It is fitting, of course, to accept Herr Kastner's encomiums on our own musical accomplishments and modes of musical education with courtesy and gratitude. The laudation does not differ much in degree from that which has become a habit in New York whenever Mr. Stokowski takes his players there.

But it is well to keep Sancho Panza's' injunction in mind. "There are no birds in last year's nests." Philadelphia is musically eminent in some departments, but it cannot afford to rest on its laurels. It was to some extent the competitive pressure of the Boston Symphony—before the climactic shocks of the end of the Muck regime—which spurred the aspiring Philadelphia organization, then a comparative newcomer, to eager endeavor and brilliant achievement. Toscannini and Mengelberg may be reckoned today as similarly tonic forces, less submissive to local pride but perhaps more stimulating to our authentic musical progress than all the utterly capitulating choruses of homage.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.

JAN 25 1926

MRS. WILSON-GREENE
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its great conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first appearance of the 1925-26 musical season in Washington at Poli's Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 2 at 4:30 o'clock, as the third concert in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course of afternoon musical events. The orchestra will be composed of 108 musicians this year, with Koussevitky personally conducting.

It is probable that Koussevitzky's musical genius has found its highest expression with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for never before have seat reservations for the famous organization's concerts been in greater demand. Each series in Boston and New York this season was entirely subscribed last May.

Koussevitzky has repeated in America this winter the triumphs he achieved in Paris and London last summer, where his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in the French capital and his appearances as conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra were outstanding continental music events.

There will be two more concerts in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course in addition to that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EXPRESS
BUFFALO, N. Y.

JAN 25 1926

COPYRIGHT LAW INTERRUPTS SYMPHONY RADIO CONCERT

Boston, Mass., Jan. 24 (A. P.).—The Boston Symphony orchestra went on the air last night for the first time, but the broadcasting was interrupted by the copyright law. While the orchestra played the Sinfonietta of Eugene Goosens, this week's guest conductor, the radio fans heard nothing.

It appeared that the rights to the composition are held by J. and W. Chester of London, and the American rights by G. Ricordi & Co. of New York. The latter firm refused to permit the broadcasting and even a request from Mr. Goosens was declined.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINE PROGRAM CHARMS BIG CROWD

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts Famous Orchestra in Superb Manner — 4800 Hear Popular Classics

By FRANCIS REGAL

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, made its annual visit to this city yesterday for a concert in the Auditorium for the Y. M. C. A. Sunday afternoon course of which its appearances have for a number of years been the great feature. The hall was, of course, filled, and not all could get in, but in issuing free tickets, some care was taken not to exceed too greatly the room available, so that the number of those disappointed should be as small as possible. Since these annual orchestral concerts began, the cost has more than doubled, so that their support has become a problem which this year was met in part by an appeal for subscriptions in blocks of five tickets, which reduced somewhat the amount necessary to be taken up at the collection in order that too heavy a burden should not be put upon the other entertainments in the course.

At present this is the only important event by a visiting orchestra in the city's musical season, but at least it is assured of a large audience. Under these conditions, the need is probably for much the kind of program that Mr Koussevitzky gave yesterday. It contained four famous works, the overture to "Euryanthe," by Weber, the "Pathetic" symphony by Tschaikowsky, "The Afternoon of a Faun," by Debussy, and "Les Preludes," by Liszt. Some of the listeners may have been disappointed not to have at least one modern work, but the program was no doubt more to the taste of the audience as a whole than one too full of novelties would have been. Some of the previous conductors have at times tended to give such programs as suit very well a Boston audience which attends every week, but are not so well adapted for hearers who have to make one concert last a long time. It is well that the main part of the music given should be old and familiar, yet even so, a place might be found for one work to show what winds are now blowing in the world of music.

Conductor at Best

There could be no question, however, that the program suited the style and temperament of Mr Koussevitzky, a conductor with whose remarkable gifts Springfield made acquaintance last year. Since then he has had more time to shape the orchestra to his taste, and the changes are considerable, though not revolutionary. One noticed, even before the music began, the rearrangement of forces, putting all the violins together on the conductor's left, while the front of the right half of the stage, formerly held by the second violins, is assigned to the violas, with the 'cellos behind them and widely separated from the basses which are aligned along the left and rear walls.

A standardized arrangement seems more remote than ever, and nowadays most conductors have their hobbies—in the New England Philharmonic society of late the traditional place of the second violins has been given to the 'cellos. That the arrangement matters greatly to the audience is unlikely but no doubt it makes a great difference to the musicians. And in some passages yesterday the violins seemed to gain by being put in one solid mass, while the violas certainly were more effective than is sometimes the case.

Orchestra Plays Well

That the quality of the orchestra, brought back to something like its old standard before Mr Monteux completed his term of service, has not deteriorated, was shown in the opening number, the lovely "Euryanthe" overture, which to many was the most beautiful part of a fine concert. Even in this classical music, which leans but a little way toward the romantic, the fiery, yet well controled temperament of the conductor was shown; if a conductor must nowadays play the role of a conjuror, Mr Koussevitzky, whose histrionic talent rivals his musical gifts, plays it very well.

[illegible] was in the "Pathetic" symphony, [illegible]ver, that his great mastery of [illegible] was revealed, and the perform[illegible] was thrilling without being ex[illegible]ted. He took it easily, with his [illegible] poised alertness, even putting [illegible] the baton when a steady march [illegible] conducted itself, and saving [illegible]ergy for the crucial moments. [illegible] symphony has had several notable productions in this city, but none surpassing the interpretation given yesterday. It is a symphony that should be saved for occasions when it can be greatly played; the greater the emotional strain of a work the more rest it needs if it is not to be worn out.

Popular Numbers Given

Something of the same sort might be said of the other big number of the afternoon, Liszt's "Les Preludes," the one orchestral work by this composer which has attained universal popularity, and one which many people who like it well do not care to hear too often. Perhaps as a matter of abstract program making it would have been better not to have them both on one program, but both are of the kind in which Mr Koussevitzky is at his best and both were tremendously popular. Between them, for relief and contrast came Debussy's idyllic "Afternoon of a Faun," the exquisite impressionism of which still charms, even though present-day musicians seem to be turning aside from the enchanted portal which Debussy opened—perhaps there was not so very much behind it after all, not more than he needed for his own uses. On the whole the program was richer in color than in content, delighting the ear rather than giving the listener stuff to carry away, but of its kind it was admirable and Mr Koussevitzky confirmed last year's impression that he must be put among the foremost conductors of the day. The great orchestra which he conducts is also playing superbly, if not quite so carefully as under his predecessor's baton—in Weber's music for example, the 'cellos should not scratch. It was one of the most successful concerts the orchestra has given here, and the interest taken in it is shown by the fact that it was heard by 4800 persons, from 500 to 700 being unable to get in. In the sum of pleasure given it perhaps equaled four or five concerts given to audiences of but moderate size.

Eugene Goossens, as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was the centre of attraction last evening at Infantry Hall. The applause which greeted him on his first appearance was seemingly perfunctory, but after the rendition of Wagner's overture, under his leadership, the applause was the result of the audience's ability to recognize a musician of merit.

In Brahms' Symphony in E-minor the leader found a pleasing vehicle in which to display his talents. The symphony played last evening may not be the greatest effort of Brahm, but it is an engrossing musical creation that offered ample possibilities for the conductor to show his understanding and imagination, and the guest conductor was masterful in his interpretation of the difficult masterpiece.

The programme was played in the following order:

Overture to "Der Freischutz" ...Weber
Symphony in E-minor, No. 4, op. 98.. Brahms
Allegro non troppo.
Andante moderato.
Allegro giocoso.
Allegro energico e passionato.
Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde" ....Wagner
"On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring" .... Delius
"Finlandia;" symphonic poem for Orchestra, op. 26, No. 7 ....Sibelius

The players were at the height of responsiveness and interpreted the conductor's interpretation with delicacy. The presentation of Wagner's prelude was colorful and beggars description, although filled with charming effects. Frederick Delius' song of nature was full of fine haunting melody and was a charming vehicle to exhibit the fine tonal quality of a flute when played by a master.

"Finlandia," the symphonic poem by Sibelius, offered the conductor an opportunity to use the brass choir effectively. The rendition was received with marked pleasure by the audience. As is generally the case, at the conclusion of the concert the musicians were enthusiastically applauded.

GOOSSENS TO LEAD SYMPHONY TUESDAY

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given next Tuesday evening, with an innovation in conducting brated En

the baton.
Weber's ov
Brahms's

WORLD COURT CRISIS NEARS

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 17 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Eugene Goossens, Guest Conductor for Tuesday Concert, Win Praise in New York.—Many Clubs Meet This Week

The feature of the week's music events here is the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Eugene Goossens, guest conductor, in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening. Both Mr. Goossens and the Boston orchestra come here fresh from triumphs in New York, the English conductor having completed a series of six appearances with the New York Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky's musicians having won high praise for performances which they gave in the metropolis under their own conductor recently.

It so happened that Mr. Goossens made his first appearance with the New York orchestra on the same evening that Mr. Koussevitzky led the Hub players in their first concert of the latest New York series, a week ago Thursday evening. Mr. Googgens was termed a conductor of "rare sympathy and commanding power" by Lawrence Gilman in the Herald-Tribune, who stated that his performance of the difficult "Le Sacre du Printemps" by Stravinsky was "electrifying in its rythmical power, its unflagging intensity." And the same critic, writing of the rendition of Strauss's "An Alpine Symphony" by Mr. Koussevitzky, and his orchestra states: "Mr. Koussevitzky gave the work a reading of unforgettable breadth and fervor and the orchestra . . . played it superbly."

For his programme here Tuesday evening Mr. Goossens, who has been a conspicuous figure in the musical life of London since the war, offers works by Weber, Wagner, Brahms, Sibelius and Delius, which are considered in Warren Storey Smith's article on this page.

A tribute to the Boston Symphony and Mr. Koussevitzky was contained in a review of one of the New York concerts in the Times, written by Olin Downes, who stated that the performance justified superlatives. "There were superlative performances and superlative interpratives by the most incalculable personality among the great conductors who appear in this city," wrote the critic.

"Mr. Koussevitzky placed his splendid band and his extraordinary gifts wholly at the services of the composers. He differentiated with self-effacement and a fine objectivity between each one of them—Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Bloch, Ravel. At the same time he infused everything he did with a virtuoso's control of his instrument that gave the concert a foremost rank among the many notable orchestral performances which have been given thus far in New York.

"The concert left no doubt of the remarkable development the orchestra has undergone under Mr. Koussevitzky. The brilliancy of the tone was matched by its lustre and fineness of texture. There are other orchestras which achieve a certain hard precision or a brass band quality of effectiveness. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to-day an aggregation of artists, most of them virtuosos, all of them men capable of instant and adequate response to the wishes of a magnetic leader."

Guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its concert here next Tuesday evening at Infantry Hall.

---

lows:

Overture to "Der Freichutz" ..Weber
Symphony in E-minor, No. 4, Op. 98.. .... Brahms
Allegro non troppo.
Andante moderato.
Allegro giocoso.
Allegro energico e passionato.
Prelude and Liebstod from "Tristan and Isolde" .... Wagner
"On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring" .... Delius
"Finlandia": Symphonic Poem for Orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7 ..... Sibelius

It seemed to us that Mr. Goossens played the second movement of the symphony and Delius's charming tone-poem better than anything else. One realized that in temperament Mr. Goossens and Mr. Koussevitzky are poles apart, while equally intelligent and scholarly. To use a very old distinction, however, Mr. Goossens was inclined to be classical and severe where Mr. Koussevitzky would have shown the adventurous spirit that goes with a romantic and highly imaginative nature.

This distinction between the two conductors is well sensed by the Boston players, but, very naturally, it has the effect of sometimes leaving them a little bewildered. Probably Mr. Goossens did not have the advantage of rehearsing very often with them before last night's performance and he frequently had difficulty in getting what he wanted. This was noteworthy both in the "Freischutz" overture and the "Prelude and Liebestod" from "Tristan," Indeed in the latter Mr. Goossens and his players seemed never to have a perfect understanding, and the result was a hesitant performance, never quite sure of itself. Similarly the sonorous barbarity of the "Finlandia" was lost in a desire for emphasizing its tuneful melodies. But in the quiet and pastoral-like Delius poem conductor and players were charmingly of one mind.

We hope to hear Mr. Goossens again with a band more fashioned in the likeness of his own high talent and interesting temperament. His love of classicism is rare in the present generation, but at its best it ought to be splendidly refreshing, spiritually restful, indeed, when Mr. Koussevitzky has sent us galloping a trifle too fast toward the Land of Heart's Desire.

R. de A. J.

[illegible] art production there are elements of fragility that may be disconcertingly fed by superflattery. The worst thing that could happen to the art impulses of this community is envelopment in an atmosphere of contentment and self-satisfaction. The corrosive consequences of smug estheticism are well known and are such as eventually to lead to hollow convention, uninspired routine and dry rot.

It is fitting, of course, to accept Herr Kastner's encomiums on our own musical accomplishments and modes of musical education with courtesy and gratitude. The laudation does not differ much in degree from that which has become a habit in New York whenever Mr. Stokowski takes his players there.

But it is well to keep Sancho Panza's' injunction in mind. "There are no birds in last year's nests." Philadelphia is musically eminent in some departments, but it cannot afford to rest on its laurels. It was to some extent the competitive pressure of the Boston Symphony—before the climactic shocks of the end of the Muck regime—which spurred the aspiring Philadelphia organization, then a comparative newcomer, to eager endeavor and brilliant achievement. Toscannini and Mengelberg may be reckoned today as similarly tonic forces, less submissive to local pride but perhaps more stimulating to our authentic musical progress than all the utterly capitulating choruses of homage.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.

JAN 25 1926

MRS. WILSON-GREENE
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its great conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first appearance of the 1925-26 musical season in Washington at Poli's Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock, as the third concert in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course of afternoon musical events. The orchestra will be composed of 108 musicians this year, with Kousse-vitky personally conducting.

It is probable that Koussevitzky's musical genius has found its highest expression with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for never before have seat reservations for the famous orvanization's concerts been in greater demand. Each series in Boston and New York this season was entirely subscribed last May.

Koussevitzky has repeated in America this winter the triumphs he achieved in Paris and London last summer, where his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in the French capital and his appearances as conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra were outstanding continental music events.

There will be two more concerts in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course in addition to that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on February 2, with Beniamino Gigli, leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, at Poli's on Friday afternoon, February 26, and Mme Galli-Curci, the world's greatest coloratura, at Poli's on Wednesday afternoon, March 17. Seats for these concerts are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

[illegible] law. While the orchestra played the Sinfonietta of Eugene Goosens, this week's guest conductor, the radio fans heard nothing.

It appeared that the rights to the composition are held by J. and W. Chester of London, and the American rights by G. Ricordi & Co. of New York. The latter firm refused to permit the broadcasting and even a request from Mr. Goosens was declined.

4 - Piece Bedroom
Economy Price . . .
Pay $2 Weekly

163

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINE PROGRAM CHARMS BIG CROWD

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts Famous Orchestra in Superb Manner — 4800 Hear Popular Classics

By FRANCIS REGAL

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, made its annual visit to this city yesterday for a concert in the Auditorium for the Y. M. C. A. Sunday afternoon course of which its appearances have for a number of years been the great feature. The hall was, of course, filled, and not all could get in, but in issuing free tickets, some care was taken not to exceed too greatly the room available, so that the umber of those disappointed should be as small as possible. Since these annual orchestral concerts began, the cost has more than doubled, so that their support has become a problem which this year was met in part by an appeal for subscriptions in blocks of five tickets, which reduced somewhat the amount necessary to be taken up at the collection in order that too heavy a burden should not be put upon the other entertainments in the course.

At present this is the only important event by a visiting orchestra in the city's musical season, but at least it is assured of a large audience. Under these conditions, the need is probably for much the kind of program that Mr Koussevitzky gave yesterday. It contained four famous works, the overture to "Euryanthe," by Weber, the "Pathetic" symphony by Tschaikowsky, "The Afternoon of a Faun," by Debussy, and "Les Preludes," by Liszt. Some of the listeners may have been disappointed not to have at least one modern work, but the program was no doubt more to the taste of the audience as a whole than one too full of novelties would have been. Some of the previous conductors have at times tended to give such programs as suit very well a Boston audience which attends every week, but are not so well adapted for hearers who have to make one concert last a long time. It is well that the main part of the music given should be old and familiar, yet even so, a place might be found for one work to show what winds are now blowing in the world of music.

Conductor at Best

There could be no question, however, that the program suited the style and temperament of Mr Koussevitzky, a conductor with whose remarkable gifts Springfield made acquaintance last year. Since then he has had more time to shape the orchestra to his taste, and the changes are considerable, though not revolutionary. One noticed, even before the music began, the rearrangement of forces, putting all the violins together on the conductor's left, while the front of the right half of the stage, formerly held by the second violins, is assigned to the violas, with the 'cellos behind them and widely separated from the basses which are aligned along the left and rear walls.

A standardized arrangement seems more remote than ever, and nowadays most conductors have their hobbies—in the New England Philharmonic society of late the traditional place of the second violins has been given to the 'cellos. That the arrangement matters greatly to the audience is unlikely but no doubt it makes a great difference to the musicians. And in some passages yesterday the violins seemed to gain by being put in one solid mass, while the violas certainly were more effective than is sometimes the case.

Orchestra Plays Well

That the quality of the orchestra, brought back to something like its old standard before Mr Monteux completed his term of service, has not deteriorated, was shown in the opening number, the lovely "Euryanthe" overture, which to many was the most beautiful part of a fine concert. Even in this classical music, which leans but a little way toward the romantic, the fiery, yet well controled temperament of the conductor was shown; if a conductor must nowadays play the role of a conjuror, Mr Koussevitzky, whose histrionic talent rivals his musical gifts, plays it very well.

It was in the "Pathetic" symphony, however, that his great mastery of climax was revealed, and the performance was thrilling without being exaggerated. He took it easily, with his usual poised alertness, even putting down the baton when a steady march rhythm conducted itself, and saving his energy for the crucial moments. The symphony has had several notable productions in this city, but none surpassing the interpretation given yesterday. It is a symphony that should be saved for occasions when it can be greatly played; the greater the emotional strain of a work the more rest it needs if it is not to be worn out.

Popular Numbers Given

Something of the same sort might be said of the other big number of the afternoon, Liszt's "Les Preludes," the one orchestral work by this composer which has attained universal popularity, and one which many people who like it well do not care to hear too often. Perhaps as a matter of abstract program making it would have been better not to have them both on one program, but both are of the kind in which Mr Koussevitzky is at his best and both were tremendously popular. Between them, for relief and contrast came Debussy's idyllic "Afternoon of a Faun," the exquisite impressionism of which still charms, even though present-day musicians seem to be turning aside from the enchanted portal which Debussy opened—perhaps there was not so very much behind it after all, not more than he needed for his own uses. On the whole the program was richer in color than in content, delighting the ear rather than giving the listener stuff to carry away, but of its kind it was admirable and Mr Koussevitzky confirmed last year's impression that he must be put among the foremost conductors of the day. The great orchestra which he conducts is also playing superbly, if not quite so carefully as under his predecessor's baton—in Weber's music for example, the 'cellos should not scratch. It was one of the most successful concerts the orchestra has given here, and the interest taken in it is shown by the fact that it was heard by 4800 persons, from 500 to 700 being unable to get in. In the sum of pleasure given it perhaps equaled four or five concerts given to audiences of but moderate size.

Eugene Goossens, as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was the centre of attraction last evening at Infantry Hall. The applause which greeted him on his first appearance was seemingly perfunctory, but after the rendition of Wagner's overture, under his leadership, the applause was the result of the audience's ability to recognize a musician of merit.

In Brahms' Symphony in E-minor the leader found a pleasing vehicle in which to display his talents. The symphony played last evening may not be the greatest effort of Brahm, but it is an engrossing musical creation that offered ample possibilities for the conductor to show his understanding and imagination, and the guest conductor was masterful in his interpretation of the difficult masterpiece.

The programme was played in the following order:

Overture to "Der Freischutz" ...Weber
Symphony in E-minor, No. 4, op. 98.. Brahms
Allegro non troppo.
Andante moderato.
Allegro giocoso.
Allegro energico e passionato.
Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde" ....Wagner
"On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring" .... Delius
"Finlandia;" symphonic poem for orchestra, op. 26, No. 7 ....Sibelius

The players were at the height of responsiveness and interpreted the conductor's interpretation with delicacy. The presentation of Wagner's prelude was colorful and beggars description, although filled with charming effects. Frederick Delius' song of nature was full of fine haunting melody and was a charming vehicle to exhibit the fine tonal quality of a flute when played by a master.

"Finlandia," the symphonic poem by Sibelius, offered the conductor an opportunity to use the brass choir effectively. The rendition was received with marked pleasure by the audience.

As is generally the case, at the conclusion of the concert the musicians were enthusiastically applauded.

GOOSSENS TO LEAD SYMPHONY TUESDAY

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given next Tuesday evening, with an innovation in conducting brated En

the baton.
Weber's ov
Brahmn's s

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Eugene Goossens, Guest Conductor for Tuesday Concert, Win Praise in New York.—Many Clubs Meet This Week

The feature of the week's music events here is the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Eugene Goossens, guest conductor, in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening. Both Mr. Goossens and the Boston orchestra come here fresh from triumphs in New York, the English conductor having completed a series of six appearances with the New York Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky's musicians having won high praise for performances which they gave in the metropolis under their own conductor recently.

It so happened that Mr. Goossens made his first appearance with the New York orchestra on the same evening that Mr. Koussevitzky led the Hub players in their first concert of the latest New York series, a week ago Thursday evening. Mr. Googgens was termed a conductor of "rare sympathy and commanding power" by Lawrence Gilman in the Herald-Tribune, who stated that his performance of the difficult "Le Sacre du Printemps" by Stravinsky was "electrifying in its rythmical power, its unflagging intensity." And the same critic, writing of the rendition of Strauss's "An Alpine Symphony" by Mr. Koussevitzky, and his orchestra states: "Mr. Koussevitzky gave th work a reading of unforgettable breadt and fervor and the orchestra . . . played it superbly."

For his programme here Tuesday evening Mr. Goossens, who has been a conspicuous figure in the musical life of London since the war, offers works by Weber, Wagner, Brahms, Sibelius and Delius, which are considered in Warren Storey Smith's article on this page.

A tribute to the Boston Symphony and Mr. Koussevitzky was contained in a review of one of the New York concerts in the Times, written by Olin Downes, who stated that the performance justified superlatives. "There were superlative performances and superlative interpratives by the most incalculable personality among the great conductors who appear in this city," wrote the critic.

"Mr. Koussevitzky placed his splendid band and his extraordinary gifts wholly at the services of the composers. He differentiated with self-effacement and a fine objectivity between each one of them—Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Bloch, Ravel. At the same time he infused everything he did with a virtuoso's control of his instrument that gave the concert a foremost rank among the many notable orchestral performances which have been given thus far in New York.

"The concert left no doubt of the remarkable development the orchestra has undergone under Mr. Koussevitzky. The brilliancy of the tone was matched by its lustre and fineness of texture. There are other orchestras which achieve a certain hard precision or a brass band quality of effectiveness. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to-day an aggregation of artists, most of them virtuosos, all of them men capable of instant and adequate response to the wishes of a magnetic leader."

Guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its concert here next Tuesday evening at Infantry Hall.

---

lows:

Overture to "Der Freichutz" ..Weber
Symphony in E-minor, No. 4, Op. 98.. .... Brahms
Allegro non troppo.
Andante moderato.
Allegro giocoso.
Allegro energico e passionato.
Prelude and Liebstod from "Tristan and Isolde" .... Wagner
"On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring" .... Delius
"Finlandia": Symphonic Poem for Orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7 ..... Sibelius

It seemed to us that Mr. Goossens played the second movement of the symphony and Delius's charming tone-poem better than anything else. One realized that in temperament Mr. Goossens and Mr. Koussevitzky are poles apart, while equally intelligent and scholarly. To use a very old distinction, however, Mr. Goossens was inclined to be classical and severe where Mr. Koussevitzky would have shown the adventurous spirit that goes with a romantic and highly imaginative nature.

This distinction between the two conductors is well sensed by the Boston players, but, very naturally, it has the effect of sometimes leaving them a little bewildered. Probably Mr. Goossens did not have the advantage of rehearsing very often with them before last night's performance and he frequently had difficulty in getting what he wanted. This was noteworthy both in the "Freischutz" overture and the "Prelude and Liebestod" from "Tristan," Indeed in the latter Mr. Goossens and his players seemed never to have a perfect understanding, and the result was a hesitant performance, never quite sure of itself. Similarly the sonorous barbarity of the "Finlandia" was lost in a desire for emphasizing its tuneful melodies. But in the quiet and pastoral-like Delius poem conductor and players were charmingly of one mind.

We hope to hear Mr. Goossens again with a band more fashioned in the likeness of his own high talent and interesting temperament. His love of classicism is rare in the present generation, but at its best it ought to be splendidly refreshing, spiritually restful, indeed, when Mr. Koussevitzky has sent us galloping a trifle too fast toward the Land of Heart's Desire.

R. de A. J.

WORLD COURT CRISIS NEARS

---

art production there are elements of fragility that may be disconcertingly fed by superflattery. The worst thing that could happen to the art impulses of this community is envelopment in an atmosphere of contentment and self-satisfaction. The corrosive consequences of smug estheticism are well known and are such as eventually to lead to hollow convention, uninspired routine and dry rot.

It is fitting, of course, to accept Herr Kastner's encomiums on our own musical accomplishments and modes of musical education with courtesy and gratitude. The laudation does not differ much in degree from that which has become a habit in New York whenever Mr. Stokowski takes his players there.

But it is well to keep Sancho Panza's' injunction in mind. "There are no birds in last year's nests." Philadelphia is musically eminent in some departments, but it cannot afford to rest on its laurels. It was to some extent the competitive pressure of the Boston Symphony—before the climactic shocks of the end of the Muck regime—which spurred the aspiring Philadelphia organization, then a comparative newcomer, to eager endeavor and brilliant achievement. Toscannini and Mengelberg may be reckoned today as similarly tonic forces, less submissive to local pride but perhaps more stimulating to our authentic musical progress than all the utterly capitulating choruses of homage.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.

JAN 25 1926

MRS. WILSON-GREENE
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its great conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first appearance of the 1925-26 musical season in Washington at Poli's Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 2 at 4:30 o'clock, as the third concert in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course of afternoon musical events. The orchestra will be composed of 108 musicians this year, with Koussevitky personally conducting.

It is probable that Koussevitzky's musical genius has found its highest expression with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for never before have seat reservations for the famous orvanization's concerts been in greater demand. Each series in Boston and New York this season was entirely subscribed last May.

Koussevitzky has repeated in America this winter the triumphs he achieved in Paris and London last summer, where his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in the French capital and his appearances as conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra were outstanding continental music events.

There will be two more concerts in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course in addition to that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on February 2, with Beniamino Gigli, leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, at Poli's on Friday afternoon, February 26, and Mme Galli-Curci, the world's greatest coloratura, at Poli's on Wednesday afternoon, March 17. Seats for these concerts are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

---

law.

while the orchestra played the Sinfonietta of Eugene Goosens, this week's guest conductor, the radio fans heard nothing.

It appeared that the rights to the composition are held by J. and W. Chester of London, and the American rights by G. Ricordi & Co. of New York. The latter firm refused to permit the broadcasting and even a request from Mr. Goosens was declined.

4 - Piece Bedroom
Economy Price . . .
Pay $2 Weekly

and Newcastle-on-Tyne,

N SYMPHONY E PROGRAM IS BIG CROWD

oussevitzky Con- nous Orchestra in Manner — 4800 pular Classics

RANCIS REGAL

Symphony orchestra, itzky, conductor, made it to this city yesterday in the Auditorium for
A. Sunday afternoon
ch its appearances have of years been the great hall was, of course,
t all could get in, but in ickets, some care was exceed too greatly the e, so that the umber of nted should be as small nce these annual orches-egan, the cost has more so that their support has blem which this year
rt by an appeal for sub-locks of five tickets, somewhat the amount
e taken up at the col-that too heavy a burbe put upon the other in the course.
his is the only import-a visiting orchestra in cal season, but at least f a large audience. Unions, the need is probthe kind of program
vitzky gave yesterday.
our famous works, the Euryanthe," by Weber, symphony by Tschai-Afternoon of a Faun," nd "Les Preludes," by the listeners may have ted not to have at least ork, but the program
nore to the taste of the audience as a whole than one too full of novelties would have been. Some of the previous conductors have at times tended to give such programs as suit very well a Boston audience which attends every week, but are not so well adapted for hearers who have to make one concert last a long time. It is well that the main part of the music given should be old and familiar, yet even so, a place might be found for one work to show what winds are now blowing in the world of music.

Conductor at Best

There could be no question, however, that the program suited the style and temperament of Mr Koussevitzky, a conductor with whose remarkable gifts Springfield made acquaintance last year. Since then he has had more time to shape the orchestra to his taste, and the changes are considerable, though not revolutionary. One noticed, even before the music began, the rearrangement of forces, putting all the violins together on the conductor's left, while the front of the right half of the stage, formerly held by the second violins, is assigned to the violas, with the 'cellos behind them and widely separated from the basses which are aligned along the left and rear walls.

A standardized arrangement seems more remote than ever, and nowadays most conductors have their hobbies—in the New England Philharmonic society of late the traditional place of the second violins has been given to the 'cellos. That the arrangement matters greatly to the audience is unlikely but no doubt it makes a great difference to the musicians. And in some passages yesterday the violins seemed to gain by being put in one solid mass, while the violas certainly were more effective than is sometimes the case.

Orchestra Plays Well

That the quality of the orchestra, brought back to something like its old standard before Mr Monteux completed his term of service, has not deteriorated, was shown in the opening number, the lovely "Euryanthe" overture, which to many was the most beautiful part of a fine concert. Even in this classical music, which leans but a little way toward the romantic, the fiery, yet well controled temperament of the conductor was shown; if a conductor must nowadays play the role of a conjuror, Mr Koussevitzky, whose histrionic talent rivals his musical gifts, plays it very well.

[illegible] was in the "Pathetic" symphony, [illegible]ever, that his great mastery of [illegible]ax was revealed, and the perform[illegible] was thrilling without being ex[illegible]ated. He took it easily, with his [illegible] poised alertness, even putting [illegible] the baton when a steady march [illegible] conducted itself, and saving [illegible]ergy for the crucial moments. [illegible]e symphony has had several notable productions in this city, but none surpassing the interpretation given yesterday. It is a symphony that should be saved for occasions when it can be greatly played; the greater the emotional strain of a work the more rest it needs if it is not to be worn out.

Popular Numbers Given

Something of the same sort might be said of the other big number of the afternoon, Liszt's "Les Preludes," the one orchestral work by this composer which has attained universal popularity, and one which many people who like it well do not care to hear too often. Perhaps as a matter of abstract program making it would have been better not to have them both on one program, but both are of the kind in which Mr Koussevitzky is at his best and both were tremendously popular. Between them, for relief and contrast came Debussy's idyllic "Afternoon of a Faun," the exquisite impressionism of which still charms, even though present-day musicians seem to be turning aside from the enchanted portal which Debussy opened—perhaps there was not so very much behind it after all, not more than he needed for his own uses. On the whole the program was richer in color than in content, delighting the ear rather than giving the listener stuff to carry away, but of its kind it was admirable and Mr Koussevitzky confirmed last year's impression that he must be put among the foremost conductors of the day. The great orchestra which he conducts is also playing superbly, if not quite so carefully as under his predecessor's baton—in Weber's music for example, the 'cellos should not scratch. It was one of the most successful concerts the orchestra has given here, and the interest taken in it is shown by the fact that it was heard by 4800 persons, from 500 to 700 being unable to get in. In the sum of pleasure given it perhaps equaled four or five concerts given to audiences of but moderate size.

---

ns, as guest conductor mphony orchestra, was ttraction last evening
. The applause which is first appearance was actory, but after the gner's overture, under he applause was the ence's ability to rec-of merit.
hony in E-minor the easing vehicle in talents. The symevening may not be f Brahm, but it is cal creation that ilities for the con-understanding and e guest conductor is interpretation of piece.
was played in the eischutz" ...Weber or, No. 4, op. 98..

Brahms
roppo.
rato.
o.
co e passionato.
d from "Tris-
..........Wagner
rst Cuckoo in .... Delius
nic poem for
No. 7 ....Sibelius
the height of rerpreted the conn with delicacy.
Wagner's prelude gars description,
charming effects.
ng of nature was melody and was exhibit the fine ute when played phonic poem by onductor an oprass choir effec-was received by the audience.

case, at the cont the musicians applauded.

4 - Piece Bedroom
Economy Price . . .
Pay $2 Weekly

GOOSSENS TO LEAD SYMPHONY TUESDAY

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given next Tuesday evening, with an innovation in conducting. Eugene Gossens, the celebrated English composer, will wield the baton. His program will include Weber's overture to "Der Freichutz," Brahmn's symphony in E minor; Wagner's prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde;" Belius' "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," and Sibelious' symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

Mr [illegible]oossens has just completed a two-w[illegible]eek engagement as guest conductor [illegible] of the New York Symphony in that [illegible]ity. He is the conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Rochester, which is conducted under the patronage of Mr. Eastman, who founded the orchestra in conjunction with the Eastman School of Music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Eugene Goossens, Guest Conductor for Tuesday Concert, Win Praise in New York.—Many Clubs Meet This Week

Guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its concert here next Tuesday evening at Infantry Hall.

The feature of the week's music events here is the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Eugene Goossens, guest conductor, in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening. Both Mr. Goossens and the Boston orchestra come here fresh from triumphs in New York, the English conductor having completed a series of six appearances with the New York Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky's musicians having won high praise for performances which they gave in the metropolis under their own conductor recently.

It so happened that Mr. Goossens made his first appearance with the New York orchestra on the same evening that Mr. Koussevitzky led the Hub players in their first concert of the latest New York series, a week ago Thursday evening. Mr. Googgens was termed a conductor of "rare sympathy and commanding power" by Lawrence Gilman in the Herald-Tribune, who stated that his performance of the difficult "Le Sacre du Printemps" by Stravinsky was "electrifying in its rythmical power, its unflagging intensity." And the same critic, writing of the rendition of Strauss's "An Alpine Symphony" by Mr. Koussevitzky, and his orchestra states: "Mr. Koussevitzky gave th work a reading of unforgettable breadt and fervor and the orchestra . . . played it superbly."

For his programme here Tuesday ev ning Mr. Goossens, who has been a co spicuous figure in the musical life of Lo don since the war, offers works by Weber, Wagner, Brahms, Sibelius and Delius, which are considered in Warren Storey Smith's article on this page.

A tribute to the Boston Symphony and Mr. Koussevitzky was contained in a review of one of the New York concerts in the Times, written by Olin Downes, who stated that the performance justified superlatives. "There were superlative performances and superlative interpratives by the most incalculable personality among the great conductors who appear in this city," wrote the critic.

"Mr. Koussevitzky placed his splendid band and his extraordinary gifts wholly at the services of the composers. He differentiated with self-effacement and a fine objectivity between each one of them—Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Bloch, Ravel. At the same time he infused everything he did with a virtuoso's control of his instrument that gave the concert a foremost rank among the many notable orchestral performances which have been given thus far in New York.

"The concert left no doubt of the remarkable development the orchestra has undergone under Mr. Koussevitzky. The brilliancy of the tone was matched by its lustre and fineness of texture. There are other orchestras which achieve a certain hard precision or a brass band quality of effectiveness. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to-day an aggregation of artists, most of them virtuosos, all of them men capable of instant and adequate response to the wishes of a magnetic leader."

---

lows:

Overture to "Der Freichutz" ..Weber
Symphony in E-minor, No. 4, Op. 98..
.... Brahms
  Allegro non troppo.
  Andante moderato.
  Allegro giocoso.
  Allegro energico e passionato.
Prelude and Liebstod from "Tristan and Isolde" .... Wagner
"On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring" .... Delius
"Finlandia": Symphonic Poem for Orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7 ..... Sibelius

It seemed to us that Mr. Goossens played the second movement of the symphony and Delius's charming tone-poem better than anything else. One realized that in temperament Mr. Goossens and Mr. Koussevitzky are poles apart, while equally intelligent and scholarly. To use a very old distinction, however, Mr. Goossens was inclined to be classical and severe where Mr. Koussevitzky would have shown the adventurous spirit that goes with a romantic and highly imaginative nature.

This distinction between the two conductors is well sensed by the Boston players, but, very naturally, it has the effect of sometimes leaving them a little bewildered. Probably Mr. Goossens did not have the advantage of rehearsing very often with them before last night's performance and he frequently had difficulty in getting what he wanted. This was noteworthy both in the "Freischutz" overture and the "Prelude and Liebestod" from "Tristan," Indeed in the latter Mr. Goossens and his players seemed never to have a perfect understanding, and the result was a hesitant performance, never quite sure of itself. Similarly the sonorous barbarity of the "Finlandia" was lost in a desire for emphasizing its tuneful melodies. But in the quiet and pastoral-like Delius poem conductor and players were charmingly of one mind.

We hope to hear Mr. Goossens again with a band more fashioned in the likeness of his own high talent and interesting temperament. His love of classicism is rare in the present generation, but at its best it ought to be splendidly refreshing, spiritually restful, indeed, when Mr. Koussevitzky has sent us galloping a trifle too fast toward the Land of Heart's Desire.

R. de A. J.

[illegible] art production th[illegible] are elements of fragility that may be disconcertingly fed by superflattery. The worst thing that could happen to the art impulses of this community is envelopment in an atmosphere of contentment and self-satisfaction. The corrosive consequences of smug estheticism are well known and are such as eventually to lead to hollow convention, uninspired routine and dry rot.

It is fitting, of course, to accept Herr Kastner's encomiums on our own musical accomplishments and modes of musical education with courtesy and gratitude. The laudation does not differ much in degree from that which has become a habit in New York whenever Mr. Stokowski takes his players there.

But it is well to keep Sancho Panza's' injunction in mind. "There are no birds in last year's nests." Philadelphia is musically eminent in some departments, but it cannot afford to rest on its laurels. It was to some extent the competitive pressure of the Boston Symphony—before the climactic shocks of the end of the Muck regime—which spurred the aspiring Philadelphia organization, then a comparative newcomer, to eager endeavor and brilliant achievement. Toscannini and Mengelberg may be reckoned today as similarly tonic forces, less submissive to local pride but perhaps more stimulating to our authentic musical progress than all the utterly capitulating choruses of homage.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.

JAN 25 1926

MRS. WILSON-GREENE
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its great conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first appearance of the 1925-26 musical season in Washington at Poli's Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 2 at 4:30 o'clock, as the third concert in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course of afternoon musical events. The orchestra will be composed of 108 musicians this year, with Koussevitky personally conducting.

It is probable that Koussevitzky's musical genius has found its highest expression with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for never before have seat reservations for the famous orvanization's concerts been in greater demand. Each series in Boston and New York this season was entirely subscribed last May.

Koussevitzky has repeated in America this winter the triumphs he achieved in Paris and London last summer, where his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in the French capital and his appearances as conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra were outstanding continental music events.

There will be two more concerts in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course in addition to that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on February 2, with Beniamino Gigli, leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, at Poli's on Friday afternoon, February 26, and Mme Galli-Curci, the world's greatest coloratura, at Poli's on Wednesday afternoon, March 17. Seats for these concerts are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

[illegible] law. while the orchestra played the Sinfonietta of Eugene Goosens, this week's guest conductor, the radio fans heard nothing.

It appeared that the rights to the composition are held by J. and W. Chester of London, and the American rights by G. Ricordi & Co. of New York. The latter firm refused to permit the broadcasting and eve[illegible] a request from Mr. Goosens was [illegible]clined.

Goossens Wins Ovation With Boston Symphony

Members of Orchestra and Musical Public Are Unanimous in Recognizing His Ability—Critics Praise Him for "Balance and Faculty of Letting Music and Composer Speak for Themselves."

By A. J. Warner.

Boston, Jan. 22.—Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, appeared as guest conductor this afternoon, in Symphony Hall, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Goossens led the Boston musicians on Tuesday at a concert in Providence, R. I. Tomorrow evening he will again conduct the orchestra in Symphony Hall when today's program will be repeated. Mr. Goossens' success during his Boston engagement has been conspicuous, both with the members of the orchestra and with the music-loving sanity, musicianship and the faculty of letting the music and the composer speak for themselves.

This afternoon's program included Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz," Brahms' Symphony No. 4, Goossens' own "Sinfonietta," which was heard for the first time in Boston; Delius' "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring"; and Debussy's "Iberia"; "Images for Orchestra", No. 2.

The magnificent resources of the Boston Symphony gave the talented young conductor an opportunity to be heard at his best and throughout the performance the qualities that have won him such notable success in America were ely in evidence. One sensed the ality of his beat, rhythmic acracy that is so characteristic of readings; and the sound mual and technical foundation on ich his interpretations are sed.

A large and deeply interested lience was present to welcome Goossens to Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

JAN 2 3 1926

Goossens Wins Boston Audience with Conducting of Symphony; Debussy Suite Provides Climax

By STAFF CORRESPONDENT.

Boston, Jan. 22.—Eugene Goossens conducted his first Boston concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this afternoon. In mid-season guest conductors are the rule with New York orchestras. Not so in Boston. The Boston Symphony has never made a practice of engaging any onsiderable number of engaging any considerable number of conductor does appear with this famous orchestra, the interest is more than casual.

The reception given Mr. Goossens as he came to the conductor's desk was polite. The "Freischutz" overture evoked a cordial response in applause from the audience. The Brahms Fourth Symphony seemed to complete Mr. Goossens's conquest of his audience's favor. The program numbers which followed were increasingly applauded, the Delins "On First Hearing the Cockoo in Spring" and Mr. Goossens's own "Sinfonietta" earning receptions which might at other than orchestra concerts have been considered requests for repetitions. The Debussy "Iberia" suite, which ended the program, was a climax in virtuosity by the orchestra which roused honest enthusiasm.

String Section Superior.

Throughout the concert the playing of the orchestra was a joy to hear. The strings in particular are, in quality and ability to play a great amount of tone, tra to subordinate themselves to the instrument carrying the theme. And yet there must be beauty of tone and nicety of execution constantly maintained in pianissimos. These are not demands that an orchestra meets with casual ease, but the Boston Symphony met them at this concert

In the "octurne" of the Debussy suite and in the Delius number the wood winds played with beautiful tone and a play of crescendo and diminuendo well nigh ideal. The flute solo passages in the Delius piece were delightful. And the sonority of the brasses in the finale of the Debussy suite was superb. The interpretation of this Debussy music is one of the most arresting of interest of any which Mr. Goossens gives. There is no intricacy for the listener; there are no blatant moments despite al the mass of instrumentation and tricky rhythms. The Boston Symphony afforded its conductor complete means to convey to the audience his conception of music.

Brahms Well Conducted.

And the Goossens "Sinfoniette" was played with gusto and gaiety; the men plainly understood the spirit as well as the letter of this music; it had the incisive and yet unforced definition of rhythms that it needs.

Mr. Goossens gave the Brahms symphony an interpretation that had dignity, dramatic intensity and eloquence. It is not h's practice to endeavor to be an innovator in interpreting Brahms. He does no tricks and seeks to go no further than

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

Jan 3 1926

SYMPHONY CONCERT BY RADIO TONIGHT

First Time in History That Boston Orchestra Has Broadcast.

Tonight the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast by radio through Station WEEI. It will be the first time in history that this world famous organization has been heard over the air, and is therefore an event of tremendous importance.

Eugene Goossens, who is considered to be one of the finest conductors in the musical world, will lead his wonderful organization in the Fourth Symphony of Brahms. A group of selections has been chosen which are certain to strike the fancy of the radio audience.

When the first programme goes on the air this evening at 8 o'clock, everything possible to insure the best broadcast will have been done. During the past week, engineers from WEEI, the Western Electric Company and the New England Telephone & Telegraph Company have spent 1 hours daily trying out proper microphone locations. At the rehearsal of the symphony on Thursday and Friday mornings final tests were made. The engineers claim that everything has been done to eliminate foreign sounds from the audience, so that a perfect broadcast should be possible.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES

JAN 2 4 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ON AIR.

Waves Are Silent as Copyrighted Number Is Played.

BOSTON, Jan. 23 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra went on the air tonight for the first time in its his-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN

JAN 2 4 1926

Copyright Tangle Halts on Symphony

BOSTON, Jan. 23 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra went on the air tonight for the first time in its history, but the broadcasting was interrupted by the copyright law. While the orchestra played the "Sinfonietta" of Eugene Goossens, this week's guest conductor, the radio fans heard nothing.

It appeared that the rights to the composition are held by J. and W. Chester, of London, and the American rights by G. Ricordi & Co., of New York. The latter firm refused to permit the broadcasting and even a request from Goossens was declined.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Interest in the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra given last evening at Infantry Hall centred in the appearance of Eugene Goossens who came as guest conductor. The usual big audience attended, intent upon hearing, for the first time the orchestral leader who recently made such a fine impression in New York.

Mr. Goossens is conductor of the Roc ester Philharmonic Orchestra, a post has held since he came to this co a few years ago. His splendid with the New Yorw Symphony th son at the first of a series of ances with that organization broug more prominently before the Am musical public. He is an Englishma for many years previous to his here was a noted figure in En musical life.

Last evening Mr. Goossens gave program phony it said the grea he four interpre cessful anced p

Upon ture he but befo polite re plause

naval officers and plain peasants who have come here to witness to-morrow or Friday the take-off of Commander Ramon Franco and Capt. Ruiz de Alva in a seaplane flight to South America, and possibly thence to New York.

The aviators made a successful flight yesterday from Melilla, Morocco, to Huelva in their Ne Plus Ultra machine.

The fliers will carry with them on their trip more than 100 messages, sent by King Alfonso to President de Alvear of Argentine, and by various Spanish Mayors to the Mayor of Buenos Aires.

Franco, who is in charge is expected to take off -morrow or Friday and to the Canary Islands.

which will enable the fliers to communicate over a radius of more than miles on a wave length of between and 600 metres. The call letters of plane are EDR-12.

DANISH SHIP SEARCHE FOR SOVIET PROPAGAN

Anti-American Circulars Beli Hidden in Freighters' Cargo

Philadelphia, Jan. 20.—(AP)—Go were searching ighter Ivar, altic ports

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS-HERALD
PORTLAND, ME.

JAN 2 3 1926

Boston Symphony Concert Is Coming Via Station WCSH

Portland Studio Linked With WEEI and WTAG For First Time

It has arrived. The time that has been awaited by radio listeners throughout Maine and beyond, since last Summer, when Station WCSH of the Congress Square Hotel, Portland, should be linked with prominent stations outside the State, for the rebroadcasting of exceptional programs, is here.

Tonight, between 8.15 and 10.15 p. m., WCSH, on a direct hook-up with WEEI of Boston and WTAG of Worcester, will broadcast no less a musical treat than the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a two-hour program to be played at Symphony Hall, Boston.

Tomorrow evening's broadcast of the Symphony will be the first of a series of 12 such concerts to be given Saturday evening from 8.15 to 10.15 o'clock. On the Saturday night following tomorrow's program, Station WJAR of Providence will also be in the chain.

Linking the Congress Square Station with WEEI for the broadcast of the Boston Symphony brings further credit in radio pioneering in Maine to the Rines Brothers Company of Portland, for 52 years leading dry goods merchants in this city. In each of the cities where the Boston Symphony is to be broadcast on Saturday evenings, a sponsor for the program was obtained. In Portland, the Rines Brothers Company came to the fore and deserves the credit.

Linking WCSH with WEEI and the other stations means a heavy expense, but the sponsor, already a strong believer in the value of commercial broadcasting of high grade programs, was convinced of the worth of the project, and has undertaken it for the entire series of 12 concerts.

The prestige and superb position of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in American musical circles needs no elaboration. To have its exceptional musicianship and delightful programs broadcast as direct from WCSH in Portland, as though the orchest

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.

JAN 2 4 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra Here

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first appearance of the 1925-26 musical season in Washington at Poli's theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock, as the third concert in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course of afternoon musical events. The orchestra is composed of 108 musicians this year.

Koussevitzky has repeated in America this winter the directoral triumphs he achieved in Paris and London last summer, where his "Concerto Koussevitzky" in the French capital and his appearances as conductor of the London Symphony orchestra were outstanding continental music events.

In Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course will be Beniamino Gigli, leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera company, at Poli's on Friday afternoon, February 26, and Mme. Galli-Curci, the world's greatest coloratura, at Poli's on Wednesday afternoon, March 17.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 2 4 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS INTERRUPTION

Boston, Jan. 23—(AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra went on the air tonight for the first time in its history, but the broadcasting was interrupted by the copyright law. While the orchestra played the "Sinfonietta" of Eugene

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM TELEGRAPH

JAN 2 4 1926

The feature of the third visit to New York this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, for a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, February 4, and Saturday evening, February 6, will be the appearance of Serge Prokofieff as soloist in his third pianoforte concerto. This score will be heard at both concerts and will in each case be preceded by the march and scherzo from the same composer's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges."

At the Thursday concert Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine" and

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 2 4 1926

Arturo Toscanini continues his guest conductorship of the Philharmonic Orchestra this week, with four concerts at Carnegie Hall—this afternoon, the Thursday evening and Friday afternoon pair and the Students' Concert Saturday night. Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture begin to-day's Philharmonic program. Thursday and Friday will bring two novelties, Roger-Ducasse's "Sarabande" for orchestra and small chorus and Vincenzo Tommasini's "Pæsaggi Toscani," a rhapsody on popular themes, based on old Italian folksongs. These, according to the composer, are reset with modern harmonies and orchestral effects, but without impairing their original character.

The seventh Students' Concert on Saturday and the Brooklyn concert at the Academy of Music next Sunday afternoon, January 81, will have a program of Vivaldi's Concerto Grosso in D minor, Haydn's "Clock" Symphony, "Siegfried's Death" and the Funeral March from "Götterdämmerung," Respighi's "Pines of Rome" and Berlioz's "Rakoczy March."

As no tickets are available for Toscanini's subscription concerts with the Philharmonic, a non-subscription concert, for which tickets are now on sale, will be given at Carnegie Hall Monday night, February 1, with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and works of Bach, Mendelssohn and Wagner. Mr. Toscanini's last Philharmonic concert will be Sunday afternoon, February 7. Wilhelm Furtwängler will open his second season as Philharmonic conductor and his first as one of the orchestra's regular leaders, on the 11th.

The Boston Symphony will pay its next New York visit next week, when Serge Koussevitzky will give an all-Russian program on Thursday, February 4, and a mainly Russian one on Saturday, the 6th. Serge Prokofieff will appear in both concerts as soloist in his third piano concerto, which will be preceded by the March and Scherzo from his opera, "The Love of Three Oranges." On Thursday evening Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain" complete the program. On Saturday afternoon the other numbers will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and a sonata of Galliard arranged by Steinberg.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 2 4 1926

Brooklyn to Hear Boston Symphony and Mme. Jeritza

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will give its third Brooklyn concert at the Academy of Music Friday evening, February 5, with Serge Prokofieff as soloist in his own third piano concerto. A sonata by Galliard, orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg, will open the concert; the other

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

JAN 2 4 1926

Koussevitzky and Boston Band

Serge Koussevitzky will be heard in two Russian numbers at his coming first public appearance in Philadelphia, at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for a concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 1. Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," will be performed and Liadov's "Fragment from the Apocalypse."

Scriabin's score is considered to have an especially sympathetic and eloquent reading from his fellow Russian, since Koussevitzky was in close artistic contact with this late composer, and first produced in Russia his principal scores. Scriabin accompanied Koussevitzky on one of his famous Volga voyages, and witnessed the effect of his scores upon villagers who had never heard symphonic music.

The third number upon this programme will be the Second Suite from Ravel's Ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe." The concert will open with a sonata by the early eighteenth century composer Galiard. This score, replete with cha

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

JAN 2 4 1926

Boston Orchestra, Feb. 2.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first appearance this season in Washington at Poli's Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock, as the third concert in the artists' course. The orchestra will be composed of 108 musicians this year.

It has been rumored that Koussevitzky's musical genius has found especially happy expression with this orchestra, for never before have seat reservations for this organization's concerts been in greater demand. Each series in Boston and New York this season was entirely subscribed last May.

Mr. Koussevitzky has repeated in America this Winter the directoral triumphs he achieved in Paris and London last Summer, when his concerts in the French capital and his appearances as conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra were outstanding continental successes.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN CITIZEN

N 2 4 1926

Boston Symphony Program

The third Brooklyn concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at the Academy of Music, on Friday evening, Feb. 5. A feature of this concert will be Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," which Russian score Serge Koussevitzky conducted elsewhere this season with phenomenal success.

The soloist of the evening will be Serge Prokofieff, who will appear in his pianoforte concerto No. 3. Prokofieff, regarded as the most talented of the younger Russian composers, by virtue of his operas, orchestral and chamber music, likewise holds an enviable position as a piano virtuoso.

Serge Koussevitzky will introduce the concert by a sonata of Galliard, the Eighteenth Century composer, which has been scored for orchestra by Miximilian Steinberg.

Goossens Wins Ovation With Boston Symphony

Members of Orchestra and Musical Public Are Unanimous in Recognizing His Ability—Critics Praise Him for "Balance and Faculty of Letting Music and Composer Speak for Themselves."

By A. J. Warner.

Boston, Jan. 22.—Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, appeared as guest conductor this afternoon, in Symphony Hall, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Goossens led the Boston musicians on Tuesday at a concert in Providence, R. I. Tomorrow evening he will again conduct the orchestra in Symphony Hall when today's program will be repeated. Mr. Goossens' success during his Boston engagement has been conspicuous, both with the members of the orchestra and with the music-loving sanity, musicianship and the faculty of letting the music and the composer speak for themselves.

This afternoon's program included Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz," Brahms' Symphony No. 4, Goossens' own "Sinfonietta," which was heard for the first time in Boston; Delius' "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring"; and Debussy's "Iberia"; "Images for Orchestra", No. 2.

The magnificent resources of the Boston Symphony gave the talented young conductor an opportunity to be heard at his best and throughout the performance the qualities that have won him such notable success in America were ely in evidence. One sensed the ality of his beat, rhythmic acacy that is so characteristic of readings; and the sound mual and technical foundation on ich his interpretations are sed.

A large and deeply interested dience was present to welcome . Goossens to Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

JAN 23 1926

Goossens Wins Boston Audience with Conducting of Symphony; Debussy Suite Provides Climax

By STAFF CORRESPONDENT.

Boston, Jan. 22.—Eugene Goossens conducted his first Boston concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this afternoon. In mid-season guest conductors are the rule with New York orchestras. Not so in Boston. The Boston Symphony has never made a practice of engaging any onsiderable number of engaging any considerable number of conductor does appear with this famous orchestra, the interest is more than casual.

The reception given Mr. Goossens as he came to the conductor's desk was polite. The "Freischutz" overture evoked a cordial response in applause from the audience. The Brahms Fourth Symphony seemed to complete Mr. Goossens's conquest of his audience's favor. The program numbers which followed were increasingly applauded, the Delins "On First Hearing the Cockoo in Spring" and Mr. Goossens's own "Sinfonietta" earning receptions which might at other than orchestra concerts have been considered requests for repetitions. The Debussy "Iberia" suite, which ended the program, was a climax in virtuosity by the orchestra which roused honest enthusiasm.

String Section Superior.

Throughout the concert the playing of the orchestra was a joy to hear. The strings in particular are, in quality and ability to play a great ... amount of tone, tra to subordinate themselves to the instrument carrying the theme. And yet there must be beauty of tone and nicety of execution constantly maintained in pianissimos. These are not demands that an orchestra meets with casual ease, but the Boston Symphony met them at this concert.

In the "octurne" of the Debussy suite and in the Delius number the wood winds played with beautiful tone and a play of crescendo and diminuendo well nigh ideal. The flute solo passages in the Delius piece were delightful. And the sonority of the brasses in the finale of the Debussy suite was superb. The interpretation of this Debussy music is one of the most arresting of interest of any which Mr. Goossens gives. There is no intricacy for the listener; there are no blatant moments despite al the mass of instrumentation and tricky rhythms. The Boston Symphony afforded its conductor complete means to convey to the audience his conception of music.

Brahms Well Conducted.

And the Goossens "Sinfoniette" was played with gusto and gaiety; the men plainly understood the spirit as well as the letter of this music; it had the incisive and yet unforced definition of rhythms that it needs.

Mr. Goossens gave the Brahms symphony an interpretation that had dignity, dramatic intensity and eloquence. It is not his practice to endeavor to be an innovator in interpreting Brahms. He does no tricks and seeks to go no further than the ... car ... son.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

... 3 1926

SYMPHONY CONCERT BY RADIO TONIGHT

First Time in History That Boston Orchestra Has Broadcast.

Tonight the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast by radio through Station WEEI. It will be the first time in history that this world famous organization has been heard over the air, and is therefore an event of tremendous importance.

Eugene Goossens, who is considered to be one of the finest conductors in the musical world, will lead his wonderful organization in the Fourth Symphony of Brahms. A group of selections has been chosen which are certain to strike the fancy of the radio audience.

When the first programme goes on the air this evening at 8 o'clock, everything possible to insure the best broadcast will have been done. During the past week, engineers from WEEI, the Western Electric Company and the New England Telephone & Telegraph Company have spent 1... hours daily trying out proper microphone locations. At the rehearsal of the symphony on Thursday and Friday mornings final tests were made. The engineers claim that everything has been done to eliminate foreign sounds from the audience, so that a perfect broadcast should be possible.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES

JAN 24 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ON AIR.

Waves Are Silent as Copyrighted Number Is Played.

BOSTON, Jan. 23 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra went on the air tonight for the first time in its histor...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN

JAN 24 1926

Copyright Tangle Halts on Symphony

BOSTON, Jan. 23 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra went on the air tonight for the first time in its history, but the broadcasting was interrupted by the copyright law. While the orchestra played the "Sinfonietta" of Eugene Goossens, this week's guest conductor, the radio fans heard nothing.

It appeared that the rights to the composition are held by J. and W. Chester, of London, and the American rights by G. Ricordi & Co., of New York. The latter firm refused to permit the broadcasting and even a request from Goossens was declined.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Interest in the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra given last evening at Infantry Hall centred in the appearance of Eugene Goossens who came as guest conductor. The usual big audience attended, intent upon hearing for the first time the orchestral leader who recently made such a fine impression in New York.

Mr. Goossens is conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, a post has held since he came to this co a few years ago. His splendid s with the New Yorw Symphony thi son at the first of a series of a ances with that organization broug more prominently before the Am musical public. He is an Englishma for many years previous to his here was a noted figure in Eng musical life.

Last evening Mr. Goossens gave progran phony it said the gres he four interpre cessful anced p

Upon ture he but befo polite re plause c

naval officers and plain peasants who have come here to witness to-morrow or Friday the take-off of Commander Ramon Franco and Capt. Ruiz de Alva in a seaplane flight to South America, and possibly thence to New York.

The aviators made a successful flight yesterday from Melilla, Morocco, to Huelva in their Ne Plus Ultra machine.

The fliers will carry with them on their trip more than 100 messages, sent by King Alfonso to President de Alvear of Argentine, and by various Spanish Mayors to the Mayor of Buenos Aires.

Franco, who is in charge is expected to take off -morrow or Friday and to the Canary Islands which will enable the fliers to communicate over a radius of more than miles on a wave length of between and 900 metres. The call letters of plane are EDR-12.

DANISH SHIP SEARCHE FOR SOVIET PROPAGAN

Anti-American Circulars Beli Hidden in Freighters' Cargo

Philadelphia, Jan. 20.—(AP)—Go were searching ighter Ivar, altic ports

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS-HERALD
PORTLAND, ME.

JAN 23 1926

Boston Symphony Concert Is Coming Via Station WCSH

Portland Studio Linked With WEEI and WTAG For First Time

It has arrived. The time that has been awaited by radio listeners throughout Maine and beyond, since last Summer, when Station WCSH of the Congress Square Hotel, Portland, should be linked with prominent stations outside the State, for the rebroadcasting of exceptional programs, is here.

Tonight, between 8.15 and 10.15 p. m., WCSH, on a direct hook-up with WEEI of Boston and WTAG of Worcester, will broadcast no less a musical treat than the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a two-hour program to be played at Symphony Hall, Boston.

Tomorrow evening's broadcast of the Symphony will be the first of a series of 12 such concerts to be given Saturday evening from 8.15 to 10.15 o'clock. On the Saturday night following tomorrow's program, Station WJAR of Providence will also be in the chain.

Linking the Congress Square Station with WEEI for the broadcast of the Boston Symphony brings further credit in radio pioneering in Maine to the Rines Brothers Company of Portland, for 52 years leading dry goods merchants in this city. In each of the cities where the Boston Symphony is to be broadcast on Saturday evenings, a sponsor for the program was obtained. In Portland, the Rines Brothers Company came to the fore and deserves the credit.

Linking WCSH with WEEI and the other stations means a heavy expense, but the sponsor, already a strong believer in the value of commercial broadcasting of high grade programs, was convinced of the worth of the project, and has undertaken it for the entire series of 12 concerts.

The prestige and superb position of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in American musical circles needs no elaboration. To have its exceptional musicianship and delightful programs broadcast as direct from WCSH in Portland, as though the orchest... dio her... ith W...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.

JAN 24 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra Here

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first appearance of the 1925-26 musical season in Washington at Poli's theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock, as the third concert in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course of afternoon musical events. The orchestra is composed of 108 musicians this year.

Koussevitzky has repeated in America this winter the directoral triumphs he achieved in Paris and London last summer, where his "Concerto Koussevitzky" in the French capital and his appearances as conductor of the London Symphony orchestra were outstanding continental music events.

In Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course will be Beniamino Gigli, leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera company, at Poli's on Friday afternoon, February 26, and Mme. Galli-Curci, the world's greatest coloratura, at Poli's on Wednesday afternoon, March 17.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 24 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS INTERRUPTION

Boston, Jan. 23—(AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra went on the air tonight for the first time in its history, but the broadcasting was interrupted by the copyright law. While the orchestra played the "Sinfonietta" of Eugene Goo... condu... ing.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TELEGRAPH

JAN 24 1926

The feature of the third visit to New York this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, for a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, February 4, and Saturday evening, February 6, will be the appearance of Serge Prokofieff as soloist in his third pianoforte concerto. This score will be heard at both concerts and will in each case be preceded by the march and scherzo from the same composer's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges."

At the Thursday concert Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine ..." and

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 24 1926

Arturo Toscanini continues his guest conductorship of the Philharmonic Orchestra this week, with four concerts at Carnegie Hall—this afternoon, the Thursday evening and Friday afternoon pair and the Students' Concert Saturday night. Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture begin to-day's Philharmonic program. Thursday and Friday will bring two novelties, Roger-Ducasse's "Sarabande" for orchestra and small chorus and Vincenzo Tommasini's "Pæsaggi Toscani," a rhapsody on popular themes, based on old Italian folksongs. These, according to the composer, are reset with modern harmonies and orchestral effects, but without impairing their original character.

The seventh Students' Concert on Saturday and the Brooklyn concert at the Academy of Music next Sunday afternoon, January 31, will have a program of Vivaldi's Concerto Grosso in D minor, Haydn's "Clock" Symphony, "Siegfried's Death" and the Funeral March from "Götterdämmerung," Respighi's "Pines of Rome" and Berlioz's "Rakoczy March."

As no tickets are available for Toscanini's subscription concerts with the Philharmonic, a non-subscription concert, for which tickets are now on sale, will be given at Carnegie Hall Monday night, February 1, with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and works of Bach, Mendelssohn and Wagner. Mr. Toscanini's last Philharmonic concert will be Sunday afternoon, February 7. Wilhelm Furtwängler will open his second season as Philharmonic conductor and his first as one of the orchestra's regular leaders, on the 11th.

The Boston Symphony will pay its next New York visit next week, when Serge Koussevitzky will give an all-Russian program on Thursday, February 4, and a mainly Russian one on Saturday, the 6th. Serge Prokofieff will appear in both concerts as soloist in his third piano concerto, which will be preceded by the March and Scherzo from his opera, "The Love of Three Oranges." On Thursday evening Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain" complete the program. On Saturday afternoon the other numbers will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and a sonata of Galliard arranged by Steinberg.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 24 1926

Brooklyn to Hear Boston Symphony and Mme. Jeritza

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will give its third Brooklyn concert at the Academy of Music Friday evening, February 5, with Serge Prokofieff as soloist in his own third piano concerto. A sonata by Galliard, orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg, will open the concert; the other ... -akoff

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

JAN 24 1926

Koussevitzky and Boston Band

Serge Koussevitzky will be heard in two Russian numbers at his coming first public appearance in Philadelphia, at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for a concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 1. Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," will be performed and Liadov's "Fragment from the Apocalypse."

Scriabin's score is considered to have an especially sympathetic and eloquent reading from his fellow Russian, since Koussevitzky was in close artistic contact with this late composer, and first produced in Russia his principal scores. Scriabin accompanied Koussevitzky on one of his famous Volga voyages, and witnessed the effect of his scores upon villagers who had never heard symphonic music.

The third number upon this programme will be the Second Suite from Ravel's Ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe." The concert will open with a sonata by the early eighteenth century composer Galiard. This score, replete with cha... ranged milian Rims...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

JAN ...

Boston Orchestra, Feb. 2.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first appearance this season in Washington at Poli's Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock, as the third concert in the artists' course. The orchestra will be composed of 108 musicians this year.

It has been rumored that Koussevitzky's musical genius has found especially happy expression with this orchestra, for never before have seat reservations for this organization's concerts been in greater demand. Each series in Boston and New York this season was entirely subscribed last May.

Mr. Koussevitzky has repeated in America this Winter the directoral triumphs he achieved in Paris and London last Summer, when his concerts in the French capital and his appearances as conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra were outstanding continental successes.

There will be ... in th... Benia... Met... ru...

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN CITIZEN

...24 1926

Boston Symphony Program

The third Brooklyn concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at the Academy of Music, on Friday evening, Feb. 5. A feature of this concert will be Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," which Russian score Serge Koussevitzky conducted elsewhere this season with phenomenal success.

The soloist of the evening will be Serge Prokofieff, who will appear in his pianoforte concerto No. 3. Prokofieff, regarded as the most talented of the younger Russian composers, by virtue of his operas, orchestral and chamber music, likewise holds an enviable position as a piano virtuoso.

Serge Koussevitzky will introduce the concert by a sonata of Galliard, the Eighteenth Century composer, which has been scored for orchestra by Miximilian Steinberg.

164

Goossens Wins Ovation With Boston Symphony

Members of Orchestra and Musical Public Are Unanimous in Recognizing His Ability—Critics Praise Him for "Balance and Faculty of Letting Music and Composer Speak for Themselves."

By A. J. Warner.

Boston, Jan. 22.—Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, appeared as guest conductor this afternoon, in Symphony Hall, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Goossens led the Boston musicians on Tuesday at a concert in Providence, R. I. Tomorrow evening he will again conduct the orchestra in Symphony Hall when today's program will be repeated. Mr. Goossens' success during his Boston engagement has been conspicuous, both with the members of the orchestra and with the music-loving public. At the close of the final rehearsal, yesterday, the musicians under his baton tendered him an ovation and demanded a speech. One of Bostons' leading musical authorities told The Times-Union correspondent this afternoon that Mr. Goossens possessed the qualities of the ideal conductor in whose interpretations are found balance, sanity, musicianship and the faculty of letting the music and the composer speak for themselves.

This afternoon's program included Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz," Brahms' Symphony No. 4, Goossens' own "Sinfonietta," which was heard for the first time in Boston; Delius' "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring"; and Debussy's "Iberia"; "Images for Orchestra", No. 2.

The magnificent resources of the Boston Symphony gave the talented young conductor an opportunity to be heard at his best and throughout the performance the qualities that have won him such notable success in America were finely in evidence. One sensed the quality of his beat, rhythmic accuracy that is so characteristic of his readings; and the sound musical and technical foundation on which his interpretations are based.

A large and deeply interested audience was present to welcome Mr. Goossens to Boston.

Goossens … n Audience … Symphony; … vides Climax

… ONDENT.

… 22.—Eugene Goossens conducted his first Boston concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this afternoon. In mid-season guest conductors are the rule with New York orchestras. Not so in Boston. The Boston Symphony has never made a practice of engaging any onsiderable number of engaging any considerable number of conductor does appear with this famous orchestra, the interest is more than casual.

The reception given Mr. Goossens as he came to the conductor's desk was polite. The "Freischutz" overture evoked a cordial response in applause from the audience. The Brahms Fourth Symphony seemed to complete Mr. Goossens's conquest of his audience's favor. The program numbers which followed were increasingly applauded, the Delins "On First Hearing the Cockoo in Spring" and Mr. Goossens's own "Sinfonietta" earning receptions which might at other than orchestra concerts have been considered requests for repetitions. The Debussy "Iberia" suite, which ended the program, was a climax in virtuosity by the orchestra which roused honest enthusiasm.

String Section Superior.

Throughout the concert the playing of the orchestra was a joy to hear. The strings in particular are, in quality and ability to play a great range of color and amount of tone, superior to all but very few string sections of any present-day orchestra. A vivid realization of this comes from hearing such music as the Delius number and the Debussy suite. As Mr. Goossens told the players at rehearsal the primal requisite of success for the Debussy music is kaleidoscopic color of tone and clarity o theme, as this is made to shift fron one instrument, or one instrumenta section, to another. The hearer mus get plainly the thematic line and i order that this may be plain, ther must be the utmost readiness of th accompanying sections of the orchestra to subordinate themselves to the instrument carrying the theme. And yet there must be beauty of tone and nicety of execution constantly maintained in pianissimos. These are not demands that an orchestra meets with casual ease, but the Boston Symphony met them at this concert.

In the "octurne" of the Debussy suite and in the Delius number the wood winds played with beautiful tone and a play of crescendo and diminuendo well nigh ideal. The flute solo passages in the Delius piece were delightful. And the sonority of the brasses in the finale of the Debussy suite was superb. The interpretation of this Debussy music is one of the most arresting of interest of any which Mr. Goossens gives. There is no intricacy for the listener; there are no blatant moments despite al the mass of instrumentation and tricky rhythms. The Boston Symphony afforded its conductor complete means to convey to the audience his conception of music.

Brahms Well Conducted.

And the Goossens "Sinfoniette" was played with gusto and gaiety; the men plainly understood the spirit as well as the letter of this music; it had the incisive and yet unforced definition of rhythms that it needs.

Mr. Goossens gave the Brahms symphony an interpretation that had dignity, dramatic intensity and eloquence. It is not his practice to endeavor to be an innovator in interpreting Brahms. He does no tricks and seeks to go no further than the music car…

… to be one of the finest conductors in the musical world, will lead his wonderful organization in the Fourth Symphony of Brahms. A group of selections has been chosen which are certain to strike the fancy of the radio audience.

When the first programme goes on the air this evening at 8 o'clock, everything possible to insure the best broadcast will have been done. During the past week, engineers from WEEI, the Western Electric Company and the New England Telephone & Telegraph Company have spent … hours daily trying out proper microphone locations. At the rehearsal of the symphony on Thursday and Friday mornings final tests were made. The engineers claim that everything has been done to eliminate foreign sounds from the audience, so that a perfect broadcast should be possible.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Interest in the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra given last evening at Infantry Hall centred in the appearance of Eugene Goossens who came as guest conductor. The usual big audience attended, intent upon hearing for the first time the orchestral leader who recently made such a fine impression in New York.

Mr. Goossens is conductor of the Ro… ester Philharmonic Orchestra, a pos… has held since he came to this co… a few years ago. His splendid … with the New Yorw Symphony th… son at the first of a series of … ances with that organization broug… more prominently before the A… musical public. He is an Englishm… for many years previous to his … here was a noted figure in En… musical life.

Last evening Mr. Goossens gave …

progra… phony … it said … the gre… he fou… interpre… cessful … anced … Upon … ture he … but bef… polite r… plause …

---

naval officers and plain peasants who have come here to witness to-morrow or Friday the take-off of Commander Ramon Franco and Capt. Ruiz de Alva in a seaplane flight to South America, and possibly thence to New York.

The aviators made a successful flight yesterday from Melilla, Morocco, to Huelva, in their Ne Plus Ultra machine.

The fliers will carry with them on their trip more than 100 messages, sent by King Alfonso to President de Alvear of Argentine, and by various Spanish Mayors to the Mayor of Buenos Aires.

… Franco, who is in charge … expected to take off … morrow or Friday and … to the Canary Islands …

which will enable the fliers to communicate over a radius of more than … miles on a wave length of between … and 900 metres. The call letters of the plane are EDR-12.

DANISH SHIP SEARCHE… FOR SOVIET PROPAGAN…

Anti-American Circulars Beli… Hidden in Freighters' Carg…

Philadelphia, Jan. 20.—(AP)—Go… were searching … freighter Ivar, … Baltic ports …

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS-HERALD
PORTLAND, ME.

JAN 23 1926

Boston Symphony Concert Is Coming Via Station WCSH

Portland Studio Linked With WEEI and WTAG For First Time

It has arrived. The time that has been awaited by radio listeners throughout Maine and beyond, since last Summer, when Station WCSH of the Congress Square Hotel, Portland, should be linked with prominent stations outside the State, for the rebroadcasting of exceptional programs, is here.

Tonight, between 8.15 and 10.15 p. m., WCSH, on a direct hook-up with WEEI of Boston and WTAG of Worcester, will broadcast no less a musical treat than the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a two-hour program to be played at Symphony Hall, Boston.

Tomorrow evening's broadcast of the Symphony will be the first of a series of 12 such concerts to be given Saturday evening from 8.15 to 10.15 o'clock. On the Saturday night following tomorrow's program, Station WJAR of Providence will also be in the chain.

Linking the Congress Square Station with WEEI for the broadcast of the Boston Symphony brings further credit in radio pioneering in Maine to the Rines Brothers Company of Portland, for 52 years leading dry goods merchants in this city. In each of the cities where the Boston Symphony is to be broadcast on Saturday evenings, a sponsor for the program was obtained. In Portland, the Rines Brothers Company came to the fore and deserves the credit.

Linking WCSH with WEEI and the other stations means a heavy expense, but the sponsor, already a strong believer in the value of commercial broadcasting of high grade programs, was convinced of the worth of the project, and has undertaken it for the entire series of 12 concerts.

The prestige and superb position of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in American musical circles needs no elaboration. To have its exceptional musicianship and delightful programs broadcast as direct from WCSH in Portland, as though the orchestra were to play in the studio here, through the hook-up with WEEI, means much to radio listeners in Maine, insuring as it does virtually perfect reception of the program in all parts of the State and beyond its borders northward and westward.

Radio enthusiasts of the State have long been asking, "When will WCSH be hooked up with outside important stations?" The answer is ready. "Tomorrow evening." And the step is without doubt the fore-runner of other and perhaps more extensive hookups for WCSH at appropriate occasions in the future.

THIS CLIPPING FR…
TIMES

JAN 24 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ON AIR.

Waves Are Silent as Copyrighted Number Is Played.

BOSTON, Jan. 23 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra went on the air tonight for the first time in its history, but the broadcasting was interrupted by the Copyright law. While the orchestra played the "Sinfonietta" of Eugene Goosens, this week's guest conductor, the radio fans heard nothing.

It appeared that the rights to the composition are held by J. and W. Chester of London, and the American rights by G. Ricordi & Co. of New York. The latter firm refused to permit the broadcasting and even a request from Mr. Goosens was declined.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 24 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS INTERRUPTION

Boston, Jan. 23—(AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra went on the air tonight for the first time in its history, but the broadcasting was interrupted by the copyright law. While the orchestra played the "Sinfonietta" of Eugene Goosens, this week's guest conductor, the radio fans heard nothing.

It appeared that the rights to the composition are held by J. and W. Chester of London, and the American rights by S. G. Ricordi & Co of New York. The latter firm refused to permit the broadcasting and even a request from Mr Goosens was declined.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 24 1926

Brooklyn to Hear Boston Symphony and Mme. Jeritza

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will give its third Brooklyn concert at the Academy of Music Friday evening, February 5, with Serge Prokofieff as soloist in his own third piano concerto. A sonata by Galliard, orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg, will open the concert; the other number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade."

Mischa-Léon, tenor of the Paris Opera, and Lajos Shuk, cellist, will give a recital under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences on Monday evening, February 8. Maria Jeritza, of the Metropolitan, will be heard in recital under institute auspices at the Academy on Thursday evening, February 25.

… Satu… the appearance of Serge Prokofieff as soloist in his third pianoforte concerto. This score will be heard at both concerts and will in each case be preceded by the march and scherzo from the same composer's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges."

At the Thursday concert Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Mousseorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain," will complete a Russian program.

At the Saturay concert, besides the Prokofieff numbers, Koussevitzky will present Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scherherazade" and a sonata of Galliard arranged by Steinberg.

Symphony and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture begin to-day's Philharmonic program. Thursday and Friday will bring two novelties, Roger-Ducasse's "Sarabande" for orchestra and small chorus and Vincenzo Tommasini's "Pæsaggi Toscani," a rhapsody on popular themes, based on old Italian folksongs. These, according to the composer, are reset with modern harmonies and orchestral effects, but without impairing their original character.

The seventh Students' Concert on Saturday and the Brooklyn concert at the Academy of Music next Sunday afternoon, January 31, will have a program of Vivaldi's Concerto Grosso in D minor, Haydn's "Clock" Symphony, "Siegfried's Death" and the Funeral March from "Götterdämmerung,"

Respighi's "Pines of Rome" and Berlioz's "Rakoczy March."

As no tickets are available for Toscanini's subscription concerts with the Philharmonic, a non-subscription concert, for which tickets are now on sale, will be given at Carnegie Hall Monday night, February 1, with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and works of Bach, Mendelssohn and Wagner. Mr. Toscanini's last Philharmonic concert will be Sunday afternoon, February 7. Wilhelm Furtwängler will open his second season as Philharmonic conductor and his first as one of the orchestra's regular leaders, on the 11th.

The Boston Symphony will pay its next New York visit next week, when Serge Koussevitzky will give an all-Russian program on Thursday, February 4, and a mainly Russian one on Saturday, the 6th. Serge Prokofieff will appear in both concerts as soloist in his third piano concerto, which will be preceded by the March and Scherzo from his opera, "The Love of Three Oranges." On Thursday evening Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain" complete the program. On Saturday afternoon the other numbers will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and a sonata of Galliard arranged by Steinberg.

… Ravel's Ballet, … oe." The concert will open with a sonata by the early eighteenth century composer Galiard. This score, replete with charm and gaiety, has been arranged for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, the son-in-law of Rimski-Korsakoff.

The coming appearance of Serge Koussevitzky has aroused considerable interest and curiosity here. This conductor, in his two years in America, has easily taken rank, in the general opinion of our public, with the very first of living conductors.

… se… tio… ma… New … subsc…

Mr. Kou… America this Winter the … oral triumphs he achieved in Paris and London last Summer, when his concerts in the French capital and his appearances as conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra were outstanding continental successes.

There will be two more concerts in the artists' course, those by Beniamino Gigli, leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, February 26, and Mme. Galli-Curci, great coloratura, March 17. Seats for these concerts are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G street.

… ce… pho… Russian score Serge Koussevitzky conducted elsewhere this season with phenomenal success.

The soloist of the evening will be Serge Prokofieff, who will appear in his pianoforte concerto No. 3. Prokofieff, regarded as the most talented of the younger Russian composers, by virtue of his operas, orchestral and chamber music, likewise holds an enviable position as a piano virtuoso.

Serge Koussevitzky will introduce the concert by a sonata of Galliard, the Eighteenth Century composer, which has been scored for orchestra by Miximilian Steinberg.

… course … Gigli, leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera company, at Poli's on Friday afternoon, February 26, and Mme. Galli-Curci, the world's greatest coloratura, at Poli's on Wednesday afternoon, March 17.

Goossens Wins Ovation With Boston Symphony

Members of Orchestra and Musical Public Are Unanimous in Recognizing His Ability—Critics Praise Him for "Balance and Faculty of Letting Music and Composer Speak for Themselves."

By A. J. Warner.

Boston, Jan. 22.—Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, appeared as guest conductor this afternoon, in Symphony Hall, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Goossens led the Boston musicians on Tuesday at a concert in Providence, R. I. Tomorrow evening he will again conduct the orchestra in Symphony Hall when today's program will be repeated. Mr. Goossens' success during his Boston engagement has been conspicuous, both with the members of the orchestra and with the music-loving public. At the close of the final rehearsal, yesterday, the musicians under his baton tendered him an ovation and demanded a speech. One of Bostons' leading musical authorities told The Times-Union correspondent this afternoon that Mr. Goossens possessed the qualities of the ideal conductor in whose interpretations are found balance, sanity, musicianship and the faculty of letting the music and the composer speak for themselves.

This afternoon's program included Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz," Brahms' Symphony No. 4, Goossens' own "Sinfonietta," which was heard for the first time in Boston; Delius' "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring"; and Debussy's "Iberia"; "Images for Orchestra", No. 2.

The magnificent resources of the Boston Symphony gave the talented young conductor an opportunity to be heard at his best and throughout the performance the qualities that have won him such notable success in America were finely in evidence. One sensed the quality of his beat, rhythmic accuracy that is so characteristic of his readings; and the sound musical and technical foundation on which his interpretations are based.

A large and deeply interested audience was present to welcome Mr. Goossens to Boston.

Goossens … n Audience … Symphony; … vides Climax

… ONDENT.

… an. 22.—Eugene Goossens conducted his first Boston concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this afternoon. In mid-season guest conductors are the rule with New York orchestras. Not so in Boston. The Boston Symphony has never made a practice of engaging any onsiderable number of engaging any considerable number ot conductor does appear with this famous orchestra, the interest is more than casual.

The reception given Mr. Goossens as he came to the conductor's desk was polite. The "Freischutz" overture evoked a cordial response in applause from the audience. The Brahms Fourth Symphony seemed to complete Mr. Goossens's conquest of his audience's favor. The program numbers which followed were increasingly applauded, the Delins "On First Hearing the Cockoo in Spring" and Mr. Goossens's own "Sinfonietta" earning receptions which might at other than orchestra concerts have been considered requests for repetitions. The Debussy "Iberia" suite, which ended the program, was a climax in virtuosity by the orchestra which roused honest enthusiasm.

String Section Superior.

Throughout the concert the playing of the orchestra was a joy to hear. The strings in particular are, in quality and ability to play a great range of color and amount of tone, superior to all but very few string sections of any present-day orchestra. A vivid realization of this comes from hearing such music as the Delius number and the Debussy suite. As Mr. Goossens told the players at rehearsal the primal requisite of suc cess for the Debussy music is kaleid oscopic color of tone and clarity o theme, as this is made to shift fron one instrument, or one instrumenta section, to another. The hearer mus get plainly the thematic line and i order that this may be plain, ther must be the utmost readiness of th accompanying sections of the orchestra to subordinate themselves to the instrument carrying the theme. And yet there must be beauty of tone and nicety of execution constantly maintained in pianissimos. These are not demands that an orchestra meets with casual ease, but the Boston Symphony met them at this concert

In the "octurne" of the Debussy suite and in the Delius number the wood winds played with beautiful tone and a play of crescendo and diminuendo well nigh ideal. The flute solo passages in the Delius piece were delightful. And the sonority of the brasses in the finale of the Debussy suite was superb. The interpretation of this Debussy music is one of the most arresting of interest of any which Mr. Goossens gives. There is no intricacy for the listener; there are no blatant moments despite al the mass of instrumentation and tricky rhythms. The Boston Symphony afforded its conductor complete means to convey to the audience his conception of music.

Brahms Well Conducted.

And the Goossens "Sinfoniette" was played with gusto and gaiety; the men plainly understood the spirit as well as the letter of this music; it had the incisive and yet unforced definition of rhythms that it needs.

Mr. Goossens gave the Brahms symphony an interpretation that had dignity, dramatic intensity and eloquence. It is not his practice to endeavor to be an innovator in interpreting Brahms. He does no tricks and seeks to go no further than the music car … nderson. … on- … m… …y:

THIS CLIPPING FR…

TIMES

JAN 24 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ON AIR.

Waves Are Silent as Copyrighted Number Is Played.

BOSTON, Jan. 23 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra went on the air tonight for the first time in its history, but the broadcasting was interrupted by the Copyright law. While the orchestra played the "Sinfonietta" of Eugene Goosens, this week's guest conductor, the radio fans heard nothing.

It appeared that the rights to the composition are held by J. and W. Chester of London, and the American rights by G. Ricordi & Co. of New York. The latter firm refused to permit the broadcasting and even a request from Mr. Goosens was declined.

… be one of the finest conductors in the musical world, will lead his wonderful organization in the Fourth Symphony of Brahms. A group of selections has been chosen which are certain to strike the fancy of the radi audience.

When the first programme goes o the air this evening at 8 o'clock, ev erything possible to insure the bes broadcast will have been done. During the past week, engineers fror WEEI, the Western Electric Compan and the New England Telephone & Telegraph Company have spent 1 hours daily trying out proper micro phone locations. At the rehearsal o the symphony on Thursday and Friday mornings final tests were made. The engineers claim that everything has been done to eliminate foreign sounds from the audience, so that a perfect broadcast should be possible.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Interest in the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra given last evening at Infantry Hall centred in the appearance of Eugene Goossens who came as guest conductor. The usual big audience attended, intent upon hearing for the first time the orchestral leader who recently made such a fine impression in New York.

Mr. Goossens is conductor of the Roc ester Philharmonic Orchestra, a post has held since he came to this co a few years ago. His splendid s with the New Yorw Symphony thi son at the first of a series of a ances with that organization broug more prominently before the An musical public. He is an Englishma for many years previous to his here was a noted figure in En musical life.

Last evening Mr. Goossens gave …

progra … phony … it said … the gre … he fou … interpr … cessful … anced … Upon … ture he … but befo … polite … plause …

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PRESS-HERALD

PORTLAND, ME.

JAN 23 1926

Boston Symphony Concert Is Coming Via Station WCSH

Portland Studio Linked With WEEI and WTAG For First Time

It has arrived. The time that has been awaited by radio listeners throughout Maine and beyond, since last Summer, when Station WCSH of the Congress Square Hotel, Portland, should be linked with prominent stations outside the State, for the rebroadcasting of exceptional programs, is here.

Tonight, between 8.15 and 10.15 p. m., WCSH, on a direct hook-up with WEEI of Boston and WTAG of Worcester, will broadcast no less a musical treat than the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a two-hour program to be played at Symphony Hall, Boston.

Tomorrow evening's broadcast of the Symphony will be the first of a series of 12 such concerts to be given Saturday evening from 8.15 to 10.15 o'clock. On the Saturday night following tomorrow's program, Station WJAR of Providence will also be in the chain.

Linking the Congress Square Station with WEEI for the broadcast of the Boston Symphony brings further credit in radio pioneering in Maine to the Rines Brothers Company of Portland, for 52 years leading dry goods merchants in this city. In each of the cities where the Boston Symphony is to be broadcast on Saturday evenings, a sponsor for the program was obtained. In Portland, the Rines Brothers Company came to the fore and deserves the credit.

Linking WCSH with WEEI and the other stations means a heavy expense, but the sponsor, already a strong believer in the value of commercial broadcasting of high grade programs, was convinced of the worth of the project, and has undertaken it for the entire series of 12 concerts.

The prestige and superb position of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in American musical circles needs no elaboration. To have its exceptional musicianship and delightful programs broadcast as direct from WCSH in Portland, as though the orchestra were to play in the studio here, through the hook-up with WEEI, means much to radio listeners in Maine, insuring as it does virtually perfect reception of the program in all parts of the State and beyond its borders northward and westward.

Radio enthusiasts of the State have long been asking, "When will WCSH be hooked up with outside important stations?" The answer is ready. "Tomorrow evening." And the step is without doubt the fore-runner of other and perhaps more extensive hookups for WCSH at appropriate occasions in the future.

---

co…

… cours… … li, leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera company, at Poli's on Friday afternoon, February 26, and Mme. Galli-Curci, the world's greatest coloratura, at Poli's on Wednesday afternoon, March 17.

---

naval officers and plain peasants who have come here to witness to-morrow or Friday the take-off of Commander Ramon Franco and Capt. Ruiz de Alva in a seaplane flight to South America, and possibly thence to New York.

The aviators made a successful flight yesterday from Melilla, Morocco, to Huelva in their Ne Plus Ultra machine.

The fliers will carry with them on their trip more than 100 messages, sent by King Alfonso to President de Alvear of Argentine, and by various Spanish Mayors to the Mayor of Buenos Aires.

…Franco, who is in charge … is expected to take off …morrow or Friday and … to the Canary Islands … ll be re… take … ntinue … in th… nds. … olled … carr…

which will enable the fliers to com… cate over a radius of more than … miles on a wave length of betwe… and 900 metres. The call letters … plane are EDR-12.

DANISH SHIP SEARCHE… FOR SOVIET PROPAGA…

Anti-American Circulars Beli… Hidden in Freighters' Carg…

Philadelphia, Jan. 20.—(AP)—G… were searchin… …ighter Ivar, … …altic por…

THIS CLIPPING FROM

REPUBLICAN

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 24 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS INTERRUPTION

Boston, Jan. 23—(AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra went on the air tonight for the first time in its history, but the broadcasting was interrupted by the copyright law. While the orchestra played the "Sinfonietta" of Eugene Goosens, this week's guest conductor, the radio fans heard nothing.

It appeared that the rights to the composition are held by J. and W. Chester of London, and the American rights by S. G. Ricordi & Co of New York. The latter firm refused to permit the broadcasting and even a request from Mr Goosens was declined.

---

o… du… Ha… Satu… the appearance of Serge Prokofieff as soloist in his third pianoforte concerto. This score will be heard at both concerts and will in each case be preceded by the march and scherzo from the same composer's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges."

At the Thursday concert Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem." and Mousseorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain," will complete a Russian program.

At the Saturay concert, besides the Prokofieff numbers, Koussevitzky will present Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scherherazade" and a sonata of Galliard arranged by Steinberg.

Symphony and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture begin to-day's Philharmonic program. Thursday and Friday will bring two novelties, Roger-Ducasse's "Sarabande" for orchestra and small chorus and Vincenzo Tommasini's "Pæsaggi Toscani," a rhapsody on popular themes, based on old Italian folksongs. These, according to the composer, are reset with modern harmonies and orchestral effects, but without impairing their original character.

The seventh Students' Concert on Saturday and the Brooklyn concert at the Academy of Music next Sunday afternoon, January 31, will have a program of Vivaldi's Concerto Grosso in D minor, Haydn's "Clock" Symphony, "Siegfried's Death" and the Funeral March from "Götterdämmerung," Respighi's "Pines of Rome" and Berlioz's "Rakoczy March."

As no tickets are available for Toscanini's subscription concerts with the Philharmonic, a non-subscription concert, for which tickets are now on sale, will be given at Carnegie Hall Monday night, February 1, with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and works of Bach, Mendelssohn and Wagner. Mr. Toscanini's last Philharmonic concert will be Sunday afternoon, February 7. Wilhelm Furtwängler will open his second season as Philharmonic conductor and his first as one of the orchestra's regular leaders, on the 11th.

The Boston Symphony will pay its next New York visit next week, when Serge Koussevitzky will give an all-Russian program on Thursday, February 4, and a mainly Russian one on Saturday, the 6th. Serge Prokofieff will appear in both concerts as soloist in his third piano concerto, which will be preceded by the March and Scherzo from his opera, "The Love of Three Oranges." On Thursday evening Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain" complete the program. On Saturday afternoon the other numbers will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and a sonata of Galliard arranged by Steinberg.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 24 1926

Brooklyn to Hear Boston Symphony and Mme. Jeritza

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will give its third Brooklyn concert at the Academy of Music Friday evening, February 5, with Serge Prokofieff as soloist in his own third piano concerto. A sonata by Galliard, orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg, will open the concert; the other number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade."

Mischa-Léon, tenor of the Paris Opera, and Lajos Shuk, cellist, will give a recital under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences on Monday evening, February 8. Maria Jeritza, of the Metropolitan, will be heard in recital under institute auspices at the Academy on Thursday evening, February 25.

---

gr… …m Ravel's Ballet, … …oe." The concert will open with … sonata by the early eighteenth century composer Galiard. This score, replete with charm and gaiety, has been arranged for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, the son-in-law of Rimski-Korsakoff.

The coming appearance of Serge Koussevitzky has aroused considerable interest and curiosity here. This conductor, in his two years in America, has easily taken rank, in the general opinion of our public, with the very first of living conductors.

… se… tion… mar… New… subsc…

Mr. Kou… …ll America this Winter the … oral triumphs he achieved in Paris and London last Summer, when his concerts in the French capital and his appearances as conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra were outstanding continental successes.

There will be two more concerts in the artists' course, those by Beniamino Gigli, leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, February 26, and Mme. Galli-Curci, great coloratura, March 17. Seats for these concerts are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G street.

… n… cer… pho… …h Russian score Serge Koussevitzky conducted elsewhere this season with phenomenal success.

The soloist of the evening will be Serge Prokofieff, who will appear in his pianoforte concerto No. 3. Prokofieff, regarded as the most talented of the younger Russian composers, by virtue of his operas, orchestral and chamber music, likewise holds an enviable position as a piano virtuoso.

Serge Koussevitzky will introduce the concert by a sonata of Galliard, the Eighteenth Century composer, which has been scored for orchestra by Miximilian Steinberg.

Goossens Wins Ovation With Boston Symphony

164

Members of Orchestra and Musical Public Are Unanimous in Recognizing His Ability—Critics Praise Him for "Balance and Faculty of Letting Music and Composer Speak for Themselves."

By A. J. Warner.

Boston, Jan. 22.—Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, appeared as guest conductor this afternoon, in Symphony Hall, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Goossens led the Boston musicians on Tuesday at a concert in Providence, R. I. Tomorrow evening he will again conduct the orchestra in Symphony Hall when today's program will be repeated. Mr. Goossens' success during his Boston engagement has been conspicuous, both with the members of the orchestra and with the music-loving public. At the close of the final rehearsal, yesterday, the musicians under his baton tendered him an ovation and demanded a speech. One of Bostons' leading musical authorities told The Times-Union correspondent this afternoon that Mr. Goossens possessed the qualities of the ideal conductor in whose interpretations are found balance, sanity, musicianship and the faculty of letting the music and the composer speak for themselves.

This afternoon's program included Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz," Brahms' Symphony No. 4, Goossens' own "Sinfonietta," which was heard for the first time in Boston; Delius' "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring"; and Debussy's "Iberia"; "Images for Orchestra", No. 2.

The magnificent resources of the Boston Symphony gave the talented young conductor an opportunity to be heard at his best and throughout the performance the qualities that have won him such notable success in America were finely in evidence. One sensed the quality of his beat, rhythmic accuracy that is so characteristic of his readings; and the sound musical and technical foundation on which his interpretations are based.

A large and deeply interested audience was present to welcome Mr. Goossens to Boston.

Goossens

n Audience Symphony; vides Climax

ONDENT.

22.—Eugene Goossens conducted his first Boston concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this afternoon. In mid-season guest conductors are the rule with New York orchestras. Not so in Boston. The Boston Symphony has never made a practice of engaging any onsiderable number of engaging any considerable number ot conductor does appear with this famous orchestra, the interest is more than casual.

The reception given Mr. Goossens as he came to the conductor's desk was polite. The "Freischutz" overture evoked a cordial response in applause from the audience. The Brahms Fourth Symphony seemed to complete Mr. Goossens's conquest of his audience's favor. The program numbers which followed were increasingly applauded, the Delins "On First Hearing the Cockoo in Spring" and Mr. Goossens's own "Sinfonietta" earning receptions which might at other than orchestra concerts have been considered requests for repetitions. The Debussy "Iberia" suite, which ended the program, was a climax in virtuosity by the orchestra which roused honest enthusiasm.

String Section Superior.

Throughout the concert the playing of the orchestra was a joy to hear. The strings in particular are, in quality and ability to play a great range of color and amount of tone, superior to all but very few string sections of any present-day orchestra. A vivid realization of this comes from hearing such music as the Delius number and the Debussy suite. As Mr. Goossens told the players at rehearsal the primal requisite of success for the Debussy music is kaleidoscopic color of tone and clarity of theme, as this is made to shift from one instrument, or one instrumental section, to another. The hearer must get plainly the thematic line and in order that this may be plain, there must be the utmost readiness of the accompanying sections of the orchestra to subordinate themselves to the instrument carrying the theme. And yet there must be beauty of tone and nicety of execution constantly maintained in pianissimos. These are not demands that an orchestra meets with casual ease, but the Boston Symphony met them at this concert

In the "octurne" of the Debussy suite and in the Delius number the wood winds played with beautiful tone and a play of crescendo and diminuendo well nigh ideal. The flute solo passages in the Delius piece were delightful. And the sonority of the brasses in the finale of the Debussy suite was superb. The interpretation of this Debussy music is one of the most arresting of interest of any which Mr. Goossens gives. There is no intricacy for the listener; there are no blatant moments despite al the mass of instrumentation and tricky rhythms. The Boston Symphony afforded its conductor complete means to convey to the audience his conception of music.

Brahms Well Conducted.

And the Goossens "Sinfoniette" was played with gusto and gaiety; the men plainly understood the spirit as well as the letter of this music; it had the incisive and yet unforced definition of rhythms that it needs.

Mr. Goossens gave the Brahms symphony an interpretation that had dignity, dramatic intensity and eloquence. It is not his practice to endeavor to be an innovator in interpreting Brahms. He does no tricks and seeks to go no further than the music carries him. As William J. Henderson, of the New York Sun, said of his conducting of the Brahms Second Symphony with the New York Symphony his conducting "is sane and sound."

The program played this afternoon will be repeated in Symphony Hall to-morrow evening. Mr. Goossens then returns to Rochester after his three weeks of guest conducting to resume his work with the Rochester Philharmonic. He has made cordial friends of the Boston Symphony players, management, and audiences.

---

to be one of the finest conductors in the musical world, will lead his wonderful organization in the Fourth Symphony of Brahms. A group of selections has been chosen which are certain to strike the fancy of the radio audience.

When the first programme goes on the air this evening at 8 o'clock, everything possible to insure the best broadcast will have been done. During the past week, engineers from WEEI, the Western Electric Company and the New England Telephone & Telegraph Company have spent hours daily trying out proper microphone locations. At the rehearsal of the symphony on Thursday and Friday mornings final tests were made. The engineers claim that everything has been done to eliminate foreign sounds in the audience, so that a perfect broadcast should be possible.

JAN 2

permit the broadcasting even a request from Mr. Goosens was declined.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Interest in the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra given last evening at Infantry Hall centred in the appearance of Eugene Goossens who came as guest conductor. The usual big audience attended, intent upon hearing for the first time the orchestral leader who recently made such a fine impression in New York.

Mr. Goossens is conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, a post he has held since he came to this country a few years ago. His splendid success with the New Yorw Symphony this season at the first of a series of appearances with that organization brought him more prominently before the American musical public. He is an Englishman, and for many years previous to his coming here was a noted figure in England's musical life.

Last evening Mr. Goossens gave Provi-

program
phony
it said the gre he four interpre cessful
anced p

Upon ture he but befo polite r plause gifts.
gramme pressed to their could ha concert.

The pr
lowing o

Overture t
Symphony
Alleg
Andante moderato.
Allegro giocoso.
Allegro energico e passionato.

---

naval officers and plain peasants who have come here to witness to-morrow or Friday the take-off of Commander Ramon Franco and Capt. Ruiz de Alva in a seaplane flight to South America, and possibly thence to New York.

The aviators made a successful flight yesterday from Melilla, Morocco, to Huelva, in their Ne Plus Ultra machine.

The fliers will carry with them on their trip more than 100 messages, sent by King Alfonso to President de Alvear of Argentine, and by various Spanish Mayors to the Mayor of Buenos Aires.

Commander Franco, who is in charge of the flight, is expected to take off here at dawn to-morrow or Friday and proceed southward to the Canary Islands, which it is hoped will be reached by noon. The seaplane will take on 750 gallons of gasoline and continue the trip the day after the arrival in the Canaries for the Cape Verde Islands. The route of the fliers will be patrolled by Spanish war vessels.

The Ne Plus Ultra carries a radio set which will enable the fliers to communicate over a radius of more than miles on a wave length of between and 900 metres. The call letters of plane are EDR-12.

ture, a thought

DANISH SHIP SEARCHE FOR SOVIET PROPAGAN

Anti-American Circulars Beli Hidden in Freighters' Cargo

Philadelphia, Jan. 20.—(AP)—Go ment agents to-day were searching cargo of the Danish freighter Ivar, arrived yesterday from Baltic ports

---

LUI

MEN'

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS-HERALD
PORTLAND, ME.

JAN 2 3 1926

Boston Symphony Concert Is Coming Via Station WCSH

Portland Studio Linked With WEEI and WTAG For First Time

It has arrived. The time that has been awaited by radio listeners throughout Maine and beyond, since last Summer, when Station WCSH of the Congress Square Hotel, Portland, should be linked with prominent stations outside the State, for the rebroadcasting of exceptional programs, is here.

Tonight, between 8.15 and 10.15 p. m., WCSH, on a direct hook-up with WEEI of Boston and WTAG of Worcester, will broadcast no less a musical treat than the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a two-hour program to be played at Symphony Hall, Boston.

Tomorrow evening's broadcast of the Symphony will be the first of a series of 12 such concerts to be given Saturday evening from 8.15 to 10.15 o'clock. On the Saturday night following tomorrow's program, Station WJAR of Providence will also be in the chain.

Linking the Congress Square Station with WEEI for the broadcast of the Boston Symphony brings further credit in radio pioneering in Maine to the Rines Brothers Company of Portland, for 52 years leading dry goods merchants in this city. In each of the cities where the Boston Symphony is to be broadcast on Saturday evenings, a sponsor for the program was obtained. In Portland, the Rines Brothers Company came to the fore and deserves the credit.

Linking WCSH with WEEI and the other stations means a heavy expense, but the sponsor, already a strong believer in the value of commercial broadcasting of high grade programs, was convinced of the worth of the project, and has undertaken it for the entire series of 12 concerts.

The prestige and superb position of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in American musical circles needs no elaboration. To have its exceptional musicianship and delightful programs broadcast as direct from WCSH in Portland, as though the orchestra were to play in the studio here, through the hook-up with WEEI, means much to radio listeners in Maine, insuring as it does virtually perfect reception of the program in all parts of the State and beyond its borders northward and westward.

Radio enthusiasts of the State have long been asking, "When will WCSH be hooked up with outside important stations?" The answer is ready. "Tomorrow evening." And the step is without doubt the fore-runner of other and perhaps more extensive hookups for WCSH at appropriate occasions in the future.

---

course, leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera company, at Poli's on Friday afternoon, February 26, and Mme. Galli-Curci, the world's greatest coloratura, at Poli's on Wednesday afternoon, March 17.

Saturday the appearance of Serge Prokofieff as soloist in his third pianoforte concerto. This score will be heard at both concerts and will in each case be preceded by the march and scherzo from the same composer's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges."

At the Thursday concert Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem." and Mousseorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain," will complete a Russian program.

At the Saturay concert, besides the Prokofieff numbers. Koussevitzky will present Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scherherazade" and a sonata of Galliard arranged by Steinberg.

Symphony and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture begin to-day's Philharmonic program. Thursday and Friday will bring two novelties, Roger-Ducasse's "Sarabande" for orchestra and small chorus and Vincenzo Tommasini's "Pæsaggi Toscani," a rhapsody on popular themes, based on old Italian folksongs. These, according to the composer, are reset with modern harmonies and orchestral effects, but without impairing their original character.

The seventh Students' Concert on Saturday and the Brooklyn concert at the Academy of Music next Sunday afternoon, January 81, will have a program of Vivaldi's Concerto Grosso in D minor, Haydn's "Clock" Symphony, "Siegfried's Death" and the Funeral March from "Götterdämmerung," Respighi's "Pines of Rome" and Berlioz's "Rakoczy March."

As no tickets are available for Toscanini's subscription concerts with the Philharmonic, a non-subscription concert, for which tickets are now on sale, will be given at Carnegie Hall Monday night, February 1, with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and works of Bach, Mendelssohn and Wagner. Mr. Toscanini's last Philharmonic concert will be Sunday afternoon, February 7. Wilhelm Furtwängler will open his second season as Philharmonic conductor and his first as one of the orchestra's regular leaders, on the 11th.

The Boston Symphony will pay its next New York visit next week, when Serge Koussevitzky will give an all-Russian program on Thursday, February 4, and a mainly Russian one on Saturday, the 6th. Serge Prokofieff will appear in both concerts as soloist in his third piano concerto, which will be preceded by the March and Scherzo from his opera, "The Love of Three Oranges." On Thursday evening Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain" complete the program. On Saturday afternoon the other numbers will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and a sonata of Galliard arranged by Steinberg.

Ravel's Ballet, oe."

The concert will open with sonata by the early eighteenth century composer Galiard. This score, replete with charm and gaiety, has been arranged for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, the son-in-law of Rimski-Korsakoff.

The coming appearance of Serge Koussevitzky has aroused considerable interest and curiosity here. This conductor, in his two years in America, has easily taken rank, in the general opinion of our public, with the very first of living conductors.

New subsc

Mr. America this Winter oral triumphs he achieved in Paris and London last Summer, when his concerts in the French capital and his appearances as conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra were outstanding continental successes.

There will be two more concerts in the artists' course, those by Beniamino Gigli, leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, February 26, and Mme. Galli-Curci, great coloratura, March 17. Seats for these concerts are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G street.

Russian score Serge Koussevitzky conducted elsewhere this season with phenomenal success.

The soloist of the evening will be Serge Prokofieff, who will appear in his pianoforte concerto No. 3. Prokofieff, regarded as the most talented of the younger Russian composers, by virtue of his operas, orchestral and chamber music, likewise holds an enviable position as a piano virtuoso.

Serge Koussevitzky will introduce the concert by a sonata of Galliard, the Eighteenth Century composer, which has been scored for orchestra by Miximilian Steinberg.

164

...ns Wins Ovation ... Boston Symphony

...chestra and Musical Public Are Unan... ...ognizing His Ability—Critics Praise ...lance and Faculty of Letting Music ...nposer Speak for Themselves."

...arner.
...Eugene Goos-
...he Rochester
...stra, appeared
...his afternoon,
...f the Boston
... Mr. Goos-
...musicians on
...n Providence,
...ning he will
...orchestra in
... today's pro-
... Mr. Goos-
...is Boston en-
... conspicuous,
...rs of the or-
... music-loving
... the final re-
...ne musicians
...ered him an
...d a speech.
...ing musical
...Times-Union
...ernoon that
...l the quali-
...tor in whose
...nd balance,

sanity, musicianship and the faculty of letting the music and the composer speak for themselves.

This afternoon's program included Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz," Brahms' Symphony No. 4, Goossens' own "Sinfonietta," which was heard for the first time in Boston; Delius' "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring"; and Debussy's "Iberia"; "Images for Orchestra", No. 2.

The magnificent resources of the Boston Symphony gave the talented young conductor an opportunity to be heard at his best and throughout the performance the qualities that have won him such notable success in America were finely in evidence. One sensed the quality of his beat, rhythmic accuracy that is so characteristic of his readings; and the sound musical and technical foundation on which his interpretations are based.

A large and deeply interested audience was present to welcome Mr. Goossens to Boston.

...n Audience ... Symphony; ...vides Climax

...NDENT.
...he Goossens
... on concert
...y Orchestra
... afternoon.
...luctors are
... orchestras.
...Boston Sym-
... practice of
... number of
... number of
...th this fa-
...est is more

...r. Goossens
...uctor's desk
...hutz" over-
...onse in ap-
...ence. The
... seemed to
... conquest of
...The program
...d were in-
... Delins "On
... in Spring"
... Sinfonietta"
...h night at
...oncerts have
... for repeti-
...beria" suite,
..., was a cli-
...he orchestra
...thusiasm.

...perior.

...rt the play-
...as a joy to
...articular are,
... play a great
...ount of tone,
...y few string
...lay orchestra.
...is comes from
... the Delius
...y suite. As
...e players at
...quisite of suc-
...usic is kaleid-
...nd clarity of
... to shift from
... instrumental
...he hearer must
...ic line and in
...e plain, there
...adiness of the
...of the orchestra to subordinate themselves to the instrument carrying the theme. And yet there must be beauty of tone and nicety of execution constantly maintained in pianissimos. These are not demands that an orchestra meets with casual ease, but the Boston Symphony met them at this concert.

In the "octurne" of the Debussy suite and in the Delius number the wood winds played with beautiful tone and a play of crescendo and diminuendo well nigh ideal. The flute solo passages in the Delius piece were delightful. And the sonority of the brasses in the finale of the Debussy suite was superb. The interpretation of this Debussy music is one of the most arresting of interest of any which Mr. Goossens gives. There is no intricacy for the listener; there are no blatant moments despite al the mass of instrumentation and tricky rhythms. The Boston Symphony afforded its conductor complete means to convey to the audience his conception of music.

Brahms Well Conducted.

And the Goossens "Sinfoniette" was played with gusto and gaiety; the men plainly understood the spirit as well as the letter of this music; it had the incisive and yet unforced definition of rhythms that it needs.

Mr. Goossens gave the Brahms symphony an interpretation that had dignity, dramatic intensity and eloquence. It is not h's practice to endeavor to be an innovator in interpreting Brahms. He does no tricks and seeks to go no further than the music carries him. As William J. Henderson, of the New York Sun, said of his conducting of the Brahms Second Symphony with the New York Symphony, his conducting "is sane and sound."

The program played this afternoon will be repeated in Symphony Hall to-morrow evening. Mr. Goossens then returns to Rochester after his three weeks of guest conducting to resume his work with the Rochester Philharmonic. He has made cordial friends of the Boston Symphony players, management, and audiences.

JAN 2 ...

... permit the broadcasting ... even a request from Mr. Goosens was declined.

...onsidered
...nductors in
...d his won-
...ourth Sym.
...up of selec-
...ch are cer-
...f the radi...

...ne goes o...
...o'clock, ev...
...e the be...
...one. Du...
...eers fro...
...c Compan...
...elephone
... spent
...per micr...
...ehearsal
...and Frida...
...made. Th...
...thing has
...ign sound...
... a perfec...
...e

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Interest in the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra given last evening at Infantry Hall centred in the appearance of Eugene Goossens who came as guest conductor. The usual big audience attended, intent upon hearing for the first time the orchestral leader who recently made such a fine impression in New York.

Mr. Goossens is conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, a post he has held since he came to this country a few years ago. His splendid success with the New Yorw Symphony this season at the first of a series of appearances with that organization brought him more prominently before the American musical public. He is an Englishman, and for many years previous to his coming here was a noted figure in England's musical life.

Last evening Mr. Goossens gave Provi... ... a decided treat ... programme that held the Brahms Symphony in E-minor as principal number. It it said that he has a special fondness for the great classicists. In the Brahms work he found a rich field for the display of interpretive talent and he was no less successful in the remainder of the nicely balanced programme.

Upon appearance for the opening overture he was accorded a warm greeting, but before the concert ended interest and polite recognition grew into stormy applause of appreciation of his unusual gifts. From beginning to end of the programme the audience seemed greatly impressed by his power and the players went to their task with an enthusiasm which could have but one result—a delightful concert.

The programme was played in the following order:

Overture to "Der Freischutz" ....Weber
Symphony in E-minor, No. 4, Op. 98...Brahms
Allegro non troppo.
Andante moderato.
Allegro giocoso.
Allegro energico e passionato.
Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde" ....Wagner
"On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring" ....Delius
"Finlandia": Symphonic Poem for Orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7............Sibelius

Providence patrons are accustomed to brilliant performances by the Boston Symphony under Mr. Koussevitsky and to rouse them to enthusiasm a conductor in the Russian leader's place must needs possess qualities of a high order. That Mr. Goossens has such qualities became evident in the first number played, the Weber overture. This, however, was but the prelude to a richer and fuller display of musicianship which came in the playing of the Brahms symphony. There may be difference of opinion concerning the merits of the great symphonic works of the German master. The symphony played last evening may or may not be his finest effort, according to individual opinion, but the fact remains that it is a tremendously engrossing musical structure, a massive creation of imaginative thought that holds almost unlimited possibilities for the sympathetic and scholarly conductor.

The four movements perhaps owe their inspiration to Brahams's life experiences; they may be the offspring of his philosophic reflection or, mayhap, the tone picture of some admired literary masterpiece. It matters little to those who may now sit and listen to the wonderful flow of his harmonies so wonderfully wrought. And when his intent is so beautifully conceived as it is by Mr. Goossens we should have little quarrel with its real inspiration.

The players were at the height of responsiveness and the various instrumental voices lent their aid in pure and expressive manner throughout the symphony. From a technical viewpoint one of the most interesting features of Mr. Goossen's readings is the manner in which he reveals the little separate threads of melody as each individual instrument takes up the story in the harmonic tide. He has a sense of balance in adjusting the tonal power of his instruments that is a source of constant delight to the listener.

The Wagner excerpt again presented conductor and men in impressive manner. It was an uplifting performance difficult to adequately describe in detail being so filled with charming effects.

This was followed by the tone picture of Delius. Frederick Delius is a composer who sings of nature, and in this fascinating piece he breathes of the simple scenes and sounds that come to those who appreciate her beauties. The work gives the flute a haunting melodic part which was given with fine tone quality. The audience evidently enjoyed it to the full.

Sibilius's strong and colorful "Finlande" symphonic poem made a brilliant closing number. Here the composer uses the brass choir effectively and indulges in skilful contrast in his instrumentation.

At the conclusion of the concert conductor and players were enthusiastically applauded for their work.

A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS-HERALD
PORTLAND, ME.

JAN 2 3 1926

Boston Symphony Concert Is Coming Via Station WCSH

Portland Studio Linked With WEEI and WTAG For First Time

It has arrived. The time that has been awaited by radio listeners throughout Maine and beyond, since last Summer, when Station WCSH of the Congress Square Hotel, Portland, should be linked with prominent stations outside the State, for the rebroadcasting of exceptional programs, is here.

Tonight, between 8.15 and 10.15 p. m., WCSH, on a direct hook-up with WEEI of Boston and WTAG of Worcester, will broadcast no less a musical treat than the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a two-hour program to be played at Symphony Hall, Boston.

Tomorrow evening's broadcast of the Symphony will be the first of a series of 12 such concerts to be given Saturday evening from 8.15 to 10.15 o'clock. On the Saturday night following tomorrow's program, Station WJAR of Providence will also be in the chain.

Linking the Congress Square Station with WEEI for the broadcast of the Boston Symphony brings further credit in radio pioneering in Maine to the Rines Brothers Company of Portland, for 52 years leading dry goods merchants in this city. In each of the cities where the Boston Symphony is to be broadcast on Saturday evenings, a sponsor for the program was obtained. In Portland, the Rines Brothers Company came to the fore and deserves the credit.

Linking WCSH with WEEI and the other stations means a heavy expense, but the sponsor, already a strong believer in the value of commercial broadcasting of high grade programs, was convinced of the worth of the project, and has undertaken it for the entire series of 12 concerts.

The prestige and superb position of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in American musical circles needs no elaboration. To have its exceptional musicianship and delightful programs broadcast as direct from WCSH in Portland, as though the orchestra were to play in the studio here, through the hook-up with WEEI, means much to radio listeners in Maine, insuring as it does virtually perfect reception of the program in all parts of the State and beyond its borders northward and westward.

Radio enthusiasts of the State have long been asking, "When will WCSH be hooked up with outside important stations?" The answer is ready. "Tomorrow evening." And the step is without doubt the fore-runner of other and perhaps more extensive hookups for WCSH at appropriate occasions in the future.

---

cour... ...li, leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera company, at Poli's on Friday afternoon, February 26, and Mme. Galli-Curci, the world's greatest coloratura, at Poli's on Wednesday afternoon, March 17.

---

o ... dt ... Ha... Satu... the appearance of Serge Prokofieff as soloist in his third pianoforte concerto. This score will be heard at both concerts and will in each case be preceded by the march and scherzo from the same composer's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges."

At the Thursday concert Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Mousseorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain," will complete a Russian program.

At the Saturay concert, besides the Prokofieff numbers, Koussevitzky will present Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scherherazade" and a sonata of Galliard arranged by Steinberg.

Symphony and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture begin to-day's Philharmonic program. Thursday and Friday will bring two novelties, Roger-Ducasse's "Sarabande" for orchestra and small chorus and Vincenzo Tommasini's "Pæsaggi Toscani," a rhapsody on popular themes, based on old Italian folksongs. These, according to the composer, are reset with modern harmonies and orchestral effects, but without impairing their original character.

The seventh Students' Concert on Saturday and the Brooklyn concert at the Academy of Music next Sunday afternoon, January 31, will have a program of Vivaldi's Concerto Grosso in D minor, Haydn's "Clock" Symphony, "Siegfried's Death" and the Funeral March from "Götterdämmerung," Respighi's "Pines of Rome" and Berlioz's "Rakoczy March."

As no tickets are available for Toscanini's subscription concerts with the Philharmonic, a non-subscription concert, for which tickets are now on sale, will be given at Carnegie Hall Monday night, February 1, with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and works of Bach, Mendelssohn and Wagner. Mr. Toscanini's last Philharmonic concert will be Sunday afternoon, February 7. Wilhelm Furtwängler will open his second season as Philharmonic conductor and his first as one of the orchestra's regular leaders, on the 11th.

The Boston Symphony will pay its next New York visit next week, when Serge Koussevitzky will give an all-Russian program on Thursday, February 4, and a mainly Russian one on Saturday, the 6th. Serge Prokofieff will appear in both concerts as soloist in his third piano concerto, which will be preceded by the March and Scherzo from his opera, "The Love of Three Oranges." On Thursday evening Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain" complete the program. On Saturday afternoon the other numbers will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and a sonata of Galliard arranged by Steinberg.

---

gr... ...om Ravel's Ballet, ...loe." The concert will open ... sonata by the early eighteenth century composer Galiard. This score, replete with charm and gaiety, has been arranged for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, the son-in-law of Rimski-Korsakoff.

The coming appearance of Serge Koussevitzky has aroused considerable interest and curiosity here. This conductor, in his two years in America, has easily taken rank, in the general opinion of our public, with the very first of living conductors.

... se... tio... mat... New... subsc...

Mr. Kou... ...in America this Winter the ... ...oral triumphs he achieved in Paris and London last Summer, when his concerts in the French capital and his appearances as conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra were outstanding continental successes.

There will be two more concerts in the artists' course, those by Beniamino Gigli, leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, February 26, and Mme. Galli-Curci, great coloratura, March 17. Seats for these concerts are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G street.

... ce... pho... ...h Russian score Serge Koussevitzky conducted elsewhere this season with phenomenal success.

The soloist of the evening will be Serge Prokofieff, who will appear in his pianoforte concerto No. 3. Prokofieff, regarded as the most talented of the younger Russian composers, by virtue of his operas, orchestral and chamber music, likewise holds an enviable position as a piano virtuoso.

Serge Koussevitzky will introduce the concert by a sonata of Galliard, the Eighteenth Century composer, which has been scored for orchestra by Miximilian Steinberg.

BOSTON MUSIC CRITICS GIVE GOOSSENS GENEROUS PRAISE FOR WORK WITH ORCHESTRA

"Brilliance" and "imagination" were characterizations used by the Boston music critics in their comment on Eugene Goossens's performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra which he conducted for the last time Saturday night. Boston, noted for its conservatism, responded to the gifted leadership of the young composer-conductor who returns to Rochester to-day to begin rehearsals for Thursday night's concert with the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra. The audiences were large and enthusiastic and the critics agreed that he possesses both the sound musicianship and the inspiration that should be among the attributes of an orchestral leader of the first rank.

While critical opinion was unanimous as to his ability as a conductor there was some difference as to the enduring merits of his own composition, "Sinfonietta," which was played at two of the Boston concerts. The Boston Post found in it "genuine beauty" while the writer in the Globe thought some might "find its daring harmonies annoying."

Thursday night's concert will Mr. Goossens's first Rochester appearance since December 10th. In his terday he was most completely convincing in DeBussy's "Iberia," which received a performance marvelously imaginative, one that will not soon be forgotten. Again, with entire sympathy he read the little piece of Delius, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," while it is altogether reasonable to suppose that his own "Sinfonietta" was done the fullest possible justice. Beyond disputing, too, there was dramatic quality in the "Freischutz" overture. The performance of it, like that of every other piece on the program, was to the last degree brilliant, technically and musically finished, judiciously balanced and finely proportioned, for this tall, spare, alert young man is not only a sound and clear-headed musician, but a conductor who knows both what he wants and knows exactly how to get it."

Of Mr. Goossens's own composition, "Sinfonietta," Mr. Smith wrote: "It is an unpretentious affair, even for a piece of that unassuming title yet in its chromatic second section, which

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 2 5 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

An unusual Russian score which has attracted a great deal of attention in the western world, Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," will be the feature of the program at the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, to Hartford in a concert at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 7. The Russian conductor was a friend of the late Scriabin, and a pioneer of his music in Russia.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

[illegible] 1926

GOOSSENS BACK FOR CONCERT

The locomotive has choo-choo-ed its way into the concert halls.

Honegger's "Pacific 231" in which the composer has translated the heroic qualities of a giant engine into music, has been performed by the New York and Boston Symphony Orchestras. Rochester will hear the novelty for the first time next Thursday night when Eugene Goossens returns to conduct the Philharmonic in its second concert of the season.

Max Landow, pianist, member of

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARRISBURG,
PA.
PATRIOT

JAN 26 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN WEEKLY BROADCASTS

The Boston Symphony is the latest orchestra to go "on the air". Beginning last Saturday and for eleven consecutive Saturday evenings thereafter, music in its entirety as played by this orchestra will be broadcast from Radio Station WEEI of the Edison Electric Illuminating Company.

The broadcasting is made possible by the generosity of Winfield S. Quinby of Brookline, music lover, art patron and prominent in civic betterment and New England business and industrial development enterprises. He will give $1000 a week for twelve weeks, which will cover the greater share of the expense of the broadcasting. The remainder will be contributed by WEEI.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

GOOSSENS TO GO, IS REPORT

Will Become Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Is One Story.

Talk that Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, might leave here for other fields soon has persisted ever since Mr. Goossens left the city on the trip during which he was guest conductor of the New York and Boston orchestras.

On Mr. Goossens' return to this city today, knowledge of any proposed

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORFOLK, VA.
PILOT

JAN 3 1 1926

Another Orchestra Added To Exclusive WBZ Attractions

Boston, Mass., Jan. 30.—Another musical organization, the Repertory Theater Orchestra of Boston under the direction of Daniel Kuntz, has been added to the ever-increasing list of exclusive attractions of Westinghouse station WBZ and will be heard every Wednesday evening from 8 to 8:30 o'clock. The Repertory Orchestra is composed of three violins, viola, cello, bass, flute, clarinet, piano, and drums. Since its initial appearance a short time ago at the opening of the Repertory Theater, the orchestra has attained a prominent place in musical circles in New England.

Daniel Kuntz was one of the original members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He also conducted the orchestra at Poland Springs and at the Lake Placid Club, and played in the orchestra at the theater at Baireuth which was built under the direction of Richard Wagner for the production of his great music dramas. He has been connected with concert organizations, notably the Kneisel Quartet and the Adamowski Quartet.

In his position as director, Mr. Kuntz brings vast experience and special aptitude in the arranging of popular programs. He will have at his disposal one of the largest musical libraries in the possession of any individual musician in the country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 2 7 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra

There is a very heavy demand for seats for the only Boston Symphony concert of the season. This famous organization will be heard in the Capitol theater Sunday afternoon, February 7, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. Seats may be obtained at McCoy's music store, No. 89 Asylum street. Telephone orders will be taken and held for a limited time. The telephone number is 2-6147.

The prinicpal number on the local program is Scriabin's third symphony in C minor. It is called "The Devine Poem." Scriabin, the late Russian composer, may be characterized as an individualist, an idealist and a mystic in tones. "The Devine Poem" is in thre parts. The first "Luttes" ('Struggles'), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation, and doubt. The second "Volutes" has been

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

JAN 2 7 1926

'HAPPY HERE,' DECLARES GOOSSENS

Rochester will not lose Eugene Goossens as conductor of its Philharmonic Orchestra, despite the many offers that have been made him to go to other cities, according to a statement by Mr. Goossens today.

"It is very flattering to have all these attractive posts presented to me by well meaning but over enthusiastic friends,' said Mr. Goossens, "but all I know of any of the rumers is what I have read in the papers.

'Why should I wish to leave Rochester? We have a fine orchestra, Rochester is at the beginning of the development that will make it one of the great musical centers of the world and I am in a most congenial and happy environment."

Mr. Goossens has returned to this city after a trip during which he was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony and the New York Philha

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 2 7 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

There is a heavy demand for seats for the only Boston Symphony concert of the season. This famous organization will be heard in the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon February 7 under then management of Frank A. Sedgwick. Seats may be obtained at McCoy's music store No. 89 Asylum street. Telephone orders will be taken and held for a limited time. The number is 2-6147.

The principal number on the program is Seriabin's third symphony in C minor. It is called "The Devine Poem." Scriabin, the late Russian composer, may be characterized as an individualist, an idealist and a mystic in tenes. "The Devine Poem" is in three parts. The first "Luttes" ('Struggles'), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation, and doubt. The second "Velutes" has been called "the spirit's eostatic joy merging into nature. The third, "Jeu divin," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed.

Serge Koussevitsky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was a close friend of Seriabin in Russia, where in full sympathetic understanding with this remarkable composer, he preformed his principal scores. Scriabin traveled with Koussevitsky on one of his famous voyages along the Velga river.

Boston Symphony to Play Here Next Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky will make its first Washington appearance of the season at Poli's Tuesday afternon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock in a brilliant orchestral program that will include selections from Weber, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Brahms. The latter composer's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Opus 68, will constitute the feature of the afternoon, while Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faun," with eclogue by S. Mallarme and Rimsky-Kors

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.

JAN 2 8 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of its Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first Washington appearance of the season at Poli's theater next Tuesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock, in a program that will include selections from Weber, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Brahms. The latter composer's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Opus 68, in four movements, will constitute the featured musical

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.

JAN 2 8 1926

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of its internationally-famous Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 2 8 1926

To Address Alum At Banquet To

DR. JAMES R. ANGELL

The annual meeting and ba of the Yale club of Western M chusetts will be held tonight a Nayasset club, with James Ro Angell, president of the universi the principal speaker. W. Kirk nor, president of the organiz will preside, and Atty Charle Bosworth will act as toastm Richard Hooker, president of Republican Publishing company. speak on alumni matters. A p sional entertainment and music follow.

AWARD MORE HONORS FOR SAFETY POST

Council Gives Names Those Who Received H orable Mention

An additional number of h have been granted by the Sp field Safety council in its recent test for the best drawing and s slogan. First and fourth plac the contest was won by Jack C mings of 154 Oak Grove avenue, Frank D. Aldrich was awarded ond honors. Third and fifth we George A. Wood of Mittineague, sixth and seventh to Vincent P. of Indian Orchard. The eighth a was won by R. F. Blanchard.

The new list released by Safety council gives honorable tion to George Blascak and Miss phie White, William Carter compa E. D. Seaver, Chapman Valve; Anna Lord, Longmeadow; Miss garet Looney, Bosch Magneto; Collins, Westinghouse; Herbert ley, Charles E. McLellan, Dewey Stone, Joseph Signo, Michael M arty and J. Keenan

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO

JAN 2 9 1926

FINE PROGRAMS WILL BE ON AIR

Four Symphony Orchestras Will Give Concerts This Week-end.

Radio fans who tune in Saturday

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BANGOR
ME.
COMMERCIAL

JAN 3 0 1926

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS-HERALD
PORTLAND, ME.

JAN 3 0 1926

Boston Symphony To Broadcast Tonight

WCSH Will Be Linked With WEEI To Bring 14th Seasonal Concert To Maine

The hours of eight to ten o'clock this evening will again bring the rare charm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Maine radio listeners and those of other New England communities when WCSH, the Congress Square Hotel at Portland, and WEEI, the Edison Electric Illuminating Co. of Boston, are linked for the second time. It will be the 14th seasonal concert by the noted orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston, and the second to be broadcast.

The program will open with a selecti

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 3 1 1926

or Symphony on the Air

what is from the p of concerts by those who support orchestra excerts an irrelevan st by its novThe claims of the ra ience are obviously incidental, and should be so regarded.

Nevertheless, the broadcasting of Boston Symphony programs is an educational influence of high potential value—assuming the physical success of the experiment. This is not alone on account of the merit of the orchestra. In equal degree it is due to the relatively limited number of New England people who in any year can hear directly the Boston Symphony programs.

In the days when the orchestra enjoyed a unique position, Boston Symphony concerts in Boston were very much of a caste affair. Save for the "rush" seats in the second gallery at the Friday afternoon rehearsal, admission was obtainable only on season tickets, and these were entirely sold in advance. There was no box office sale. Use of a few tickets could, to be sure, be procured from the theater ticket agencies. Season tickets at moderate cost could be obtained, and were often bought co-operatively; but the casual visitor to Boston, or the Bostonian who desired to attend occasionally rather than regularly, had meager opportunity.

This year for the first time a series of concerts early in the week is being given. But frequent and easy contact between the orchestra and the public has never been as well attained as it is attained by the New York orchestras. Springfield's "free" concert given by the Boston orchestra is not without problems, alike in selecti audience and in financing. But does afford a ha liaison betwee orchestra and public.

JAN 2 [illegible] 1926

BOSTON MUSIC CRITICS GIVE GOOSSENS GENEROUS PRAISE FOR WORK WITH ORCHESTRA

"Brilliance" and "imagination" were characterizations used by the Boston music critics in their comment on Eugene Goossens's performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra which he conducted for the last time Saturday night. Boston, noted for its conservatism, responded to the gifted leadership of the young composer-conductor who returns to Rochester to-day to begin rehearsals for Thursday night's concert with the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra. The audiences were large and enthusiastic and the critics agreed that he possesses both the sound musicianship and the inspiration that should be among the attributes of an orchestral leader of the first rank.

While critical opinion was unanimous as to his ability as a conductor there was some difference as to the enduring merits of his own composition, "Sinfonietta," which was played at two of the Boston concerts. The Boston Post found in it "genuine beauty" while the writer in the Globe thought some might "find its daring harmonies annoying."

Thursday night's concert will Mr. Goossens's first Rochester appearance since December 10th. In his

terday he was most completely convincing in DeBussy's "Iberia," which received a performance marvelously imaginative, one that will not soon be forgotten. Again, with entire sympathy he read the little piece of Delius, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," while it is altogether reasonable to suppose that his own "Sinfonietta" was done the fullest possible justice. Beyond disputing, too, there was dramatic quality in the "Freischutz" overture. The performance of it, like that of every other piece on the program, was to the last degree brilliant, technically and musically finished, judiciously balanced and finely proportioned, for this tall, spare, alert young man is not only a sound and clear-headed musician, but a conductor who knows both what he wants and knows exactly how to get it."

Of Mr. Goossens's own composition, "Sinfonietta," Mr. Smith wrote: "It is an unpretentious affair, even for a piece of that unassuming title yet in its chromatic second section, which Mr. Goossens describes as 'very sen- and

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 2 5 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

An unusual Russian score which has attracted a great deal of attention in the western world, Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem." will be the feature of the program at the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, to Hartford in a concert at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 7. The Russian conductor was a friend of the late Scriabin, and a pioneer of his music in Russia. He may now still be tive

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

GOOSSENS BACK FOR CONCERT

The locomotive has choo-choo-ed its way into the concert halls.

Honegger's "Pacific 231" in which the composer has translated the heroic qualities of a giant engine into music, has been performed by the New York and Boston Symphony Orchestras. Rochester will hear the novelty for the first time next Thursday night when Eugene Goossens returns to conduct the Philharmonic in its second concert of the season.

Max Landow, pianist, member of

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARRISBURG,
PA.
PATRIOT

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN WEEKLY BROADCASTS

The Boston Symphony is the latest orchestra to go "on the air". Beginning last Saturday and for eleven consecutive Saturday evenings thereafter, music in its entirety as played by this orchestra will be broadcast from Radio Station WEEI of the Edison Electric Illuminating Company.

The broadcasting is made possible by the generosity of Winfield S. Quinby of Brookline, music lover, art patron and prominent in civic betterment and New England business and industrial development enterprises. He will give $1000 a week for twelve weeks, which will cover the greater share of the expense of the broadcasting. The remainder will be contributed by WEEI.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

GOOSSENS TO GO, IS REPORT

Will Become Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Is One Story.

Talk that Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, might leave here for other fields soon has persisted ever since Mr. Goossens left the city on the trip during which he was guest conductor of the New York and Boston orchestras.

On Mr. Goossens' return to this city today, knowledge of any proposed

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORFOLK, VA.
PILOT

JAN 3 1 1926

Another Orchestra Added To Exclusive WBZ Attractions

Boston, Mass., Jan. 30.—Another musical organization, the Repertory Theater Orchestra of Boston under the direction of Daniel Kuntz, has been added to the ever-increasing list of exclusive attractions of Westinghouse station WBZ and will be heard every Wednesday evening from 8 to 8:30 o'clock. The Repertory Orchestra is composed of three violins, viola, cello, bass, flute, clarinet, piano, and drums. Since its initial appearance a short time ago at the opening of the Repertory Theater, the orchestra has attained a prominent place in musical circles in New England.

Daniel Kuntz was one of the original members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He also conducted the orchestra at Poland Springs and at the Lake Placid Club, and played in the orchestra at the theater at Baireuth which was built under the direction of Richard Wagner for the production of his great music dramas. He has been connected with concert organizations, notably the Kneisel Quartet and the Adamowski Quartet.

In his position as director, Mr. Kuntz brings vast experience and special aptitude in the arranging of popular programs. He will have at his disposal one of the largest musical libraries in the possession of any individual musician in the country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 2 7 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra

There is a very heavy demand for seats for the only Boston Symphony concert of the season. This famous organization will be heard in the Capitol theater Sunday afternoon, February 7, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. Seats may be obtained at McCoy's music store, No. 89 Asylum street. Telephone orders will be taken and held for a limited time. The telephone number is 2-6147.

The prinicpal number on the local program is Scriabin's third symphony in C minor. It is called "The Devine Poem." Scriabin, the late Russian composer, may be characterized as an individualist, an idealist and a mystic in tones. "The Devine Poem" is in thre parts. The first "Luttes" ('Struggles'), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation, and doubt. The second "Volutes" has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy merg-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

JAN 2 7 1926

'HAPPY HERE,' DECLARES GOOSSENS

Rochester will not lose Eugene Goossens as conductor of its Philharmonic Orchestra, despite the many offers that have been made him to go to other cities, according to a statement by Mr. Goossens today.

"It is very flattering to have all these attractive posts presented to me by well meaning but over enthusiastic friends,' said Mr. Goossens, "but all I know of any of the rumers is what I have read in the papers.

'Why should I wish to leave Rochester? We have a fine orchestra, Rochester is at the beginning of the development that will make it one of the great musical centers of the world and I am in a most congenial and happy environment."

Mr. Goossens has returned to this city after a trip during which he was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony and the New York Philha

Wh port to

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 2 7 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

There is a heavy demand for seats for the only Boston Symphony concert of the season. This famous organization will be heard in the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon February 7 under then management of Frank A. Sedgwick. Seats may be obtained at McCoy's music store No. 89 Asylum street. Telephone orders will be taken and held for a limited time. The number is 2-6147.

The principal number on the program is Seriabin's third symphony in C minor. It is called "The Devine Poem." Scriabin, the late Russian composer, may be characterized as an individualist, an idealist and a mystic in tenes. "The Devine Poem" is in three parts. The first "Luttes" ('Struggles'), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation, and doubt. The second "Velutes" has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy merging into nature. The third, "Jeu divin," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed.

Serge Koussevitsky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was a close friend of Seriabin in Russia, where in full sympathetic understanding with this remarkable composer, he preformed his principal scores. Scriabin traveled with Koussevitsky on one of his famous voyages along the Velga river.

[illegible] 1926

Boston Symphony to Play Here Next Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will make its first Washington appearance of the season at Poli's Tuesday afternon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock in a brilliant orchestral program that will include selections from Weber, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Brahms. The latter composer's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Opus 68, will constitute the feature of the after noon, while Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faun," with eclogue by S. Mallarme and Rimsky-Kors

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.

JAN 2 8 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of its Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first Washington appearance of the season at Poli's theater next Tuesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock, in a program that will include selections from Weber, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Brahms. The latter composer's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Opus 68, in four movements, will constitute the featured musical event of the afternoon

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.

JAN 2 8 1926

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of its internationally-famous Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 2 8 1926

To Address Alum
At Banquet To

DR. JAMES R. ANGELL

The annual meeting and ba of the Yale club of Western M chusetts will be held tonight a Nayasset club, with James Ro Angell, president of the universi the principal speaker. W. Kirk nor, president of the organiz will preside, and Atty Charle Bosworth will act as toastm Richard Hooker, president of Republican Publishing company speak on alumni matters. A p sional entertainment and music follow.

AWARD MORE HONORS FOR SAFETY POST

Council Gives Names Those Who Received H orable Mention

An additional number of h have been granted by the Sp field Safety council in its recent test for the best drawing and s slogan. First and fourth plac the contest was won by Jack C mings of 154 Oak Grove avenue, Frank D. Aldrich was awarded ond honors. Third and fifth we George A. Wood of Mittineague, sixth and seventh to Vincent P. I of Indian Orchard. The eighth a was won by R. F. Blanchard.

The new list released by Safety council gives honorable tion to George Blascak and Miss phie White, William Carter compa E. D. Seaver, Chapman Valve; Anna Lord, Longmeadow; Miss M garet Looney, Bosch Magneto; Quinn Westinghouse; Herbert I ley, Charles E. McLellan, Dewey Stone, Joseph Signo, Michael M arty and J. Keenan, Fisk Rub

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO

JAN 2 9 1926

FINE PROGRAMS WILL BE ON AIR

Four Symphony Orchestras Will Give Concerts This Week-end.

Radio fans who tune in Saturday

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BANGOR
ME.
COMMERCIAL

JAN 3 [illegible] 1926

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS-HERALD
PORTLAND, ME.

JAN 3 0 1926

Boston Symphony To Broadcast Tonight

WCSH Will Be Linked With WEEI To Bring 14th Seasonal Concert To Maine

The hours of eight to ten o'clock this evening will again bring the rare charm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Maine radio listeners and those of other New England communities when WCSH, the Congress Square Hotel at Portland, and WEEI, the Edison Electric Illuminating Co. of Boston, are linked for the second time. It will be the 14th seasonal concert by the noted orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston, and the second to be broadcast.

The program will open with a selecti Moussorgsky, "Une Nuit sur will

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 3 1 1926

or Symphony on the Air

what is from the p of concerts by those who support orchestra excerts an irrelevan st by its novThe claims of the ra audience are obviously incidental, and should be so regarded.

Nevertheless, the broadcasting of Boston Symphony programs is an educational influence of high potential value—assuming the physical success of the experiment. This is not alone on account of the merit of the orchestra. In equal degree it is due to the relatively limited number of New England people who in any year can hear directly the Boston Symphony programs.

In the days when the orchestra enjoyed a unique position, Boston Symphony concerts in Boston were very much of a caste affair. Save for the "rush" seats in the second gallery at the Friday afternoon rehearsal, admission was obtainable only on season tickets, and these were entirely sold in advance. There was no box office sale. Use of a few tickets could, to be sure, be procured from the theater ticket agencies. Season tickets at moderate cost could be obtained, and were often bought co-operatively; but the casual visitor to Boston, or the Bostonian who desired to attend occasionally rather than regularly, had meager opportunity.

This year for the first time a series of concerts early in the week is being given. But frequent and easy contact between the orchestra and the public has never been as well attained as it is attained by the New York orchestras. Springfield's "free" concert given by the Boston orchestra is not without problems, alike in selectio audience and in financing. But does afford a ha liaison betwee orchestra and pu lic.

BOSTON MUSIC CRITICS GIVE GOOSSENS GENEROUS PRAISE FOR WORK WITH ORCHESTRA

"Brilliance" and "imagination" were characterizations used by the Boston music critics in their comment on Eugene Goossens's performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra which he conducted for the last time Saturday night. Boston, noted for its conservatism, responded to the gifted leadership of the young composer-conductor who returns to Rochester to-day to begin rehearsals for Thursday night's concert with the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra. The audiences were large and enthusiastic and the critics agreed that he possesses both the sound musicianship and the inspiration that should be among the attributes of an orchestral leader of the first rank.

While critical opinion was unanimous as to his ability as a conductor there was some difference as to the enduring merits of his own composition, "Sinfonietta," which was played at two of the Boston concerts. The Boston Post found in it "genuine beauty" while the writer in the Globe thought some might "find its daring harmonies annoying."

Thursday night's concert will be Mr. Goossens's first Rochester appearance since December 10th. In his absence from the city he has conducted the New York Symphony in six and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts.

Excerpts from the press comment on the Boston performances follow:

Warren Storey Smith in the Boston Post—"As conductor Mr. Goossens has long been held to excel in the interpretation of contemporary music, particularly that of Stravinsky. Yesterday he was most completely convincing in DeBussy's "Iberia," which received a performance marvelously imaginative, one that will not soon be forgotten. Again, with entire sympathy he read the little piece of Delius, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," while it is altogether reasonable to suppose that his own "Sinfonietta"' was done the fullest possible justice. Beyond disputing, too, there was dramatic quality in the "Freischutz" overture. The performance of it, like that of every other piece on the program, was to the last degree brilliant, technically and musically finished, judiciously balanced and finely proportioned, for this tall, spare, alert young man is not only a sound and clear-headed musician, but a conductor who knows both what he wants and knows exactly how to get it."

Of Mr. Goossens's own composition, "Sinfonietta," Mr. Smith wrote: "It is an unpretentious affair, even for a piece of that unassuming title yet in its chromatic second section, which Mr. Gooossens describes as 'very sentimental,' there is genuine beauty and the other division of the piece compel by their nervous vitality their characteristically modern terseness and directfulness of utterance."

Boston Globe — "Mr. Goossens's Boston debut was a great success. The orchestra under him played with great brilliance and imaginative power. The program, except to a musician, was not of the most attractive but the first rate performance made amends. 'Sinfonietta,' written by Mr. Goossens, was conducted effectively.

---

the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 7. The Russian conductor was a friend of the late Scriabin, and a pioneer of his music in Russia. He may now still be called a prophet of the creative genius of this composer, for probably it has found no more sympathetic and eloquent an interpreter. The program will also include Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"; Lebussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun"; and the prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

The seats and boxes are now on sale at McCoy's, Inc., No. 89 Asylum street. The advance sale indicates one of the largest and most distinguished audiences of the season. Early application is advisable. Seats may be reserved for a limited time by calling 2-6147.

---

per-formed by the New York and Boston Symphony Orchestras. Rochester will hear the novelty for the first time next Thursday night when Eugene Goossens returns to conduct the Philharmonic in its second concert of the season.

Max Landow, pianist, member of the Kilbourn quartet and concert performer of note, will be the soloist, playing the Beethoven Concerto in E Flat.

The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's beautiful No. 4 in F. Minor. It will be Mr. Goossens' first appearance since December 10.

He since has achieved triumphs in New York and Boston. Following is the Philharmonic program:

Overture, Iphegினia .... Gluck-Wagner
Concerto in E flat for piano and orchestra .... Beethoven
In the Steppes of Central Asia .... Borodine
Pacific 231 .... Honegger
(First Rochester Performance)
Symphony No. 4 in F Minor .... Tschaikowsky

---

of

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Is One Story.

Talk that Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, might leave here for other fields soon has persisted ever since Mr. Goossens left the city on the trip during which he was guest conductor of the New York and Boston orchestras.

On Mr. Goossens' return to this city today, knowledge of any proposed engagement that would take him away from Rochester was disclaimed by officials of the Eastman Theater.

Fear that Mr. Goossens might be planning to leave Rochester was aroused by gossip in music circles during the past few days that S. L. Rothafel had offered him a $40,000 contract to conduct the 110-piece orchestra which he is to establish in his new $6,000,000 theater now being built in New York City.

BOSTON TALK, TOO

Talk has also been heard of the probability of Goossens succeeding Sergei Koussevitsky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next year.

On this score, Robin H. Legge, music critic for the London, England, Daily Telegraph, expresses himself in a paragraph which Philip Hale, music critic for the Boston Herald calls "surprising" and reprints, as follows:

"I do not know whether some enterprising writer is joking with me, or is one of the blind who go through life disregarding this music page, but it makes me laugh to read in an enthusiastic letter from a correspondent all that I said last week about Eugene Goossens and Rochester, N. Y., and his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"One tiny bit of news contained in the letter, however, soothese this savage breast, namely, that there is a substantial probability of Eugene Goossens succeeding Koussevitsky as conductor-in-chief of this orchestra."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 2 7 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra

There is a very heavy demand for seats for the only Boston Symphony concert of the season. This famous organization will be heard in the Capitol theater Sunday afternoon, February 7, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. Seats may be obtained at McCoy's music store, No. 89 Asylum street. Telephone orders will be taken and held for a limited time. The telephone number is 2-6147.

The prinicpal number on the local program is Scriabin's third symphony in C minor. It is called "The Devine Poem." Scriabin, the late Russian composer, may be characterized as an individualist, an idealist and a mystic in tones. "The Devine Poem" is in thre parts. The first "Luttes" ('Struggles'), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation, and doubt. The second "Volutes" has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy merging into nature. The third, "Jeu divin," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed.

Serge Koussevitsky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was a close friend of Scriabin in Russia, where in full sympathetic understanding with this remarkable composer, he performed his principal scores. Scriabin traveled with Koussevitsky on one of his famous voyages along the Volga river.

Rochester will not lose Eugene Goossens as conductor of its Philharmonic Orchestra, despite the many offers that have been made him to go to other cities, according to a statement by Mr. Goossens today.

"It is very flattering to have all these attractive posts presented to me by well meaning but over enthusiastic friends,' said Mr. Goossens, "but all I know of any of the rumers is what I have read in the papers.

'Why should I wish to leave Rochester? We have a fine orchestra, Rochester is at the beginning of the development that will make it one of the great musical centers of the world and I am in a most congenial and happy environment."

Mr. Goossens has returned to this city after a trip during which he was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic Orchestras.

While he was away, it was reported offers had been made to him to take over the direction of the Boston Symphony next year, and to conduct the large orchestra that S. L. Raithel is to establish in his $6,000,000 theater being built in New York.

---

m. is ('Str torn ation, and doubt. The second "Velutes" has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy merging into nature. The third, "Jeu divin," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed.

Serge Koussevitsky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was a close friend of Seriabin in Russia, where in full sympathetic understanding with this remarkable composer, he preformed his principal scores. Scriabin traveled with Koussevitsky on one of his famous voyages along the Velga ver.

Boston Symphony to Play Here Next Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will make its first Washington appearance of the season at Poli's Tuesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock in a brilliant orchestral program that will include selections from Weber, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Brahms. The latter composer's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Opus 68, will constitute the feature of the after noon, while Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faun," with eclogue by S. Mallarme and Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite from the opera, 'Tsar Saltan" will be added. Seats for this and other concerts in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course, including concerts by Mme. Galli-Curci on March 17 and Beniamino Gigli on February 26, are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Grene's Concert Bureau at Droop's, 1300 G Street N. W sky-Kor latter composer's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Opus 68, in four movements, will constitute the featured musical event of the afternoon

---

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.

JAN 2 8 1926

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of its internationally-famous Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first Washington appearance of the season at Poli's Theater next Tuesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock, in a brilliant orchestral program that will include selections from Weber, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakoff, and Brahms. The latter composer's Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Opus 68, in four movements, will constitute the featured musical event of the afternoon, while Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres Midi d'un Faun," with Eologue by S. Mallarme, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite from the opera, "Tsar Saltan," will be other outstanding features of the program. Seats for this and other concerts in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course, including concerts by Mme. Galli-Curci on March 17 and Beniamino Gigli on February 28, are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, at Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

FOR SAFETY POS

Council Gives Names Those Who Received H orable Mention

An additional number of h have been granted by the Sp field Safety council in its recent test for the best drawing and s slogan. First and fourth plac the contest was won by Jack C mings of 154 Oak Grove avenue, w Frank D. Aldrich was awarded ond honors. Third and fifth wen George A. Wood of Mittineague, sixth and seventh to Vincent P. I of Indian Orchard. The eighth a was won by R. F. Blanchard.

The new list released by Safety council gives honorable m tion to George Blascak and Miss phie White, William Carter compa E. D. Seaver, Chapman Valve; Anna Lord, Longmeadow; Miss M garet Looney, Bosch Magneto; J Quinn, Westinghouse; Herbert I ley, Charles E. McLellan, Dewey Stone, Joseph Signo, Michael M arty and J. Keenan, Fisk Rub

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO

1926

JAN 29 1926

FINE PROGRAMS WILL BE ON AIR

Four Symphony Orchestras Will Give Concerts This Week-end.

Radio fans who tune in Saturday and Sunday will hear what probably is the greatest array of concerts ever offered over the radio in one week-end.

Saturday evening, the Boston Symphony orchestra, New York Philharmonic orchestra and St. Louis Symphony orchestra will give concerts for the radio audiences. The Chicago Civic Opera Co. will sing "The Masked Ball." President Coolidge and Director of the Budget Lord are scheduled for addresses and the rine band the Edison Electric Illuminating Co. of Boston, are linked for the second time. It will be the 14th seasonal concert by the noted orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston, and the second to be broadcast.

---

The program will open with a selection by Moussorgsky, "Une Nuit sur Le Mont Chauve". This number will be followed by Prokofieff's "Third

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
BANGOR, ME.

JAN 3 0 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN THE AIR, TONIGHT

PORTLAND, Jan. 29—The hours of 8 to 10 on Saturday evening will again bring the rare charm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Maine radio listeners and those of other New England communities when WCSH the Congress Square Hotel at Portland, and WEEI, the Edison Electric Illuminating Company of Boston, are linked for the second time. It will be the 14th seasonal concert by the noted orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston, and the second ever to be broadcast.

The officials of Rines Brothers Company of Portland, the firm that has sponsored broadcasting of the entire series of 12 concerts through WCSH, have been cordially complimented by many lovers of fine music during the past week since the first broadcast last Saturday evening, and are convinced that their efforts to bring a truly exceptional radio entertainment to Maine and Northern New England have been worth while.

BOSTON MUSIC CRITICS GIVE GOOSSENS GENEROUS PRAISE FOR WORK WITH ORCHESTRA

"Brilliance" and "imagination" were characterizations used by the Boston music critics in their comment on Eugene Goossens's performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra which he conducted for the last time Saturday night. Boston, noted for its conservatism, responded to the gifted leadership of the young composer-conductor who returns to Rochester to-day to begin rehearsals for Thursday night's concert with the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra. The audiences were large and enthusiastic and the critics agreed that he possesses both the sound musicianship and the inspiration that should be among the attributes of an orchestral leader of the first rank.

While critical opinion was unanimous as to his ability as a conductor there was some difference as to the enduring merits of his own composition, "Sinfonietta," which was played at two of the Boston concerts. The Boston Post found in it "genuine beauty" while the writer in the Globe thought some might "find its daring harmonies annoying."

Thursday night's concert will be Mr. Goossens's first Rochester appearance since December 10th. In his absence from the city he has conducted the New York Symphony in six and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts.

Excerpts from the press comment on the Boston performances follow:

Warren Storey Smith in the Boston Post—"As conductor Mr. Goossens has long been held to excel in the interpretation of contemporary music, particularly that of Stravinsky. Yesterday he was most completely convincing in DeBussy's "Iberia," which received a performance marvelously imaginative, one that will not soon be forgotten. Again, with entire sympathy he read the little piece of Delius, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," while it is altogether reasonable to suppose that his own "Sinfonietta" was done the fullest possible justice. Beyond disputing, too, there was dramatic quality in the "Freischutz" overture. The performance of it, like that of every other piece on the program, was to the last degree brilliant, technically and musically finished, judiciously balanced and finely proportioned, for this tall, spare, alert young man is not only a sound and clear-headed musician, but a conductor who knows both what he wants and knows exactly how to get it."

Of Mr. Goossens's own composition, "Sinfonietta," Mr. Smith wrote: "It is an unpretentious affair, even for a piece of that unassuming title yet in its chromatic second section, which Mr. Gooossens describes as 'very sentimental,' there is genuine beauty and the other division of the piece compel by their nervous vitality their characteristically modern terseness and directfulness of utterance."

Boston Globe — "Mr. Goossens's Boston debut was a great success. The orchestra under him played with great brilliance and imaginative power. The program, except to a musician, was not of the most attractive but the first rate performance made amends. 'Sinfonietta,' written by Mr. Goossens, was conducted effectively.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 2 7 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra

There is a very heavy demand for seats for the only Boston Symphony concert of the season. This famous organization will be heard in the Capitol theater Sunday afternoon, February 7, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. Seats may be obtained at McCoy's music store, No. 89 Asylum street. Telephone orders will be taken and held for a limited time. The telephone number is 2-6147.

The prinicpal number on the local program is Scriabin's third symphony in C minor. It is called "The Devine Poem." Scriabin, the late Russian composer, may be characterized as an individualist, an idealist and a mystic in tones. "The Devine Poem" is in thre parts. The first "Luttes" ('Struggles'), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation, and doubt. The second "Volutes" has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy merging into nature. The third, "Jeu divin," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed.

Serge Koussevitsky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was a close friend of Scriabin in Russia, where in full sympathetic understanding with this remarkable composer, he performed his principal scores. Scriabin traveled with Koussevitsky on one of his famous voyages along the Volga river.

Boston Symphony to Play Here Next Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will make its first Washington appearance of the season at Poli's Tuesday afternon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock in a brilliant orchestral program that will include selections from Weber, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Brahms. The latter composer's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Opus 68, will constitute the feature of the after noon, while Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faun," with eclogue by S. Mallarme and Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite from the opera, 'Tsar Saltan" will be added. Seats for this and other concerts in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course, including concerts by Mme. Galli-Curci on March 17 and Beniamino Gigli on February 26, are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Grene's Concert Bureau at Droop's, 1300 G Street N. W

---

tio

sky-Korsa he latter composer's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Opus 68, in four movements, will constitute the featured musical event of the afternoon

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.

JAN 2 8 1926

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of its internationally-famous Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first Washington appearance of the season at Poli's Theater next Tuesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock, in a brilliant orchestral program that will include selections from Weber, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakoff, and Brahms. The latter composer's Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Opus 68, in four movements, will constitute the featured musical event of the afternoon, while Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres Midi d'un Faun," with Eologue by S. Mallarme, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite from the opera, "Tsar Saltan," will be other outstanding features of the program. Seats for this and other concerts in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course, including concerts by Mme. Galli-Curci on March 17 and Beniamino Gigli on February 28, are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, at Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO

JAN 29 1926

FINE PROGRAMS WILL BE ON AIR

Four Symphony Orchestras Will Give Concerts This Week-end.

Radio fans who tune in Saturday and Sunday will hear what probably is the greatest array of concerts ever offered over the radio in one week-end.

Saturday evening, the Boston Symphony orchestra, New York Philharmonic orchestra and St. Louis Symphony orchestra will give concerts for the radio audiences. The Chicago Civic Opera Co. will sing "The Masked Ball." President Coolidge and Director of the Budget Lord are sch d for addresses nd t rine band

nes-

---

the Edison Electric Illuminating Co. of Boston, are linked for the second time. It will be the 14th seasonal concert by the noted orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston, and the second to be broadcast.

The program will open with a selection by Moussorgsky, "Une Nuit sur Le Mont Chauve". This number will be followed by Prokofieff's "Third

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
BANGOR, ME.

JAN 3 0 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN THE AIR, TONIGHT

PORTLAND, Jan. 29—The hours of 8 to 10 on Saturday evening will again bring the rare charm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Maine radio listeners and those of other New England communities when WCSH the Congress Square Hotel at Portland, and WEEI, the Edison Electric Illuminating Company of Boston, are linked for the second time. It will be the 14th seasonal concert by the noted orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston, and the second ever to be broadcast.

The officials of Rines Brothers Company of Portland, the firm that has sponsored broadcasting of the entire series of 12 concerts through WCSH, have been cordially complimented by many lovers of fine music during the past week since the first broadcast last Saturday evening, and are convinced that their efforts to bring a truly exceptional radio entertainment to Maine and Northern New England have been worth while.

---

the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 7. The Russian conductor was a friend of the late Scriabin, and a pioneer of his music in Russia. He may now still be called a prophet of the creative genius of this composer, for probably it has found no more sympathetic and eloquent an interpreter. The program will also include Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"; Lebussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun"; and the prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

The seats and boxes are now on sale at McCoy's, Inc., No. 89 Asylum street. The advance sale indicates one of the largest and most distinguished audiences of the season. Early application is advisable. Seats may be reserved for a limited time by calling 2-6147.

---

performed by the New York and Boston Symphony Orchestras. Rochster will hear the novelty for the first time next Thursday night when Eugene Goossens returns to conduct the Philharmonic in its second concert of the season.

Max Landow, pianist, member of the Kilbourn quartet and concert performer of note, will be the soloist, playing the Beethoven Concerto in E Flat.

The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's beautiful No. 4 in F. Minor. It will be Mr. Goossens' first appearance since December 10.

He since has achieved triumphs in New York and Boston. Following is the Philharmonic program:

Overture, Ipheginia .... Gluck-Wagner
Concerto in E flat for piano and orchestra .... Beethoven
In the Steppes of Central Asia .... Borodine
Pacific 231 .... Honegger
(First Rochester Performance)
Symphony No. 4 in F Minor .... Tschaikowsky

---

of

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Is One Story.

Talk that Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, might leave here for other fields soon has persisted ever since Mr. Goossens left the city on the trip during which he was guest conductor of the New York and Boston orchestras.

On Mr. Goossens' return to this city today, knowledge of any proposed engagement that would take him away from Rochester was disclaimed by officials of the Eastman Theater.

Fear that Mr. Goossens might be planning to leave Rochester was aroused by gossip in music circles during the past few days that S. L. Rothafel had offered him a $40,000 contract to conduct the 110-piece orchestra which he is to establish in his new $6,000,000 theater now being built in New York City.

BOSTON TALK, TOO

Talk has also been heard of the probability of Goossens succeeding Sergei Koussevitsky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next year.

On this score, Robin H. Legge, music critic for the London, England, Daily Telegraph, expresses himself in a paragraph which Philip Hale, music critic for the Boston Herald calls "surprising" and reprints, as follows:

"I do not know whether some enterprising writer is joking with me, or is one of the blind who go through life disregarding this music page, but it makes me laugh to read in an enthusiastic letter from a correspondent all that I said last week about Eugene Goossens and Rochester, N. Y., and his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"One tiny bit of news contained in the letter, however, soothese this savage breast, namely, that there is a substantial probability of Eugene Goossens succeeding Koussevitsky as conductor-in-chief of this orchestra."

Rochester will not lose Eugene Goossens as conductor of its Philharmonic Orchestra, despite the many offers that have been made him to go to other cities, according to a statement by Mr. Goossens today.

"It is very flattering to have all these attractive posts presented to me by well meaning but over enthusiastic friends,' said Mr. Goossens, "but all I know of any of the rumers is what I have read in the papers.

'Why should I wish to leave Rochester? We have a fine orchestra, Rochester is at the beginning of the development that will make it one of the great musical centers of the world and I am in a most congenial and happy environment."

Mr. Goossens has returned to this city after a trip during which he was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic Orchestras.

While he was away, it was reported offers had been made to him to take over the direction of the Boston Symphony next year, and to conduct the large orchestra that S. L. Raithel is to establish in his $6,000,000 theater being built in New York.

---

m.
is ('Str
torn ation,
and doubt. The second "Velutes" has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy merging into nature. The third, "Jeu divin," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed.

Serge Koussevitsky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was a close friend of Seriabin in Russia, where in full sympathetic understanding with this remarkable composer, he preformed his principal scores. Scriabin traveled with Koussevitsky on one of his famous voyages along the Velga river.

FOR SAFETY

Council Gives Names Those Who Received H orable Mention

An additional number of have been granted by the Sp field Safety council in its recent test for the best drawing and slogan. First and fourth plac the contest was won by Jack C mings of 154 Oak Grove avenue, Frank D. Aldrich was awarded ond honors. Third and fifth we George A. Wood of Mittineague, sixth and seventh to Vincent P. of Indian Orchard. The eighth a was won by R. F. Blanchard.

The new list released by Safety council gives honorable tion to George Blascak and Miss phie White, William Carter compa E. D. Seaver, Chapman Valve; Anna Lord, Longmeadow; Miss M garet Looney, Bosch Magneto; J Quinn, Westinghouse; Herbert ley, Charles E. McLellan, Dewey Stone, Joseph Signo, Michael M arty and J. Keenan, Fisk, Rub

---

the fliers to com hus of more than length of between
The call letters of
-12.

HIP SEARCHEI
IET PROPAGAN

n Circulars Beli
Freighters' Cargo

Jan. 20.—(AP)—Go were searching ighter Ivar,
Baltic ports

UNE

1926 ston

e. Jeritza Orchestra, will give its
the Academy
February 5,
oloist in his
A sonata by Maximilian

concert; the

OM
, PA.
R

26 oston Band ill be heard in his coming first Philadelphia, at Symphony Or-

the Academy
ening, February ymphony, "The performed and rom the Apocnsidered to have etic and elo-fellow Russian, in close aris late comed in Russia his iabin accompan-e of his famous tnessed the effect illagers who had

music.
upon this pro-econd Suite from huis' and Chloe."
n with a sonata
th century com-score, replete

PPING FROM
NGTON, D. C.
STAR
2 4 1926

estra, Feb. 2.

phony Orchestra,
Koussevitzky, will rance this season
t Poli's Theater
February 2, at e third concert in
The orchestra will 08 musicians this

nored that Kousse-genius has found expression with never before have for this organiza-
en in greater des in Boston and ason was entirely

y has repeated in ter the directoral ved in Paris and er, when his con-
h capital and his conductor of the Orchestra were ntal successes.

PPING FROM N CITIZEN

2 4 1926

phony Program

klyn concert of the
Boston Symphony
ake place at the ic, on Friday eve-feature of this con-ky-Korsakov's sym-heherazade," which erge Koussevitzky re this season with ss.
the evening will be
who will appear in ncerto No. 3. Pros the most talented Russian composers, operas, orchestral sic, likewise, holds ition as a piano

tzky will introduce sonata of Galliard.
Century composer,
cored for orchestra
einberg.

BOSTON MUSIC CRITICS GIVE GOOSSENS GENEROUS PRAISE FOR WORK WITH ORCHESTRA

◆

"Brilliance" and "imagination" were characterizations used by the Boston music critics in their comment on Eugene Goossens's performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra which he conducted for the last time Saturday night. Boston, noted for its conservatism, responded to the gifted leadership of the young composer-conductor who returns to Rochester to-day to begin rehearsals for Thursday night's concert with the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra. The audiences were large and enthusiastic and the critics agreed that he possesses both the sound musicianship and the inspiration that should be among the attributes of an orchestral leader of the first rank.

While critical opinion was unanimous as to his ability as a conductor there was some difference as to the enduring merits of his own composition, "Sinfonietta," which was played at two of the Boston concerts. The Boston Post found in it "genuine beauty" while the writer in the Globe thought some might "find its daring harmonies annoying."

Thursday night's concert will be Mr. Goossens's first Rochester appearance since December 10th. In his absence from the city he has conducted the New York Symphony in six and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts.

Excerpts from the press comment on the Boston performances follow:

Warren Storey Smith in the Boston Post—"As conductor Mr. Goossens has long been held to excel in the interpretation of contemporary music, particularly that of Stravinsky. Yesterday he was most completely convincing in DeBussy's "Iberia," which received a performance marvelously imaginative, one that will not soon be forgotten. Again, with entire sympathy he read the little piece of Delius, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," while it is altogether reasonable to suppose that his own "Sinfonietta" was done the fullest possible justice. Beyond disputing, too, there was dramatic quality in the "Freischutz" overture. The performance of it, like that of every other piece on the program, was to the last degree brilliant, technically and musically finished, judiciously balanced and finely proportioned, for this tall, spare, alert young man is not only a sound and clear-headed musician, but a conductor who knows both what he wants and knows exactly how to get it."

Of Mr. Goossens's own composition, "Sinfonietta," Mr. Smith wrote: "It is an unpretentious affair, even for a piece of that unassuming title yet in its chromatic second section, which Mr. Gooossens describes as 'very sentimental,' there is genuine beauty and the other division of the piece compel by their nervous vitality their characteristically modern terseness and directfulness of utterance."

Boston Globe — "Mr. Goossens's Boston debut was a great success. The orchestra under him played with great brilliance and imaginative power. The program, except to a musician, was not of the most attractive but the first rate performance made amends. 'Sinfonietta,' written by Mr. Goossens, was conducted effectively.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 2 7 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra

There is a very heavy demand for seats for the only Boston Symphony concert of the season. This famous organization will be heard in the Capitol theater Sunday afternoon, February 7, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. Seats may be obtained at McCoy's music store, No. 89 Asylum street. Telephone orders will be taken and held for a limited time. The telephone number is 2-6147.

The prinicpal number on the local program is Scriabin's third symphony in C minor. It is called "The Devine Poem." Scriabin, the late Russian composer, may be characterized as an individualist, an idealist and a mystic in tones. "The Devine Poem" is in thre parts. The first "Luttes" ('Struggles'), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation, and doubt. The second "Volutes" has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy merging into nature. The third, "Jeu divin," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed.

Serge Koussevitsky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was a close friend of Scriabin in Russia, where in full sympathetic understanding with this remarkable composer, he performed his principal scores. Scriabin traveled with Koussevitsky on one of his famous voyages along the Volga river.

Boston Symphony to Play Here Next Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will make its first Washington appearance of the season at Poli's Tuesday afternon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock in a brilliant orchestral program that will include selections from Weber, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Brahms. The latter composer's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Opus 68, will constitute the feature of the after noon, while Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faun," with eclogue by S. Mallarme and Rimsky-Kors

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.

JAN 2 8 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of its Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first Washington appearance of the season at Poli's theater next Tuesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock, in a program that will include selections from Weber, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Brahms. The latter composer's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Opus 68, in four movements, will constitute the featured musical event of the afternoon, while Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe." Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faun," with eclogue by S. Mallarme, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite from the opera "Tsar Saltan" will be other outstanding features of the program. Seats for this and other concerts in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, at Droop's, 1300 G street northwest.

OM

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO

1926

JAN 29 1926

FINE PROGRAMS WILL BE ON AIR

Four Symphony Orchestras Will Give Concerts This Week-end.

Radio fans who tune in Saturday

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BANGOR
ME.
COMMERCIAL

JAN 3 0 1926

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS-HERALD
PORTLAND, ME.

JAN 3 0 1926

Boston Symphony To Broadcast Tonight

WCSH Will Be Linked With WEEI To Bring 14th Seasonal Concert To Maine

The hours of eight to ten o'clock this evening will again bring the rare charm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Maine radio listeners and those of other New England communities when WCSH, the Congress Square Hotel at Portland, and WEEI, the Edison Electric Illuminating Co. of Boston, are linked for the second time. It will be the 14th seasonal concert by the noted orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston, and the second to be broadcast.

The program will open with a selection by Moussorgsky, "Une Nuit sur Le Mont Chauve". This number will be followed by Prokofieff's "Third Concerto for Piano, Op. 26" in three movements, the second naving five variations. The concluding selection will be Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," Op. 43. The soloist for the evening will be Serge Prokefieff.

The officials of Rines Brothers Company of Portland, the firm that has sponsored broadcasting of the entire series of 12 concerts through WCSH, have been complimented by many lovers of fine music the past week since the first broadcast last Saturday evening, and are convinced that their efforts to bring a truly exceptional radio entertainment to Maine and Northern New England have been worth while.

---

e
-
ie
ara the

omhas enough mpli-
music
during the e first broadcast last Satur ig, and are convinced that their efforts to bring a truly exceptional radio entertainment to Maine and Northern New England have been worth while.

---

the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 7. The Russian conductor was a friend of the late Scriabin, and a pioneer of his music in Russia. He may now still be called a prophet of the creative genius of this composer, for probably it has found no more sympathetic and eloquent an interpreter. The program will also include Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"; Lebussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun"; and the prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

The seats and boxes are now on sale at McCoy's, Inc., No. 89 Asylum street. The advance sale indicates one of the largest and most distinguished audiences of the season. Early application is advisable. Seats may be reserved for a limited time by calling 2-6147.

---

performed by the New York and Boston Symphony Orchestras. Rochster will hear the novelty for the first time next Thursday night when Eugene Goossens returns to conduct the Philharmonic in its second concert of the season.

Max Landow, pianist, member of the Kilbourn quartet and concert performer of note, will be the soloist, playing the Beethoven Concerto in E Flat.

The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's beautiful No. 4 in F. Minor. It will be Mr. Goossens' first appearance since December 10.

He since has achieved triumphs in New York and Boston. Following is the Philharmonic program:

Overture, Iphegina .... Gluck-Wagner
Concerto in E flat for piano and orchestra .... Beethoven
In the Steppes of Central Asia .... Borodine
Pacific 231 .... Honegger
(First Rochester Performance)
Symphony No. 4 in F Minor .... Tschaikowsky

---

of

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Is One Story.

Talk that Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, might leave here for other fields soon has persisted ever since Mr. Goossens left the city on the trip during which he was guest conductor of the New York and Boston orchestras.

On Mr. Goossens' return to this city today, knowledge of any proposed engagement that would take him away from Rochester was disclaimed by officials of the Eastman Theater.

Fear that Mr. Goossens might be planning to leave Rochester was aroused by gossip in music circles during the past few days that S. L. Rothafel had offered him a $40,000 contract to conduct the 110-piece orchestra which he is to establish in his new $6,000,000 theater now being built in New York City.

BOSTON TALK, TOO

Talk has also been heard of the probability of Goossens succeeding Sergei Koussevitsky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next year.

On this score, Robin H. Legge, music critic for the London, England, Daily Telegraph, expresses himself in a paragraph which Philip Hale, music critic for the Boston Herald calls "surprising" and reprints, as follows:

"I do not know whether some enterprising writer is joking with me, or is one of the blind who go through life disregarding this music page, but it makes me laugh to read in an enthusiastic letter from a correspondent all that I said last week about Eugene Goossens and Rochester, N. Y., and his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"One tiny bit of news contained in the letter, however, soothese this savage breast, namely, that there is a substantial probability of Eugene Goossens succeeding Koussevitsky as conductor-in-chief of this orchestra."

Rochester will not lose Eugene Goossens as conductor of its Philharmonic Orchestra, despite the many offers that have been made him to go to other cities, according to a statement by Mr. Goossens today.

"It is very flattering to have all these attractive posts presented to me by well meaning but over enthusiastic friends,' said Mr. Goossens, "but all I know of any of the rumers is what I have read in the papers.

'Why should I wish to leave Rochester? We have a fine orchestra, Rochester is at the beginning of the development that will make it one of the great musical centers of the world and I am in a most congenial and happy environment."

Mr. Goossens has returned to this city after a trip during which he was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic Orchestras.

While he was away, it was reported offers had been made to him to take over the direction of the Boston Symphony next year, and to conduct the large orchestra that S. L. Raithel is to establish in his $6,000,000 theater being built in New York.

---

other outstanding features of the program. Seats for this and other concerts in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course, including concerts by Mme. Galli-Curci on March 17 and Beniamino Gigli on February 28, are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, at Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

---

m.
is ('Str
torn ation,
and doubt. The second "Velutes" has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy merging into nature. The third, "Jeu divin," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed.

Serge Koussevitsky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was a close friend of Scriabin in Russia, where in full sympathetic understanding with this remarkable composer, he preformed his principal scores. Scriabin traveled with Koussevitsky on one of his famous voyages along the Velga river.

FOR SAFETY PO

Council Gives Names Those Who Received H orable Mention

An additional number of h have been granted by the Spr field Safety council in its recent test for the best drawing and s slogan. First and fourth plac the contest was won by Jack C mings of 154 Oak Grove avenue, w Frank D. Aldrich was awarded ond honors. Third and fifth wen George A. Wood of Mittineague, sixth and seventh to Vincent P. I of Indian Orchard. The eighth a was won by R. F. Blanchard.

The new list released by Safety council gives honorable m tion to George Blascak and Miss phie White, William Carter compa E. D. Seaver, Chapman Valve; Anna Lord, Longmeadow; Miss M garet Looney, Bosch Magneto; J Quinn, Westinghouse; Herbert ley, Charles E. McLellan, Dewey Stone, Joseph Signo, Michael M arty and J. Keenan, Fisk Rubb

December 10th. In this

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 2 5 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

An unusual Russian score which has attracted a great deal of attention in the western world, Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," will be the feature of the program at the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, to Hartford in a concert at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 7. The Russian conductor was a friend of the late Scriabin, and a pioneer of his music in [illegible] still be [illegible] tive

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

GOOSSENS BACK FOR CONCERT

The locomotive has choo-choo-ed ts way into the concert halls.

Honegger's "Pacific 231" in which the composer has translated he heroic qualities of a giant engine into music, has been performed by the New York and Boston Symphony Orchestras. Rochester will hear the novelty for the first time next Thursday night when Eugene Goossens returns to conduct the Philharmonic in its second concert of the season.

Max Landow, pianist, member of

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARRISBURG,
PA.
PATRIOT

26

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN WEEKLY BROADCASTS

The Boston Symphony is the latest orchestra to go "on the air". Beginning last Saturday and for eleven consecutive Saturday evenings thereafter, music in its entirety as played by this orchestra will be broadcast from Radio Station WEEI of the Edison Electric Illuminating Company.

The broadcasting is made possible by the generosity of Winfield S. Quinby of Brookline, music lover, art patron and prominent in civic betterment and New England business and industrial development enterprises. He will give $1000 a week for twelve weeks, which will cover the greater share of the expense of the broadcasting. The remainder will be contributed by WEEI.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

GOOSSENS TO GO, IS REPORT

Will Become Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Is One Story.

Talk that Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, might leave here for other fields soon has persisted ever since Mr. Goossens left the city on the trip during which he was guest conductor of the New York and Boston orchestras.

On Mr. Goossens' return to this city today, knowledge of any proposed engagement

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORFOLK, VA.
PILOT

JAN 3 1 1926

Another Orchestra Added To Exclusive WBZ Attractions

Boston, Mass., Jan. 30.—Another musical organization, the Repertory Theater Orchestra of Boston under the direction of Daniel Kuntz, has been added to the ever-increasing list of exclusive attractions of Westinghouse station WBZ and will be heard every Wednesday evening from 8 to 8:30 o'clock. The Repertory Orchestra is composed of three violins, viola, cello, bass, flute, clarinet, piano, and drums. Since its initial appearance a short time ago at the opening of the Repertory Theater, the orchestra has attained a prominent place in musical circles in New England.

Daniel Kuntz was one of the original members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He also conducted the orchestra at Poland Springs and at the Lake Placid Club, and played in the orchestra at the theater at Baireuth which was built under the direction of Richard Wagner for the production of his great music dramas. He has been connected with concert organizations, notably the Kneisel Quartet and the Adamowski Quartet.

In his position as director, Mr. Kuntz brings vast experience and special aptitude in the arranging of popular programs. He will have at his disposal one of the largest musical libraries in the possession of any individual musician in the country.

JOURNAL

JAN 2 7 1926

'HAPPY HERE,' DECLARES GOOSSENS

Rochester will not lose Eugene Goossens as conductor of its Philharmonic Orchestra, despite the many offers that have been made him to go to other cities, according to a statement by Mr. Goossens today.

"It is very flattering to have all these attractive posts presented to me by well meaning but over enthusiastic friends,' said Mr. Goossens, "but all I know of any of the rumers is what I have read in the papers.

'Why should I wish to leave Rochester? We have a fine orchestra, Rochester is at the beginning of the development that will make it one of the great musical centers of the world and I am in a most congenial and happy environment."

Mr. Goossens has returned to this city after a trip during which he was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony and the New York Philh

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 2 7 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

There is a heavy demand for seats for the only Boston Symphony concert of the season. This famous organization will be heard in the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon February 7 under then management of Frank A. Sedgwick. Seats may be obtained at McCoy's music store No. 89 Asylum street. Telephone orders will be taken and held for a limited time. The number is 2-6147.

The principal number on the program is Scriabin's third symphony in C minor. It is called "The Devine Poem." Scriabin, the late Russian composer, may be characterized as an individualist, an idealist and a mystic in tenes. "The Devine Poem" is in three parts. The first "Luttes" ('Struggles'), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation, and doubt. The second "Velutes" has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy merging into nature. The third, "Jeu divin," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed.

Serge Kousseyitsky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was a close friend of Scriabin in Russia, where in full sympathetic understanding with this remarkable composer, he preformed his principal scores. Scriabin traveled with Koussevitsky on one of his famous voyages along the Velga river.

, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Brahms. The latter composer's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Opus 68, in four movements, will constitute the featured

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.

JAN 2 8 1926

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 2 8 1926

Whiting's Boston Letter

By EDWARD ELWELL WHITING

Boston, Jan. 27—In the course of time the Boston Symphony orchestra may become as famous as Dr Cadman. They are both now on the radio. What would good old Maj Higginson say to this broadcasting of his great band? We shall never know. If the spirit of the gallant major is at all stirred by this event, he will not bother us about it. Nor should we ask it. He did enough for the orchestra while he was here. The responsibility is on mortal shoulders now. And we may suppose that celestial choirs at least equal the Symphony orchestra—if we may say so without disrespect for Boston.

It has many times been related of an excellent Bostonian that her spirit, after her passing, when interrogated by a surviving niece regarding the higher abode, replied that heaven was indeed very beautiful, "but," she added, "it is not Boston." There is only one Boston Symphony orchestra; or has been. Now there are as many as there are loud speakers or ear phone sets.

Who will coin a happier designation than "loud speaker?" There are several substitute terms, but they have not yet displaced the original and repellent one.

By way, perhaps, of compensation for scattering seeds of symphonic kindness, we have a visit from the Chicago Opera company. By way of contrast, too. For the orchestra is ours. The opera is others'. Memory goes back to a brief but glorious day when Boston had its own opera company. We still have the Opera house, but the local company has been blown asunder long ago. None was willing, or prepared, to go so far with it as Maj Higginson went with the orchestra. One recalls a phrase happily and inoffensively used by the late, and still fondly remembered, Louis Elson, that genial, kindly and brilliant musical critic of the old Boston Advertiser, when he ushered in a local opera season under Mr Russell's management by observing, "Once again the Israelites have come to the banks of the Jordan."

The opera, too, is broadcast, of course. Everything is, except happiness. Not yet has the radio infringed on the preserves of the newspapers and newspapers do not fear that it will. Newspapers sometimes die, but Look in the copies of old Advertisers." Or words to such effect. The Advertiser was never broadcast. It was cast abroad.

A party of Boston theater enthusiasts has been down to New York (here in Boston we always say "down" to New York) to see, and hear, and to understand, if possible and proper, Mr Strindberg's Scandinavian preachment, "The Dream Play." An eminent New Yorker once admitted that Boston had one point of superiority over New York: "If you live in Boston," he said, "you can always go to New York. But if you live in New York, where is there to go?" So Boston theater devotees sometimes go to New York. And some of them have just been to see Strindberg's new play.

There were no fatalities. One scoffer brought back the devastating comment that to his way of thinking the Scandinavian drama was to the brain what the Charleston was to the feet, but that is flippant and we do not approve. Better was the redoubtable Maggie Cline's celebrated criticism of Ibsen's "Ghosts." She was prevailed upon to attend a performance of this play, in which Sarah Cowell Lemoyne and Charles B. Lewis took the principal parts. Asked what she thought of it, she thus expressed herself: "Well, I've seen plays as made me tired, an' I've seen plays as gave me a pain, but this here 'Ghosts' makes me downright sick—an' I ain't no prude nor what you might call straight-laced, neither." Perhaps the Provincetown players will send "The Dream Play" to Boston some day.

Other entertainment and stimulation has been provided during the week by young Hanford MacNider, now assistant secretary of war and former soldier overseas and national commander of the American Legion. He has, we believe, also touched Springfield, so Springfield folks know what he thinks. The public mind is a good deal confused about preparedness and peace. No one wants to be called a "pacifist," at least no one except those who do not mind it. Yet all seem to be agreed that it might be a pretty good idea if we did not have any more war. Mr MacNider is a little savage in his remarks about "paid pacifists," who may be, at least in their own minds, as honest as paid officials who assail them. Maybe something ought to be said about paid moralists who, as professional preachers, preach anti-devil propaganda.

It is not easy even in Boston, to keep one's thoughts and deductions unsnarled in these days of easy argument. One's sense of right and wrong is so continually subjected to introspective doubts. Nothing could better illustrate the muddled state of our moral thinking than the current tale of a conversation between two men on the street car:—

"You know Bill, the bootlegger? Well, he's been arrested."

"What! Bill's been arrested? What did they arrest him for?"

The business, or profession, of bootlegging is alleged even to have acquired a code of ethics. It is related that a certain Bostonian of some political prominence not long ago met his favorite bootlegger on the street, and after some business conversation said: "And by the way, I wish you'd send me around a little absinthe." The bootlegger raised his hands in a gesture of outraged amazement. "Great Scott, man!" he said, "Don't you know that absinthe is against the law?"

Our new mayor has now been in office about three weeks, and has met his first rebuff in the action of the civil service commission which has turned down his appointment of John T. Hawes as fire commissioner. A lot of Republicans immediately want to know what are we coming to if the commission is going to act like that, with a Republican mayor in office.

The mayor has dashed the hopes for the so-called loop highway which, at an expenditure of $29,000,000, was to solve the traffic problem—or try to. The mayor is not convinced that it would do anything of the kind. Inasmuch as the Chamber of Commerce, which within the last few years has become an energetic and important factor in Boston and New England affairs, has devoted a good deal of energy backing the loop highway plan, this skepticism on the part of Mayor Nichols has started a good deal of talk among business men. Yet sober thought commends the caution of the mayor. We do not want to [illegible] to find after the money has been [illegible] that we have not done it. Anyway, the mayor's [illegible]ent attitude has [illegible] a damper on [illegible] the plan.

Gov Fuller sails along on fairly even seas, with a fair amount of trouble but no serious political peril in sight. There are whispers heard that Mr Goodwin, state registrar of motor vehicles, will be a candidate to oppose his renomination at the end of the present term, but Mr Goodwin is not likely to make any foolish gestures. The moment any man waves his arms and tries to do anything in the light of shining publicity it is assumed that he is going out to seek a bigger office. Thus it was that Goodwin was given a mayoralty boom—which he promptly squashed.

Gov Fuller in 1925 accepted 381 invitations to speak at what may be called social gatherings, or gatherings having a social side. Bearing in mind that the year had, as usual, only 365 days, one can see that the governor had to do a deal of talking out of office hours. Even so, he accepted only a small portion of the invitations which came to him. There were more than 1800 invitations. We suspect that Mr Fuller would favor some kind of a gubernatorial closure rule. Or else more days in the year. He might not agree with the optimism of the old Negro who thanked the Lord because "He made de moments of time consecutive 'stead of contemporaneous."

Here is a little political item: State Senator Eben S. Draper has been elected president of the Republican Club of Massachusetts. Mr Draper, who is young but large, is looking forward. Keep him in mind.

Returning for a moment to art, note should be made of an interesting exhibit of what may be called posters, at the Athenaeum, to continue through February. They advertise English railways (a railway in England is what we call a railroad here) and they are by eminent artists. The show is worth seeing. And it offers a suggestion. Instead of trying to root up all the billboards along the highways—a rather slow process—why not convert the billboards into works of art, and thus string an endless open air gallery from one end of the country to the other? It ought to be as easy to put gen-oo-ine art into advertising suspenders and chewing gum as into advertising a British railroad—that is, railway.

JAN 3 0 1926

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS-HERALD
PORTLAND, ME.

JAN 3 0 1926

Boston Symphony To Broadcast Tonight

Will Be Linked With I To Bring 14th Seasonal Concert To Maine hours of eight to ten o'clock evening will again bring the rare charm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Maine radio listeners and those of other New England communities when WCSH, the Congress Square Hotel at Portland, and WEEI, the Edison Electric Illuminating Co. of Boston, are linked for the second time. It will be the 14th seasonal concert by the noted orchestra at Sym ond se- Juit

---

on the Air

concerts by orchestra ex by its nov dience are nd should be oadcasting of grams is an high potenthe physical ent. This is of the merit ual degree it limited numeople who in tly the Bos s. e orchestra tion, Boston Boston were affair. Save the second fternoon re obtainable and these vance. There Use of a few be procured t agencies. derate cost were often but the or the Bos ttend occaularly, had rst time a in the week equent and e orchestra er been as ined by the pringfield's the Boston problems, nce and rd a ha and p harmonies annoying."

Thursday night's concert will Mr. Goossens's first Rochester app ance since December 10th. In his

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 2 5 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

An unusual Russian score which has attracted a great deal of attention in the western world, Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," will be the feature of the program at the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, to Hartford in a concert at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 7. The Russian conductor was a friend of the late Scriabin, and a pioneer of his music in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

GOOSSENS BACK FOR CONCERT

The locomotive has choo-choo-ed ts way into the concert halls.

Honegger's "Pacific 231" in which the composer has translated he heroic qualities of a giant engine into music, has been perormed by the New York and Boson Symphony Orchestras. Rochster will hear the novelty for the irst time next Thursday night when Eugene Goossens returns to onduct the Philharmonic in its econd concert of the season.

Max Landow, pianist, member of

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARRISBURG,
PA.
PATRIOT

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN WEEKLY BROADCASTS

The Boston Symphony is the latest orchestra ~~to go "on the air"~~. Beginning last Saturday and for eleven consecutive Saturday evenings thereafter, music in its entirety as played by this orchestra will be broadcast from Radio Station WEEI of the Edison Electric Illuminating Company.

The broadcasting is made possible by the generosity of Winfield S. Quinby of Brookline, music lover, art patron and prominent in civic betterment and New England business and industrial development enterprises. He will give $1000 a week for twelve weeks, which will cover the greater share of the expense of the broadcasting. The remainder will be contributed by WEEI.

---

section, which

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

GOOSSENS TO GO, IS REPORT

Will Become Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Is One Story.

Talk that Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, might leave here for other fields soon has persisted ever since Mr. Goossens left the city on the trip during which he was guest conductor of the New York and Boston orchestras.

On Mr. Goossens' return to this city today, knowledge of any proposed

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORFOLK, VA.
PILOT

JAN 3

Another Orchestra Added To Exclusive WBZ Attractions

Boston, Mass., Jan. 30.—Another musical organization, the Repertory Theater Orchestra of Boston under the direction of Daniel Kuntz, has been added to the ever-increasing list of exclusive attractions of Westinghouse station WBZ and will be heard every Wednesday evening from 8 to 8:30 o'clock. The Repertory Orchestra is composed of three violins, viola, cello, bass, flute, clarinet, piano, and drums. Since its initial appearance a short time ago at the opening of the Repertory Theater, the orchestra has attained a prominent place in musical circles in New England.

Daniel Kuntz was one of the original members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He also conducted the orchestra at Poland Springs and at the Lake Placid Club, and played in the orchestra at the theater at Baireuth which was built under the direction of Richard Wagner for the production of his great music dramas. He has been connected with concert organizations, notably the Kneisel Quartet and the Adamowski Quartet.

In his position as director, Mr. Kuntz brings vast experience and special aptitude in the arranging of popular programs. He will have at his disposal one of the largest musical libraries in the possession of any individual musician in the country.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

JAN 2 7 1926

'HAPPY HERE,' DECLARES GOOSSENS

Rochester will not lose Eugene Goossens as conductor of its Philharmonic Orchestra, despite the many offers that have been made him to go to other cities, according to a statement by Mr. Goossens today.

"It is very flattering to have all these attractive posts presented to me by well meaning but over enthusiastic friends,' said Mr. Goossens, "but all I know of any of the rumers is what I have read in the papers.

'Why should I wish to leave Rochester? We have a fine orchestra, Rochester is at the beginning of the development that will make it one of the great musical centers of the world and I am in a most congenial and happy environment."

Mr. Goossens has returned to this city after a trip during which he was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony and the New York

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 2 7 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

There is a heavy demand for seats for the only Boston Symphony concert of the season. This famous organization will be heard in the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon February 7 under then management of Frank A. Sedgwick. Seats may be obtained at McCoy's music store No. 89 Asylum street. Telephone orders will be taken and held for a limited time. The number is 2-6147.

The principal number on the program is Scriabin's third symphony in C minor. It is called "The Devine Poem." Scriabin, the late Russian composer, may be characterized as an individualist, an idealist and a mystic in tenes. "The Devine Poem" is in three parts. The first "Luttes" ('Struggles'), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation, and doubt. The second "Velutes" has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy merging into nature. The third, "Jeu divin," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed.

Serge Koussevitsky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was a close friend of Scriabin in Russia, where in full sympathetic understanding with this remarkable composer, he preformed his principal scores. Scriabin traveled with Koussevitsky on one of his famous voyages along the Velga river.

February 2, at 4:30 o'clock, in a program that will include selections from Weber, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Brahms. The latter composer's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Opus 68, in four movements, will constitute the featured

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.

JAN 2 8 1926

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of its internationally-famous Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

1926

Otto Bartels, W ander Penny, Ludie Thomas H. Parkhill

To Address Alum At Banquet To

DR. JAMES R. ANGELL

The annual meeting and ba of the Yale club of Western M chusetts will be held tonight a Nayasset club, with James Ro Angell, president of the universi the principal speaker. W. Kirk nor, president of the organiz will preside, and Atty Charle Bosworth will act as toastm Richard Hooker, president of Republican Publishing company, speak on alumni matters. A p sional entertainment and music follow.

AWARD MORE HONORS FOR SAFETY POST

Council Gives Names Those Who Received H orable Mention

An additional number of ho have been granted by the Sp field Safety council in its recent test for the best drawing and s slogan. First and fourth plac the contest was won by Jack C mings of 154 Oak Grove avenue, w Frank D. Aldrich was awarded ond honors. Third and fifth wen George A. Wood of Mittineague, sixth and seventh to Vincent P. of Indian Orchard. The eighth a was won by R. F. Blanchard.

The new list released by Safety council gives honorable tion to George Blascak and Miss phie White, William Carter compa E. D. Seaver, Chapman Valve; Anna Lord, Longmeadow; Miss garet Looney, Bosch Magneto;

JAN 3 0 1926

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS-HERALD
PORTLAND, ME.

JAN 3 0 1926

Boston Symphony To Broadcast Tonight

WCSH Will Be Linked With WEEI To Bring 14th Seasonal Concert To Maine

The hours of eight to ten o'clock this evening will again bring the rare charm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Maine radio listeners and those of other New England communities when WCSH, the Congress Square Hotel at Portland, and WEEI, the Edison Electric Illuminating Co. of Boston, are linked for the second time. It will be the 14th seasonal concert by the noted orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston, and the second to be broadcast.

The program will open with a selecti Moussorgsky, "Une Nuit sur will

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 3 1 1926

Boston Symphony on the Air

Radio broadcasting of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra excites particular interest by its novelty, that is, its novelty for Boston, and by the problems incidentally involved. These problems concern neither music in itself nor the radio in itself, but rather the economics of music. At the Boston concert a week ago last night, the first to be broadcast, the radio audience had to put up with an interruption of the program, due to the refusal of a New York firm of musical agents to allow Mr Goossens's "Sinfinietta" to go on the air. The New York firm holds the American performing rights of this score and declined to permit broadcasting, although it appears that W. S. Quinby of Boston, who is sponsoring the Boston orchestra's radio experience, was willing to pay a royalty for the privilege. It was particularly unfortunate that this score could not be communicated to the radio audience, as the composer, Mr Goossens, was that night directing the orchestra as guest conductor.

Difficulties over obtaining permission for broadcasting musical scores do not pertain to this work alone. There are numerous Italian, Spanish and German scores the commercial rights in which are jealously guarded by the New York agents. This leads to the prospect of interruptions in the broadcasting of future programs, and this prospect has led, logically but regrettably, to a request that the Boston orchestra's programs should be chosen exclusively hereafter of scores which are available for broadcasting purposes. As H. T. Parker says this suggestion ignores the rig [illegible] orchestra Boston audien [illegible] programs made up solely in accordance with the artistic purposes [illegible] what is from the p [illegible] those who support [illegible] certs an irrelevan [illegible] The claims of the ra [illegible] audience are obviously incidental, and should be so regarded.

Nevertheless, the broadcasting of Boston Symphony programs is an educational influence of high potential value—assuming the physical success of the experiment. This is not alone on account of the merit of the orchestra. In equal degree it is due to the relatively limited number of New England people who in any year can hear directly the Boston Symphony programs.

In the days when the orchestra enjoyed a unique position, Boston Symphony concerts in Boston were very much of a caste affair. Save for the "rush" seats in the second gallery at the Friday afternoon rehearsal, admission was obtainable only on season tickets, and these were entirely sold in advance. There was no box office sale. Use of a few tickets could, to be sure, be procured from the theater ticket agencies. Season tickets at moderate cost could be obtained, and were often bought co-operatively; but the casual visitor to Boston, or the Bostonian who desired to attend occasionally rather than regularly, had meager opportunity.

This year for the first time a series of concerts early in the week is being given. But frequent and easy contact between the orchestra and the public has never been as well attained as it is attained by the New York orchestras. Springfield's "free" concert given by the Boston orchestra is not without problems, alike in selection of audience and in financing. But it does afford a ha liaison between orchestra and p lic.

harmonies annoying."

Thursday night's concert will Mr. Goossens's first Rochester appearance since December 10th. In his

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 25 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

An unusual Russian score which has attracted a great deal of attention in the western world, Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," will be the feature of the program at the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, to Hartford in a concert at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 7. The Russian conductor was a friend of the late Scriabin, and a pioneer of his music in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

JAN 25 1926

GOOSSENS BACK FOR CONCERT

The locomotive has choo-choo-ed its way into the concert halls.

Honegger's "Pacific 231" in which the composer has translated the heroic qualities of a giant engine into music, has been performed by the New York and Boston Symphony Orchestras. Rochester will hear the novelty for the first time next Thursday night when Eugene Goossens returns to conduct the Philharmonic in its second concert of the season.

Max Landow, pianist, member of

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARRISBURG,
PA.
PATRIOT

JAN 26 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN WEEKLY BROADCASTS

The Boston Symphony is the latest orchestra to go "on the air". Beginning last Saturday and for eleven consecutive Saturday evenings thereafter, music in its entirety as played by this orchestra will be broadcast from Radio Station WEEI of the Edison Electric Illuminating Company.

The broadcasting is made possible by the generosity of Winfield S. Quinby of Brookline, music lover, art patron and prominent in civic betterment and New England business and industrial development enterprises. He will give $1000 a week for twelve weeks, which will cover the greater share of the expense of the broadcasting. The remainder will be contributed by WEEI.

---

chromatic second section, which

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

JAN 25 1926

GOOSSENS TO GO, IS REPORT

Will Become Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Is One Story.

Talk that Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, might leave here for other fields soon has persisted ever since Mr. Goossens left the city on the trip during which he was guest conductor of the New York and Boston orchestras.

On Mr. Goossens' return to this city today, knowledge of any pro-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORFOLK, VA.
PILOT

JAN 31 1926

Another Orchestra Added To Exclusive WBZ Attractions

Boston, Mass., Jan. 30.—Another musical organization, the Repertory Theater Orchestra of Boston under the direction of Daniel Kuntz, has been added to the ever-increasing list of exclusive attractions of Westinghouse station WBZ and will be heard every Wednesday evening from 8 to 8:30 o'clock. The Repertory Orchestra is composed of three violins, viola, cello, bass, flute, clarinet, piano, and drums. Since its initial appearance a short time ago at the opening of the Repertory Theater, the orchestra has attained a prominent place in musical circles in New England.

Daniel Kuntz was one of the original members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He also conducted the orchestra at Poland Springs and at the Lake Placid Club, and played in the orchestra at the theater at Baireuth which was built under the direction of Richard Wagner for the production of his great music dramas. He has been connected with concert organizations, notably the Kneisel Quartet and the Adamowski Quartet.

In his position as director, Mr. Kuntz brings vast experience and special aptitude in the arranging of popular programs. He will have at his disposal one of the largest musical libraries in the possession of any individual musician in the country.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

JAN 27 1926

'HAPPY HERE,' DECLARES GOOSSENS

Rochester will not lose Eugene Goossens as conductor of its Philharmonic Orchestra, despite the many offers that have been made him to go to other cities, according to a statement by Mr. Goossens today.

"It is very flattering to have all these attractive posts presented to me by well meaning but over enthusiastic friends,' said Mr. Goossens, "but all I know of any of the rumers is what I have read in the papers.

'Why should I wish to leave Rochester? We have a fine orchestra, Rochester is at the beginning of the development that will make it one of the great musical centers of the world and I am in a most congenial and happy environment."

Mr. Goossens has returned to this city after a trip during which he was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony and the New York Philh

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 27 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

There is a heavy demand for seats for the only Boston Symphony concert of the season. This famous organization will be heard in the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon February 7 under then management of Frank A. Sedgwick. Seats may be obtained at McCoy's music store No. 89 Asylum street. Telephone orders will be taken and held for a limited time. The number is 2-6147.

The principal number on the program is Seriabin's third symphony in C minor. It is called "The Devine Poem." Scriabin, the late Russian composer, may be characterized as an individualist, an idealist and a mystic in tenes. "The Devine Poem" is in three parts. The first "Luttes" ('Struggles'), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation, and doubt. The second "Velutes" has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy merging into nature. The third, "Jeu divin," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed.

Serge Koussevitsky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was a close friend of Seriabin in Russia, where in full sympathetic understanding with this remarkable composer, he preformed his principal scores. Scriabin traveled with Koussevitsky on one of his famous voyages along the Velga river.

February 2, at 4:30 o'clock, in a program that will include selections from Weber, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Brahms. The latter composer's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Opus 68, in four movements, will constitute the featured

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.

JAN 28 1926

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of its internationally-famous Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will

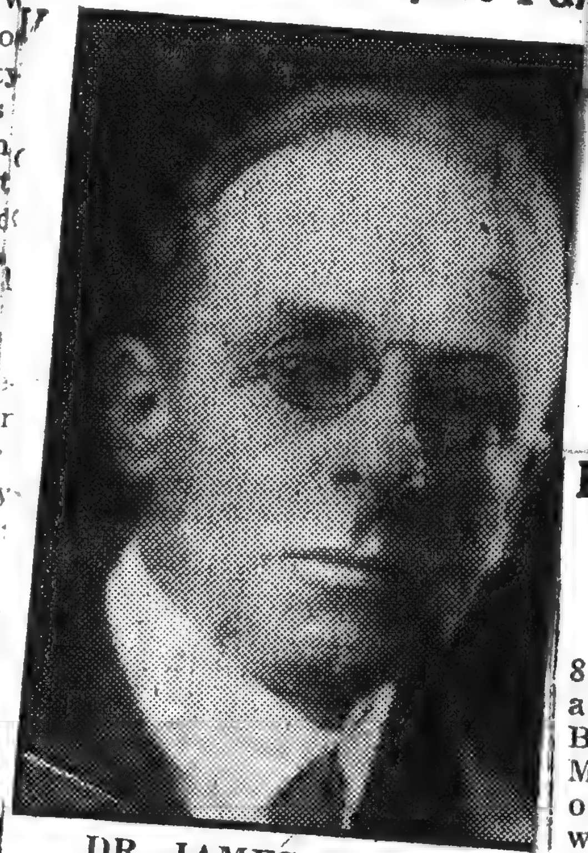
---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

1926

Otto Bartels, W
ander Penny, Ludw
Thomas H. Parkhill

To Address Alum At Banquet To



DR. JAMES R. ANGELL

The annual meeting and ba of the Yale club of Western M chusetts will be held tonight a Nayasset club, with James Ro Angell, president of the universi the principal speaker. W. Kirk nor, president of the organiz will preside, and Atty Charle Bosworth will act as toastm Richard Hooker, president of Republican Publishing company, speak on alumni matters. A p sional entertainment and music follow.

AWARD MORE HONORS FOR SAFETY POST

Council Gives Names Those Who Received H orable Mention

An additional number of ho have been granted by the Sp field Safety council in its recent test for the best drawing and sa slogan. First and fourth plac the contest was won by Jack C mings of 154 Oak Grove avenue, w Frank D. Aldrich was awarded ond honors. Third and fifth wen George A. Wood of Mittineague, sixth and seventh to Vincent P. E of Indian Orchard. The eighth av was won by R. F. Blanchard.

The new list released by Safety council gives honorable n tion to George Blascak and Miss phie White, William Carter compa E. D. Seaver, Chapman Valve; Anna Lord, Longmeadow; Miss M garet Looney, Bosch Magneto;

JAN 30 1926

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS-HERALD
PORTLAND, ME.

JAN 30 1926

Boston Symphony To Broadcast Tonight

WCSH Will Be Linked With WEEI To Bring 14th Seasonal Concert To Maine

The hours of eight to ten o'clock this evening will again bring the rare charm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Maine radio listeners and those of other New England communities when WCSH, the Congress Square Hotel at Portland, and WEEI, the Edison Electric Illuminating Co. of Boston, are linked for the second time. It will be the 14th seasonal concert by the noted orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston, and the second to be broadcast.

The program will open with a selection by Moussorgsky, "Une Nuit sur Le Mont Chauve". This number will be followed by Prokofieff's "Third

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
BANGOR, ME.

JAN 30 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN THE AIR, TONIGHT

PORTLAND, Jan. 29—The hours of 8 to 10 on Saturday evening will again bring the rare charm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Maine radio listeners and those of other New England communities when WCSH the Congress Square Hotel at Portland, and WEEI, the Edison Electric Illuminating Company of Boston, are linked for the second time. It will be the 14th seasonal concert by the noted orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston, and the second ever to be broadcast.

The officials of Rines Brothers Company of Portland, the firm that has sponsored broadcasting of the entire series of 12 concerts through WCSH, have been cordially complimented by many lovers of fine music during the past week since the first broadcast last Saturday evening, and are convinced that their efforts to bring a truly exceptional radio entertainment to Maine and Northern New England have been worth while.

Dr J. L. McConaughy Will Address Faith Church Men's Club

of motor vehicles. will have as its special feature a Springfield Women's division of the the Longmeadow Maternal asso- W. Douglass, headmaster at Wil- director of the Child Welfare League Tuesday the League of Women workers as guests, and these will tell Allen Bird club. Tuesday the Fort- Laurence B. Fletcher will speak to- known, are the outstanding feature of

---

were Save second on re-

tickets could, to be sure, be procured from the theater ticket agencies. Season tickets at moderate cost could be obtained, and were often bought co-operatively; but the casual visitor to Boston, or the Bostonian who desired to attend occasionally rather than regularly, had meager opportunity.

This year for the first time a series of concerts early in the week is being given. But frequent and easy contact between the orchestra and the public has never been as well attained as it is attained by the New York orchestras. Springfield's "free" concert given by the Boston orchestra is not without problems, alike in selection of audience and financing. But it does afford a ha liaison between orchestra and p lic.

G 166

TELEPHONE LIBERTY 4000

SANROMA APPEARS AS PIANO SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

A brilliant performance of the Rakoczy March, in great contrast to the preceding fairy-like Ballet of the Sylphs, from "The Damnation of Faust," by Berlioz, won great applause at the second concert in the new historical series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. The selections were for the most part in a lighter vein.

A foreword by Prof. Walter R. Spalding preceded the program which opened with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." The delicate shading of Serge Koussevitzky's direction and the haunting melody of the two movements of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony contributed to the enjoyment of this favorite work.

On the second portion of the program was the exquisitely delicate Scherzo from Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

Jesus Sanroma, piano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave half a dozen excerpts from Schumann's "Carnaval" group. He played with fervent unconcern and was heartily received.

Conductor Koussevitzky did himself proud in "Les Preludes," Symphonic poem No. 3 by Liszt. As in the Schubert number, there is in this work a recurrent melody in addition to rich passages calling for volume and brilliance, both of which qualities stood out in

---

SYMPHONY REPEATS STRAUSS

Casalls, Master Cellist New Year's Day Soloist

Post — Jan 2

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

An altogether welcome repetition of Strauss' "Alpine Symphony," the appearance of that excellent 'cellist Pablo Casals, as soloist in Haydn's D major Concerto, and an electrifying performance of Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"—such was the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon.

WORTH GROWS ON HEARER

To record a personal experience and opinion, a third hearing of the "Alpine Symphony" deepens first impressions of the music's worth while it lessens those of the music's weakness. To this end, yesterday, the performance itself, a performance truly magnificent, brilliant and eloquent beyond all praise, not unnaturally contributed; for remarkable as the original performances seemed, that of yesterday surpassed them at every point. But the truth of the matter is that a piece of the length and the complexity of the "Alpine Symphony" may scarcely be justly appraised upon one or even upon two hearings. To be sure, Strauss' melodic and harmonic idiom are, in the light of later musical developments, eminently simple and straightforward, but only when something like familiarity with it is attained may such a bulk of music be heard to full appreciation.

As on other occasions Strauss seemed yesterday in this "Alpine Symphony" to be least successful when he would be realistic. The cow-bell episode is overdone, unduly prolonged; the music of the waterfall, scintillating though it is, is inherently empty; the fanfares of hunting horns, heard yesterday from behind the stage, are a bit incongruous; the storm, for all its terrifying racket, is less truly suggestive of the wildness of the elements than is that in Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, to say nothing of the tempest that begins Wagner's "Die Walkure"; it is indeed hardly more than the storm of Rossini's "William Tell" Overture, tremendously inflated. But, broadly considered, the "Alpine Symphony" contains a deal of noble and beautiful music, its architecture is superb, its instrumentation nothing short of marvelous.

Truly, as conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky is inexhaustible. From the orchestra yesterday he obtained a performance of Berlioz' Overture that Hector of the flaming locks would himself have rejoiced to hear, a performance rich in dramatic contrasts, now warmly songful, now of blinding brilliance. Yet from this feat of conduc- rial virtuosity he could turn to ydn's gentle Concerto and give to Casals an accompaniment as poised balanced, as delicate and finished playing.

CASALS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe — Jan 2

Michael Press to Conduct Concerts of Jan 15 and 16

Pablo Casals as soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert played the 'cello in a Haydn concerto with the marvellous artistry that has long caused him to be universally regarded by all persons qualified to judge as one of the few living performers of the very first rank.

No other 'cellist equals him, no performer on any instrument surpasses him, not even Kreisler, not even Paderewski. It is curious that the general public has never fully realized the esteem in which Casals is held by musicians.

The rest of the program included a repetition of Strauss' "Alpine Symphony" played at the concerts of Dec 18 and 19, and a curiously noisy and ineffective performance of Berlioz' overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

The programs carried the announcement, not hitherto released for publication, that Michael Press will conduct the next pair of Symphony concerts, as "guest." Next week the orchestra visits New York, so the dates will be Jan 15 and 16.

"And who is Michael Press?" The question is pardonable, and the only discreet answer is that we shall know after we have heard him conduct. From 1901 until the Russian Revolution he was professor of violin playing in the Moscow Conservatory. It is said that he has since conducted in Sweden and elsewhere, but nobody hereabouts seems to have heard much of it or of him. He conducted as guest a single concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Philadelphia not long ago. This orchestra is not to be confused with the Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski, conductor.

The only apparent reason for asking a musician practically unknown as a conductor to lead the Boston Symphony is Mr Koussevitzky's desire and need for two weeks' vacation. Eugene Goossens, well-known English conductor now leading the new Rochester, N Y, Orchestra, was long ago engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony concerts of Jan 22 and 23.

This was announced in November. But Mr Press' engagement was not announced until now. It is to be assumed that his abilities as conductor deserve the high and unprecedented compliment the trustees of the orchestra have paid him. The only guest conductors at these concerts have been Vincent d'Indy, Bruno Walter, George Schneevoight and Henry Hadley, in 45 seasons. It is to be noted that Maj Higginson, except when d'Indy conducted a program chiefly of his own compositions in

---

IE BOSTON HERALD, WED

SYMPHONY PLAYS ROMANTIC MUSIC

Jan 6 1926

Second Tuesday Concert Draws Large Audience

The second symphony concert of the Tuesday series took place yesterday afternoon. Mr. Koussevitzky had arranged a program of what is called "romantic" music, which ranged from Weber's Euryanthe overture through Schubert's unfinished symphony, the Sylphs' dance and the Rakoczy march from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," the scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," music, excerpts from Schumann's "Carnival," played by Jesus Sanroma, to Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." The audience was very large.

Before the concert Mr. Walter R. Spalding spoke for 10 minutes—they seemed not so long—about "romantic" music. Speaking right to the point, he cleared the atmosphere for those in the audience who, their heads confused from having perused Mr. Cecil Gray's spirited book, had lost such ideas as they once might have had as to the meaning of the term. Mr. Spalding made everything clear once more.

But was Mr. Spalding giving voice to his own views or to those of Mr. Koussevitzky when he intimated that Schumann, because of his lack of skill at writing for orchestra, might better be represented by a piano piece? Schumann, if you like, was not past master at orchestral writing—though indeed he did contrive, for a man so clumsy as good judges will have him, to turn out some very tolerable music.

If nothing he wrote, however, was fit to keep company yesterday with, say "Les Preludes" by Liszt, it might have been wiser to leave his name off the program. To play at an orchestral concert those scraps of the Carnival did neither composer nor performer justice.

If justice, though, comes into question, was it just to any one of yesterday's composers to place them all in a row? The worth of a historical concert is of course another matter. It may have been their very romanticism, expressed in terms of the picturesque, of gorgeous color and of emotionalism, that made them, in each other's company, lose lustre.

If only, for instance, the lovely symphony had followed, not Weber, but Bach, or any of those early masters Mr. Koussevitzky deals with so happily! If Brahms at his ruggedest, not Shubert, had paved the way for those wanton sylphs, they would have danced the more enchantingly. Mendelssohn and his clowns and fairies would have felt more at home with Beethoven than with any of his companions yesterday. And the cruelty of making Liszt sound his noisy march after Berlioz (and Mr. Koussevitzky) had roused a furore with his!

It all could not be helped; the concert was chronological. But the concert proved once more the futility of a "period" program. Too much romance itself can clog, let alone an overdose of romanticism. A page or two of late Stravinsky can never have sounded so well in its life as it would have sounded yesterday afternoon, a dash of bitter or sour to do away with too much sweetness.

R. R. G.

Symphony

CONDUCTOR GOES, VIRTUOSO COMES, FAMILIAR MUSIC

Transcript — Jan 2

SYMPHONY CONCERT OF PABLO CASALS

The Violoncellist in the Prime of His Powers Upon a Classic Concerto—For a Month Mr. Koussevitzky Takes Leave —Strauss's "Alpine Symphony" Repeated, Quickened and Intensified — Other Incidents

NOT UNTIL the end of January will Mr. Koussevitzky return to a symphony Concert of Friday afternoon. With the captains in the arts as well as with the captains of commerce, "winter vacations" are now becoming the custom in America. As the head of his profesion on this side of the Atlantic, Mr. Stokowski set the example in Philadelphia. Now, in degree, his brethren follow it. Either, like Mr. Koussevitzky, they arrange their own holiday or, like Mr. Damrosch, conduct through but half a season. Only a few old-fashioned souls, blessed with routined temperaments, like Mr. Stock in Chicago or Mr. Monteux through his years in Boston, may now bear the brunt of an unbroken round of concerts from October even unto April. No doubt conducting is becoming, in these days, an increasingly nervous business. If it happens to be "very personal," as it is with Mr. Koussevitzky or Mr. Stokowski, the strain of in-taking from the music and out-going upon orchestra and audience, tells, and relaxation becomes advisable, not to say imperative.

Certainly the conductor of the Boston Orchestra earns and deserves such release. Mr. Koussevitzky is not the man to husband himself upon any piece or upon any occasion. Besides, a hundred-odd concerts in seven months make a task of which, as European itinerant, he would never have dreamed. Yet with this mid-winter holiday he accomplishes it and ends the season by no means stripped and spent. His orchestra, as well, needs "the rest and change"; for he lays no light and sparing hand upon it; whereas the passing "guest" is strange and therefore in measure forbearing. At least he is "different" and the "personnel," though the program book but baldly lists it, remains intrinsically human. No doubt, it will make the best of Mr. Michael Press and Mr. Eugene Goossens who are to be substitutes at the subscription concerts for the absent leader. As for the audiences, being docile by nature and habit, they will take what is set before them asking few questions. At the least, Mr. Goossens is notable figure in the younger English generation—as conductor or composer a musician of spirit.

In no respect did Mr. Koussevitzky signalize his impending departure while the assembled company quite forgot that for a month it was farewelling him. He began the concert with Berlioz's Overture to the opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," and he ended it with Strauss's "Alpine Symphony," repeated within a fortnight. By the Overture the conductor did exactly what there was reason to expect. That is to say, at every turn he vivified and dramatized it, loosing his own spirit, intensifying Berlioz's design. The first measures sounded in mounting tumult; the sombre and stately melody of the Cardinal ascended from the orchestral depths and moved like a cavalcade of prelates. The wood-winds sang the amorous melody at a languorous pace and in the utmost richness of tone. So forth and so onward, alike with the succeeding tumults, the recurring chants d'amour, the returning Cardinal. Berlioz's imagining of a clamorous and sensuous Rome of the Renaissance stood revealed; he himself could hardly have kept the music at intenser beat. Yet only the more clearly the hearer perceived that he was setting down one tonal episode after the other rather than fusing and intertwining them; while the habitual detractors of Mr. Koussevitzky could sit content with their usual comment: "Every thing that is slow, he takes more slowly; while every thing that is fast, he whips and speeds"—which in their chaste view is not the whole art of conducting.

Thrice and four times blessed among composers is Strauss. Before he puts pen to music-paper, he seems to know exactly what he wishes to say; to abound likewise in the means wherewith he will say it. When he has filled those staves with many notes, but with few "stage-directions," neither conductor nor orchestra, nor yet again the audience, may mistake the music. There opens the design unfolded and upbuilt; there are the tonal signs and symbols precisely distributed; thence outspring the mood and the suggestion, the picture or the passion, unescapable. By that rare virtue Strauss's tone-poems seldom miscarry in the concert-hall; while upon the remembering hearer they do but confirm the impression gained, retained and anticipated.

Consequently at a third hearing "An Alpine Symphony" sounded much as it had at a first or a second—save only where the personal equation of bettered performance entered. Yesterday, for example, those measures for the trumpets, which are as the very streaks of dawn upon mountain-slopes, sounded more clearly and characterizingly. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed

---

SECOND OF SYMPHONY MATINEES

Romantic Composers Given Fullest Due

Post — Jan 6

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Music of almost certain effect—conductor's "war-horses," if you choose—made the programme of yesterday's Symphony Concert, the second of the new Historical Series.

In short, the romantic composers yesterday had their innings, and in a concert that in the matter of performance gave them their fullest due.

BERLIOZ'S BALLET

The previous Tuesday afternoon, having brought the subscribers as far as Beethoven, Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday began with Weber of the "Euryanthe"

ROMANTIC MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe — Jan 6

Second Program of New Tuesday Series

Jan 6

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of the new Tuesday afternoon series yesterday to an enthusiastic audience that filled Symphony Hall. Mr Koussevitzky, carrying out his scheme for historical programs, chose this time music of the Romantic period, ranging, in order of time, from Weber to Liszt. As at the first concert, Prof Walter R. Spalding of Harvard spoke briefly about the pieces to be played before the music began.

Mr Koussevitzky yesterday conducted with his wonted brilliance and imaginative energy, seeming more his usual self than he has at the last few concerts of the regular series. This time he did not grossly overdramatise the first movement of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony." He failed to set and adhere to a tempo for the movement. One does not, of course, expect a mechanical rigidity of beat, a metronomic regularity of tempo. But one does expect that whatever fluctuations occur within the phrase or period that the phrases, unless the composer otherwise indicates, will be of even duration. Koussevitzky produces a disjointed, a fragmentary effect by too often failing to balance his phrases and periods.

His sense of rhythm is his strongest point, his is never an involuntary instability of tempo. It is a misplaced desire to be dramatic that misleads him into hurrying half his crescendos and lingering, almost lagging over expressive measures, when the composer has not directed any change of tempo whatever.

With Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Berlioz' "Rackoczy March," Mr Koussevitzky was eminently successful. His highly individual reading is not mere sound and fury, there is dramatic power and lyric feeling back of it. Weber's "Euryanthe" overture went less well than heretofore. Nor did the scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, or Berlioz' "Dance of the Sylphs" rouse the conductor's best qualities.

Mr Spalding's comment that much ink has been wasted in the vain endeavor to distinguish the romantic in music from the classic suggested a train of thought that the distinguished lecturer would probably be unwilling to approve. Was there really a "Romantic Period," from Weber to Liszt, or to Stravinsky for that matter?

Are not the differences between the pieces heard yesterday by Weber, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Schumann, Berlioz, and Liszt in most cases far more significant and striking than any similarities? It is commonly said that these composers cared more for emotional expression than for formal perfection, by distinction from Bach. But is not this separation of form from substance a mere delusion of the critical brain?

Fashions in musical structure change, fugues and sonata form go out of style, the Wagnerian prelude replaces the Beethoven overture as that had replaced the old-style opera overture. But the essential is form, not any single traditional form.

Wagner's Prelude to "Tristan" has certainly as finely wrought a form as any classic masterpiece. If Schumann, Schubert, and the rest can show nothing as good, except simple melodies like "Du bist die Ruh," that is a proof not of their preoccupation with emotion, but of their inferior talent and hasty workmanship in the larger forms.

As for the expression of emotion, is it not significant that the title and 21 subtitle of Schumann's "Carnival" were written after and not before the music? One is reminded of Ambros' anecdote about the virtuoso who wrote a new piano piece and confided to a friend that he was undecided whether to call it "The Falls of the Rhinde at Schaffhausen" or "Moonlight in the Sultan's Garden." Mr Sanroma yesterday played several excerpts from "Carnaval" with great refinement of style and beauty of tone, especially in lyric passages. His piano solo was very heartily and deservedly applauded. But if the listener found romantic emotion in the music, did he not himself supply it?

The next concert in this series will be given Feb 9.

P. B.

---

task nobly carried out.

Monitor Jan 13

Koussevitzky, Goossens and Reiner in New York

Special from Monitor Bureau

NEW YORK, Jan. 9—Two schoolmasters have come to town the past week, in the name of orchestral conductors: Fritz Reiner, teaching the deeper meanings of music, and Eugene Goossens, giving instruction in the outer forms. The first made a visit of but a night, bringing the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. The second moved here, bag and baggage, to stay a while as director of the concerts of the New York Symphony. Both won a distinct success with the parquet and boxes of Carnegie Hall, though neither caused anything more than a neutral reaction in that popularity barometer, the Carnegie balconies. They appealed to everything intellectual in the house, but hardly to everything sentimental.

The profounder of the two, Mr. Reiner, gave an especially impressive disclosure of himself interpreting a piece entitled "Dance Suite," by Bartok, on the evening of Jan. 6. The externalist, Mr. Goossens, submitted his artistic confession and apology in all clearness, by means of the "Sacre du Printemps" of Stravinsky, on the evening of Jan. 8. But Mr. Reiner, for all his penetration, seemed able to show only what was in the composer's thought when writing, and rather powerless to tell what was in his heart. Likewise Mr. Goossens, in spite of a most charming lightness of touch, did no more than reproduce the composer's melodic contours correctly and set off one harmonic mass against another in just balance and proportion; he scarcely ever heightened the picture with an accent of emotion.

That is how it must be, no doubt, when conductors appear before the public as candidates. For they may all be presumed to aspire to a New York call of a more or less permanent sort. When they would account well for themselves, they must needs display their knowledge, but must keep their feeling to themselves. Performances, indeed, like Mr. Reiner's and Mr. Goossens' become a sort of examination. The parquet and boxes, which are done with tests and ratings on their own account but may be supposed to like the theory of them, report favorably; the balconies, which are still under academic oversight or not far escaped from it, answer non-committally.

Came Serge Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Carnegie Hall on the evening of Jan. 7, a Reiner for the deeper meanings and a Goossens for the outer forms, and something else besides. Not that Mr. Koussevitzky undertook on this occasion to start the balconies going. But truly, there was a good deal in addition to the cold philosophy and the physical outlines of the tone art in his presentations of Copland's "Music for the Theater" and Strauss' "Alpine" symphony. What a novel idea, to set off the latest conceit of the modern small orchestra school of composing against the final one of the old grand orchestra school! Is there, by the way, something ever so slightly New England about that

---

ORCHESTRA PLAYS ALPINE SYMPHONY

Herald — Jan 26

Sanroma Is Soloist at Second Monday Night Concert

At Symphony hall last evening, the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor, gave the second Monday evening concert of this season. Jesus Sanroma, pianist, was the soloist. The program included Galliard's Sonata in G major, transcribed for a small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg; Rachmaninoff's second concerto in C minor for orchestra and piano, and Strauss's Alpine symphony.

After his several weeks' absence, Mr. Koussevitzky again resumed his baton, and from the Galliard, through the Strauss, it was a virtuosic performance, both for the conductor and the orchestra. Only the Rachmaninoff concerto is new this season. Both the luxuriant and vigorous Steinberg setting for the sonata of Galliard, and the Alpine Symphony have been on regular symphony programs, the Strauss twice.

The Alpine Symphony is rapidly becoming one of Mr. Koussevitzky's chef-l'ouvres, and despite its obvious journeymanship, its borrowings both from Wagner and an earlier and more spontaneous Strauss, it plays well, and improves with the playing. There is no one writing today who knows so well how to achieve the full vigor and sensuousness of the orchestra as Strauss, or to build so tumultuous a climax.

But it was Sanroma's playing of the Rachmaninoff concerto that demanded most attention. A season ago he played a Rachmaninoff concerto with the People's orchestra. Whether it was this one or another, we do not remember, but since then his playing has improved immeasurably, and last night there was more firmness and power than he had a year ago. He played the virtuoso passages brilliantly and with an immense eclat, and in the adagio he played with fire and imaginativeness. An excellent thing, this sombre, charging, and sometimes sentimental Rachmaninoff concerto, for a pianist to test his powers with, and Sanroma acquitted himself with dis-

G 166

TELEPHONE LIBERTY 4000

SANROMA APPEARS AS PIANO SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

A brilliant performance of the Rakoczy March, in great contrast to the preceding fairy-like Ballet of the Sylphs, from "The Damnation of Faust," by Berlioz, won great applause at the second concert in the new historical series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. The selections were for the most part in a lighter vein.

A foreword by Prof. Walter R. Spalding preceded the program which opened with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." The delicate shading of Serge Koussevitzky's direction and the haunting melody of the two movements of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony contributed to the enjoyment of this favorite work.

On the second portion of the program was the exquisitely delicate Scherzo from Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

Jesus Sanroma, piano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave half a dozen excerpts from Schumann's "Carnaval" group. He played with fervent unconcern and was heartily received.

Conductor Koussevitzky did himself proud in "Les Preludes," Symphonic poem No. 3 by Liszt. As in the Schubert number, there is in this work a recurrent melody in addition to rich passages calling for volume and brilliance, both of which qualities stood out in yesterday's

---

SYMPHONY REPEATS STRAUSS

Casalls, Master Cellist New Year's Day Soloist

Post — Jan 2

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

An altogether welcome repetition of Strauss' "Alpine Symphony," the appearance of that excellent 'cellist Pablo Casals, as soloist in Haydn's D major Concerto, and an electrifying performance of Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"—such was the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon.

WORTH GROWS ON HEARER

To record a personal experience and opinion, a third hearing of the "Alpine Symphony" deepens first impressions of the music's worth while it lessens those of the music's weakness. To this end, yesterday, the performance itself, a performance truly magnificent, brilliant and eloquent beyond all praise, not unnaturally contributed; for remarkable as the original performances seemed, that of yesterday surpassed them at every point. But the truth of the matter is that a piece of the length and the complexity of the "Alpine Symphony" may scarcely be justly appraised upon one or even upon two hearings. To be sure, Strauss' melodic and harmonic idiom are, in the light of later musical developments, eminently simple and straightforward, but only when something like familiarity with it is attained may such a bulk of music be heard to full appreciation.

As on other occasions Strauss seemed yesterday in this "Alpine Symphony" to be least successful when he would be realistic. The cow-bell episode is overdone, unduly prolonged; the music of the waterfall, scintillating though it is, is inherently empty; the fanfares of hunting horns, heard yesterday from behind the stage, are a bit incongruous; the storm, for all its terrifying racket, is less truly suggestive of the wildness of the elements than is that in Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, to say nothing of the tempest that begins Wagner's "Die Walkure"; it is indeed hardly more than the storm of Rossini's "William Tell" Overture, tremendously inflated. But, broadly considered, the "Alpine Symphony" contains a deal of noble and beautiful music, its architecture is superb, its instrumentation nothing short of marvelous.

Truly, as conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky is inexhaustible. From the orchestra yesterday he obtained a performance of Berlioz' Overture that Hector of the flaming locks would himself have rejoiced to hear, a performance rich in dramatic contrasts, now warmly songful, now of blinding brilliance. Yet from this feat of conductorial virtuosity he could turn to ydn's gentle Concerto and give to Casals an accompaniment as poised d balanced, as [illegible]licate and finished [illegible] playing.

CASALS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe — Jan 2

Michael Press to Conduct Concerts of Jan 15 and 16

Pablo Casals as soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert played the 'cello in a Haydn concerto with the marvellous artistry that has long caused him to be universally regarded by all persons qualified to judge as one of the few living performers of the very first rank.

No other 'cellist equals him, no performer on any instrument surpasses him, not even Kreisler, not even Paderewski. It is curious that the general public has never fully realized the esteem in which Casals is held by musicians.

The rest of the program included a repetition of Strauss' "Alpine Symphony" played at the concerts of Dec 18 and 19, and a curiously noisy and ineffective performance of Berlioz' overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

The programs carried the announcement, not hitherto released for publication, that Michael Press will conduct the next pair of Symphony concerts, as "guest." Next week the orchestra visits New York, so the dates will be Jan 15 and 16.

"And who is Michael Press?" The question is pardonable, and the only discreet answer is that we shall know after we have heard him conduct. From 1901 until the Russian Revolution he was professor of violin playing in the Moscow Conservatory. It is said that he has since conducted in Sweden and elsewhere, but nobody hereabouts seems to have heard much of it or of him. He conducted as guest a single concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Philadelphia not long ago. This orchestra is not to be confused with the Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski, conductor.

The only apparent reason for asking a musician practically unknown as a conductor to lead the Boston Symphony is Mr Koussevitzky's desire and need for two weeks' vacation. Eugene Goossens, well-known English conductor now leading the new Rochester, N Y, Orchestra, was long ago engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony concerts of Jan 22 and 23.

This was announced in November. But Mr Press' engagement was not announced until now. It is to be assumed that his abilities as conductor deserve the high and unprecedented compliment the trustees of the orchestra have paid him. The only guest conductors at these concerts have been Vincent d'Indy, Bruno Walter, George Schneevoight and Henry Hadley, in 45 seasons. It is to be noted that Maj Higginson, except when d'Indy conducted a program chiefly of his own compositions, in

---

IE BOSTON HERALD, WED

SYMPHONY PLAYS ROMANTIC MUSIC

Jan 6 1926

Second Tuesday Concert Draws Large Audience

The second symphony concert of the Tuesday series took place yesterday afternoon. Mr. Koussevitzky had arranged a program of what is called "romantic" music, which ranged from Weber's Euryanthe overture through Schubert's unfinished symphony, the Sylphs' dance and the Rakoczy march from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," the scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," music, excerpts from Schumann's "Carnival," played by Jesus Sanroma, to Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." The audience was very large.

Before the concert Mr. Walter R. Spalding spoke for 10 minutes—they seemed not so long—about "romantic" music. Speaking right to the point, he cleared the atmosphere for those in the audience who, their heads confused from having perused Mr. Cecil Gray's spirited book, had lost such ideas as they once might have had as to the meaning of the term. Mr. Spalding made everything clear once more.

But was Mr. Spalding giving voice to his own views or to those of Mr. Koussevitzky when he intimated that Schumann, because of his lack of skill at writing for orchestra, might better be represented by a piano piece? Schumann, if you like, was not past master at orchestral writing—though indeed he did contrive, for a man so clumsy as good judges will have him, to turn out some very tolerable music.

If nothing he wrote, however, was fit to keep company yesterday with, say "Les Preludes" by Liszt, it might have been wiser to leave his name off the program. To play at an orchestral concert those scraps of the Carnival did neither composer nor performer justice.

If justice, though, comes into question, was it just to any one of yesterday's composers to place them all in a row? The worth of a historical concert is of course another matter. It may have been their very romanticism, expressed in terms of the picturesque, of gorgeous color and of emotionalism, that made them, in each other's company, lose lustre.

If only, for instance, the lovely symphony had followed, not Weber, but Bach, or any of those early masters Mr. Koussevitzky deals with so happily! If Brahms at his ruggedest, not Shubert, had paved the way for those wanton sylphs, they would have danced the more enchantingly. Mendelssohn and his clowns and fairies would have felt more at home with Beethoven than with any of his companions yesterday. And the cruelty of making Liszt sound his noisy march after Berlioz (and Mr. Koussevitzky) had roused a furore with his!

It all could not be helped; the concert was chronological. But the concert proved once more the futility of a "period" program. Too much romance itself can clog, let alone an overdose of romanticism. A page or two of late Stravinsky can never have sounded so well in its life as it would have sounded yesterday afternoon, a dash of bitter or sour to do away with too much sweetness.

R. R. G.

Symphony

CONDUCTOR GOES, VIRTUOSO COMES, FAMILIAR MUSIC

Transcript — Jan 2

SYMPHONY CONCERT OF PABLO CASALS

The Violoncellist in the Prime of His Powers Upon a Classic Concerto—For a Month Mr. Koussevitzky Takes Leave —Strauss's "Alpine Symphony" Repeated, Quickened and Intensified — Other Incidents

NOT UNTIL the end of January will Mr. Koussevitzky return to a symphony Concert of Friday afternoon. With the captains in the arts as well as with the captains of commerce, "winter vacations" are now becoming the custom in America. As the head of his profesion on this side of the Atlantic, Mr. Stokowski set the example in Philadelphia. Now, in degree, his brethren follow it. Either, like Mr. Koussevitzky, they arrange their own holiday or, like Mr. Damrosch, conduct through but half a season. Only a few old-fashioned souls, blessed with routined temperaments, like Mr. Stock in Chicago or Mr. Monteux through his years in Boston, may now bear the brunt of an unbroken round of concerts from October even unto April. No doubt conducting is becoming, in these days, an increasingly nervous business. If it happens to be "very personal," as it is with Mr. Koussevitzky or Mr. Stokowski, the strain of in-taking from the music and out-going upon orchestra and audience, tells, and relaxation becomes advisable, not to say imperative.

Certainly the conductor of the Boston Orchestra earns and deserves such release. Mr. Koussevitzky is not the man to husband himself upon any piece or upon any occasion. Besides, a hundred-odd concerts in seven months make a task of which, as European itinerant, he would never have dreamed. Yet with this mid-winter holiday he accomplishes it and ends the season by no means stripped and spent. His orchestra, as well, needs "the rest and change"; for he lays no light and sparing hand upon it; whereas the passing "guest" is strange and therefore in measure forbearing. At least he is "different" and the "personnel," though the program book but baldly lists it, remains intrinsically human. No doubt, it will make the best of Mr. Michael Press and Mr. Eugene Goossens who are to be substitutes at the subscription concerts for the absent leader. As for the audiences, being docile by nature and habit, they will take what is set before them asking few questions. At the least, Mr. Goossens is notable figure in the younger English generation—as conductor or composer a musician of spirit.

In no respect did Mr. Koussevitzky signalize his impending departure while the assembled company quite forgot that for a month it was farewelling him. He began the concert with Berlioz's Overture to the opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," and he ended it with Strauss's "Alpine Symphony," repeated within a fortnight. By the Overture the conductor did exactly what there was reason to expect. That is to say, at every turn he vivified and dramatized it, loosing his own spirit, intensifying Berlioz's design. The first measures sounded in mounting tumult; the sombre and stately melody of the Cardinal ascended from the orchestral depths and moved like a cavalcade of prelates. The wood-winds sang the amorous melody at a languorous pace and in the utmost richness of tone. So forth and so onward, alike with the succeeding tumults, the recurring chants d'amour, the returning Cardinal. Berlioz's imagining of a clamorous and sensuous Rome of the Renaissance stood revealed; he himself could hardly have kept the music at intenser beat. Yet only the more clearly the hearer perceived that he was setting down one tonal episode after the other rather than fusing and intertwining them; while the habitual detractors of Mr. Koussevitzky could sit content with their usual comment: "Every thing that is slow, he takes more slowly; while every thing that is fast, he whips and speeds"—which in their chaste view is not the whole art of conducting.

Thrice and four times blessed among composers is Strauss. Before he puts pen to music-paper, he seems to know exactly what he wishes to say; to abound likewise in the means wherewith he will say it. When he has filled those staves with many notes, but with few "stage-directions," neither conductor nor orchestra, nor yet again the audience, may mistake the music. There opens the design unfolded and upbuilt; there are the tonal signs and symbols precisely distributed; thence outspring the mood and the suggestion, the picture or the passion, unescapable. By that rare virtue Strauss's tone-poems seldom miscarry in the concert-hall; while upon the remembering hearer they do but confirm the impression gained, retained and anticipated.

Consequently at a third hearing "An Alpine Symphony" sounded much as it had at a first or a second—save only where the personal equation of bettered performance entered. Yesterday, for example, those measures for the trumpets, which are as the very streaks of dawn upon mountain-slopes, sounded more clearly and characterizingly. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed [illegible] and vary the pace of that lang

---

SECOND OF SYMPHONY MATINEES

Romantic Composers Given Fullest Due

Post — Jan 6

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Music of almost certain effect—conductor's "war-horses," if you choose—made the programme of yesterday's Symphony Concert, the second of the new Historical Series.

In short, the romantic composers yesterday had their innings, and in a concert that in the matter of performance gave them their fullest due.

BERLIOZ'S BALLET

The previous Tuesday afternoon, having brought the subscribers as far as Beethoven, Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday began with Weber of the "Euryanthe"

ROMANTIC MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe — Jan 6

Second Program of New Tuesday Series

Jan 6

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of the new Tuesday afternoon series yesterday to an enthusiastic audience that filled Symphony Hall. Mr Koussevitzky, carrying out his scheme for historical programs, chose this time music of the Romantic period, ranging, in order of time, from Weber to Liszt. As at the first concert, Prof Walter R. Spalding of Harvard spoke briefly about the pieces to be played before the music began.

Mr Koussevitzky yesterday conducted with his wonted brilliance and imaginative energy, seeming more his usual self than he has at the last few concerts of the regular series. This time he did not grossly overdramatise the first movement of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony." He failed to set and adhere to a tempo for the movement. One does not, of course, expect a mechanical rigidity of beat, a metronomic regularity of tempo. But one does expect that whatever fluctuations occur within the phrase or period that the phrases, unless the composer otherwise indicates, will be of even duration. Koussevitzky produces a disjointed, a fragmentary effect by too often failing to balance his phrases and periods.

His sense of rhythm is his strongest point, his is never an involuntary instability of tempo. It is a misplaced desire to be dramatic that misleads him into hurrying half his crescendos and lingering, almost lagging over expressive measures, when the composer has not directed any change of tempo whatever.

With Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Berlioz' "Rackoczy March," Mr Koussevitzky was eminently successful. His highly individual reading is not mere sound and fury, there is dramatic power and lyric feeling back of it. Weber's "Euryanthe" overture went less well than heretofore. Nor did the scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, or Berlioz' "Dance of the Sylphs" rouse the conductor's best qualities.

Mr Spalding's comment that much ink has been wasted in the vain endeavor to distinguish the romantic in music from the classic suggested a train of thought that the distinguished lecturer would probably be unwilling to approve. Was there really a "Romantic Period," from Weber to Liszt, or to Stravinsky for that matter?

Are not the differences between the pieces heard yesterday by Weber, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Schumann, Berlioz, and Liszt in most cases far more significant and striking than any similarities? It is commonly said that these composers cared more for emotional expression than for formal perfection, by distinction from Bach. But is not this separation of form from substance a mere delusion of the critical brain?

Fashions in musical structure change fugues and sonata form go out of style, the Wagnerian prelude replaces the Beethoven overture as that had replaced the old-style opera overture. But the essential is form, not any single traditional form.

Wagner's Prelude to "Tristan" has certainly as finely wrought a form as any classic masterpiece. If Schumann, Schubert, and the rest can show nothing as good, except simple melodies like "Du bist die Ruh," that is a proof not of their preoccupation with emotion, but of their inferior talent and hasty workmanship in the larger forms.

As for the expression of emotion, is it not significant that the title and 21 subtitle of Schumann's "Carnival" were written after and not before the music? One is reminded of Ambros' anecdote about the virtuoso who wrote a new piano piece and confided to a friend that he was undecided whether to call it "The Falls of the Rhinde at Schaffhausen" or "Moonlight in the Sultan's Garden." Mr Sanroma yesterday played several excerpts from "Carnaval" with great refinement of style and beauty of tone, especially in lyric passages. His piano solo was very heartily and deservedly applauded. But if the listener found romantic emotion in the music, did he not himself supply it?

The next concert in this series will be given Feb 9.

F. B.

---

task nobly carried out.

Monitor — Jan 13

Koussevitzky, Goossens and Reiner in New York

Special from Monitor Bureau

NEW YORK, Jan. 9—Two schoolmasters have come to town the past week, in the name of orchestral conductors: Fritz Reiner, teaching the deeper meanings of music, and Eugene Goossens, giving instruction in the outer forms. The first made a visit of but a night, bringing the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. The second moved here, bag and baggage, to stay a while as director of the concerts of the New York Symphony. Both won a distinct success with the parquet and boxes of Carnegie Hall, though neither caused anything more than a neutral reaction in that popularity barometer, the Carnegie balconies. They appealed to everything intellectual in the house, but hardly to everything sentimental.

The profounder of the two, Mr. Reiner, gave an especially impressive disclosure of himself interpreting a piece entitled "Dance Suite," by Bartok, on the evening of Jan. 6. The externalist, Mr. Goossens, submitted his artistic confession and apology in all clearness, by means of the "Sacre du Printemps" of Stravinsky, on the evening of Jan. 8. But Mr. Reiner, for all his penetration, seemed able to show only what was in the composer's thought when writing, and rather powerless to tell what was in his heart. Likewise Mr. Goossens, in spite of a most charming lightness of touch, did no more than reproduce the composer's melodic contours correctly and set off one harmonic mass against another in just balance and proportion; he scarcely ever heightened the picture with an accent of emotion.

That is how it must be, no doubt, when conductors appear before the public as candidates. For they may all be presumed to aspire to a New York call of a more or less permanent sort. When they would account well for themselves, they must needs display their knowledge, but must keep their feeling to themselves. Performances, indeed, like Mr. Reiner's and Mr. Goossens' become a sort of examination. The parquet and boxes, which are done with tests and ratings on their own account but may be supposed to like the theory of them, report favorably; the balconies, which are still under academic oversight or not far escaped from it, answer non-committally.

Came Serge Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Carnegie Hall on the evening of Jan. 7, a Reiner for the deeper meanings and a Goossens for the outer forms, and something else besides. Not that Mr. Koussevitzky undertook on this occasion to start the balconies going. But truly, there was a good deal in addition to the cold philosophy and the physical outlines of the tone art in his presentations of Copland's "Music for the Theater" and Strauss' "Alpine" symphony. What a novel idea, to set off the latest conceit of the modern small orchestra school of composing against the final one of the old grand orchestra school! Is there, by the way, something ever so slightly New England about that

---

ORCHESTRA PLAYS ALPINE SYMPHONY

Herald — Jan 26

Sanroma Is Soloist at Second Monday Night Concert

At Symphony hall last evening, the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor, gave the second Monday evening concert of this season. Jesus Sanroma, pianist, was the soloist. The program included Galliard's Sonata in G major, transcribed for a small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg; Rachmaninoff's second concerto in C minor for orchestra and piano, and Strauss's Alpine symphony.

After his several weeks' absence, Mr. Koussevitzky again resumed his baton, and from the Galliard, through the Strauss, it was a virtuosic performance, both for the conductor and the orchestra. Only the Rachmaninoff concerto is new this season. Both the luxuriant and vigorous Steinberg setting for the sonata of Galliard, and the Alpine Symphony have been on regular symphony programs, the Strauss twice.

The Alpine Symphony is rapidly becoming one of Mr. Koussevitzky's chef-l'ouvres, and despite its obvious journeymanship, its borrowings both from Wagner and an earlier and more spontaneous Strauss, it plays well, and improves with the playing. There is no one writing today who knows so well how to achieve the full vigor and sensuousness of the orchestra as Strauss, or to build so tumultuous a climax.

But it was Sanroma's playing of the Rachmaninoff concerto that demanded most attention. A season ago he played a Rachmaninoff concerto with the People's orchestra. Whether it was this one or another, we do not remember, but since then his playing has improved immeasurably, and last night there was more firmness and power than he had a year ago. He played the virtuoso passages brilliantly and with an immense eclat, and in the adagio he played with fire and imaginativeness. An excellent thing, this sombre, charging, and sometimes sentimental Rachmaninoff concerto, for a pianist to test his powers with, and Sanroma acquitted himself with dis-

G 166

TELEPHONE LIBERTY 4000

SANROMA APPEARS AS PIANO SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

A brilliant performance of the Rakoczy March, in great contrast to the preceding fairy-like Ballet of the Sylphs, from "The Damnation of Faust," by Berlioz, won great applause at the second concert in the new historical series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. The selections were for the most part in a lighter vein.

A foreword by Prof. Walter R. Spalding preceded the program which opened with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." The delicate shading of Serge Koussevitzky's direction and the haunting melody of the two movements of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony contributed to the enjoyment of this favorite work.

On the second portion of the program was the exquisitely delicate Scherzo from Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

Jesus Sanroma, piano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave half a dozen excerpts from Schumann's "Carnaval" group. He played with fervent unconcern and was heartily received.

Conductor Koussevitzky did himself proud in "Les Preludes," Symphonic poem No. 3 by Liszt. As in the Schubert number, there is in this work a recurrent melody in addition to rich passages calling for volume and brilliance, both of which qualities stood out in yesterday's performance.

REPEATS STRAUSS

Casalls, Master Cellist, New Year's Day Soloist

Post — JAN 2

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

An altogether welcome repetition of Strauss' "Alpine Symphony," the appearance of that excellent 'cellist, Pablo Casals, as soloist in Haydn's D major Concerto, and an electrifying performance of Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"—such was the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon.

WORTH GROWS ON HEARER

To record a personal experience and opinion, a third hearing of the "Alpine Symphony" deepens first impressions of the music's worth while it lessens those of the music's weakness. To this end, yesterday, the performance itself, a performance truly magnificent, brilliant and eloquent beyond all praise, not unnaturally contributed; for remarkable as the original performances seemed, that of yesterday surpassed them at every point. But the truth of the matter is that a piece of the length and the complexity of the "Alpine Symphony" may scarcely be justly appraised upon one or even upon two hearings. To be sure, Strauss' melodic and harmonic idiom are, in the light of later musical developments, eminently simple and straightforward, but only when something like familiarity with it is attained may such a bulk of music be heard to full appreciation.

As on other occasions Strauss seemed yesterday in this "Alpine Symphony" to be least successful when he would be realistic. The cow-bell episode is overdone, unduly prolonged; the music of the waterfall, scintillating though it is, is inherently empty; the fanfares of hunting horns, heard yesterday from behind the stage, are a bit incongruous; the storm, for all its terrifying racket, is less truly suggestive of the wildness of the elements than is that in Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, to say nothing of the tempest that begins Wagner's "Die Walkure"; it is indeed hardly more than the storm of Rossini's "William Tell" Overture, tremendously inflated. But, broadly considered, the "Alpine Symphony" contains a deal of noble and beautiful music, its architecture is superb, its instrumentation nothing short of marvelous.

Truly, as conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky is inexhaustible. From the orchestra yesterday he obtained a performance of Berlioz' Overture that Hector of the flaming locks would himself have rejoiced to hear, a performance rich in dramatic contrasts, now warmly songful, now of blinding brilliance. Yet from this feat of conductorial virtuosity he could turn to Haydn's gentle Concerto and give to Casals an accompaniment as poised and balanced, as delicate and finished [illegible] playing.

CASALS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe — Jan 2

Michael Press to Conduct Concerts of Jan 15 and 16

Pablo Casals as soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert played the 'cello in a Haydn concerto with the marvellous artistry that has long caused him to be universally regarded by all persons qualified to judge as one of the few living performers of the very first rank.

No other 'cellist equals him, no performer on any instrument surpasses him, not even Kreisler, not even Paderewski. It is curious that the general public has never fully realized the esteem in which Casals is held by musicians.

The rest of the program included a repetition of Strauss' "Alpine Symphony" played at the concerts of Dec 18 and 19, and a curiously noisy and ineffective performance of Berlioz' overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

The programs carried the announcement, not hitherto released for publication, that Michael Press will conduct the next pair of Symphony concerts, as "guest." Next week the orchestra visits New York, so the dates will be Jan 15 and 16.

"And who is Michael Press?" The question is pardonable, and the only discreet answer is that we shall know after we have heard him conduct. From 1901 until the Russian Revolution he was professor of violin playing in the Moscow Conservatory. It is said that he has since conducted in Sweden and elsewhere, but nobody hereabouts seems to have heard much of it or of him. He conducted as guest a single concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Philadelphia not long ago. This orchestra is not to be confused with the Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski, conductor.

The only apparent reason for asking a musician practically unknown as a conductor to lead the Boston Symphony is Mr Koussevitzky's desire and need for two weeks' vacation. Eugene Goossens, well-known English conductor now leading the new Rochester, N Y, Orchestra, was long ago engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony concerts of Jan 22 and 23.

This was announced in November. But Mr Press' engagement was not announced until now. It is to be assumed that his abilities as conductor deserve the high and unprecedented compliment the trustees of the orchestra have paid him. The only guest conductors at these concerts have been Vincent d'Indy, Bruno Walter, George Schneevoight and Henry Hadley, in 45 seasons. It is to be noted that Maj Higginson, except when d'Indy conducted a program chiefly of his own compositions, in 1905, permitted no guest conductors.

Mr Casals yesterday played Haydn's music with elogance of phrasing, subtlety of nuances, the utmost polish of style, and yet with a relish. One hoped the local singers and players in the audience noted as a model of perfect musicianship this performance.

When the orchestra repeated phrases of Haydn that Mr Casale had just previously played the undistinguished character of the interpretation it gave was somewhat of a shock to those who still vividly remember how the whole Boston Symphony Orchestra, before it became a casualty of the World War, once played Haydn and Mozart under Dr Muck. The whole orchestra then played almost as musically as Casals did yesterday, in such music.

Mr Koussevitzky's qualities shone to far better advantage in the swelling rhythms and almost megalomaniac sonorities of Strauss, whose "Alpine Symphony" again seemed to be a work with every musical quality save melodic, or, more precisely, thematic, invention.

One wondered why a conductor capable he has repeatedly shown in his two seasons here of remarkably brilliant performances of Berlioz should have made such a noisy botch out of the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture. But the trouble probably is that Mr Koussevitzky, who puts tremendous nervous energy into his work, is tired and in real need of the vacation the two weeks of guest conductors will afford him.

P. R.

---

gorgeous color and of emotionalism, that made them, in each other's company, lose lustre.

If only, for instance, the lovely symphony had followed, not Weber, but Bach, or any of those early masters Mr. Koussevitzky deals with so happily! If Brahms at his ruggedest, not Shubert, had paved the way for those wanton sylphs, they would have danced the more enchantingly. Mendelssohn and his clowns and fairies would have felt more at home with Beethoven than with any of his companions yesterday. And the cruelty of making Liszt sound his noisy march after Berlioz (and Mr. Koussevitzky) had roused a furore with his!

It all could not be helped; the concert was chronological. But the concert proved once more the futility of a "period" program. Too much romance itself can clog, let alone an overdose of romanticism. A page or two of late Stravinsky can never have sounded so well in its life as it would have sounded yesterday afternoon, a dash of bitter or sour to do away with too much sweetness.

R. R. G.

Symphony

CONDUCTOR GOES, VIRTUOSO COMES, FAMILIAR MUSIC

TRANSCRIPT — JAN 2

SYMPHONY CONCERT OF PABLO CASALS

The Violoncellist in the Prime of His Powers Upon a Classic Concerto—For a Month Mr. Koussevitzky Takes Leave—Strauss's "Alpine Symphony" Repeated, Quickened and Intensified — Other Incidents

NOT UNTIL the end of January will Mr. Koussevitzky return to a symphony Concert of Friday afternoon. With the captains in the arts as well as with the captains of commerce, "winter vacations" are now becoming the custom in America. As the head of his profesion on this side of the Atlantic, Mr. Stokowski set the example in Philadelphia. Now, in degree, his brethren follow it. Either, like Mr. Koussevitzky, they arrange their own holiday or, like Mr. Damrosch, conduct through but half a season. Only a few old-fashioned souls, blessed with routined temperaments, like Mr. Stock in Chicago or Mr. Monteux through his years in Boston, may now bear the brunt of an unbroken round of concerts from October even unto April. No doubt conducting is becoming, in these days, an increasingly nervous business. If it happens to be "very personal," as it is with Mr. Koussevitzky or Mr. Stokowski, the strain of in-taking from the music and out-going upon orchestra and audience, tells, and relaxation becomes advisable, not to say imperative.

Certainly the conductor of the Boston Orchestra earns and deserves such release. Mr. Koussevitzky is not the man to husband himself upon any piece or upon any occasion. Besides, a hundred-odd concerts in seven months make a task of which, as European itinerant, he would never have dreamed. Yet with this mid-winter holiday he accomplishes it and ends the season by no means stripped and spent. His orchestra, as well, needs "the rest and change"; for he lays no light and sparing hand upon it; whereas the passing "guest" is strange and therefore in measure forbearing. At least he is "different" and the "personnel," though the program book but baldly lists it, remains intrinsically human. No doubt, it will make the best of Mr. Michael Press and Mr. Eugene Goossens who are to be substitutes at the subscription concerts for the absent leader. As for the audiences, being docile by nature and habit, they will take what is set before them asking few questions. At the least, Mr. Goossens is notable figure in the younger English generation—as conductor or composer a musician of spirit.

In no respect did Mr. Koussevitzky signalize his impending departure, while the assembled company quite forgot that for a month it was farewelling him. He began the concert with Berlioz's Overture to the opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," and he ended it with Strauss's "Alpine Symphony," repeated within a fortnight. By the Overture the conductor did exactly what there was reason to expect. That is to say, at every turn he vivified and dramatized it, loosing his own spirit, intensifying Berlioz's design. The first measures sounded in mounting tumult; the sombre and stately melody of the Cardinal ascended from the orchestral depths and moved like a cavalcade of prelates. The wood-winds sang the amorous melody at a languorous pace and in the utmost richness of tone. So forth and so onward, alike with the succeeding tumults, the recurring chants d'amour, the returning Cardinal. Berlioz's imagining of a clamorous and sensuous Rome of the Renaissance stood revealed; he himself could hardly have kept the music at intenser beat. Yet only the more clearly the hearer perceived that he was setting down one tonal episode after the other rather than fusing and intertwining them; while the habitual detractors of Mr. Koussevitzky could sit content with their usual comment: "Every thing that is slow, he takes more slowly; while every thing that is fast, he whips and speeds"—which in their chaste view not the whole art of conducting.

Thrice and four times blessed among composers is Strauss. Before he puts pen to music-paper, he seems to know exactly what he wishes to say; to abound likewise in the means wherewith he will say it. When he has filled those staves with many notes, but with few "stage-directions," neither conductor nor orchestra, nor yet again the audience, may mistake the music. There opens the design unfolded and upbuilt; there are the tonal signs and symbols precisely distributed; thence outspring the mood and the suggestion, the picture or the passion, unescapable. By that rare virtue Strauss's tone-poems seldom miscarry in the concert-hall; while upon the remembering hearer they do but confirm the impression gained, retained and anticipated.

Consequently at a third hearing "An Alpine Symphony" sounded much as it had at a first or a second—save only where the personal equation of bettered performance entered. Yesterday, for example, those measures for the trumpets, which are as the very streaks of dawn upon mountain-slopes, sounded more clearly and characterizingly. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed [illegible] and vary the pace of that long

---

SECOND OF SYMPHONY MATINEES

Romantic Composers Given Fullest Due

Post — JAN 6

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Music of almost certain effect—conductor's "war-horses," if you choose—made the programme of yesterday's Symphony Concert, the second of the new Historical Series.

In short, the romantic composers yesterday had their innings, and in a concert that in the matter of performance gave them their fullest due.

BERLIOZ'S BALLET

The previous Tuesday afternoon, having brought the subscribers as far as Beethoven, Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday began with Weber of the "Euryanthe" overture, passed to Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and proceeded through two excerpts from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust" and the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music to Liszt's "Les Preludes." And, since no one of the short orchestral pieces of Schumann appealed sufficiently to Mr. Koussekitzky (although the overture to "Manfred" would not have been out of place in this company). that composer was represented by portions of the "Carnaval," played with insight and authority by Mr. Sanroma, now the established pianist of the orchestra.

Some will have it that Mr. Koussevitzky unduly dramatizes the "Unfinished" symphony, and, judged by certain standards of interpretation, mayhap he does. Nevertheless, forgetting for the moment tradition and association, does not the score itself call for the very treatment that Mr. Koussevitzky accords it? That it does, and that most emphatically, is, at least, the opinion of one reviewer.

Brilliant in the extreme was the performance yesterday of Weber's Overture and of Liszt's resounding, irresistibly effective, if thematically commonplace, tone-poem, hitherto unconducted here by Mr. Koussevitzky. Likewise, new from his hand, were the two Berlioz pieces, of which the stirring "Rakoczy March" proved the popular success of the concert, while that miracle of orchestral delicacy, the Ballet of the Sylphs, came yesterday, gossamer-like, from the orchestra. Beside it the Scherzo of Mendelssohn, deft as it is, inevitably sounded thick-voiced and but conventionally imaginative.

---

title of Schumann's "Carnaval" were written after and not before the music? One is reminded of Ambros' anecdote about the virtuoso who wrote a new piano piece and confided to a friend that he was undecided whether to call it "The Falls of the Rhinde at Schaffhausen" or "Moonlight in the Sultan's Garden." Mr Sanroma yesterday played several excerpts from "Carnaval" with great refinement of style and beauty of tone, especially in lyric passages. His piano solo was very heartily and deservedly applauded. But if the listener found romantic emotion in the music, did he not himself supply it?

The next concert in this series will be given Feb 9.

F. B.

---

task nobly carried out.

Monitor — Jan 13

Koussevitzky, Goossens and Reiner in New York

Special from Monitor Bureau

NEW YORK, Jan. 9—Two schoolmasters have come to town the past week, in the name of orchestral conductors: Fritz Reiner, teaching the deeper meanings of music, and Eugene Goossens, giving instruction in the outer forms. The first made a visit of but a night, bringing the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. The second moved here, bag and baggage, to stay a while as director of the concerts of the New York Symphony. Both won a distinct success with the parquet and boxes of Carnegie Hall, though neither caused anything more than a neutral reaction in that popularity barometer, the Carnegie balconies. They appealed to everything intellectual in the house, but hardly to everything sentimental.

The profounder of the two, Mr. Reiner, gave an especially impressive disclosure of himself interpreting a piece entitled "Dance Suite," by Bartok, on the evening of Jan. 6. The externalist, Mr. Goossens, submitted his artistic confession and apology in all clearness, by means of the "Sacre du Printemps" of Stravinsky, on the evening of Jan. 8. But Mr. Reiner, for all his penetration, seemed able to show only what was in the composer's thought when writing, and rather powerless to tell what was in his heart. Likewise Mr. Goossens, in spite of a most charming lightness of touch, did no more than reproduce the composer's melodic contours correctly and set off one harmonic mass against another in just balance and proportion; he scarcely ever heightened the picture with an accent of emotion.

That is how it must be, no doubt, when conductors appear before the public as candidates. For they may all be presumed to aspire to a New York call of a more or less permanent sort. When they would account well for themselves, they must needs display their knowledge, but must keep their feeling to themselves. Performances, indeed, like Mr. Reiner's and Mr. Goossens' become a sort of examination. The parquet and boxes, which are done with tests and ratings on their own account but may be supposed to like the theory of them, report favorably; the balconies, which are still under academic oversight or not far escaped from it, answer non-committally.

Came Serge Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Carnegie Hall on the evening of Jan. 7, a Reiner for the deeper meanings and a Goossens for the outer forms, and something else besides. Not that Mr. Koussevitzky undertook on this occasion to start the balconies going. But truly, there was a good deal in addition to the cold philosophy and the physical outlines of the tone art in his presentations of Copland's "Music for the Theater" and Strauss' "Alpine" symphony. What a novel idea, to set off the latest conceit of the modern small orchestra school of composing against the final one of the old grand orchestra school! Is there, by the way, something ever so slightly New England about that Copland piece? Something, too, slightly of the western prairies? Just a hearsay hint, let us allow. The American orchestral composer is without question on his way. He never came in the old German orchestra, nor in the old four-movement symphony. He'll find himself a wagon, though, to ride in one of these days.

---

concerto is new this season. Both the luxuriant nd vigorous Steinberg setting for the onata of Galliard, and the Alpine Symphony have been on regular symphony rograms, the Strauss twice.

The Alpine Symphony is rapidly becoming one of Mr. Koussevitzky's chef-d'ouvres, and despite its obvious journeymanship, its borrowings both from Wagner and an earlier and more spontaneous Strauss, it plays well, and improves with the playing. There is no one writing today who knows so well how o achieve the full vigor and sensuousness of the orchestra as Strauss, or to uild so tumultuous a climax.

But it was Sanroma's playing of the Rachmaninoff concerto that demanded most attention. A season ago he played a Rachmaninoff concerto with the People's orchestra. Whether it was this one or another, we do not remember, but since then his playing has improved immeasurably, and last night there was more firmness and power than he had a year ago. He played the virtuoso passages brilliantly and with an immense eclat, and in the adagio he played with fire and imaginativeness. An excellent thing, this sombre, charging, and sometimes sentimental Rachmaninoff concerto, for a pianist to test his powers with, and Sanroma acquitted himself with dis-

G 166

TELEPHONE LIBERTY 4000

SANROMA APPEARS AS PIANO SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

A brilliant performance of the Rakoczy March, in great contrast to the preceding fairy-like Ballet of the Sylphs, from "The Damnation of Faust," by Berlioz, won great applause at the second concert in the new historical series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. The selections were for the most part in a lighter vein.

A foreword by Prof. Walter R. Spalding preceded the program which opened with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." The delicate shading of Serge Koussevitzky's direction and the haunting melody of the two movements of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony contributed to the enjoyment of this favorite work.

On the second portion of the program was the exquisitely delicate Scherzo from Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

Jesus Sanroma, piano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave half a dozen excerpts from Schumann's "Carnaval" group. He played with fervent unconcern and was heartily received.

Conductor Koussevitzky did himself proud in "Les Preludes," Symphonic poem No. 3 by Liszt. As in the Schubert number, there is in this work a recurrent melody in addition to rich passages calling for volume and brilliance, both of which qualities stood out in yesterday's performance.

REPEATS STRAUSS

Casalls, Master Cellist, New Year's Day Soloist

Post — Jan 2

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

An altogether welcome repetition of Strauss' "Alpine Symphony," the appearance of that excellent 'cellist, Pablo Casals, as soloist in Haydn's D major Concerto, and an electrifying performance of Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"—such was the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon.

WORTH GROWS ON HEARER

To record a personal experience and opinion, a third hearing of the "Alpine Symphony" deepens first impressions of the music's worth while it lessens those of the music's weakness. To this end, yesterday, the performance itself, a performance truly magnificent, brilliant and eloquent beyond all praise, not unnaturally contributed; for remarkable as the original performances seemed, that of yesterday surpassed them at every point. But the truth of the matter is that a piece of the length and the complexity of the "Alpine Symphony" may scarcely be justly appraised upon one or even upon two hearings. To be sure, Strauss' melodic and harmonic idiom are, in the light of later musical developments, eminently simple and straightforward, but only when something like familiarity with it is attained may such a bulk of music be heard to full appreciation.

As on other occasions Strauss seemed yesterday in this "Alpine Symphony" to be least successful when he would be realistic. The cow-bell episode is overdone, unduly prolonged; the music of the waterfall, scintillating though it is, is inherently empty; the fanfares of hunting horns, heard yesterday from behind the stage, are a bit incongruous; the storm, for all its terrifying racket, is less truly suggestive of the wildness of the elements than is that in Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, to say nothing of the tempest that begins Wagner's "Die Walkure"; it is indeed hardly more than the storm of Rossini's "William Tell" Overture, tremendously inflated. But, broadly considered, the "Alpine Symphony" contains a deal of noble and beautiful music, its architecture is superb, its instrumentation nothing short of marvelous.

Truly, as conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky is inexhaustible. From the orchestra yesterday he obtained a performance of Berlioz' Overture that Hector of the flaming locks would himself have rejoiced to hear, a performance rich in dramatic contrasts, now warmly songful, now of blinding brilliance. Yet from this feat of conductorial virtuosity he could turn to Haydn's gentle Concerto and give to Casals an accompaniment as poised [illegible] balanced, as delicate and finished [illegible] playing.

CASALS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe — Jan 2

Michael Press to Conduct Concerts of Jan 15 and 16

Pablo Casals as soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert played the 'cello in a Haydn concerto with the marvellous artistry that has long caused him to be universally regarded by all persons qualified to judge as one of the few living performers of the very first rank.

No other 'cellist equals him, no performer on any instrument surpasses him, not even Kreisler, not even Paderewski. It is curious that the general public has never fully realized the esteem in which Casals is held by musicians.

The rest of the program included a repetition of Strauss' "Alpine Symphony" played at the concerts of Dec 18 and 19, and a curiously noisy and ineffective performance of Berlioz' overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

The programs carried the announcement, not hitherto released for publication, that Michael Press will conduct the next pair of Symphony concerts, as "guest." Next week the orchestra visits New York, so the dates will be Jan 15 and 16.

"And who is Michael Press?" The question is pardonable, and the only discreet answer is that we shall know after we have heard him conduct. From 1901 until the Russian Revolution he was professor of violin playing in the Moscow Conservatory. It is said that he has since conducted in Sweden and elsewhere, but nobody hereabouts seems to have heard much of it or of him. He conducted as guest a single concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Philadelphia not long ago. This orchestra is not to be confused with the Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski, conductor.

The only apparent reason for asking a musician practically unknown as a conductor to lead the Boston Symphony is Mr Koussevitzky's desire and need for two weeks' vacation. Eugene Goossens, well-known English conductor now leading the new Rochester, N Y, Orchestra, was long ago engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony concerts of Jan 22 and 23.

This was announced in November. But Mr Press' engagement was not announced until now. It is to be assumed that his abilities as conductor deserve the high and unprecedented compliment the trustees of the orchestra have paid him. The only guest conductors at these concerts have been Vincent d'Indy, Bruno Walter, George Schneevoight and Henry Hadley, in 45 seasons. It is to be noted that Maj Higginson, except when d'Indy conducted a program chiefly of his own compositions, in 1905, permitted no guest conductors.

Mr Casals yesterday played Haydn's music with elegance of phrasing, subtlety of nuances, the utmost polish of style, and yet with a relish. One hoped the local singers and players in the audience noted as a model of perfect musicianship this performance.

When the orchestra repeated phrases of Haydn that Mr Casale had just previously played the undistinguished character of the interpretation it gave was somewhat of a shock to those who still vividly remember how the whole Boston Symphony Orchestra, before it became a casualty of the World War, once played Haydn and Mozart under Dr Muck. The whole orchestra then played almost as musically as Casals did yesterday, in such music.

Mr Koussevitzky's qualities shone to far better advantage in the swelling rhythms and almost megalomaniac sonorities of Strauss, whose "Alpine Symphony" again seemed to be a work with every musical quality save melodic, or, more precisely, thematic, invention.

One wondered why a conductor capable he has repeatedly shown in his two seasons here of remarkably brilliant performances of Berlioz should have made such a noisy botch out of the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture. But the trouble probably is that Mr Koussevitzky, who puts tremendous nervous energy into his work, is tired and in real need of the vacation the two weeks of guest conductors will afford him.

P. R.

---

gorgeous color and of emotionalism, that made them, in each other's company, lose lustre.

If only, for instance, the lovely symphony had followed, not Weber, but Bach, or any of those early masters Mr. Koussevitzky deals with so happily! If Brahms at his ruggedest, not Shubert, had paved the way for those wanton sylphs, they would have danced the more enchantingly. Mendelssohn and his clowns and fairies would have felt more at home with Beethoven than with any of his companions yesterday. And the cruelty of making Liszt sound his noisy march after Berlioz (and Mr. Koussevitzky) had roused a furore with his!

It all could not be helped; the concert was chronological. But the concert proved once more the futility of a "period" program. Too much romance itself can clog, let alone an overdose of romanticism. A page or two of late Stravinsky can never have sounded so well in its life as it would have sounded yesterday afternoon, a dash of bitter or sour to do away with too much sweetness.

R. R. G.

Symphony

CONDUCTOR GOES, VIRTUOSO COMES, FAMILIAR MUSIC

Transcript — Jan 2

SYMPHONY CONCERT OF PABLO CASALS

The Violoncellist in the Prime of His Powers Upon a Classic Concerto—For a Month Mr. Koussevitzky Takes Leave—Strauss's "Alpine Symphony" Repeated, Quickened and Intensified — Other Incidents

NOT UNTIL the end of January will Mr. Koussevitzky return to a symphony Concert of Friday afternoon. With the captains in the arts as well as with the captains of commerce, "winter vacations" are now becoming the custom in America. As the head of his profesion on this side of the Atlantic, Mr. Stokowski set the example in Philadelphia. Now, in degree, his brethren follow it. Either, like Mr. Koussevitzky, they arrange their own holiday or, like Mr. Damrosch, conduct through but half a season. Only a few old-fashioned souls, blessed with routined temperaments, like Mr. Stock in Chicago or Mr. Monteux through his years in Boston, may now bear the brunt of an unbroken round of concerts from October even unto April. No doubt conducting is becoming, in these days, an increasingly nervous business. If it happens to be "very personal," as it is with Mr. Koussevitzky or Mr. Stokowski, the strain of in-taking from the music and out-going upon orchestra and audience, tells, and relaxation becomes advisable, not to say imperative.

Certainly the conductor of the Boston Orchestra earns and deserves such release. Mr. Koussevitzky is not the man to husband himself upon any piece or upon any occasion. Besides, a hundred-odd concerts in seven months make a task of which, as European itinerant, he would never have dreamed. Yet with this mid-winter holiday he accomplishes it and ends the season by no means stripped and spent. His orchestra, as well, needs "the rest and change"; for he lays no light and sparing hand upon it; whereas the passing "guest" is strange and therefore in measure forbearing. At least he is "different" and the "personnel," though the program book but baldly lists it, remains intrinsically human. No doubt, it will make the best of Mr. Michael Press and Mr. Eugene Goossens who are to be substitutes at the subscription concerts for the absent leader. As for the audiences, being docile by nature and habit, they will take what is set before them asking few questions. At the least, Mr. Goossens is notable figure in the younger English generation—as conductor or composer a musician of spirit.

In no respect did Mr. Koussevitzky signalize his impending departure while the assembled company quite forgot that for a month it was farewelling him. He began the concert with Berlioz's Overture to the opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," and he ended it with Strauss's "Alpine Symphony," repeated within a fortnight. By the Overture the conductor did exactly what there was reason to expect. That is to say, at every turn he vivified and dramatized it, loosing his own spirit, intensifying Berlioz's design. The first measures sounded in mounting tumult; the sombre and stately melody of the Cardinal ascended from the orchestral depths and moved like a cavalcade of prelates. The wood-winds sang the amorous melody at a languorous pace and in the utmost richness of tone. So forth and so onward, alike with the succeeding tumults, the recurring chants d'amour, the returning Cardinal. Berlioz's imagining of a clamorous and sensuous Rome of the Renaissance stood revealed; he himself could hardly have kept the music at intenser beat. Yet only the more clearly the hearer perceived that he was setting down one tonal episode after the other rather than fusing and intertwining them; while the habitual detractors of Mr. Koussevitzky could sit content with their usual comment: "Everything that is slow, he takes more slowly; while every thing that is fast, he whips and speeds"—which in their chaste view is not the whole art of conducting.

Thrice and four times blessed among composers is Strauss. Before he puts pen to music-paper, he seems to know exactly what he wishes to say; to abound likewise in the means wherewith he will say it. When he has filled those staves with many notes, but with few "stage-directions," neither conductor nor orchestra, nor yet again the audience, may mistake the music. There opens the design unfolded and upbuilt; there are the tonal signs and symbols precisely distributed; thence outspring the mood and the suggestion, the picture or the passion, unescapable. By that rare virtue Strauss's tone-poems seldom miscarry in the concert-hall; while upon the remembering hearer they do but confirm the impression gained, retained and anticipated.

Consequently at a third hearing "An Alpine Symphony" sounded much as it had at a first or a second—save only where the personal equation of bettered performance entered. Yesterday, for example, those measures for the trumpets, which are as the very streaks of dawn upon mountain-slopes, sounded more clearly and characterizingly. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed [illegible] and vary the pace of that [illegible]

SECOND OF SYMPHONY MATINEES

Romantic Composers Given Fullest Due

Post — Jan 6

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Music of almost certain effect—conductor's "war-horses," if you choose—made the programme of yesterday's Symphony Concert, the second of the new Historical Series.

In short, the romantic composers yesterday had their innings, and in a concert that in the matter of performance gave them their fullest due.

BERLIOZ'S BALLET

The previous Tuesday afternoon, having brought the subscribers as far as Beethoven, Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday began with Weber of the "Euryanthe" overture, passed to Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and proceeded through two excerpts from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust" and the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music to Liszt's "Les Preludes." And, since no one of the short orchestral pieces of Schumann appealed sufficiently to Mr. Koussekitzky (although the overture to "Manfred" would not have been out of place in this company), that composer was represented by portions of the "Carnaval," played with insight and authority by Mr. Sanroma, now the established pianist of the orchestra.

Some will have it that Mr. Koussevitzky unduly dramatizes the "Unfinished" symphony, and, judged by certain standards of interpretation, mayhap he does. Nevertheless, forgetting for the moment tradition and association, does not the score itself call for the very treatment that Mr. Koussevitzky accords it? That it does, and that most emphatically, is, at least, the opinion of one reviewer.

Brilliant in the extreme was the performance yesterday of Weber's Overture and of Liszt's resounding, irresistibly effective, if thematically commonplace, tone-poem, hitherto unconducted here by Mr. Koussevitzky. Likewise, new from his hand, were the two Berlioz pieces, of which the stirring "Rakoczy March" proved the popular success of the concert, while that miracle of orchestral delicacy, the Ballet of the Sylphs, came yesterday, gossamer-like, from the orchestra. Beside it the Scherzo of Mendelssohn, deft as it is, inevitably sounded thick-voiced and but conventionally imaginative.

---

title [illegible] written after and not before the music? One is reminded of Ambros' anecdote about the virtuoso who wrote a new piano piece and confided to a friend that he was undecided whether to call it "The Falls of the Rhinde at Schaffhausen" or "Moonlight in the Sultan's Garden." Mr Sanroma yesterday played several excerpts from "Carnaval" with great refinement of style and beauty of tone, especially in lyric passages. His piano solo was very heartily and deservedly applauded. But if the listener found romantic emotion in the music, did not himself supply it?

The next concert in this series will be given Feb 9.

P. B.

---

task nobly carried out.

Monitor — Jan 13

Koussevitzky, Goossens and Reiner in New York

Special from Monitor Bureau

NEW YORK, Jan. 9—Two schoolmasters have come to town the past week, in the name of orchestral conductors: Fritz Reiner, teaching the deeper meanings of music, and Eugene Goossens, giving instruction in the outer forms. The first made a visit of but a night, bringing the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. The second moved here, bag and baggage, to stay a while as director of the concerts of the New York Symphony. Both won a distinct success with the parquet and boxes of Carnegie Hall, though neither caused anything more than a neutral reaction in that popularity barometer, the Carnegie balconies. They appealed to everything intellectual in the house, but hardly to everything sentimental.

The profounder of the two, Mr. Reiner, gave an especially impressive disclosure of himself interpreting a piece entitled "Dance Suite," by Bartok, on the evening of Jan. 6. The externalist, Mr. Goossens, submitted his artistic confession and apology in all clearness, by means of the "Sacre du Printemps" of Stravinsky, on the evening of Jan. 8. But Mr. Reiner, for all his penetration, seemed able to show only what was in the composer's thought when writing, and rather powerless to tell what was in his heart. Likewise Mr. Goossens, in spite of a most charming lightness of touch, did no more than reproduce the composer's melodic contours correctly and set off one harmonic mass against another in just balance and proportion; he scarcely ever heightened the picture with an accent of emotion.

That is how it must be, no doubt, when conductors appear before the public as candidates. For they may all be presumed to aspire to a New York call of a more or less permanent sort. When they would account well for themselves, they must needs display their knowledge, but must keep their feeling to themselves. Performances, indeed, like Mr. Reiner's and Mr. Goossens' become a sort of examination. The parquet and boxes, which are done with tests and ratings on their own account but may be supposed to like the theory of them, report favorably; the balconies, which are still under academic oversight or not far escaped from it, answer non-committally.

Came Serge Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Carnegie Hall on the evening of Jan. 7, a Reiner for the deeper meanings and a Goossens for the outer forms, and something else besides. Not that Mr. Koussevitzky undertook on this occasion to start the balconies going. But truly, there was a good deal in addition to the cold philosophy and the physical outlines of the tone art in his presentations of Copland's "Music for the Theater" and Strauss' "Alpine" symphony. What a novel idea, to set off the latest conceit of the modern small orchestra school of composing against the final one of the old grand orchestra school! Is there, by the way, something ever so slightly New England about that Copland piece? Something, too, slightly of the western prairies? Just a hearsay hint, let us allow. The American orchestral composer is without question on his way. He never came in the old German orchestra, nor in the old four-movement symphony. He'll find himself a wagon, though, to ride in one of these days.

---

new this season. Both the luxuriant and vigorous Steinberg setting for the Sonata of Galliard, and the Alpine Symphony have been on regular symphony programs, the Strauss twice.

The Alpine Symphony is rapidly becoming one of Mr. Koussevitzky's chefs-d'ouvres, and despite its obvious journeymanship, its borrowings both from Wagner and an earlier and more spontaneous Strauss, it plays well, and improves with the playing. There is no one writing today who knows so well how to achieve the full vigor and sensuousness of the orchestra as Strauss, or to build so tumultuous a climax.

But it was Sanroma's playing of the Rachmaninoff concerto that demanded most attention. A season ago he played a Rachmaninoff concerto with the People's orchestra. We do not [illegible] was this one or another, but since then his playing has improved immeasurably, and last night there were more firmness and power than he had a year ago. He played the virtuoso passages brilliantly and with an immense eclat, and in the adagio he played with fire and imaginativeness. An excellent thing, this sombre, charging, and sometimes sentimental Rachmaninoff concerto, for a pianist to test his powers with, and Sanroma acquitted himself with dis-

SIDE BY SIDE AND ALSO IN CONTRAST A ROMANTICAL SIX

Transcript JAN 6

THE PLEASURES OF A SYMPHONIC AFTERNOON

Mr. Koussevitzky from Weber and Berlioz to Schubert and Schumann—Liszt and Mendelssohn as Well—The Conductor in New Tasks and Accomplishment—"Old Hat" Made Alive Again—Impressions from the Process

FORTUNATELY Mr. Koussevitzy has not fallen into the habit that obsesses Mr. Damrosch's present years. The Bostonian conductor does not address the audience about the music in hand, cracking jokes, and pseudo-jokes, along the way. Perhaps he regards discourse as superfluous when composers through an orchestra are about to speak for themselves. Not everyone, however, at Symphony Hall has attained this wisdom. Consequently, since the concerts of Tuesday afternoons run in a chronological sequence of composers, a "short foreword" must precede the pieces. Professor Spalding of Harvard spoke it yesterday as announcer for Herren Weber, Schubert, Schumann and Mendelssohn, Messieurs Berlioz and Liszt. In succinct sentences he arrayed their ways and works; while, speaking of their warmer instrumentation, he found at last an apt adjective for the clarinet. The "passionate" clarinet was his label. In spite of this find, it was Professor Spalding's misfortune to end exactly where he began. "You have only to listen to the music," he concluded, "to enjoy it." Even so, thought we others who prefer the sound of trumpet and shawm to any babble of tongue at a symphony concert.

Besides, if ever music spoke for itself—with now and then a helpful programnote—it was the numbers that Mr. Koussevitzky had arrayed. He began his exposition of the romantic composers (as they call it in Cambridge) with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," in which conductor and orchestra both excel. Again it was thrill to hear them spring into the opening fanfaronade; to listen to their stately hymning of "Ich bau' auf Gott und meine Euryanthe"; to feel the warmth of the amorous song. Then the descending hush; the vaporous Largo of ghostly vision; the fresh leap into driving rhythms and sonorities outflung. As the rider feels the dart of his horse at the prick of the spur, so the listener heard the orchestra quickening to the music at the uptake of Mr. Koussevitzky's hand. And in this Overture is half at least of the romantic gospel—the ardors and the vigors, the passion and the parade, the richness and the flamboyance, the range from heart-filling song to ear-filling frenzy, with "mystery" tucked appositely between. Weber may now live in the concert-hall by only three overtures; but Mon Dieu! (as the French say) how he lives—if only there is a romanticist to play him.

One companion-piece stood a bit further down the program; the other brought the end; while in both Mr. Koussevitzky had not previously been heard in Boston. The first was the "Rákóczy March" from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," preceded by the Dance of the Sylphs, which the conductor took lightly and simply, without the over-artful whisper and quiver of vanishing wings which was one of Dr. Muck's technical feats. Upon the March Mr. Koussevitzky wreaked himself magnificently. He both measured and whipped the rhythms; both proportioned and magnified the sonorities; attained at last to Berlioz's delirium of sound. Old hat, for most of us, the "Rákóczy March" has been these many years. And here it was alive again, striding and pounding, apotheosis once more of romantic and musical frenzy. Before he quits Boston, Mr. Kossevitzky should set hand to the whole "Damnation of Faust." Similarly, he might revivify it.

The other companion-piece was Liszt's "Preludes." As the "Rákóczy March" set the listener craving more Berlioz from the conductor, so the tone-poem made him eager for more Liszt. There is no other way to play "Preludes" than to wade into the music up to the middle, up to the neck. Merely to paddle in it is to reduce it to sandy shallows. Sound the trumpets, smite the drums, clash the cymbals, which is to say accept the Lisztian tumults in good faith and honest frenzy. They may be circus-music; but they are circus-music that can still be made to emit romantical shouts and tumble about in romantical torrents. By the same token, lay on and spare not when Liszt sighs like an amorous furnace or meditates—surrounded by a full band—upon the charms of nature. The melodies may not be too much; but the romantic emotion is still there, waiting to be squeezed forth. Above Liszt's other tone-poems, "Preludes" is the climax of romantical excess—the apotheosis of tonal shoddy bedevilled into tonal glory, of a kind. Not to play it with that excess is to strangle the music. Dr. Muck knew how; Mr. Mengelberg knows how; Mr. Koussevitzky, yesterday, was past master at it; but, unlike the possessed Dutchman, he kept the proportions.

There was inning also for the romantics with their fancies and their graces; while Schubert of the "Unfinished Symphony" was also led amongst them. The Scherzo from the incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" is good to hear especially in these days of a re-born and re-ascendent Mendelssohn, by common consent of conductors and audiences. Under Mr. Koussevitzky's hand, again it deployed its bright perfections; yet it is possible to imagine it played by a smaller orchestra, more lightly, more trippingly. Those seven-and-sixty strings are more than enough for such skipping, sportive music. Mr. Laurent's feathering flute might hardly withstand them. The little workaday band of a German municipal theater can make the Scherzo sound more Mendelssohnian. . . .

With the chosen piece from Schumann Mr. Koussevitzky belied expectations. Seemingly, having no overture or symphonic excerpt in readiness, he bade Mr. Sanromá play detached fragments of "Carnaval," probably for the first time in a concert in this town. Eleven minutes was the allotted duration; and from the beginning ("Préambule"); the middle ("Eusebius," "Florestan," "Coquette," "Chopin," "Harlequin and Columbine"); the end ("Pause" and the Davidsbündler March) conductor and pianist made choice. As it proved and as Mr. Sanromá skilfully spaced them, the scraps ran plausibly enough; exemplified fairly Schumann's fanciful and playful vein; while, thanks again to Mr. Sanromá, this interlude of the piano sounded by no means tamely, with orchestral pieces before and behind it. Moreover, not within memory has Mr. Sanromá played with such lustrous and edgeless tone, such technical aptness, such sensibility to the curve and the contents of the music. Toward young prime he steadily ripens.

The books call Schubert a romantic composer. The learned doctors when they are a-teaching or a-cataloguing confidently set him in that category. No doubt they are right—by the witness of his songs—and we pleasure-seekers may only bow before them. Yet some of us idlers prefer to think

---

SECOND MONDAY CONCERT

Post JAN 26

Koussevitzky Returns to Symphony From Vacation

Mr. Koussevitzsky returned to his post at Symphony Hall last evening to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the second of the Monday supplementary concerts. Apparantly greatly refreshed and reinvigorated by his brief vacation, he gave a stirring reading of Strauss' grandiloquent "Alpine" Symphony, repeated here for the third time.

The soloist was Jesus Sanroma of the orchestra, heard in Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto, and the other number, a delightful little Sonata of Galliard, transcribed for small orchestra by Steinberg.

AN ENSEMBLE ARTIST

Of Mr. Sanroma's pianistic skill and well-developed musicianship, it is hardly necessary to speak, least of all here in Boston, where he has made such an enviable name for himself, first at the New England Conservatory of Music, and later as a solo and ensemble artist with the Flute Players' Club, Boston and People's Symphonies, and other organizations. Wisely deciding against squandering his talents on solo concert work, he has chosen to qualify in the much more difficult field of ensemble playing. Consequently he is invariably musician first and pianist afterward.

On hearing the Concerto last night, one could only marvel at the taste and discrimination with which his vast technical powers were always kept subservient to the music itself. A romantic poem with real depths of feeling, the Concerto has seldom been so capably interpreted; even the few spots that are beginning to wear thin sounded fresh and new under the soloist's discreet glossing over.

Seldom has the applause for a young artist been so fervent or so well deserved. Boston may well be proud of Mr. Sanroma, not merely as a promising, but a ripened and accomplished musician.

BOSTO EVENING

a = News

From

SANROMA PLEASES WITH SYMPHON

Globe JAN 2

Koussevitzky Returns Orchestra After Rest

After a vacation of slightly m than a fortnight, Mr Koussevitzky turned to the rostrum of the Sympho Orchestra last evening to lead the ba in the second of the Monday even concerts. He was in a gay and excit mood. He fairly radiated smiles, gr ciously shared applause with his chestra at his first return for a bo and even administered a pleased pat the head to Jesus Sanroma, pianist the orchestra, who was soloist.

Mr Sanroma deserved even more, last evening his playing transcen any of the fine performances he given in the past. It was not with a great anticipation that one looked fo ward to Rachmaninoff's second c certo. The more credit to the piani then, that the playing cast about piece a glamor that made it seem spl did music.

The verve and vitality which Mr Sa roma always exhibits stood him in e ceeding good stead. So, too, the son ity which he is able to achieve witho pounding. Beyond and above these displayed a poetic feeling that he h not always shown, a lyric sympat that was just right in balance and tone. It has always been possible praise Mr Sanroma's rhythmic feeli With the added graces of last eveni he became a great pianist.

Nor was Mr Koussevitzky's acco paniment one whit behind. There w opportunity during the concerto to o serve how a willing and intelligent co ductor may mold his orchestra arou and about the solo instrument in su a way as to achieve at one and t same time the full beauties of the so part and the orchestral balance th so frequently is lost. To have not the careful, beautiful way in which t conductor brought in the wood-win after a quiet solo passage for the pian forte was in itself a revelation in conducting of a concerto.

The rest of the program consisted Steinberg's transcription for a lit orchestra of Galliard's Sonata in major and Strauss' "Alpine Symphon both pieces which have appeared the programs of the regular series t year.

The third hearing of the Stra music but serves to confirm a strengthen the first impression of clev ness in doing with little. As a cha to hear what a composer who is genius can do with two or three tremely slender themes, the piece w probably never fail to interest. Eve hearing reveals new brillianc beautiful, amusing or striking music falls short of several other works by Strauss.

EUGENE GOOSSENS

Herald JAN 24

Composer-Conductor, Begins First Symphony, Minus Cacophony

The orchestra had just finished the Debussy, or rather the intermittent measures of it that they had been playing at Mr. Goossens's instigation, and the visiting line had already begun to form outside of the green room. But because it was still quite early in the week, and because after all it was only a morning rehearsal, it wasn't a fatuous stream of impassioned laymen—and women. And we recognized, among others, Henry Hadley, who had just slipped in after his own rehearsal with the People's,

But then there came a slump in what seemed to us an endless procession, and Eugene Goossens, looking quite untouched by his morning's work, and amazingly energetic, sat by thte window and talked of music and other things, but chiefly of music. He said that he was delighted with the orchestra, "which has such a marvelous string section. Beautiful, sonorous tone! And I like the arrangement of it, the first and second violins together. I don't know who it was who first did away with the platform, but the effect isn't as good, although it's much simpler for travelling. And your wind section is excellent too, but especially the strings!

"This is the second big orchestra that I've conducted recently, as a guest. On Sunday I'm conducting something of my own at the League of Composers' concert. After that I go back to Rochester for the rest of the season. It's the first time that I've been here for a whole season. Before this Albert Coates had the orchestra at Rochester for for the second half. I'm very much interested in what they are doing there. It's really the only place of its kind. And besides conducting the orchestra, I'm head of the operatic department of the school as well, which takes practically all my time.

"But after the season is over I go to Europe for a month and work on my symphony. It will be my first, and really the first big thing that I've done, except for the Sinfonietta that I'm playing here. It's still in a very nebulous state, because just now I'm working on the orchestration of my one-act opera, 'Judith,' for which Arnold Bennett wrote the libretto. It's finished except for the orchestration. I don't know who is going to do it, but I think some one will soon. But it's almost impossible to do any creative writing when I'm conducting so much, although I've shut my brain off into water-tight compartments. I think that the only way to compose independently is to go off as Sibelius did, into complete isolation. Because no matter how one tries, it is almost impossible to be uninfluenced by what one hears, and by the times. And there are so many currents. There's the Schoenberg concert, and the Stravinsky current. And to conduct, one has to submerge himself in the music to really understand it. And after you've been playing Wagner and Strauss and Schoenberg, it's almost impossible to sit down and write without thinking in terms of them.

"All that I know as yet about my symphony is that it probably won't be considered revolutionary, and that it won't be programme music. Abstract. My thoughts up to the moment of writing. It's for a large orchestra. A composer doesn't sit down and say, now I'm going to write for a large orchestra, or for three solo instruments. It's the musical idea itself that determines the idiom and the form. Although at one time, in London, because I introduced quite a little modern music in my program I got the reputation for being revolutionary, I've never really been exclusively a modern. I don't think that to be great, music must be cacophonous, and I believe that each composer has to work out his own idiom. I'm beginning to find mine, and it certainly isn't either 'futurist' or 'vorticist.'

"Music is going through an uncertain, revolutionary stage just now, although it's beginning to come out of it, and individual composers are coming to the top. It's been the same in poetry, and in the plastic arts. All sorts of small movements, vorticism, cubism, intense mechanization. People are just beginning tounderstand and value Van Gogh and Gauguin now at their real worth! And it's the sam with Debussy, who changed the whole musical trend from German emotionalism to the tone painting of the impressionists. Sometimes one understands one's own art so much better through another. In painting, as in music there are the same fundamental aesthetics. There is form, color, design, and climax. And there has been the same experimentation in the plastic arts in the last 10 years or so that there has been in music.

"So many people go around saying that what music needs is another Bach, or another Beethoven. But the very changes in the orchestra forbid it. One can't retrogress, and it is as impossible for a composer today to write in the style of Beethoven as it was for Beethoven to write for a Wagnerian orchestra. The musician is the product of his age. Everything was going along very smoothly, and the musicians in the orchestra, having conquered the difficulties of Beethoven, thought that there was nothing harder. Then along came Wagner and Strauss, and swept them off their feet. An entirely new school of musicians came into being, who could play all of the intricacies of a Wagnerian score. And so on. And that is why the solo players are better now than they have ever been. That is also why, although it was also a reaction against the large orchestra, there is more writing for solo groups. Take the trumpets for instance. Where once they played only in octaves and fifths, they are now sometimes asked to play violin passages!

"And so it is absurd to cry for another Beethoven. Art must evolve and who knows what will happen in the next five years. Honnegger may or may not ultimately be considered the great French composer. Stravinsky and Schoenberg may be called greater than Bach or Beethoven. Although I doubt it. Perhaps the music of 10 years from now will be all rhythm, or all counterpoint. Where once it was entirely diatonic, music has become chromatic, every note carrying its own accidental, and the rhythm changing with each bar. Something must come out of all this.

"I don't believe in playing all-classical programs or all-modern ones. I think that a program should be representative, and that it should have a climax. Representative, so that the man in the street who comes into a concert hall for the first time will find at least one thing on the program that will make him say, 'Well, if they'll give me something like that next time, I'll come again.' That's one of the difficulties with the London public. There are very few musical laymen. There are the musicians and musical connoisseurs, and then there are the laymen who seem to be frightened of the concert halls, and there is no crossing of these magic circles.

"There isn't a better reader than the English orchestral musician, but there isn't the public, and there isn't enough money for rehearsals. Some time ago, just before I came to America, I happened to have a little money on hand, and so I got together the best musicians I could find in London. And I paid them for each of their rehearsals, and we gave a series of eight concerts; they were called 'Goosens concerts.' But that couldn't last. How can one expect to have a good orchestra, or anything of a performance, if there aren't at least three rehearsals? With three rehearsals, even the poorest orchestra can do something.

"It seemed very strange to me at first when I came here to see the symphony placed at the top of the program. I think that it is better to open with an overture, because people always take off their coats and arrange themselves during the first movement, and then, as I said before about art in general, there must be a climax. And I don't believe in long concerts. When I played with the Queens Hall orcehtsra, under Sir Henry Wood, we gave concerts of three hours each, but the strain on conductor and orchestra was very great, though the public (as usual) didn't cavil at good value for their money. That's when I did my first conducting, of my own compositions. I'd put my violin down on my chair and conduct, and then go back and play again for the rest of the concert. Sir Thomas Beecham saw me there and asked me to conduct operas for him. So in 1915 I put my violin in its case and have never taken it up again since.

"Will I ever give up conducting for composition? No, because I like interpreting too much. In a way I've been an interpreter since I was eight years old. When I was 15 I was familiar with the entire operatic repertoire up to Wagner. That was because of my father, who conducted the Carl Rosa Opera Company.

"Do you know why people are sometimes speechless in the face of a new idiom? Because they haven't kept in touch with what has gone before. It's only ignorance."

E.

SIDE BY SIDE AND ALSO IN CONTRAST A ROMANTICAL SIX

Transcript ~~JAN 6~~

THE PLEASURES OF A SYMPHONIC AFTERNOON

Mr. Koussevitzky from Weber and Berlioz to Schubert and Schumann—Liszt and Mendelssohn as Well—The Conductor in New Tasks and Accomplishment—"Old Hat" Made Alive Again—Impressions from the Process

FORTUNATELY Mr. Koussevitzy has not fallen into the habit that obsesses Mr. Damrosch's present years. The Bostonian conductor does not address the audience about the music in hand, cracking jokes, and pseudo-jokes, along the way. Perhaps he regards discourse as superfluous when composers through an orchestra are about to speak for themselves. Not everyone, however, at Symphony Hall has attained this wisdom. Consequently, since the concerts of Tuesday afternoons run in a chronological sequence of composers, a "short foreword" must precede the pieces. Professor Spalding of Harvard spoke it yesterday as announcer for Herren Weber, Schubert, Schumann and Mendelssohn. Messieurs Berlioz and Liszt. In succinct sentences he arrayed their ways and works; while, speaking of their warmer instrumentation, he found at last an apt adjective for the clarinet. The "passionate" clarinet was his label. In spite of this find, it was Professor Spalding's misfortune to end exactly where he began. "You have only to listen to the music," he concluded, "to enjoy it." Even so, thought we others who prefer the sound of trumpet and shawm to any babble of tongue at a symphony concert.

Besides, if ever music spoke for itself—with now and then a helpful program-note—it was the numbers that Mr. Koussevitzky had arrayed. He began his exposition of the romantic composers (as they call it in Cambridge) with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," in which conductor and orchestra both excel. Again it was thrill to hear them spring into the opening fanfaronade; to listen to their stately hymning of "Ich bau' auf Gott und meine Euryanthe"; to feel the warmth of the amorous song. Then the descending hush; the vaporous Largo of ghostly vision; the fresh leap into driving rhythms and sonorities outflung. As the rider feels the dart of his horse at the prick of the spur, so the listener heard the orchestra quickening to the music at the uptake of Mr. Koussevitzky's hand. And in this Overture is half at least of the romantic gospel—the ardors and the vigors, the passion and the parade, the richness and the flamboyance, the range from heart-filling song to ear-filling frenzy, with "mystery" tucked appositely between. Weber may now live in the concert-hall by only three overtures; but Mon Dieu! (as the French say) how he lives—if only there is a romanticist to play him.

One companion-piece stood a bit further down the program; the other brought the end; while in both Mr. Koussevitzky had not previously been heard in Boston. The first was the "Rákóczy March" from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," preceded by the Dance of the Sylphs, which the conductor took lightly and simply, without the over-artful whisper and quiver of vanishing wings which was one of Dr. Muck's technical feats. Upon the March Mr. Koussevitzky wreaked himself magnificently. He both measured and whipped the rhythms; both proportioned and magnified the sonorities; attained at last to Berlioz's delirium of sound. Old hat, for most of us, the "Rákóczy March" has been these many years. And here it was alive again, striding and pounding, apotheosis once more of romantic and musical frenzy. Before he quits Boston, Mr. Kossevitzky should set hand to the whole "Damnation of Faust." Similarly, he might revivify it.

The other companion-piece was Liszt's "Preludes." As the "Rákóczy March" set the listener craving more Berlioz from the conductor, so the tone-poem made him eager for more Liszt. There is no other way to play "Preludes" than to wade into the music up to the middle, up to the neck. Merely to paddle in it is to reduce it to sandy shallows. Sound the trumpets, smite the drums, clash the cymbals, which is to say accept the Lisztian tumults in good faith and honest frenzy. They may be circus-music; but they are circus-music that can still be made to emit romantical shouts and tumble about in romantical torrents. By the same token, lay on and spare not when Liszt sighs like an amorous furnace or meditates—surrounded by a full band—upon the charms of nature. The melodies may not be too much; but the romantic emotion is still there, waiting to be squeezed forth. Above Liszt's other tone-poems, "Preludes" is the climax of romantical excess—the apotheosis of tonal shoddy bedevilled into tonal glory, of a kind. Not to play it with that excess is to strangle the music. Dr. Muck knew how; Mr. Mengelberg knows how; Mr. Koussevitzky, yesterday, was past master at it; but, unlike the possessed Dutchman, he kept the proportions.

There was inning also for the romantics with their fancies and their graces; while Schubert of the "Unfinished Symphony" was also led amongst them. The Scherzo from the incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" is good to hear especially in these days of a re-born and re-ascendent Mendelssohn, by common consent of conductors and audiences. Under Mr. Koussevitzky's hand, again it deployed its bright perfections; yet it is possible to imagine it played by a smaller orchestra, more lightly, more trippingly. Those seven-and-sixty strings are more than enough for such skipping, sportive music. Mr. Laurent's feathering flute might hardly withstand them. The little workaday band of a German municipal theater can make the Scherzo sound more Mendelssohnian. . . .

With the chosen piece from Schumann Mr. Koussevitzky belied expectations. Seemingly, having no overture or symphonic excerpt in readiness, he bade Mr. Sanromá play detached fragments of "Carnaval," probably for the first time in a concert in this town. Eleven minutes was the allotted duration; and from the beginning ("Préambule"); the middle ("Eusebius," "Florestan," "Coquette," "Chopin," "Harlequin and Columbine"); the end ("Pause" and the Davidsbündler March) conductor and pianist made choice. As it proved and as Mr. Sanromá skilfully spaced them, the scraps ran plausibly enough; exemplified fairly Schumann's fanciful and playful vein; while, thanks again to Mr. Sanromá, this interlude of the piano sounded by no means tamely, with orchestral pieces before and behind it. Moreover, not within memory has Mr. Sanromá played with such lustrous and edgeless tone, such technical aptness, such sensibility to the curve and the contents of the music. Toward young prime he steadily ripens.

The books call Schubert a romantic composer. The learned doctors when they are a-teaching or a-cataloguing confidently set him in that category. No doubt they are right—by the witness of his songs—and we pleasure-seekers may only bow before them. Yet some of us idlers prefer to think

---

SECOND MONDAY CONCERT

Post ~~JAN 26~~

Koussevitzky Returns to Symphony From Vacation

Mr. Koussevitzsky returned to his post at Symphony Hall last evening to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the second of the Monday supplementary concerts. Apparantly greatly refreshed and reinvigorated by his brief vacation, he gave a stirring reading of Strauss' grandiloquent "Alpine" Symphony, repeated here for the third time.

The soloist was Jesus Sanroma of the orchestra, heard in Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto, and the other number, a delightful little Sonata of Galliard, transcribed for small orchestra by Steinberg.

AN ENSEMBLE ARTIST

Of Mr. Sanroma's pianistic skill and well-developed musicianship, it is hardly necessary to speak, least of all here in Boston, where he has made such an enviable name for himself, first at the New England Conservatory of Music, and later as a solo and ensemble artist with the Flute Players' Club, Boston and People's Symphonies, and other organizations. Wisely deciding against squandering his talents on solo concert work, he has chosen to qualify in the much more difficult field of ensemble playing. Consequently he is invariably musician first and pianist afterward.

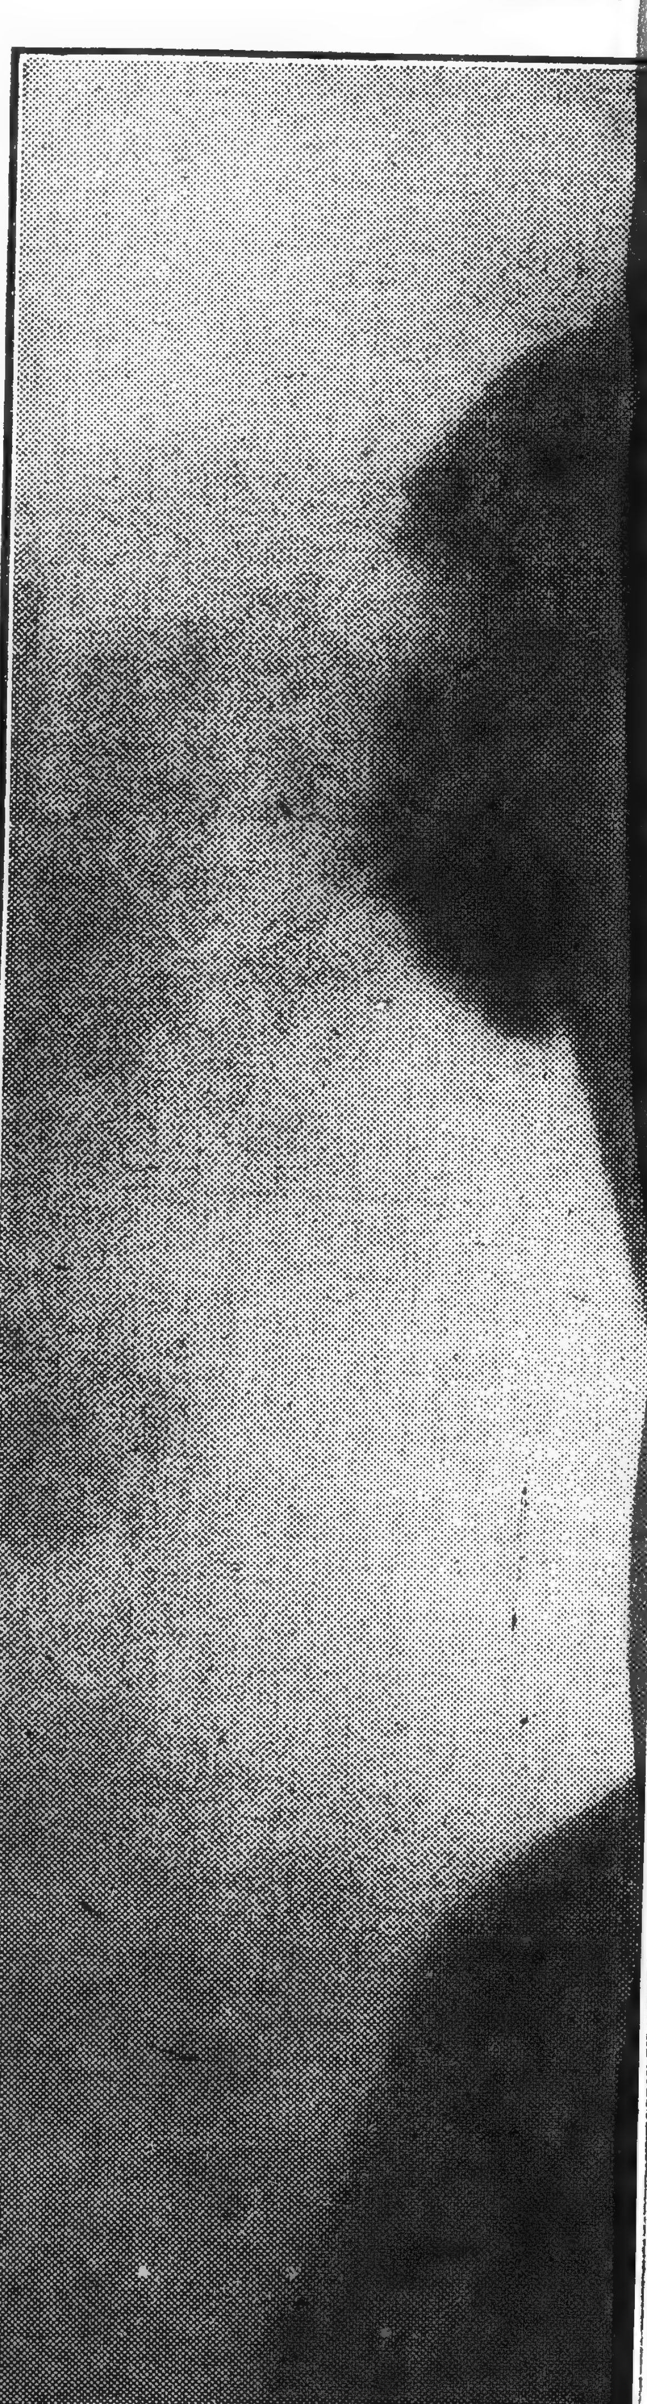
On hearing the Concerto last night, one could only marvel at the taste and discrimination with which his vast technical powers were always kept subservient to the music itself. A romantic poem with real depths of feeling, the Concerto has seldom been so capably interpreted; even the few spots that are beginning to wear thin sounded fresh and new under the soloist's discreet glossing over.

Seldom has the applause for a young artist been so fervent or so well deserved. Boston may well be proud of Mr. Sanroma, not merely as a promising, but a ripened and accomplished musician.

BOSTON EVENING

News

From



SANROMA PLEASES WITH SYMPHON

Globe ~~JAN 26~~

Koussevitzky Returns Orchestra After Rest

After a vacation of slightly mo than a fortnight, Mr Koussevitzky turned to the rostrum of the Sympho Orchestra last evening to lead the ba in the second of the Monday even concerts. He was in a gay and excit mood. He fairly radiated smiles, gr ciously shared applause with his o chestra at his first return for a bo and even administered a pleased pat the head to Jesus Sanroma, pianist the orchestra, who was soloist.

Mr Sanroma deserved even more, last evening his playing transcend any of the fine performances he h given in the past. It was not with an great anticipation tha, one looked for ward to Rachmaninoff's second co certo. The more credit to the piani then, that the playing cast about piece a glamor that made it seem spl did music.

The verve and vitality which Mr Sa roma always exhibits stood him in e ceeding good stead. So, too, the sono ity which he is able to achieve witho pounding. Beyond and above these displayed a poetic feeling that he h not always shown, a lyric sympat that was just right in balance and tone. It has always been possible praise Mr Sanroma's rhythmic feelin With the added graces of last eveni he became a great pianist.

Nor was Mr Koussevitzky's acco paniment one whit behind. There w opportunity during the concerto to o serve how a willing and intelligent co ductor may mold his orchestra arou and about the solo instrument in su a way as to achieve at one and t same time the full beauties of the so part and the orchestral balance th so frequently is lost. To have not the careful, beautiful way in which t conductor brought in the wood-win after a quiet solo passage for the pian forte was in itself a revelation in t conducting of a concerto.

The rest of the program consisted Steinberg's transcription for a lit orchestra of Galliard's Sonata in major and Strauss' "Alpine Symphon both pieces which have appeared the programs of the regular series t year.

The third hearing of the Stra music but serves to confirm a strengthen the first impression of clev ness in doing with little. As a char to hear what a composer who is genius can do with two or three tremely slender themes, the piece w probably never fail to interest. Eve hearing reveals new brillianc beautiful, amusing or striking music falls short of several other works by Strauss.

EUGENE GOOSSENS

Herald ~~JAN 24~~

Composer-Conductor, Begins First Symphony, Minus Cacophony

The orchestra had just finished the Debussy, or rather the intermittent measures of it that they had been playing at Mr. Goossens's instigation, and the visiting line had already begun to form outside of the green room. But because it was still quite early in the week, and because after all it was only a morning rehearsal, it wasn't a fatuous stream of impassioned laymen—and women. And we recognized, among others, Henry Hadley, who had just slipped in after his own rehearsal with the People's,

But then there came a slump in what seemed to us an endless procession, and Eugene Goossens, looking quite untouched by his morning's work, and amazingly energetic, sat by thte window and talked of music and other things, but chiefly of music. He said that he was delighted with the orchestra, "which has such a marvelous string section. Beautiful, sonorous tone! And I like the arrangement of it, the first and second violins together. I don't know who it was who first did away with the platform, but the effect isn't as good, although it's much simpler for travelling. And your wind section is excellent too, but especially the strings!

"This is the second big orchestra that I've conducted recently, as a guest. On Sunday I'm conducting something of my own at the League of Composers' concert. After that I go back to Rochester for the rest of the season. It's the first time that I've been here for a whole season. Before this Albert Coates had the orchestra at Rochester for for the second half. I'm very much interested in what they are doing there. It's really the only place of its kind. And besides conducting the orchestra, I'm head of the operatic department of the school as well, which takes practically all my time.

"But after the season is over I go to Europe for a month and work on my symphony. It will be my first, and really the first big thing that I've done, except for the Sinfonietta that I'm playing here. It's still in a very nebulous state, because just now I'm working on the orchestration of my one-act opera, 'Judith,' for which Arnold Bennett wrote the libretto. It's finished except for the orchestration. I don't know who is going to do it, but I think some one will soon. But it's almost impossible to do any creative writing when I'm conducting so much, although I've shut my brain off into water-tight compartments. I think that the only way to compose independently is to go off as Sibelius did, into complete isolation. Because no matter how one tries, it is almost impossible to be uninfluenced by what one hears, and by the times. And there are so many currents. There's the Schoenberg concert, and the Stravinsky current. And to conduct, one has to submerge himself in the music to really understand it. And after you've been playing Wagner and Strauss and Schoenberg, it's almost impossible to sit down and write without thinking in terms of them.

"All that I know as yet about my symphony is that it probably won't be considered revolutionary, and that it won't be programme music. Abstract. My thoughts up to the moment of writing. It's for a large orchestra: A composer doesn't sit down and say, now I'm going to write for a large orchestra, or for three solo instruments. It's the musical idea itself that determines the idiom and the form. Although at one time, in London, because I introduced quite a little modern music in my program I got the reputation for being revolutionary. I've never really been exclusively a modern. I don't think that to be great, music must be cacophonous, and I believe that each composer has to work out his own idiom. I'm beginning to find mine, and it certainly isn't either 'futurist' or 'vorticist.'

"Music is going through an uncertain, revolutionary stage just now, although it's beginning to come out of it, and individual composers are coming to the top. It's been the same in poetry, and in the plastic arts. All sorts of small movements, vorticism, cubism, intense mechanization. People are just beginning tounderstand and value Van Gogh and Gauguin now at their real worth! And it's the same with Debussy, who changed the whole musical trend from German emotionalism to the tone painting of the impressionists. Sometimes one understands one's own art so much better through another. In painting, as in music there are the same fundamental aesthetics. There is form, color, design, and climax. And there has been the same experimentation in the plastic arts in the last 10 years or so that there has been in music.

"So many people go around saying that what music needs is another Bach, or another Beethoven. But the very changes in the orchestra forbid it. One can't retrogress, and it is as impossible for a composer today to write in the style of Beethoven as it was for Beethoven to write for a Wagnerian orchestra. The musician is the product of his age. Everything was going along very smoothly, and the musicians in the orchestra, having conquered the difficulties of Beethoven, thought that there was nothing harder. Then along came Wagner and Strauss, and swept them off their feet. An entirely new school of musicians came into being, who could play all of the intricacies of a Wagnerian score. And so on. And that is why the solo players are better now than they have ever been. That is also why, although it was also a reaction against the large orchestra, there is more writing for solo groups. Take the trumpets for instance. Where once they played only in octaves and fifths, they are now sometimes asked to play violin passages!

"And so it is absurd to cry for another Beethoven. Art must evolve and who knows what will happen in the next five years. Honnegger may or may not ultimately be considered the great French composer. Stravinsky and Schoenberg may be called greater than Bach or Beethoven. Although I doubt it. Perhaps the music of 10 years from now will be all rhythm, or all counterpoint. Where once it was entirely diatonic, music has become chromatic, every note carrying its own accidental, and the rhythm changing with each bar. Something must come out of all this.

"I don't believe in playing all-classical programs or all-modern ones. I think that a program should be representative, and that it should have a climax. Representative, so that the man in the street who comes into a concert hall for the first time will find at least one thing on the program that will make him say, 'Well, if they'll give me something like that next time, I'll come again.' That's one of the difficulties with the London public. There are very few musical laymen. There are the musicians and musical connoisseurs, and then there are the laymen who seem to be frightened of the concert halls, and there is no crossing of these magic circles.

"There isn't a better reader than the English orchestral musician, but there isn't the public, and there isn't enough money for rehearsals. Some time ago, just before I came to America, I happened to have a little money on hand, and so I got together the best musicians I could find in London. And I paid them for each of their rehearsals, and we gave a series of eight concerts; they were called 'Goosens concerts.' But that couldn't last. How can one expect to have a good orchestra, or anything of a performance, if there aren't at least three rehearsals? With three rehearsals, even the poorest orchestra can do something.

"It seemed very strange to me at first when I came here to see the symphony placed at the top of the program. I think that it is better to open with an overture, because people always take off their coats and arrange themselves during the first movement, and then, as I said before about art in general, there must be a climax. And I don't believe in long concerts. When I played with the Queens Hall orcehtsra, under Sir Henry Wood, we gave concerts of three hours each, but the strain on conductor and orchestra was very great, though the public (as usual) didn't cavil at good value for their money. That's when I did my first conducting, of my own compositions. I'd put my violin down on my chair and conduct, and then go back and play again for the rest of the concert. Sir Thomas Beecham saw me there and asked me to conduct operas for him. So in 1915 I put my violin in its case and have never taken it up again since.

"Will I ever give up conducting for composition? No, because I like interpreting too much. In a way I've been an interpreter since I was eight years old. When I was 15 I was familiar with the entire operatic repertoire up to Wagner. That was because of my father, who conducted the Carl Rosa Opera Company.

"Do you know why people are sometimes speechless in the face of a new idiom? Because they haven't kept in touch with what goes before. It's only ignorance."

E.

SIDE BY SIDE AND ALSO IN CONTRAST A ROMANTICAL SIX

Transcript JAN 6

THE PLEASURES OF A SYMPHONIC AFTERNOON

Mr. Koussevitzky from Weber and Berlioz to Schubert and Schumann—Liszt and Mendelssohn as Well—The Conductor in New Tasks and Accomplishment—"Old Hat" Made Alive Again—Impressions from the Process

FORTUNATELY Mr. Koussevitzy has not fallen into the habit that obsesses Mr. Damrosch's present years. The Bostonian conductor does not address the audience about the music in hand, cracking jokes, and pseudo-jokes, along the way. Perhaps he regards discourse as superfluous when composers through an orchestra are about to speak for themselves. Not everyone, however, at Symphony Hall has attained this wisdom. Consequently, since the concerts of Tuesday afternoons run in a chronological sequence of composers, a "short foreword" must precede the pieces. Professor Spalding of Harvard spoke it yesterday as announcer for Herren Weber, Schubert, Schumann and Mendelssohn, Messieurs Berlioz and Liszt. In succinct sentences he arrayed their ways and works; while, speaking of their warmer instrumentation, he found at last an apt adjective for the clarinet. The "passionate" clarinet was his label. In spite of this find, it was Professor Spalding's misfortune to end exactly where he began. "You have only to listen to the music," he concluded, "to enjoy it." Even so, thought we others who prefer the sound of trumpet and shawm to any babble of tongue at a symphony concert.

Besides, if ever music spoke for itself—with now and then a helpful program-note—it was the numbers that Mr. Koussevitzky had arrayed. He began his exposition of the romantic composers (as they call it in Cambridge) with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," in which conductor and orchestra both excel. Again it was thrill to hear them spring into the opening fanfaronade; to listen to their stately hymning of "Ich bau' auf Gott und meine Euryanthe"; to feel the warmth of the amorous song. Then the descending hush; the vaporous Largo of ghostly vision; the fresh leap into driving rhythms and sonorities outflung. As the rider feels the dart of his horse at the prick of the spur, so the listener heard the orchestra quickening to the music at the uptake of Mr. Koussevitzky's hand. And in this Overture is half at least of the romantic gospel—the ardors and the vigors, the passion and the parade, the richness and the flamboyance, the range from heart-filling song to ear-filling frenzy, with "mystery" tucked appositely between. Weber may now live in the concert-hall by only three overtures; but Mon Dieu! (as the French say) how he lives—if only there is a romanticist to play him.

One companion-piece stood a bit further down the program; the other brought the end; while in both Mr. Koussevitzky had not previously been heard in Boston. The first was the "Rákóczy March" from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," preceded by the Dance of the Sylphs, which the conductor took lightly and simply, without the over-artful whisper and quiver of vanishing wings which was one of Dr. Muck's technical feats. Upon the March Mr. Koussevitzky wreaked himself magnificently. He both measured and whipped the rhythms; both proportioned and magnified the sonorities; attained at last to Berlioz's delirium of sound. Old hat, for most of us, the "Rákóczy March" has been these many years. And here it was alive again, striding and pounding, apotheosis once more of romantic and musical frenzy. Before he quits Boston, Mr. Kossevitzky should set hand to the whole "Damnation of Faust." Similarly, he might revivify it.

The other companion-piece was Liszt's "Preludes." As the "Rákóczy March" set the listener craving more Berlioz from the conductor, so the tone-poem made him eager for more Liszt. There is no other way to play "Preludes" than to wade into the music up to the middle, up to the neck. Merely to paddle in it is to reduce it to sandy shallows. Sound the trumpets, smite the drums, clash the cymbals, which is to say accept the Lisztian tumults in good faith and honest frenzy. They may be circus-music; but they are circus-music that can still be made to emit romantical shouts and tumble about in romantical torrents. By the same token, lay on and spare not when Liszt sighs like an amorous furnace or meditates—surrounded by a full band—upon the charms of nature. The melodies may not be too much; but the romantic emotion is still there, waiting to be squeezed forth. Above Liszt's other tone-poems, "Preludes" is the climax of romantical excess—the apotheosis of tonal shoddy-bedevilled into tonal glory, of a kind. Not to play it with that excess is to strangle the music. Dr. Muck knew how; Mr. Mengelberg knows how; Mr. Koussevitzky, yesterday, was past master at it; but, unlike the possessed Dutchman, he kept the proportions.

There was inning also for the romantics with their fancies and their graces; while Schubert of the "Unfinished Symphony" was also led amongst them. The Scherzo from the incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" is good to hear especially in these days of a re-born and re-ascendent Mendelssohn, by common consent of conductors and audiences. Under Mr. Koussevitzky's hand, again it deployed its bright perfections; yet it is possible to imagine it played by a smaller orchestra, more lightly, more trippingly. Those seven-and-sixty strings are more than enough for such skipping, sportive music. Mr. Laurent's feathering flute might hardly withstand them. The little workaday band of a German municipal theater can make the Scherzo sound more Mendelssohnian. . . .

With the chosen piece from Schumann Mr. Koussevitzky belied expectations. Seemingly, having no overture or symphonic excerpt in readiness, he bade Mr. Sanromá play detached fragments of "Carnaval," probably for the first time in a concert in this town. Eleven minutes was the allotted duration; and from the beginning ("Préambule"); the middle ("Eusebius," "Florestan," "Coquette," "Chopin," "Harlequin and Columbine"); the end ("Pause" and the Davidsbündler March) conductor and pianist made choice. As it proved and as Mr. Sanromá skilfully spaced them, the scraps ran plausibly enough; exemplified fairly Schumann's fanciful and playful vein; while, thanks again to Mr. Sanromá, this interlude of the piano sounded by no means tamely, with orchestral pieces before and behind it. Moreover, not within memory has Mr. Sanromá played with such lustrous and edgeless tone, such technical aptness, such sensibility to the curve and the contents of the music. Toward young prime he steadily ripens.

The books call Schubert a romantic composer. The learned doctors when they are a-teaching or a-cataloguing confidently set him in that category. No doubt they are right—by the witness of his songs—and we pleasure-seekers may only bow before them. Yet some of us idlers prefer to think of the orchestral Schubert—and the Schubert of the finer chamber-music—as an isolated genius, above and beyond classification and kindred academic pastimes. In our wilfulness, we also prefer to think of him as a composer who sang—in symphonies finished or unfinished—out of a full heart, an eager spirit, an answering hand. We would rather not have him decked in the romantic trappings—ardors, glooms, ecstasies; pangs, visions, stresses; the whole baggage of a troubled, aspiring soul. Rather let him sit in the sunshine or the shadow and sing his heart out; while we overhearers listen rapt. In fact, our quarrel with Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the "Unfinished Symphony" is that he will have it a highly intensified, romantical music. For the entrance of every theme the conductor would have us stir with expectation; while when and if it returns, we must await it all a-quiver. Moreover, when it bourgeons into melody, that melody must be charged with sentiment and cumulated into emotion. As for modulations, and as the conductor will have them "every little movement has a meaning all its own." Now all this may be the romantical-tragic Schubert; but it is not the Schubert who, singing down a century, has turned to water the hearts of the sons of men.

H. T. P.

BOSTO EVENING TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, JANUARY 14, 1926

—News of the Playwrigh

From One Russian to Another

Michael Press

the Symphony Concerts To-morrow and Saturday

SANROMA PLEASES WITH SYMPHONY

Globe JAN 26

Koussevitzky Returns to Orchestra After Rest

After a vacation of slightly more than a fortnight, Mr Koussevitzky returned to the rostrum of the Symphony Orchestra last evening to lead the band in the second of the Monday evening concerts. He was in a gay and excited mood. He fairly radiated smiles, graciously shared applause with his orchestra at his first return for a bow, and even administered a pleased pat on the head to Jesus Sanroma, pianist of the orchestra, who was soloist.

Mr Sanroma deserved even more, for last evening his playing transcended any of the fine performances he has given in the past. It was not with any great anticipation that one looked forward to Rachmaninoff's second concerto. The more credit to the pianist, then, that the playing cast about the piece a glamor that made it seem splendid music.

The verve and vitality which Mr Sanroma always exhibits stood him in exceeding good stead. So, too, the sonority which he is able to achieve without pounding. Beyond and above these he displayed a poetic feeling that he has not always shown, a lyric sympathy that was just right in balance and in tone. It has always been possible to praise Mr Sanroma's rhythmic feeling. With the added graces of last evening he became a great pianist.

Nor was Mr Koussevitzky's accompaniment one whit behind. There was opportunity during the concerto to observe how a willing and intelligent conductor may mold his orchestra around and about the solo instrument in such a way as to achieve at one and the same time the full beauties of the solo part and the orchestral balance that so frequently is lost. To have noted the careful, beautiful way in which the conductor brought in the wood-winds after a quiet solo passage for the pianoforte was in itself a revelation in the conducting of a concerto.

The rest of the program consisted of Steinberg's transcription for a little orchestra of Galliard's Sonata in G major and Strauss' "Alpine Symphony," both pieces which have appeared on the programs of the regular series year.

The third hearing of the Str music but serves to confirm strengthen the first impression of cle ness in doing with little. As a cha to hear what a composer who genius can do with two or three tremely slender themes, the piece probably never fail to interest. Ev hearing reveals new brilliancies. beautiful, amusing or striking music falls short of several other works Strauss.

SIDE BY SIDE AND ALSO IN CONTRAST A ROMANTICAL SIX

Transcript Jan 6

THE PLEASURES OF A SYMPHONIC AFTERNOON

Mr. Koussevitzky from Weber and Berlioz to Schubert and Schumann—Liszt and Mendelssohn as Well—The Conductor in New Tasks and Accomplishment—"Old Hat" Made Alive Again—Impressions from the Process

FORTUNATELY Mr. Koussevitzy has not fallen into the habit that obsesses Mr. Damrosch's present years. The Bostonian conductor does not address the audience about the music in hand, cracking jokes, and pseudo-jokes, along the way. Perhaps he regards discourse as superfluous when composers through an orchestra are about to speak for themselves. Not everyone, however, at Symphony Hall has attained this wisdom. Consequently, since the concerts of Tuesday afternoons run in a chronological sequence of composers, a "short foreword" must precede the pieces. Professor Spalding of Harvard spoke it yesterday as announcer for Herren Weber, Schubert, Schumann and Mendelssohn. Messieurs Berlioz and Liszt. In succinct sentences he arrayed their ways and works; while, speaking of their warmer instrumentation, he found at last an apt adjective for the clarinet. The "passionate" clarinet was his label. In spite of this find, it was Professor Spalding's misfortune to end exactly where he began. "You have only to listen to the music," he concluded, "to enjoy it." Even so, thought we others who prefer the sound of trumpet and shawm to any babble of tongue at a symphony concert.

Besides, if ever music spoke for itself—with now and then a helpful programme-note—it was the numbers that Mr. Koussevitzky had arrayed. He began his exposition of the romantic composers (as they call it in Cambridge) with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," in which conductor and orchestra both excel. Again it was thrill to hear them spring into the opening fanfaronade; to listen to their stately hymning of "Ich bau' auf Gott und meine Euryanthe"; to feel the warmth of the amorous song. Then the descending hush; the vaporous Largo of ghostly vision; the fresh leap into driving rhythms and sonorities outflung. As the rider feels the dart of his horse at the prick of the spur, so the listener heard the orchestra quickening to the music at the uptake of Mr. Koussevitzky's hand. And in this Overture is half at least of the romantic gospel—the ardors and the vigors, the passion and the parade, the richness and the flamboyance, the range from heart-filling song to ear-filling frenzy, with "mystery" tucked appositely between. Weber may now live in the concert-hall by only three overtures; but Mon Dieu! (as the French say) how he lives—if only there is a romanticist to play him.

One companion-piece stood a bit further down the program; the other brought the end; while in both Mr. Koussevitzky had not previously been heard in Boston. The first was the "Rákóczy March" from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," preceded by the Dance of the Sylphs, which the conductor took lightly and simply, without the over-artful whisper and quiver of vanishing wings which was one of Dr. Muck's technical feats. Upon the March Mr. Koussevitzky wreaked himself magnificently. He both measured and whipped the rhythms; both proportioned and magnified the sonorities; attained at last to Berlioz's delirium of sound. Old hat, for most of us, the "Rákóczy March" has been these many years. And here it was alive again, striding and pounding, apotheosis once more of romantic and musical frenzy. Before he quits Boston, Mr. Kossevitzky should set hand to the whole "Damnation of Faust." Similarly, he might revivify it.

The other companion-piece was Liszt's "Preludes." As the "Rákóczy March" set the listener craving more Berlioz from the conductor, so the tone-poem made him eager for more Liszt. There is no other way to play "Preludes" than to wade into the music up to the middle, up to the neck. Merely to paddle in it is to reduce it to sandy shallows. Sound the trumpets, smite the drums, clash the cymbals, which is to say accept the Lisztian tumults in good faith and honest frenzy. They may be circus-music; but they are circus-music that can still be made to emit romantical shouts and tumble about in romantical torrents. By the same token, lay on and spare not when Liszt sighs like an amorous furnace or meditates—surrounded by a full band—upon the charms of nature. The melodies may not be too much; but the romantic emotion is still there, waiting to be squeezed forth. Above Liszt's other tone-poems, "Preludes" is the climax of romantical excess—the apotheosis of tonal shoddy bedevilled into tonal glory, of a kind. Not to play it with that excess is to strangle the music. Dr. Muck knew how; Mr. Mengelberg knows how; Mr. Koussevitzky, yesterday, was past master at it; but, unlike the possessed Dutchman, he kept the proportions.

There was inning also for the romantics with their fancies and their graces; while Schubert of the "Unfinished Symphony" was also led amongst them. The Scherzo from the incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" is good to hear especially in these days of a re-born and re-ascendent Mendelssohn, by common consent of conductors and audiences. Under Mr. Koussevitzky's hand, again it deployed its bright perfections; yet it is possible to imagine it played by a smaller orchestra, more lightly, more trippingly. Those seven-and-sixty strings are more than enough for such skipping, sportive music. Mr. Laurent's feathering flute might hardly withstand them. The little workaday band of a German municipal theater can make the Scherzo sound more Mendelssohnian. . . .

With the chosen piece from Schumann Mr. Koussevitzky belied expectations. Seemingly, having no overture or symphonic excerpt in readiness, he bade Mr. Sanromá play detached fragments of "Carnaval," probably for the first time in a concert in this town. Eleven minutes was the allotted duration; and from the beginning ("Préambule"); the middle ("Eusebius," "Florestan," "Coquette," "Chopin," "Harlequin and Columbine"); the end ("Pause" and the Davidsbündler March) conductor and pianist made choice. As it proved and as Mr. Sanromá skilfully spaced them, the scraps ran, plausibly enough; exemplified fairly Schumann's fanciful and playful vein; while, thanks again to Mr. Sanromá, this interlude of the piano sounded by no means tamely, with orchestral pieces before and behind it. Moreover, not within memory has Mr. Sanromá played with such lustrous and edgeless tone, such technical aptness, such sensibility to the curve and the contents of the music. Toward young prime he steadily ripens.

The books call Schubert a romantic composer. The learned doctors when they are a-teaching or a-cataloguing confidently set him in that category. No doubt they are right—by the witness of his songs—and we pleasure-seekers may only bow before them. Yet some of us idlers prefer to think of the orchestral Schubert—and the Schubert of the finer chamber-music—as an isolated genius, above and beyond classification and kindred academic pastimes. In our wilfulness, we also prefer to think of him as a composer who sang—in symphonies finished or unfinished—out of a full heart, an eager spirit, an answering hand. We would rather not have him decked in the romantic trappings—ardors, glooms, ecstasies; pangs, visions, stresses; the whole baggage of a troubled, aspiring soul. Rather let him sit in the sunshine or the shadow and sing his heart out; while we overhearers listen rapt. In fact, our quarrel with Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the "Unfinished Symphony" is that he will have it a highly intensified, romantical music. For the entrance of every theme the conductor would have us stir with expectation; while when and if it returns, we must await it all a-quiver. Moreover, when it bourgeons into melody, that melody must be charged with sentiment and cumulated into emotion. As for modulations, and as the conductor will have them "every little movement has a meaning all its own." Now all this may be the romantical-tragic Schubert; but it is not the Schubert who, singing down a century, has turned to water the hearts of the sons of men.

H. T. P.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, JANUARY 14, 1926

News of the Playwrigh

167

From One Russian to Another

Michael Press

Guest-Conductor at the Symphony Concerts To-morrow and Saturday

---

Nor was Mr Koussevitzky's accompaniment one whit behind. There was opportunity during the concerto to observe how a willing and intelligent conductor may mold his orchestra around and about the solo instrument in such a way as to achieve at one and the same time the full beauties of the solo part and the orchestral balance that so frequently is lost. To have noted the careful, beautiful way in which the conductor brought in the wood-winds after a quiet solo passage for the pianoforte was in itself a revelation in the conducting of a concerto.

The rest of the program consisted of Steinberg's transcription for a little orchestra of Galliard's Sonata in G major and Strauss' "Alpine Symphony," both pieces which have appeared on the programs of the regular series this year.

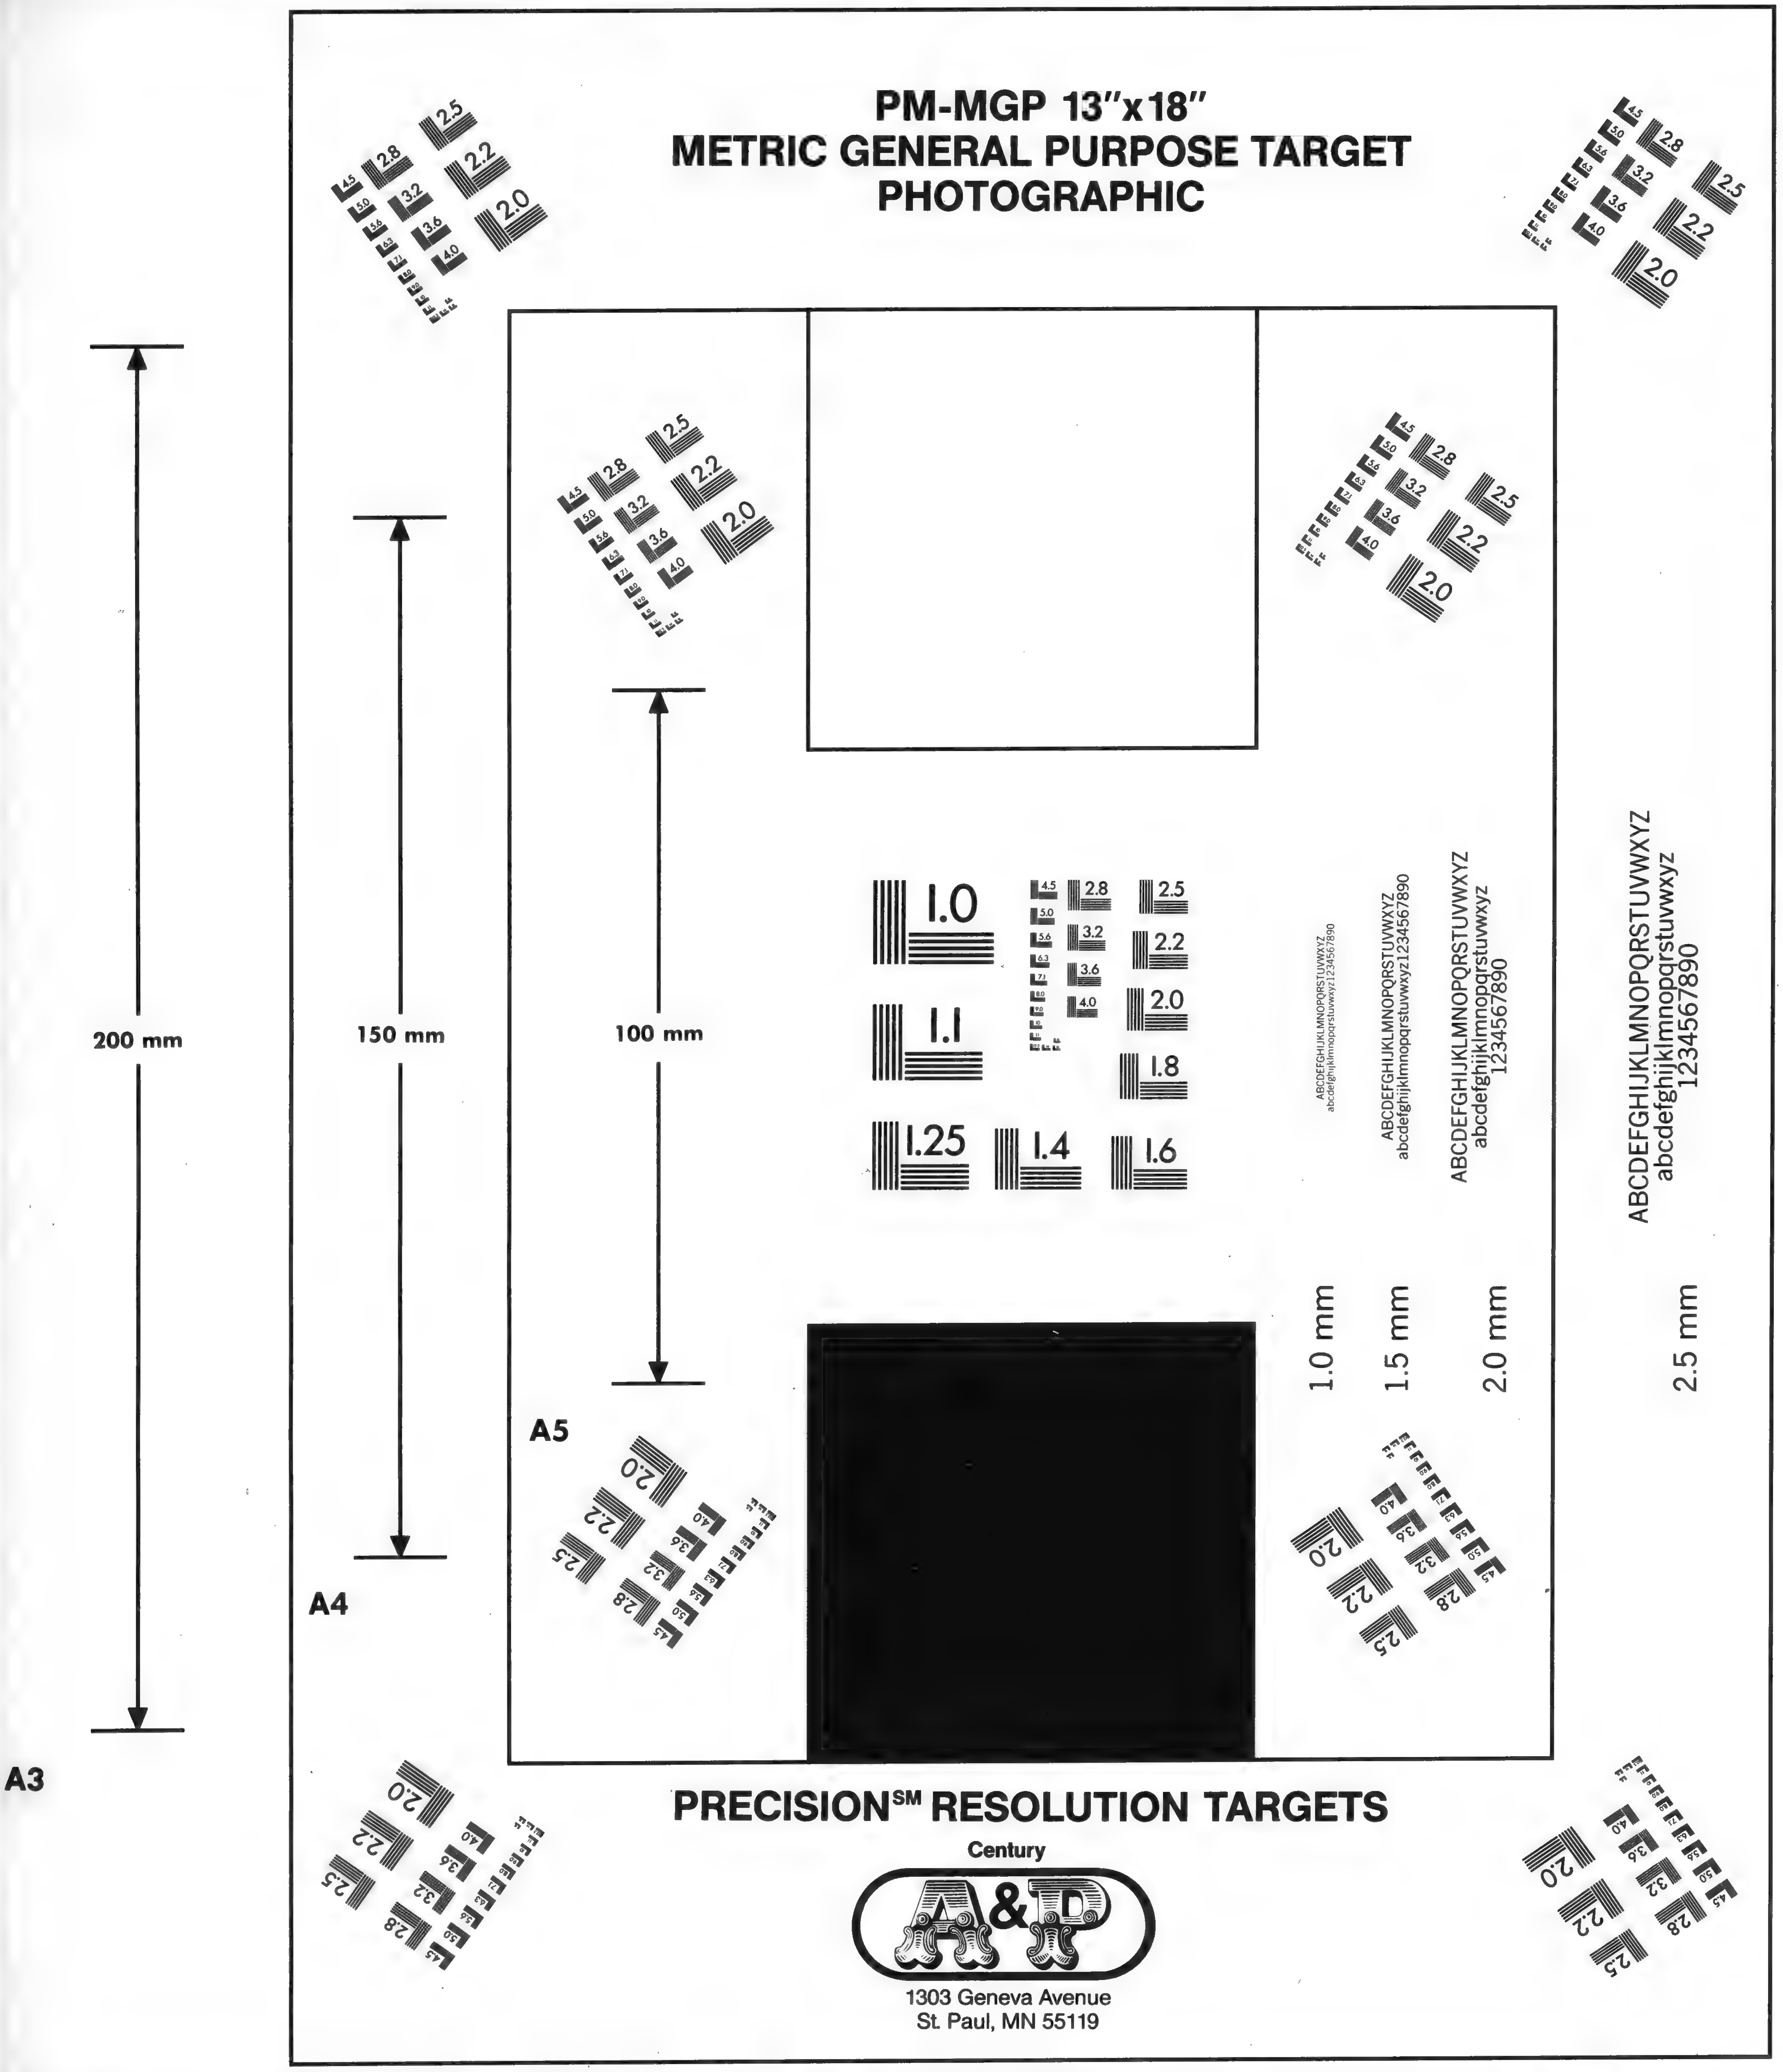
The third hearing of the St music but serves to confirm strengthen the first impression of cle ness in doing with little. As a cha to hear what a composer who genius can do with two or three tremely slender themes, the piece probably never fail to interest. Eve hearing reveals new brilliancies. beautiful, amusing or striking music falls short of several other works Strauss.

REDUCTION

RATIO

13x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
10
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.0
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Monitor 168

Boston Jan 26

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, last night in Symphony Hall gave the second of this season's series of Monday evening concerts. Jesus Sanromá, pianist, was the assisting soloist. The program:

Gaillard—Sonata in G major (freely transcribed for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg)
Rachmaninoff—Pianoforte Concerto No. 2 in C minor
Strauss—"An Alpine Symphony"

Returning to his orchestra after a brief mid-winter vacation, Mr. Koussevitzky was greeted with enthusiasm by his audience. Even the opening night of a season of opera did not lessen the number of attendants, for, as has become the custom at all concerts of the orchestra, every seat was taken.

Fragmentary and episodic in nature, Gaillard's fragile old bit seems scarcely worth the care and pains lavished on its arrangement and performance. For Mr. Steinberg has exercised a skilled technical ability on its restoration. Likewise Mr. Koussevitzky has bestowed on this little antique the same detailed attentiveness which large and brilliant compositions call from him. But this "infinite capacity for taking pains" seems ingrained in the man's nature.

Interest in Gaillard's music may be tinged with a certain antiquarianism. Quite another extreme of feeling animates any consideration of Mr. Sanromá's performance of the Rachmaninoff Concerto. Unbelievable as it may seem, this young pianist has not yet had his head turned by the abundant praise poured on him. He continues to work. He continues to play before audiences both large and small. Most important of all, he continues to improve. Each performance shows a slight but noticeable advance over earlier appearances.

Last evening Mr. Sanromá played as if there existed for him only the music he was traversing and the leader before him. He played Rachmaninoff's music with delicacy, with fervor, with understanding, even with a touch of the "grand manner." The sophistications of sections of the concerto he stripped of artificiality. Stark, unmantled emotion poured from the tensity, the mounting climax, the surcharged vibrance of the concluding movement. Yet restraint came at his call many times in the course of the music. The fartherly pat which Mr. Koussevitzky bestowed on the pianist's head was in tune with the enthusiastic applause.

Presumably this performance of Strauss's much discussed "Alpine Symphony" marks its disappearance, for a time at least, from this orchestra's concerts. Two recent pairs of regular concerts have set forth its ingredients. Hearing it once more, one wondered how Strauss limited his realistic imitations to a mere wind machine, a thunder machine and cowbells. For surely he might have incorporated a well-behaved yodel in the mixture.

Fortunately for the hearer, comparatively few sections of the "Alpine Symphony" lend themselves to ridicule. If this music does not achieve the effectiveness of some of Strauss's most impelling works, it does remain beautifully descriptive program music, of a realistic and daring type. But Richard Strauss knows the perverseness of the public and its opinions. How, then, did he summon the courage to risk going down in the annals of popular musical history as the composer of the "Cow-bell Symphony?"

RESURRECTED CRAFTSMAN

Galliard Contributes an Eighteenth-Century Sonata for Present Novelty—Mr. Sanroma and, Once More, Strauss—Monday-Nighters Greet Mr. Koussevitzky—Music Hereabouts

IT is the year 2155. The wise ones among the radio announcers (we used to call them college professors, in an earlier organization of society) have explained to the public repeatedly that the beginning of the twentieth century produced the world's one supremely great composer in the person of Arnold Schönberg, of whom pictures are flashed into our homes, whose music we are forced to hear for the good of our souls—though some of us get a bit tired of it—and it is told us over and over again that he is so great first, because the whole range of human emotion resides in his works, a bit hard to see, to be sure, for the uninitiated, but it is there nevertheless; second, because the whole structure of the music of the twenty-first century and of the twenty-second, that golden epoch of music, rests squarely upon his shoulders.

But now an enterprising conductor, in search for novelty, comes upon a forgotten score. With the help of the most erudite of the radio announcers, who promises aid in his few hours off duty, it is possible to reconstruct the faded pages. The title is "Nocturnes," the composer a hitherto unheard one, Achilles Claude DeBussy. The conductor plays his score. It wins a certain praise. He persists, and gradually even the radio announcers begin to recognize its worth.

Coming back to 1926, let us ask ourselves a question: "How much do we really know about the music of a couple of centuries ago?" We are told that the musical sun rises and sets in the works of Bach and Handel; minor composers of worth are enumerated. But few ever even hear of one John Ernest Galliard, unless perchance they have come to Boston and have heard the concerts of its Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Serge Koussevitzky. Again last evening, at the second of the Monday series of concerts, the orchestra played Maximilian Steinberg's transcription of Galliard's Sonata in G major. The string band, a flute, an oboe, a bassoon play it. In style it is none too similar to the works of the great George Frederick, or the greater Johann Sebastian. Previous impressions are but renewed. In these four movements resides the rarest beauty, the beauty of tones swelling, long-sustained, the beauty of tones in active kaleidoscopic motion. Not skill in the use of counterpoint as such, not its use as a matter of routine, nor yet its use in laying bare the depths of a noble soul, is what interests Galliard; but the use of counterpoint in the quest for pure beauty—there is his field, there his achievement. With the string band, now winning fame on every hand, to play it, with Messrs Laurent, Gillet, Laus as quasi-soloists, with the sensitive Mr. Koussevitzky to conduct, performance matched, yes, surely much

—Continued on P[illegible]

RESURRECTED CRAFTSMAN

Boston Transcript Jan 26

Continued from Page Eight

more than matched the biggest conception that good old John Ernest Galliard ev had of his piece.

A soloist graced this concert, a young Bostonian, a familiar figure in concert halls. Modest, unassuming, Mr. Sanroma is occasionally heard in an ensemble concert—when it is decidedly up to his partner to prove himself the pianist's equal. Rakhmaninov's second concerto he played last evening. Applause was loud and long, bringing the young artist back to the stage time and again. Deservedly so. Not often does a piano paired with an orchestra acquit itself so well. Flaws one cannot find in this youth's performance. Tone was beauty itself, in many a gradation, with many a modulation. Plasticity there was, the broadest and best-considered molding of phrase. Phrase followed phrase, building up into shapely larger structures. No sign of immaturity here. No sign of mere adequate technical equipment, skillfully handled. For fires burn deep within young Sanroma, fires which together with his unlimited technical resource will carry him, indeed already place him, with the world's elect among pianists. Many a visiting artist of note has fallen short of Mr. Sanroma's work yesterday.

After the intermission the orchestra played Strauss's "Alpensymphonie," fifth performance in five weeks. It is a work played none too often, laid by now and again as not a worthy companion to the most of the rest of Strauss's orchestral works. From this one must dissent. The works of Strauss that do not contain some dross are indeed few and far between. As for the rest, the Alpensymphonie" does not fall far below them. Nor are its weakest portions those in which machinery cowbells, a maximum of percussion are added to the music. Strauss can be, indeed is in this piece, quite as dissonant as a cowbell ever thought of being. Its weakest spots are passages in which invention permits dullness to overtake it, as in certain development sections worked out by the composer's routine ability. Banal themes there are also, as for example the one which forms the subject for the rather dry fugato. But the weakest part, to the present writer, is the peroration. The composer has finished his piece, but still he wanders on and on with apparent aimlessness. A good European organist trained in the technic of improvisation could ramble on in this fashion for hours and hours. But the weak spots are much overbalanced by the strong ones. And the strong ones include the main bulk of the work. Themes are many—all but about two are worthy of the best of Strauss. Mood he evokes over and over again. Structurally the work hangs together admirably—not counting the appendage at the end. And a virtuoso performance it received at the hands of the orchestra.

The Monday evening concerts were fir to welcome the returned Mr. Koussevitzk They [illegible] not li[illegible]en to a "guest

---

APROPOS GOOSSENS

Trans Jan 21

A Note on the Impending Visitor—His Place in British Music; His Career; His Work—Delius and a Norwegian Cuckoo

TRANSCRIPT —— JAN 21.

MR. EUGENE GOOSSENS, who conducts the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week-end, appears on the program as composer as well as conductor. On this program he has placed his own Sinfonietta, and with it a work by his countryman, Frederick Delius, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring." Mr. Goossens has won fame as a violinist in the London Philharmonic String Quartet; he is equally brilliant as a concert pianist. His early career as a conductor was phenomenal. At the age of twenty-three he was invited by Sir Thomas Beecham to conduct a performance of Stanford's "The Critic." A permanent engagement resulted. Similarly, a single engagement at the Hallé concerts at Manchester resulted in many re-engagements. Soon the Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra began to invite him to conduct as guest. In 1920 Sir Henry Wood invited him to conduct his own "Eternal Rhythm," and by 1921—at the age of twenty-eight—he found himself established in the front rank of European conductors. His work with the symphony orchestra at Rochester, N. Y., is known to most American music-lovers. But however great Mr. Goossens may be as violinist, pianist, or conductor, his chief fame rests upon his work as a creative artist.

Eugène Goossens began composing at an early age. Yet his works have never been known as the works of a beginner. From the first, his works have showed remarkable technical finish, often even considerable maturity of imagination. If he committed indiscretions as a youthful composer, he had the critical good sense never to allow them to see the light of publicity. Writers speak of him as having absorbed the methods of Debussy, of Skryabin, of Strauss—all according to the writer you happen to read. Goossens, like Shakspeare, has learned from all the world about him. His own musical personality has always dominated over his models in his works. An unconscious nationalism, high emotion, tenderness, passion, and perhaps most important, humor, have all found their place in his art. He is a modern in that he thinks chromatically rather than diatonically; he has been called a "neo-classic" in that his "formal principles are classic, but he works in a medium which is largely novel."

Of the work of Mr. Goossens to be performed here on Friday and Saturday, The Musical Times (London), of April 1, 1923, said:

"Eugène Goossens conducted the London Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 18, and his own new Quarter-of-an-Hour Symphony (or "Sinfonietta") was included in the program. It has three movements—a sonata-form first, a 'Romanza second, and a scherzo-like third. Some of the subject-matter is used in more than one movement, and there is a 'motto-theme' (picked up in the street from a whistling passer-by) that appears in all. The whole work flies in the face of some of the theories and principles of its own composer, as laid down in numerous lectures and articles; but if he does not object to such defiance, nobody else is likely to do so. So far as can be seen, nothing has been lost by this frank adoption of the old-fashioned 'development' system and by the representation of 'extra-musical emotion'! The fact is, of course, that none of these young men bite half as hard as they bark.

Continued on Last Page

APROPOS GOOSSENS

Continued from Page Sixteen

"The whole work, in subject-matter, harmony, and orchestration—is very interesting, and its conciseness should lead to its being heard often enough for the public to find out whether it likes it—a poiont about which it seemed a little in doubt at the first performance, probably not finding the harmonic scheme immediately accessible."

And a writer in The Chesterian for April, 1923 (Mr. Leigh Henry) says:

"Far and away above all the novelties mentionel [of the past few weeks in London] for clarity of expression, for sense of form, and for real musicality, was Eugène Goossens's 'Sinfonietta,' and the instrumentation is even more original than that of the exquisite 'Eternal Rhythm.' Here one feels that Goossens has escaped certain romantic weaknesses which threatened some preceding works, has attained a rarity and purity of expression truly classic."

Frederick Delius's "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring" was written in 1912 and first performed at London in January, 1914, at a Philharmonic Concert under Mengelberg. Mr. Philip Heseltine, in his authoritative "Frederick Delius," says of this piece and of its companion-piece, "Summer Night on the River," that they are certainly Delius's "finest achievements in purely orchestral music." He continues:

"To anyone quite unacquainted with his music the 'First Cuckoo' might be presented as an epitome of his whole life's work. It is based upon a twofold melory; the first part is Delius's own, a sequence of phrases that echo each other like distant cuckoo calls, the second is derived from a Norwegian folk-song, 'I Ola Dalon' ('In Ola Valley the Church Chimes Ring'), which is to be harmonized by Grieg [as No. 14] in his Opus 66 ['Popular Norwegian Melodies for Pianoforte']. Associated with the song is a legend of an old woman who, thinking her son had been kidnapped by the bogles and bugaboos of the hills, rang the bells of the neighboring church in the hope of releasing him from their power. But Delius chose the theme for its musical beauty, without any thought of its traditional associations, and using it as a motif has painted in unforgettable tones the emotions of one for whom spring is not so much a season of riot and exuberance, fresh hopes and renewed vitality, as a vision of such sweet and tender loveliness that the heart stands still in contemplation of it and the old unrest of the soul is put to sleep."

Mr. Percy Grainger, in the Symphony Society bulletins, on the occasion of the performance by the New York Symphony adds: "Delius adores Norway and knows it as few non-Scandinavians do. He has spent eighteen summers in the High Hills. Therefore, the advent of the spring brings for him longings for Norway, and particularly for those glorious mountains and fine hill-men from which 'I Ola Dalon' hails. That is why he has used this Norwegian tune in this impression of spring."

Frederick Delius was forty-three years of age before any large work of his was published—even though he had been writing for twenty years. His modesty, his unwillingness to use his compositions for publicity's sake, his refusal to resort to wire-pulling of any kind in order to gain recognition caused this extremely late acknowledgment of his powers. Haseltine has struck a true note then when he adds, later in his volume:

"One feels that all Delius's music is evolved out of the emotions of a past that was never fully realized when it was present, emotions which only became real after they had ceased to be experienced. . . . Here perhaps we have the explanation of the sadness that is intermingled with the serenity and sweetness of the conception of spring revealed in the 'First Cuckoo'; for it is a spring of the soul that cannot blossom until the autumn has come, that has so little time to stay. . . . The apparent victories of time over the soul, in separation and in going apart, are Delius's predominant theme; but in his music there is always a smile of assurance which seems to tell us that time itself is no more than the great illusion of the world."

A. H. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
FEB 2 1 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMING HERE NEXT MONTH

One of the outstanding concert events that has been brought to New Haven music lovers in many years is scheduled for Woolsey Hall on the night of March 11th, at which time the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear under the auspices of the Yale School of Music. The event will mark the fifth and final offering of the season of the Steinert Concert Series, which this year has proven the most popular ever, and with such an ambitious presentation as the Boston Symphony to conclude the series Woolsey Hall will undoubtedly be jammed to the doors for the occasion. Of great importance to the forthcoming event is the fact that the great musical organization will be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, who will make his first appearance before the local audiences at that time.

The concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season are in greater demand than they have ever been in the illustrious history of this great organization, and the waiting lists of applicants for subscription tickets have for the first time reached the number of 1000. Since every series in Boston is subscribed for the season to the last seat, a new historical series has just been announced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons. This will increase the total number of concerts in greater Boston to 73 as against 59 five years ago. The same conditions apply in New York where ten concerts are given.

This demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the orchestra, who is now beginning his second season in America.

Coming to America a year ago, with this reputation to herald him, Koussevitzky, appearing over the famous orchestra which he still commands, more than fulfilled the highest expectations. He has quickly become the most outstanding figure in the musical world of those cities which the orchestra visits and his reputation extends the length and breadth of this country.

Seats are now on sale for the Boston Symphony concert at Steinert's, 183 Church St.

NEXT SYMPHONY CONCERT FEB. 9TH

TRAVELER —— JAN 30

Schumann's "Manfred" to Be Given by People's

Since the Boston Symphony orchestra will be on tour next week there will be no concerts in Boston until the week following. On Tuesday afternoon, Feb. 9, at 3:15, there will take place the third concert of the new historical series. The music will consist of Brahm's First Symphony and numbers by Wagner, Saint-Saens and Tchaikovsky.

The 15th regular pair of concerts will take place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 12 and 13. Mr. Koussevitzky will then present a Concerto for Strings by Vivaldi; a Contrapuntol Fantasy by Bekeu; Respighi's Symphony Poem, the "Pines of Rome," then to be heard for the first time in Boston, and Beethoven's First Symphony.

Mr. Koussevitzky, returning from his vacation spent in New York, will conduct the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra this week. The program will comprise Moussorgsky's fantastical "Night on Bald Mountain," Prokofieff's third piano concerto, and Scriabin's symphony "The Divine Poem." Mr. Prokofieff will be the pianist. The third concerto was performed for the first time at Chicago on Dec. 16, 1921, when the composer was in that city attending to the production of his opera "The Love for Three Oranges."

It was announced that this program would include Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony. Later it was stated that the symphony would not be played; [illegible] Scherzo from his

---

TRANSCRIPT JAN 27

Koussevitzky Stays

Without Rhyme or Reason Is the Tattle to the Contrary

IT IS high time to make an end of current gossip about Mr. Koussevitzky's departure from the Symphony Orchestra. To squelch the whole rumor briefly and bluntly, he has no intention of quitting his post either at the end of the present season or at the end of the season next to come. He will fulfill his contract, which still has several years to run. He has not asked to be relieved of it or meditated such a request. All this report, surmise and innuendo is wholly unwarranted. Yet for a fortnight or more the town has buzzed with it until everyone was asking his neighbor whether it was true, and half-believing it at that. On the fullest authority every such rumor is groundless and not to be endured.

PROKOFIEFF IS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

AMERICAN JAN 30

By MOSES SMITH

When Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, came on the stage at the start of yesterday's concert, it was the signal for one of the longest demonstrations that has taken place there for years. The audience was acknowledging its admiration for the conductor, who was absent from the two previous concerts.

Mr. Koussevitzky proceeded to conduct the orchestra with his accustomed vigor and insight, in Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain," glowing Orchestral Fantasy. Certainly it glowed under his baton.

The soloist was one of the "wild men of Russia," Serge Prokofieff, whose own Third Piano Concerto was on the program. Mr. Prokofieff in the flesh did not turn out to be wild at all, nor did the Concerto, which was performed for the first time in Boston, have the primitive savagery of his "Scythian Suite," which Mr. Koussevitzky had introduced to Boston audiences last year.

Nevertheless this Concerto is a very original work. And just as you never quite know what type of music to expect from these new Russians, so in a particular piece there are startling and violent changes and contrasts. The soloist, by the way, proved to be an exceptionally gifted pianist, with a marvellous technical facility. His fingers flew all over the keys, and were everywhere at once. The audience applauded very heartily at the close of the performance.

The other number was Scriabin's "Divine Poem." Only once before has this piece been heard in Boston. That was when Mr. Monteux brought it out at these concerts two years ago. To our mind this is the best of the Symphonic pieces of Scriabin with which Bostonians are familiar. The performance of the work was brilliant.

GOOSENS LEADS HUB ORCHESTRA

Another guest conductor, this time an attractive, and dynamic young Englishman, Eugene Goosens, is duplicating the success made at the Symphony Concerts last week by the gifted Russian visitor, Michael Press.

JAN 23

Mr. Goosens appeared as composer as well as leader, for one of the two novelties on this 13th program, which will be broadcast tonight, is his charming "Sinfonietta."

Equally admirable was the new work by Goosens' fellow-countryman, Delius, an imaginative and intriguingly scored little tone picture called "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring."

Mr. Goosens offers a model program, easily one of the best of the season, and this, combined with excellent conducting and some of the best playing the Hub orchestra has done since its reorganization, excited unusual enthusiasm.

After the performance of Brahms' fourth symphony, conductor and players received an intensely warm ovation. Two other numbers that provoked much applause were Weber's sparkling "Freischuetz" overture and Debussy's delightful "Iberia" tone pictures.

Boston Symphony Orc Program With Serg Closing Toscanini Symphony Society U

N.Y. EVE POST JAN 30

THE feature of the third visit of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon will be the appearance of Serge Prokofieff as soloist in his third pianaforte concerto. The orchestra will also play the march and scherzo from his opera "The Love for Three Oranges."

At the Thursday concert the orchestra will give an all-Russian program with Seriabine's third symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain." Saturday afternoon, besides the Prokofieff numbers there will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and a sonata of Galhard arranged by Steinberg.

Monitor 168

Boston Jan 26

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, last night in Symphony Hall gave the second of this season's series of Monday evening concerts. Jesus Sanromá, pianist, was the assisting soloist. The program:

Gaillard—Sonata in G major (freely transcribed for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg)
Rachmaninoff—Pianoforte Concerto No. 2 in C minor
Strauss—"An Alpine Symphony"

Returning to his orchestra after a brief mid-winter vacation, Mr. Koussevitzky was greeted with enthusiasm by his audience. Even the opening night of a season of opera did not lessen the number of attendants, for, as has become the custom at all concerts of the orchestra, every seat was taken.

Fragmentary and episodic in nature, Gaillard's fragile old bit seems scarcely worth the care and pains lavished on its arrangement and performance. For Mr. Steinberg has exercised a skilled technical ability on its restoration. Likewise Mr. Koussevitzky has bestowed on this little antique the same detailed attentiveness which large and brilliant compositions call from him. But this "infinite capacity for taking pains" seems ingrained in the man's nature.

Interest in Gaillard's music may be tinged with a certain antiquarianism. Quite another extreme of feeling animates any consideration of Mr. Sanromá's performance of the Rachmaninoff Concerto. Unbelievable as it may seem, this young pianist has not yet had his head turned by the abundant praise poured on him. He continues to work. He continues to play before audiences both large and small. Most important of all, he continues to improve. Each performance shows a slight but noticeable advance over earlier appearances.

Last evening Mr. Sanromá played as if there existed for him only the music he was traversing and the leader before him. He played Rachmaninoff's music with delicacy, with fervor, with understanding, even with a touch of the "grand manner." The sophistications of sections of the concerto he stripped of artificiality. Stark, unmantled emotion poured from the tensity, the mounting climax, the surcharged vibrance of the concluding movement. Yet restraint came at his call many times in the course of the music. The fartherly pat which Mr. Koussevitzky bestowed on the pianist's head was in tune with the enthusiastic applause.

Presumably this performance of Strauss's much discussed "Alpine Symphony" marks its disappearance, for a time at least, from this orchestra's concerts. Two recent pairs of regular concerts have set forth its ingredients. Hearing it once more, one wondered how Strauss limited his realistic imitations to a mere wind machine, a thunder machine and cowbells. For surely he might have incorporated a well-behaved yodel in the mixture.

Fortunately for the hearer, comparatively few sections of the "Alpine Symphony" lend themselves to ridicule. If this music does not achieve the effectiveness of some of Strauss's most impelling works, it does remain beautifully descriptive program music, of a realistic and daring type. But Richard Strauss knows the perverseness of the public and its opinions. How, then, did he summon the courage to risk going down in the annals of popular musical history as the composer of the "Cow-bell Symphony?"

RESURRECTED CRAFTSMAN

Galliard Contributes an Eighteenth-Century Sonata for Present Novelty—Mr. Sanroma and, Once More, Strauss—Monday-Nighters Greet Mr. Koussevitzky—Music Hereabouts

It is the year 2155. The wise ones among the radio announcers (we used to call them college professors, in an earlier organization of society) have explained to the public repeatedly that the beginning of the twentieth century produced the world's one supremely great composer in the person of Arnold Schönberg, of whom pictures are flashed into our homes, whose music we are forced to hear for the good of our souls—though some of us get a bit tired of it—and it is told us over and over again that he is so great first, because the whole range of human emotion resides in his works, a bit hard to see, to be sure, for the uninitiated, but it is there nevertheless; second, because the whole structure of the music of the twenty-first century and of the twenty-second, that golden epoch of music, rests squarely upon his shoulders.

But now an enterprising conductor, in search for novelty, comes upon a forgotten score. With the help of the most erudite of the radio announcers, who promises aid in his few hours off duty, it is possible to reconstruct the faded pages. The title is "Nocturnes," the composer a hitherto unheard one, Achilles Claude De-Bussy. The conductor plays his score. It wins a certain praise. He persists, and gradually even the radio announcers begin to recognize its worth.

Coming back to 1926, let us ask ourselves a question: "How much do we really know about the music of a couple of centuries ago?" We are told that the musical sun rises and sets in the works of Bach and Handel; minor composers of worth are enumerated. But few ever even hear of one John Ernest Galliard, unless perchance they have come to Boston and have heard the concerts of its Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Serge Koussevitzky. Again last evening, at the second of the Monday series of concerts, the orchestra played Maximilian Steinberg's transcription of Galliard's Sonata in G major. The string band, a flute, an oboe, a bassoon play it. In style it is none too similar to the works of the great George Frederick, or the greater Johann Sebestian. Previous impressions are but renewed. In these four movements resides the rarest beauty, the beauty of tones swelling, long-sustained, the beauty of tones in active kaleidoscopic motion. Not skill in the use of counterpoint as such, not its use as a matter of routine, nor yet its use in laying bare the depths of a noble soul, is what interests Galliard; but the use of counterpoint in the quest for pure beauty—there is his field, there his achievement. With the string band, now winning fame on every hand, to play it, with Messrs Laurent, Gillet, Laus as quasi-soloists, with the sensitive Mr. Koussevitzky to conduct, performance matched, yes, surely much

Continued on Page [illegible]

RESURRECTED CRAFTSMAN

Bost. Jan 26

Continued from Page Eight

more than matched the biggest conception that good old John Ernest Galliard ever had of his piece.

A soloist graced this concert, a young Bostonian, a familiar figure in concert halls. Modest, unassuming, Mr. Sanroma is occasionally heard in an ensemble concert—when it is decidedly up to his partner to prove himself the pianist's equal. Rakhmaninov's second concerto he played last evening. Applause was loud and long, bringing the young artist back to the stage time and again. Deservedly so. Not often does a piano paired with an orchestra acquit itself so well. Flaws one cannot find in this youth's performance. Tone was beauty itself, in many a gradation, with many a modulation. Plasticity there was, the broadest and best-considered molding of phrase. Phrase followed phrase, building up into shapely larger structures. No sign of immaturity here. No sign of mere adequate technical equipment, skillfully handled. For fires burn deep within young Sanroma, fires which together with his unlimited technical resource will carry him, indeed already place him, with the world's elect among pianists. Many a visiting artist of note has fallen short of Mr. Sanroma's work yesterday.

After the intermission the orchestra played Strauss's "Alpensymphonie," fifth performance in five weeks. It is a work played none too often, laid by now and again as not a worthy companion to the most of the rest of Strauss's orchestral works. From this one must dissent. The works of Strauss that do not contain some dross are indeed few and far between. As for the rest, the Alpensymphonie" does not fall far below them. Nor are its weakest portions those in which machinery cowbells, a maximum of percussion are added to the music. Strauss can be, indeed is in this piece, quite as dissonant as a cowbell ever thought of being. Its weakest spots are passages in which invention permits dullness to overtake it, as in certain development sections worked out by the composer's routine ability. Banal themes there are also, as for example the one which forms the subject for the rather dry fugato. But the weakest part, to the present writer, is the peroration. The composer has finished his piece, but still he wanders on and on with apparent aimlessness. A good European organist trained in the technic of improvisation could ramble on in this fashion for hours and hours. But the weak spots are much overbalanced by the strong ones. And the strong ones include the main bulk of the work. Themes are many—all but about two are worthy of the best of Strauss. Mood he evokes over and over again. Structurally the work hangs together admirably—not counting the appendage at the end. And a virtuoso performance it received at the hands of the orchestra.

The Monday evening concerts were fir to welcome the returned Mr. Koussevitzk The [illegible] not listen to a "guest

---

APROPOS GOOSSENS

Trans Jan 21

A Note on the Impending Visitor—His Place in British Music; His Career; His Work—Delius and a Norwegian Cuckoo

Transcript — Jan 21.

Mr. Eugene Goossens, who conducts the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week-end, appears on the program as composer as well as conductor. On this program he has placed his own Sinfonietta, and with it a work by his countryman, Frederick Delius, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring." Mr. Goossens has won fame as a violinist in the London Philharmonic String Quartet; he is equally brilliant as a concert pianist. His early career as a conductor was phenomenal. At the age of twenty-three he was invited by Sir Thomas Beecham to conduct a performance of Stanford's "The Critic." A permanent engagement resulted. Similarly, a single engagement at the Hallé concerts at Manchester resulted in many re-engagements. Soon the Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra began to invite him to conduct as guest. In 1920 Sir Henry Wood invited him to conduct his own "Eternal Rhythm," and by 1921—at the age of twenty-eight—he found himself established in the front rank of European conductors. His work with the symphony orchestra at Rochester, N. Y., is known to most American music-lovers. But however great Mr. Goossens may be as violinist, pianist, or conductor, his chief fame rests upon his work as a creative artist.

Eugène Goossens began composing at an early age. Yet his works have never been known as the works of a beginner. From the first, his works have showed remarkable technical finish, often even considerable maturity of imagination. If he committed indiscretions as a youthful composer, he had the critical good sense never to allow them to see the light of publicity. Writers speak of him as having absorbed the methods of Debussy, of Skryabin, of Strauss—all according to the writer you happen to read. Goossens, like Shakspeare, has learned from all the world about him. His own musical personality has always dominated over his models in his works. An unconscious nationalism, high emotion, tenderness, passion, and perhaps most important, humor, have all found their place in his art. He is a modern in that he thinks chromatically rather than diatonically; he has been called a "neo-classic" in that his "formal principles are classic, but he works in a medium which is largely novel."

Of the work of Mr. Goossens to be performed here on Friday and Saturday, The Musical Times (London), of April 1, 1923, said:

"Eugène Goossens conducted the London Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 18, and his own new Quarter-of-an-Hour Symphony (or "Sinfonietta") was included in the program. It has three movements—a sonata-form first, a 'Romanza second, and a scherzo-like third. Some of the subject-matter is used in more than one movement, and there is a 'motto-theme' (picked up in the street from a whistling passer-by) that appears in all. The whole work flies in the face of some of the theories and principles of its own composer, as laid down in numerous lectures and articles; but if he does not object to such defiance, nobody else is likely to do so. So far as can be seen, nothing has been lost by this frank adoption of the old-fashioned 'development' system and by the representation of 'extra-musical emotion'! The fact is, of course, that none of these young men bite half as hard as they bark.

Continued on Last Page

APROPOS GOOSSENS

Continued from Page Sixteen

"The whole work, in subject-matter, harmony, and orchestration—is very interesting, and its conciseness should lead to its being heard often enough for the public to find out whether it likes it—a point about which it seemed a little in doubt at the first performance, probably not finding the harmonic scheme immediately accessible."

And a writer in The Chesterian for April, 1923 (Mr. Leigh Henry) says:

"Far and away above all the novelties mentionel [of the past few weeks in London] for clarity of expression, for sense of form, and for real musicality, was Eugène Goossens's 'Sinfonietta,' and the instrumentation is even more original than that of the exquisite 'Eternal Rhythm.' Here one feels that Goossens has escaped certain romantic weaknesses which threatened some preceding works, has attained a rarity and purity of expression truly classic."

Frederick Delius's "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring" was written in 1912 and first performed at London in January, 1914, at a Philharmonic Concert under Mengelberg. Mr. Philip Heseltine, in his authoritative "Frederick Delius," says of this piece and of its companion-piece, "Summer Night on the River," that they are certainly Delius's "finest achievements in purely orchestral music." He continues:

"To anyone quite unacquainted with his music the 'First Cuckoo' might be presented as an epitome of his whole life's work. It is based upon a twofold melory: the first part is Delius's own, a sequence of phrases that echo each other like distant cuckoo calls, the second is derived from a Norwegian folk-song, 'I Ola Dalon' ('In Ola Valley the Church Chimes Ring'), which is to be harmonized by Grieg [as No. 14] in his Opus 66 ['Popular Norwegian Melodies for Pianoforte']. Associated with the song is a legend of an old woman who, thinking her son had been kidnapped by the bogles and bugaboos of the hills, rang the bells of the neighboring church in the hope of releasing him from their power. But Delius chose the theme for its musical beauty, without any thought of its traditional associations, and using it as a motif has painted in unforgettable tones the emotions of one for whom spring is not so much a season of riot and exuberance, fresh hopes and renewed vitality, as a vision of such sweet and tender loveliness that the heart stands still in contemplation of it and the old unrest of the soul is put to sleep."

Mr. Percy Grainger, in the Symphony Society bulletins, on the occasion of the performance by the New York Symphony adds: "Delius adores Norway and knows it as few non-Scandinavians do. He has spent eighteen summers in the High Hills. Therefore, the advent of the spring brings for him longings for Norway, and particularly for those glorious mountains and fine hill-men from which 'I Ola Dalon' hails. That is why he has used this Norwegian tune in this impression of spring."

Frederick Delius was forty-three years of age before any large work of his was published—even though he had been writing for twenty years. His modesty, his unwillingness to use his compositions for publicity's sake, his refusal to resort to wire-pulling of any kind in order to gain recognition caused this extremely late acknowledgment of his powers. Haseltine has struck a true note then when he adds, later in his volume:

"One feels that all Delius's music is evolved out of the emotions of a past that was never fully realized when it was present, emotions which only became real after they had ceased to be experienced. . . . Here perhaps we have the explanation of the sadness that is intermingled with the serenity and sweetness of the conception of spring revealed in the 'First Cuckoo'; for it is a spring of the soul that cannot blossom until the autumn has come, that has so little time to stay. . . . The apparent victories of time over the soul, in separation and in going apart, are Delius's predominant theme; but in his music there is always a smile of assurance which seems to tell us that time itself is no more than the great illusion of the world."

A. H. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
[illegible] 1 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMING HERE NEXT MONTH

One of the outstanding concert events that has been brought to New Haven music lovers in many years is scheduled for Woolsey Hall on the night of March 11th, at which time the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear under the auspices of the Yale School of Music. The event will mark the fifth and final offering of the season of the Steinert Concert Series, which this year has proven the most popular ever, and with such an ambitious presentation as the Boston Symphony to conclude the series Woolsey Hall will undoubtedly be jammed to the doors for the occasion. Of great importance to the forthcoming event is the fact that the great musical organization will be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, who will make his first appearance before the local audiences at that time.

The concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season are in greater demand than they have ever been in the illustrious history of this great organization, and the waiting lists of applicants for subscription tickets have for the first time reached the number of 1000. Since every series in Boston is subscribed for the season to the last seat, a new historical series has just been announced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons. This will increase the total number of concerts in greater Boston to 73 as against 59 five years ago. The same conditions apply in New York where ten concerts are given.

This demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the orchestra, who is now beginning his second season in America.

Coming to America a year ago, with this reputation to herald him, Koussevitzky, appearing over the famous orchestra which he still commands, more than fulfilled the highest expectations. He has quickly become the most outstanding figure in the musical world of those cities which the orchestra visits and his reputation extends the length and breadth of this country.

Seats are now on sale for the Boston Symphony concert at Steinert's, 183 Church St.

NEXT SYMPHONY CONCERT FEB. 9TH

Traveler — Jan 30

Schumann's "Manfred" to Be Given by People's

Since the Boston Symphony orchestra will be on tour next week there will be no concerts in Boston until the week following. On Tuesday afternoon, Feb. 9, at 3:15, there will take place the third concert of the new historical series. The music will consist of Brahms's First Symphony and numbers by Wagner, Saint-Saens and Tchaikovsky.

The 15th regular pair of concerts will take place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 12 and 13. Mr. Koussevitsky will then present a Concerto for Strings by Vivaldi; a Contrapuntal Fantasy by Beken; Respighi's Symphony Poem, the "Pines of Rome," then to be heard for the first time in Boston, and Beethoven's First Symphony.

Mr. Koussevitzky, returning from his vacation spent in New York, will conduct the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra this week. The program will comprise Moussorgsky's fantastical "Night on Bald Mountain," Prokofieff's third piano concerto, and Scriabin's symphony "The Divine Poem." Mr. Prokofieff will be the pianist. The third concerto was performed for the first time at Chicago on Dec. 16, 1921, when the composer was in that city attending to the production of his opera "The Love for Three Oranges."

It was announced that this program would include Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony. Later it was stated that the symphony would not be played; [illegible] Scherzo from his

---

Transcript Jan 27

Koussevitzky Stays

Without Rhyme or Reason Is the Tattle to the Contrary

It is high time to make an end of current gossip about Mr. Koussevitzky's departure from the Symphony Orchestra. To squelch the whole rumor briefly and bluntly, he has no intention of quitting his post either at the end of the present season or at the end of the season next to come. He will fulfill his contract, which still has several years to run. He has not asked to be relieved of it or meditated such a request. All this report, surmise and innuendo is wholly unwarranted. Yet for a fortnight or more the town has buzzed with it until everyone was asking his neighbor whether it was true, and half-believing it at that. On the fullest authority every such rumor is groundless and not to be endured.

PROKOFIEFF IS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

American Jan 30

By MOSES SMITH

When Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, came on the stage at the start of yesterday's concert, it was the signal for one of the longest demonstrations that has taken place there for years. The audience was acknowledging its admiration for the conductor, who was absent from the two previous concerts.

Mr. Koussevitzky proceeded to conduct the orchestra with his accustomed vigor and insight, in Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain," glowing Orchestral Fantasy. Certainly it glowed under his baton.

The soloist was one of the "wild men of Russia," Serge Prokofieff, whose own Third Piano Concerto was on the program. Mr. Prokofieff in the flesh did not turn out to be wild at all, nor did the Concerto, which was performed for the first time in Boston, have the primitive savagery of his "Scythian Suite," which Mr. Koussevitzky had introduced to Boston audiences last year.

Nevertheless this Concerto is a very original work. And just as you never quite know what type of music to expect from these new Russians, so in a particular piece there are startling and violent changes and contrasts. The soloist, by the way, proved to be an exceptionally gifted pianist, with a marvellous technical facility. His fingers flew all over the keys, and were everywhere at once. The audience applauded very heartily at the close of the performance.

The other number was Scriabin's "Divine Poem." Only once before has this piece been heard in Boston. That was when Mr. Monteux brought it out at these concerts two years ago. To our mind this is the best of the Symphonic pieces of Scriabin with which Bostonians are familiar. The performance of the work was brilliant.

GOOSENS LEADS HUB ORCHESTRA

Another guest conductor, this time an attractive, and dynamic young Englishman, Eugene Goosens, is duplicating the success made at the Symphony Concerts last week by the gifted Russian visitor, Michael Press.

Jan 23

Mr. Goosens appeared as composer as well as leader, for one of the two novelties on this 13th program, which will be broadcast tonight, is his charming "Sinfonietta."

Equally admirable was the new work by Goosens' fellow-countryman, Delius, an imaginative and intriguingly scored little tone picture called 'On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring."

Mr. Goosens offers a model program, easily one of the best of the season, and this, combined with excellent conducting and some of the best playing the Hub orchestra has done since its reorganization, excited unusual enthusiasm.

After the performance of Brahms' fourth symphony, conductor and players received an intensely warm ovation. Two other numbers that provoked much applause were Weber's sparkling "Freischuetz" overture and Debussy's delightful "Iberia" tone pictures.

Boston Symphony Orc Program With Serge Closing Toscanini Symphony Society U

N.Y. Eve Post Jan 30

The feature of the third visit of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon will be the appearance of Serge Prokofieff as soloist in his third pianaforte concerto. The orchestra will also play the march and scherzo from his opera "The Love for Three Oranges."

At the Thursday concert the orchestra will give an all-Russian program with Seriabine's third symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain." Saturday afternoon, besides the Prokofieff numbers there will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and a sonata of Galhard arranged by Steinberg.

Monitor 168

Boston

Jan 26

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, last night in Symphony Hall gave the second of this season's series of Monday evening concerts. Jesus Sanromá, pianist, was the assisting soloist. The program:

Gaillard—Sonata in G major (freely transcribed for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg)
Rachmaninoff—Pianoforte Concerto No. 2 in C minor
Strauss—"An Alpine Symphony"

Returning to his orchestra after a brief mid-winter vacation, Mr. Koussevitzky was greeted with enthusiasm by his audience. Even the opening night of a season of opera did not lessen the number of attendants, for, as has become the custom at all concerts of the orchestra, every seat was taken.

Fragmentary and episodic in nature, Gaillard's fragile old bit seems scarcely worth the care and pains lavished on its arrangement and performance. For Mr. Steinberg has exercised a skilled technical ability on its restoration. Likewise Mr. Koussevitzky has bestowed on this little antique the same detailed attentiveness which large and brilliant compositions call from him. But this "infinite capacity for taking pains" seems ingrained in the man's nature.

Interest in Gaillard's music may be tinged with a certain antiquarianism. Quite another extreme of feeling animates any consideration of Mr. Sanromá's performance of the Rachmaninoff Concerto. Unbelievable as it may seem, this young pianist has not yet had his head turned by the abundant praise poured on him. He continues to work. He continues to play before audiences both large and small. Most important of all, he continues to improve. Each performance shows a slight but noticeable advance over earlier appearances.

Last evening Mr. Sanromá played as if there existed for him only the music he was traversing and the leader before him. He played Rachmaninoff's music with delicacy, with fervor, with understanding, even with a touch of the "grand manner." The sophistications of sections of the concerto he stripped of artificiality. Stark, unmantled emotion poured from the tensity, the mounting climax, the surcharged vibrance of the concluding movement. Yet restraint came at his call many times in the course of the music. The fartherly pat which Mr. Koussevitzky bestowed on the pianist's head was in tune with the enthusiastic applause.

Presumably this performance of Strauss's much discussed "Alpine Symphony" marks its disappearance, for a time at least, from this orchestra's concerts. Two recent pairs of regular concerts have set forth its ingredients. Hearing it once more, one wondered how Strauss limited his realistic imitations to a mere wind machine, a thunder machine and cowbells. For surely he might have incorporated a well-behaved yodel in the mixture.

Fortunately for the hearer, comparatively few sections of the "Alpine Symphony" lend themselves to ridicule. If this music does not achieve the effectiveness of some of Strauss's most impelling works, it does remain beautifully descriptive program music, of a realistic and daring type. But Richard Strauss knows the perverseness of the public and its opinions. How, then, did he summon the courage to risk going down in the annals of popular musical history as the composer of the "Cow-bell Symphony?"

RESURRECTED CRAFTSMAN

Galliard Contributes an Eighteenth-Century Sonata for Present Novelty—Mr. Sanroma and, Once More, Strauss—Monday-Nighters Greet Mr. Koussevitzky—Music Hereabouts

It is the year 2155. The wise ones among the radio announcers (we used to call them college professors, in an earlier organization of society) have explained to the public repeatedly that the beginning of the twentieth century produced the world's one supremely great composer in the person of Arnold Schönberg, of whom pictures are flashed into our homes, whose music we are forced to hear for the good of our souls—though some of us get a bit tired of it—and it is told us over and over again that he is so great first, because the whole range of human emotion resides in his works, a bit hard to see, to be sure, for the uninitiated, but it is there nevertheless; second, because the whole structure of the music of the twenty-first century and of the twenty-second, that golden epoch of music, rests squarely upon his shoulders.

But now an enterprising conductor, in search for novelty, comes upon a forgotten score. With the help of the most erudite of the radio announcers, who promises aid in his few hours off duty, it is possible to reconstruct the faded pages. The title is "Nocturnes," the composer a hitherto unheard one, Achilles Claude DeBussy. The conductor plays his score. It wins a certain praise. He persists, and gradually even the radio announcers begin to recognize its worth.

Coming back to 1926, let us ask ourselves a question: "How much do we really know about the music of a couple of centuries ago?" We are told that the musical sun rises and sets in the works of Bach and Handel; minor composers of worth are enumerated. But few ever even hear of one John Ernest Galliard, unless perchance they have come to Boston and have heard the concerts of its Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Serge Koussevitzky. Again last evening, at the second of the Monday series of concerts, the orchestra played Maximilian Steinberg's transcription of Galliard's Sonata in G major. The string band, a flute, an oboe, a bassoon play it. In style it is none too similar to the works of the great George Frederick, or the greater Johann Sebastian. Previous impressions are but renewed. In these four movements resides the rarest beauty, the beauty of tones swelling, long-sustained, the beauty of tones in active kaleidoscopic motion. Not skill in the use of counterpoint as such, not its use as a matter of routine, nor yet its use in laying bare the depths of a noble soul, is what interests Galliard; but the use of counterpoint in the quest for pure beauty—there is his field, there his achievement. With the string band, now winning fame on every hand, to play it, with Messrs Laurent, Gillet, Laus as quasi-soloists, with the sensitive Mr. Koussevitzky to conduct, performance matched, yes, surely much

Continued on Page [illegible]

RESURRECTED CRAFTSMAN

Boston Transcript Jan 26

Continued from Page Eight

more than matched the biggest conception that good old John Ernest Galliard ev had of his piece.

A soloist graced this concert, a young Bostonian, a familiar figure in concert halls. Modest, unassuming, Mr. Sanroma is occasionally heard in an ensemble concert—when it is decidedly up to his partner to prove himself the pianist's equal. Rakhmaninov's second concerto he played last evening. Applause was loud and long, bringing the young artist back to the stage time and again. Deservedly so. Not often does a piano paired with an orchestra acquit itself so well. Flaws one cannot find in this youth's performance. Tone was beauty itself, in many a gradation, with many a modulation. Plasticity there was, the broadest and best-considered molding of phrase. Phrase followed phrase, building up into shapely larger structures. No sign of immaturity here. No sign of mere adequate technical equipment, skillfully handled. For fires burn deep within young Sanroma, fires which together with his unlimited technical resource will carry him, indeed already place him, with the world's elect among pianists. Many a visiting artist of note has fallen short of Mr. Sanroma's work yesterday.

After the intermission the orchestra played Strauss's "Alpensymphonie," fifth performance in five weeks. It is a work played none too often, laid by now and again as not a worthy companion to the most of the rest of Strauss's orchestral works. From this one must dissent. The works of Strauss that do not contain some dross are indeed few and far between. As for the rest, the Alpensymphonie" does not fall far below them. Nor are its weakest portions those in which machinery cowbells, a maximum of percussion are added to the music. Strauss can be, indeed is in this piece, quite as dissonant as a cowbell ever thought of being. Its weakest spots are passages in which invention permits dullness to overtake it, as in certain development sections worked out by the composer's routine ability. Banal themes there are also, as for example the one which forms the subject for the rather dry fugato. But the weakest part, to the present writer, is the peroration. The composer has finished his piece, but still he wanders on and on with apparent aimlessness. A good European organist trained in the technic of improvisation could ramble on in this fashion for hour and hours. But the weak spots are much overbalanced by the strong ones. And the strong ones include the main bulk of the work. Themes are many—all but about two are worthy of the best of Strauss. Mood he evokes over and over again. Structurally the work hangs together admirably—not counting the appendage at the end. And a virtuoso performance received at the hands of the orchestra.

The Monday evening concerts were fir to welcome the returned Mr. Koussevitzk The [illegible] not listen to a "guest

---

APROPOS GOOSSENS

Trans Jan 21

A Note on the Impending Visitor—His Place in British Music; His Career; His Work—Delius and a Norwegian Cuckoo

Transcript — Jan 21.

Mr. Eugene Goossens, who conducts the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week-end, appears on the program as composer as well as conductor. On this program he has placed his own Sinfonietta, and with it a work by his countryman, Frederick Delius, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring." Mr. Goossens has won fame as a violinist in the London Philharmonic String Quartet; he is equally brilliant as a concert pianist. His early career as a conductor was phenomenal. At the age of twenty-three he was invited by Sir Thomas Beecham to conduct a performance of Stanford's "The Critic." A permanent engagement resulted. Similarly, a single engagement at the Hallé concerts at Manchester resulted in many re-engagements. Soon the Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra began to invite him to conduct as guest. In 1920 Sir Henry Wood invited him to conduct his own "Eternal Rhythm," and by 1921—at the age of twenty-eight—he found himself established in the front rank of European conductors. His work with the symphony orchestra at Rochester, N. Y., is known to most American music-lovers. But however great Mr. Goossens may be as violinist, pianist, or conductor, his chief fame rests upon his work as a creative artist.

Eugène Goossens began composing at an early age. Yet his works have never been known as the works of a beginner. From the first, his works have showed remarkable technical finish, often even considerable maturity of imagination. If he committed indiscretions as a youthful composer, he had the critical good sense never to allow them to see the light of publicity. Writers speak of him as having absorbed the methods of Debussy, of Skryabin, of Strauss—all according to the writer you happen to read. Goossens, like Shakspeare, has learned from all the world about him. His own musical personality has always dominated over his models in his works. An unconscious nationalism, high emotion, tenderness, passion, and perhaps most important, humor, have all found their place in his art. He is a modern in that he thinks chromatically rather than diatonically; he has been called a "neo-classic" in that his "formal principles are classic, but he works in a medium which is largely novel."

Of the work of Mr. Goossens to be performed here on Friday and Saturday, The Musical Times (London), of April 1, 1923, said:

"Eugène Goossens conducted the London Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 18, and his own new Quarter-of-an-Hour Symphony (or "Sinfonietta") was included in the program. It has three movements—a sonata-form first, a 'Romanza second, and a scherzo-like third. Some of the subject-matter is used in more than one movement, and there is a 'motto-theme' (picked up in the street from a whistling passer-by) that appears in all. The whole work flies in the face of some of the theories and principles of its own composer, as laid down in numerous lectures and articles; but if he does not object to such defiance, nobody else is likely to do so. So far as can be seen, nothing has been lost by this frank adoption of the old-fashioned 'development' system and by the representation of 'extra-musical emotion'! The fact is, of course, that none of these young men bite half as hard as they bark.

Continued on Last Page

APROPOS GOOSSENS

Continued from Page Sixteen

"The whole work, in subject-matter, harmony, and orchestration—is very interesting, and its conciseness should lead to its being heard often enough for the public to find out whether it likes it—a point about which it seemed a little in doubt at the first performance, probably not finding the harmonic scheme immediately accessible."

And a writer in The Chesterian for April, 1923 (Mr. Leigh Henry) says:

"Far and away above all the novelties mentionel [of the past few weeks in London] for clarity of expression, for sense of form, and for real musicality, was Eugène Goossens's 'Sinfonietta,' and the instrumentation is even more original than that of the exquisite 'Eternal Rhythm.' Here one feels that Goossens has escaped certain romantic weaknesses which threatened some preceding works, has attained a rarity and purity of expression truly classic."

Frederick Delius's "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring" was written in 1912 and first performed at London in January, 1914, at a Philharmonic Concert under Mengelberg. Mr. Philip Heseltine, in his authoritative "Frederick Delius," says of this piece and of its companion-piece, "Summer Night on the River," that they are certainly Delius's "finest achievements in purely orchestral music." He continues:

"To anyone quite unacquainted with his music the 'First Cuckoo' might be presented as an epitome of his whole life's work. It is based upon a twofold melory; the first part is Delius's own, a sequence of phrases that echo each other like distant cuckoo calls, the second is derived from a Norwegian folk-song, 'I Ola Dalon' ('In Ola Valley the Church Chimes Ring'), which is to be harmonized by Grieg [as No. 14] in his Opus 66 ['Popular Norwegian Melodies for Pianoforte']. Associated with the song is a legend of an old woman who, thinking her son had been kidnapped by the bogles and bugaboos of the hills, rang the bells of the neighboring church in the hope of releasing him from their power. But Delius chose the theme for its musical beauty, without any thought of its traditional associations, and using it as a motif has painted in unforgettable tones the emotions of one for whom spring is not so much a season of riot and exuberance, fresh hopes and renewed vitality, as a vision of such sweet and tender loveliness that the heart stands still in contemplation of it and the old unrest of the soul is put to sleep."

Mr. Percy Grainger, in the Symphony Society bulletins, on the occasion of the performance by the New York Symphony adds: "Delius adores Norway and knows it as few non-Scandinavians do. He has spent eighteen summers in the High Hills. Therefore, the advent of the spring brings for him longings for Norway, and particularly for those glorious mountains and fine hill-men from which 'I Ola Dalon' hails. That is why he has used this Norwegian tune in this impression of spring."

Frederick Delius was forty-three years of age before any large work of his was published—even though he had been writing for twenty years. His modesty, his unwillingness to use his compositions for publicity's sake, his refusal to resort to wire-pulling of any kind in order to gain recognition caused this extremely late acknowledgment of his powers. Haseltine has struck a true note then when he adds, later in his volume:

"One feels that all Delius's music is evolved out of the emotions of a past that was never fully realized when it was present, emotions which only became real after they had ceased to be experienced. . . . Here perhaps we have the explanation of the sadness that is intermingled with the serenity and sweetness of the conception of spring revealed in the 'First Cuckoo'; for it is a spring of the soul that cannot blossom until the autumn has come, that has so little time to stay. . . . The apparent victories of time over the soul, in separation and in going apart, are Delius's predominant theme; but in his music there is always a smile of assurance which seems to tell us that time itself is no more than the great illusion of the world."

A. H. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
FEB 2 1 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMING HERE NEXT MONTH

One of the outstanding concert events that has been brought to New Haven music lovers in many years is scheduled for Woolsey Hall on the night of March 11th, at which time the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear under the auspices of the Yale School of Music. The event will mark the fifth and final offering of the season of the Steinert Concert Series, which this year has proven the most popular ever, and with such an ambitious presentation as the Boston Symphony to conclude the series Woolsey Hall will undoubtedly be jammed to the doors for the occasion. Of great importance to the forthcoming event is the fact that the great musical organization will be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, who will make his first appearance before the local audiences at that time.

The concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season are in greater demand than they have ever been in the illustrious history of this great organization, and the waiting lists of applicants for subscription tickets have for the first time reached the number of 1000. Since every series in Boston is subscribed for the season to the last seat, a new historical series has just been announced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons. This will increase the total number of concerts in greater Boston to 73 as against 59 five years ago. The same conditions apply in New York where ten concerts are given.

This demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the orchestra, who is now beginning his second season in America.

Coming to America a year ago, with this reputation to herald him, Koussevitzky, appearing over the famous orchestra which he still commands, more than fulfilled the highest expectations. He has quickly become the most outstanding figure in the musical world of those cities which the orchestra visits and his reputation extends the length and breadth of this country.

Seats are now on sale for the Boston Symphony concert at Steinert's, 183 Church St.

NEXT SYMPHONY CONCERT FEB. 9TH

Traveler — Jan 30

Schumann's "Manfred" to Be Given by People's

Since the Boston Symphony orchestra will be on tour next week there will be no concerts in Boston until the week following. On Tuesday afternoon, Feb. 9, at 3:15, there will take place the third concert of the new historical series. The music will consist of Brahm's First Symphony and numbers by Wagner, Saint-Saens and Tchaikovsky.

The 15th regular pair of concerts will take place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 12 and 13. Mr. Koussevitsky will then present a Concerto for Strings by Vivaldi; a Contrapuntol Fantasy by Lekeu; Respighi's Symphony Poem, the "Pines of Rome," then to be heard for the first time in Boston, and Beethoven's First Symphony.

Mr. Koussevitzky, returning from his vacation spent in New York, will conduct the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra this week. The program will comprise Moussorgsky's fantastical "Night on Bald Mountain," Prokofieff's third piano concerto, and Scriabin's symphony "The Divine Poem." Mr. Prokofieff will be the pianist. The third concerto was performed for the first time at Chicago on Dec. 16, 1921, when the composer was in that city attending to the production of his opera "The Love for Three Oranges."

It was announced that this program would include Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony. Later it was stated that the symphony would not be played; that the March and Scherzo from his opera would be substituted. These excerpts from the opera have been dropped for the time being.

Boston has already heard Prokofieff's splendidly barbaric "Symphony" suite; his violin concerto which was played here by Mr. Burgin; his "Song without Words," sang by Nina Koshetz.

PROKOFIEFF IS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

American Jan 30

By MOSES SMITH

When Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, came on the stage at the start of yesterday's concert, it was the signal for one of the longest demonstrations that has taken place there for years. The audience was acknowledging its admiration for the conductor, who was absent from the two previous concerts.

Mr. Koussevitzky proceeded to conduct the orchestra with his accustomed vigor and insight, in Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain," glowing Orchestral Fantasy. Certainly it glowed under his baton.

The soloist was one of the "wild men of Russia," Serge Prokofieff, whose own Third Piano Concerto was on the program. Mr. Prokofieff in the flesh did not turn out to be wild at all, nor did the Concerto, which was performed for the first time in Boston, have the primitive savagery of his "Scythian Suite," which Mr. Koussevitzky had introduced to Boston audiences last year.

Nevertheless this Concerto is a very original work. And just as you never quite know what type of music to expect from these new Russians, so in a particular piece there are startling and violent changes and contrasts. The soloist, by the way, proved to be an exceptionally gifted pianist, with a marvellous technical facility. His fingers flew all over the keys, and were everywhere at once. The audience applauded very heartily at the close of the performance.

The other number was Scriabin's "Divine Poem." Only once before has this piece been heard in Boston. That was when Mr. Monteux brought it out at these concerts two years ago. To our mind this is the best of the Symphonic pieces of Scriabin with which Bostonians are familiar. The performance of the work was brilliant.

GOOSENS LEADS HUB ORCHESTRA

Another guest conductor, this time an attractive, and dynamic young Englishman, Eugene Goosens, is duplicating the success made at the Symphony Concerts last week by the gifted Russian visitor, Michael Press.

Jan 23

Mr. Goosens appeared as composer as well as leader, for one of the two novelties on this 13th program, which will be broadcast tonight, is his charming "Sinfonietta."

Equally admirable was the new work by Goosens' fellow-countryman, Delius, an imaginative and intriguingly scored little tone picture called "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring."

Mr. Goosens offers a model program, easily one of the best of the season, and this, combined with excellent conducting and some of the best playing the Hub orchestra has done since its reorganization, excited unusual enthusiasm.

After the performance of Brahms' fourth symphony, conductor and players received an intensely warm ovation. Two other numbers that provoked much applause were Weber's sparkling "Freischuetz" overture and Debussy's delightful "Iberia" tone pictures.

---

and half-believing it at [illegible] On the fullest authority every such rumor is groundless and not to be endured.

---

numbers there will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and a sonata of Galhard arranged by Steinberg.

EFF IS T AT ONY

JAN 30

ITH vitzky, con-
y Orchestra,
the start of
was the sig-t demonstraace there for was acknowlfor the con-nt from the proceeded to with his ac-insight, in ht on Bald hestral Fand under his

of the "wild Prokofieff,
no Concerto
, Prokofieff
n out to be Concerto.
r the first primitive an Suite," had intro-
s last year.
certo is a just as you ype of mu-new Ruspiece there hanges and y the way,
ally gifted technical w all over ywhere at uded very he perform-

Scriabin's
once before rd in Bos-
. Monteux ncerts two this is the pieces of onians are nce of the

DS
ESTRA

tor, this dynamic Goosens, made at t week by r, Michael composer of the two program, tonight, is

."
the new -countryative and ne picture rst Cuc-

del pro-t of the with exe of the stra has n, excited

Brahms' ctor and ly warm
bers that se were schuetz" delightful

---

ny Orc
th Serge scanini ociety

d visit of the Symphony Or-
of Serge Kous-and Satur ppearance of in his third rchestra will rzo from his ranges."
e orchestra ogram with
The Divine
ght on Bald
, besides the b Rimskya sonata
nberg.

SYMPHONIC INTERLUDES

A Note on the Current Way with Musical Masterpieces

IT has become the fashion to play symphonies in three or four movements without any considerable intervals between the movements, and without permitting the audience to applaud until the end of the work. It may be asked why? It does not matter any longer what symphony it is; whether it is a classic by Haydn, such as the "Clock" symphony recently interpreted by Mr. Toscanini, or a modern work like Tchaikovsky's "Symphonie Pathétique" as performed by Mr. Koussevitzky, or Mr. Stokowski with a new work by Miascovsky, or Mr. Sokoloff with the long and involved symphony of Arnold Bax, which he introduced in this city last Tuesday night. Whatever the music, whatever its character or style, the conductor signals for silence a the end of a movement, waits just long enough to prepare his men, and proceeds with his task. The work is heard in solemn silence. No one ventures a sound There is the atmosphere of ritual, which may have been the last thing intended by the composer.

This procedure is becoming general; in some instances it is for the good of the composer and the audience; in many instances it defeats its own purpose.

The purpose is that nothing shall distract the attention of the listeners or interrupt the continuity of the composer's thought. But this may be in direct contrast to the musician's intention, to say nothing of the unwarranted and unprofitable strain upon the mental processes of the audience. Why play a Haydn symphony through, with all the repeats, with the result of a solid half hour or more of music, when that is not Haydn's plan or necessary to the trade standing of his composition? Haydn did not compose tone-poems or music dramas. He labored humbly to produce beautiful sound, and, also, in the best sense of the word, to please. He did not regard his art with knitted brows. He did not intend, when he produced a symphony, to inspire vast meditations upon the infinite. It does not make his composition any greater, or show any particular degree of reverence to him, to treat him as if he did, or as if it were light-minded to betray a human enthusiasm for his music.

The classic symphonists were particularly concerned with justness and balance of proportion. Their works were conceived and carried out in formal divisions. The divisions are carefully contrasted with each other, in time and rhythm, in mood, form, melodic content. The character of one movement is thrown into relief by contrast with the others. Between each movement there is opportunity for an instant's rest on the part of the audience and the nervous and emotional relief that applause often provides. This is for the good of the listener and the symphony. It is procedure based upon logical principes of artistic balance and proportion, and also the principles of psychology. The symphony, a great architectural design, requires proper spacing and arrangement for its best presentation. The audience is the gainer if it can rest the ears and the mind in the intervals of the performance.

Certainly this is true of the symphony in which formal considerations overbalance emotional fervor and romantic meaning. But it also applies to symphonies of the more modern and dramatic kind. The fifth symphony of Beethoven is obviously the work of a romanticist, in spite of its powerful concentration of elements of classic form. Its first two movements stand complete in themselves and apart from each other. A brief space of time is not only appropriate but desirable between them. The first movement is a musical and emotional unit, an expression of amazing intensity and compression of force. When its passion and stress ends, there should be a reasonable interval for adjustment to the mood of the variations that follow. Not to permit that opportunity and prevent the applause which is perfectly creditable emotional outlet, is to work injury to the effect of the symphony. For the slow movement, following without a pause the revolutionary fury of the preceding section, cannot have the effect Beethoven intended; the audience has not been permitted to realize its reactions and prepare for what is to come. In the two movements that follow, the situation is otherwise. These two movements depend upon each other for the effect—one of the most dramatic in all music—of the transition from the mysterious and the ominous suspense of the scherzo to the wild rejoicings of the finale. And what has Beethoven done? He has joined the two movements.

The grander the proportions of the symphony the more advisable that it be played as a work in parts, even when there is intimate thematic or dramatic relation between them. Brahms's C minor symphony, corresponding to the dramatic plan of Beethoven's symphony in the same key, but more elaborate in its structure, uses thematic fragments which reappear in the different divisions. Only one of these divisions is entirely free of the haunting presence of the fate theme heard at once in the introduction. The composer's meaning is clear. Once again it is the struggle with fate, the triumph of righteousness. The meaning is not the less plain, but rather more so, if the movements are properly separated from each other. Franck's symphony, more intimately related in its parts, should no more be heard without pauses between the movements than an opera in four acts should be given in one. In each instance the significance of the musical and dramatic expression is the greater for separation and contrast.

There is, of course, no hard and fast rule that applies to such cases. There are many instances when a moment of silence enhances musical effect as nothing else can—instances, indeed, where the silence itself assumes the quality and significance of music. Like everything else, taste and individual judgment should be brought to bear in these matters. But it is not good when a method appropriate under some [illegible] orchestra [illegible] first-rate orchestra, that distinction is a most elusive quality. But they join the rest of us in welcoming Mr. Koussevitzky back into the fold, so that distinguished conducting and distinguished playing may go undiminished, enhancing each other, climbing mountain-tops of achievement.

A. H. M.

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Casals, the violoncellist, is ambitious to be conductor. At concerts in Barcelona, London and New York he has given clear proof of corresponding abilities. He controls and sways the orchestra; he is master of the music in hand. Next winter, when Mr. Koussevitzky takes holiday, one or two guest-conductors must be bidden to Symphony Hall. If Mr. Casals is then in America, why should not he be the choice? The public that rises to him as violoncellist would hear him eagerly as conductor. Besides, he is a personage.

The Scherzo of the Bumble Bee—fragment from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera "Tsar Saltan"—of which Mr. Koussevitzky made much last season, has received final consecration as concert-piece. The Conservatory Orchestra in Paris lately played it; and there is none more hidebound in ritual and tradition. It has also found room for Respighi's new tone-poem, "Pines of Rome," which the public of Symphony Hall still awaits.

At his concert in Jordan Hall, on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 6, Mr. Gieseking, the first new pianist of renown to visit Boston this season, will repeat the program of his début in New York. It comprises a Partita in G major from Bach; three little Sonatas from Scarlatti; Schumann's "Kreisleriana"; the First Book of Debussy's Preludes—twelve in all; Busoni's Sonatina for Christmas Day, 1917; his mildly satirical Sonatina "ad usum infantis." By these signs Mr. Gieseking does not assemble conventional "test-pieces."

SYMPHONY GIVES 11TH CONCERT

"Benvenuto Cellini" Overture and Haydn's Concerto Well Performed

Herald Jan 2

"ALPINE SYMPHONY" AGAIN WINS FAVOR

The eleventh symphony concert yesterday was an occasion of unusual euphony, which began with the opening bars of Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, that piece of music one longs to find beautiful if only out of response to Berlioz's persuasive words about it, and also from sympathy for his struggles to get his opera produced. It still sounds well; yesterday M. Koussevitzky, with his nicest taste to the fore and his finest cunning, saw to that.

It is well he did. The overture had yesterday little more than many varieties of beautiful sound to grace it; its force seemed spent, its stirring rhythm, too; its brilliancy. But who will forget the sound of it, above all the oboe solo, the splendor of the trumpets near the end? A fine sense of proportion can accomplish much.

Much that was exquisite Mr. Koussevitzky accomplished in the accompaniment to Haydn's concerto in D major for violoncello, for he made it, especially the first movement, as agreeable in sound as though it were being played where Haydn meant it to be played, in a small hall. Thus, free from harshness and not swollen up like the ambitious frog of the fable, the concerto could make its charm felt. Charm it has in plenty.

Pablo Casals played the solo part. In his strict adherence to the doctrine, he evidently holds that a performer when playing a classic should let the composer speak for himself, Mr. Casals throughout the first movement all but leaned over backward; though he played with lovely tone—very small, to be sure—and the utmost niceness of phrasing, he kept himself so modestly in the background that the performance lacked all life. As for the finale, it is hard to believe that Haydn imagined it so void of snap and bounce as Mr. Casals fancies it.

But in the adagio Mr. Casals proved the soundness of his doctrine. Putting firmly behind him the 'cellist's temptation to whine and sob and roll slow melodies in sugar, Mr. Casals, trusting confidently in Haydn, played the movement with a noble simplicity that in very truth "let the composer speak for himself." The grace of Haydn's music as Mr. Casals drew it from his instrument, the amazing beauty of Mr. Casals's tone, these are not to be soon forgotten. The artist was cordially applauded.

For a quite different sort of magnificent sound Mr. Koussevitzky had his golden opportunity in Richard Strauss's "Alpine Symphony," wisely repeated to let people really come to know it. The symphony may be very long; it may use in its length some themes that are ordinary, indulge in some episodes too obvious—those cowbells could not fail to sound silly to people who live in the country, nor could country folk ever be impressed with wind that comes from a churn, let it howl as loud as it likes.

Hats, nevertheless, should come off before Richard Strauss, who at the least of it was stirred to write of mountain tops and sunrise, brooks, forests, wide open spaces, storms, and who has so complete a mastery of his means that he can do it. How well he knows the advantage a climax has if it is properly prepared! How fully he understands the value of contrast! How rich and satisfying he makes his music sound. (The superb performance yesterday had a hand in that!)

Strauss must feel deep in his heart the appeal of mountain country. A

Transcript Jan 13

Sign of the Times?

The Boston Orchestra, Koussevitzky and the Succession

SPECULATION about the future remains speculation. Often there is no warrant for it; yet now and again it proves to be divination. Hence its perpetual interest to fallible men and hence the re-printing of the following paragraph from the London Daily Telegraph:

> There is a substantial probability of Eugene Goossens succeeding Koussevitzky as conductor-in-chief of the famous Boston Orchestra. It appears that Koussevitzky is disinclined to continue in Boston after the close of the season of next autumn, owing to his many business engagements and business affairs in Europe, and that in the event of his resignation occurring then the most enviable post will be taken over by Eugene Goossens. This, of course, means that Goossens will thus become a guest-conductor over here instead of over there. Well, well! Who can blame him? He is young and enthusiastic and capable—and fully occupied. Here he would be equally the first three, but alas! not the fourth.

Seemingly "the season" about which The Telegraph predicts is that of 1926-27. For a fact, Mr. Goossens will be guest-conductor at the Symphony Concerts next week. Praise be! he is both young and of modernist sympathies.

FINE PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY

Traveler Jan 23

First Broadcasting of the Beautiful Music in Boston Tonight

Those who are looking forward to listening in when the first Boston Symphony program is broadcast this evening will find their anticipations fully met. The program is an interesting one, representing a range of periods from Weber (contemporary of Beethoven) to the 32-year-old Goossens, who is also conductor for the day.

The opening piece is Weber's familiar "Overture" to the opera "Der Freischutz," composed 125 years ago. It is scored for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, kettledrums and strings. Its themes suggest the characters and plot of the acient novel on which the opera is based—the brave huntsman Max, who goes off into the mountains to prove his marksmanship, that he may be entitled to the hand of the beautiful Agatha; while she, amid preparations for her wedding to him, dreams she has been transformed into a dove and is killed by one of his shots.

The overture is followed by the Fourth Symphony, in E minor, by Brahms, written about 40 years ago. This is the symphony that was played at the last concert Brahms heard before his death, in 1897, when he was received with wild acclaim as a master. Wistfulness is perhaps its prevailing characteristic. It is scored for two flutes (one interchangeable with piccolo), two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, double bassoon, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, kettledrums, triangle and strings.

The short intermission after the Brahms symphony is followed by Mr. Goossens's composition, written in 1912, which he calls a "symphonietta." The instruments used are three flutes (two interchangeable with piccolo), two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, bass clarinet, two bassoons, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, bass tuba, kettledrums, side drums, cymbals, triangle, glockenspiel, celesta, harp and the usual strings.

The piece was played in Boston for the first time yesterday, and a true estimate of it cannot be attempted now. This much may be ventured, however, that its three themes impress themselves on the ear more for their development than for their content—make an appeal more to the mind than to the emotions.

The next piece is another that was played in Boston for the first time yesterday, although some of the composer's other works have had places in Symphony programs here. It is entitled "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring." It was written in 1912 by Frederick Delius, born in Yorkshire 63 years ago and now living in France. It has two themes, one suggesting the cuckoo and the other based on a Norwegian folk song describing the old woman who rings the church bells to break the spell over her son of the ogres who have kidnapped him. The piece is full of sentiment and forms a strong contrast to the preceding one.

The program ends with "Iberia—Images for Orchestra," by Debussy. It has three movements: "In the Streets and Byways," "The Fragrance of the Night," "The Morning of a Festival Day." It is scored for piccolo, three flutes (one interchangeable with a second piccolo), two oboes, English horn, three clarinets, three bassoons, double bassoon, four horns, three trombones, bass tuba, kettledrums, side drum, tambourine, castanets, xylophone, celesta, cymbals, three bells (F, G, A), two harps and the usual strings.

This music, written about 20 years ago and first heard in Boston in 1911, sounds less novel now, after half a dozen hearings here, than when it was first produced. "Cacophanous" is an outworn description for the Debussy idiom. Yet the music has lost none of its color, none of its brilliance. It is different from that of the earlier eras, but it is no longer strange. It has its own beauty.

Mr. Eugene Goossens, guest conductor of this week's concerts, is a Belgian-Englishman, if he may so be termed. That is, he is of a Belgian family who settled in London two generations ago. He has been heralded as a modernist, but that term is perhaps more applicable to him as a composer than as conductor. Certainly his selections yesterday showed a wide interpretive range and no partiality for the composers of his own time.

It is hardly possible to give more than an impression of his conducting on hearing one program. His renderings are faithful and effective without being brilliant. He does not employ terse phrasing or subtle nuance. He seems more energetic than powerful.

He has a fine stage presence, and one feature of the concert of which his radio audience will be deprived is the kaleidoscopic series of dancing angles and curves which his slim, well tailored figure cuts in the course of his conducting. The audience yesterday afternoon was enthusiastic in its appreciation.

The concerts next week will again be conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky.

OTHER J[illegible] NOT[illegible]
WILL BE FOUND ON PAGE 206 - 207

JANUARY 20, 1926

PROV JOURNAL 169

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Interest in the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra give last evening at Infantry Hall centred in the appearance of Eugene Goossens who came as guest conductor. The usual big audience attended, intent upon hearing for the first time the orchestral leader who recently made such a fine impression in New York.

Mr. Goossens is conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, a post he has held since he came to this country a few years ago. His splendid success with the New York Symphony this season at the first of a series of apeparances with that organization brought him more prominently before the American musical public. He is an Englishman, and for many years previous to his coming here was a noted figure in England's musical life.

Last evening Mr. Goossens gave Providence music lovers a decided treat in a programme that held the Brahms Symphony in E-minor as principal number. It it said that he has a special fondness for the great classicists. In the Brahms work he found a rich field for the display of interpretive talent and he was no less successful in the remainder of the nicely balanced programme.

Upon appearance for the opening overture he was accorded a warm greeting, but before the concert ended interest and polite recognition grew into stormy applause of appreciation of his unusual gifts. From beginning to end of the programme the audience seemed greatly impressed by his power and the players went to their task with an enthusiasm which could have but one result—a delightful concert.

The programme was played in the following order:

Overture to "Der Freischutz" ....Weber
Symphony in E-minor, No. 4, Op. 98...Brahms
Allegro non troppo.
Andante moderato.
Allegro giocoso.
Allegro energico e passionato.
Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde" ....Wagner
"On Hearing the First Cucoo in Spring" ....Delius
"Finlandia"; Symphonic Poem for Orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7..........Sibelius

Providence patrons are accustomed to brilliant performances by the Boston Symphony under Mr. Koussevitzky and to rouse them to enthusiasm a conductor in the Russian leader's place must needs possess qualities of a high order. That Mr. Goossens has uch qualitie became evident in the firt number played, the Weber overture. This, however, was but the prelude to a richer and fuller display of musicianship which came in the playing of the Brahms symphony. There

---

Monitor Jan 30

Serge Prokofieff Soloist With Boston Symphony

The fourteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, was:

Moussorgsky."A Night on Bald Mountain"
Prokofieff......Third Concerto for Piano
Scriabin
Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem"

Mr. Koussevitzky resumed his baton yesterday after an absence of two weeks. His return was greeted by applause prolonged somewhat longer than usual. The program was composed entirely of Russian music, of which Mr. Koussevitzky is quite naturally fond. To begin with, there was the orchestral fantasy of the crude and overrated Moussorgsky, to be sure smoothed over by the expert Rimsky-Korsakoff. Then there was the Piano Concerto of the forward-looking Prokofieff, and lastly the inflated "Divine Poem," a monument to the industry and self-confidence of its composer, who succeeds in saying nothing portentously, in a strange musical speech partaking overmuch of the Wagnerian idiom.

It would seem that in this program all the qualities which endear the music of the Russians to lovers of symphonic music were lacking. Only the defects of this school of composition were in evidence. Even the more expert hand of Rimsky failed to soften entirely the crudities of Moussorgsky or to conceal the amateurishness of his methods of composition. "A Night on Bald Mountain" quickens the imagination by its program, but as actual music it falls far short of satisfying fulfillment.

The piano part of Prokofieff's concerto was played by the composer. There was natural curiosity to see and hear him, and thus some attention was drawn from his music.

Yesterday's concerto had no program to illustrate. Presumably it was to be heard as music pure and simple. As heard for the first time, it seems to consist of repetition rather than development. Rhythmically it is not without interest. Neither is the playing of a good drum corps. This is merely a personal impression. Others, no doubt, will find another appeal in this music.

Mr. Prokofieff played the piano part in unrelenting fashion. He rushed up and down the keyboard with apparent security. Beauty of tone, nuance, color were not considered of importance by him. Of rhythmical life and vigor there was much. But one is tempted to ask, "Is rhythm the sole end and aim of music."

S. M.

GOOSSENS AT SYMPHONY HALL

Herald Jan 23

Conducts Orchestra as Guest—Gives Brilliant Concert

PROGRAM TESTS HIS VERSATILITY

By PHILIP HALE

Eugene Goossens, as a guest, conducted the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. He visited Boston this week for the first time. For his program he chose two unfamiliar works; his own Sinfonietta, produced in London in February, 1923, and performed at Rochester, N. Y., under his direction in the season of 1923-24; "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," by Delius, which was brought out in London two years ago. The program also included Weber's overture to "Der Freischuetz," Brahm's Fourth Symphony and Debussy's "Iberia."

The enviable reputation of Mr. Goossens as a conductor had long preceded him. Born in a family of musicians, he has had wide experience, having conducted operas, ballets, symphony concerts in England and on the European continent. It was said earlier in the season that, in coming to Boston, he would like to be judged first of all as a conductor, not as a composer, yet the list of his works is a long one, embracing music for the stage and the orchestra, chamber music, songs and piano pieces. He has been known here for some years as a composer of chamber music. His Scherzo "Tam o'Shanter," was played at a concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in March, 1923.

His earlier compositions, by a certain audacity, by his not conforming to the august traditions of British academicians and doctors of music, were described in London as the musical excursions and adventures of an "enfant terrible." Of late, solemn writers about music in London have commended him for turning from the error of his ways. They have patted him on the head. We doubt if his conversion is so complete as these regarders of the rigid law and the aged prophets fondly believe. We certainly hope for his future that it is not.

The Program Book contained a short and modest description of the Sinfonietta by the composer. He ended by saying that he was "a poor estimator of his own work." Thus he did himself injustice. Though he may not look at all that he has done and pronounce it good, he shows in this music that he can criticise himself, that he is not verbose, that he is not intoxicated by his facility. The Sinfonietta is singularly compact, without superfluities. The first movement is practically a fantasia on a persistent little rhythmic figure, which, constantly occurring, is by ingenious treatment free from monotony. The second movement, introduced by a solo for the English horn, has original beauty. Mr. Goossens speaks of this movement, in an almost deprecatory manner, as "very sentimental." True, it has sentiment, but the expression is not too obvious; it is far from being mushy. By its poetic quality it is a charming interlude between two fiery sections. Mr. Goossens refers to the Finale as "hectic"; but the fever is soon over. Let us add that the orchestration of the Sinfonietta is ingenious.

Some regard Frederick Delius as the outstanding figure in the musical world of today. To many his idiom is foreign and unsympathetic. Boston knows only four of his orchestral works. It is not acquainted with his remarkable opera, "A Village Romeo and Juliet," his concertos, or his great choral works, "Sea Drift" (after Walt Whitman), "A Mass of Life" or his "Requiem" in memory of all young artists fallen in the war.

The short piece played yesterday is not an ornithological rhapsody. Like other music by Delius that we have heard, it has a strange reticence, sadness suggested, not emphasized; the music is acid-sweet; it is music that would grow on one, nor would the dangerous approach to monotony by the maintenance of subdued coloring be so noticeable as at a first hearing. Here is an example of how an indisputable impression may be made by the skilful use of the simplest orchestral resources. Mr. Heseltine, the biographer of Delius, reminds the hearer that spring is not to the composer a season of rioting nature and budding hope, but a sweet and tender vision so that "the old unrest of the soul is put to sleep." A pretty burst of rhetoric, but there is a quality in this music that is not so easily defined.

The concert was a brilliant one. The program tested the versatility of Mr. Goossens as a conductor. The romanticism of Weber, which is frank and dramatic, is not the romanticism of Brahms, which is tempered with austerity as perhaps befitted the last great composer of the German academic school. The moods of Delius and Debussy, as they were represented yesterday, are far apart. Yet Mr. Goossens in each instance interpreted as if for the time being he was the sworn champion of that particular school. His technical equipment was at once manifest; his clean and commanding beat, his ability to gain precision of attack in every choir of instruments, his skill in presenting dynamic gradations, stirring contrasts, and in preparing climaxes. More than this, he caught the spirit of the composer, was imbued by it, nor in his varied interpretation was he conscious of himself. The members of the orchestra played as if they rejoiced in being led by him.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct the concerts of next week. The [illegible] will be as follows: Moussorg[illegible] on Bald Mountain"

SYMPHONIC INTERLUDES

A Note on the Current Way with Musical Masterpieces

IT has become the fashion to play symphonies in three or four movements without any considerable intervals between the movements, and without permitting the audience to applaud until the end of the work. It may be asked why? It does not matter any longer what symphony it is; whether it is a classic by Haydn, such as the "Clock" symphony recently interpreted by Mr. Toscanini, or a modern work like Tchaikovsky's "Symphonie Pathétique" as performed by Mr. Koussevitzky, or Mr. Stokowski with a new work by Miascovsky, or Mr. Sokoloff with the long and involved symphony of Arnold Bax, which he introduced in this city last Tuesday night. Whatever the music, whatever its character or style, the conductor signals for silence a the end of a movement, waits just long enough to prepare his men, and proceeds with his task. The work is heard in solemn silence. No one ventures a sound There is the atmosphere of ritual, which may have been the last thing intended by the composer.

This procedure is becoming general; in some instances it is for the good of the composer and the audience; in many instances it defeats its own purpose.

The purpose is that nothing shall distract the attention of the listeners or interrupt the continuity of the composer's thought. But this may be in direct contrast to the musician's intention, to say nothing of the unwarranted and unprofitable strain upon the mental processes of the audience. Why play a Haydn symphony through with all the repeats, with the result of a solid half hour or more of music, when that is not Haydn's plan or necessary to the trade standing of his composition? Haydn did not compose tone-poems or music dramas. He labored humbly to produce beautiful sound, and, also, in the best sense of the word, to please. He did not regard his art with knitted brows. He did not intend, when he produced a symphony, to inspire vast meditations upon the infinite. It does not make his composition any greater, or show any particular degree of reverence to him, to treat him as if he did, or as if it were light-minded to betray a human enthusiasm for his music.

The classic symphonists were particularly concerned with justness and balance of proportion. Their works were conceived and carried out in formal divisions. The divisions are carefully contrasted with each other, in time and rhythm, in mood, form, melodic content. The character of one movement is thrown into relief by contrast with the others. Between each movement there is opportunity for an instant's rest on the part of the audience and the nervous and emotional relief that applause often provides. This is for the good of the listener and the symphony. It is procedure based upon logical principes of artistic balance and proportion, and also the principles of psychology. The symphony, a great architectural design, requires proper spacing and arrangement for its best presentation. The audience is the gainer if it can rest the ears and the mind in the intervals of the performance.

* * *

Certainly this is true of the symphony in which formal considerations overbalance emotional fervor and romantic meaning. But it also applies to symphonies of the more modern and dramatic kind. The fifth symphony of Beethoven is obviously the work of a romanticist, in spite of its powerful concentration of elements of classic form. Its first two movements stand complete in themselves and apart from each other. A brief space of time is not only appropriate but desirable between them. The first movement is a musical and emotional unit, an expression of amazing intensity and compression of force. When its passion and stress ends, there should be a reasonable interval for adjustment to the mood of the variations that follow. Not to permit that opportunity and prevent the applause which is perfectly creditable emotional outlet, is to work injury to the effect of the symphony. For the slow movement, following without a pause the revolutionary fury of the preceding section, cannot have the effect Beethoven intended; the audience has not been permitted to realize its reactions and prepare for what is to come. In the two movements that follow, the situation is otherwise. These two movements depend upon each other for the effect—one of the most dramatic in all music—of the transition from the mysterious and the ominous suspense of the scherzo to the wild rejoicings of the finale. And what has Beethoven done? He has joined the two movements.

The grander the proportions of the symphony the more advisable that it be played as a work in parts, even when there is intimate thematic or dramatic relation between them. Brahms's C minor symphony, corresponding to the dramatic plan of Beethoven's symphony in the same key, but more elaborate in its structure, uses thematic fragments which reappear in the different divisions. Only one of these divisions is entirely free of the haunting presence of the fate theme heard at once in the introduction. The composer's meaning is clear. Once again it is the struggle with fate, the triumph of righteousness. The meaning is not the less plain, but rather more so, if the movements are properly separated from each other. Franck's symphony, more intimately related in its parts, should no more be heard without pauses between the movements than an opera in four acts should be given in one. In each instance the significance of the musical and dramatic expression is the greater for separation and contrast.

There is, of course, no hard and fast rule that applies to such cases. There are many instances when a moment of silence enhances musical effect as nothing else can—instances, indeed, where the silence itself assumes the quality and significance of music. Like everything else, taste and individual judgment should be brought to bear in these matters. But it is not good when a method appropriate under some [illegible] orchestra can sound [illegible] first-rate orchestra, that distinction is a most elusive quality. But they join the rest of us in welcoming Mr. Koussevitzky back into the fold, so that distinguished conducting and distinguished playing may go undiminished, enhancing each other, climbing mountain-tops of achievement.

A. H. M.

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Casals, the violoncellist, is ambitious to be conductor. At concerts in Barcelona, London and New York he has given clear proof of corresponding abilities. He controls and sways the orchestra; he is master of the music in hand. Next winter, when Mr. Koussevitzky takes holiday, one or two guest-conductors must be bidden to Symphony Hall. If Mr. Casals is then in America, why should not he be the choice? The public that rises to him as violoncellist would hear him eagerly as conductor. Besides, he is a personage.

The Scherzo of the Bumble Bee—fragment from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera "Tsar Saltan"—of which Mr. Koussevitzky made much last season, has received final consecration as concert-piece. The Conservatory Orchestra in Paris lately played it; and there is none more hidebound in ritual and tradition. It has also found room for Respighi's new tone-poem, "Pines of Rome," which the public of Symphony Hall still awaits.

At his concert in Jordan Hall, on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 6, Mr. Gieseking, the first new pianist of renown to visit Boston this season, will repeat the program of his début in New York. It comprises a Partita in G major from Bach; three little Sonatas from Scarlatti; Schumann's "Kreisleriana"; the First Book of Debussy's Preludes—twelve in all; Busoni's Sonatina for Christmas Day, 1917; his mildly satirical Sonatina "ad usum infantis." By these signs Mr. Gieseking does not assemble conventional "test-pieces."

SYMPHONY GIVES 11TH CONCERT

"Benvenuto Cellini" Overture and Haydn's Concerto Well Performed

Herald Jan 2

"ALPINE SYMPHONY" AGAIN WINS FAVOR

The eleventh symphony concert yesterday was an occasion of unusual euphony, which began with the opening bars of Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, that piece of music one longs to find beautiful if only out of response to Berlioz's persuasive words about it, and also from sympathy for his struggles to get his opera produced. It still sounds well; yesterday M. Koussevitzky, with his nicest taste to the fore and his finest cunning, saw to that.

It is well he did. The overture had yesterday little more than many varieties of beautiful sound to grace it; its force seemed spent, its stirring rhythm, too; its brilliancy. But who will forget the sound of it, above all the oboe solo, the splendor of the trumpets near the end? A fine sense of proportion can accomplish much.

Much that was exquisite Mr. Koussevitzky accomplished in the accompaniment to Haydn's concerto in D major for violoncello, for he made it, especially the first movement, as agreeable in sound as though it were being played where Haydn meant it to be played, in a small hall. Thus, free from harshness and not swollen up like the ambitious frog of the fable, the concerto could make its charm felt. Charm it has in plenty.

Pablo Casals played the solo part. In his strict adherence to the doctrine, he evidently holds that a performer when playing a classic should let the composer speak for himself, Mr. Casals throughout the first movement all but leaned over backward; though he played with lovely tone—very small, to be sure—and the utmost niceness of phrasing, he kept himself so modestly in the background that the performance lacked all life. As for the finale, it is hard to believe that Haydn imagined it so void of snap and bounce as Mr. Casals fancies it.

But in the adagio Mr. Casals proved the soundness of his doctrine. Putting firmly behind him the 'cellist's temptation to whine and sob and roll slow melodies in sugar, Mr. Casals, trusting confidently in Haydn, played the movement with a noble simplicity that in very truth "let the composer speak for himself." The grace of Haydn's music as Mr. Casals drew it from his instrument, the amazing beauty of Mr. Casals's tone, these are not to be soon forgotten. The artist was cordially applauded.

For a quite different sort of magnificent sound Mr. Koussevitzky had his golden opportunity in Richard Strauss's "Alpine Symphony," wisely repeated to let people really come to know it. The symphony may be very long; it may use in its length some themes that are ordinary, indulge in some episodes too obvious—those cowbells could not fail to sound silly to people who live in the country, nor could country folk ever be impressed with wind that comes from a churn, let it howl as loud as it likes.

Hats, nevertheless, should come off before Richard Strauss, who at the least of it was stirred to write of mountain tops and sunrise, brooks, forests, wide open spaces, storms, and who has so complete a mastery of his means that he can do it. How well he knows the advantage a climax has if it is properly prepared! How fully he understands the value of contrast! How rich and satisfying he makes his music sound. (The superb performance yesterday had a hand in that!)

Strauss must feel deep in his heart the appeal of mountain country. A sense of exhilaration, when the ascent began and the summit rose in view, swept over many a listener yesterday. The symphony gains much on acquaintance.

Michael Press will conduct the 12th pair of concerts, Jan. 15 and 16. There will be Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture, Sibelius's first symphony, and Jacques Thibaud will play Brahms's violin concerto.

R. R. G.

[illegible] to continue in Boston after the close of the season of next autumn, owing to his many business engagements and business affairs in Europe, and that in the event of his resignation occurring then the most enviable post will be taken over by Eugene Goossens. This, of course, means that Goossens will thus become a guest-conductor over here instead of over there. Well, well! Who can blame him? He is young and enthusiastic and capable—and fully occupied. Here he would be equally the first three, but alas! not the fourth.

Seemingly "the season" about which The Telegraph predicts is that of 1926-27. For a fact, Mr. Goossens will be guest-conductor at the Symphony Concerts next week. Praise be! he is both young and of modernist sympathies.

FINE PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY

Traveler Jan 23

First Broadcasting of the Beautiful Music in Boston Tonight

Those who are looking forward to listening in when the first Boston Symphony program is broadcast this evening will find their anticipations fully met. The program is an interesting one, representing a range of periods from Weber (contemporary of Beethoven) to the 32-year-old Goossens, who is also conductor for the day.

The opening piece is Weber's familiar "Overture" to the opera "Der Freischutz," composed 125 years ago. It is scored for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, kettledrums and strings. Its themes suggest the characters and plot of the acient novel on which the opera is based—the brave huntsman Max, who goes off into the mountains to prove his marksmanship, that he may be entitled to the hand of the beautiful Agatha; while she, amid preparations for her wedding to him, dreams she has been transformed into a dove and is killed by one of his shots.

The overture is followed by the Fourth Symphony, in E minor, by Brahms, written about 40 years ago. This is the symphony that was played at the last concert Brahms heard before his death, in 1897, when he was received with wild acclaim as a master. Wistfulness is perhaps its prevailing characteristic. It is scored for two flutes (one interchangeable with piccolo), two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, double bassoon, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, kettledrums, triangle and strings.

The short intermission after the Brahms symphony is followed by Mr. Goossens's composition, written in 1912, which he calls a "symphonietta." The instruments used are three flutes (two interchangeable with piccolo), two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, bass clarinet, two bassoons, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, bass tuba, kettledrums, side drums, cymbals, triangle, glockenspiel, celesta, harp and the usual strings.

The piece was played in Boston for the first time yesterday, and a true estimate of it cannot be attempted now. This much may be ventured, however, that its three themes impress themselves on the ear more for their development than for their content—make an appeal more to the mind than to the emotions.

The next piece is another that was played in Boston for the first time yesterday, although some of the composer's other works have had places in Symphony programs here. It is entitled "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring." It was written in 1912 by Frederick Delius, born in Yorkshire 63 years ago and now living in France. It has two themes, one suggesting the cuckoo and the other based on a Norwegian folk song describing the old woman who rings the church bells to break the spell over her son of the ogres who have kidnapped him. The piece is full of sentiment and forms a strong contrast to the preceding one.

The program ends with "Iberia—Images for Orchestra," by Debussy. It has three movements: "In the Streets and Byways," "The Fragrance of the Night," "The Morning of a Festival Day." It is scored for piccolo, three flutes (one interchangeable with a second piccolo), two oboes, English horn, three clarinets, three bassoons, double bassoon, four horns, three trombones, bass tuba, kettledrums, side drum, tambourine, castanets, xylophone, celesta, cymbals, three bells (F, G, A), two harps and the usual strings.

This music, written about 20 years ago and first heard in Boston in 1911, sounds less novel now, after half a dozen hearings here, than when it was first produced. "Cacophanous" is an outworn description for the Debussy idiom. Yet the music has lost none of its color, none of its brilliance. It is different from that of the earlier eras, but it is no longer strange. It has its own beauty.

Mr. Eugene Goossens, guest conductor of this week's concerts, is a Belgian-Englishman, if he may so be termed. That is, he is of a Belgian family who settled in London two generations ago. He has been heralded as a modernist, but that term is perhaps more applicable to him as a composer than as conductor. Certainly his selections yesterday showed a wide interpretive range and no partiality for the composers of his own time.

It is hardly possible to give more than an impression of his conducting on hearing one program. His renderings are faithful and effective without being brilliant. He does not employ terse phrasing or subtle nuance. He seems more energetic than powerful.

He has a fine stage presence, and one feature of the concert of which his radio audience will be deprived is the kaleidoscopic series of dancing angles and curves which his slim, well tailored figure cuts in the course of his conducting. The audience yesterday afternoon was enthusiastic in its appreciation.

The concerts next week will again be conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky.

OTHER JAN. NOTICES WILL BE FOUND ON PAGE 206 - 207

JANUARY 20, 1926

Prov Journal 169

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Interest in the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra give last evening at Infantry Hall centred in the appearance of Eugene Goossens who came as guest conductor. The usual big audience attended, intent upon hearing for the first time the orchestral leader who recently made such a fine impression in New York.

Mr. Goossens is conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, a post he has held since he came to this country a few years ago. His splendid success with the New York Spmphony this season at the first of a series of apeparances with that organization brought him more prominently before the American musical public. He is an Englishman, and for many years previous to his coming here was a noted figure in England's musical life.

Last evening Mr. Goossens gave Providence music lovers a decided treat in a programme that held the Brahms Symphony in E-minor as principal number. It it said that he has a special fondness for the great classicists. In the Brahms work he found a rich field for the display of interpretive talent and he was no less successful in the remainder of the nicely balanced programme.

Upon appearance for the opening overture he was accorded a warm greeting, but before the concert ended interest and polite recognition grew into stormy applause of appreciation of his unusual gifts. From beginning to end of the programme the audience seemed greatly impressed by his power and the players went to their task with an enthusiasm which could have but one result—a delightful concert.

The programme was played in the following order:

Overture to "Der Freischutz" ....Weber
Symphony in E-minor, No. 4, Op. 98...Brahms
  Allegro non troppo.
  Andante moderato.
  Allegro giocoso.
  Allegro energico e passionato.
Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde" ....Wagner
"On Hearing the First Cucoo in Spring" .... Delius
"Finlandia": Symphonic Poem for Orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7...........Sibelius

Providence patrons are accustomed to brilliant performances by the Boston Symphony under Mr. Koussevitzky and to rouse them to enthusiasm a conductor in the Russian leader's place must needs possess qualities of a high order. That Mr. Goossens has uch qualitie became evident in the firt number played, the Weber overture. This, however, was but the prelude to a richer and fuller display of musicianship which came in the playing of the Brahms symphony. There may be difference of opinion concerning the merits of the great symphonic works of the German master. The symphony played last evening may or may not be his finest effort, according to individual opinion, but the fact remains that it is a tremendously engrossing musical structure, a massive creation of imaginative thought that holds almost unlimited possibilities for the sympathetic and scholarly conductor.

The four movements perhaps owe their inspiration to Brahm's life experiences; they may be the offspring of his philosophic reflection or, mayhap, the tone picture of some admired literary masterpiece. It matters little to those who may now sit and listen to the wonderful flow of his harmonies so wonderfully wrought. And when his intent is so beautifully conceived as it is by Mr. Goossens we should have little quarrel with its real inspiration.

The players were at the height of responsiveness and the various instrumental voices lent their aid in pure and expressive manner throughout the symphony. From a technical viewpoint one of the most interesting features of Mr. Goossen's readings is the manner in which he reveals the little separate threads of melody as each individual instrument takes up the story in the harmonic tide. He has a sense of balance in adjusting the tonal power of his instruments that is a source of constant delight to the listener.

The Wagner excerpt again presented conductor and men in impressive manner. It was an uplifting performance difficult to adequately describe in detail being so filled with charming effects.

This was followed by the tone picture of Delius. Frederick Delius is a com-

---

GOOSSENS AT SYMPHONY HALL

Herald Jan 23

Conducts Orchestra as Guest—Gives Brilliant Concert

PROGRAM TESTS HIS VERSATILITY

By PHILIP HALE

Eugene Goossens, as a guest, conducted the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. He visited Boston this week for the first time. For his program he chose two unfamiliar works; his own Sinfonietta, produced in London in February, 1923, and performed at Rochester, N. Y., under his direction in the season of 1923-24; "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," by Delius, which was brought out in London two years ago. The program also included Weber's overture to "Der Freischuetz," Brahm's Fourth Symphony and Debussy's "Iberia."

The enviable reputation of Mr. Goossens as a conductor had long preceded him. Born in a family of musicians, he has had wide experience, having conducted operas, ballets, symphony concerts in England and on the European continent. It was said earlier in the season that, in coming to Boston, he would like to be judged first of all as a conductor, not as a composer, yet the list of his works is a long one, embracing music for the stage and the orchestra, chamber music, songs and piano pieces. He has been known here for some years as a composer of chamber music. His Scherzo "Tam o'Shanter," was played at a concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in March, 1923.

His earlier compositions, by a certain audacity, by his not conforming to the august traditions of British academicians and doctors of music, were described in London as the musical excursions and adventures of an "enfant terrible." Of late, solemn writers about music in London have commended him for turning from the error of his ways. They have patted him on the head. We doubt if his conversion is so complete as these regarders of the rigid law and the aged prophets fondly believe. We certainly hope for his future that it is not.

The Program Book contained a short and modest description of the Sinfonietta by the composer. He ended by saying that he was "a poor estimator of his own work." Thus he did himself injustice. Though he may not look at all that he has done and pronounce it good, he shows in this music that he can criticise himself, that he is not verbose, that he is not intoxicated by his facility. The Sinfonietta is singularly compact, without superfluities. The first movement is practically a fantasia on a persistent little rhythmic figure, which, constantly occurring, is by ingenious treatment free from monotony. The second movement, introduced by a solo for the English horn, has original beauty. Mr. Goossens speaks of this movement, in an almost deprecatory manner, as "very sentimental." True, it has sentiment, but the expression is not too obvious; it is far from being mushy. By its poetic quality it is a charming interlude between two fiery sections. Mr. Goossens refers to the Finale as "hectic"; but the fever is soon over. Let us add that the orchestration of the Sinfonietta is ingenious.

Some regard Frederick Delius as the outstanding figure in the musical world of today. To many his idiom is foreign and unsympathetic. Boston knows only four of his orchestral works. It is not acquainted with his remarkable opera, "A Village Romeo and Juliet," his concertos, or his great choral works, "Sea Drift" (after Walt Whitman), "A Muss of Life" or his "Requiem" in memory of all young artists fallen in the war.

The short piece played yesterday is not an ornithological rhapsody. Like other music by Delius that we have heard, it has a strange reticence, sadness suggested, not emphasized; the music is acid-sweet; it is music that would grow on one, nor would the dangerous approach to monotony by the maintenence of subdued coloring be so noticeable as at a first hearing. Here is an example of how an indisputable impression may be made by the skilful use of the simplest orchestral resources. Mr. Heseltine, the biographer of Delius, reminds the hearer that spring is not to the composer a season of rioting nature and budding hope, but a sweet and tender vision so that "the old unrest of the soul is put to sleep. A pretty burst of rhetoric, but there is a quality in this music that is not so easily defined.

The concert was a brilliant one. The program tested the versatility of Mr. Goossens as a conductor. The romanticism of Weber, which is frank and dramatic, is not the romanticism of Brahms, which is tempered with austerity as perhaps befitted the last great composer of the German academic school. The moods of Delius and Debussy, as they were represented yesterday, are far apart. Yet Mr. Goossens in each instance interpreted as if for the time being he was the sworn champion of that particular school. His technical equipment was at once manifest; his clean and commanding beat, his ability to gain precision of attack in every choir of instruments, his skill in presenting dynamic gradations, stirring contrasts, and in preparing climaxes. More than this, he caught the spirit of the composer, was imbued by it, nor in his varied interpretation was he conscious of himself. The members of the orchestra played as if they rejoiced in being led by him.

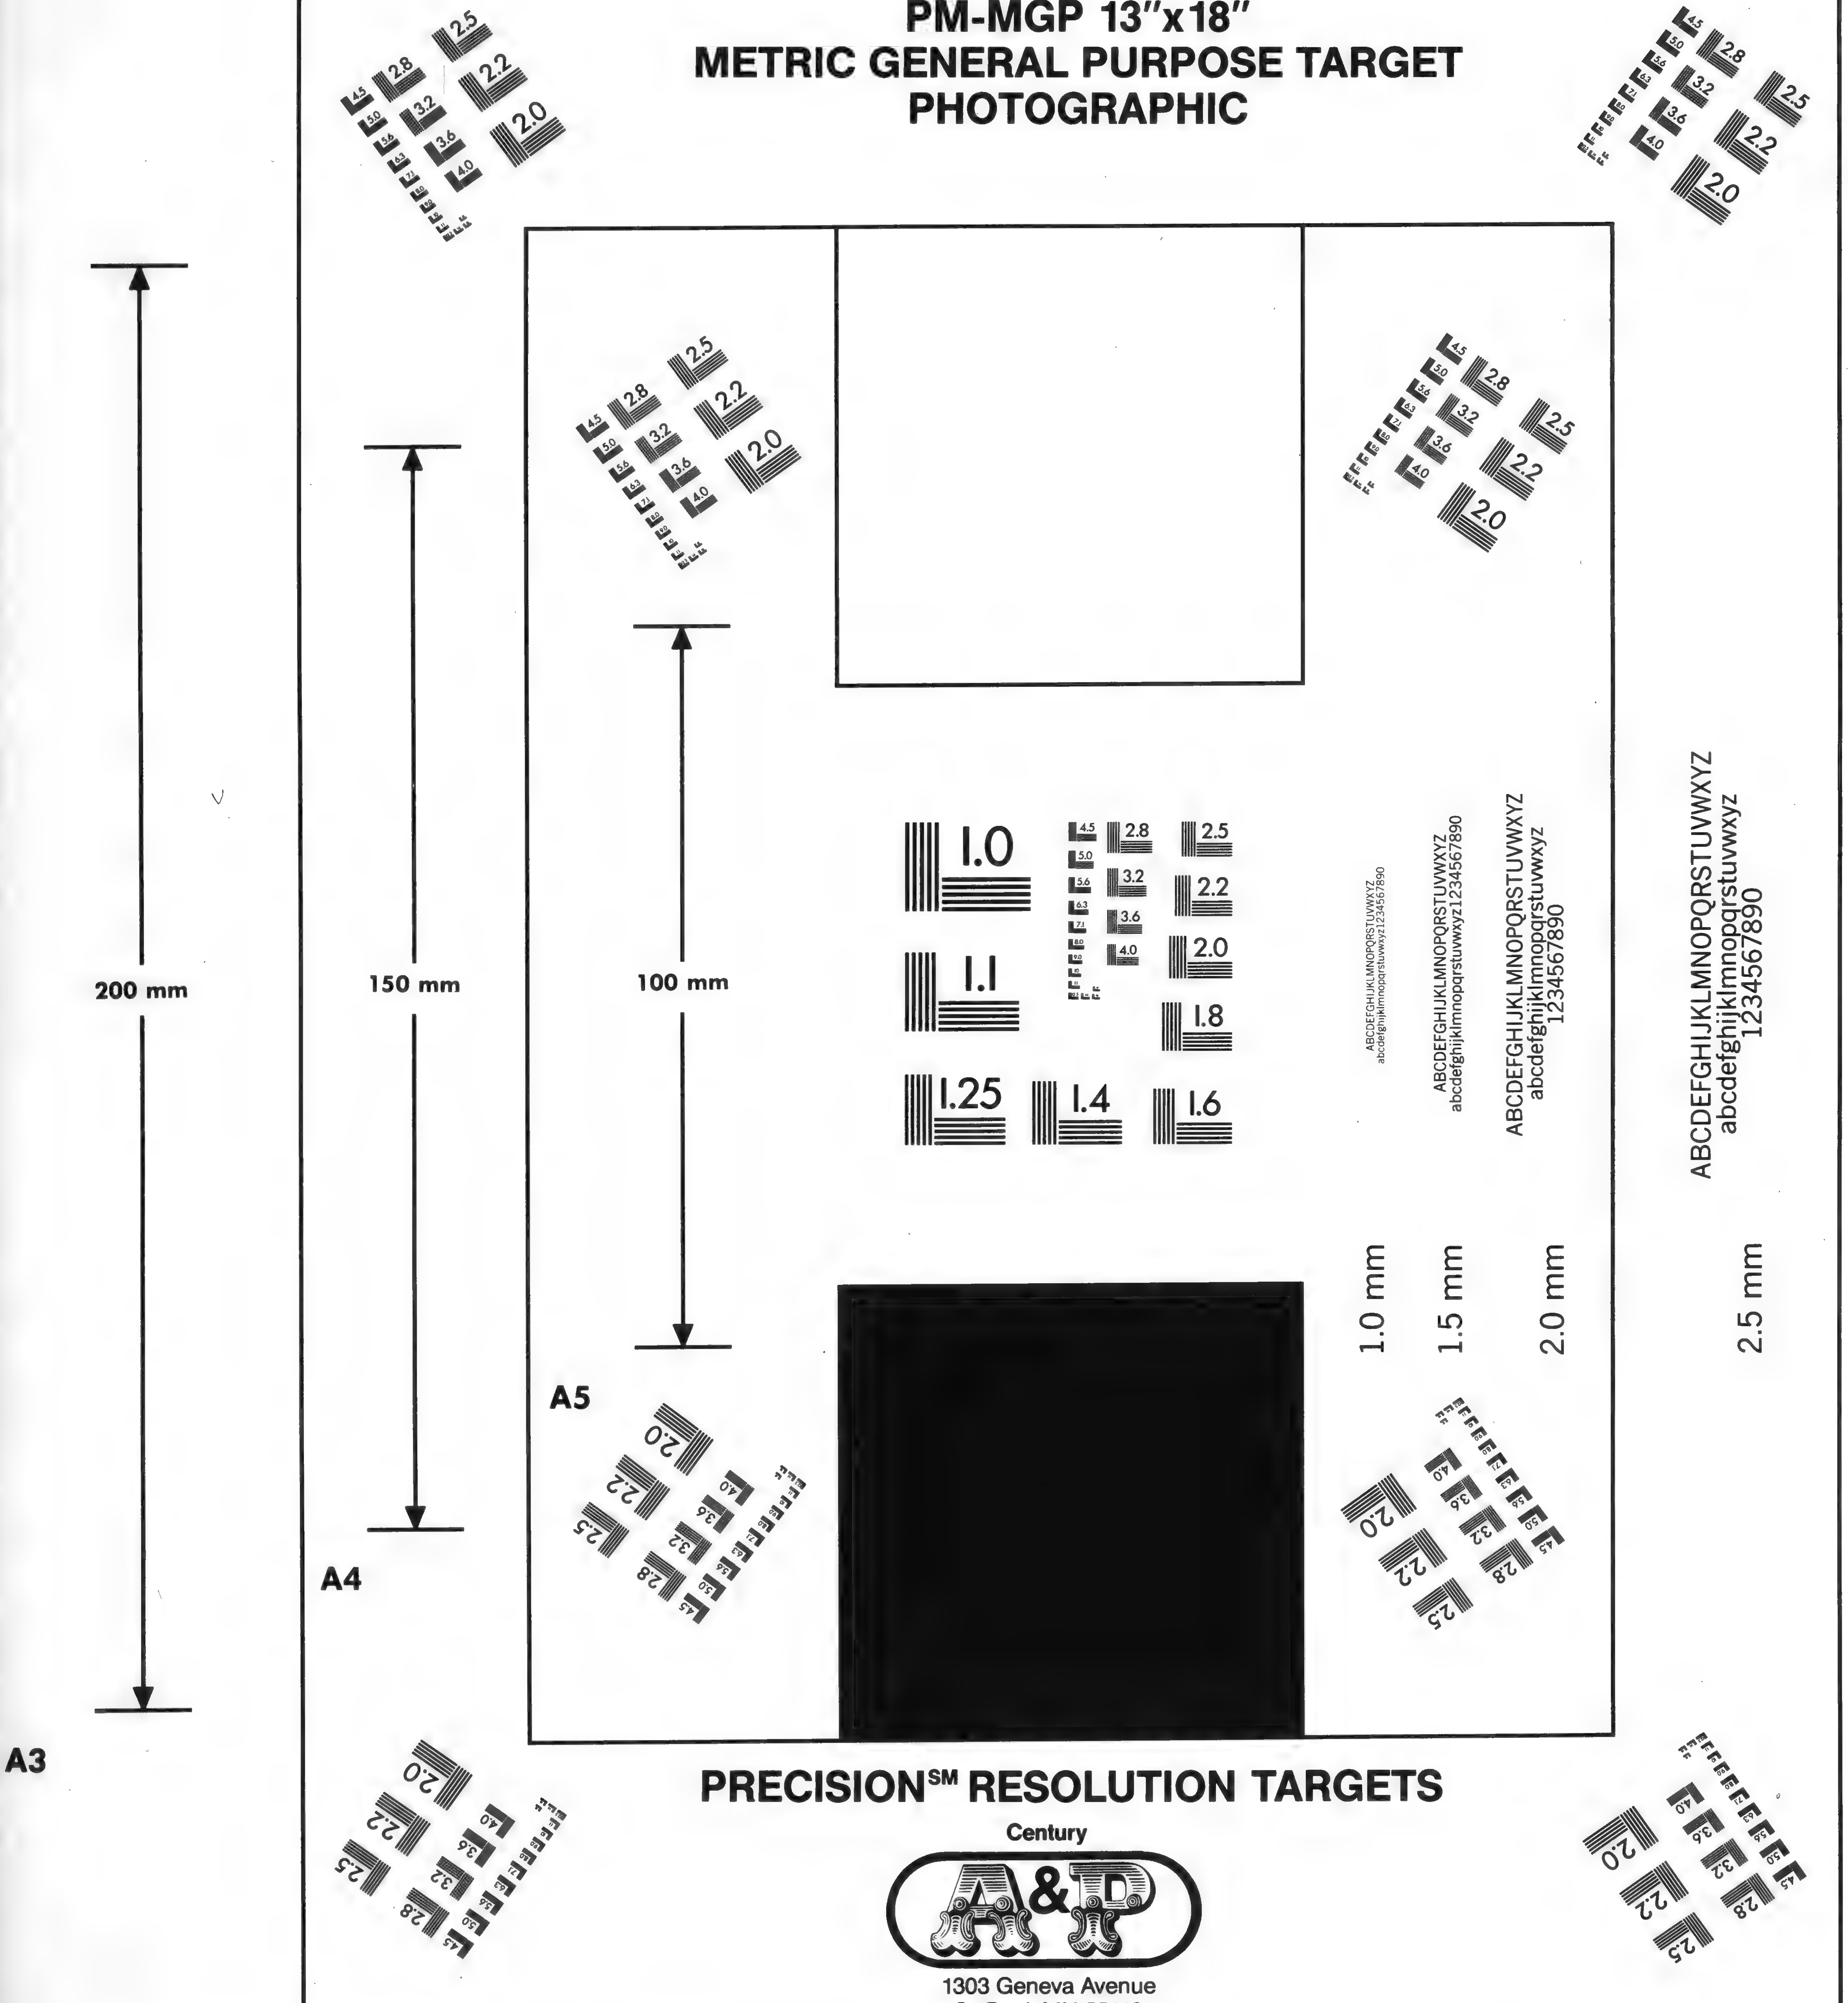
The concert will be repeated tonight. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct the concerts of next week. The [illegible] will be as follows: Moussor[illegible] on Bald Mountain"; [illegible]

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0
7.1
8.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, JANUARY 28, 1926

ROOM FOR PROKOVIEV

The Composer and Pianist at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow—As He Looks, as He Plays, as He Writes Music—Various Forewords

A NEW RUSSIAN comes this week to the Symphony Concerts as guest—Serge Prokoviev. Hitherto Bostonian ears have known him only by his "Scythian Suite" and his Concerto for Violin, both played at Symphony Hall last season; or by incidental songs and piano-pieces slipped briefly into a passing recital. Now he may be seen in his own person and heard in his own music. As pianist he will play the solo-part in his third, and most recent, Concerto. By no more than that piece, however, may his audiences renew acquaintance. Seemingly, he and Mr. Koussevitzky were not minded to a repetition of the "Scythian Suite"; while they also put by a March and Scherzo from Prokoviev's fantastic opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," originally produced in Chicago where the great house of McCormick once viewed him kindly. In fact, while the list of Prokoviev's published music is substantial, it contains relatively few symphonic numbers without a voice, a solo-part or similar accessory. Consequently with this Third Piano-Concerto must we listeners be content.

Though Mr. Prokoviev is stranger to Boston, twice at least he has visited the United States and given concerts in both New York and Chicago. In those days "impressions" were written of the man, one or two of which may now serve for introduction. In The Transcript, for example, Mr. Borowski sketched him: "To the outer eye he is tall, blonde, big-boned, short-haired, thick-featured—a thorough Muscovite. In manner he is quick, businesslike, composed. He did not look any more like an 'anarchist' than did any of the gentlement who, in the first division of the concert, appeared from behind the stage to wheel the piano to a convenient place from which Mr. Prokoviev might deliver his concerto to the house.

"Serge Sergievich Prokoviev belongs still to the younger generation. He was born April 24, 1891, at Sontsovka, in the south of Russia. His mother, musically inclined, taught the boy all that she knew and having come to the end of her resources, confided his artistic training to Glière and Taneiev, in Moscow. There can have been very little doubt in the minds of Prokoviev's parents or of his teachers as to the profession which ultimately he would choose; for at the age of five he was beginning to compose. At a period in which most children are reading fairy tales in words of one syllable Prokoviev was writing them—in sound. He was attracted early by the glare of footlights. When only seven he composed an opera entitled 'The Giant' and he was only nine when he set down another dramatic composition, 'The Deserted Islands.' The youngster had not yet swallowed the secrets of orchestral virtuosity that were beginning to be too well known to Russian composers to be secrets any longer, so these youthful inspirations were laid out—as to the instrumental portion—for the colorless keyboard of the piano.

"By the time he was eleven Prokoviev had picked up more or less valuable information about instrumentation and he contributed a symphony in G major to the literature of that form. After that the stage reached out for the embryo composer once again. The year following the completion of the symphony found him engaged on 'The Feast,' an opera based upon a story by Poushkin. He was thirteen when another and a four-act opera 'Undine,' was composed. One must believe that Giliere and Taneive looked at each other portentiously when the boy tottered into the class room in Moscow with four acts of the orchestral score of 'Undine' clasped in his little arms.

"In 1903 Prokoviev betook himself to Leningrad, there to enter the Imperial Conservatory as a pupil of Mme. Essipov in piano-playing, and of Lyadov and Rimsky- theory and composi- bold like radi- ning pulse Rim- e an- t, a oug when his pupil Stravinsky played to him the music of 'The Fire-Bird,' Rimsky said, 'Stop playing that, for I might begin to like it,' that master was not one who would stifle the individuality of his students. He concerned himself more with their technique than with their style. Almost certainly the present accomplishments of Serge Prokoviev owe much to the guidance of Rimsky.'

"So great as Prokoviev's industry during his period of study at Leningrad that he set down more than a hundred pieces, some of which—like a symphony in E minor and various sonatas for piano—belonged to the larger forms. Apparently he has no illusions as to their quality; for with the exception of a sonata for piano which he recomposed later all these scholastic efforts remain unpublished." As Prokoviev matured—he is now thirty-five—he wrote abundantly; but not a few of his manuscripts were lost or abandoned in the turmoil of the Russian Revolution and the earlier years of the Soviet Government. Yet as it is, he can array three operas; two ballets—one, "Chout," produced in Paris by Mr. Dyaghilev; a "classic symphony"; a symphonic poem or two; the "Scythian Suite"; three concertos for piano; a concerto for violin; "They are Seven," choral and orchestral "incantation" suggested by an ancient Akkadian inscription. As publisher and as conductor, in Europe and now in America, Mr. Koussevitzky has often encouraged him.

Of Prokoviev as man, composer and pianist, Mr. W. B. Murray also wrote in The Transcript, saying: "Like Prokoviev or dislike him; accept or reject his music. It matters little. Ridicule will not hurt or dismay Prokoviev; the sarcastic criticism of the elderly will not subdue or stay him. In him rather is the driving force that laughs at obstacles. He never half-says his thoughts; he is happy or he is sad in superlatives of youthful intensity. Like the young painters and other young musicans of Russia, Prokoviev is economical of means. Simple, straightforward themes tell his thoughts, and they are developed quickly, vigorously and without over-elaboration. Conventional harmonies mean nothing to him. He will tell you what he has to say in the first and most convenient language. His only consideration is the full and immediate expression of the thought in hand. If the usages of the past will answer his purpose, well and good; if not he will find new and direct means.

"As a pianist Prokoviev possesses a remarkable finger-technique, without which his music might have gone for years without an interpreter. For the exactions of it are such as only few pianists could master. Add to this amazing dexterity of fingers pedalling that colors every tone; a rhythmic precision that stings and bites; a wide range of dynamics that builds a crescendo from the mildest of pianissimi into the most raging of fortissimi, the kind of dynamic control that enables the pianist to orchestrate a piano composition and at the same time keep it within the bounds of the instrument—the power Busoni uses in his transcription of Bachs's organ fugues—and you may have some concepion of Prokoviev's playing. He is never sentimental, never sweetly songful. Merely with a piano, he might easily override an orchestra."

Transcript Feb 3

De Boston à Paris

Le Temps Prints the News About Mr. Koussevitzky

THE POPULARITY of the celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, increases steadily in the United States. Subscriptions for every concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he leads, were exhausted several months beforehand—in New York as well as in Boston—an unprecedented event "over there." The management asked Mr. Koussevitzky to undertake several supplementary concerts. He was obliged to decline the proposal since he must sail for Europe at the beginning of May to give, in Paris and London, the usual series of "Koussevitzky Concerts."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

FEB 3 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY

When ~~the famous~~ Boston Symphony orchestra appears in the Capitol theater next Sunday afternoon in its only concert of the season, the personnel will number 107 of the world's finest musicians and will be conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, a gigantic personality in the world of music.

The occasion marks Mr. Koussevitsky's second local appearance ~~and may~~ be regarded as one of the principle musical events of the season. Mr. Koussevitsky's programs are always interesting and his list for Sunday is no exception. The symphony is Scriabin's third, "The Divine Poem," an opus new to local audiences. The program will open brilliantly with Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" and followed by Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faun," which in turn is followed by Wagner's prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg."

The seats and boxes for this veritable musical feast are no on sale at McCoy's inc., No. 89 Asylum street. Reservations may be made by calling 2-6147.

Symphony to Play Russian Music

Prov. Journal Feb 7

A Russian programme with a Russian composer as soloist will mark the fourth Boston Symphony concert in Providence to be given in Infantry Hall a week from Tuesday evening. Serge Prokofieff, who is considered the most important of the younger generation of Russian composers and one of the finest piano virtuosos of the day, will appear as soloist in his own Third Pianoforte Concerto. Prokofieff has played this concerto with this orchestra in Boston, New York and Brooklyn.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the programme with the orchestral fantasy of Moussorgsky, "A Night on Bald Mountain," a music of sorcery and evil spirits which are dispelled by the coming of dawn. The latter part of the programme will be taken up by Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," of which Koussevitzky has proved himself an inspired interpreter at recent concerts in Boston, New York and other cities.

A friend of Scriabin, Koussevitzky was in sympathetic understanding with the musical aims and philosophic ideals of this "mystic in tones." The conductor first gave performance to his principal works in Moscow and Petrograd. He even took them to the villages along the Volga river, Scriabin accompanying him on one of his voyages. The "Divine Poem" is in three parts. The first, "Luttes" ("Struggles"), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation and doubt. The second, "Voluptes," has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy in merging into nature." The third, "Jeu divin," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 3 1926

BROWN WILL HONOR ASIATIC EXPLORER AND HUB MUSICIAN

Honorary Degrees to Be Conferred Upon Koussevitzky and Andrews at University's Special Convocation Feb. 24, Faunce Announces.

Brown University will hold a special convocation on Wednesday, Feb. 24, at which time it will confer honorary degrees upon Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews of New York, the famous Asiatic explorer.

In making this announcement last night, President W. H. P. Faunce of Brown said that the convocation had been specially called because neither M. Kossevitzky, who leads European orchestras each summer, nor Mr. Andrews, who leaves on March 1 for exploration in Turkestan, could be in this country in June.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

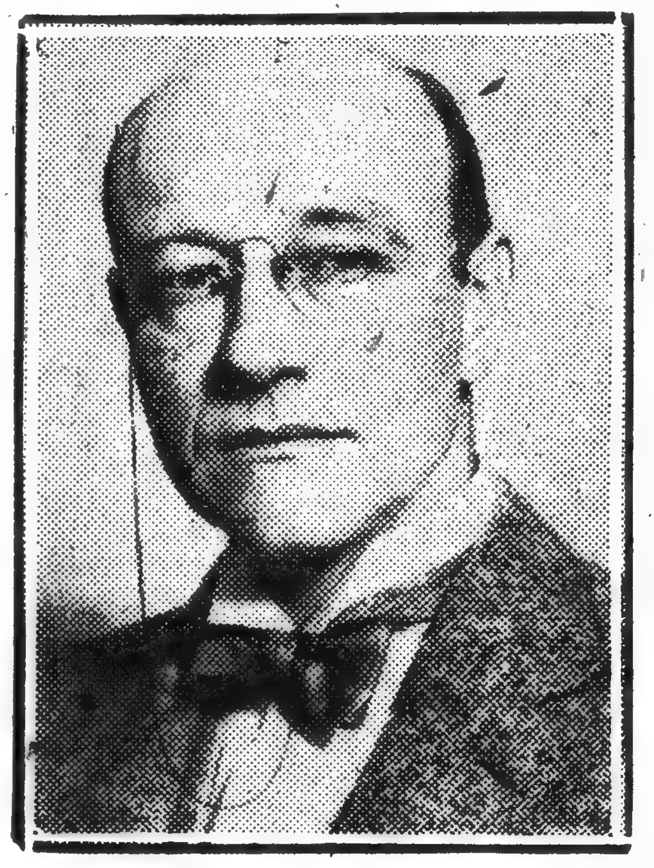
Visiting Day, which has heretofore taken place the first Wednesday in March, will be held in conjunction with the convocation. The advisory board of the Associated Alumni, made up of delegates from Brown Clubs in all parts of the United States, will also convene at this time. It will have its first session Tuesday evening, Feb. 23, at the University Club, and will finish its business Wednesday morning in the alumni offices, John Hay Library.



ROY CHAPMAN ANDREWS

There will be a special chapel service for Visiting Day. At 12 o'clock noon, members of the visiting committees, together with the corporation and faculty and Associated Alumni delegates, will assemble at the Faculty Club to hear a review of the year given by President Faunce. Luncheon will follow and at 2 o'clock the visiting committee will confer with the officers of instruction at the offices of the various departments of the university.

The academic procession will form at 4 o'clock for the march to Sayles Hall, where the honorary degrees will be conferred upon M. Koussevitzky and Mr. Andrews.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS HAPPY RE

Phila Ledger Fe

Phenomenal Rejuvenatio Old Organ'zation Demonstr by Koussevitzky at Academy

GIVES NOTABLE CONCER

The dynamic Serge Koussevitsk overflowing with personality and mus cal feeling, at the head of the rejuv nated Boston Symphony Orchestr gave the first public concert of the o ganization for several years in th Academy of Music last night. Th ~~audience~~ was not so large as it shou have been, considering Mr. Koussevi zky's eminence, ~~but it was exceeding~~ enthusiastic. Incidentally, it heard o of the finest concerts of the season.

What Mr. Koussevitzky has accon plished with the Boston Symphony Or chestra in the brief space of his leade ship is little short of phenomenal. I a little more than a season he hs transformed it from an organization o very moderate ability into a great vir tuoso orchestra of amazing flexibility The tone of the strings recalls the Bos ton Orchestra of the days of Kneise Loeffler, Svecenski and Schroeder, whil the brass is wonderfully beautiful in it balance and in its ability to play wit an extremely soft and beautiful to quality as well as with the require sonority in the louder passages.

The organization is highly disciplin the equal of our own orchestra in tha respect, and is under the absolute dom nation of Mr. Koussevitzky and respo sive to his slightest wish, the dimi uendos, the most difficult effect in a music to be obtained with a large e semble being especially beautiful a effective. At the same time the to is tremendous in the climaxes and e cellent through all the gradations.

The program opened with the co certo grosso in D minor of Handel f strings alone, a work which gave t string section an opportunity to demo strate its admirable quality of tone a balance. This was followed by a "sym phonic picture," entitled "From th Apocalypse," by Liadoff, for full o chestra. It is a work of tremendou tonal and dynamic contrasts which wa played with the utmost brilliancy an effect, despite its manifestly religiou character, an element which M Koussevitzky did not fail to introduce i ~~his interpretation~~.

The virtuoso side of the organizatio was perhaps best illustrated in th Ravel suite, "Daphnis et Chloe," ~~which was introduced to Philadelphia b Fritz Reiner and the Cincinnati Orches tra a few weeks ago.~~ Mr. Koussevitzky whose understanding of the Frenc moderns is exceptionally complete, gav a delicate and thoroughly characteristi reading of the lovely suite, and th orchestra performed the difficult musi with great beauty and skill. The com position was in some ways the mos effective of the program. The co cert closed with Scriabin's Third Sy phony, the "Poeme Divin," a wo which has not been performed in th city since the season of 1916-17, wh Mr. Stokowski played it. Mr. Kou sevitsky is an acknowledged authori in the works of Scriabin, and the sym phony, which is exceedingly complicat in composition and elaborate in c chestration, was given a splend reading. The first movement is t finest musically and also the mo effective.

One of Mr. Koussevitzky's chara teristics as a conductor is his ability create different atmospheres, both the orchestra and the audience, acco ing to the composition being perform In the Handel number, it was one pure classicism; in Liadoff the atm phere was that of a Russian church, the work is religious music in the chestral instead of the vocal form; Ravel number was pure French and Scriabin had an unearthly atmosphe admirably fitting the meaning of program and of the music. The Bost Orchestra leader is undoubtedly a v tuoso conductor, but he never for moment loses sight of the musical co tent of the work, at the same ti giving all the detail with the great clearness and a perfect relation theme to accompaniment—a diffic thing in the complicated music of t modern composers. In his seating the orchestra, he used the stage pl forms to the great gain of the tone the orchestra and the clarity of de of the composition played. S. L. L

170

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second visit to this city of Boston Symphony Orchestra, under t direction of Serge Koussevitzky, at t Lyric last night served in a way classify the conductor more definitel than seemed possible on the first appearance.

On his debut there was a certain manner, almost as of posture, which tended to leave an impression that somehow the Russian did not bring to his work that absolute sincerity and that conviction which are essential to an altogether vitalized performance. This impression, indefinite as it was, the second appearance served to dissipate.

Whether one agrees with Koussevitzky's interpretation of a certain work, with his conception of its precise meaning and import, or not, one cannot help according to him originality, force, vitality and a certain rugged, picturesque impressiveness, which invest his offering with commanding and even compelling interest.

How else could the rapt attention manifest by the audience last night, in the performance of compositions which lacked very distinctly the element of novelty and at least one of which, the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Scheherazade," because of its obviousness and a certain simplicity now regarded as very much out of date, is often spoken of lightly, be accounted for?

There was nothing subtle or sophisticated about this interpretation. It told the story of the sea and of Sinbad's ship, of the Kalandar Prince, of the young Prince and Princess, and of the Festival at Bagdad and the shipwreck, in plain language. To use another simile, the several pictures were painted with bold strokes, especially in the shipwreck, where Koussevitzky gives the brasses and percussions their head, in vivid coloring, but it was an entrancing picture that retained the old "Thousand and One Nights" spell.

Similarly, in the Debussy "Afternoon with a Faun," which has been presented by every conductor of note with an orchestra sufficiently large to give it with any chance of effectiveness, there was a directness savoring of realism in the interpretation.

The feeling of nebulosity, of dreaminess, of diaphanous delicacy, was largely wanting, and in its place appeared a definiteness of outline, a distinctness that made the figures and the sylvan scenes assume a quality almost as of life itself.

The gambolings of fauns and satyrs, the enchanting presence of nymphs and dryads, was almost seen rather than felt, and the work thus took on a more substantial character than is usually given it.

As for the novelties of the evening the Galliard Sonata in G mayor, freely transcribed for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, a modern Russian composer, and the Dukas "Sorcerer's Apprentice," the former retained in the transcription all of the stateliness and the nobility of the original work.

It was played with a broad sweep, and its four short movements were splendidly differentiated. There was dignity in the first movement, lightness in the second, old-fashioned pathos and gloom in the third and sprightliness and buoyancy in the last. The transacription, it appears, still exists only in manuscript.

The Dukas opus, which has not been heard here before, proved to be a fascinating conception. It was played in brilliant style, and one could fairly visualize the owls, the bats, the witches and the broom spirit dashing out to the pool and filling the bath.

The blow with the axe which split the uncanny servant in two was indicated strikingly, and the horror of the apprentice following the discovery that each half again became a separate entity found adequate expression. One of the most unusual effects was the use made of the bassoons.

In this number Koussevitsky again showed that he is less concerned about infinite details than about general impressions, and the same vigor that he displayed in other places distinguished the production.

The audience left no doubt that it was with the Russian conductor in his ideas, and the first violinist came in for special approbation for the delicacy and the fluency with which he played the various motives introduced in the "Scheherazade." Nicholas Avierino, viola player, who was at the Peabody Conservatory last season, appeared with the orchestra.

The Grachur Glee Club will give its annual benefit concert this evening at the Maryland Casualty Auditorium and an interesting program has been arranged for the occasion.

The event is for the advancement of the work carried on by organizations connected with Grace Methodist Episcopal, St. Mark's Episcopal, St. John's Episcopal, Elderslie Methodist Episcopal, Waverly Methodist Episcopal and Grace Lutheran churches and the Mothers' Club of McDonogh School. A large attendance is expected.

Included among the numbers to be given are Parker's "Cossack War Song," Gibson's "Lullaby," Nevin's "The Bells of Shannon," and Protheroe's "Shadow Song," and the same composer's "Song of Marching Men," by the Glee Club; a selection of attractive lyrics by Anne Baugher Marks, contralto; some numbers by a quartet, and Clark's "Blind Plowman," Sanderson's "Until," and Guion's "De Old Ark's A'movin'," by John L. Wilbourne, tenor. The quarte is made up of Edward Jendrek, tenor John L. Wilbourne, tenor; C. Conn baritone, and Walter Linth Turner cum, bass.

Hobart Smith
Norman B. Cole

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, JANUARY 28, 1926

ROOM FOR PROKOVIEV

The Composer and Pianist at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow—As He Looks, as He Plays, as He Writes Music—Various Forewords

A NEW RUSSIAN comes this week to the Symphony Concerts as guest—Serge Prokoviev. Hitherto Bostonian ears have known him only by his "Scythian Suite" and his Concerto for Violin, both played at Symphony Hall last season; or by incidental songs and piano-pieces slipped briefly into a passing recital. Now he may be seen in his own person and heard in his own music. As pianist he will play the solo-part in his third, and most recent, Concerto. By no more than that piece, however, may his audiences renew acquaintance. Seemingly, he and Mr. Koussevitzky were not minded to a repetition of the "Scythian Suite"; while they also put by a March and Scherzo from Prokoviev's fantastic opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," originally produced in Chicago where the great house of McCormick once viewed him kindly. In fact, while the list of Prokoviev's published music is substantial, it contains relatively few symphonic numbers without a voice, a solo-part or similar accessory. Consequently with this Third Piano-Concerto must we listeners be content.

Though Mr. Prokoviev is stranger to Boston, twice at least he has visited the United States and given concerts in both New York and Chicago. In those days "impressions" were written of the man, one or two of which may now serve for introduction. In The Transcript, for example, Mr. Borowski sketched him: "To the outer eye he is tall, blonde, big-boned, short-haired, thick-featured—a thorough Muscovite. In manner he is quick, businesslike, composed. He did not look any more like an 'anarchist' than did any of the gentlement who, in the first division of the concert, appeared from behind the stage to wheel the piano to a convenient place from which Mr. Prokoviev might deliver his concerto to the house.

"Serge Sergievich Prokoviev belongs still to the younger generation. He was born April 24, 1891, at Sontsovka, in the south of Russia. His mother, musically inclined, taught the boy all that she knew and having come to the end of her resources, confided his artistic training to Glière and Taneiev, in Moscow. There can have been very little doubt in the minds of Prokoviev's parents or of his teachers as to the profession which ultimately he would choose; for at the age of five he was beginning to compose. At a period in which most children are reading fairy tales in words of one syllable Prokoviev was writing them—in sound. He was attracted early by the glare of footlights. When only seven he composed an opera entitled 'The Giant' and he was only nine when he set down another dramatic composition. "The Deserted Islands.' The youngster had not yet swallowed the secrets of orchestral virtuosity that were beginning to be too well known to Russian composers to be secrets any longer, so these youthful inspirations were laid out—as to the instrumental portion—for the colorless keyboard of the piano.

"By the time he was eleven Prokoviev had picked up more or less valuable information about instrumentation and he contributed a symphony in G major to the literature of that form. After that the stage reached out for the embryo composer once again. The year following the completion of the symphony found him engaged on 'The Feast,' an opera based upon a story by Poushkin. He was thirteen when another and a four-act opera 'Undine,' was composed. One must believe that Giliere and Taneive looked at each other portentiously when the boy tottered into the class room in Moscow with four acts of the orchestral score of 'Undine' clasped in his little arms.

"In 1903 Prokoviev betook himself to Leningrad, there to enter the Imperial Conservatory as a pupil of Mme. Essipov in piano-playing, and of Lyadov and Rimsky-Korsakov in musical theory and composi- [illegible] bold [illegible] like [illegible]radi- [illegible]ning [illegible]pulse Rim- [illegible] an- [illegible]t, a [illegible]ough when his pupil Stravinsky played to him the music of 'The Fire-Bird,' Rimsky said, 'Stop playing that, for I might begin to like it,' that master was not one who would stifle the individuality of his students. He concerned himself more with their technique than with their style. Almost certainly the present accomplishments of Serge Prokoviev owe much to the guidance of Rimsky.

"So great as Prokoviev's industry during his period of study at Leningrad that he set down more than a hundred pieces, some of which—like a symphony in E minor and various sonatas for piano—belonged to the larger forms. Apparently he has no illusions as to their quality; for with the exception of a sonata for piano which he recomposed later all these scholastic efforts remain unpublished." As Prokoviev matured—he is now thirty-five—he wrote abundantly; but not a few of his manuscripts were lost or abandoned in the turmoil of the Russian Revolution and the earlier years of the Soviet Government. Yet as it is, he can array three operas; two ballets—one, "Chout," produced in Paris by Mr. Dyaghilev; a "classic symphony"; a symphonic poem or two; the "Scythian Suite"; three concertos for piano; a concerto for violin; "They are Seven," choral and orchestral "incantation" suggested by an ancient Akkadian inscription. As publisher and as conductor, in Europe and now in America, Mr. Koussevitzky has often encouraged him.

Of Prokoviev as man, composer and pianist, Mr. W. B. Murray also wrote in The Transcript, saying: "Like Prokoviev or dislike him; accept or reject his music It matters little. Ridicule will not hurt or dismay Prokoviev; the sarcastic criticism of the elderly will not subdue or stay him. In him rather is the driving force that laughs at obstacles. He never [illegible] his thoughts; he is happy or he is sad in superlatives of youthful intensity. Like the young painters and other young musicians of Russia, Prokoviev is economical of means. Simple, straightforward themes tell his thoughts, and they are developed quickly, vigorously and without over-elaboration. Conventional harmonies mean nothing to him. He will tell you what he has to say in the first and most convenient language. His only consideration is the full and immediate expression of the thought in hand. If the usages of the past will answer his purpose, well and good; if not he will find new and direct means.

"As a pianist Prokoviev possesses a remarkable finger-technique, without which his music might have gone for years without an interpreter. For the exactions of it are such as only few pianists could master. Add to this amazing dexterity of fingers pedalling that colors every tone; a rhythmic precision that stings and bites; a wide range of dynamics that builds a crescendo from the mildest of pianissimi into the most raging of fortissimi, the kind of dynamic control that enables the pianist to orchestrate a piano composition and at the same time keep it within the bounds of the instrument—the power Busoni uses in his transcription of Bachs's organ fugues—and you may have some concepion of Prokoviev's playing. He is never sentimental, never sweetly songful. Merely with a piano, he might easily override an orchestra."

TRANSCRIPT FEB 3

De Boston à Paris

Le Temps Prints the News About Mr. Koussevitzky

THE POPULARITY of the celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, increases steadily in the United States. Subscriptions for every concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he leads, were exhausted several months beforehand—in New York as well as in Boston—an unprecedented event "over there." The management asked Mr. Koussevitzky to undertake several supplementary concerts. He was obliged to decline the proposal since he must sail for Europe at the beginning of May to give, in Paris and London, the usual series of "Koussevitzky Concerts."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

FEB 3 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY

When ~~the~~ famous Boston Symphony orchestra appears in the Capitol theater next Sunday afternoon in its only concert of the season, the personnel will number 107 of the world's finest musicians and will be conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, a gigantic personality in the world of music.

The occasion marks Mr. Koussevitsky's second local appearance and may be regarded as one of the principle musical events of the season. Mr. Koussevitsky's programs are always interesting and his list for Sunday is no exception. The symphony is Scriabin's third, "The Divine Poem," an opus new to local audiences. The program will open brilliantly with Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" and followed by Debussy's 'Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faun," which in turn is followed by Wagner's prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg."

The seats and boxes for this veritable musical feast are no on sale at McCoy's inc., No. 89 Asylum street. Reservations may be made by calling 2-6147.

Symphony to Play Russian Music

PROV. JOURNAL Feb 7

A Russian programme with a Russian composer as soloist will mark the fourth Boston Symphony concert in Providence to be given in Infantry Hall a week from Tuesday evening. Serge Prokofieff, who is considered the most important of the younger generation of Russian composers and one of the finest piano virtuosos of the day, will appear as soloist in his own Third Pianoforte Concerto. Prokofieff has played this concerto with this orchestra in Boston, New York and Brooklyn.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the programme with the orchestral fantasy of Moussorgsky, "A Night on Bald Mountain," a music of sorcery and evil spirits which are dispelled by the coming of dawn. The latter part of the programme will be taken up by Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," of which Koussevitzky has proved himself an inspired interpreter at recent concerts in Boston, New York and other cities.

A friend of Scriabin, Koussevitzky was in sympathetic understanding with the musical aims and philosophic ideals of this "mystic in tones." The conductor first gave performance to his principal works in Moscow and Petrograd. He even took them to the villages along the Volga river, Scriabin accompanying him on one of his voyages. The "Divine Poem" is in three parts. The first, "Luttes" ("Struggles"), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation and doubt. The second, "Voluptes," has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy in merging into nature." The third, "Jeu divin," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 3 1926

BROWN WILL HONOR ASIATIC EXPLORER AND HUB MUSICIAN

Honorary Degrees to Be Conferred Upon Koussevitzky and Andrews at University's Special Convocation Feb. 24, Faunce Announces.

Brown University will hold a special convocation on Wednesday, Feb. 24, at which time it will confer honorary degrees upon Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews of New York, the famous Asiatic explorer.

In making this announcement last night, President W. H. P. Faunce of Brown said that the convocation had been specially called because neither M. Kossevitzky, who leads European orchestras each summer, nor Mr. Andrews, who leaves on March 1 for exploration in Turkestan, could be in this country in June.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Visiting Day, which has heretofore taken place the first Wednesday in March, will be held in conjunction with the convocation. The advisory board of the Associated Alumni, made up of delegates from Brown Clubs in all parts of the United States, will also convene at this time. It will have its first session Tuesday evening, Feb. 23, at the University Club, and will finish its business Wednesday morning in the alumni offices, John Hay Library.

ROY CHAPMAN ANDREWS

There will be a special chapel service for Visiting Day. At 12 o'clock noon, members of the visiting committees, together with the corporation and faculty and Associated Alumni delegates, will assemble at the Faculty Club to hear a review of the year given by President Faunce. Luncheon will follow and at 2 o'clock the visiting committee will confer with the officers of instruction at the offices of the various departments of the university.

The academic procession will form at 4 o'clock for the march to Sayles Hall, where the honorary degrees will be conferred upon M. Koussevitzky and Mr. Andrews.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS HAPPY RET

Phila Ledger Fe

Phenomenal Rejuvenatio Old Organization Demonstra by Koussevitzky at Academy

GIVES NOTABLE CONCER

The dynamic Serge Koussevitsk overflowing with personality and mus cal feeling, at the head of the rejuv nated Boston Symphony Orchestr gave the first public concert of the o ganization for several years in th Academy of Music last night. Th audience was not so large as it shou have been, considering Mr. Koussevi zky's eminence, but it was exceeding enthusiastic. Incidentally, it heard o of the finest concerts of the season.

What Mr. Koussevitzky has acco plished with the Boston Symphony O chestra in the brief space of his leade ship is little short of phenomenal. I a little more than a season he h transformed it from an organization o very moderate ability into a great vi tuoso orchestra of amazing flexibilit The tone of the strings recalls the Bo ton Orchestra of the days of Kneise Loeffler, Sveeenski and Schroeder, whil the brass is wonderfully beautiful in it balance and in its ability to play wit an extremely soft and beautiful to quality as well as with the require sonority in the louder passages.

The organization is highly disciplin the equal of our own orchestra in th respect, and is under the absolute dom nation of Mr. Koussevitzky and respo sive to his slightest wish, the dimi uendos, the most difficult effect in a music to be obtained with a large e semble being especially beautiful a effective. At the same time the to is tremendous in the climaxes and e cellent through all the gradations.

The program opened with the co certo grosso in D minor of Handel fo strings alone, a work which gave th string section an opportunity to demo strate its admirable quality of tone a balance. This was followed by a "sym phonic picture," entitled "From th Apocalypse," by Liadoff, for full o chestra. It is a work of tremendou tonal and dynamic contrasts which wa played with the utmost brilliancy an effect, despite its manifestly religiou character, an element which M Koussevitzky did not fail to introduce i his interpretation.

The virtuoso side of the organizatio was perhaps best illustrated in th Ravel suite, "Daphnis et Chloe," ~~which~~ was introduced to Philadelphia b Fritz Reiner and the Cincinnati Orches tra a few weeks ago. Mr. Koussevitzky whose understanding of the Frenc moderns is exceptionally complete, gav a delicate and thoroughly characteristi reading of the lovely suite, and th orchestra performed the difficult musi with great beauty and skill. The com position was in some ways the mos effective of the program. The co cert closed with Scriabin's Third Sy phony, the "Poeme Divin," a wo which has not been performed in th city since the season of 1916-17, wh Mr. Stokowski played it. Mr. Kou sevitsky is an acknowledged authori in the works of Scriabin, and the sy phony, which is exceedingly complicat in composition and elaborate in c chestration, was given a splend reading. The first movement is t finest musically and also the mo effective.

One of Mr. Koussevitzky's chara teristics as a conductor is his ability create different atmospheres, both the orchestra and the audience, acco ing to the composition being perform In the Handel number, it was one pure classicism; in Liadoff the atm phere was that of a Russian church, the work is religious music in the chestral instead of the vocal form; Ravel number was pure French and Scriabin had an unearthly atmosphe admirably fitting the meaning of program and of the music. The Bost Orchestra leader is undoubtedly a tuoso conductor, but he never for moment loses sight of the musical co tent of the work, at the same ti giving all the detail with the great clearness and a perfect relation theme to accompaniment—a diffic thing in the complicated music of modern composers. In his seating the orchestra, he used the stage pl forms to the great gain of the tone the orchestra and the clarity of de of the composition played. S. L. L

170

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second visit to this city of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, at the Lyric last night served in a way to classify the conductor more definitely than seemed possible on the first appearance.

On his debut there was a certain manner, almost as of posture, which tended to leave an impression that somehow the Russian did not bring to his work that absolute sincerity and that conviction which are essential to an altogether vitalized performance. This impression, indefinite as it was, the second appearance served to dissipate.

Whether one agrees with Koussevitzky's interpretation of a certain work, with his conception of its precise meaning and import, or not, one cannot help according to him originality, force, vitality and a certain rugged, picturesque impressiveness, which invest his offering with commanding and even compelling interest.

How else could the rapt attention manifest by the audience last night, in the performance of compositions which lacked very distinctly the element of novelty and at least one of which, the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Scheherazade," because of its obviousness and a certain simplicity now regarded as very much out of date, is often spoken of lightly, be accounted for?

There was nothing subtle or sophisticated about this interpretation. It told the story of the sea and of Sinbad's ship, of the Kalandar Prince, of the young Prince and Princess, and of the Festival at Bagdad and the shipwreck, in plain language. To use another simile, the several pictures were painted with bold strokes, especially in the shipwreck, where Koussevitzky gives the brasses and percussions their head, in vivid coloring, but it was an entrancing picture that retained the old "Thousand and One Nights" spell.

Similarly, in the Debussy "Afternoon with a Faun," which has been presented by every conductor of note with an orchestra sufficiently large to give it with any chance of effectiveness, there was a directness savoring of realism in the interpretation.

The feeling of nebulosity, of dreaminess, of diaphanous delicacy, was largely wanting, and in its place appeared a definiteness of outline, a distinctness that made the figures and the sylvan scenes assume a quality almost as of life itself.

The gambolings of fauns and satyrs, the enchanting presence of nymphs and dryads, was almost seen rather than felt, and the work thus took on a more substantial character than is usually given it.

As for the novelties of the evening the Galliard Sonata in G mayor, freely transcribed for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, a modern Russian composer, and the Dukas "Sorcerer's Apprentice," the former retained in the transcription all of the stateliness and the nobility of the original work.

It was played with a broad sweep, and its four short movements were splendidly differentiated. There was dignity in the first movement, lightness in the second, old-fashioned pathos and gloom in the third and sprightliness and buoyancy in the last. The transcription, it appears, still exists only in manuscript.

The Dukas opus, which has not been heard here before, proved to be a fascinating conception. It was played in brilliant style, and one could fairly visualize the owls, the bats, the witches and the broom spirit dashing out to the pool and filling the bath.

The blow with the axe which split the uncanny servant in two was indicated strikingly, and the horror of the apprentice following the discovery that each half again became a separate entity found adequate expression. One of the most unusual effects was the use made of the bassoons.

In this number Koussevitsky again showed that he is less concerned about infinite details than about general impressions, and the same vigor that he displayed in other places distinguished the production.

The audience left no doubt that it was with the Russian conductor in his ideas, and the first violinist came in for special approbation for the delicacy and the fluency with which he played the various motives introduced in the "Scheherazade." Nicholas Avierino, viola player, who was at the Peabody Conservatory last season, appeared with the orchestra.

The Grachur Glee Club will give its annual benefit concert this evening at the Maryland Casualty Auditorium and an interesting program has been arranged for the occasion.

The event is for the advancement of the work carried on by organizations connected with Grace Methodist Episcopal, St. Mark's Episcopal, St. John's Episcopal, Elderslie Methodist Episcopal, Waverly Methodist Episcopal and Grace Lutheran churches and the Mothers' Club of McDonogh School. A large attendance is expected.

Included among the numbers to be given are Parker's "Cossack War Song," Gibson's "Lullaby," Nevin's "The Bells of Shannon," and Protheroe's "Shadow Song," and the same composer's "Song of Marching Men," by the Glee Club; a selection of attractive lyrics by Anne Baugher Marks, contralto; some numbers by a quartet, and Clark's "Blind Plowman," Sanderson's "Until," and Guion's "De Old Ark's A'movin'," by John L. Wilbourne, tenor. The quarte is made up of Edward Jendrek, tenor John L. Wilbourne, tenor; C. Conn [illegible] barytone, and Walter Linth[illegible] Turner[illegible] cum, bass. Hobart Smith [illegible] Norman B. Cole [illegible] accompaniments.

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, JANUARY 28, 1926

ROOM FOR PROKOVIEV

The Composer and Pianist at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow—As He Looks, as He Plays, as He Writes Music—Various Forewords

A NEW RUSSIAN comes this week to the Symphony Concerts as guest—Serge Prokoviev. Hitherto Bostonian ears have known him only by his "Scythian Suite" and his Concerto for Violin, both played at Symphony Hall last season; or by incidental songs and piano-pieces slipped briefly into a passing recital. Now he may be seen in his own person and heard in his own music. As pianist he will play the solo-part in his third, and most recent, Concerto. By no more than that piece, however, may his audiences renew acquaintance. Seemingly, he and Mr. Koussevitzky were not minded to a repetition of the "Scythian Suite"; while they also put by a March and Scherzo from Prokoviev's fantastic opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," originally produced in Chicago where the great house of McCormick once viewed him kindly. In fact, while the list of Prokoviev's published music is substantial, it contains relatively few symphonic numbers without a voice, a solo-part or similar accessory. Consequently with this Third Piano-Concerto must we listeners be content.

Though Mr. Prokoviev is stranger to Boston, twice at least he has visited the United States and given concerts in both New York and Chicago. In those days "impressions" were written of the man, one or two of which may now serve for introduction. In The Transcript, for example, Mr. Borowski sketched him: "To the outer eye he is tall, blonde, big-boned, short-haired, thick-featured—a thorough Muscovite. In manner he is quick, businesslike, composed. He did not look any more like an 'anarchist' than did any of the gentlement who, in the first division of the concert, appeared from behind the stage to wheel the piano to a convenient place from which Mr. Prokoviev might deliver his concerto to the house.

"Serge Sergievich Prokoviev belongs still to the younger generation. He was born April 24, 1891, at Sontsovka, in the south of Russia. His mother, musically inclined, taught the boy all that she knew and having come to the end of her resources, confided his artistic training to Glière and Taneiev, in Moscow. There can have been very little doubt in the minds of Prokoviev's parents or of his teachers as to the profession which ultimately he would choose; for at the age of five he was beginning to compose. At a period in which most children are reading fairy tales in words of one syllable Prokoviev was writing them—in sound. He was attracted early by the glare of footlights. When only seven he composed an opera entitled 'The Giant' and he was only nine when he set down another dramatic composition. 'The Deserted Islands.' The youngster had not yet swallowed the secrets of orchestral virtuosity that were beginning to be too well known to Russian composers to be secrets any longer, so these youthful inspirations were laid out—as to the instrumental portion—for the colorless keyboard of the piano.

"By the time he was eleven Prokoviev had picked up more or less valuable information about instrumentation and he contributed a symphony in G major to the literature of that form. After that the stage reached out for the embryo composer once again. The year following the completion of the symphony found him engaged on 'The Feast,' an opera based upon a story by Poushkin. He was thirteen when another and a four-act opera 'Undine,' was composed. One must believe that Giliere and Taneive looked at each other portentiously when the boy tottered into the class room in Moscow with four acts of the orchestral score of 'Undine' clasped in his little arms.

"In 1903 Prokoviev betook himself to Leningrad, there to enter the Imperial Conservatory as a pupil of Mme. Essipov in piano-playing, and of Lyadov and Rimsky-Korsakov in musical theory and composition. Lyadov was not one of the bold spirits of the time. He wrote music like a gentleman, with no yearnings for 'radical' ideas. Possibly he laid a restraining finger on young Mr Prokoviev's impulse to rush into the music of the future. Rimsky-Korsakov, never a member of the anarchistic brotherhood in art, was not, at the same time, a reactionary. Although when his pupil Stravinsky played to him the music of 'The Fire-Bird,' Rimsky said, 'Stop playing that, for I might begin to like it,' that master was not one who would stifle the individuality of his students. He concerned himself more with their technique than with their style. Almost certainly the present accomplishments of Serge Prokoviev owe much to the guidance of Rimsky.'

"So great as Prokoviev's industry during his period of study at Leningrad that he set down more than a hundred pieces, some of which—like a symphony in E minor and various sonatas for piano—belonged to the larger forms. Apparently he has no illusions as to their quality; for with the exception of a sonata for piano which he recomposed later all these scholastic efforts remain unpublished." As Prokoviev matured—he is now thirty-five—he wrote abundantly; but not a few of his manuscripts were lost or abandoned in the turmoil of the Russian Revolution and the earlier years of the Soviet Government. Yet as it is, he can array three operas; two ballets—one, "Chout," produced in Paris by Mr. Dyaghilev; a "classic symphony"; a symphonic poem or two; the "Scythian Suite"; three concertos for piano; a concerto for violin; "They are Seven," choral and orchestral "incantation" suggested by an ancient Akkadian inscription. As publisher and as conductor, in Europe and now in America, Mr. Koussevitzky has often encouraged him.

Of Prokoviev as man, composer and pianist, Mr. W. B. Murray also wrote in The Transcript, saying: "Like Prokoviev or dislike him; accept or reject his music. It matters little. Ridicule will not hurt or dismay Prokoviev; the sarcastic criticism of the elderly will not subdue or stay him. In him rather is the driving force that laughs at obstacles. He never [illegible] his thoughts; he is happy or he is [illegible] in superlatives of youthful intensity. Like the young painters and other young musicians of Russia, Prokoviev is economical of means. Simple, straightforward themes tell his thoughts, and they are developed quickly, vigorously and without over-elaboration. Conventional harmonies mean nothing to him. He will tell you what he has to say in the first and most convenient language. His only consideration is the full and immediate expression of the thought in hand. If the usages of the past will answer his purpose, well and good; if not he will find new and direct means.

"As a pianist Prokoviev possesses a remarkable finger-technique, without which his music might have gone for years without an interpreter. For the exactions of it are such as only few pianists could master. Add to this amazing dexterity of fingers pedalling that colors every tone; a rhythmic precision that stings and bites; a wide range of dynamics that builds a crescendo from the mildest of pianissimi into the most raging of fortissimi, the kind of dynamic control that enables the pianist to orchestrate a piano composition and at the same time keep it within the bounds of the instrument—the power Busoni uses in his transcription of Bachs's organ fugues—and you may have some concepion of Prokoviev's playing. He is never sentimental, never sweetly songful. Merely with a piano, he might easily override an orchestra."

---

ge

gigantic personality in the world of music.

The occasion marks Mr. Koussevitsky's second local appearance and may be regarded as one of the principle musical events of the season. Mr. Koussevitsky's programs are always interesting and his list for Sunday is no exception. The symphony is Scriabin's third, "The Divine Poem," an opus new to local audiences. The program will open brilliantly with Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" and followed by Debussy's 'Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faun," which in turn is followed by Wagner's prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg."

The seats and boxes for this veritable musical feast are no on sale at McCoy's inc., No. 89 Asylum street. Reservations may be made by calling 2-6147.

Transcript Feb 3

De Boston à Paris

Le Temps Prints the News About Mr. Koussevitzky

THE POPULARITY of the celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, increases steadily in the United States. Subscriptions for every concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he leads, were exhausted several months beforehand—in New York as well as in Boston—an unprecedented event "over there." The management asked Mr. Koussevitzky to undertake several supplementary concerts. He was obliged to decline the proposal since he must sail for Europe at the beginning of May to give, in Paris and London, the usual series of "Koussevitzky Concerts."

Symphony to Play Russian Music

Prov. Journal Feb 7

A Russian programme with a Russian composer as soloist will mark the fourth Boston Symphony concert in Providence to be given in Infantry Hall a week from Tuesday evening. Serge Prokofieff, who is considered the most important of the younger generation of Russian composers and one of the finest piano virtuosos of the day, will appear as soloist in his own Third Pianoforte Concerto. Prokofieff has played this concerto with this orchestra in Boston, New York and Brooklyn.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the programme with the orchestral fantasy of Moussorgsky, "A Night on Bald Mountain," a music of sorcery and evil spirits which are dispelled by the coming of dawn. The latter part of the programme will be taken up by Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," of which Koussevitzky has proved himself an inspired interpreter at recent concerts in Boston, New York and other cities.

A friend of Scriabin, Koussevitzky was in sympathetic understanding with the musical aims and philosophic ideals of this "mystic in tones." The conductor first gave performance to his principal works in Moscow and Petrograd. He even took them to the villages along the Volga river, Scriabin accompanying him on one of his voyages. The "Divine Poem" is in three parts. The first, "Luttes" ("Struggles"), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation and doubt. The second, "Voluptes," has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy in merging into nature." The third, "Jeu divin," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 3 1926

BROWN WILL HONOR ASIATIC EXPLORER AND HUB MUSICIAN

Honorary Degrees to Be Conferred Upon Koussevitzky and Andrews at University's Special Convocation Feb. 24, Faunce Announces.

Brown University will hold a special convocation on Wednesday, Feb. 24, at which time it will confer honorary degrees upon Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews of New York, the famous Asiatic explorer.

In making this announcement last night, President W. H. P. Faunce of Brown said that the convocation had been specially called because neither M. Kossevitzky, who leads European orchestras each summer, nor Mr. Andrews, who leaves on March 1 for exploration in Turkestan, could be in this country in June.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Visiting Day, which has heretofore taken place the first Wednesday in March, will be held in conjunction with the convocation. The advisory board of the Associated Alumni, made up of delegates from Brown Clubs in all parts of the United States, will also convene at this time. It will have its first session Tuesday evening, Feb. 23, at the University Club, and will finish its business Wednesday morning in the alumni offices, John Hay Library.

ROY CHAPMAN ANDREWS

There will be a special chapel service for Visiting Day. At 12 o'clock noon, members of the visiting committees, together with the corporation and faculty and Associated Alumni delegates, will assemble at the Faculty Club to hear a review of the year given by President Faunce. Luncheon will follow and at 2 o'clock the visiting committee will confer with the officers of instruction at the offices of the various departments of the university.

The academic procession will form at 4 o'clock for the march to Sayles Hall, where the honorary degrees will be conferred upon M. Koussevitzky and Mr. Andrews.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS HAPPY RET

[redacted]

Phila Ledger Fe

Phenomenal Rejuvenatio Old Organ'zation Demonstr by Koussevitzky at Academy

GIVES NOTABLE CONCER

The dynamic Serge Koussevitsk overflowing with personality and mus cal feeling, at the head of the rejuv nated Boston Symphony Orchestr gave the first public concert of the o ganization for several years in t Academy of Music last night. Th audience was not so large as it shou have been, considering Mr. Koussevi zky's eminence, but it was exceeding enthusiastic. Incidentally, it heard o of the finest concerts of the season.

What Mr. Koussevitzky has accon plished with the Boston Symphony O chestra in the brief space of his leade ship is little short of phenomenal. I a little more than a season he h transformed it from an organization o very moderate ability into a great vir tuoso orchestra of amazing flexibilit The tone of the strings recalls the Bo ton Orchestra of the days of Kneise Loeffler, Svecenski and Schroeder, whil the brass is wonderfully beautiful in it balance and in its ability to play wit an extremely soft and beautiful to quality as well as with the require sonority in the louder passages.

The organization is highly discipline the equal of our own orchestra in th respect, and is under the absolute dom nation of Mr. Koussevitzky and respo sive to his slightest wish, the dimi uendos, the most difficult effect in a music to be obtained with a large e semble being especially beautiful a effective. At the same time the to is tremendous in the climaxes and e cellent through all the gradations.

The program opened with the co certo grosso in D minor of Handel f strings alone, a work which gave t string section an opportunity to demo strate its admirable quality of tone a balance. This was followed by a "sym phonic picture," entitled "From t Apocalypse," by Liadoff, for full o chestra. It is a work of tremendou tonal and dynamic contrasts which w played with the utmost brilliancy an effect, despite its manifestly religiou character, an element which M Koussevitzky did not fail to introduce i his interpretation.

The virtuoso side of the organizatio was perhaps best illustrated in th Ravel suite. "Daphnis et Chloe," ~~which~~ was introduced to Philadelphia b Fritz Reiner and the Cincinnati Orches tra a few weeks ago. Mr. Koussevitzky whose understanding of the Frenc moderns is exceptionally complete, gav a delicate and thoroughly characteristi reading of the lovely suite, and th orchestra performed the difficult musi with great beauty and skill. The co position was in some ways the mos effective of the program. The co cert closed with Scriabin's Third Sy phony, the "Poeme Divin," a wo which has not been performed in th city since the season of 1916-17, wh Mr. Stokowski played it. Mr. Kou sevitsky is an acknowledged authorit in the works of Scriabin, and the sy phony, which is exceedingly complicat in composition and elaborate in c chestration, was given a splend reading. The first movement is t finest musically and also the mo effective.

One of Mr. Koussevitzky's chara teristics as a conductor is his ability create different atmospheres, both the orchestra and the audience, acco ing to the composition being perform In the Handel number, it was one pure classicism; in Liadoff the atmo phere was that of a Russian church, the work is religious music in the chestral instead of the vocal form; Ravel number was pure French and Scriabin had an unearthly atmosphe admirably fitting the meaning of program and of the music. The Bost Orchestra leader is undoubtedly a tuoso conductor, but he never for moment loses sight of the musical c tent of the work, at the same ti giving all the detail with the great clearness and a perfect relation theme to accompaniment—a diffic thing in the complicated music of modern composers. In his seating the orchestra, he used the stage p forms to the great gain of the tone the orchestra and the clarity of de of the composition played. S. L. L

170

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second visit to this city of the ~~Boston Symphony~~ Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, at the Lyric last night served in a way to classify the conductor more definitely than seemed possible on the first appearance.

On his debut there was a certain manner, almost as of posture, which tended to leave an impression that somehow the Russian did not bring to his work that absolute sincerity and that conviction which are essential to an altogether vitalized performance. This impression, indefinite as it was, the second appearance served to dissipate.

Whether one agrees with Koussevitzky's interpretation of a certain work, with his conception of its precise meaning and import, or not, one cannot help according to him originality, force, vitality and a certain rugged, picturesque impressiveness, which invest his offering with commanding and even compelling interest.

How else could the rapt attention manifest by the audience last night, in the performance of compositions which lacked very distinctly the element of novelty and at least one of which, the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Scheherazade," because of its obviousness and a certain simplicity now regarded as very much out of date, is often spoken of lightly, be accounted for?

There was nothing subtle or sophisticated about this interpretation. It told the story of the sea and of Sinbad's ship, of the Kalandar Prince, of the young Prince and Princess, and of the Festival at Bagdad and the shipwreck, in plain language. To use another simile, the several pictures were painted with bold strokes, especially in the shipwreck, where Koussevitzky gives the brasses and percussions their head, in vivid coloring, but it was an entrancing picture that retained the old "Thousand and One Nights" spell.

Similarly, in the Debussy "Afternoon with a Faun," which has been presented by every conductor of note with an orchestra sufficiently large to give it with any chance of effectiveness, there was a directness savoring of realism in the interpretation.

The feeling of nebulosity, of dreaminess, of diaphanous delicacy, was largely wanting, and in its place appeared a definiteness of outline, a distinctness that made the figures and the sylvan scenes assume a quality almost as of life itself.

The gambolings of fauns and satyrs, the enchanting presence of nymphs and dryads, was almost seen rather than felt, and the work thus took on a more substantial character than is usually given it.

As for the novelties of the evening the Galliard Sonata in G mayor, freely transcribed for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, a modern Russian composer, and the Dukas "Sorcerer's Apprentice," the former retained in the transcription all of the stateliness and the nobility of the original work.

It was played with a broad sweep, and its four short movements were splendidly differentiated. There was dignity in the first movement, lightness in the second, old-fashioned pathos and gloom in the third and sprightliness and buoyancy in the last. The transcription, it appears, still exists only in manuscript.

The Dukas opus, which has not been heard here before, proved to be a fascinating conception. It was played in brilliant style, and one could fairly visualize the owls, the bats, the witches and the broom spirit dashing out to the pool and filling the bath.

The blow with the axe which split the uncanny servant in two was indicated strikingly, and the horror of the apprentice following the discovery that each half again became a separate entity found adequate expression. One of the most unusual effects was the use made of the bassoons.

In this number Koussevitsky again showed that he is less concerned about infinite details than about general impressions, and the same vigor that he displayed in other places distinguished the production.

The audience left no doubt that it was with the Russian conductor in his ideas, and the first violinist came in for special approbation for the delicacy and the fluency with which he played the various motives introduced in the "Scheherazade." Nicholas Avierino, viola player, who was at the Peabody Conservatory last season, appeared with the orchestra.

The Grachur Glee Club will give its annual benefit concert this evening at the Maryland Casualty Auditorium and an interesting program has been arranged for the occasion.

The event is for the advancement of the work carried on by organizations connected with Grace Methodist Episcopal, St. Mark's Episcopal, St. John's Episcopal, Elderslie Methodist Episcopal, Waverly Methodist Episcopal and Grace Lutheran churches and the Mothers' Club of McDonogh School. A large attendance is expected.

Included among the numbers to be given are Parker's "Cossack War Song," Gibson's "Lullaby," Nevin's "The Bells of Shannon," and Protheroe's "Shadow Song," and the same composer's "Song of Marching Men," by the Glee Club; a selection of attractive lyrics by Anne Baugher Marks, contralto; some numbers by a quartet, and Clark's "Blind Plowman," Sanderson's "Until," and Guion's "De Old Ark's A'movin'," by John L. Wilbourne, tenor. The quarte is made up of Edward Jendrek, tenor John L. Wilbourne, tenor; C. Conn barytone, and Walter Linth Turner, cum, bass.

Hobart Smith Norman B. Cole accompaniments.

OM

171 ny Orchestra,

to this city of chestra under the sevitzky, in the f ved in a way to r more definite on the first a was a certain posture, which impression that did not bring to ts sincerity and

are essential to
ed performance.
finite as it was
e served to dis-

es with Koussen of a certain ion of its precise r not, one cannot originality, force,
in rugged, pic-
s, which invest anding and even

e rapt attention ce last night, in mpositions which the element of ne of which, the heherazade," bes and a certain
d as very much poken of lightly.

ubtle or sophis-retation. It told
and of Sinbad's
Prince, of the
ces, and of the
the shipwreck,
es so use another
res were painted
ally in the ship-itzky gives the
their head, in an entrancing old "Thousand ssy "Afternoon

been presented te with an or-o give it with ess, there was realism in the

ity, of dreamiey, was largely nce appeared a a distinctness
nd the sylvan almost as of

nns and satyrs,
of nymphs and
en rather than took on a more
than is usually

of the evening
G mayor, freely
itten by Maxi-nodern Russian kas "Sorcerer's
retained in the stateliness and
nal work.
a broad sweep,
movements were
d. There was ement, lightness
oned pathos and
sprightliness and
The transcripexists only in

ich has not been
ed to be a fas-was played in e could fairly ts, the witches
ing out of the
sh.
s which split the
was indicated of the appren-very that each eparate entity
n. One of the the use made

sevitzky again oncerned about ut general im-vigor that he s distinguished

oubt that it was tor in his ideas,
ame in for spe-
delicacy and the
played the va-
d in the "Sche-Avierino, viola
e Peabody Conppeared with the

Club will give its
this evening at Auditorium and m has been ar-advancement by organizations
Methodist Episcopal, St. John's
ethodist Episco-
ches and the nough School. A numbers to be ck War Song," n's "The Bells

eroe's "Shadow
mposer's "Song
the Glee Club;
lyrics by Anne alto; some num-Clark's "Blind
s "Until," and A'movin'," and
r. The quartet
Jendrek, tenor
nor; C. Connor er Linth

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
FEB 3 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, famous Russian conductor, gave the first of the two concerts scheduled for Washington for the present season at Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon before a large audience that showed marked enthusiasm. German, French and Russian music was presented. Music of Teutonic composers, widely varied, opened and closed the program. The overture was Carl Maria von Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," given original and painstaking shading of tone with an effect of recitatives for different groups of instruments in the various passages. The violins would announce a theme that was embroidered and varied by the cellos and other instruments. It was as though Mr. Koussevitzky turned an imaginary spotlight of concentration on first one group of instruments and then on another.

In decided contrast to the Von Weber work was Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," full of soft, nebulous imageries, with the wind and harp instruments dominating. Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this work may not prove the most popular reading of it, but it is certainly distinctive. At the end of the work the conductor insisted that M. Laurent, flutist, take part of the warm applause separately from the rest of the performers.

Again the nationality and mood of the music changed decidedly as the orchestra began the suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Tsar Saltan," with a military flourish and swung into musical narrative touched with the eerie quality that prevades a fairy tale. In the second part of the suite the pizzicato music of the first violins was swept into a sea of strident orchestral volume most descriptive of the story told, and in the last part an entirely different quality of pizzicato was used in portraying the happy ending of the story of fairy enchantment. The whole orchestra received an ovation following this work.

It is small wonder that there are so many admirers of the music of Johannes Brahms that the title "Brahmsians" has long since been coined. He is indeed one of the master composers. Probably never has his "Symphony in C Minor" appeared to better advantage than it did yesterday when played as the real feature of the Boston Orchestra's program. The four movements were played with only a short pause between them, unusual for a symphony in Washington. It has been noticed that even in Boston Mr. Koussevitzky's method of doing this has aroused much discussion and even argument as to its effectiveness. In the case of the Brahms work yesterday this plan was most effective, building up the music without any of the detrimental breaks caused so frequently by applause. Of course, it did make a long stretch of attentive listening for those inclined to be restless and also gave those who always seem to have to leave early no opportunity to do so gracefully. On the whole, however, it proved an admirable idea and the performance won continued ovations for both leader and orchestra at the symphony's conclusion.

The beautiful themes of this symphony, which rise with the effect of instrumental chants with a sonorous hymn-like quality, were given fine reading. The angry chattering of the pizzicato passages in the latter part

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 3 1926

Brown Will Confer Honorary Degrees

Koussevitzky, Orchestra Leader, and Andrews, Explorer, To Be Honored

Honorary degrees will be conferred upon Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews of New York, noted Asiatic explorer, a a special convocation to be held at Brown University on Wednesday, Feb. 24.

President Faunce, in making the announcement, explained that the special convocation is to be held because neither of the men to be honored will be in this country in the summer. In conjunction with the convocation visiting day will be held at the university and the advisory board of the Associated Alumni will convene.

There will be a special chapel service, and at noon members of the visiting committees will head a review of the year to be given by Dr. Faunce at the Faculty Club.

The academic procession will form at 4 p. m. for the march to Sayles Hall where the honorary degrees will be conferred.

Brown University to Honor Noted Musician and Explorer

Monitor — Feb 3

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 3 (Special)—Brown University has called a special convocation to be held on February 24 for the purpose of conferring honorary degrees upon Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews of New York, Asiatic explorer.

Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, president of the university, in making this announcement, said that a special convocation had been called because the fact that the recipients-elect ould not be in this country during ommencement exercises in June. onductor Koussevitsky will be in urope and Mr. Andrews is to leave on March 1 for exploration in Turkestan.

© Bain News Service
ROY CHAPMAN ANDREWS
Asiatic Explorer

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra

In conjunction with the convocation, Visiting Day, which ordinarily comes on the first Wednesday in March, will be held and the advisory board of the Associated Alumni will convene. The board's opening session will be held on the evening of Feb. 23.

On Visiting Day the visiting committees, the corporation and faculty and the Associated Alumni delegates will gather at the Faculty club and there listen to a review of the year fr The [illegible] Faunce. Luncheon wi at si
Sa
de

BROWN HONORS KOUSSEVITZKY

Post — Feb 3

Degrees for Conductor and Explorer Andrews

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 2 (AP).—A special convocation of Brown University will be held Feb. 24 for the conferring of honorary degrees on Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews of New York, explorer, President W. H. P. Faunce announced tonight.

President Faunce said the convocation had been called at this time because neither M. Koussevitzky, who conducts European orchestras in the summer, nor Mr. Andrews, who leaves on March 1 for exploration in Turkestan, could be in this country in June.

At present London has a number of omen police, but they have actually power of arrest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 3 1926

BROWN TO CONFER TWO SPECIAL DEGREES

Serge Koussevitzky and Explorer Andrews to Be Honored on Feb. 24

Sergt. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews, Asiatic explorer, will receive honorary degrees from Brown University at a special convocation on Wednesday, Feb. 24, according to announcement by William H. P. Faunce, president of the university, which goes on to say that the degrees are confirmed at this time since neither of the recipients will be in the country in June.

Visiting day, usually the first Wednesday of the month, will be held in conjunction with the convocation. The advisory board of the Associated Alumni, composed of delegates from Brown Clubs throughout the country, will be in session, convening here the night before and completing its business on Wednesday morning.

A special chapel service is planned for noon of visiting day. A luncheon will follow and at 2 o'clock the degrees will be conferred.

KOUSSEVITZKY HERE WITH BOSTON BAND

Remarkable Russian Gives Academy Audience a Swig of Musical Vodka

Phila Inquirer — Feb 2

Orchestra's First Public Appearance Here in Five Years Wins Enthusiasm

By LINTON MARTIN

It was good to welcome the Boston Symphony Orchestra back to town at the Academy last night for its first public concert here in five years. And it was good because the return was as festive as the previous departure was funereal—because the Orchestra "comes back," in a double sense, as a band of vital virtuosos instead of varied vagrants, and, first and foremost, because in the Russian Serge Koussevitzky it has a conductor who is more than a human metronome beating time over black dots on paper.

Koussevitzky took no chances last night on leaving the audience free to form what are called sane and sober judgments. He evidently doesn't believe that the Volstead law applies to musical matters. For, at the end, he poured a forty-minute swig of Russian musical vodka down the aural gullets of those present, and then sent them reeling out into the night after a hearing of Skryabin's "The Divine Poem," that seemed at times more demoniacal than divine, but was certainly often delirious.

It was in this number that Koussevitzky's most striking and most sensational qualities were emphasized on an old but arresting programme that had previously been changed oftener than twenty wild women could change one mind between them. The programme began sedately enough with the Haendel Concerto Grosso in D minor, Opus 6, No. 10, by an orchestra reduced to classic size. But that was merely to take the audience unaware later, for with the next number the canny Koussevitzky cut loose with his tonal thunders. Since the piece—Liadoff's symphonic picture, "From the Apocalypse"—is Biblical in inspiration, it might be in order to speculate whether the proverbial last trump of Gabriel on the Judgment Day may sound like a tin horn beside this resounding and pretentious tonal tempest. Koussevitzky worked his orchestra up to a veritable spasm, but the essential emptiness of the music could not be hid. The other numbers were the second "Daphnis and Chloe" Ballet Suite of Ravel, which is graceful but artificial music, and the Skryabin "Divine Poem," already mentioned.

The Boston band has again been brought, under Koussevitzky's conducting, to a very high point. It is sonorous and smooth; the brasses impress by their weight, the drums are dramatic, and the strings have tension and elasticity. But it is the conducting that counts, and Koussevitzky has the admirable faculty of being always aflame. He can maintain a sense of climax, and then push it still higher, yet with musicianly balance. It was enlivening and epochal to hear him

---

BOSTON SYMPHONY SHOWS NEW VIGOR

Rejuvenated Orchestra Under Koussevitsky Gives Demonstration at Academy

CONCERT A NOTABLE ONE

The dynamic Serge Koussevitsky, overflowing with personality and musical feeling, at the head of the rejuvenated Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave the first public concert of the organization for several years in the Academy of Music last night. The audience was not so large as it should have been, considering Mr. Koussevitzky's eminence, but it was exceedingly enthusiastic. Incidentally, it heard one of the finest concerts of the season.

What Mr. Koussevitzky has accomplished with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the brief space of his leadership is little short of phenomenal. In a little more than a season he hsa transformed it from an organization of very moderate ability into a great virtuoso orchestra of amazing flexibility. The tone of the strings recalls the Boston Orchestra of the days of Kneisel, Loeffler, Svecenski and Schroeder, while the brass is wonderfully beautiful in its balance and in its ability to play with an extremely soft and beautiful tone quality as well as with the required sonority in the louder passages.

The organization is highly disciplined the equal of our own orchestra in that respect, and is under the absolute domination of Mr. Koussevitzky and responsive to his slightest wish, the diminuendos, the most difficult effect in all music to be obtained with a large ensemble being especially beautiful and effective. At the same time the tone is tremendous in the climaxes and excellent through all the gradations.

The program opened with the concerto grosso in D minor of Handel for strings alone, a work which gave the string section an opportunity to demonstrate its admirable quality of tone and balance. This was followed by a "symphonic picture," entitled "From the Apocalypse," by Liadoff, for full orchestra. It is a work of tremendous tonal and dynamic contrasts which was played with the utmost brilliancy and effect, despite its manifestly religious character, an element which Mr. Koussevitzky did not fail to introduce in his interpretation.

The virtuoso side of the organization was perhaps best illustrated in the Ravel suite, "Daphnis et Chloe," which was introduced to Philadelphia by Fritz Reiner and the Cincinnati Orchestra a few weeks ago. Mr. Koussevitzky, whose understanding of the French moderns is exceptionally complete, gave a delicate and thoroughly characteristic reading of the lovely suite, and the orchestra performed the difficult music with great beauty and skill. The composition was in some ways the most effective of the program. The concert closed with Scriabin's Third Symphony, the "Poeme Divin," a work which has not been performed in this city since the season of 1916-17, when Mr. Stokowski played it. Mr. Koussevitsky is an acknowledged authority in the works of Scriabin, and the symphony, which is exceedingly complicated in composition and elaborate in orchestration, was given a splendid reading. The first movement is the finest musically and also the most effective.

One of Mr. Koussevitzky's characteristics as a conductor is his ability to create different atmospheres, both for the orchestra and the audience, according to the composition being performed. In the Handel number, it was one of pure classicism; in Liadoff the atmosphere was that of a Russian church, as the work is religious music in the orchestral instead of the vocal form; the Ravel number was pure French and the Scriabin had an unearthly atmosphere, admirably fitting the meaning of the program and of the music. The Boston Orchestra leader is undoubtedly a virtuoso conductor, but he never for a moment loses sight of the musical content of the work, at the same time giving all the detail with the greatest clearness and a perfect relation of theme to accompaniment—a difficult thing in the complicated music of the modern composers. In his seating of the orchestra, he used the stage platforms to the great gain of the tone of the orchestra and the clarity of detail of the composition played. S. L. L.

Boston Symphony Goes on the Air

Prov. Journal Feb 7

Long anxious to broadcast some of its concerts, but unable to do so because of the expense involved, the Boston Symphony Orchestra finally went on the air recently through the generosity of a friend, and the very first night ran up against the copyright snag. Listeners were forced to stand by for 15 minutes while the orchestra played a number which is held under exclusive copyright by a concern which refused to let it be broadcast.

This frequently encountered problem involving the broadcasting of music held under exclusive copyright bobbed up at a peculiarly annoying time. It was the orchestra's debut on the air, thousands of listeners who had tuned in were displeased at the wait, and the number which caused the trouble was "Sinfonietta" by Eugene Goossens, who was appearing that evening as guest conductor, and who was anxious that his work should be made available to the radio audience as well as to those in Symphony Hall.

As a result of the difficulty, thousands of letters from music lovers and radio fans throughout New England poured in with the request that some arrangement be made to obviate similar interruptions in future concerts. It happened that Serge Koussevitsky had arranged a programme for the second broadcast which included no music with exclusive copyrights, and it seems probable now that all broadcast programmes will be so arranged in the future.

Confronted with the same problem, Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra, which broadcasts concerts from New York frequently, has omitted all music with an exclusive copyright when he has not been able to obtain permission to broadcast it. Orchestras in Philadelphia and Cincinnati

---

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Traveler — Feb 6

Third of New Series to Be Given Tuesday Afternoon

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, will give the third concert of the new historical Tuesday afternoon series next Tuesday in Symphony hall at 3:15. The works to be played will include Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; Saint-Saens' Symphonic Poem "Omphale's Spinning Wheel"; Tchaikowsky's overture-fantasia "Romeo and Juliet," and Brahms' First Symphony in C Minor.

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Respighi's new score, "The Pines of Rome," will be performed for the first time in Boston. Other numbers will be a concerto in E minor for string orchestra by Vivaldi, a contrapuntal fantasy on a folk song of Liege by Lekeu and Beethoven's First Symphony in C Major.

The People's Symphony Orchestra will give its 14th concert of the season tomorrow afternoon at 3:30 in the Hollis Street Theatre, Stuart Mason conducting. The assisting artist will be Mieczyslaw Munz, pianist, and the program is as follows: Mendelssohn's overture "Ruy Blas"; Chadwick's Symphony No. 2 in B Flat Major, Op. 21; Liszt's Concerto in A Major for Piano and Orchestra; Berlioz's Danse des Sylphes et Marche Hongroise from "La Damnation de Faust."

HIS CLIPPING FROM THE CAMDEN,
N. J.
FEB 2 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY WINS NEW TRIUMPH

Koussevitzky Leads Brilliant Orchestra in Stimulating Program

◆

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of the palmy days of Karl Muck, was recalled when the Boston Symphony of today, under the leadership of the brilliant Serge Koussevitzky, made its first public appearance in several years at the Academy of Music last night.

Mr. Koussevitzky's transformation of this orchestra is a feat that demands superlatives. From the second-rate, wobbly and musically uncertain organization that worked under the batons of Rabaud and Monteux, this towering Russian has molded a symphonic body the equal of any, bar none, that has played in the Quaker City this season—and the superior of all but one.

The string tone has the bland, warm quality, and marvelous unanimity and balance that made the orchestra of 1914 famous while the playing of the other choirs is of the highest order. Koussevitzky gets from this ensemble a responsiveness that none but Stokowski can boast. The conductor's somewhat affected gestures are quickly forgotten in the great things which they seem to call forth, tonal shading of the most delicate sort and instrumental details that ordinarily one would only know existed by reading the score.

The opening work was the Concerto Grosso, in D Minor of Handel, which gave the strings full chance to shine. A composition new to Philadelphia followed, Liadoff's "From the Apocalypse." Based upon a scriptural quotation, the work proved a brilliant piece of orchestral writing, shimmering in tonal color, despite its underlying religious character. It was given a virtuoso performance.

The most beautiful moments of the evening, however, were the "Daphnis et Chloe" suite of Ravel. This work was introduced to Philadelphia recently by Fritz Reiner and the Cincinnati Symphony and is one of the most exquisite things I can recall from the pen of any modern French composer.

Of the "Divine Poem" of Scriabin, which closed the program, I found only that its moments of tedium far outweighed its moments of beauty. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it with reverence and zeal. —A. D. P.

171

ony Orchestra.
to this city of th
Orchestra, under th
Koussevitzky, at th
ved in a way t or more definite
e on the first ap

re was a certain of posture, which impression that
did not bring to ute sincerity and
are essential to zed performance.
efinite as it was
ce served to dis-

ees with Kousse-on of a certain ption of its precise or not, one cannot originality, force,
ain rugged, pic-
ess, which invest manding and even

he rapt attention nce last night, in ompositions which the element of
one of which, the cheherazade," bess and a certain
ed as very much spoken of lightly.

subtle or sophis
pretation. It told
and of Sinbad's
Prince, of the
cess, and of the
the shipwreck,
To use another
res were painted
ially in the ship-
itzky gives the
s their head, in s an entrancing
e old "Thousand

ussy "Afternoon
been presented ote with an orto give it with ness, there was realism in the

sity, of dreami-acy, was largely lace appeared a a distinctness
and the sylvan y almost as of uns and satyrs,

of nymphs and
een rather than
took on a more
than is usually

of the evening
G mayor, freely
chestra by Maximodern Russian
kas "Sorcerer's
retained in the stateliness and inal work.
a broad sweep,
movements were
ed. There was vement, lightness
oned pathos and
sprightliness and
The transacrip-l exists only in

ich has not been ved to be a fast was played in ne could fairly bats, the witches
ashing out to the
th.
e which split the wo was indicated
r of the appren-overy that each separate entity on. One of the s the use made ssevitsky again concerned about out general ime vigor that he es distinguished

loubt that it was ctor in his ideas,
ame in for spe-
delicacy and the
played the va-
ed in the "Sche-Avierino, viola
he Peabody Con-appeared with the

Club will give its t this evening at ty Auditorium and am has been ar-
on.
e advancement of
by organizations
Methodist Episcopal, St. John's
ethodist Episco-
t Episcopal and rches and the nogh School. A ected.
numbers to be

ck War Song," in's "The Bells
eroe's "Shadow
omposer's "Song
the Glee Club;
lyrics by Anne lto; some num-
Clark's "Blind
s "Until," and
s A'movin'," by
or. The quartet
Jendrek, tenor;
enor; C. Connor
ker Linth

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
FEB 3 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, famous Russian conductor, gave the first of the two concerts scheduled for Washington for the present season at Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon before a large audience that showed marked enthusiasm. German, French and Russian music was presented. Music of Teutonic composers, widely varied, opened and closed the program. The overture was Carl Maria von Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," given original and painstaking shading of tone with an effect of recitatives for different groups of instruments in the various passages. The violins would announce a theme that was embroidered and varied by the cellos and other instruments. It was as though Mr. Koussevitzky turned an imaginary spotlight of concentration on first one group of instruments and then on another.

In decided contrast to the Von Weber work was Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," full of soft, nebulous imageries, with the wind and harp instruments dominating. Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this work may not prove the most popular reading of it, but it is certainly distinctive. At the end of the work the conductor insisted that M. Laurent, flutist, take part of the warm applause separately from the rest of the performers.

Again the nationality and mood of the music changed decidedly as the orchestra began the suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Tsar Saltan," with a military flourish and swung into musical narrative touched with the eerie quality that prevades a fairy tale. In the second part of the suite the pizzicato music of the first violins was swept into a sea of strident orchestral volume most descriptive of the story told, and in the last part an entirely different quality of pizzicato was used in portraying the happy ending of the story of fairy enchantment. The whole orchestra received an ovation following this work.

It is small wonder that there are so many admirers of the music of Johannes Brahms that the title "Brahmsians" has long since been coined. He is indeed one of the master composers. Probably never has his "Symphony in C Minor" appeared to better advantage than it did yesterday when played as the real feature of the Boston Orchestra's program. The four movements were played with only a short pause between them, unusual for a symphony in Washington. It has been noticed that even in Boston Mr. Koussevitzky's method of doing this has aroused much discussion and even argument as to its effectiveness. In the case of the Brahms work yesterday this plan was most effective, building up the music without any of the detrimental breaks caused so frequently by applause. Of course, it did make a long stretch of attentive listening for those inclined to be restless and also gave those who always seem to have to leave early no opportunity to do so gracefully. On the whole, however, it proved an admirable idea and the performance won continued ovations for both leader and orchestra at the symphony's conclusion.

The beautiful themes of this symphony, which rise with the effect of instrumental chants with a sonorous hymn-like quality, were given fine reading. The angry chattering of the pizzicato passages in the latter part

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 3 1926

Brown Will Confer Honorary Degrees

Koussevitzky, Orchestra Leader, and Andrews, Explorer, To Be Honored

Honorary degrees will be conferred upon Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews of New York, noted Asiatic explorer, at a special convocation to be held at Brown University on Wednesday, Feb. 24.

President Faunce, in making the announcement, explained that the special convocation is to be held because neither of the men to be honored will be in this country in the summer. In conjunction with the convocation visiting day will be held at the university and the advisory board of the Associated Alumni will convene.

There will be a special chapel service, and at noon members of the visiting committees will head a review of the year to be given by Dr. Faunce at the Faculty Club.

The academic procession will form at 4 p. m. for the march to Sayles Hall where the honorary degrees will be conferred.

Brown University to Honor Noted Musician and Explorer

Monitor Feb 3

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 3 (Special)—Brown University has called a special convocation to be held on February 24 for the purpose of conferring honorary degrees upon Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews of New York, Asiatic explorer.

Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, president of the university, in making this announcement, said that a special convocation had been called because the fact that the recipients-elect ould not be in this country during ommencement exercises in June. onductor Koussevitsky will be in urope and Mr. Andrews is to leave on March 1 for exploration in Turkestan.

© Bain News Service
ROY CHAPMAN ANDREWS
Asiatic Explorer

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra

In conjunction with the convocation, Visiting Day, which ordinarily comes on the first Wednesday in March, will be held and the advisory board of the Associated Alumni will convene. The board's opening session will be held on the evening of Feb. 23.

On Visiting Day the visiting committees, the corporation and faculty and the Associated Alumni delegates will gather at the Faculty club and there listen to a review of the year fr
wi
at sic
Sa
de

BROWN HONORS KOUSSEVITZKY

Post Feb 3

Degrees for Conductor and Explorer Andrews

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 2 (AP).—A special convocation of Brown University will be held Feb. 24 for the conferring of honorary degrees on Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews of New York, explorer, President W. H. P. Faunce announced tonight.

President Faunce said the convocation had been called at this time because neither M. Koussevitzky, who conducts European orchestras in the summer, nor Mr. Andrews, who leaves on March 1 for exploration in Turkestan, could be in this country in June.

At present London has a number of omen police, but they have actually power of arrest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 3 1926

BROWN TO CONFER TWO SPECIAL DEGREES

Serge Koussevitzky and Explorer Andrews to Be Honored on Feb. 24

Sergt. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews, Asiatic explorer, will receive honorary degrees from Brown University at a special convocation on Wednesday, Feb. 24, according to announcement by William H. P. Faunce, president of the university, which goes on to say that the degrees are confirmed at this time since neither of the recipients will be in the country in June.

Visiting day, usually the first Wednesday of the month, will be held in conjunction with the convocation. The advisory board of the Associated Alumni, composed of delegates from Brown Clubs throughout the country, will be in session, convening here the night before and completing its business on Wednesday morning.

A special chapel service is planned for noon of visiting day. A luncheon will follow and at 2 o'clock the degrees will be conferred.

KOUSSEVITZKY HERE WITH BOSTON BAND

Remarkable Russian Gives Academy Audience a Swig of Musical Vodka

Phila Inquirer. Feb 2

Orchestra's First Public Appearance Here in Five Years Wins Enthusiasm

By LINTON MARTIN

It was good to welcome the Boston Symphony Orchestra back to town at the Academy last night for its first public concert here in five years. And it was good because the return was as festive as the previous departure was funereal—because the Orchestra "comes back," in a double sense, as a band of vital virtuosos instead of varied vagrants, and, first and foremost, because in the Russian Serge Koussevitzky it has a conductor who is more than a human metronome beating time over black dots on paper.

Koussevitzky took no chances last night on leaving the audience free to form what are called sane and sober judgments. He evidently doesn't believe that the Volstead law applies to musical matters. For, at the end, he poured a forty-minute swig of Russian musical vodka down the aural gullets of those present, and then sent them reeling out into the night after a hearing of Skryabin's "The Divine Poem," that seemed at times more demoniacal than divine, but was certainly often delirious.

It was in this number that Koussevitzky's most striking and most sensational qualities were emphasized on an old but arresting programme that had previously been changed oftener than twenty wild women could change one mind between them. The programme began sedately enough with the Haendel Concerto Grosso in D minor, Opus 6, No. 10, by an orchestra reduced to classic size. But that was merely to take the audience unaware later, for with the next number the canny Koussevitzky cut loose with his tonal thunders. Since the piece—Liadoff's symphonic picture, "From the Apocalypse"—is Biblical in inspiration, it might be in order to speculate whether the proverbial last trump of Gabriel on the Judgment Day may sound like a tin horn beside this resounding and pretentious tonal tempest. Koussevitzky worked his orchestra up to a veritable spasm, but the essential emptiness of the music could not be hid. The other numbers were the second "Daphnis and Chloe" Ballet Suite of Ravel, which is graceful but artificial music, and the Skryabin "Divine Poem," already mentioned.

The Boston band has again been brought, under Koussevitzky's conducting, to a very high point. It is sonorous and smooth; the brasses impress by their weight, the drums are dramatic, and the strings have tension and elasticity. But it is the conducting that counts, and Koussevitzky has the admirable faculty of being always aflame. He can maintain a sense of climax, and then push it still higher, yet with musicianly balance. It was enlivening and epochal to hear him

---

OM

BOSTON SYMPHONY SHOWS NEW VIGOR

Rejuvenated Orchestra Under Koussevitsky Gives Demonstration at Academy

CONCERT A NOTABLE ONE

The dynamic Serge Koussevitsky, overflowing with personality and musical feeling, at the head of the rejuvenated Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave the first public concert of the organization for several years in the Academy of Music last night. The audience was not so large as it should have been, considering Mr. Koussevitzky's eminence, but it was exceedingly enthusiastic. Incidentally, it heard one of the finest concerts of the season.

What Mr. Koussevitzky has accomplished with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the brief space of his leadership is little short of phenomenal. In a little more than a season he hsa transformed it from an organization of very moderate ability into a great virtuoso orchestra of amazing flexibility. The tone of the strings recalls the Boston Orchestra of the days of Kneisel, Loeffler, Svecenski and Schroeder, while the brass is wonderfully beautiful in its balance and in its ability to play with an extremely soft and beautiful tone quality as well as with the required sonority in the louder passages.

The organization is highly disciplined the equal of our own orchestra in that respect, and is under the absolute domination of Mr. Koussevitzky and responsive to his slightest wish, the diminuendos, the most difficult effect in all music to be obtained with a large ensemble being especially beautiful and effective. At the same time the tone is tremendous in the climaxes and excellent through all the gradations.

The program opened with the concerto grosso in D minor of Handel for strings alone, a work which gave the string section an opportunity to demonstrate its admirable quality of tone and balance. This was followed by a "symphonic picture," entitled "From the Apocalypse," by Liadoff, for full orchestra. It is a work of tremendous tonal and dynamic contrasts which was played with the utmost brilliancy and effect, despite its manifestly religious character, an element which Mr. Koussevitzky did not fail to introduce in his interpretation.

The virtuoso side of the organization was perhaps best illustrated in the Ravel suite, "Daphnis et Chloe," which was introduced to Philadelphia by Fritz Reiner and the Cincinnati Orchestra a few weeks ago. Mr. Koussevitzky, whose understanding of the French moderns is exceptionally complete, gave a delicate and thoroughly characteristic reading of the lovely suite, and the orchestra performed the difficult music with great beauty and skill. The composition was in some ways the most effective of the program. The concert closed with Scriabin's Third Symphony, the "Poeme Divin," a work which has not been performed in this city since the season of 1916-17, when Mr. Stokowski played it. Mr. Koussevitsky is an acknowledged authority in the works of Scriabin, and the symphony, which is exceedingly complicated in composition and elaborate in orchestration, was given a splendid reading. The first movement is the finest musically and also the most effective.

One of Mr. Koussevitzky's characteristics as a conductor is his ability to create different atmospheres, both for the orchestra and the audience, according to the composition being performed. In the Handel number, it was one of pure classicism; in Liadoff the atmosphere was that of a Russian church, as the work is religious music in the orchestral instead of the vocal form; the Ravel number was pure French and the Scriabin had an unearthly atmosphere, admirably fitting the meaning of the program and of the music. The Boston Orchestra leader is undoubtedly a virtuoso conductor, but he never for a moment loses sight of the musical content of the work, at the same time giving all the detail with the greatest clearness and a perfect relation of theme to accompaniment—a difficult thing in the complicated music of the modern composers. In his seating of the orchestra, he used the stage platforms to the great gain of the tone of the orchestra and the clarity of detail of the composition played. S. L. L.

Boston Symphony Goes on the Air

Prov. Journal Feb 7

Long anxious to broadcast some of its concerts, but unable to do so because of the expense involved, the Boston Symphony Orchestra finally went on the air recently through the generosity of a friend, and the very first night ran up against the copyright snag. Listeners were forced to stand by for 15 minutes while the orchestra played a number which is held under exclusive copyright by a concern which refused to let it be broadcast.

This frequently encountered problem involving the broadcasting of music held under exclusive copyright bobbed up at a peculiarly annoying time. It was the orchestra's debut on the air, thousands of listeners who had tuned in were displeased at the wait, and the number which caused the trouble was "Sinfonietta" by Eugene Goossens, who was appearing that evening as guest conductor, and who was anxious that his work should be made available to the radio audience as well as to those in Symphony Hall.

As a result of the difficulty, thousands of letters from music lovers and radio fans throughout New England poured in with the request that some arrangement be made to obviate similar interruptions in future concerts. It happened that Serge Koussevitsky had arranged a programme for the second broadcast which included no music with exclusive copyrights, and it seems probable now that all broadcast programmes will be so arranged in the future.

Confronted with the same problem, Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra, which broadcasts concerts from New York frequently, has omitted all music with an exclusive copyright when he has not been able to obtain permission to broadcast it. Orchestras in Philadelphia and Cincinnati

---

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Traveler Feb 6

Third of New Series to Be Given Tuesday Afternoon

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, will give the third concert of the new historical Tuesday afternoon series next Tuesday in Symphony hall at 3:15. The works to be played will include Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; Saint-Saens' Symphonic Poem "Omphale's Spinning Wheel"; Tchaikowsky's overture-fantasia "Romeo and Juliet," and Brahms' First Symphony in C Minor.

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Respighi's new score, "The Pines of Rome," will be performed for the first time in Boston. Other numbers will be a concerto in E minor for string orchestra by Vivaldi, a contrapuntal fantasy on a folk song of Liege by Lekeu and Beethoven's First Symphony in C Major.

The People's Symphony Orchestra will give its 14th concert of the season tomorrow afternoon at 3:30 in the Hollis Street Theatre, Stuart Mason conducting. The assisting artist will be Mieczyslaw Munz, pianist, and the program is as follows: Mendelssohn's overture "Ruy Blas"; Chadwick's Symphony No. 2 in B Flat Major, Op. 21; Liszt's Concerto in A Major for Piano and Orchestra; Berlioz's Danse des Sylphes et Marche Hongroise from "La Damnation de Faust."

HIS CLIPPING FROM THE CAMDEN,
N. J.

BOSTON SYMPHONY WINS NEW TRIUMPH

Koussevitzky Leads Brilliant Orchestra in Stimulating Program

◆

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of the palmy days of Karl Muck, was recalled when the Boston Symphony of today, under the leadership of the brilliant Serge Koussevitzky, made its first public appearance in several years at the Academy of Music last night.

Mr. Koussevitzky's transformation of this orchestra is a feat that demands superlatives. From the second-rate, wobbly and musically uncertain organization that worked under the batons of Rabaud and Monteux, this towering Russian has molded a symphonic body the equal of any, bar none, that has played in the Quaker City this season—and the superior of all but one.

The string tone has the bland, warm quality, and marvelous unanimity and balance that made the orchestra of 1914 famous while the playing of the other choirs is of the highest order. Koussevitzky gets from this ensemble a responsiveness that none but Stokowski can boast. The conductor's somewhat affected gestures are quickly forgotten in the great things which they seem to call forth, tonal shading of the most delicate sort and instrumental details that ordinarily one would only know existed by reading the score.

The opening work was the Concerto Grosso, in D Minor of Handel, which gave the strings full chance to shine. A composition new to Philadelphia followed, Liadoff's "From the Apocalypse." Based upon a scriptural quotation, the work proved a brilliant piece of orchestral writing, shimmering in tonal color, despite its underlying religious character. It was given a virtuoso performance.

The most beautiful moments of the evening, however, were the "Daphnis et Chloe" suite of Ravel. This work was introduced to Philadelphia recently by Fritz Reiner and the Cincinnati Symphony and is one of the most exquisite things I can recall from the pen of any modern French composer.

Of the "Divine Poem" of Scriabin, which closed the program, I found only that its moments of tedium far outweighed its moments of beauty. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it with reverence and zeal. —A. D. P.

171

phony Orchestra.
it to this city of t y Orchestra, under t Koussevitzky, at t served in a way
uctor more definite ible on the first a

here was a certai
of posture, which an impression that ian did not bring to solute sincerity and ich are essential to alized performance,
ndefinite as it was ance served to dis-

grees with Kousse-ation of a certain ception of its precise t, or not, one cannot im originality, force,
ertain rugged, piceness, which invest mmanding and eve

the rapt attention
dience last night, in compositions which tly the element of t one of which, the "Scheherazade," be-ness and a certain rded as very much
spoken of lightly,

subtle or sophi erpretation. It tol
and of Sinbad's
dar Prince, of the
rincess, and of the
and the shipwreck,
To use another
ctures were painted pecially in the shipsevitzky gives the
ons their head, in was an entrancing
the old "Thousand ll.
ebussy "Afternoon
has been presented note with an orge to give it with veness, there was
of realism in the

ulosity, of dreamlicacy, was largely place appeared a e, a distinctness
s and the sylvan lity almost as of

fauns and satyrs,
ce of nymphs and
seen rather than us took on a more
r than is usually

es of the evening
in G mayor, freely orchestra by Maximodern Russian Dukas "Sorcerer's
her retained in the
the stateliness and
riginal work.
th a broad sweep,
movements were
ted. There was ovement, lightness
hioned pathos and
d sprightliness and
t. The transacriptill exists only in which has not been roved to be a fas-

It was played in one could fairly
e bats, the witches dashing out to the bath.
axe which split the two was indicated
rror of the appren-discovery that each a separate entity ession. One of the was the use made

oussevitzky again concerned about
about general imme vigor that he aces distinguished

o doubt that it wa
ductor in his ideas
t came in for spe
he delicacy and th
he played the v
uced in the "Sche
s Avierino, viola
the Peabody Con-
, appeared with the

e Club will give its cert this evening at alty Auditorium and gram has been ar-
sion.
the advancement of
on by organizations
ce Methodist Epis-piscopal, St. John's Methodist Episco-dist Episcopal and hurches and the cDonogh School. A xpected.
he numbers to be

---

ossack War Song," Nevin's "The Bells
rotheroe's "Shadow composer's "Song
by the Glee Club;
tive lyrics by Anne tralto; some num-
nd Clark's "Blind on's "Until," and k's A'movin'," by enor. The quartet rd Jendrek, tenor tenor; C. Conno
alter Linth

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
FEB 3 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, famous Russian conductor, gave the first of the two concerts scheduled for Washington for the present season at Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon before a large audience that showed marked enthusiasm. German, French and Russian music was presented. Music of Teutonic composers, widely varied, opened and closed the program. The overture was Carl Maria von Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," given original and painstaking shading of tone with an effect of recitatives for different groups of instruments in the various passages. The violins would announce a theme that was embroidered and varied by the cellos and other instruments. It was as though Mr. Koussevitzky turned an imaginary spotlight of concentration on first one group of instruments and then on another.

In decided contrast to the Von Weber work was Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," full of soft, nebulous imageries, with the wind and harp instruments dominating. Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this work may not prove the most popular reading of it, but it is certainly distinctive. At the end of the work the conductor insisted that M. Laurent, flutist, take part of the warm applause separately from the rest of the performers.

Again the nationality and mood of the music changed decidedly as the orchestra began the suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Tsar Saltan," with a military flourish and swung into musical narrative touched with the eerie quality that prevades a fairy tale. In the second part of the suite the pizzicato music of the first violins was swept into a sea of strident orchestral volume most descriptive of the story told, and in the last part an entirely different quality of pizzicato was used in portraying the happy ending of the story of fairy enchantment. The whole orchestra received an ovation following this work.

It is small wonder that there are so many admirers of the music of Johannes Brahms that the title "Brahmsians" has long since been coined. He is indeed one of the master composers. Probably never has his "Symphony in C Minor" appeared to better advantage than it did yesterday when played as the real feature of the Boston Orchestra's program. The four movements were played with only a short pause between them, unusual for a symphony in Washington. It has been noticed that even in Boston Mr. Koussevitzky's method of doing this has aroused much discussion and even argument as to its effectiveness. In the case of the Brahms work yesterday this plan was most effective, building up the music without any of the detrimental breaks caused so frequently by applause. Of course, it did make a long stretch of attentive listening for those inclined to be restless and also gave those who always seem to have to leave early no opportunity to do so gracefully. On the whole, however, it proved an admirable idea and the performance won continued ovations for both leader and orchestra at the symphony's conclusion.

The beautiful themes of this symphony, which rise with the effect of instrumental chants with a sonorous hymn-like quality, were given fine reading. The angry chattering of the pizzicato passages in the latter part was a vivid bit. Above all, the rising of the musical climax into an inspired outburst of melody that was almost poignant to the listener's ears in its beauty gave an aurical picture that can never be quite obliterated.

The orchestra appeared under the auspices of Mrs. Wilson-Greene and will be presented in the other concert here this year on April 13.

H. F.

President Faunce, in making the announcement, explained that the special convocation is to be held because neither of the men to be honored will be in this country in the summer. In conjunction with the convocation visiting day will be held at the university and the advisory board of the Associated Alumni will convene.

There will be a special chapel service, and at noon members of the visiting committees will head a review of the year to be given by Dr. Faunce at the Faculty Club.

The academic procession will form at 4 p. m. for the march to Saylee Hall where the honorary degrees will be conferred.

Brown University to Honor Noted Musician and Explorer

Monitor Feb 3

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 3 (Special)—Brown University has called a special convocation to be held on February 24 for the purpose of conferring honorary degrees upon Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews of New York, Asiatic explorer.

Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, president of the university, in making this announcement, said that a special convocation had been called because the fact that the recipients-elect ould not be in this country during ommencement exercises in June. onductor Koussevitsky will be in urope and Mr. Andrews is to leave on March 1 for exploration in Turkestan.

© Bain News Service

ROY CHAPMAN ANDREWS
Asiatic Explorer

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra

In conjunction with the convocation, Visiting Day, which ordinarily comes on the first Wednesday in March, will be held and the advisory board of the Associated Alumni will convene. The board's opening session will be held on the evening of Feb. 23.

On Visiting Day the visiting committees, the corporation and faculty and the Associated Alumni delegates will gather at the Faculty club and there listen to a review of the year from President Faunce. Luncheon will be followed by conferences and at 4 o'clock the academic procession will form for the march to Sayles Hall where the honorary degrees will be conferred.

OM

BOSTON SYMPHONY SHOWS NEW VIGOR

Rejuvenated Orchestra Under Koussevitsky Gives Demonstration at Academy

CONCERT A NOTABLE ONE

The dynamic Serge Koussevitsky, overflowing with personality and musical feeling, at the head of the rejuvenated Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave the first public concert of the organization for several years in the Academy of Music last night. The audience was not so large as it should have been, considering Mr. Koussevitzky's eminence, but it was exceedingly enthusiastic. Incidentally, it heard one of the finest concerts of the season.

What Mr. Koussevitzky has accomplished with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the brief space of his leadership is little short of phenomenal. In a little more than a season he hsa transformed it from an organization of very moderate ability into a great virtuoso orchestra of amazing flexibility. The tone of the strings recalls the Boston Orchestra of the days of Kneisel, Loeffler, Svecenski and Schroeder, while the brass is wonderfully beautiful in its balance and in its ability to play with an extremely soft and beautiful tone quality as well as with the required sonority in the louder passages.

The organization is highly disciplined the equal of our own orchestra in that respect, and is under the absolute domination of Mr. Koussevitzky and responsive to his slightest wish, the diminuendos, the most difficult effect in all music to be obtained with a large ensemble being especially beautiful and effective. At the same time the tone is tremendous in the climaxes and excellent through all the gradations.

The program opened with the concerto grosso in D minor of Handel for strings alone, a work which gave the string section an opportunity to demonstrate its admirable quality of tone and balance. This was followed by a "symphonic picture," entitled "From the Apocalypse," by Liadoff, for full orchestra. It is a work of tremendous tonal and dynamic contrasts which was played with the utmost brilliancy and effect, despite its manifestly religious character, an element which Mr. Koussevitzky did not fail to introduce in his interpretation.

The virtuoso side of the organization was perhaps best illustrated in the Ravel suite, "Daphnis et Chloe," which was introduced to Philadelphia by Fritz Reiner and the Cincinnati Orchestra a few weeks ago. Mr. Koussevitzky, whose understanding of the French moderns is exceptionally complete, gave a delicate and thoroughly characteristic reading of the lovely suite, and the orchestra performed the difficult music with great beauty and skill. The composition was in some ways the most effective of the program. The concert closed with Scriabin's Third Symphony, the "Poeme Divin," a work which has not been performed in this city since the season of 1916-17, when Mr. Stokowski played it. Mr. Koussevitsky is an acknowledged authority in the works of Scriabin, and the symphony, which is exceedingly complicated in composition and elaborate in orchestration, was given a splendid reading. The first movement is the finest musically and also the most effective.

One of Mr. Koussevitzky's characteristics as a conductor is his ability to create different atmospheres, both for the orchestra and the audience, according to the composition being performed. In the Handel number, it was one of pure classicism; in Liadoff the atmosphere was that of a Russian church, as the work is religious music in the orchestral instead of the vocal form; the Ravel number was pure French and the Scriabin had an unearthly atmosphere, admirably fitting the meaning of the program and of the music. The Boston Orchestra leader is undoubtedly a virtuoso conductor, but he never for a moment loses sight of the musical content of the work, at the same time giving all the detail with the greatest clearness and a perfect relation of theme to accompaniment—a difficult thing in the complicated music of the modern composers. In his seating of the orchestra, he used the stage platforms to the great gain of the tone of the orchestra and the clarity of detail of the composition played. S. L. L.

BROWN HONORS KOUSSEVITZKY

Post Feb 3

Degrees for Conductor and Explorer Andrews

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 2 (AP).—A special convocation of Brown University will be held Feb. 24 for the conferring of honorary degrees on Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews of New York, explorer, President W. H. P. Faunce announced tonight.

President Faunce said the convocation had been called at this time because neither M. Koussevitzky, who conducts European orchestras in the summer, nor Mr. Andrews, who leaves on March 1 for exploration in Turkestan, could be in this country in June.

At present London has a number of women police, but they have actually no power of arrest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 3 1926

BROWN TO CONFER TWO SPECIAL DEGREES

Serge Koussevitzky and Explorer Andrews to Be Honored on Feb. 24

Sergt. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews, Asiatic explorer, will receive honorary degrees from Brown University at a special convocation on Wednesday, Feb. 24, according to announcement by William H. P. Faunce, president of the university, which goes on to say that the degrees are confirmed at this time since neither of the recipients will be in the country in June.

Visiting day, usually the first Wednesday of the month, will be held in conjunction with the convocation. The advisory board of the Associated Alumni, composed of delegates from Brown Clubs throughout the country, will be in session, convening here the night before and completing its business on Wednesday morning.

A special chapel service is planned for noon of visiting day. A luncheon will follow and at 2 o'clock the degrees will be conferred.

Orchestra's First Public Appearance Here in Five Years Wins Enthusiasm

By LINTON MARTIN

It was good to welcome the Boston Symphony Orchestra back to town at the Academy last night for its first public concert here in five years. And it was good because the return was as festive as the previous departure was funereal—because the Orchestra "comes back," in a double sense, as a band of vital virtuosos instead of varied vagrants, and, first and foremost, because in the Russian Serge Koussevitzky it has a conductor who is more than a human metronome beating time over black dots on paper.

Koussevitzky took no chances last night on leaving the audience free to form what are called sane and sober judgments. He evidently doesn't believe that the Volstead law applies to musical matters. For, at the end, he poured a forty-minute swig of Russian musical vodka down the aural gullets of those present, and then sent them reeling out into the night after a hearing of Skryabin's "The Divine Poem," that seemed at times more demoniacal than divine, but was certainly often delirious.

It was in this number that Koussevitzky's most striking and most sensational qualities were emphasized on an old but arresting programme that had previously been changed oftener than twenty wild women could change one mind between them. The programme began sedately enough with the Haendel Concerto Grosso in D minor, Opus 6, No. 10, by an orchestra reduced to classic size. But that was merely to take the audience unaware later, for with the next number the canny Koussevitzky cut loose with his tonal thunders. Since the piece—Liadoff's symphonic picture, "From the Apocalypse"—is Biblical in inspiration, it might be in order to speculate whether the proverbial last trump of Gabriel on the Judgment Day may sound like a tin horn beside this resounding and pretentious tonal tempest. Koussevitzky worked his orchestra up to a veritable spasm, but the essential emptiness of the music could not be hid. The other numbers were the second "Daphnis and Chloe" Ballet Suite of Ravel, which is graceful but artificial music, and the Skryabin "Divine Poem," already mentioned.

The Boston band has again been brought, under Koussevitzky's conducting, to a very high point. It is sonorous and smooth; the brasses impress by their weight, the drums are dramatic, and the strings have tension and elasticity. But it is the conducting that counts, and Koussevitzky has the admirable faculty of being always aflame. He can maintain a sense of climax, and then push it still higher, yet with musicianly balance. It was enlivening and epochal to hear him

---

Boston Symphony Goes on the Air

Prov. Journal Feb 7

Long anxious to broadcast some of its concerts, but unable to do so because of the expense involved, the Boston Symphony Orchestra finally went on the air recently through the generosity of a friend, and the very first night ran up against the copyright snag. Listeners were forced to stand by for 15 minutes while the orchestra played a number which is held under exclusive copyright by a concern which refused to let it be broadcast.

This frequently encountered problem involving the broadcasting of music held under exclusive copyright bobbed up at a peculiarly annoying time. It was the orchestra's debut on the air, thousands of listeners who had tuned in were displeased at the wait, and the number which caused the trouble was "Sinfonietta" by Eugene Goossens, who was appearing that evening as guest conductor, and who was anxious that his work should be made available to the radio audience as well as to those in Symphony Hall.

As a result of the difficulty, thousands of letters from music lovers and radio fans throughout New England poured in with the request that some arrangement be made to obviate similar interruptions in future concerts. It happened that Serge Koussevitsky had arranged a programme for the second broadcast which included no music with exclusive copyrights, and it seems probable now that all broadcast programmes will be so arranged in the future.

Confronted with the same problem, Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra, which broadcasts concerts from New York frequently, has omitted all music with an exclusive copyright when he has not been able to obtain permission to broadcast it. Orchestras in Philadelphia and Cincinnati have followed his example.

Despite protests of radio stations and listeners throughout the country, a ruling was made about a year ago in favor of the American Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers to prevent matter controlled by then to be broadcast without their permission. When permission cannot be obtained, the microphone must be shut off while the piece is being rendered. It is felt by those interested in the broadcasting of the symphony concerts that if long breaks in the programme occur there will be considerably less interest in the concerts among radio fans.

---

evening Respighi's new score, "The Pines of Rome," will be performed for the first time in Boston. Other numbers will be a concerto in E minor for string orchestra by Vivaldi, a contrapuntal fantasy on a folk song of Liege by Lekeu and Beethoven's First Symphony in C Major.

The People's Symphony Orchestra will give its 14th concert of the season tomorrow afternoon at 3:30 in the Hollis Street Theatre, Stuart Mason conducting. The assisting artist will be Mieczyslaw Munz, pianist, and the program is as follows: Mendelssohn's overture "Ruy Blas"; Chadwick's Symphony No. 2 in B Flat Major, Op. 21; Liszt's Concerto in A Major for Piano and Orchestra; Berlioz's Danse des Sylphes et Marche Hongroise from "La Damnation de Faust."

HIS CLIPPING FROM THE CAMDEN,
N. J.

FEB 2 - 192

BOSTON SYMPHONY WINS NEW TRIUMPH

Koussevitzky Leads Brilliant Orchestra in Stimulating Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of the palmy days of Karl Muck, was recalled when the Boston Symphony of today, under the leadership of the brilliant Serge Koussevitzky, made its first public appearance in several years at the Academy of Music last night.

Mr. Koussevitzky's transformation of this orchestra is a feat that demands superlatives. From the second-rate, wobbly and musically uncertain organization that worked under the batons of Rabaud and Monteux, this towering Russian has molded a symphonic body the equal of any, bar none, that has played in the Quaker City this season—and the superior of all but one.

The string tone has the bland, warm quality, and marvelous unanimity and balance that made the orchestra of 1914 famous while the playing of the other choirs is of the highest order. Koussevitzky gets from this ensemble a responsiveness that none but Stokowski can boast. The conductor's somewhat affected gestures are quickly forgotten in the great things which they seem to call forth, tonal shading of the most delicate sort and instrumental details that ordinarily one would only know existed by reading the score.

The opening work was the Concerto Grosso, in D Minor of Handel, which gave the strings full chance to shine. A composition new to Philadelphia followed, Lladoff's "From the Apocalypse." Based upon a scriptural quotation, the work proved a brilliant piece of orchestral writing, shimmering in tonal color, despite its underlying religious character. It was given a virtuoso performance.

The most beautiful moments of the evening, however, were the "Daphnis et Chloe" suite of Ravel. This work was introduced to Philadelphia recently by Fritz Reiner and the Cincinnati Symphony and is one of the most exquisite things I can recall from the pen of any modern French composer.

Of the "Divine Poem" of Scriabin, which closed the program, I found only that its moments of tedium far outweighed its moments of beauty. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it with reverence and zeal. —A. D. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
WASH. D. C.

FEB 3 1926

1172

BOSTON SYMPHONY AGAIN PLEASES HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, made its annual appearance here at Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon, presenting a program of varied interest in which Symphony No. 1 in C minor, by Brahms, and a Suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "Tsar Saltan," were featured.

The orchestra under Koussevitzky is a quite different organization from that heard here in recent years under Pierre Montreux. This great symphony, which, in the days of Karl Muck, was probably the foremost organization of its kind in the country, has suffered numerous vicissitudes, but is now well on the way to recovery.

Muck was removed from the conductorship and was followed out by other members. Also, in the post-war days, the musicians sought higher wages and the recalcitrants were removed.

The result was that practically a new orchestra had to be built. Koussevitzky has succeeded in large measure, and the Boston Symphony is now among the finest musical organizations.

The Suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, a colorful, exotic work which Koussevitzky interpreted with amazing intuition, was by far his most inspired reading of the afternoon and was splendidly received.

The Brahms Symphony naturally attracted much interest as the principal work presented. Its stirring finale and pleasing first movement were most delightful.—LEE SOMERS.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.

FEB 3 1926

Koussevitsky Here Tonight

Sergei Koussevitsky will direct the only performance here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric tonight. This will mark the second local appearance of the Russian conductor who succeeded Monteux as director of the Boston forces.

Sergei Koussevitsky

A suite by the conductor's fellow countryman, Rimcky-Korsakov, will be the feature

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 7 1926

Symphony to Play Russian Music

A Russian programme with a Russian composer as soloist will mark the fourth Boston Symphony concert in Providence to be given in Infantry Hall a week from Tuesday evening. Serge Prokofieff, who is considered the most important of the younger generation of Russian composers and one of the finest piano virtuosos of the day, will appear as soloist in his own Third Pianoforte Concerto. Prokofieff has played this concerto with this orchestra in Boston, New York and Brooklyn.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the programme with the orchestral fantasy of Moussorgsky, "A Night on Bald Mountain," a music of sorcery and evil spirits which are dispelled by the coming of dawn. The latter part of the programme will be taken up by Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," of which Koussevitzky has proved himself an inspired interpreter at recent concerts in Boston, New York and other cities.

A friend of Scriabin, Koussevitzky was in sympathetic understanding with the musical aims and philosophic ideals of the "mystic in tones." The conductor gave performance to his principal works in Moscow and Petrograd. He even took them to the villages along the Volga river, Scriabin accompanying him on one of his voyages. The "Divine Poem" is in three parts. The first, "Luttes" ("Struggles"), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation and doubt. The second, "Voluptes," has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy in merging into nature." The third, "Jeu divin," the final, triumphant realization of the [illegible] expressed.

ROTOGRAVURE SECTION

HERALD MAR 21-26

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 7 1926

Plight of Symphony Orchestra Looking for an Auditorium

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

So Mr. Koussintzky is to be honored by Brown University! Splendid! How proud the people of Providence ought to be of its own Brown University which so honors itself by being the first American college to confer an honor upon the world's greatest living orchestral conductor.

Apropos to this, the very serious question arises whether or not Providence will be honored by the regular series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, which have been for so many years a vital part of the city's artistic life.

With the razing of Infantry Hall in the spring to make room for the proposed garage, there seems to be at this time not a single auditorium, theatre or hall available to engage for next season's concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra does not make a practice of giving Sunday concerts. The Majestic and Albee Theatres are available only on Sundays. The armory is unsuitable. The Elks Auditorium and Opera House are much too small. The above-mentioned places comprise the complete list of the city's facilities to house concerts of the first magnitude with the possible exception of the new skating rink on North Main street, which cannot be judged until completed and tried out for accoustic properties.

As the years pass, Providence finds itself more and more in disgrace over the fact that it has no suitable auditorium for first-class visiting or home organizations to give its people pleasure and education.

Will the people of Providence be indifferent to the situation and allow an obelisk or monument to be placed in Exchange place or Market square and viewed occasionally as they pass by individually or will they use and demand the much needed auditorium as their war memorial?

Such a structure can be useful as well as ornamental; a work of art in which the finest principles of American ideals can be taught to our cosmopolitan audiences, and the best in universal art can be enjoyed.

Cannot the committee on the war memorial see that this would be the combined wish of the boys who never came back, could they but express themselves?

ANTOINETTE HALL-WHYTOCK.
Providence, Feb. 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

FEB 2 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S CONCERT AT ACADEMY

Koussevitzky Greeted Enthusiastically by Audience.

How delightful it seemed to enter the Academy of Music last night and to find in their accustomed places the familiar program books of the Boston Orchestra. Even more delightful was the realization, after a glance about the audience, of a survival of that interest and spirit which for many years—in fact, during much of the period in which musical taste in this city was being formed—made possible the annual series of concerts by what was then the country's finest musical organization—the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was a great gratification last night to recognize in the splendid orchestra conducted by the present leader, Serge Koucsevitsky, a reincarnation of the past glories of that great body. The Boston musicians have been completely restored to their former high estate, and should recapture all the prestige so unfortunately lost some seasons ago.

The development since the visit of last season, when the orchestra played under the auspices of the Forum, is amazing and demonstrates the power of Koussevitzky even more thoroughly than did the remarkably beautiful program so ably conducted by him last night. A last-moment change substituted, as an opening number, the Haendel Concerto Grosso in D minor for the Galliard Sonata in G major. Otherwise, the program book list remained unchanged, and included a very interesting symphonic picture "From the Apocalypse" by Liadow, a work thoroughly Russian in type, employing some of the familiar ecclesiastical modes, and having real dramatic, even theatrical, feeling. The Ravel Ballet, from "Daphnis et Chloe," was so superbly presented the orchestra was given the first pronounced ovation of the evening, Koussevitzky being recalled several times, and the musicians rising to acknowledge the appreciation of their fine work. Following the intermission, the Third Symphony of Seriabin, "The Divine Poem," was played. This work, more than anything on the program, brought out the virtuosity of the orchestra and the meticulous control of the talented, interesting leader. It was beautiful playing, "The Divine Poem," despite its philosophical program, being music so richly melodious, so intense and so varied that it is quite possible to revel in its beauties, regardless of its obtruse idealism. The audience was stirred by the mastery of the conductor and the brilliancy and nobility of tone of the orchestra.

Hartford Courant 2/8/26

THE HARTF

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN SPLENDID FORM

Hundred Musicians Play Superlatively Well in Capitol Concert.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY CONSUMMATE ARTIST

Performs Upon Greatest of Instruments With Magnificent Skill.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, played at the Capitol Theater yesterday afternoon, the concert being under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The occasion marked the only appearance of the Boston orchestra here this season and a capacity audience heard the playing, which was of the quality expected of the orchestra, highest and best. The program offered included the not over-familiar "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Borlioz, the extremely familiar "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" and "Metistersinger" overture, and the practically unknown Scriabin Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem." The audience was most enthusiastic and recalled Mr. Koussevitzky to the stage again and again, the members of the orchestra rising to share the applause with him after the Wagner number and at the close of the concert.

In Splendid Form.

The first few measures only of the Belioz work were necessary to prove the quality of yesterday's playing. The orchestra was in splendid form and its conductor seemingly at his best. It is a joy to watch him at work as well as to listen to what the orchestra has to say under his direction. He plays upon his five-score instruments as if they were one; he gets his effects of tremendous power and brilliance with ease and brings the merest whispers of tone seeping through the fingers of his lightly raised hand. They call him virtuoso, and some feel that the word is not wholly complimentary in its meaning when applied to an orchestrial conductor, but he is a performer of magnificent skill upon the greatest of instruments. the combined artistry of many men to make the orchestra certainly the title is well earned and a title indicating extraordinary merit well earned should never be considered other than complimentary.

Highly Individual.

He is highly individual in his conducting but he is not a gallery player. He knows what he wants of his men as an artist knows the colors he uses; his players in their combined skill paint the picture in sound that he desires to produce. The world could well use many virtuosi of the quality of this calm and self-possessed Russian.

Berlioz revelled in orchestral tone and the reading of his overture yesterday afternoon was a tonal delight. It was an exposition of the powers of the orchestra, the massive strength of the whole, the smoothness of the brasses, the splendid sweep of the strings, the delights of the woodwinds. And the Debussy number was given in all its supertonal graces. It is lovely, evanescent poetry in sound that Debussy wove in his fantastic work; and the playing was superb.

Of course the delights of the "Meistersinger" measures were appreciated, for even a moderately good orchestra can make this work pleasing and an orchestra of superlative merit like the Boston Symphony adds to the joys of Wagner's tremendous ingenuity as it is shown in the overture. The reading was sweeping and free yet perfect in every slightest detail; the humor of the music was there, too; nothing was lost yet every effect was gained with no perceptible effort. The overture made one long to hear the whole work done on the same splendid scale.

Scriabins Third Symphony.

In "The Divine Poem" the composer has created a work that needs more than a single hearing to establish its values no matter how great an interpretation is given. The idea of life that the composer would show in his music might be differently understood as the music became more familiar to the hearer. Most of those in yesterday's audience were listening to the Scriabin Symphony for the first time and many of them doubtless found their best enjoyment of the music in letting it take their thoughts where it would without much references to the program notes or to the titles allotted its three movements. And in that Mr. Koussevitzky elected to play the symphony without intermission this mental attitude towards the work was easy to hold.

There is splendid sweep of tone throughout, there is gorgeously complicated writing, there is fine melody and a great deal of it and every melodic measure was given its just due in the reading and the playing. The place one would give the Scriabin Third Symphony in symphonic literature is hardly to be considered after one hearing of the work. But a more brilliant, a more tonally satisfying reading of the work than that of yesterday afternoon could not well be asked.

Hartford Feb 8th 26

KOUSSEVITSKY SWAYS AUDIENCE

Conductor of Boston Symphony Thrills 3,000 Music Lovers in Concert Here.

ROMANTIC IMAGERY SUBTLY DISPLAYED

Orchestra Now Is a Perfected Organization—"Afternoon of a Faun" Given Glowing Reading.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, making its annual visit in Hartford, attracted a large audience at the Capitol theater yesterday afternoon, when a concert was given by this noted organization under the direction of its magnetic director, Serge Koussevitsky. The event was under the local managment of Frank A. Sedgwick and proved to be one of the most enjoyable events of the season in this city, which has been distinguished for its many notable recitals of different forms of music. With Mr. Koussevitsky, were more than one hundred members of his finely trained orchestra, which for many years has been one of the leading units of its kind throughout the entire musical world.

Concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Hartford have always attracted much favorable attention and yesterproved no exception to the rule. Crowds attending these events gradually have increased. Formerly Parsons's theater was ample in size to accommodate all who wished to attend, but yesterday $3,000 lover of music were present and showed keen interest in a concert which proved enjoyable from start to finish. Hartford has seen many great conductors of the Boston Symphony, Muck, Fiedler, Monteux and others, but none with any more of a general appeal than that shown by Koussevitsky yesterday afternoon.

Under the direction of Koussevitsky, the orchestra has now reached what yesterday was to many one of the most interesting stages in its development. Changes have been made in the personnel of the organization, and many familiar faces were missing yesterday. But the genius of a Koussevitsky has improved and raised the musical standards of the orchestra until critics agree that it is now as near perfect as any organization of its kind can be under human supervision. Criticism of a performance such as yesterday's would be practically impossible, and for keen enjoyment of a harmonious presentation of masterpieces of orchestral writing it would be impossible to suggest any place where there might be any decided room for improvement. It was the glorified picturization of ensemble playing, and those present were not slow to realize that they were in the presence of a genius of the baton whose work was leaving a favorable impression which will be long remembered in this vicinity.

The program opened with a splendid depiction of the "Overture" to "Benvenuto Cellini" by Berlioz. This work was played with spirit, yet with a proper regard for the dramatic as well as the lyric passages which made its performance one of great interest. This overture has been heard in this city in the past years, but Mr. Koussevitsky presented it with a dignity and a comprehensiveness throughout which his really marvelous personality made most pronounced. Mr. Koussevitsky is a conductor who is always the absolute master of his players. They have been drilled to follow his every sign, and as a result he has a precision, yet a freedom which is always of a most interesting as well as of a most compelling character.

Next in order was the unusual "Afternoon of a Faun," by Debussy, a number always a favorite with devotees of the orchestra. The lyric beauties of this really remarkable work were set forth in glowing colors, and Koussevitsky obtained effects in shading and in tone colorization which were really remarkable. Throughout a considerable part of the number was heard an entrancing flute obligato, and at the conclusion the unnamed flute player in the orchestra was generously permitted by the director to share much deserved applause with him. The Debussy number was in many ways one of the most interesting of the entire afternoon.

Mr. Koussevitsky next presented the familiar "Prelude" to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," one of Wagner's masterpieces. The Boston Symphony orchestra has had conductors who were able to conduct Wagner with more virility that Koussevitsky; Dr. Muck, for example. In some ways Koussevitsky's performance of this favorite number was rather perfunctory. Technical flaws there were none, but there was something lacking, something of that indescribable character which only a Wagnerian genius could have imparted.

Much of the interest of the afternoon centered in the "Third Symphony," styled "The Divine Poem" by Scriabin, which yesterday had its first performance in this city. Here again was the great Koussevitzky at his best. Here was the noted conductor dwelling in an atmosphere entirely [illegible] to him. Here he was interpreting the music of a friend and associate, one with whom he had been well acquainted. Here was the unusual spectacle of the Boston Symphony orchestra departing from the academic and presenting a work filled with the inspiration of a genius. Color there was in abundance. There also were elements of picturesqueness and dramatic impulses which made the playing of this symphony something to be treasured for weeks and even months to come.

The symphony was in three movements, "Luttes," interpreted as meaning "Struggles"; "Voluptes," meaning "Sensuous Pleasures," and "Jeu Divin," meaning "Divine Activity." In the last two movements some exquisite obligato solo work was done by R. Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra. In the last movement are all the emotions and joys of life set forth in dramatic style. Here was in reality the climax of the afternoon, the climax of a program which showed the orchestra and director working in perfect union for the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
WASH. D. C.

FEB 3 1926

17P

BOSTON SYMPHONY AGAIN PLEASES HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, made its annual appearance here at Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon, presenting a program of varied interest in which Symphony No. 1 in C minor, by Brahms, and a Suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "Tsar Saltan," were featured.

The orchestra under Koussevitzky is a quite different organization from that heard here in recent years under Pierre Montreux. This great symphony, which, in the days of Karl Muck, was probably the foremost organization of its kind in the country, has suffered numerous vicissitudes, but is now well on the way to recovery.

Muck was removed from the conductorship and was followed out by other members. Also, in the post-war days, the musicians sought higher wages and the recalcitrants were removed.

The result was that practically a new orchestra had to be built. Koussevitzky has succeeded in large measure, and the Boston Symphony is now among the finest musical organizations.

The Suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, a colorful, exotic work which Koussevitzky interpreted with amazing intuition, was by far his most inspired reading of the afternoon and was splendidly received.

The Brahms Symphony naturally attracted much interest as the principal work presented. Its stirring finale and pleasing first movement were most delightful.—LEI SOMERS.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.

FEB 3 1926

Koussevitsky Here Tonight

Sergei Koussevitsky will direct the only performance here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric tonight. This will mark the second local appearance of the Russian conductor who succeeded Monteux as director of the Boston forces.

Sergei Koussevitsky

A suite by the conductor's fellow countryman, Rimcky-Korsakov, will be the feature here the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 7 1926

Symphony to Play Russian Music

A Russian programme with a Russian composer as soloist will mark the fourth Boston Symphony concert in Providence to be given in Infantry Hall a week from Tuesday evening. Serge Prokofieff, who is considered the most important of the younger generation of Russian composers and one of the finest piano virtuosos of the day, will appear as soloist in his own Third Pianoforte Concerto. Prokofieff has played this concerto with this orchestra in Boston, New York and Brooklyn.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the programme with the orchestral fantasy of Moussorgsky, "A Night on Bald Mountain," a music of sorcery and evil spirits which are dispelled by the coming of dawn. The latter part of the programme will be taken up by Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," of which Koussevitzky has proved himself an inspired interpreter at recent concerts in Boston, New York and other cities.

A friend of Scriabin, Koussevitzky was in sympathetic understanding with the musical aims and philosophic ideals of "mystic in tones." The conductor gave performance to his principal works in Moscow and Petrograd. He even took them to the villages along the Volga river, Scriabin accompanying him on one of his voyages. The "Divine Poem" is in three parts. The first, "Luttes" ("Struggles"), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation and doubt. The second, "Voluptes," has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy in merging into nature." The third, "Jeu divin," the final, triumphant realization of the [illegible] expressed.

ROTOGRAVURE SECTION
HERALD MAR 21-'26

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 7 1926

Plight of Symphony Orchestra Looking for an Auditorium

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

So Mr. Koussintzky is to be honored by Brown University! Splendid! How proud the people of Providence ought to be of its own Brown University which so honors itself by being the first American college to confer an honor upon the world's greatest living orchestral conductor.

Apropos to this, the very serious question arises whether or not Providence will be honored by the regular series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, which have been for so many years a vital part of the city's artistic life.

With the razing of Infantry Hall in the spring to make room for the proposed garage, there seems to be at this time not a single auditorium, theatre or hall available to engage for next season's concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra does not make a practice of giving Sunday concerts. The Majestic and Albee Theatres are available only on Sundays. The armory is unsuitable. The Elks Auditorium and Opera House are much too small. The above-mentioned places comprise the complete list of the city's facilities to house concerts of the first magnitude with the possible exception of the new skating rink on North Main street, which cannot be judged until completed and tried out for accoustic properties.

As the years pass, Providence finds itself more and more in disgrace over the fact that it has no suitable auditorium for first-class visiting or home organizations to give its people pleasure and education.

Will the people of Providence be indifferent to the situation and allow an obelisk or monument to be placed in Exchange place or Market square and viewed occasionally as they pass by individually or will they use and demand the much needed auditorium as their war memorial.

Such a structure can be useful as well as ornamental; a work of art in which the finest principles of American ideal can be taught to our cosmopolitan audiences, and the best in universal art can be enjoyed.

Cannot the committee on the war memorial see that this would be the combined wish of the boys who never came back, could they but express themselves?

ANTOINETTE HALL-WHYTOCK.
Providence, Feb. 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

FEB 2 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S CONCERT AT ACADEMY

Koussevitzky Greeted Enthusiastically by Audience.

How delightful it seemed to enter the Academy of Music last night and to find in their accustomed places the familiar program books of the Boston Orchestra. Even more delightful was the realization, after a glance about the audience, of a survival of that interest and spirit which for many years—in fact, during much of the period in which musical taste in this city was being formed—made possible the annual series of concerts by what was then the country's finest musical organization—the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was a great gratification last night to recognize in the splendid orchestra conducted by the present leader, Serge Koucsevitsky, a reincarnation of the past glories of that great body. The Boston musicians have been completely restored to their former high estate, and should recapture all the prestige so unfortunately lost some seasons ago.

The development since the visit of last season, when the orchestra played under the auspices of the Forum, is amazing and demonstrates the power of Koussevitzky even more thoroughly than did the remarkably beautiful program so ably conducted by him last night. A last-moment change substituted, as an opening number, the Haendel Concerto Grosso in D minor for the Galliard Sonata in G major. Otherwise, the program book list remained unchanged, and included a very interesting symphonic picture "From the Apocalypse" by Liadow, a work thoroughly Russian in type, employing some of the familiar ecclesiastical modes, and having real dramatic, even theatrical, feeling. The Ravel Ballet, from "Daphnis et Chloe," was so superbly presented the orchestra was given the first pronounced ovation of the evening, Koussevitzky being recalled several times, and the musicians rising to acknowledge the appreciation of their fine work. Following the intermission, the Third Symphony of Scriabin, "The Divine Poem," was played. This work, more than anything on the program, brought out the virtuosity of the orchestra and the meticulous control of the talented, interesting leader. It was beautiful playing, "The Divine Poem," despite its philosophical program, being music so richly melodious, so intense and so varied that it is quite possible to revel in its beauties, regardless of its obtruse idealism. The audience was stirred by the mastery of the conductor and the brilliancy and nobility of tone of the orchestra.

Hartford Courant 2/18/26

THE HARTF

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN SPLENDID FORM

Hundred Musicians Play Superlatively Well in Capitol Concert.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY CONSUMMATE ARTIST

Performs Upon Greatest of Instruments With Magnificent Skill.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, played at the Capitol Theater yesterday afternoon, the concert being under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The occasion marked the only appearance of the Boston orchestra here this season and a capacity audience heard the playing, which was of the quality expected of the orchestra, highest and best. The program offered included the not over-familiar "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Borlioz, the extremely familiar "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" and "Metistersinger" overture, and the practically unknown Scriabin Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem." The audience was most enthusiastic and recalled Mr. Koussevitzky to the stage again and again, the members of the orchestra rising to share the applause with him after the Wagner number and at the close of the concert.

In Splendid Form.

The first few measures only of the Belioz work were necessary to prove the quality of yesterday's playing. The orchestra was in splendid form and its conductor seemingly at his best. It is a joy to watch him at work as well as to listen to what the orchestra has to say under his direction. He plays upon his five-score instruments as if they were one; he gets his effects of tremendous power and brilliance with ease and brings the merest whispers of tone seeping through the fingers of his lightly raised hand. They call him virtuoso, and some feel that the word is not wholly complimentary in its meaning when applied to an orchestrial conductor, but he is a performer of magnificent skill upon the greatest of instruments. the combined artistry of many men to make the orchestra certainly the title is well earned and a title indicating extraordinary merit well earned should never be considered other than complimentary.

Highly Individual.

He is highly individual in his conducting but he is not a gallery player. He knows what he wants of his men as an artist knows the colors he uses; his players in their combined skill paint the picture in sound that he desires to produce. The world could well use many virtuosi of the quality of this calm and self-possessed Russian.

Berlioz revelled in orchestral tone and the reading of his overture yesterday afternoon was a tonal delight. It was an exposition of the powers of the orchestra, the massive strength of the whole, the smoothness of the brasses, the splendid sweep of the strings, the delights of the woodwinds. And the Debussy number was given in all its supertonal graces. It is lovely, evanescent poetry in sound that Debussy wove in his fantastic work; and the playing was superb.

Of course the delights of the "Meistersinger" measures were appreciated, for even a moderately good orchestra can make this work pleasing and an orchestra of superlative merit like the Boston Symphony adds to the joys of Wagner's tremendous ingenuity as it is shown in the overture. The reading was sweeping and free yet perfect in every slightest detail; the humor of the music was there, too: nothing was lost yet every effect was gained with no perceptible effort. The overture made one long to hear the whole work done on the same splendid scale.

Scriabins Third Symphony.

In "The Divine Poem" the composer has created a work that needs more than a single hearing to establish its values no matter how great an interpretation is given. The idea of life that the composer would show in his music might be differently understood as the music became more familiar to the hearer. Most of those in yesterday's audience were listening to the Scriabin Symphony for the first time and many of them doubtless found their best enjoyment of the music in letting it take their thoughts where it would without much references to the program notes or to the titles allotted its three movements. And in that Mr. Koussevitzky elected to play the symphony without intermission this mental attitude towards the work was easy to hold.

There is splendid sweep of tone throughout, there is gorgeously complicated writing, there is fine melody and a great deal of it and every melodic measure was given its just due in the reading and the playing. The place one would give the Scriabin Third Symphony in symphonic literature is hardly to be considered after one hearing of the work. But a more brilliant, a more tonaliy satisfying reading of the work than that of yesterday afternoon could not [illegible] be asked.

Hartford Feb 8th 26

KOUSSEVITSKY SWAYS AUDIENCE

Conductor of Boston Symphony Thrills 3,000 Music Lovers in Concert Here.

ROMANTIC IMAGERY SUBTLY DISPLAYED

Orchestra Now Is a Perfected Organization—"Afternoon of a Faun" Given Glowing Reading.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, making its annual visit in Hartford, attracted a large audience at the Capitol theater yesterday afternoon, when a concert was given by this noted organization under the direction of its magnetic director, Serge Koussevitsky. The event was under the local managment of Frank A. Sedgwick and proved to be one of the most enjoyable events of the season in this city, which has been distinguished for its many notable recitals of different forms of music. With Mr. Koussevitsky, were more than one hundred members of his finely trained orchestra, which for many years has been one of the leading units of its kind throughout the entire musical world.

Concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Hartford have always attracted much favorable attention and yester- proved no exception to the rule. Crowds attending these events gradually have increased. Formerly Parsons's theater was ample in size to accommodate all who wished to attend, but yesterday $3,000 lover of music were present and showed keen interest in a concert which proved enjoyable from start to finish. Hartford has seen many great conductors of the Boston Symphony, Muck, Fiedler, Monteux and others, but none with any more of a general appeal than that shown by Koussevitsky yesterday afternoon.

Under the direction of Koussevitsky, the orchestra has now reached what yesterday was to many one of the most interesting stages in its development. Changes have been made in the personnel of the organization, and many familiar faces were missing yesterday. But the genius of a Koussevitsky has improved and raised the musical standards of the orchestra until critics agree that it is now as near perfect as any organization of its kind can be under human supervision. Criticism of a performance such as yesterday's would be practically impossible, and for keen enjoyment of a harmonious presentation of masterpieces of orchestral writing it would be impossible to suggest any place where there might be any decided room for improvement. It was the glorified picturization of ensemble playing, and those present were not slow to realize that they were in the presence of a genius of the baton whose work was leaving a favorable impression which will be long remembered in this vicinity.

The program opened with a splendid depiction of the "Overture" to "Benvenuto Cellini" by Berlioz. This work was played with spirit, yet with a proper regard for the dramatic as well as the lyric passages which made its performance one of great interest. This overture has been heard in this city in the past years, but Mr. Koussevitsky presented it with a dignity and a comprehensiveness throughout which his really marvelous personality made most pronounced. Mr. Koussevitsky is a conductor who is always the absolute master of his players. They have been drilled to follow his every sign, and as a result he has a precision, yet a freedom which is always of a most interesting as well as of a most compelling character.

Next in order was the unusual "Afternoon of a Faun," by Debussy, a number always a favorite with devotees of the orchestra. The lyric beauties of this really remarkable work were set forth in glowing colors, and Koussevitsky obtained effects in shading and in tone colorization which were really remarkable. Throughout a considerable part of the number was heard an entrancing flute obligato, and at the conclusion the unnamed flute player in the orchestra was generously permitted by the director to share much deserved applause with him. The Debussy number was in many ways one of the most interesting of the entire afternoon.

Mr. Koussevitsky next presented the familiar "Prelude" to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," one of Wagner's masterpieces. The Boston Symphony orchestra has had conductors who were able to conduct Wagner with more virility that Koussevitsky; Dr. Muck, for example. In some ways Koussevitsky's performance of this favorite number was rather perfunctory. Technical flaws there were none, but there was something lacking, something of that indescribable character which only a Wagnerian genius could have imparted.

Much of the interest of the afternoon centered in the "Third Symphony," styled "The Divine Poem" by Scriabin, which yesterday had its first performance in this city. Here again was the great Koussevitzky at his best. Here was the noted conductor dwelling in an atmosphere entirely familiar to him. Here he was interpreting the music of a friend and associate, one with whom he had been well acquainted. Here was the unusual spectacle of the Boston Symphony orchestra departing from the academic and presenting a work filled with the inspiration of a genius. Color there was in abundance. There also were elements of picturesqueness and dramatic impulses which made the playing of this symphony something to be treasured for weeks and even months to come.

The symphony was in three movements, "Luttes," interpreted as meaning "Struggles"; "Volupte," meaning "Sensuous Pleasures," and "Jeu Divin," meaning "Divine Activity." In the last two movements some exquisite obligato solo work was done by R. Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra. In the last movement are all the emotions and joys of life set forth in dramatic style. Here was in reality the climax of the afternoon, the climax of a program which showed the orchestra and director working in perfect union for the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
WASH. D. C.

FEB 3 1926

172

BOSTON SYMPHONY AGAIN PLEASES HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, made its annual appearance here at Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon, presenting a program of varied interest in which Symphony No. 1 in C minor, by Brahms, and a Suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "Tsar Saltan," were featured.

The orchestra under Koussevitzky is a quite different organization from that heard here in recent years under Pierre Montreux. This great symphony, which, in the days of Karl Muck, was probably the foremost organization of its kind in the country, has suffered numerous vicissitudes, but is now well on the way to recovery.

Muck was removed from the conductorship and was followed out by other members. Also, in the post-war days, the musicians sought higher wages and the recalcitrants were removed.

The result was that practically a new orchestra had to be built. Koussevitzky has succeeded in large measure, and the Boston Symphony is now among the finest musical organizations.

The Suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, a colorful, exotic work which Koussevitzky interpreted with amazing intuition, was by far his most inspired reading of the afternoon and was splendidly received.

The Brahms Symphony naturally attracted much interest as the principal work presented. Its stirring finale and pleasing first movement were most delightful.—LEI SOMERS.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.

FEB 3 1926

Koussevitsky Here Tonight

Sergei Koussevitsky will direct the only performance here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric tonight. This will mark the second local appearance of the Russian conductor who succeeded Monteux as director of the Boston forces.

Sergei Koussevitsky

A suite by the conductor's fellow countryman, Rimcky-Korsakov, will be the feature of the program. The "Scheherezade" suite has four sections, "The Sea," "The Story of the Kalendar Prince," "The Young Prince and the Young Princess" and "Festival at Bagdad."

Other numbers on the program will include Galliard's Sonata in G Major, transcribed for orchestra by Maximilian; Debussy's "Afternoon" and a scherzo, by Dukas.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the programme with the orchestral fantasy of Moussorgsky, "A Night on Bald Mountain," a music of sorcery and evil spirits which are dispelled by the coming of dawn. The latter part of the programme will be taken up by Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," of which Koussevitzky has proved himself an inspired interpreter at recent concerts in Boston, New York and other cities.

A friend of Scriabin, Koussevitzky was in sympathetic understanding with the musical aims and philosophic ideals of the "mystic in tones." The conductor gave performance to his principal works in Moscow and Petrograd. He even took them to the villages along the Volga river, Scriabin accompanying him on one of his voyages. The "Divine Poem" is in three parts. The first, "Luttes" ("Struggles"), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation and doubt. The second, "Voluptes," has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy in merging into nature." The third, "Jeu divin," the final, triumphant realization of the expressed.

ROTOGRAVURE SECTION

HERALD MAR 21-'26

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who was given the degree of doctor of music by Brown University on Feb. 24. President Faunce called a special session for the purpose. Dr. Koussevitsky responded by playing upon the double bass. The conductor began his career as a virtuoso upon this instrument, but never before had played it in America. (Bachrach) concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, which have been for so many years a vital part of the city's artistic life.

---

With the razing of Infantry Hall in the spring to make room for the proposed garage, there seems to be at this time not a single auditorium, theatre or hall available to engage for next season's concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra does not make a practice of giving Sunday concerts. The Majestic and Albee Theatres are available only on Sundays. The armory is unsuitable. The Elks Auditorium and Opera House are much too small. The above-mentioned places comprise the complete list of the city's facilities to house concerts of the first magnitude with the possible exception of the new skating rink on North Main street, which cannot be judged until completed and tried out for accoustic properties.

As the years pass, Providence finds itself more and more in disgrace over the fact that it has no suitable auditorium for first-class visiting or home organizations to give its people pleasure and education.

Will the people of Providence be indifferent to the situation and allow an obelisk or monument to be placed in Exchange place or Market square and viewed occasionally as they pass by individually or will they use and demand the much needed auditorium as their war memorial?

Such a structure can be useful as well as ornamental; a work of art in which the finest principles of American ideal can be taught to our cosmopolitan audiences, and the best in universal art can be enjoyed.

Cannot the committee on the war memorial see that this would be the combined wish of the boys who never came back, could they but express themselves?

ANTOINETTE HALL-WHYTOCK.
Providence, Feb. 3.

---

in their accustomed places the familiar program books of the Boston Orchestra. Even more delightful was the realization, after a glance about the audience, of a survival of that interest and spirit which for many years—in fact, during much of the period in which musical taste in this city was being formed—made possible the annual series of concerts by what was then the country's finest musical organization—the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was a great gratification last night to recognize in the splendid orchestra conducted by the present leader, Serge Koucsevitsky, a reincarnation of the past glories of that great body. The Boston musicians have been completely restored to their former high estate, and should recapture all the prestige so unfortunately lost some seasons ago.

The development since the visit of last season, when the orchestra played under the auspices of the Forum, is amazing and demonstrates the power of Koussevitzky even more thoroughly than did the remarkably beautiful program so ably conducted by him last night. A last-moment change substituted, as an opening number, the Haendel Concerto Grosso in D minor for the Galliard Sonata in G major. Otherwise, the program book list remained unchanged, and included a very interesting symphonic picture "From the Apocalypse" by Liadow, a work thoroughly Russian in type, employing some of the familiar ecclesiastical modes, and having real dramatic, even theatrical, feeling. The Ravel Ballet, from "Daphnis et Chloe," was so superbly presented the orchestra was given the first pronounced ovation of the evening, Koussevitzky being recalled several times, and the musicians rising to acknowledge the appreciation of their fine work. Following the intermission, the Third Symphony of Scriabin, "The Divine Poem," was played. This work, more than anything on the program, brought out the virtuosity of the orchestra and the meticulous control of the talented, interesting leader. It was beautiful playing, "The Divine Poem," despite its philosophical program, being music so richly melodious, so intense and so varied that it is quite possible to revel in its beauties, regardless of its obtruse idealism. The audience was stirred by the mastery of the conductor and the brilliancy and nobility of tone of the orchestra.

Hartford Courant 2/8/26

THE HARTF

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN SPLENDID FORM

Hundred Musicians Play Superlatively Well in Capitol Concert.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY CONSUMMATE ARTIST

Performs Upon Greatest of Instruments With Magnificent Skill.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, played at the Capitol Theater yesterday afternoon, the concert being under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The occasion marked the only appearance of the Boston orchestra here this season and a capacity audience heard the playing, which was of the quality expected of the orchestra, highest and best. The program offered included the not over-familiar "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Borlioz, the extremely familiar "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" and "Metistersinger" overture, and the practically unknown Scriabin Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem." The audience was most enthusiastic and recalled Mr. Koussevitzky to the stage again and again, the members of the orchestra rising to share the applause with him after the Wagner number and at the close of the concert.

In Splendid Form.

The first few measures only of the Belioz work were necessary to prove the quality of yesterday's playing. The orchestra was in splendid form and its conductor seemingly at his best. It is a joy to watch him at work as well as to listen to what the orchestra has to say under his direction. He plays upon his five-score instruments as if they were one; he gets his effects of tremendous power and brilliance with ease and brings the merest whispers of tone seeping through the fingers of his lightly raised hand. They call him virtuoso, and some feel that the word is not wholly complimentary in its meaning when applied to an orchestrial conductor, but he is a performer of magnificent skill upon the greatest of instruments. the combined artistry of many men to make the orchestra certainly the title is well earned and a title indicating extraordinary merit well earned should never be considered other than complimentary.

Highly Individual.

He is highly individual in his conducting but he is not a gallery player. He knows what he wants of his men as an artist knows the colors he uses; his players in their combined skill paint the picture in sound that he desires to produce. The world could well use many virtuosi of the quality of this calm and self-possessed Russian.

Berlioz revelled in orchestral tone and the reading of his overture yesterday afternoon was a tonal delight. It was an exposition of the powers of the orchestra, the massive strength of the whole, the smoothness of the brasses, the splendid sweep of the strings, the delights of the woodwinds. And the Debussy number was given in all its supertonal graces. It is lovely, evanescent poetry in sound that Debussy wove in his fantastic work; and the playing was superb.

Of course the delights of the "Meistersinger" measures were appreciated, for even a moderately good orchestra can make this work pleasing and an orchestra of superlative merit like the Boston Symphony adds to the joys of Wagner's tremendous ingenuity as it is shown in the overture. The reading was sweeping and free yet perfect in every slightest detail; the humor of the music was there, too; nothing was lost yet every effect was gained with no perceptible effort. The overture made one long to hear the whole work done on the same splendid scale.

Scriabins Third Symphony.

In "The Divine Poem" the composer has created a work that needs more than a single hearing to establish its values no matter how great an interpretation is given. The idea of life that the composer would show in his music might be differently understood as the music became more familiar to the hearer. Most of those in yesterday's audience were listening to the Scriabin Symphony for the first time and many of them doubtless found their best enjoyment of the music in letting it take their thoughts where it would without much references to the program notes or to the titles allotted its three movements. And in that Mr. Koussevitzky elected to play the symphony without intermission this mental attitude towards the work was easy to hold.

There is splendid sweep of tone throughout, there is gorgeously complicated writing, there is fine melody and a great deal of it and every melodic measure was given its just due in the reading and the playing. The place one would give the Scriabin Third Symphony in symphonic literature is hardly to be considered after one hearing of the work. But a more brilliant, a more tonally satisfying reading of the work than that of yesterday afternoon could not well be asked.

Hartford Feb 8th 26

KOUSSEVITSKY SWAYS AUDIENCE

Conductor of Boston Symphony Thrills 3,000 Music Lovers in Concert Here.

ROMANTIC IMAGERY SUBTLY DISPLAYED

Orchestra Now Is a Perfected Organization—"Afternoon of a Faun" Given Glowing Reading.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, making its annual visit in Hartford, attracted a large audience at the Capitol theater yesterday afternoon, when a concert was given by this noted organization under the direction of its magnetic director, Serge Koussevitsky. The event was under the local managment of Frank A. Sedgwick and proved to be one of the most enjoyable events of the season in this city, which has been distinguished for its many notable recitals of different forms of music. With Mr. Koussevitsky, were more than one hundred members of his finely trained orchestra, which for many years has been one of the leading units of its kind throughout the entire musical world.

Concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Hartford have always attracted much favorable attention and yesterday proved no exception to the rule. Crowds attending these events gradually have increased. Formerly Parsons's theater was ample in size to accommodate all who wished to attend, but yesterday $3,000 lover of music were present and showed keen interest in a concert which proved enjoyable from start to finish. Hartford has seen many great conductors of the Boston Symphony, Muck, Fiedler, Monteux and others, but none with any more of a general appeal than that shown by Koussevitsky yesterday afternoon.

Under the direction of Koussevitsky, the orchestra has now reached what yesterday was to many one of the most interesting stages in its development. Changes have been made in the personnel of the organization, and many familiar faces were missing yesterday. But the genius of a Koussevitsky has improved and raised the musical standards of the orchestra until critics agree that it is now as near perfect as any organization of its kind can be under human supervision. Criticism of a performance such as yesterday's would be practically impossible, and for keen enjoyment of a harmonious presentation of masterpieces of orchestral writing it would be impossible to suggest any place where there might be any decided room for improvement. It was the glorified picturization of ensemble playing, and those present were not slow to realize that they were in the presence of a genius of the baton whose work was leaving a favorable impression which will be long remembered in this vicinity.

The program opened with a splendid depiction of the "Overture" to "Benvenuto Cellini" by Berlioz. This work was played with spirit, yet with a proper regard for the dramatic as well as the lyric passages which made its performance one of great interest. This overture has been heard in this city in the past years, but Mr. Koussevitsky presented it with a dignity and a comprehensiveness throughout which his really marvelous personality made most pronounced. Mr. Koussevitsky is a conductor who is always the absolute master of his players. They have been drilled to follow his every sign, and as a result he has a precision, yet a freedom which is always of a most interesting as well as of a most compelling character.

Next in order was the unusual "Afternoon of a Faun," by Debussy, a number always a favorite with devotees of the orchestra. The lyric beauties of this really remarkable work were set forth in glowing colors, and Koussevitsky obtained effects in shading and in tone colorization which were really remarkable. Throughout a considerable part of the number was heard an entrancing flute obligato, and at the conclusion the unnamed flute player in the orchestra was generously permitted by the director to share much deserved applause with him. The Debussy number was in many ways one of the most interesting of the entire afternoon.

Mr. Koussevitsky next presented the familiar "Prelude" to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," one of Wagner's masterpieces. The Boston Symphony orchestra has had conductors who were able to conduct Wagner with more virility that Koussevitsky; Dr. Muck, for example. In some ways Koussevitsky's performance of this favorite number was rather perfunctory. Technical flaws there were none, but there was something lacking, something of that indescribable character which only a Wagnerian genius could have imparted.

Much of the interest of the afternoon centered in the "Third Symphony," styled "The Divine Poem" by Scriabin, which yesterday had its first performance in this city. Here again was the great Koussevitzky at his best. Here was the noted conductor dwelling in an atmosphere entirely familiar to him. Here he was interpreting the music of a friend and associate, one with whom he had been well acquainted. Here was the unusual spectacle of the Boston Symphony orchestra departing from the academic and presenting a work filled with the inspiration of a genius. Color there was in abundance. There also were elements of picturesqueness and dramatic impulses which made the playing of this symphony something to be treasured for weeks and even months to come.

The symphony was in three movements, "Luttes," interpreted as meaning "Struggles"; "Voluptes," meaning "Sensuous Pleasures," and "Jen Divin," meaning "Divine Activity." In the last two movements some exquisite obligato solo work was done by R. Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra. In the last movement are all the emotions and joys of life set forth in dramatic style. Here was in reality the climax of the afternoon, the climax of a program which showed the orchestra and director working in perfect union for the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
WASH. D. C.

FEB 3 1926

1172

BOSTON SYMPHONY AGAIN PLEASES HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, made its annual appearance here at Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon, presenting a program of varied interest in which Symphony No. 1 in C minor, by Brahms, and a Suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "Tsar Saltan," were featured.

The orchestra under Koussevitzky is a quite different organization from that heard here in recent years under Pierre Montreux. This great symphony, which, in the days of Karl Muck, was probably the foremost organization of its kind in the country, has suffered numerous vicissitudes, but is now well on the way to recovery.

Muck was removed from the conductorship and was followed out by other members. [illegible] the postwar days, the [illegible] sought higher wages [illegible] recalcitrants were removed.

The result [illegible] practically [illegible] new orchest[illegible] to be built. Koussevitzk[illegible] [illegible] ceeded in large measure, [illegible] Boston Symphony is [illegible] among th[illegible] finest musical or[illegible].

The Suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, [illegible] colorful, exotic work which Koussevitzky interpreted with amazing intuition, was by far his most inspired reading of the afternoon and was splendidly received.

The Brahms Symphony naturally attracted [illegible] interest as the principal work presented. Its stirring finale and pleasing first movement were most delightful.—LEI SOMERS.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.

FEB 3 1926

Koussevitsky Here Tonight

Sergei Koussevitsky will direct the only performance here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric tonight. This will mark the second local appearance of the Russian conductor who succeeded Monteux as director of the Boston forces.

Sergei Koussevitsky

A suite by the conductor's fellow countryman, Rimsky-Korsakov, will be the feature of the program. The "Scheherezade" suite has four sections, "The Sea," "The Story of the Kalendar Prince," "The Young Prince and the Young Princess" and "Festival at Bagdad."

Other numbers on the program will include Galliard's Sona[illegible] Major, transcribed for [illegible] chestra by Maximilian [illegible] Debussy's "Afterno[illegible] nd a scherzo, "[illegible] y Dukas.

ROTOGRAVURE SECTION

HERALD MAR 21-'26

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who was given the degree of doctor of music by Brown University on Feb. 24. President Faunce called a special session for the purpose. Dr. Koussevitsky responded by playing upon the double bass. The conductor began his career as a virtuoso upon this instrument, but never before had played it in America. (Bachrach)

[illegible] by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, which have been for so many years a vital part of the city's artistic life.

With the razing of Infantry Hall in the spring to make room for the proposed garage, there seems to be at this time not a single auditorium, theatre or hall available to engage for next season's concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra does not make a practice of giving Sunday concerts. The Majestic and Albee Theatres are available only on Sundays. The armory is unsuitable. The Elks Auditorium and Opera House are much too small. The above-mentioned places comprise the complete list of the city's facilities to house concerts of the first magnitude with the possible exception of the new skating rink on North Main street, which cannot be judged until completed and tried out for acoustic properties.

As the years pass, Providence finds itself more and more in disgrace over the fact that it has no suitable auditorium for first-class visiting or home organizations to give its people pleasure and education.

Will the people of Providence be content to the dilation [illegible] an obelisk or monument to be placed in Exchange place or Market square and viewed occasionally as they pass by incidentally or will they use and demand the much needed auditorium as their war memorial?

Such a structure can be useful as well as ornamental; a work of art in which the finest principles of American ideals can be taught to our cosmopolitan audiences, and the best in universal art can be enjoyed.

Cannot the committee on the war memorial see that this would be the combined wish of the boys who never came back, could they but express themselves?

ANTOINETTE HALL-WHYTOCK
Providence, Feb. 3.

A[illegible] in their accustomed places the familiar program books of the Boston Orchestra. Even more delightful was the realization, after a glance about the audience, of a survival of that interest and spirit which for many years, in fact during much of the period in which musical taste in this city was being formed, made possible the annual series of concerts by what was then the country's finest musical organization—the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was a great gratification last night to recognize in the splendid orchestra conducted by the present leader, Serge Koussevitsky, a reincarnation of the past glories of that great body. The Boston musicians have been completely restored to their former high estate, and should recapture all the prestige so unfortunately lost some seasons ago.

The development since the visit of last season, when the orchestra played under the auspices of the Forum, is amazing and demonstrates the power of Koussevitzky even more thoroughly than did the remarkably beautiful program so ably conducted by him last night. A last-moment change substituted, as an opening number, the Haendel Concerto Grosso in B minor for the Galliard Sonata in G major. Otherwise, the program book list remained unchanged, and included a very interesting symphonic picture "From the Apocalypse" by Liadow, a work thoroughly Russian in type, employing some of the familiar ecclesiastical modes, and having real dramatic, even theatrical, feeling. The Ravel Ballet, from "Daphnis et Chloe," was so superbly presented the orchestra was given the first pronounced ovation of the evening, Koussevitzky being recalled several times, and the musicians rising to acknowledge the appreciation of their fine work. Following the intermission the Third Symphony of Scriabin "The Divine Poem," was played. This work, more than anything on the program, brought out the virtuosity of the orchestra and the meticulous control of the talented, interesting leader. It was beautiful playing. "The Divine Poem," despite its philosophical program, being music so richly melodious, so intense and so varied that it is quite possible to revel in its beauties, regardless of its obtruse idealism. The audience was stirred by the mastery of the conductor and the brilliancy and nobility of tone of the orchestra.

[illegible]stra

Serge Koussevitzky will open the programme with the orchestral fantasy of Moussorgsky, "A Night on Bald Mountain," a music of sorcery and evil spirits which are dispelled by the coming of dawn. The latter part of the programme will be taken up by Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," of which Koussevitzky has proved himself an inspired interpreter at recent concerts in Boston, New York and other cities.

A friend of Scriabin, Koussevitzky was in sympathetic understanding with the musical aims and philosophic ideals of [illegible] "mystic in tones." The conductor gave performance to his principal works in Moscow and Petrograd. He even took them to the villages along the Volga river, Scriabin accompanying him on one of his voyages. The "Divine Poem" is in three parts. The first, "Luttes" ("Struggles"), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation and doubt. The second, "Voluptes," has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy in merging into nature." The third, "Jeu divin," [illegible] final, triumphant realization of the [illegible] expressed.

Hartford 2-[illegible]-6

THE HARTF

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN SPLENDID FORM

Hundred Musicians Play Superlatively Well in Capitol Concert.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY CONSUMMATE ARTIST

Performs Upon Greatest of Instruments With Magnificent Skill.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, played at the Capitol Theater yesterday afternoon, the concert being under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The occasion marked the only appearance of the Boston orchestra here this season and a capacity audience heard the playing, which was of the quality expected of the orchestra, highest and best. The program offered included the not over-familiar "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz, the extremely familiar "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" and "Metistersinger" overture, and the practically unknown Scriabin Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem." The audience was most enthusiastic and recalled Mr. Koussevitzky to the stage again and again, the members of the orchestra rising to share the applause with him after the Wagner number and at the close of the concert.

In Splendid Form.

The first few measures only of the Berlioz work were necessary to prove the quality of yesterday's playing. The orchestra was in splendid form and its conductor seemingly at his best. It is a joy to watch him at work as well as to listen to what the orchestra has to say under his direction. He plays upon his five-score instruments as if they were one; he gets his effects of tremendous power and brilliance with ease and brings the merest whispers of tone seeping through the fingers of his lightly raised hand. They call him virtuoso, and some feel that the word is not wholly complimentary in its meaning when applied to an orchestrial conductor, but he is a performer of magnificent skill upon the greatest of instruments. the combined artistry of many men to make the orchestra certainly the title is well earned and a title indicating extraordinary merit well earned should never be considered other than complimentary.

Highly Individual.

He is highly individual in his conducting but he is not a gallery player. He knows what he wants of his men as an artist knows the colors he uses; his players in their combined skill paint the picture in sound that he desires to produce. The world could well use many virtuosi of the quality of this calm and self-possessed Russian.

Berlioz revelled in orchestral tone and the reading of his overture yesterday afternoon was a tonal delight. It was an exposition of the powers of the orchestra, the massive strength of the whole, the smoothness of the brasses, the splendid sweep of the strings, the delights of the woodwinds. And the Debussy number was given in all its super-tonal graces. It is lovely, evanescent poetry in sound that Debussy wove in his fantastic work; and the playing was superb.

Of course the delights of the "Meistersinger" measures were appreciated, for even a moderately good orchestra can make this work pleasing and an orchestra of superlative merit like the Boston Symphony adds to the joys of Wagner's tremendous ingenuity as it is shown in the overture. The reading was sweeping and free yet perfect in every slightest detail; the humor of the music was there, too; nothing was lost, yet every effect was gained with no perceptible effort. The overture made one long to hear the whole work done on the same splendid scale.

Scriabins Third Symphony.

In "The Divine Poem" the composer has created a work that needs more than a single hearing to establish its values no matter how great an interpretation is given. The idea of life that the composer would show in his music might be differently understood as the music became more familiar to the hearer. Most of those in yesterday's audience were listening to the Scriabin Symphony for the first time and many of them doubtless found their best enjoyment of the music in letting it take their thoughts where it would without much references to the program notes or to the titles allotted its three movements. And in that Mr. Koussevitzky elected to play the symphony without intermission this mental attitude towards the work was easy to hold.

There is splendid sweep of tone throughout, there is gorgeously complicated writing, there is fine melody and a great deal of it and every melodic measure was given its just due in the reading and the playing. The place one would give the Scriabin Third Symphony in symphonic literature is hardly to be considered after one hearing of the work. But a more brilliant, a more tonally satisfying reading of the work than that of yesterday afternoon could not [illegible] be asked.

Hartford Feb 3

KOUSSEVITSKY SWAYS AUDIENCE

Conductor of Boston Symphony Thrills 3,000 Music Lovers in Concert Here.

ROMANTIC IMAGERY SUBTLY DISPLAYED

Orchestra Now Is a Perfected Organization—"Afternoon of a Faun" Given Glowing Reading.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, making its annual visit in Hartford, attracted a large audience at the Capitol theater yesterday afternoon, when a concert was given by this noted organization under the direction of its magnetic director, Serge Koussevitsky. The event was under the local managment of Frank A. Sedgwick and proved to be one of the most enjoyable events of the season in this city, which has been distinguished for its many notable recitals of different forms of music. With Mr. Koussevitsky, were more than one hundred members of his finely trained orchestra, which for many years has been one of the leading units of its kind throughout the entire musical world.

Concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Hartford have always attracted much favorable attention and yesterday proved no exception to the rule. Crowds attending these events gradually have increased. Formerly Parsons's theater was ample in size to accommodate all who wished to attend, but yesterday $3,000 lover of [illegible] were present and showed keen interest in a concert which proved enjoyable from start to finish. Hartford has seen many great conductors of the Boston Symphony, Muck, Fiedler, Monteux and others, but none with any more of a general appeal than that shown by Koussevitsky yesterday afternoon.

Under the direction of Koussevitsky the orchestra has now reached what yesterday was to many one of the most interesting stages in its development. Changes have been made in the personnel of the organization and many familiar faces were [illegible] yesterday. But the genius of [illegible]sevitsky has improved and raised the musical standards of the orchestra until critics agree that it is now as near perfect as any organization of its kind can be under human supervision. [illegible] of a performance such as yesterday's would [illegible] practically impossible, and for keen enjoyment of a harmonious presentation of masterpieces of orchestral [illegible] it would be impossible to suggest [illegible] place where there might be [illegible] cided room for improvement. [illegible] the glorified picturization of [illegible] playing, and those present were [illegible] slow to realize that they were in the presence of a genius of the baton [illegible] work was leaving a favorable [illegible] sion which will be long remembered [illegible] this vicinity.

The program opened with a splendid depiction of the "Overture" to "Benvenuto Cellini" by Berlioz. This work was played with spirit, [illegible] with a proper regard for the dramatic as well as the lyric passages which made its performance one of great interest. This overture has been heard in this city in the past years, but Mr. Koussevitsky presented it with a dignity and a comprehensiveness throughout which his really marvelous personality made most pronounced. Mr. Koussevitsky is a conductor who is always the absolute master of his players. They have been drilled to follow his every sign, and as a result he has a precision, yet a freedom which is always of a most interesting as well as of a most compelling character.

Next in order was the unusual "Afternoon of a Faun," by Debussy, a number always a favorite with devotees of the orchestra. The lyric beauties of this really remarkable work were set forth in glowing colors, and Koussevitsky obtained effects in shading and in tone colorization which were really remarkable. Throughout a considerable part of the number was heard an entrancing flute obligato, and at the conclusion the unnamed flute player in the orchestra was generously permitted by the director to share much deserved applause with him. The Debussy number was in many ways one of the most interesting of the entire afternoon.

Mr. Koussevitsky next presented the familiar "Prelude" to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," one of Wagner's masterpieces. The Boston Symphony orchestra has had conductors who were able to conduct Wagner with more virility that Koussevitsky; Dr. Muck, for example. In some ways Koussevitsky's performance of this favorite number was rather perfunctory. Technical flaws there were none, but there was something lacking, something of that indescribable character which only a Wagnerian genius could have imparted.

Much of the interest of the afternoon centered in the "Third Symphony," styled "The Divine Poem" by Soriabin, which yesterday had its first performance in this city. Here again was the great Koussevitzky at his best. Here was the noted conductor dwelling in an atmosphere entirely familiar to him. Here he was interpreting the music of a friend and associate, one with whom he had been well acquainted. Here was the unusual spectacle of the Boston Symphony orchestra departing from the academic and presenting a work filled with the inspiration of a genius. Color there was in abundance. There also were elements of picturesqueness and dramatic impulses which made the playing of this symphony something to be treasured for weeks and even months to come.

The symphony was in three movements, "Luttes," interpreted as meaning "Struggles"; "Voluptes," meaning "Sensuous Pleasures," and "Jen Divin," meaning "Divine Activity." In the last two movements some exquisite obligato solo work was done by R. Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra. In the last movement are all the emotions and joys of life set forth in dramatic style. Here was in reality the climax of the afternoon, the climax of a program which showed the orchestra and director working in perfect union for the

26

...VITSKY
...S AUDIENCE

...Boston Symphony
...00 Music Lovers in
...re.

...MAGERY
...TLY DISPLAYED

...Is a Perfected
...—"Afternoon of
...Given Glowing

...ny orchestra, mak-
...in Hartford, at-
...ce at the Capitol
...ternoon, when a
...his noted organi-
...tion of its mag-
...oussevitsky. The
...al managment of
...d proved to be
...le events of the
...ch has been dis-
...notable recitals
...usic. With Mr.
...than one hun-
...nely trained or-
...years has been
...its of its kind
...usical world.
...Symphony or-
...always attract-
...ion and yester-
...e rule. Crowds
...radually have
...rsons's theater
...commodate all
...yesterday $3,-
...present and
...concert which
...start to finish.
...great conduct-
...phony, Muck,
...hers, but none
...ral appeal than
...itsky yesterday

...Koussevitzky,
...reached what
...ne of the most
...development.
...in the person-
...and many fa-
...g yesterday.
...oussevitsky has
...musical stand-
...critics agree
...erfect as any
...can be under
...sm of a per-
...y's would be
...for keen en-
...presentation
...tral writing
...suggest any
...be any de-
...ent. It was
...of ensemble
...t were not
...were in the
...baton whose
...rable impres-
...membered in

...h a splendid
...e" to "Ben-
...This work
...et with a
...tic as well
...made its
...erest. This
...his city in
...ussevitsky
...d a com-
...hich his
...ade most
...is a
...absolute
...ve been
...and as
...a free-
...interest-
...ompelling

...unusual
...Debussy,
...ith devo-
...he lyric
...able work
...lors, and
...in shad-
...n which
...roughout
...mber was
...ato; and

...e music of a
...th whom he
...Here was
...the Boston
...from the
...work filled
...us. Color
...here also
...oness and
...the play-
...ing to be
...n months

...ee move-
...s mean-
...meaning
...Divin,"
...the last
...obligat
...in, con-
...In the
...ons and
...c style
...of th
...program
...direc-
...for the

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN SPLENDID FORM

173

Hundred Musicians Play Superlatively Well in Capitol Concert.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY CONSUMMATE ARTIST

Performs Upon Greatest of Instruments With Magnificent Skill.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, played at the Capitol Theater yesterday afternoon, the concert being under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The occasion marked the only appearance of the Boston orchestra here this season and a capacity audience heard the playing, which was of the quality expected of the orchestra, highest and best. The program offered included the not over-familiar "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Borlioz, the extremely familiar "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" and "Metistersinger" overture, and the practically unknown Scrabin Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem." The audience was most enthusiastic and recalled Mr. Koussevitzky to the stage again and again, the members of the orchestra rising to share the applause with him after the Wagner number and at the close of the concert.

In Splendid Form.

The first few measures only of the Belloz work were necessary to prove the quality of yesterday's playing. The orchestra was in splendid form and its conductor seemingly at his best. It is a joy to watch him at work as well as to listen to what the orchestra has to say under his direction. He plays upon his five-score instruments as if they were one; he gets his effects of tremendous power and brilliance with ease and brings the merest whispers of tone seeping through the fingers of his lightly raised hand. They call him virtuoso, and some feel that the word is not wholly complimentary in its meaning when applied to an orchestrial conductor, but he is a performer of magnificent skill upon the greatest of instruments. the combined artistry of many men to make the orchestra certainly the title is well earned and a title indicating extraordinary merit well earned should never be considered other than complimentary.

Highly Individual.

He is highly individual in his conducting but he is not a gallery player. He knows what he wants of his men as an artist knows the colors he uses; his players in their combined skill paint the picture in sound that he desires to produce. The world could well use many virtuosi of the quality of this calm and self-possessed Russian.

Berlioz revelled in orchestral tone and the reading of his overture yesterday afternoon was a tonal delight. It was an exposition of the powers of the orchestra, the massive strength of the whole, the smoothness of the brasses, the splendid sweep of the strings, the delights of the woodwinds. And the Debussy number was given in all its supertonal graces. It is lovely, evanescent poetry in sound that Debussy wove in his fantastic work; and the playing was superb.

Of course the delights of the "Meistersinger" measures were appreciated, for even a moderately good orchestra can make this work pleasing and an orchestra of superlative merit like the Boston Symphony adds to the joys of Wagner's tremendous ingenuity as it is shown in the overture. The reading was sweeping and free yet perfect in every slightest detail; the humor of the music was there, too; nothing was lost yet every effect was gained with no perceptible effort. The overture made one long to hear the whole work done on the same splendid scale.

Scriabins Third Symphony.

In "The Divine Poem" the composer has created a work that needs more than a single hearing to establish its values no matter how great an interpretation is given. The idea of life that the composer would show in his music might be differently understood as the music became more familiar to the hearer. Most of those in yesterday's audience were listening to the Scriabin Symphony for the first time and many of them doubtless found their best enjoyment of the music in letting it take their thoughts where it would without much references to the program notes or to the titles allotted its three movements. And in that Mr. Koussevitzky elected to play the symphony without intermission this mental attitude towards the work was easy to hold.

There is splendid sweep of tone throughout, there is gorgeously complicated writing, there is fine melody and a great deal of it and every melodic measure was given its just due in the reading and the playing. The place one would give the Scriabin Third Symphony in symphonic literature is hardly to be considered after one hearing of the work. But a more brilliant, a more tonally satisfying reading of the work than that of yesterday afternoon could not well be asked.

MUSICIAN AND EXPLORER TO BE HONORED BY BROWN

KOUSSEVITZKY, ANDREWS TO GET DEGREES

Event to Be Held in Conjunction With Visiting Day, Feb. 24

Brown University will hold a special convocation on Wednesday, Feb. 24, at which time it will confer honorary degrees upon Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews of New York, the famous Asiatic explorer.

In making this announcement last night, President W. H. P. Faunce of Brown said that the convocation had been specially called because neither M. Kossevitzky, who leads European orchestras each summer, nor Mr. Andrews, who leaves on March 1 for exploration in Turkestan, could be in this country in June.

Visiting Day, which has heretofore taken place the first Wednesday in March, will be held in conjunction with the convocation. The advisory board of the Associated Alumni, made up of delegates from Brown Clubs in all parts of the United States, will also convene at this time. It will have its first session Tuesday evening, Feb. 23, at the University Club, and will finish its business Wednesday morning in the alumni offices, John Hay Library.

There will be a special chapel service for Visiting Day. At 12 o'clock noon, members of the visiting committees, together with the corporation and faculty and Associated Alumni delegates, will assemble at the Faculty Club to hear a review of the year given by President Faunce. Luncheon will follow and at 2 o'clock the visiting committee will confer with the officers of instruction at the of... the ... at

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony Leader and Internationally Known Musician Who Will be Honored by Brown.

ROY C. ANDREWS

Also ...rom

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN
FEB 5 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN RUSSIAN MUSIC

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

WITH New York snow-bound, it seemed appropriate for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to present a ~~typical~~ Russian programme last night at Carnegie Hall.

Proceedings began with Moussorgsky's symphonic poem, "A Night on a Bald Mountain," and again one admired the melodic strength and descriptive power of the ill-fated composer of "Boris Goudonoff." The conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, gave a colorful reading ~~and~~ made the music speak its most decisive message.

That prolific young modernist Serge Prokofieff was represented by his piano concerto No. 3 in which he played the solo instrument.

No unfamiliar phases of the Prokofieff talents unfolded themselves last evening. Prokofieff has an almost fatal facility in writing music, and stands in terror of none of its forms. From short songs and piano pieces, to chamber music, concertos, suites, ballets, grand operas, and symphonies, Prokofieff has produced them all. How did he happen to overlook oratorio?

Pleasant moments in conventional modes alternated with radical modernistic pages in the Prokofieff scores last night, but when all was over very little remained in the ear and mind of the present reviewer, who went away recalling a certain quotation about "sound and fury, signifying nothing." As a pianist Prokofieff registered successfully.

Scriabine's "The Divine Poem" is a composition of far greater intrinsic value than the complete Prokofieff output. The Scriabine technic and imagination run along large and glowing lines, not always affiliated cohesively, and sometimes too prolix, but unvaryingly characteristic and interesting. Koussevitzky and his players performed "The Divine Poem"...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 6 1926

HONORARY DEGREE FOR KOUSSEVITZKY

Brown University Honors Boston Symphony Conductor.

Brown university, at Providence, has called a special convocation for February 24 in order to confer honorary degrees upon Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and ~~Roy Chapman~~ Andrews, the explorer. President W. H. P. Faunce has

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNIO
FEB 5 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra At the Academy Tonight

The third Brooklyn concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will take place at the Academy of Music to-night. The programme includes an 18th century Sonata by Galliard, Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto, with the composer as soloist. The concert is given under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

1926

Symphony Society at the Mecca

Beethoven's "Pastoral" and the "Pulcinella" Suite Are on Klemperer Program.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Listening to a concert of the Symphony Society from a seat in the Mecca Auditorium under the balcony, where two thirds of the down stairs hearers mus... comets through an opera glas... respect to Garrett Serviss, is... was brought home with forc... afternoon's concert, and parti... the "Pastoral" symphony of Be...

The winds, even the trumpets, sounded as if they might be discharging their duties in the next building. The thunder storm would perhaps have excited a bumble bee to wrath, but would not have driven him to shelter. The brook slept in the sweet shadows and the peasants made merry with bated breath. Nevertheless this was because of hearing con sordino, as it were, and some experience in appraising musical doings in unfavorable conditions enables one to assert with a measure of confidence that the symphony was well played and that the spirit of Beethoven was respected.

Seemingly because there was a small number of instruments and, those all in the foreground, the "Pulcinella" suite, which Stravinsky made out of ideas by Pergolisi, had a better sonority. One of the Stravinsky devotees who was present at the first performance of the suite in Paris declared that the disciples were astonished that they were not more astonished. They found much of the Pergolesi flavor preserved in the modern version.

This is true of parts of the work, but not of the ribald pages in which the jazz trombone and the modernist double bass disport themselves. It is, however, indisputable that, as the same writer declares, after much contention between the two composers Stravinsky is triumphant in the end. And it is a jolly suite too. Mr. Klemperer knew every bar of it and conducted it without a score and with great gusto. The 'Meistersinger" vorspiel was the other orchestral number.

The soloist was Roland Hayes, the distinguished negro tenor. His first number was Mozart's air "Si mostra la sorte" and after the suite he sang three spirituals with orchestra. The weather evidently disagreed with Mr. Hayes and his voice was not in its best estate. His admirable art, however, gave the usual pleasure to his hearers, who compelled him to repeat the second spiritual. The extraordinarily large audience was probably due to his popularity.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert of ~~Saturday~~ afternoon was attended by an audience which apparently approved of the entire entertainment. The program began with a sonata of Galliard freely transcribed for small orchestra by Maximillian Steinberg. Such contrivances invariably confront the mind with the question why there are not enough original compositions to make incessant transcription unnecessary. But in this case a pleasing result was obtained and of course that suffices unto itself. The sonata revealed itself as a composition of grace and charm.

There was also at the end of the list the continuous "Scheherzade" of Rimsky-Korsakov, which received an admirable performance. In the middle stood the third piano concerto of Serge Prokofieff, who manipulated the keyboard in person. The concerto was first disclosed to New York on January 26, 1922, when it left a considerable confusion of mind. Just why it is difficult to say now.

The work seemed clear enough Saturday and for the most part firm and logical in form. Furthermore in the slow movement one could find a certain type of expression, reflective, outreaching and sometimes poignant in melodic and harmonic character. This movement is a theme and set of variations and the composer's affection for inexorable rhythms sometimes yields to a mellowing plasticity. The Russianism of the musician is often disclosed in the themes as well as in the treatment.

We should be inclined to have more hope for the permanence of the work if Mr. Prokofieff had not made his first movement sound so much like a Muscovite study in velocity and his last to expand so large a proportion of its pages in a publication of that aggressive energy on which he prides himself and for which his compatriots have so highly praised him.

Wise men, however, speak with caution of Prokofieff. When a newspaper man, in 1919, asked him who were the leading composers in Russia he answered, "Stravinsky, myself and Miaskowsky." Since Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakov and a few others were already dead this was doubtless true, but it was a statement subject to the application of the doctrine of relativity. But Prokofieff must not be separated from his time and in it he is a conspicuous figure. He is also a good pianist and ... competent ...

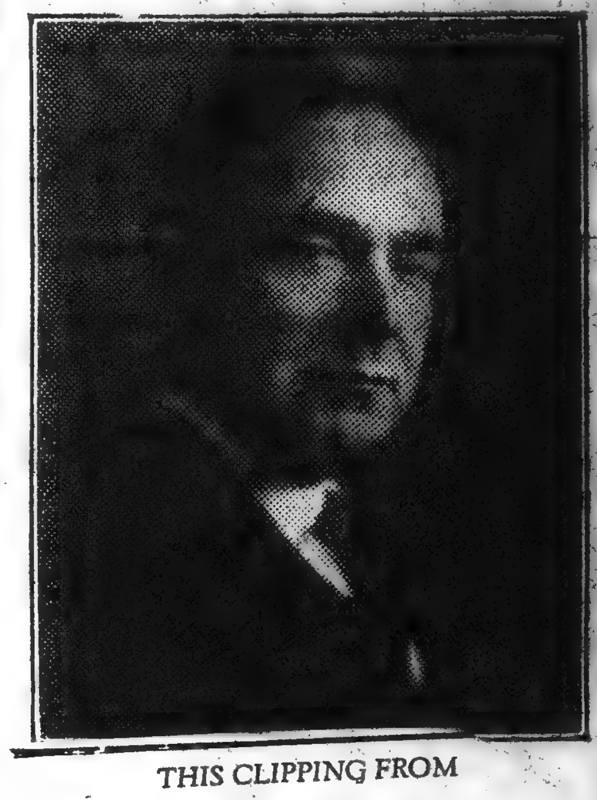
THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 4 1926

...ORD DAILY...

BOSTON SYMPHONY

At Capitol Theater Sunday Afternoon, February 7.

All roads for music lovers on Sunday will lead to the Capitol theater. The reason for this is simple. The famous Boston symphony orchestra under that distinguished Russian Serge Koussevitsky will be heard in its only concert of the season. The orchestra is now at the very zenith of its perfection. The addi...



and nuance from the most... pianissimo to a fortissimo that... ficent without becoming und... whelming. Moreover, there is... ent beauty of tone, clarity tha... and brilliance that stimulates...

The Russian conductor sign... players his every interpretativ... by repressed, but significant, ... hand, of arm, of the entire f... carries his forces with him b... mighty musical impetus and... All persons who will be ... enough to obtain admission to... the theater Sunday afterno... vital performance that ... mastery of every det... pretation and th... of the orchestra...

It will be a ... seats and box... McCoy's, Inc. ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 5 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The "Toronto Mail" of November 4, last, said of Serge Koussevitsky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, "Serge Koussevitsky thrilling conductor. Concert of the Boston orchestra was an unforgetable event. Every regular concert goer has, stored away in his memory, a number of experiences that he accounts as unforgetable—the first time he heard Paderewski play Chopin's "Polonaise," the first time he heard Gerhardt sing some haunting German leider. To these events he will doubtless add the hearing of the fourth movement of Brahm's "First Symphony," as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Massey Hall last night. It was one of those occasions when all the senses seem completely satisfied, in the presence of absolute beauty, of subtle drama, of intense emotion exalted to the nth degree. No reviewer can possibly return to the office in cold blood to dissect such an experience. One impression of the concert remains indel... in the mind—it is that th... at... of... o... p...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
FEB 5 1926

MR. KOUSSEWITSKY, the well-tailored conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, divided his program last evening between three Russians — Moussorgsky, Scriabin and Prokofieff. But Mr. Koussewitsky exercised little discretion and even less taste in choosing the works with which to represent these composers. Of the Prokofieff Concerto for Piano, the composer appearing as soloist, it will not be necessary for me to speak until tomorrow, for both Mr. Koussewitsky and Mr. Prokofieff are going to storm Brooklyn at the Academy of Music tonight.

And of the Moussorgsky and the Scriabin? "A Night on Bald Mountain" is only fair Moussorgsky, and even Mr. Koussewitsky, for all his pulling at the brass and sawing on the strings, cannot make it seem wholly worthy of the composer of "Boris." The Scriabin of the evening was he of the "Divine Poem"—the turgid, ineffective, mystic whose cosmic urgings have all the nobility and pathos of a poodle's colic. Yet Mr. Koussewitsky seems to have an uncontrollable affection for this effeminate tonal groaning. Something should be done about it.

26

VITSKY
S AUDIENCE

Boston Symphony
00 Music Lovers in
re.

MAGERY
TLY DISPLAYED

Is a Perfected
—"Afternoon of
Given Glowing

ny orchestra, mak-
in Hartford, at-nce at the Capitol
ternoon, when a
this noted organi-
tion of its mag-
oussevitsky. The
al managment of
d proved to be
ble events of the
ch has been dis-
notable recitals
usic. With Mr.
e than one hun-
nely trained or-
years has been
its of its kind
usical world.
n Symphony or-
always attract-
tion and yester-
e rule. Crowds
gradually have Parsons's theater
commodate all yesterday $3,- present and
concert which
start to finish.
great conduct-
Symphony, Muck,
others, but none
eneral appeal than
evitsky yesterday

f Koussevitsky,
reached what
one of the most
its development.
in the person-
n, and many fa-
ssing yesterday.
Koussevitsky has
e musical stand-
ntil critics agree perfect as any
can be under ism of a per-
ay's would be
for keen en-presentation
stral writing
suggest any
be any de-
ent. It was
of ensemble
t were not
were in the baton whose rable impres-
emembered in

h a splendid
e" to "Ben-
This work
et with a tic as well
made its erest. This his city in ussevitsky
d a com-
hich his ade most is a absolute ve been
and as a free-interest-ompelling

unusual Debussy,
ith devo-
he lyric able work
lors, and
in shad-
n which roughout
mber was ato; and
e music of a
th whom he
Here was the Boston
from the ork filled
us. Color
here also eness and the playing to be n months

ee moves mean-
meaning Divin,"
the last obligat
in, con-
In the ns and c style
of th rogram direc-
for the

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN SPLENDID FORM

173

Hundred Musicians Play Superlatively Well in Capitol Concert.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY CONSUMMATE ARTIST

Performs Upon Greatest of Instruments With Magnificent Skill.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, played at the Capitol Theater yesterday afternoon, the concert being under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The occasion marked the only appearance of the Boston orchestra here this season and a capacity audience heard the playing, which was of the quality expected of the orchestra, highest and best. The program offered included the not overfamiliar "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Borlioz, the extremely familiar "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" and "Meitstersinger" overture, and the practically unknown Scriabin Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem." The audience was most enthusiastic and recalled Mr. Koussevitzky to the stage again and again, the members of the orchestra rising to share the applause with him after the Wagner number and at the close of the concert.

In Splendid Form.

The first few measures only of the Belioz work were necessary to prove the quality of yesterday's playing. The orchestra was in splendid form and its conductor seemingly at his best. It is a joy to watch him at work as well as to listen to what the orchestra has to say under his direction. He plays upon his five-score instruments as if they were one; he gets his effects of tremendous power and brilliance with ease and brings the merest whispers of tone seeping through the fingers of his lightly raised hand. They call him virtuoso, and some feel that the word is not wholly complimentary in its meaning when applied to an orchestrial conductor, but he is a performer of magnificent skill upon the greatest of instruments. the combined artistry of many men to make the orchestra certainly the title is well earned and a title indicating extraordinary merit well earned should never be considered other than complimentary.

Highly Individual.

He is highly individual in his conducting but he is not a gallery player. He knows what he wants of his men as an artist knows the colors he uses; his players in their combined skill paint the picture in sound that he desires to produce. The world could well use many virtuosi of the quality of this calm and self-possessed Russian.

Berlioz revelled in orchestral tone and the reading of his overture yesterday afternoon was a tonal delight. It was an exposition of the powers of the orchestra, the massive strength of the whole, the smoothness of the brasses, the splendid sweep of the strings, the delights of the woodwinds. And the Debussy number was given in all its supertonal graces. It is lovely, evanescent poetry in sound that Debussy wove in his fantastic work; and the playing was superb.

Of course the delights of the "Meistersinger" measures were appreciated, for even a moderately good orchestra can make this work pleasing and an orchestra of superlative merit like the Boston Symphony adds to the joys of Wagner's tremendous ingenuity as it is shown in the overture. The reading was sweeping and free yet perfect in every slightest detail; the humor of the music was there, too; nothing was lost yet every effect was gained with no perceptible effort. The overture made one long to hear the whole work done on the same splendid scale.

Scriabins Third Symphony.

In "The Divine Poem" the composer has created a work that needs more than a single hearing to establish its values no matter how great an interpretation is given. The idea of life that the composer would show in his music might be differently understood as the music became more familiar to the hearer. Most of those in yesterday's audience were listening to the Scriabin Symphony for the first time and many of them doubtless found their best enjoyment of the music in letting it take their thoughts where it would without much references to the program notes or to the titles allotted its three movements. And in that Mr. Koussevitzky elected to play the symphony without intermission this mental attitude towards the work was easy to hold.

There is splendid sweep of tone throughout, there is gorgeously complicated writing, there is fine melody and a great deal of it and every melodic measure was given its just due in the reading and the playing. The place one would give the Scriabin Third Symphony in symphonic literature is hardly to be considered after one hearing of the work. But a more brilliant, a more tonally satisfying reading of the work than that of yesterday afternoon could not well be asked.

MUSICIAN AND EXPLORER TO BE HONORED BY BROWN

KOUSSEVITZKY, ANDREWS TO GET DEGREES

Event to Be Held in Conjunction With Visiting Day, Feb. 24

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony Leader and Internationally Known Musician Who Will be Honored by Brown.

ROY C. ANDREWS

Brown University will hold a special convocation on Wednesday, Feb. 24, at which time it will confer honorary degrees upon Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews of New York, the famous Asiatic explorer.

In making this announcement last night, President W. H. P. Faunce of Brown said that the convocation had been specially called because neither M. Kossevitzky, who leads European orchestras each summer, nor Mr. Andrews, who leaves on March 1 for exploration in Turkestan, could be in this country in June.

Visiting Day, which has heretofore taken place the first Wednesday in March, will be held in conjunction with the convocation. The advisory board of the Associated Alumni, made up of delegates from Brown Clubs in all parts of the United States, will also convene at this time. It will have its first session Tuesday evening, Feb. 23, at the University Club, and will finish its business Wednesday morning in the alumni offices, John Hay Library.

There will be a special chapel service for Visiting Day. At 12 o'clock noon, members of the visiting committees, together with the corporation and faculty and Associated Alumni delegates, will assemble at the Faculty Club to hear a review of the year given by President Faunce. Luncheon will follow and at 2 o'clock the visiting committee will confer with the officers of instruction at the of-

the

at

Also

rom

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN
FEB 5 1926

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 6 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN RUSSIAN MUSIC

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

WITH New York snow-bound, it seemed appropriate for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to present a ~~typical~~ Russian programme last night at Carnegie Hall.

Proceedings began with Moussorgsky's symphonic poem, "A Night on a Bald Mountain," and again one admired the melodic strength and descriptive power of the ill-fated composer of "Boris Goudonoff." The conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, gave a colorful reading ~~and~~ made the music speak its most decisive message.

That prolific young modernist Serge Prokofieff was represented by his piano concerto No. 3 in which he played the solo instrument.

No unfamiliar phases of the Prokofieff talents unfolded themselves last evening. Prokofieff has an almost fatal facility in writing music, and stands in terror of none of its forms. From short songs and piano pieces, to chamber music, concertos, suites, ballets, grand operas, and symphonies, Prokofieff has produced them all. How did he happen to overlook oratorio?

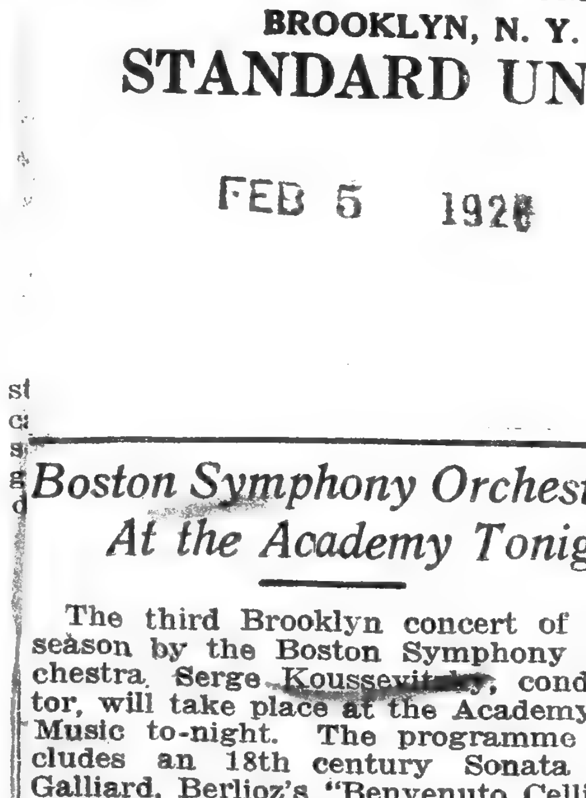
Pleasant moments in conventional modes alternated with radical modernistic pages in the Prokofieff scores last night, but when all was over very little remained in the ear and mind of the present reviewer, who went away recalling a certain quotation about "sound and fury, signifying nothing." As a pianist Prokofieff registered successfully.

Scriabine's "The Divine Poem" is a composition of far greater intrinsic value than the complete Prokofieff output. The Scriabine technic and imagination run along large and glowing lines, not always affiliated cohesively, and sometimes too prolix, but unvaryingly characteristic and interesting. Koussevitzky and his players performed "The Divine Poem" in highly brilliant fashion.

HONORARY DEGREE FOR KOUSSEVITZKY

Brown University Honors Boston Symphony Conductor.

Brown university, at Providence, has called a special convocation for February 24 in order to confer honorary degrees upon Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and ~~Roy Chapman~~ Andrews, the explorer. President W. H. P. Faunce has



THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNIO
FEB 5 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra At the Academy Tonight

The third Brooklyn concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will take place at the Academy of Music to-night. The programme includes an 18th century Sonata by Galliard, Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto, with the composer as soloist. The concert is given under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

1926

Symphony Society at the Mecca

Beethoven's "Pastoral" and the "Pulcinella" Suite Are on Klemperer Program.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Listening to a concert of the Symphony Society from a seat in the Mecca Auditorium under the balcony, where two thirds of the down stairs hearers mus
comets through an opera glas respect to Garrett Serviss, is was brought home with forc afternoon's concert, and parti
the "Pastoral" symphony of Be

The winds, even the trumpets, sounded as if they might be discharging their duties in the next building. The thunder storm would perhaps have excited a bumble bee to wrath, but would not have driven him to shelter. The brook slept in the sweet shadows and the peasants made merry with bated breath. Nevertheless this was because of hearing con sordino, as it were, and some experience in appraising musical doings in unfavorable conditions enables one to assert with a measure of confidence that the symphony was well played and that the spirit of Beethoven was respected.

Seemingly because there was a small number of instruments and, those all in the foreground, the "Pulcinella" suite, which Stravinsky made out of ideas by Pergolisi, had a better sonority. One of the Stravinsky devotees who was present at the first performance of the suite in Paris declared that the disciples were astonished that they were not more astonished. They found much of the Pergolesi flavor preserved in the modern version.

This is true of parts of the work, but not of the ribald pages in which the jazz trombone and the modernist double bass disport themselves. It is, however, indisputable that, as the same writer declares, after much contention between the two composers Stravinsky is triumphant in the end. And it is a jolly suite too. Mr. Klemperer knew every bar of it and conducted it without a score and with great gusto. The "Meistersinger" vorspiel was the other orchestral number.

The soloist was Roland Hayes, the distinguished negro tenor. His first number was Mozart's air "Si mostra la sorte" and after the suite he sang three spirituals with orchestra. The weather evidently disagreed with Mr. Hayes and his voice was not in its best estate. His admirable art, however, gave the usual pleasure to his hearers, who compelled him to repeat the second spiritual. The extraordinarily large audience was probably due to his popularity.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert of ~~Saturday~~ afternoon was attended by an audience which apparently approved of the entire entertainment. The program began with a sonata of Galliard freely transcribed for small orchestra by Maximillian Steinberg. Such contrivances invariably confront the mind with the question why there are not enough original compositions to make incessant transcription unnecessary. But in this case a pleasing result was obtained and of course that suffices unto itself. The sonata revealed itself as a composition of grace and charm.

There was also at the end of the list the continuous "Scheherzade" of Rimsky-Korsakov, which received an admirable performance. In the middle stood the third piano concerto of Serge Prokofieff, who manipulated the keyboard in person. The concerto was first disclosed to New York on January 26, 1922, when it left a considerable confusion of mind. Just why it is difficult to say now.

The work seemed clear enough Saturday and for the most part firm and logical in form. Furthermore in the slow movement one could find a certain type of expression, reflective, outreaching and sometimes poignant in melodic and harmonic character. This movement is a theme and set of variations and the composer's affection for inexorable rhythms sometimes yields to a mellowing plasticity. The Russianism of the musician is often disclosed in the themes as well as in the treatment.

We should be inclined to have more hope for the permanence of the work if Mr. Prokofieff had not made his first movement sound so much like a Muscovite study in velocity and his last to expand so large a proportion of its pages in a publication of that aggressive energy on which he prides himself and for which his compatriots have so highly praised him.

Wise men, however, speak with caution of Prokofieff. When a newspaper man, in 1919, asked him who were the leading composers in Russia he answered, "Stravinsky, myself and Miaskowsky." Since Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakov and a few others were already dead this was doubtless true, but it was a statement subject to the application of the doctrine of relativity. But Prokofieff must not be separated from his time and in it he is a conspicuous figure. He is also a good pianist and a competent com-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 4 1926

FORD DAILY TIM

BOSTON SYMPHONY

At Capitol Theater Sunday Afternoon, February 7.

All roads for music lovers on Sunday will lead to the Capitol theater. The reason for this is simple. The famous Boston symphony orchestra under that distinguished Russian Serge Koussevitsky will be heard in its only concert of the season. The orchestra is now at the very zenith of its perfection. The addi-

and nuance from the most atten pianissimo to a fortissimo that is magnificent without becoming unduly overwhelming. Moreover, there is ever present beauty of tone, clarity that satisfies, and brilliance that stimulates.

The Russian conductor signals to his players his every interpretative impulse by repressed, but significant, gesture of hand, of arm, of the entire frame, and carries his forces with him by his own mighty musical impetus and passi
All persons who will be for enough to obtain admission to tol theater Sunday afterno
vital performance that mastery of every det
pretation and th
of the orchestra

It will be a seats and box
McCoy's, Inc.,

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 5 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The "Toronto Mail" of November 4, last, said of Serge Koussevitsky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, "Serge Koussevitsky thrilling conductor. Concert of the Boston orchestra was an unforgetable event. Every regular concert goer has, stored away in his memory, a number of experiences that he accounts as unforgetable—the first time he heard Paderewski play Chopin's "Polonaise," the first time he heard Gerhardt sing some haunting German leider. To these events he will doubtless add the hearing of the fourth movement of Brahm's "First Symphony," as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Massey Hall last night. It was one of those occasions when all the senses seem completely satisfied, in the presence of absolute beauty, of subtle drama, of intense emotion exalted to the nth degree. No reviewer can possibly return to the office in cold blood to dissect such an experience. One impression of the concert remains indel in the mind—it is that

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
FEB 5 1926

MR. KOUSSEWITSKY, the well-tailored conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, divided his program last evening between three Russians — Moussorgsky, Scriabin and Prokofieff. But Mr. Koussewitsky exercised little discretion and even less taste in choosing the works with which to represent these composers. Of the Prokofieff Concerto for Piano, the composer appearing as soloist, it will not be necessary for me to speak until tomorrow, for both Mr. Koussewitsky and Mr. Prokofieff are going to storm Brooklyn at the Academy of Music tonight.

And of the Moussorgsky and the Scriabin? "A Night on Bald Mountain" is only fair Moussorgsky, and even Mr. Koussewitsky, for all his pulling at the brass and sawing on the strings, cannot make it seem wholly worthy of the composer of "Boris." The Scriabin of the evening was he of the "Divine Poem"—the turgid, ineffective, mystic whose cosmic urgings have all the nobility and pathos of a poodle's colic. Yet Mr. Koussewitsky seems to have an uncontrollable affection for this effeminate tonal groaning. Something should be done about it.

26

ITSKY
S AUDIENCE

Boston Symphony
0 Music Lovers in re.

MAGERY
TLY DISPLAYED

Is a Perfected
—"Afternoon of
Given Glowing

ony orchestra, mak-
in Hartford, at-
nce at the Capitol
ternoon, when a
this noted organi-
ction of its mag-
oussevitsky. The
al managment of
nd proved to be
ble events of the
ch has been dis-
notable recitals
usic. With Mr.
e than one hun-
nely trained or-
y years has been
its of its kind
usical world.
n Symphony or-
always attract-
tion and yester-
he rule. Crowds
gradually have arsons's theater
ccommodate all
t yesterday $3,- re present and
concert which
start to finish.
great conduct-
phony, Muck,
thers, but none
ral appeal than
itsky yesterday

of Koussevitsky,
reached what
one of the most
s development.
in the person-
and many fa-
ng yesterday.
oussevitsky has musical stand-ll critics agree
perfect as any
can be under
ism of a per-
ay's would be l for keen ens presentation
stral writing
o suggest any t be any dement. It was
of ensemble
t were not
were in the e baton whose
rable impres-
emembered in

th a splendid
e" to "Ben-
This work
yet with a atic as well
h made its terest. This
his city in oussevitsky nd a com-
hich his ade most y is a absolute ave been
, and as t a free-
interest-ompelling

unusual Debussy,
with devo-
The lyric
able work olors, and
in shad-on which hroughout
mber was gato; and med flute
e music of a ith whom he
Here was the Boston
g from the
work filled
ius. Color
There also
eness and e the playhing to be en months

ree move-as mean-
meaning n Divin,"
the last obligat
gin, con-
In the ions and ic style of the program
nd direcn for the

OSTON SYMPHONY IN SPLENDID FORM

173 undred Musicians Play Superlatively Well in Capitol Concert.

ERGE KOUSSEVITSKY CONSUMMATE ARTIST

Performs Upon Greatest of Instruments With Magnificent Skill.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, played at the Capitol Theater yesterday afternoon, the concert being under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The occasion marked the only appearance of the Boston orchestra here this season and a capacity audience heard the playing, which was of the quality expected of the orchestra, highest and best. The program offered included the not over-familiar "Benvenuto Cellini", overture of Borlioz, the extremely familiar "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" and "Meistersinger" overture, and the practically unknown Scriabin Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem." The audience was most enthusiastic and recalled Mr. Kousevitzky to the stage again and again, the members of the orchestra rising to share the applause with him after the Wagner number and at the close of the concert.

In Splendid Form.

The first few measures only of the Belioz work were necessary to prove the quality of yesterday's playing. The orchestra was in splendid form and its conductor seemingly at his best. It is a joy to watch him at work as well as to listen to what the orchestra has to say under his direction. He plays upon his five-score instruments as if they were one; he gets his effects of tremendous power and brilliance with ease and brings the merest whispers of tone seeping through the fingers of his lightly raised hand. They call him virtuoso, and some feel that the word is not wholly complimentary in its meaning when applied to an orchestrial conductor, but he is a performer of magnificent skill upon the greatest of instruments. the combined artistry of many men to make the orchestra certainly the title is well earned and a title indicating extraordinary merit well earned should never be considered other than complimentary.

Highly Individual.

He is highly individual in his conducting but he is not a gallery player. He knows what he wants of his men as an artist knows the colors he uses; his players in their combined skill paint the picture in sound that he desires to produce. The world could well use many virtuosi of the quality of this calm and self-possessed Russian.

Berlioz revelled in orchestral tone and the reading of his overture yesterday afternoon was a tonal delight. It was an exposition of the powers of the orchestra, the massive strength of the whole, the smoothness of the brasses, the splendid sweep of the strings, the delights of the woodwinds. And the Debussy number was given in all its supertonal graces. It is lovely, evanescent poetry in sound that Debussy wove in his fantastic work; and the playing was superb.

Of course the delights of the "Meistersinger" measures were appreciated, for even a moderately good orchestra can make this work pleasing and an orchestra of superlative merit like the Boston Symphony adds to the joys of Wagner's tremendous ingenuity as it is shown in the overture. The reading was sweeping and free yet perfect in every slightest detail; the humor of the music was there, too; nothing was lost yet every effect was gained with no perceptible effort. The overture made one long to hear the whole work done on the same splendid scale.

Scriabins Third Symphony.

In "The Divine Poem" the composer has created a work that needs more than a single hearing to establish its values no matter how great an interpretation is given. The idea of life that the composer would show in his music might be differently understood as the music became more familiar to the hearer. Most of those in yesterday's audience were listening to the Scriabin Symphony for the first time and many of them doubtless found their best enjoyment of the music in letting it take their thoughts where it would without much references to the program notes or to the titles allotted its three movements. And in that Mr. Koussevitzky elected to play the symphony without intermission this mental attitude towards the work was easy to hold.

There is splendid sweep of tone throughout, there is gorgeously complicated writing, there is fine melody and a great deal of it and every melodic measure was given its just due in the reading and the playing. The place one would give the Scriabin Third Symphony in symphonic literature is hardly to be considered after one hearing of the work. But a more brilliant, a more tonally satisfying reading of the work than that of yesterday afternoon could not well be asked.

MUSICIAN AND EXPLORER TO BE HONORED BY BROWN

KOUSSEVITZKY, ANDREWS TO GET DEGREES

Event to Be Held in Conjunction With Visiting Day, Feb. 24

Brown University will hold a special convocation on Wednesday, Feb. 24, at which time it will confer honorary degrees upon Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews of New York, the famous Asiatic explorer.

In making this announcement last night, President W. H. P. Faunce of Brown said that the convocation had been specially called because neither M. Kossevitzky, who leads European orchestras each summer, nor Mr. Andrews, who leaves on March 1 for exploration in Turkestan, could be in this country in June.

Visiting Day, which has heretofore taken place the first Wednesday in March, will be held in conjunction with the convocation. The advisory board of the Associated Alumni, made up of delegates from Brown Clubs in all parts of the United States, will also convene at this time. It will have its first session Tuesday evening, Feb. 23, at the University Club, and will finish its business Wednesday morning in the alumni offices, John Hay Library.

There will be a special chapel service for Visiting Day. At 12 o'clock noon, members of the visiting committees, together with the corporation and faculty and Associated Alumni delegates, will assemble at the Faculty Club to hear a review of the year given by President Faunce. Luncheon will follow and at 2 o'clock the visiting committee will confer with the officers of instruction at the offices of the various departments of the university.

The academic procession will form at 4 o'clock for the march to Sayles Hall, where the honorary degrees will be conferred upon M. Koussevitzky and Mr. Andrews.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony Leader and Internationally Known Musician Who Will be Honored by Brown.

ROY C. ANDREWS

Famous Asiatic Explorer Who Also Will Receive Honorary Degree from University Here.

University Honors Boston Symphony Conductor.

university, at Providence, has special convocation for February 24 in order to confer honorary degrees upon Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and ~~Roy Chapman~~ Andrews, the explorer. President W. H. P. Faunce has stated that this convocation has been called earlier than usual since Mr. Koussevitzky will have left for European engagements next June, and since Mr. Andrews will then be in the Orient.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

---

ceedings began with Moussorgsky's symphonic poem, "A Night on a Bald Mountain," and again one admired the melodic strength and descriptive power of the ill-fated composer of "Boris Goudonoff." The conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, gave a colorful reading and made the music speak its most decisive message.

That prolific young modernist Serge Prokofieff was represented by his piano concerto No. 3 in which he played the solo instrument.

No unfamiliar phases of the Prokofieff talents unfolded themselves last evening. Prokofieff has an almost fatal facility in writing music, and stands in terror of none of its forms. From short songs and piano pieces, to chamber music, concertos, suites, ballets, grand operas, and symphonies, Prokofieff has produced them all. How did he happen to overlook oratorio?

Pleasant moments in conventional modes alternated with radical modernistic pages in the Prokofieff scores last night, but when all was over very little remained in the ear and mind of the present reviewer, who went away recalling a certain quotation about "sound and fury, signifying nothing." As a pianist Prokofieff registered successfully.

Scriabine's "The Divine Poem" is a composition of far greater intrinsic value than the complete Prokofieff output. The Scriabine technic and imagination run along large and glowing lines, not always affiliated cohesively, and sometimes too prolix, but unvaryingly characteristic and interesting. Koussevitzky and his players performed "The Divine

---

S ety at the Mecca

Beethoven astoral" and the "Pulcinella" Suite Are on Klemperer Program.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Listening to a concert of the Symphony Society from a seat in the Mecca Auditorium under the balcony, where two-thirds of the down stairs hearers must sit, is somewhat like observing comets through an opera glass, a proceeding which, with due respect to Garrett Serviss, is not wholly satisfactory. This was brought home with force to one listener to yesterday afternoon's concert, and particularly in the performance of the "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven.

The winds, even the trumpets, sounded as if they might be discharging their duties in the next building. The thunder storm would perhaps have excited a bumble bee to wrath, but would not have driven him to shelter. The brook slept in the sweet shadows and the peasants made merry with bated breath. Nevertheless this was because of hearing con sordino, as it were, and some experience in appraising musical doings in unfavorable conditions enables one to assert with a measure of confidence that the symphony was well played and that the spirit of Beethoven was respected.

Seemingly because there was a small number of instruments and, those all in the foreground, the "Pulcinella" suite, which Stravinsky made out of ideas by Pergolisi, had a better sonority. One of the Stravinsky devotees who was present at the first performance of the suite in Paris declared that the disciples were astonished that they were not more astonished. They found much of the Pergolesi flavor preserved in the modern version.

This is true of parts of the work, but not of the ribald pages in which the jazz trombone and the modernist double bass disport themselves. It is, however, indisputable that, as the same writer declares, after much contention between the two composers Stravinsky is triumphant in the end. And it is a jolly suite too. Mr. Klemperer knew every bar of it and conducted it without a score and with great gusto. The "Meistersinger" vorspiel was the other orchestral number.

The soloist was Roland Hayes, the distinguished negro tenor. His first number was Mozart's air "Si mostra la sorte" and after the suite he sang three spirituals with orchestra. The weather evidently disagreed with Mr. Hayes and his voice was not in its best estate. His admirable art, however, gave the usual pleasure to his hearers, who compelled him to repeat the second spiritual. The extraordinarily large audience was probably due to his popularity.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert of ~~Saturday~~ afternoon was attended by an audience which apparently approved of the entire entertainment. The program began with sonata of Galliard freely transcribe for small orchestra by Maximillia Steinberg. Such contrivances invariably confront the mind with the question why there are not enough original compositions to make incessant transcription unnecessary. But in this case a pleasing result was obtained and of course that suffices unto itself. The sonata revealed itself as a composition of grace and charm.

There was also at the end of the list the continuous "Scheherzade" of Rimsky-Korsakov, which received an admirable performance. In the middle stood the third piano concerto of Serge Prokofieff, who manipulated the keyboard in person. The concerto was first disclosed to New York on January 26, 1922, when it left a considerable confusion of mind. Just why it is difficult to say now.

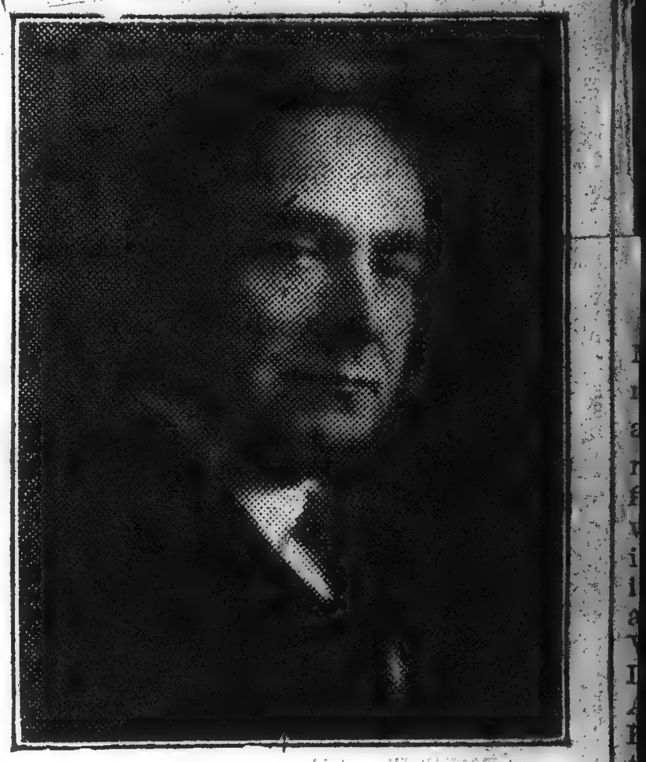
The work seemed clear enough Saturday and for the most part firm and logical in form. Furthermore in the slow movement one could find a certain type of expression, reflective, outreaching and sometimes poignant in melodic and harmonic character. This movement is a theme and set of variations and the composer's affection for inexorable rhythms sometimes yields to a mellowing plasticity. The Russianism of the musician is often disclosed in the themes as well as in the treatment.

We should be inclined to have more hope for the permanence of the work if Mr. Prokofieff had not made his first movement sound so much like a Muscovite study in velocity and his last to expand so large a proportion of its pages in a publication of that aggressive energy on which he prides himself and for which his compatriots have so highly praised him.

Wise men, however, speak with caution of Prokofieff. When a newspaper man, in 1919, asked him who were the leading composers in Russia he answered, "Stravinsky, myself and Miaskovsky." Since Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakov and a few others were dead this was doubtless true, as a statement subject to the of the doctrine of relat Prokofieff must not be from his time and in it he picuous figure. He is also a

---

he addi-



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

tion of a number of admirable solo artists has strengthened the always capable players in the ranks, and under Mr. Koussevitsky magnetic and musicianly direction the orchestra has attained a unity at which one must marvel, and a command of every inflection

---

ORD DAIL

and nuance from the pianissimo to a fortiss cent without becom helming. Moreover, nt beauty of tone, cla nd brilliance that The Russian conduc ayers his every inte repressed, but sign nd, of arm, of the ries his forces wit ghty musical impe All persons who w enough to obtain admi tol theater Sunday af vital performance tha mastery of every det pretation and th of the orchestra

It will be a seats and box McCoy's, Inc.,

Symp Hall last night. It of those occasions when all the senses seem completely satisfied, in the presence of absolute beauty, of subtle drama, of intense emotion exalted to the nth degree. No reviewer can possibly return to the office in cold blood to dissect such an experience. One impression of the concert remains indelibly fixed in the mind—it is that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has at its head in Mr. Koussevitsky one of the greatest personalities among orchestral leaders now before the public."

The seats and boxes are now on sale at McCoy's, Inc., No. 89 Asylum street. The concert will begin at 3 o'clock. The orchestra comes to Hartford under the direction of Frank A. Sedgwick.

---

pulling at the brass and sawing on the strings, cannot make it seem wholly worthy of the composer of "Boris." The Scriabin of the evening was he of the "Divine Poem"—the turgid, ineffective, mystic whose cosmic urgings have all the nobility and pathos of a poodle's colic. Yet Mr. Koussewitsky seems to have an uncontrollable affection for this effeminate tonal groaning. Something should be done about it.

l
26

VITSKY
S AUDIENCE

Boston Symphony
0 Music Lovers in re.

MAGERY
TLY DISPLAYED

Is a Perfected
—"Afternoon of
Given Glowing

pony orchestra, mak-
in Hartford, at-
nce at the Capitol
fternoon, when a
this noted organi-
ction of its mag-oussevitzky. The
al managment of
nd proved to be
ble events of the
ich has been dis-
notable recitals
music. With Mr.
re than one huninely trained or-
y years has been
its of its kind
musical world.
n Symphony ore always attract-
tion and yester-
he rule. Crowds
gradually have arsons's theater
ccommodate all
t yesterday $3,- re present and
s concert which
start to finish.
great conduct-
ymphony, Muck,
thers, but none
eneral appeal than vitzky yesterday

of Koussevitzky,
reached what
one of the most
ts development.
in the person-
n, and many fa-
sing yesterday.
Koussevitzky has
e musical stand-
til critics agree
perfect as any
can be under
ism of a per-
ay's would be
for keen en-
s presentation
stral writing
suggest any t be any dement. It was
of ensemble
t were not
were in the e baton whose
rable impres-
emembered in

th a splendid re" to "Ben-
This work
yet with a atic as well
h made its terest. This this city in oussevitzky
nd a com-hich his ade most y is a absolute ave been
, and as t a free-
interest-compelling

unusual Debussy,
with devo-
The lyric able work
olors, and
in shad-
on which hroughout
mber was gato, and
lar to him.
e music of a ith whom he
Here was the Boston
g from the work filled
ius. Color
There also
eness and
e the play-
hing to be en months

ree move-
as mean-meaning n Divin,"
the last obligat
gin, con-
In the
ions and tic style
of the program
nd direc-
for the

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN SPLENDID FORM

173

Hundred Musicians Play Superlatively Well in Capitol Concert.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY CONSUMMATE ARTIST

Performs Upon Greatest of Instruments With Magnificent Skill.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, played at the Capitol Theater yesterday afternoon, the concert being under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The occasion marked the only appearance of the Boston orchestra here this season and a capacity audience heard the playing, which was of the quality expected of the orchestra, highest and best. The program offered included the not overfamiliar "Benvenuto Cellini", overture of Borljoz, the extremely familiar "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" and "Metistersinger" overture, and the practically unknown Scriabin Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem." The audience was most enthusiastic and recalled Mr. Koussevitzky to the stage again and again, the members of the orchestra rising to share the applause with him after the Wagner number and at the close of the concert.

In Splendid Form.

The first few measures only of the Belioz work were necessary to prove the quality of yesterday's playing. The orchestra was in splendid form and its conductor seemingly at his best. It is a joy to watch him at work as well as to listen to what the orchestra has to say under his direction. He plays upon his five-score instruments as if they were one; he gets his effects of tremendous power and brilliance with ease and brings the merest whispers of tone seeping through the fingers of his lightly raised hand. They call him virtuoso, and some feel that the word is not wholly complimentary in its meaning when applied to an orchestrial conductor, but he is a performer of magnificent skill upon the greatest of instruments. the combined artistry of many men to make the orchestra certainly the title is well earned and a title indicating extraordinary merit well earned should never be considered other than complimentary.

Highly Individual.

He is highly individual in his conducting but he is not a gallery player. He knows what he wants of his men as an artist knows the colors he uses; his players in their combined skill paint the picture in sound that he desires to produce. The world could well use many virtuosi of the quality of this calm and self-possessed Russian.

Berlioz revelled in orchestral tone and the reading of his overture yesterday afternoon was a tonal delight. It was an exposition of the powers of the orchestra, the massive strength of the whole, the smoothness of the brasses, the splendid sweep of the strings, the delights of the woodwinds. And the Debussy number was given in all its supertonal graces. It is lovely, evanescent poetry in sound that Debussy wove in his fantastic work; and the playing was superb.

Of course the delights of the "Meistersinger" measures were appreciated, for even a moderately good orchestra can make this work pleasing and an orchestra of superlative merit like the Boston Symphony adds to the joys of Wagner's tremendous ingenuity as it is shown in the overture. The reading was sweeping and free yet perfect in every slightest detail; the humor of the music was there, too; nothing was lost yet every effect was gained with no perceptible effort. The overture made one long to hear the whole work done on the same splendid scale.

Scriabins Third Symphony.

In "The Divine Poem" the composer has created a work that needs more than a single hearing to establish its values no matter how great an interpretation is given. The idea of life that the composer would show in his music might be differently understood as the music became more familiar to the hearer. Most of those in yesterday's audience were listening to the Scriabin Symphony for the first time and many of them doubtless found their best enjoyment of the music in letting it take their thoughts where it would without much references to the program notes or to the titles allotted its three movements. And in that Mr. Koussevitzky elected to play the symphony without intermission this mental attitude towards the work was easy to hold.

There is splendid sweep of tone throughout, there is gorgeously complicated writing, there is fine melody and a great deal of it and every melodic measure was given its just due in the reading and the playing. The place one would give the Scriabin Third Symphony in symphonic literature is hardly to be considered after one hearing of the work. But a more brilliant, a more tonally satisfying reading of the work than that of yesterday afternoon could not well be asked.

MUSICIAN AND EXPLORER TO BE HONORED BY BROWN

KOUSSEVITZKY, ANDREWS TO GET DEGREES

Event to Be Held in Conjunction With Visiting Day, Feb. 24

Brown University will hold a special convocation on Wednesday, Feb. 24, at which time it will confer honorary degrees upon Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews of New York, the famous Asiatic explorer.

In making this announcement last night, President W. H. P. Faunce of Brown said that the convocation had been specially called because neither M. Kossevitzky, who leads European orchestras each summer, nor Mr. Andrews, who leaves on March 1 for exploration in Turkestan, could be in this country in June.

Visiting Day, which has heretofore taken place the first Wednesday in March, will be held in conjunction with the convocation. The advisory board of the Associated Alumni, made up of delegates from Brown Clubs in all parts of the United States, will also convene at this time. It will have its first session Tuesday evening, Feb. 23, at the University Club, and will finish its business Wednesday morning in the alumni offices, John Hay Library.

There will be a special chapel service for Visiting Day. At 12 o'clock noon, members of the visiting committees, together with the corporation and faculty and Associated Alumni delegates, will assemble at the Faculty Club to hear a review of the year given by President Faunce. Luncheon will follow and at 2 o'clock the visiting committee will confer with the officers of instruction at the offices of the various departments of the university.

The academic procession will form at 4 o'clock for the march to Sayles Hall, where the honorary degrees will be conferred upon M. Koussevitzky and Mr. Andrews.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony Leader and Internationally Known Musician Who Will be Honored by Brown.

ROY C. ANDREWS

Famous Asiatic Explorer Who Also Will Receive Honorary Degree from Unversity Here.

---

ceedings began with Moussorgsky's symphonic poem, "A Night on a Bald Mountain," and again one admired the melodic strength and descriptive power of the ill-fated composer of "Boris Goudonoff." The conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, gave a colorful reading and made the music speak its most decisive message.

That prolific young modernist Serge Prokofieff was represented by his piano concerto No. 3 in which he played the solo instrument.

No unfamiliar phases of the Prokofieff talents unfolded themselves last evening. Prokofieff has an almost fatal facility in writing music, and stands in terror of none of its forms. From short songs and piano pieces, to chamber music, concertos, suites, ballets, grand operas, and symphonies, Prokofieff has produced them all. How did he happen to overlook oratorio?

Pleasant moments in conventional modes alternated with radical modernistic pages in the Prokofieff scores last night, but when all was over very little remained in the ear and mind of the present reviewer, who went away recalling a certain quotation about "sound and fury, signifying nothing." As a pianist Prokofieff registered successfully.

Scriabine's "The Divine Poem" is a composition of far greater intrinsic value than the complete Prokofieff output. The Scriabine technic and imagination run along large and glowing lines, not always affiliated cohesively, and sometimes too prolix, but unvaryingly characteristic and interesting. Koussevitzky and his players performed "The Divine

---

University Boston Symphony Conductor.

university, at Providence, has special convocation for February 24 in order to confer honorary degrees upon Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer. President W. H. P. Faunce has stated that this convocation has been called earlier than usual since Mr. Koussevitzky will have left for European engagements next June, and since Mr. Andrews will then be in the Orient.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

FEB 5 1926

Sy ety at the Mecca

Beethoven's "Pastoral" and the "Pulcinella" Suite Are on Klemperer Program.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Listening to a concert of the Symphony Society from a seat in the Mecca Auditorium under the balcony, where two-thirds of the down stairs hearers must sit, is somewhat like observing comets through an opera glass, a proceeding which, with due respect to Garrett Serviss, is not wholly satisfactory. This was brought home with force to one listener to yesterday afternoon's concert, and particularly in the performance of the "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven.

The winds, even the trumpets, sounded as if they might be discharging their duties in the next building. The thunder storm would perhaps have excited a bumble bee to wrath, but would not have driven him to shelter. The brook slept in the sweet shadows and the peasants made merry with bated breath. Nevertheless this was because of hearing con sordino, as it were, and some experience in appraising musical doings in unfavorable conditions enables one to assert with a measure of confidence that the symphony was well played and that the spirit of Beethoven was respected.

Seemingly because there was a small number of instruments and, those all in the foreground, the "Pulcinella" suite, which Stravinsky made out of ideas by Pergolisi, had a better sonority. One of the Stravinsky devotees who was present at the first performance of the suite in Paris declared that the disciples were astonished that they were not more astonished. They found much of the Pergolesi flavor preserved in the modern version.

This is true of parts of the work, but not of the ribald pages in which the jazz trombone and the modernist double bass disport themselves. It is, however, indisputable that, as the same writer declares, after much contention between the two composers Stravinsky is triumphant in the end. And it is a jolly suite too. Mr. Klemperer knew every bar of it and conducted it without a score and with great gusto. The "Meistersinger" vorspiel was the other orchestral number.

The soloist was Roland Hayes, the distinguished negro tenor. His first number was Mozart's air "Si mostra la sorte" and after the suite he sang three spirituals with orchestra. The weather evidently disagreed with Mr. Hayes and his voice was not in its best estate. His admirable art, however, gave the usual pleasure to his hearers, who compelled him to repeat the second spiritual. The extraordinarily large audience was probably due to his popularity.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert of Saturday afternoon was attended by an audience which apparently approved of the entire entertainment. The program began with sonata of Galliard freely transcribe for small orchestra by Maximillia Steinberg. Such contrivances invariably confront the mind with the question why there are not enough original compositions to make incessant transcription unnecessary. But in this case a pleasing result was obtained and of course that suffices unto itself. The sonata revealed itself as a composition of grace and charm.

There was also at the end of the list the continuous "Scheherzade" of Rimsky-Korsakov, which received an admirable performance. In the middle stood the third piano concerto of Serge Prokofieff, who manipulated the keyboard in person. The concerto was first disclosed to New York on January 26, 1922, when it left a considerable confusion of mind. Just why it is difficult to say now.

The work seemed clear enough Saturday and for the most part firm and logical in form. Furthermore in the slow movement one could find a certain type of expression, reflective, outreaching and sometimes poignant in melodic and harmonic character. This movement is a theme and set of variations and the composer's affection for inexorable rhythms sometimes yields to a mellowing plasticity. The Russianism of the musician is often disclosed in the themes as well as in the treatment.

We should be inclined to have more hope for the permanence of the work if Mr. Prokofieff had not made his first movement sound so much like a Muscovite study in velocity and his last to expand so large a proportion of its pages in a publication of that aggressive energy on which he prides himself and for which his compatriots have so highly praised him.

Wise men, however, speak with caution of Prokofieff. When a newspaper man, in 1919, asked him who were the leading composers in Russia he answered, "Stravinsky, myself and Mias- ky." Since Moussorgsky, Rim- Korsakov and a few others were dead this was doubtless true, as a statement subject to the on of the doctrine of relat Prokofieff must not be rom his time and in it he spicuous figure. He is also a

---

The addi-

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

tion of a number of admirable solo artists has strengthened the always capable players in the ranks, and under Mr. Koussevitzky magnetic and musicianly direction the orchestra has attained a unity at which one must marvel, and a command of every inflection

t
e ng
he
he rst
ton

Symp y Hall last night. It of those occasions when all the senses seem completely satisfied, in the presence of absolute beauty, of subtle drama, of intense emotion exalted to the nth degree. No reviewer can possibly return to the office in cold blood to dissect such an experience. One impression of the concert remains indelibly fixed in the mind—it is that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has at its head in Mr. Koussevitzky one of the greatest personalities among orchestral leaders now before the public."

The seats and boxes are now on sale at McCoy's, Inc., No. 89 Asylum street. The concert will begin at 3 o'clock. The orchestra comes to Hartford under the direction of Frank A. Sedgwick.

---

g
y or Ir.
ooktol the foun-
, and ll his pulling at the brass and sawing on the strings, cannot make it seem wholly worthy of the composer of "Boris." The Scriabin of the evening was he of the "Divine Poem"—the turgid, ineffective, mystic whose cosmic urgings have all the nobility and pathos of a poodle's colic. Yet Mr. Koussewitsky seems to have an uncontrollable affection for this effeminate tonal groaning. Somethin should be done about it.

ORD DAILY T

and nuance from the most a pianissimo to a fortissimo that ficent without becoming und whelming. Moreover, there is nt beauty of tone, clarity that nd brilliance that stimulates.
The Russian conductor signs ayers his every interpretative repressed, but significant, g nd, of arm, of the entire fr rries his forces with him by ghty musical impetus and
All persons who will be enough to obtain admission to t l theater Sunday afterno
vital performance that mastery of every det
pretation and th
of the orchestra
It will be a r
seats and boxe
McCoy's, Inc., N

ten s magnily over-ver pres-
satisfies,
s to his impulse sture of me, and his own passi

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

To Direct Boston Symphony at Capitol Theater Sunday.

The Toronto Mail of November 4, 1925, said of Serge Koussevitsky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Capitol theater Sunday afternoon: "Serge Koussevitsky Thrilling Conductor. Concert of the Boston orchestra was an unforgetable event. Every regular concertgoer has, stored away in his memory, a number of experiences that he accounts as unforgetable—the first time he heard Paderewski play Chopin's Polonaise, the first time he heard Gerhardt sing some haunting German leider. To these events he will doubtless add the hearing of the fourth movement of Brahm's First Symphony, as played by the Boston orchestra in Massey hall last night. It was one of those occasions when all the senses seem completely satisfied, in the presence of absolute beauty, of subtle drama, of intense emotion exalted to the nth degree. No reviewer can possibly return to the office in cold blood to dissect such an experience. One impression of the concert remains

NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 5 19

MUSIC

BY OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Concert.

A Russian program calculated to display very well the capacities of the orchestra, and to exalt the conductor, if not invariably the audience, was given by Mr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. This program consisted of Moussorgsky's familiar and somewhat banal "Nuit sur la Mont Chauve," Serge Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto, with the composer as soloist, and Scriabine's Third Symphony, otherwise known as the "Divine Poem."

Of these three compositions the most interesting, possibly on account of its novelty and its esprit, was Mr. Prokofieff's concerto. Conveniently enough for a reviewer forming his impressions of an unfamiliar score, this concerto will be repeated at the Boston Symphony concert of tomorrow afternoon, and that will be the right and proper occasion for a discussion of its value as music. It is enough to say at this time that it is a very brilliantly written work, full of rhythmical energy and interest, scintillant, youthful, audacious in its manner. Perhaps this audacity is skin deep. Future hearings will tell. At any rate, Mr. Prokofieff enjoyed a triumph with the virtuoso piece which he had provided himself. He played a very difficult and effective piano part most brilliantly, and for the moment at least was monarch of what he surveyed. There is a dangerous fluency in this concerto, as there is in a good deal that Prokofieff has written, but his fluency is seldom mere glibness; it seems to proceed from an excess of energy, whether or not the ideas are always sufficiently pruned and revised for expressive purposes. There were many recalls for Mr. Prokofieff.

Moussorgsky's "Nuit sur le Mont Chauve" owes much of its effect to the instrumentation of Rimsky-Korsakoff, for there is little body or worth in the ideas. It was given a highly effective performance. This also might be said of the "Divine Poem," interpreted to the excellent advantage of the score. The composer, in fact, could hardly have wished a more comprehending and sympathetic representation. Unfortunately, the "Divine Poem" is not of divine but of insufferable length. It is a kind of Wagnerian eau de cologne, much attenuated. It is swooning this moment and waxing furious the next. There is not enough contrast either of dynamics or instrumentation, and at last the ears become fatigued with the noise, the pother, the hot, sweltering orchestration.

All this gave Mr. Koussevitsky, as a conductor, an unusual opportunity, and of this opportunity he made much.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

COURANT

HARTFORD, CONN.

FEB 6 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

A great orchestra and a great leader will be the attraction at the Capitol Theater tomorrow afternoon. The organization is the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra and the leader is that distinguished Russian Serge Koussevitsky. It is safe to predict that all those who are fortunate enough to obtain admission to the Capitol Theater tomorrow afternoon will hear a program of classic music that will linger in the memory for many a long day.

Mr. Koussevitsky's program will open with Berliez's overture to "Benvenute Cellini," which will be followed by Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," which in turn is followed by Wagner's Prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg." The program will close with Scriabin's Third Symphony "The Devine Poem," an opus new to Hartford.

The seats and boxes will be on sale at McCoy's, Inc., 89 Asylum street today. The box office sale tomorrow at the theater will open at noon. Reservations by telephone may be made by calling 2-0375 after 9 a. m. The concert will begin promptly at 3 o'clock. The orchestra comes to Hartford under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick.

174

REALM OF MUSIC

By Paul Morris

RUSSIAN scenic artists are noted for their cleverness in splashing jarring colors together in a way that excites but does not irritate the sense of sight. Serge Prokofieff, the Russian pianist who played his own third piano concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, has translated this particular flair of the decorative clan into tones. His concerto is full of clashing harmonies, rhythms, and tone colorings, but it is not half as shocking as it ought to be, considering its unconventionality. In fact, it contains some novel combinations of tone and color that please as well as startle. The concerto contains a Theme and Variations, one of the most objectionable of ancient musical forms, but so cleverly does Mr. Prokofieff conceal his variations that they seem even less strained than the theme itself. An Andante meditativo is a strikingly novel variant, and the final Allegro gusto is full of vitality, but its connection with the original theme is fortunately remote.

Mr. Prokofieff is one of those modmentalities and replaced them with cleverness and novelty. There are few composer-pianists as clever as Prokofieff.

Last night's program was devoted entirely to Russian music. Under the guidance of Serge Koussevitsky, the orchestra gave a rousing performance of Scriabin's "Divine Poem," and there was a colorful, beautifully balanced presentation of Moussorgsky's "Night On a Bald Mountain."

A VANISHING AUDIENCE

The best receipt yet discovered for driving music lovers out of concert halls in New York is a symphony by Anton Bruckner, and Otto Klemperer fulfilled expectations when he presented one of the longest of these works to yesterday afternoon's Symphony Society audience in Carnegie Hall. The symphony in question was Bruckner's eighth. Most of the audience heard the first movement. But at its close the expected exodus started. After that there was an almost continual shuffling of feet down the aisles.

The performance was brilliant, better, in fact, than most performances of Bruckner's music in this city. The resounding passages for brasses were blown out triumphantly. The softer melodies were phrased and refined most skilfully. The tone of the strings was appealing and smooth. But Bruckner is not for New York, as other conductors

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK TELEGRAM

FEB 5 1926

A Profitless Concert.

The program building of Serge Koussevitzky continues as inscrutable as the ways of Providence. Last evening's visit of the Boston Symphony to the snowgirt fastnesses of Carnegie Hall supplied an additional case in point. That all the music proffered emanated from the Land of the Bear was of much less consequence than that the best of it was no better than second rate, while a good part of it was far below even that dispiriting station. The list assembled by Boston's eye comforting conductor comprised Moussorgsky's "Night on the Bald Mountain," Serge Prokofieff's third piano concerto (with the composer as soloist) and Scriabine's "Divine Poem." The last, for all its lusty racket, creaks dismally in the joints and carries its three and twenty years like the mortal burden of a century. Even the "Poem of Ecstasy" seems flushed with health in comparison. Not all the superb playing the Bostonians expended on it could restore its frayed and threadbare fabric.

Moussorgsky's hell broth has likewise cooled and caked until its flavor is as of month-old porridge. The best passages in it were all done much better in "Boris." Anyhow, why not leave the thing to stadium concerts and ambitious movie houses? Something might perhaps have been said in defence of its presence last night had Mr. Koussevitzky's performance been unwontedly vivid or acute. But it was eminently God-fearing. As for utilizing this piece to open a program—well, no doubt Isolde's Love Death or Bruennhilde's Immolation would be somewhat less to the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK WORLD

FEB 5 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

The Boston Symphony appears at Carnegie Hall with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor and Serge Prokofieff as soloist. The following program was presented:

Night on the Bald Mountain....Moussorgsky

March and scherzo, from "The Love of the Three Oranges"..........Prokofieff

Piano concerto No. 3, Op. 26......Prokofieff

"The Divine Poem," symphony No. 3, Scriabin

At the same hall in the evening Mr. Koussevitzky led the Boston Orchestra in a strictly Russian program of Moussorgsky, Prokofieff and Scriabin. The Moussorgsky number, "A Night on Bald Mountain," Mr. Koussevitzky first revealed to local audiences at a concert last winter and last night's repetition of it didn't enhance its importance. It is based on a short doublebass figure which the composer also used in Varlaam's song in the tavern scene in "Boris." But that is about all there is of a resemblance between the Bald Mountain and the immortal opera.

The piece abounds in several cheap tunes, one of which is reiterated in the strings to exasperation. It might be cut in half without in the least impairing any essential part. It would be nice to discover that Moussorgsky really wrote it as a joke.

Mr. Prokofieff in his third piano concerto followed hard on the Bald Mountain. This seems to be a great season for the composer of "The Loves of Three Oranges." His violin concerto was performed recently by Mr. Kochanski and the Symphony Society. It may be that his piano concerto heard last night was the same violin concerto transcribed for the piano. There is no way of telling.

There was a semblance of a Russian tune at the very beginning, but that was abandoned hurriedly and there ensued at least fifteen minutes of meaningless cacophony. There was also a theme with variations which every once in a while struck out a decent spark. But the same thing always happened—each moment of sanity was at once engulfed in an ocean of noises.

Watching the intentness of the audience last night made me wonder what its attitude would have been if the Mr. Koussevitzky, through some whim, had elected to play, say "All Alone," by Irving Berlin, instead of the Prokofieff concerto. What a commotion there would have been! Yet they would have heard better music.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who plays the Russians better than he plays the Germans, played his program with authority and power, and the audience seemed well pleased with everything.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK SUN

FEB 5 1926

Boston Symphony Offers Russian Program

Mr. Koussevitzky's all Russian seance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening plunged the audience into an extensive array of Slavic moods. The modern idiom was represented by the talented young Russian composer-pianist, Serge Prokofieff, who played his third concerto, for piano and orchestra. The concerto was also played by the Symphony Society on January 26, 1922. Full comment on last night's offering will be reserved for its Saturday performance. It is an interesting, colorful composition, leaning skillfully in the modern manner on rhythmic cross currents and contrasts, and its performance was received with genuine applause.

The rest of the program ranged from a more or less wild, satanic night on Moussorgsky's "Bald Mountain" to that delectable tidbit, Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem." A generation ago this would probably have been a most exciting evening, but fashions in wild parties and religious exultations have changed considerably in fifty years. Emotionally, at least, the evening's course was comparatively calm and uneventful.

The orchestra played brilliantly and provided excellent support for Mr. Prokofieff's difficult swirls of rushing rhythms. As for Scriabin's ecstasies, despite Mr. Koussevitzky's strenuous efforts and loving care, they tended to become soporific. The audience's ecstasy was restricted to polite attention and genuine applause for a brilliantly built finale.

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays an All-Russian Program

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; soloist, Serge Prokofieff, pianist. At Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. "A Night on Bald Mountain" Moussorgsky
2. Piano Concerto, No. 3, Op. 26...Prokofieff Mr. Prokofieff
3. Symphony No. 3, "The Divine Poem," Op. 15.........................Scriabin

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra blew into town on the wings of the northeast storm and gave us last night a little lesson in the history of Russian music.

They went back to the sixties, to Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain," and worked forward through Scriabin's "Divine Poem," of the early twentieth century, to Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto of 1918-1921; and it was amusing to observe that not one of these Russians could escape the huge shadow of Franz Liszt. You found him in the diabolism of Moussorgsky's Witches' Sabbath (a diabolism grown amiable and trite), in the inflated sentimentalism of the "Divine Poem" (how delightfully Lisztian is Scriabin's direction for his second theme: "Mystérieux, romantique, légendaire"!). Finally, you detected the glorious old showman in the platform tricks of Prokofieff's concerto. Scratch a Russian (save only Moussorgsky at his greatest) and you find a Lisztian wart.

* * *

None of this music represented its composers at their best. Moussorgsky's timid little excursion in romantic supernaturalism is one of his feeblest

Night on Bald Mountain," and the "Divine Poem" are very old stories hereabouts, and Mr. Prokofieff's concerts had been heard here at least once before. The composer played it at a New York Symphony concert, under Albert Coates, on January 26, 1922. Mr. Prokoffieff had completed it a few months before.

The concerto is in three movements, and one of them, the second, is a theme with variations—five only, a modest allowance, for which the haters of variations composed by any one will be properly grateful.

* * *

When Mr. Prokofieff played this concerto here four years ago it gave pain in certain quarters because the object of its harmonic structure seemed to be, it was said, "to avoid every succession of tones in which the ingenuous, unsophisticated musical ear might recognize obvious beauty." We cannot honestly lay claim to the possession of an "ingenuous" ear; nor do we think it important that an ear of that sort should be pleased. But certainly Mr. Prokofieff's music could not possibly, in our time, fail to please the least sophisticated of ears. Thus do the tonal problems of one day become the kindergarten frolics of the next.

Nothing could be more candid, more sunnily eupeptic, than Mr. Prokofieff's Muse as she chats with him in this concerto. What amiable and friendly patter this music is, with its high spirits, its vivacity, its pretty tricks and its untroubled externality, and its touch of Lisztian bombast at the end, which you forgive because of the obvious harmlessness of the whole thing!

* * *

Mr. Prokofieff played it with delight-

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

BULLETIN

FEB 6 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT INCLUDES SCRIABIN WORKS

Director Koussevitsky Brings Russian Programme on Feb. 16.

Serge Koussevitsky will bring a Russian programme to Providence when he conducts the fourth Boston Symphony concert of the season in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 16. The soloist will be Serge Prokofieff, regarded as the most significant of the younger Russian composers, Prokofieff, pianist, will appear in his own Third Pianoforte Concerto, which he has played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently in Boston and New York.

Koussevitzky will include, as the longest number on the programme, Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem." A friend of Scriabin, Koussevitzky was the first to bring forth his principal works in Russia. By virtue of his performance of this score in Boston, New York and Philadelphia in the last fortnight, Koussevitzky has been called the foremost living prophet of this Russian master.

The "Divine Poem" is in three parts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TRIBUNE

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

FEB 7 1926

RUSSIAN MUSIC BY KOUSSEVITZKY

A Russian program with a Russian composer as soloist will mark the fourth Boston Symphony concert in Providence to be given in Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, Feb. 16th. Serge Prokofieff, who is generally considered the most important of the younger generation of Russian composers, and who is likewise one of the finest piano virtuosos of the day, will appear as soloist in his own Third Pianoforte Concento. Prokofieff has played this concerto with the orchestra, with conspicuous success, in Boston, New York and Brooklyn.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the program with the orchestral fantasy of Moussorgsky, "A Night On Bald Mountain," a music of sorcery and evil spirits which are dispelled by the coming of dawn. The latter part of the program will be taken up by Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," of which Koussevitzky has proved himself an inspired interpreter at recent concerts in Boston, New York and other cities. A friend of Scriabin, Koussevitzky was in sympathetic understanding with the musical aims and philosophic ideals of this "mystic in tones." The conductor first gave performance to his principal works in Moscow and Petrograd. He even took them to the villages along the Volga River, Scriabin accompanying him on one of his famous voyages. The "Divine Poem" is in three parts. The first, "Luttes," ("Struggles"), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation and doubt. The second, "Voluptes" has been called "The spirit's ecstatic joy in merging into nature." The third, "Jeu divin," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

EAGLE

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

FEB 6 1926

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By EDWARD CUSHING

CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. Program: Galliard, Sonata in G major (freely transcribed for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg); Berlioz, Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"; Prokofieff, Third Piano Concerto; Rimsky-Korsakow, Suite, "Scheherazade." Soloist, Serge Prokofieff. At the Academy of Music, last evening.

* * *

WHEN the Third Piano Concerto of Serge Prokofieff was first performed in New York its composer assisted as the soloist and Albert Coates conducted the orchestra—that of the Symphony Society. How the Concerto "took" then, how it affected its hearers, I cannot tell, for I was not a member of Mr. Coates' audience. But Prokofieff could not have made in this particular work any very striking impression as a composer. It was not played a second time and had not been heard again by New York until Mr. Koussewitsky (with Mr. Prokofieff still at the piano) unfolded it Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall, again last evening in the Academy of Music and yet again—I understand—this afternoon on 57th st.

This Concerto is a frail, tenuous score, mechanical and labored in construction, lacking in musical ideas of even a faint distinction. I find it difficult to understand what could have induced Mr. Kossewitsky to waste nearly half an evening over it. Prokofieff at his best is clever, entertaining—never important. But in this Concerto he is obviously not at his best. His witticisms seem stale and awkwardly phrased. Evidently he needed a piano concerto to use as a vehicle for orchestral appearances. So he made one. It is so very distinctly made.

* * *

THE BALANCE of the evening might have been very pleasant—a charming orchestration by Maximilian Steinberg of an old Galliard Sonata "for bassoon or violincello with a thorough base for the harpsichord," the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz, and Rimsky's "Scheherazade"—had it not been for Mr. Koussewitsky, who insisted on placing himself between the music and the audience. Mr. Koussewitsky is an individualist, and no one would protest were his position as such achieved with less obvious strain and direct intention. Temperament for art's sake is one thing and temperament for temperament's sake is another. Mr. Kousgewitsky exhibits the latter motto conspicuously on his shield.

Of Rimsky's perennial excursion through lands of wonder and fantasy, he gave the most affected, exasperating reading within my experience. If as it has been remarked, Mr. Koussewitsky strives to make Schubert "sound like Rimsky-Korsakow," then let it also be said that he strives to make "Scheherazade" sound like Strawinsky. The results

174

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

To Direct Boston Symphony at Capitol Theater Sunday.

The Toronto Mail of November 4, 1925, said of Serge Koussevitsky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Capitol theater Sunday afternoon: "Serge Koussevitsky Thrilling Conductor. Concert of the Boston orchestra was an unforgetable event. Every regular concertgoer has, stored away in his memory, a number of experiences that he accounts as unforgetable—the first time he heard Paderewski play Chopin's Polonaise, the first time he heard Gerhardt sing some haunting German leider. To these events he will doubtless add the hearing of the fourth movement of Brahm's First Symphony, as played by the Boston orchestra in Massey hall last night. It was one of those occasions when all the senses seem completely satisfied, in the presence of absolute beauty, of subtle drama, of intense emotion exalted to the nth degree. No reviewer can possibly return to the office in cold blood to dissect such an experience. One impression of the concert remains indelibl [illegible] it is that has at the

---

NEW YORK TIM

FEB 5 19

MUSIC

BY OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Concert.

A Russian program calculated to display very well the capacities of the orchestra, and to exalt the conductor, if not invariably the audience, was given by Mr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. This program consisted of Moussorgsky's familiar and somewhat banal "Nuit sur la Mont Chauve," Serge Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto, with the composer as soloist, and Scriabine's Third Symphony, otherwise known as the "Divine Poem."

Of these three compositions the most interesting, possibly on account of its novelty and its esprit, was Mr. Prokofieff's concerto. Conveniently enough for a reviewer forming his impressions of an unfamiliar score, this concerto will be repeated at the Boston Symphony concert of tomorrow afternoon, and that will be the right and proper occasion for a discussion of its value as music. It is enough to say at this time that it is a very brilliantly written work, full of rhythmical energy and interest, scintillant, youthful, audacious in its manner. Perhaps this audacity is skin deep. Future hearings will tell. At any rate, Mr. Prokofieff enjoyed a triumph with the virtuoso piece which he had provided himself. He played a very difficult and effective piano part most brilliantly, and for the moment at least was monarch of what he surveyed. There is a dangerous fluency in this concerto, as there is in a good deal that Prokofieff has written, but his fluency is seldom mere glibness; it seems to proceed from an excess of energy, whether or not the ideas are always sufficiently pruned and revised for expressive purposes. There were many recalls for Mr. Prokofieff.

Moussorgsky's "Nuit sur le Mont Chauve" owes much of its effect to the instrumentation of Rimsky-Korsakoff, for there is little body or worth in the ideas. It was given a highly effective performance. This also might be said of the "Divine Poem," interpreted to the excellent advantage of the score. The composer, in fact, could hardly have wished a more comprehending and sympathetic representation. Unfortunately, the "Divine Poem" is not of divine but of insufferable length. It is a kind of Wagnerian eau de cologne, much attenuated. It is swooning this moment and waxing furious the next. There is not enough contrast either of dynamics or instrumentation, and at last the ears become fatigued with the noise, the pother, the hot, sweltering orchestration.

All this gave Mr. Koussevitsky, as a conductor, an unusual opportunity, and of this opportunity he made much. a mas- has

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

FEB 6 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

A great orchestra and a great leader will be the attraction at the Capitol Theater tomorrow afternoon. The organization is the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra and the leader is that distinguished Russian Serge Koussevitsky. It is safe to predict that all those who are fortunate enough to obtain admission to the Capitol Theater tomorrow afternoon will hear a program of classic music that will linger in the memory for many a long day.

Mr. Koussevitsky's program will open with Berliez's overture to "Benvenute Cellini," which will be followed by Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," which in turn is followed by Wagner's Prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg." The program will close with Scriabin's Third Symphony "The Devine Poem," an opus new to Hartford.

The seats and boxes will be on sale at McCoy's, Inc., 89 Asylum street today. The box office sale tomorrow at the theater will open at noon. Reservations by telephone may be made by calling 2-0375 after 9 a. m. The concert will begin promptly at 3 o'clock. The orchestra comes to Hartford under the management of nk A. Sedgwick.

REALM OF MUSIC

By Paul Morris

RUSSIAN scenic artists are noted for their cleverness in splashing jarring colors together in a way that excites but does not irritate the sense of sight. Serge Prokofieff, the Russian pianist who played his own third piano concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, has translated this particular flair of the decorative clan into tones. His concerto is full of clashing harmonies, rhythms, and tone colorings, but it is not half as shocking as it ought to be, considering its unconventionality. In fact, it contains some novel combinations of tone and color that please as well as startle. The concerto contains a Theme and Variations, one of the most objectionable of ancient musical forms, but so cleverly does Mr. Prokofieff conceal his variations that they seem even less strained than the theme itself. An Andante meditativo is a strikingly novel variant, and the final Allegro gusto is full of vitality, but its connection with the original theme is fortunately remote.

Mr. Prokofieff is one of those modmentalities and replaced them with cleverness and novelty. There are few composer-pianists as clever as Prokofieff.

Last night's program was devoted entirely to Russian music. Under the guidance of Serge Koussevitsky, the orchestra gave a rousing performance of Scriabin's "Divine Poem," and there was a colorful, beautifully balanced presentation of Moussorgsky's "Night On a Bald Mountain."

A VANISHING AUDIENCE

The best receipt yet discovered for driving music lovers out of concert halls in New York is a symphony by Anton Bruckner, and Otto Klemperer fulfilled expectations when he presented one of the longest of these works to yesterday afternoon's Symphony Society audience in Carnegie Hall. The symphony in question was Bruckner's eighth. Most of the audience heard the first movement. But at its close the expected exodus started. After that there was an almost continual shuffling of feet down the aisles.

The performance was brilliant, better, in fact, than most performances of Bruckner's music in this city. The resounding passages for brasses were blown out triumphantly. The softer melodies were phrased and refined most skilfully. The tone of the strings was appealing and smooth. But Bruckner is not for New York, as other conductors

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK TELEGRAM

FEB 5 1926

A Profitless Concert.

The program building of Serge Koussevitzky continues as inscrutable as the ways of Providence. Last evening's visit of the Boston Symphony to the snowgirt fastnesses of Carnegie Hall supplied an additional case in point. That all the music proffered emanated from the Land of the Bear was of much less consequence than that the best of it was no better than second rate, while a good part of it was far below even that dispiriting station. The list assembled by Boston's eye comforting conductor comprised Moussorgsky's "Night on the Bald Mountain," Serge Prokofieff's third piano concerto (with the composer as soloist) and Scriabine's "Divine Poem." The last, for all its lusty racket, creaks dismally in the joints and carries its three and twenty years like the mortal burden of a century. Even the "Poem of Ecstasy" seems flushed with health in comparison. Not all the superb playing the Bostonians expended on it could restore its frayed and threadbare fabric.

Moussorgsky's hell broth has likewise cooled and caked until its flavor is as of month-old porridge. The best passages in it were all done much better in "Boris." Anyhow, why not leave the thing to stadium concerts and ambitious movie houses? Something might perhaps have been said in defence of its presence last night had Mr. Koussevitzky's performance been unwontedly vivid or acute. But it was eminently God-fearing. As for utilizing this piece to open a program—well, no doubt Isolde's Love Death or Bruennhilde's Immolation would be somewhat less to the purpos per- chanc not pri

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK WORLD

FEB 5 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

The Boston Symphony appears at Carnegie Hall with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor and Serge Prokofieff as soloist. The following program was presented:

Night on the Bald Mountain....Moussorgsky
March and scherzo, from "The Love of the Three Oranges"..........Prokofieff
Piano concerto No. 3, Op. 26......Prokofieff
"The Divine Poem," symphony No. 3, Scriabin

At the same hall in the evening Mr. Koussevitzky led the Boston Orchestra in a strictly Russian program of Moussorgsky, Prokofieff and Scriabin. The Moussorgsky number, "A Night on Bald Mountain," Mr. Koussevitzky first revealed to local audiences at a concert last winter and last night's repetition of it didn't enhance its importance. It is based on a short doublebass figure which the composer also used in Varlaam's song in the tavern scene in "Boris." But that is about all there is of a resemblance between the Bald Mountain and the immortal opera.

The piece abounds in several cheap tunes, one of which is reiterated in the strings to exasperation. It might be cut in half without in the least impairing any essential part. It would be nice to discover that Moussorgsky really wrote it as a joke.

Mr. Prokofieff in his third piano concerto followed hard on the Bald Mountain. This seems to be a great season for the composer of "The Loves of Three Oranges." His violin concerto was performed recently by Mr. Kochanski and the Symphony Society. It may be that his piano concerto heard last night was the same violin concerto transcribed for the piano. There is no way of telling.

There was a semblance of a Russian tune at the very beginning, but that was abandoned hurriedly and there ensued at least fifteen minutes of meaningless cacophony. There was also a theme with variations which every once in a while struck out a decent spark. But the same thing always happened—each moment of sanity was at once engulfed in an ocean of noises.

Watching the intentness of the audience last night made me wonder what its attitude would have been if the Mr. Koussevitzky, through some whim, had elected to play, say "All Alone," by Irving Berlin, instead of the Prokofieff concerto. What a commotion there would have been! Yet they would have heard better music.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who plays the Russians better than he plays the Germans, played his program with authority and power, and the audience seemed well pleased with everything.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK SUN

FEB 5 1926

Boston Symphony Offers Russian Program

Mr. Koussevitzky's all Russian seance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening plunged the audience into an extensive array of Slavic moods. The modern idiom was represented by the talented young Russian composer-pianist, Serge Prokofieff, who played his third concerto, for piano and orchestra. The concerto was also played by the Symphony Society on January 26, 1922. Full comment on last night's offering will be reserved for its Saturday performance. It is an interesting, colorful composition, leaning skillfully in the modern manner on rhythmic cross currents and contrasts, and its performance was received with genuine applause.

The rest of the program ranged from a more or less wild, satanic night on Moussorgsky's "Bald Mountain" to that delectable tidbit, Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem." A generation ago this would probably have been a most exciting evening, but fashions in wild parties and religious exultations have changed considerably in fifty years. Emotionally, at least, the evening's course was comparatively calm and uneventful.

The orchestra played brilliantly and provided excellent support for Mr. Prokofieff's difficult swirls of rushing rhythms. As for Scriabin's ecstasies, despite Mr. Koussevitzky's strenuous efforts and loving care, they tended to become soporific. The audience's ecstasy was restricted to polite attention and genuine applause for a brilliantly built finale.

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays an All-Russian Program

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; soloist, Serge Prokofieff, pianist. At Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. "A Night on Bald Mountain" Moussorgsky
2. Piano Concerto, No. 3, Op. 26...Prokofieff
   Mr. Prokofieff
3. Symphony No. 3, "The Divine Poem," Op. 15.........................Scriabin

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra blew into town on the wings of the northeast storm and gave us last night a little lesson in the history of Russian music.

They went back to the sixties, to Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain," and worked forward through Scriabin's "Divine Poem," of the early twentieth century, to Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto of 1918-1921; and it was amusing to observe that not one of these Russians could escape the huge shadow of Franz Liszt. You found him in the diabolism of Moussorgsky's Witches' Sabbath (a diabolism grown amiable and trite), in the inflated sentimentalism of the "Divine Poem" (how delightfully Lisztian is Scriabin's direction for his second theme: "Mystérieux, romantique, légendaire"!). Finally, you detected the glorious old showman in the platform tricks of Prokofieff's concerto. Scratch a Russian (save only Moussorgsky at his greatest) and you find a Lisztian wart.

* * *

None of this music represented its composers at their best. Moussorgsky's timid little excursion in romantic supernaturalism is one of his feeblest invent Mr. Prokofieff's Third Concer his and its Night on Bald Mountain," and the "Divine Poem" are very old stories hereabouts, and Mr. Prokofieff's concerts had been heard here at least once before. The composer played it at a New York Symphony concert, under Albert Coates, on January 26, 1922. Mr. Prokoffieff had completed it a few months before.

The concerto is in three movements, and one of them, the second, is a theme with variations—five only, a modest allowance, for which the haters of variations composed by any one will be properly grateful.

* * *

When Mr. Prokofieff played this concerto here four years ago it gave pain in certain quarters because the object of its harmonic structure seemed to be, it was said, "to avoid every succession of tones in which the ingenuous, unsophisticated musical ear might recognize obvious beauty." We cannot honestly lay claim to the possession of an "ingenuous" ear; nor do we think it important that an ear of that sort should be pleased. But certainly Mr. Prokofieff's music could not possibly, in our time, fail to please the least sophisticated of ears. Thus do the tonal problems of one day become the kindergarten frolics of the next.

Nothing could be more candid, more sunnily eupeptic, than Mr. Prokofieff's Muse as she chats with him in this concerto. What amiable and friendly patter this music is, with its high spirits, its vivacity, its pretty tricks and its untroubled externality, and its touch of Lisztian bombast at the end, which you forgive because of the obvious harmlessness of the whole thing!

* * *

Mr. Prokofieff played it with delight-

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 6 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT INCLUDES SCRIABIN WORKS

Director Koussevitsky Brings Russian Programme on Feb. 16.

Serge Koussevitsky will bring a Russian programme to Providence when he conducts the fourth Boston Symphony concert of the season in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 16. The soloist will be Serge Prokofieff, regarded as the most significant of the younger Russian composers, Prokofieff, pianist, will appear in his own Third Pianoforte Concerto, which he has played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently in Boston and New York.

Koussevitzky will include, as the longest number on the programme, Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem." A friend of Scriabin, Koussevitzky was the first to bring forth his principal works in Russia. By virtue of his performance of this score in Boston, New York and Philadelphia in the last fortnight, Koussevitzky has been called the foremost living prophet of this Russian master.

The "Divine Poem" is in three parts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

FEB 7 1926

RUSSIAN MUSIC BY KOUSSEVITZKY

A Russian program with a Russian composer as soloist will mark the fourth Boston Symphony concert in Providence to be given in Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, Feb. 16th. Serge Prokofieff, who is generally considered the most important of the younger generation of Russian composers, and who is likewise one of the finest piano virtuosos of the day, will appear as soloist in his own Third Pianoforte Concerto. Prokofieff has played this concerto with the orchestra, with conspicuous success, in Boston, New York and Brooklyn.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the program with the orchestral fantasy of Moussorgsky, "A Night On Bald Mountain," a music of sorcery and evil spirits which are dispelled by the coming of dawn. The latter part of the program will be taken up by Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," of which Koussevitzky has proved himself an inspired interpreter at recent concerts in Boston, New York and other cities. A friend of Scriabin, Koussevitzky was in sympathetic understanding with the musical aims and philosophic ideals of this "mystic in tones." The conductor first gave performance to his principal works in Moscow and Petrograd. He even took them to the villages along the Volga River, Scriabin accompanying him on one of his famous voyages. The "Divine Poem" is in three parts. The first, "Luttes," ("Struggles"), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation and doubt. The second, "Voluptes" has been called "The spirit's ecstatic joy in merging into nature." The third, "Jeu divin," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

FEB 6 1926

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By EDWARD CUSHING

CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. Program: Galliard, Sonata in G major (freely transcribed for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg); Berlioz, Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"; Prokofieff, Third Piano Concerto; Rimsky-Korsakow, Suite, "Scheherazade." Soloist, Serge Prokofieff. At the Academy of Music, last evening.

* * *

WHEN the Third Piano Concerto of Serge Prokofieff was first performed in New York its composer assisted as the soloist and Albert Coates conducted the orchestra—that of the Symphony Society. How the Concerto "took" then, how it affected its hearers, I cannot tell, for I was not a member of Mr. Coates' audience. But Prokofieff could not have made in this particular work any very striking impression as a composer. It was not played a second time and had not been heard again by New York until Mr. Koussewitsky (with Mr. Prokofieff still at the piano) unfolded it Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall, again last evening in the Academy of Music and yet again—I understand—this afternoon on 57th st.

This Concerto is a frail, tenuous score, mechanical and labored in construction, lacking in musical ideas of even a faint distinction. I find it difficult to understand what could have induced Mr. Kossewitsky to waste nearly half an evening over it. Prokofieff at his best is clever, entertaining—never important. But in this Concerto he is obviously not at his best. His witticisms seem stale and awkwardly phrased. Evidently he needed a piano concerto to use as a vehicle for orchestral appearances. So he made one. It is so very distinctly made.

* * *

THE BALANCE of the evening might have been very pleasant—a charming orchestration by Maximilian Steinberg of an old Galliard Sonata "for bassoon or violincello with a thorough base for the harpisichord," the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz, and Rimsky's "Scheherazade"—had it not been for Mr. Koussewitsky, who insisted on placing himself between the music and the audience. Mr. Koussewitsky is an individualist, and no one would protest were his position as such achieved with less obvious strain and direct intention. Temperament for art's sake is one thing and temperament for temperament's sake is another. Mr. Koussewitsky exhibits the latter motto conspicuously on his shield.

Of Rimsky's perennial excursion through lands of wonder and fantasy, he gave the most affected, exasperating reading within my experience. If as it has been remarked, Mr. Koussewitsky strives to make Schubert "sound like Rimsky-Korsakow," then let it also be said that he strives to make "Scheherazade" sound like Strawinsky. The results

INFORMATION OBSCURED

174

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

To Direct Boston Symphony at Capitol Theater Sunday.

The Toronto Mail of November 4, 1925, said of Serge Koussevitsky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Capitol theater Sunday afternoon: "Serge Koussevitsky Thrilling Conductor. Concert of the Boston orchestra was an unforgetable event. Every regular concertgoer has, stored away in his memory, a number of experiences that he accounts as unforgetable—the first time he heard Paderewski play Chopin's Polonaise, the first time he heard Gerhardt sing some haunting German leider. To these events he will doubtless add the hearing of the fourth movement of Brahm's First Symphony, as played by the Boston orchestra in Massey hall last night. It was one of those occasions when all the senses seem completely satisfied, in the presence of absolute beauty, of subtle drama, of intense emotion exalted to the nth degree. No reviewer can possibly return to the office in cold blood to dissect such an experience. One impression of the concert remains indelibly fixed in the mind—it is that the Boston Symphony orchestra has at its head in Mr. Koussevitsky, one of the greatest personalities among the orchestral leaders now before the public."

The seats and boxes are now on sale at McCoy's, inc., No. 89 Asylum sreet. The concert will begin at 3 o'clock. The orchestra comes to Hartford under the

---

A Russian program calculated to display very well the capacities of the orchestra, and to exalt the conductor, if not invariably the audience, was given by Mr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. This program consisted of Moussorgsky's familiar and somewhat banal "Nuit sur la Mont Chauve," Serge Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto, with the composer as soloist, and Scriabine's Third Symphony, otherwise known as the "Divine Poem."

Of these three compositions the most interesting, possibly on account of its novelty and its esprit, was Mr. Prokofieff's concerto. Conveniently enough for a reviewer forming his impressions of an unfamiliar score, this concerto will be repeated at the Boston Symphony concert of tomorrow afternoon, and that will be the right and proper occasion for a discussion of its value as music. It is enough to say at this time that it is a very brilliantly written work, full of rhythmical energy and interest, scintillant, youthful, audacious in its manner. Perhaps this audacity is skin deep. Future hearings will tell. At any rate, Mr. Prokofieff enjoyed a triumph with the virtuoso piece which he had provided himself. He played a very difficult and effective piano part most brilliantly, and for the moment at least was monarch of what he surveyed. There is a dangerous fluency in this concerto, as there is in a good deal that Prokofieff has written, but his fluency is seldom mere glibness; it seems to proceed from an excess of energy, whether or not the ideas are always sufficiently pruned and revised for expressive purposes. There were many recalls for Mr. Prokofieff.

Moussorgsky's "Nuit sur le Mont Chauve" owes much of its effect to the instrumentation of Rimsky-Korsakoff, for there is little body or worth in the ideas. It was given a highly effective performance. This also might be said of the "Divine Poem," interpreted to the excellent advantage of the score. The composer, in fact, could hardly have wished a more comprehending and sympathetic representation. Unfortunately, the "Divine Poem" is not of divine but of insufferable length. It is a kind of Wagnerian eau de cologne, much attenuated. It is swooning this moment and waxing furious the next. There is not enough contrast either of dynamics or instrumentation, and at last the ears become fatigued with the noise, the pother, the hot, sweltering orchestration.

All this gave Mr. Koussevitsky, as a conductor, an unusual opportunity, and of this opportunity he made much. It was an excellent, indeed a masterly, performance of a score that has aged disagreeably in a few years, like a face rouged and cracked under the rouge; an effusion which should be forgotten and forgiven the composer. At this concert orchestra and conductor sustained their reputation, but Russia has produced better music than most of the program afforded.

…ian …are to predict that all those who are fortunate enough to obtain admission to the Capitol Theater tomorrow afternoon will hear a program of classic music that will linger in the memory for many a long day.

Mr. Koussevitsky's program will open with Berliez's overture to "Benvenute Cellini," which will be followed by Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," which in turn is followed by Wagner's Prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg." The program will close with Scriabin's Third Symphony "The Devine Poem," an opus new to Hartford.

The seats and boxes will be on sale at McCoy's, Inc., 89 Asylum street today. The box office sale tomorrow at the theater will open at noon. Reservations by telephone may be made by calling 2-0375 after 9 a. m. The concert will begin promptly at 3 o'clock. The orchestra comes to Hartford under the management of …nk A. Sedgwick.

REALM OF MUSIC

By Paul Morris

RUSSIAN scenic artists are noted for their cleverness in splashing jarring colors together in a way that excites but does not irritate the sense of sight. Serge Prokofieff, the Russian pianist who played his own third piano concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, has translated this particular flair of the decorative clan into tones. His concerto is full of clashing harmonies, rhythms, and tone colorings, but it is not half as shocking as it ought to be, considering its unconventionality. In fact, it contains some novel combinations of tone and color that please as well as startle. The concerto contains a Theme and Variations, one of the most objectionable of ancient musical forms, but so cleverly does Mr. Prokofieff conceal his variations that they seem even less strained than the theme itself. An Andante meditativo is a strikingly novel variant, and the final Allegro gusto is full of vitality, but its connection with the original theme is fortunately remote.

Mr. Prokofieff is one of those modern pianists who discard the softer subtleties of piano tone which Chopin loved and exploited. A hard, brittle, sharp piano tone suits his music and his particular pianistic style. There is not much sentiment in his music or in his playing, but the younger moderns have long ago discarded sentimentalities and replaced them with cleverness and novelty. There are few composer-pianists as clever as Prokofieff.

Last night's program was devoted entirely to Russian music. Under the guidance of Serge Koussevitsky, the orchestra gave a rousing performance of Scriabin's "Divine Poem," and there was a colorful, beautifully balanced presentation of Moussorgsky's "Night On a Bald Mountain."

A VANISHING AUDIENCE

The best receipt yet discovered for driving music lovers out of concert halls in New York is a symphony by Anton Bruckner, and Otto Klemperer fulfilled expectations when he presented one of the longest of these works to yesterday afternoon's Symphony Society audience in Carnegie Hall. The symphony in question was Bruckner's eighth. Most of the audience heard the first movement. But at its close the expected exodus started. After that there was an almost continual shuffling of feet down the aisles.

The performance was brilliant, better, in fact, than most performances of Bruckner's music in this city. The resounding passages for brasses were blown out triumphantly. The softer melodies were phrased and refined most skilfully. The tone of the strings was appealing and smooth. But Bruckner is not for New York, as other conductors before Klemperer have discovered.

In the first half of the program Harold Bauer played Beethoven's fourth piano concerto with so much musical insight, precision and appropriate sentiment that the symphony sounded like an anti-climax.

…showed… supplied an additional … point. That all the music proffered emanated from the Land of the Bear was of much less consequence than that the best of it was no better than second rate, while a good part of it was far below even that dispiriting station. The list assembled by Boston's eye comforting conductor comprised Moussorgsky's "Night on the Bald Mountain," Serge Prokofieff's third piano concerto (with the composer as soloist) and Scriabine's "Divine Poem." The last, for all its lusty racket, creaks dismally in the joints and carries its three and twenty years like the mortal burden of a century. Even the "Poem of Ecstasy" seems flushed with health in comparison. Not all the superb playing the Bostonians expended on it could restore its frayed and threadbare fabric.

Moussorgsky's hell broth has likewise cooled and caked until its flavor is a… of month-old porridge. The best passages in it were all done much better … "Boris." Anyhow, why not leave th… thing to stadium concerts and ambitio… movie houses? Something might p… haps have been said in defence of its presence last night had Mr. Koussevitzky's performance been unwontedly vivid or acute. But it was eminently God-fearing. As for utilizing this piece to open a program—well, no doubt Isolde's Love Death or Bruennhilde's Immolation would be somewhat less to the purpose. But barring these and, perchance, Chabrier's "Espana" one does not readily think of a more inappropriate beginning.

Mr. Prokofieff's concerto was introduced here some years ago under the sovereignty of Albert Coates. There need, therefore, be no present alarms or excursions touching the affair. Its difficulties of performance are out of all proportion to the shallowness of its chatter and the exiguity of its ideas. Here is a bit suggesting folk-tune, there a snippet of the "Sacre," somewhere else a crumb of Tschaikowskian cantilena. The second movement, in the shape of a theme with five variations, has a few transient passages that sound like a discouraged attempt to rewrite the "Nutcracker" Suite. All told, the thing is glib prattle—profound, perhaps, as Chaminade but vapid as even that facile lady hardly dared be.

Mr. Lauri-Volpi returned to the Metropolitan in last night's "Andrea Chenier," winning vociferous plaudits. Florence Easton was the Madeleine.

H. F. P.

Mr. Kou… Orchestra in a su… gram of Moussorgsky, Prokofieff and Scriabin. The Moussorgsky number, "A Night on Bald Mountain," Mr. Koussevitzky first revealed to local audiences at a concert last winter and last night's repetition of it didn't enhance its importance. It is based on a short doublebass figure which the composer also used in Varlaam's song in the tavern scene in "Boris." But that is about all there is of a resemblance between the Bald Mountain and the immortal opera.

The piece abounds in several cheap tunes, one of which is reiterated in the strings to exasperation. It might be cut in half without in the least impairing any essential part. It would be nice to discover that Moussorgsky really wrote it as a joke.

Mr. Prokofieff in his third piano concerto followed hard on the Bald Mountain. This seems to be a great season for the composer of "The Loves of Three Oranges." His violin concerto was performed recently by Mr. Kochanski and the Symphony Society. It may be that his piano concerto heard last night was the same violin concerto transcribed for the piano. There is no way of telling.

There was a semblance of a Russian tune at the very beginning, but that was abandoned hurriedly and there ensued at least fifteen minutes of meaningless cacophony. There was also a theme with variations which every once in a while struck out a decent spark. But the same thing always happened—each moment of sanity was at once engulfed in an ocean of noises.

Watching the intentness of the audience last night made me wonder what its attitude would have been if the Mr. Koussevitzky, through some whim, had elected to play, say "All Alone," by Irving Berlin, instead of the Prokofieff concerto. What a commotion there would have been! Yet they would have heard better music.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who plays the Russians better than he plays the Germans, played his program with authority and power, and the audience seemed well pleased with everything.

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays an All-Russian Program

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; soloist, Serge Prokofieff, pianist. At Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. "A Night on Bald Mountain" Moussorgsky
2. Piano Concerto, No. 3, Op. 26...Prokofieff Mr. Prokofieff
3. Symphony No. 3, "The Divine Poem," Op. 15........................Scriabin

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra blew into town on the wings of the northeast storm and gave us last night a little lesson in the history of Russian music.

They went back to the sixties, to Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain," and worked forward through Scriabin's "Divine Poem," of the early twentieth century, to Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto of 1918-1921; and it was amusing to observe that not one of these Russians could escape the huge shadow of Franz Liszt. You found him in the diabolism of Moussorgsky's Witches' Sabbath (a diabolism grown amiable and trite), in the inflated sentimentalism of the "Divine Poem" (how delightfully Lisztian is Scriabin's direction for his second theme: "Mystérieux, romantique, légendaire"!). Finally, you detected the glorious old showman in the platform tricks of Prokofieff's concerto. Scratch a Russian (save only Moussorgsky at his greatest) and you find a Lisztian wart.

* * *

None of this music represented its composers at their best. Moussorgsky's timid little excursion in romantic supernaturalism is one of his feeblest inventions; Mr. Prokofieff's Third Concerto cannot hold a candle to his "Scythian Suite," for instance; and Scriabin's "Divine Poem," with its boudoir mysticism, its distended prettiness, the image it evokes of the Cosmos in pink tulle, heavily perfumed, is far indeed from the reticent profundities and the sensitive, tragic beauty of his later piano pieces—but then, alas, those pieces can scarcely be put upon an orchestra.

* * *

Not one of the works on last night's program was new to this town. "A Night on Bald Mountain," and the "Divine Poem" are very old stories hereabouts, and Mr. Prokofieff's concerts had been heard here at least once before. The composer played it at a New York Symphony concert, under Albert Coates, on January 26, 1922. Mr. Prokoffieff had completed it a few months before.

The concerto is in three movements, and one of them, the second, is a theme with variations—five only, a modest allowance, for which the haters of variations composed by any one will be properly grateful.

* * *

When Mr. Prokofieff played this concerto here four years ago it gave pain in certain quarters because the object of its harmonic structure seemed to be, it was said, "to avoid every succession of tones in which the ingenuous, unsophisticated musical ear might recognize obvious beauty." We cannot honestly lay claim to the possession of an "ingenuous" ear; nor do we think it important that an ear of that sort should be pleased. But certainly Mr. Prokofieff's music could not possibly, in our time, fail to please the least sophisticated of ears. Thus do the tonal problems of one day become the kindergarten frolics of the next.

Nothing could be more candid, more sunnily eupeptic, than Mr. Prokofieff's Muse as she chats with him in this concerto. What amiable and friendly patter this music is, with its high spirits, its vivacity, its pretty tricks and its untroubled externality, and its touch of Lisztian bombast at the end, which you forgive because of the obvious harmlessness of the whole thing!

* * *

Mr. Prokofieff played it with delightful insouciance, with admirable rhythmic crispness, and the audience rejoiced greatly in his performance. Mr. Koussevitzky directed the accompaniment with more gusto than precision. But he conducted Moussorgsky's tone-poem as if he were assisting at the revelation of a masterpiece—which is, of course, the way all music should be conducted, good or bad.

Of the intense conviction, the unquestioning devotion, the true ardor that Mr. Koussevitzky lavishes upon Scriabin's portentous trivialities, it is no longer needful to speak. If any one could give validity to them, Koussevitzky is the man. But not even his fire and vitality can do that—at least for some of us.

---

po… his o… …ich he has … Symphony Orchestra recently in Boston and New York.

Koussevitzky will include, as the longest number on the programme, Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem." A friend of Scriabin, Koussevitzky was the first to bring forth his principal works in Russia. By virtue of his performance of this score in Boston, New York and Philadelphia in the last fortnight, Koussevitzky has been called the foremost living prophet of this Russian master.

The "Divine Poem" is in three parts. The first, "Luttes" ("Struggles"), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation and doubt. The second, "Voluptes," has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy in merging into nature." The third, "Jeu divin," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed.

The opening number will be Moussorgsky's grotesque score, descriptive of evil and good spirits, "A Night on Bald Mountain."

---

gram with … Moussorgsky, "A Night On Bald Mountain," a music of sorcery and evil spirits which are dispelled by the coming of dawn. The latter part of the program will be taken up by Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," of which Koussevitzky has proved himself an inspired interpreter at recent concerts in Boston, New York and other cities. A friend of Scriabin, Koussevitzky was in sympathetic understanding with the musical aims and philosophic ideals of this "mystic in tones." The conductor first gave performance to his principal works in Moscow and Petrograd. He even took them to the villages along the Volga River, Scriabin accompanying him on one of his famous voyages. The "Divine Poem" is in three parts. The first, "Luttes," ("Struggles"), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation and doubt. The second, "Voluptes" has been called "The spirit's ecstatic joy in merging into nature." The third, "Jeu divin," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed.

…Concerto is a frail, tenuous score, mechanical and labored in construction, lacking in musical ideas of even a faint distinction. I find it difficult to understand what could have induced Mr. Kossewitsky to waste nearly half an evening over it. Prokofieff at his best is clever, entertaining—never important. But in this Concerto he is obviously not at his best. His witticisms seem stale and awkwardly phrased. Evidently he needed a piano concerto to use as a vehicle for orchestral appearances. So he made one. It is so very distinctly made.

* * *

THE BALANCE of the evening might have been very pleasant—a charming orchestration by Maximilian Steinberg of an old Galliard Sonata "for bassoon or violincello with a thorough base for the harpsichord," the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz, and Rimsky's "Scheherazade"—had it not been for Mr. Koussewitsky, who insisted on placing himself between the music and the audience. Mr. Koussewitsky is an individualist, and no one would protest were his position as such achieved with less obvious strain and direct intention. Temperament for art's sake is one thing and temperament for temperament's sake is another. Mr. Koussewitsky exhibits the latter motto conspicuously on his shield.

Of Rimsky's perennial excursion through lands of wonder and fantasy, he gave the most affected, exasperating reading within my experience. If as it has been remarked, Mr. Koussewitsky strives to make Schubert "sound like Rimsky-Korsakow," then let it also be said that he strives to make "Scheherazade" sound like Strawinsky. The results

INFORMATION OBSCURED

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

To Direct Boston Symphony at Capitol Theater Sunday.

The Toronto Mail of November 4, 1925, said of Serge Koussevitsky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Capitol theater Sunday afternoon: "Serge Koussevitsky Thrilling Conductor. Concert of the Boston orchestra was an unforgetable event. Every regular concertgoer has, stored away in his memory, a number of experiences that he accounts as unforgetable—the first time he heard Paderewski play Chopin's Polonaise, the first time he heard Gerhardt sing some haunting German leider. To these events he will doubtless add the hearing of the fourth movement of Brahm's First Symphony, as played by the Boston orchestra in Massey hall last night. It was one of those occasions when all the senses seem completely satisfied, in the presence of absolute beauty, of subtle drama, of intense emotion exalted to the nth degree. No reviewer can possibly return to the office in cold blood to dissect such an experience. One impression of the concert remains indelibly fixed in the mind—it is that the Boston Symphony orchestra has at its head in Mr. Koussevitsky, one of the greatest personalities among the orchestral leaders now before the public."

The seats and boxes are now on sale at McCoy's, inc., No. 89 Asylum sreet. The concert will begin at 3 o'clock. The orchestra comes to Hartford under the [illegible] Sedgwick.

A Russian program calculated to display very well the capacities of the orchestra, and to exalt the conductor, if not invariably the audience, was given by Mr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. This program consisted of Moussorgsky's familiar and somewhat banal "Nuit sur la Mont Chauve," Serge Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto, with the composer as soloist, and Scriabine's Third Symphony, otherwise known as the "Divine Poem."

Of these three compositions the most interesting, possibly on account of its novelty and its esprit, was Mr. Prokofieff's concerto. Conveniently enough for a reviewer forming his impressions of an unfamiliar score, this concerto will be repeated at the Boston Symphony concert of tomorrow afternoon, and that will be the right and proper occasion for a discussion of its value as music. It is enough to say at this time that it is a very brilliantly written work, full of rhythmical energy and interest, scintillant, youthful, audacious in its manner. Perhaps this audacity is skin deep. Future hearings will tell. At any rate, Mr. Prokofieff enjoyed a triumph with the virtuoso piece which he had provided himself. He played a very difficult and effective piano part most brilliantly, and for the moment at least was monarch of what he surveyed. There is a dangerous fluency in this concerto, as there is in a good deal that Prokofieff has written, but his fluency is seldom mere glibness; it seems to proceed from an excess of energy, whether or not the ideas are always sufficiently pruned and revised for expressive purposes. There were many recalls for Mr. Prokofieff.

Moussorgsky's "Nuit sur le Mont Chauve" owes much of its effect to the instrumentation of Rimsky-Korsakoff, for there is little body or worth in the ideas. It was given a highly effective performance. This also might be said of the "Divine Poem," interpreted to the excellent advantage of the score. The composer, in fact, could hardly have wished a more comprehending and sympathetic representation. Unfortunately, the "Divine Poem" is not of divine but of insufferable length. It is a kind of Wagnerian eau de cologne, much attenuated. It is swooning this moment and waxing furious the next. There is not enough contrast either of dynamics or instrumentation, and at last the ears become fatigued with the noise, the pother, the hot, sweltering orchestration.

All this gave Mr. Koussevitsky, as a conductor, an unusual opportunity, and of this opportunity he made much. It was an excellent, indeed a masterly, performance of a score that has aged disagreeably in a few years, like a face rouged and cracked under the rouge; an effusion which should be forgotten and forgiven the composer. At this concert orchestra and conductor sustained their reputation, but Russia has produced better music than most of the program afforded.

…ate to predict that all those who are fortunate enough to obtain admission to the Capitol Theater tomorrow afternoon will hear a program of classic music that will linger in the memory for many a long day.

Mr. Koussevitsky's program will open with Berliez's overture to "Benvenute Cellini," which will be followed by Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," which in turn is followed by Wagner's Prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg." The program will close with Scriabin's Third Symphony "The Devine Poem," an opus new to Hartford.

The seats and boxes will be on sale at McCoy's, Inc., 89 Asylum street today. The box office sale tomorrow at the theater will open at noon. Reservations by telephone may be made by calling 2-0375 after 9 a. m. The concert will begin promptly 2 o'clock. The orchestra comes to rtford under the management of ank A. Sedgwick.

REALM OF MUSIC

By Paul Morris

RUSSIAN scenic artists are noted for their cleverness in splashing jarring colors together in a way that excites but does not irritate the sense of sight. Serge Prokofieff, the Russian pianist who played his own third piano concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, has translated this particular flair of the decorative clan into tones. His concerto is full of clashing harmonies, rhythms, and tone colorings, but it is not half as shocking as it ought to be, considering its unconventionality. In fact, it contains some novel combinations of tone and color that please as well as startle. The concerto contains a Theme and Variations, one of the most objectionable of ancient musical forms, but so cleverly does Mr. Prokofieff conceal his variations that they seem even less strained than the theme itself. An Andante meditativo is a strikingly novel variant, and the final Allegro gusto is full of vitality, but its connection with the original theme is fortunately remote.

Mr. Prokofieff is one of those modern pianists who discard the softer subtleties of piano tone which Chopin loved and exploited. A hard, brittle, sharp piano tone suits his music and his particular pianistic style. There is not much sentiment in his music or in his playing, but the younger moderns have long ago discarded sentimentalities and replaced them with cleverness and novelty. There are few composer-pianists as clever as Prokofieff.

Last night's program was devoted entirely to Russian music. Under the guidance of Serge Koussevitsky, the orchestra gave a rousing performance of Scriabin's "Divine Poem," and there was a colorful, beautifully balanced presentation of Moussorgsky's "Night On a Bald Mountain."

A VANISHING AUDIENCE

The best receipt yet discovered for driving music lovers out of concert halls in New York is a symphony by Anton Bruckner, and Otto Klemperer fulfilled expectations when he presented one of the longest of these works to yesterday afternoon's Symphony Society audience in Carnegie Hall. The symphony in question was Bruckner's eighth. Most of the audience heard the first movement. But at its close the expected exodus started. After that there was an almost continual shuffling of feet down the aisles.

The performance was brilliant, better, in fact, than most performances of Bruckner's music in this city. The resounding passages for brasses were blown out triumphantly. The softer melodies were phrased and refined most skilfully. The tone of the strings was appealing and smooth. But Bruckner is not for New York, as other conductors before Klemperer have discovered.

In the first half of the program Harold Bauer played Beethoven's fourth piano concerto with so much musical insight, precision and appropriate sentiment that the symphony sounded like an anti-climax.

---

showe[illegible] supplied an additional [illegible] point. That all the music proffered emanated from the Land of the Bear was of much less consequence than that the best of it was no better than second rate, while a good part of it was far below even that dispiriting station. The list assembled by Boston's eye comforting conductor comprised Moussorgsky's "Night on the Bald Mountain," Serge Prokofieff's third piano concerto (with the composer as soloist) and Scriabine's "Divine Poem." The last, for all its lusty racket, creaks dismally in the joints and carries its three and twenty years like the mortal burden of a century. Even the "Poem of Ecstasy" seems flushed with health in comparison. Not all the superb playing the Bostonians expended on it could restore its frayed and threadbare fabric.

Moussorgsky's hell broth has likewise cooled and caked until its flavor is as of month-old porridge. The best passages in it were all done much better f "Boris." Anyhow, why not leave th thing to stadium concerts and ambitio movie houses? Something might p haps have been said in defence of its presence last night had Mr. Koussevitzky's performance been unwontedly vivid or acute. But it was eminently God-fearing. As for utilizing this piece to open a program—well, no doubt Isolde's Love Death or Bruennhilde's Immolation would be somewhat less to the purpose. But barring these and, perchance, Chabrier's "Espana" one does not readily think of a more inappropriate beginning.

Mr. Prokofieff's concerto was introduced here some years ago under the sovereignty of Albert Coates. There need, therefore, be no present alarms or excursions touching the affair. Its difficulties of performance are out of all proportion to the shallowness of its chatter and the exiguity of its ideas. Here is a bit suggesting folk-tune, there a snippet of the "Sacre," somewhere else a crumb of Tschaikowskian cantilena. The second movement, in the shape of a theme with five variations, has a few transient passages that sound like a discouraged attempt to rewrite the "Nutcracker" Suite. All told, the thing is glib prattle—profound, perhaps, as Chaminade but vapid as even that facile lady hardly dared be.

Mr. Lauri-Volpi returned to the Metropolitan in last night's "Andrea Chenier," winning vociferous plaudits. Florence Easton was the Madeleine.

H. F. P.

Mr. Kou[illegible] Orchestra in a su[illegible] gram of Moussorgsky, Prokofieff and Scriabin. The Moussorgsky number, "A Night on Bald Mountain." Mr. Koussevitzky first revealed to local audiences at a concert last winter and last night's repetition of it didn't enhance its importance. It is based on a short doublebass figure which the composer also used in Varlaam's song in the tavern scene in "Boris." But that is about all there is of a resemblance between the Bald Mountain and the immortal opera.

The piece abounds in several cheap tunes, one of which is reiterated in the strings to exasperation. It might be cut in half without in the least impairing any essential part. It would be nice to discover that Moussorgsky really wrote it as a joke.

Mr. Prokofieff in his third piano concerto followed hard on the Bald Mountain. This seems to be a great season for the composer of "The Loves of Three Oranges." His violin concerto was performed recently by Mr. Kochanski and the Symphony Society. It may be that his piano concerto heard last night was the same violin concerto transcribed for the piano. There is no way of telling.

There was a semblance of a Russian tune at the very beginning, but that was abandoned hurriedly and there ensued at least fifteen minutes of meaningless cacophony. There was also a theme with variations which every once in a while struck out a decent spark. But the same thing always happened—each moment of sanity was at once engulfed in an ocean of noises.

Watching the intentness of the audience last night made me wonder what its attitude would have been if the Mr. Koussevitzky, through some whim, had elected to play, say "All Alone," by Irving Berlin, instead of the Prokofieff concerto. What a commotion there would have been! Yet they would have heard better music.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who plays the Russians better than he plays the Germans, played his program with authority and power, and the audience seemed well pleased with everything.

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays an All-Russian Program

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; soloist, Serge Prokofieff, pianist. At Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. "A Night on Bald Mountain" Moussorgsky
2. Piano Concerto, No. 3, Op. 26...Prokofieff
   Mr. Prokofieff
3. Symphony No. 3, "The Divine Poem," Op. 15..........................Scriabin

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra blew into town on the wings of the northeast storm and gave us last night a little lesson in the history of Russian music.

They went back to the sixties, to Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain," and worked forward through Scriabin's "Divine Poem," of the early twentieth century, to Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto of 1918-1921; and it was amusing to observe that not one of these Russians could escape the huge shadow of Franz Liszt. You found him in the diabolism of Moussorgsky's Witches' Sabbath (a diabolism grown amiable and trite), in the inflated sentimentalism of the "Divine Poem" (how delightfully Lisztian is Scriabin's direction for his second theme: "Mystérieux, romantique, légendaire"!). Finally, you detected the glorious old showman in the platform tricks of Prokofieff's concerto. Scratch a Russian (save only Moussorgsky at his greatest) and you find a Lisztian wart.

* * *

None of this music represented its composers at their best. Moussorgsky's timid little excursion in romantic supernaturalism is one of his feeblest inventions; Mr. Prokofieff's Third Concerto cannot hold a candle to his "Scythian Suite," for instance; and Scriabin's "Divine Poem," with its boudoir mysticism, its distended prettiness, the image it evokes of the Cosmos in pink tulle, heavily perfumed, is far indeed from the reticent profundities and the sensitive, tragic beauty of his later piano pieces—but then, alas, those pieces can scarcely be put upon an orchestra.

* * *

Not one of the works on last night's program was new to this town. "A Night on Bald Mountain," and the "Divine Poem" are very old stories hereabouts, and Mr. Prokofieff's concerts had been heard here at least once before. The composer played it at a New York Symphony concert, under Albert Coates, on January 26, 1922. Mr. Prokoffieff had completed it a few months before.

The concerto is in three movements, and one of them, the second, is a theme with variations—five only, a modest allowance, for which the haters of variations composed by any one will be properly grateful.

* * *

When Mr. Prokofieff played this concerto here four years ago it gave pain in certain quarters because the object of its harmonic structure seemed to be, it was said, "to avoid every succession of tones in which the ingenuous, unsophisticated musical ear might recognize obvious beauty." We cannot honestly lay claim to the possession of an "ingenuous" ear; nor do we think it important that an ear of that sort should be pleased. But certainly Mr. Prokofieff's music could not possibly, in our time, fail to please the least sophisticated of ears. Thus do the tonal problems of one day become the kindergarten frolics of the next.

Nothing could be more candid, more sunnily eupeptic, than Mr. Prokofieff's Muse as she chats with him in this concerto. What amiable and friendly patter this music is, with its high spirits, its vivacity, its pretty tricks and its untroubled externality, and its touch of Lisztian bombast at the end, which you forgive because of the obvious harmlessness of the whole thing!

* * *

Mr. Prokofieff played it with delightful insouciance, with admirable rhythmic crispness, and the audience rejoiced greatly in his performance. Mr. Koussevitzky directed the accompaniment with more gusto than precision. But he conducted Moussorgsky's tone-poem as if he were assisting at the revelation of a masterpiece—which is, of course, the way all music should be conducted, good or bad.

Of the intense conviction, the unquestioning devotion, the true ardor that Mr. Koussevitzky lavishes upon Scriabin's portentous trivialities, it is no longer needful to speak. If any one could give validity to them, Koussevitzky is the man. But not even his fire and vitality can do that—at least for some of us his o[illegible] he has [illegible] Symphony Orchestra recently in Boston and New York.

---

Koussevitzky will include, as the longest number on the programme, Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem." A friend of Scriabin, Koussevitzky was the first to bring forth his principal works in Russia. By virtue of his performance of this score in Boston, New York and Philadelphia in the last fortnight, Koussevitzky has been called the foremost living prophet of this Russian master.

The "Divine Poem" is in three parts. The first, "Luttes" ("Struggles"), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation and doubt. The second, "Voluptes," has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy in merging into nature." The third, "Jeu divin," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed.

The opening number will be Moussorgsky's grotesque score, descriptive of evil and good spirits, "A Night on Bald Mountain."

---

gram w[illegible] Moussorgsky, "A Night On Bald Mountain," a music of sorcery and evil spirits which are dispelled by the coming of dawn. The latter part of the program will be taken up by Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," of which Koussevitzky has proved himself an inspired interpreter at recent concerts in Boston, New York and other cities. A friend of Scriabin, Koussevitzky was in sympathetic understanding with the musical aims and philosophic ideals of this "mystic in tones." The conductor first gave performance to his principal works in Moscow and Petrograd. He even took them to the villages along the Volga River, Scriabin accompanying him on one of his famous voyages. The "Divine Poem" is in three parts. The first, "Luttes," ("Struggles"), depicts the soul as torn between confident affirmation and doubt. The second, "Voluptes" has been called "The spirit's ecstatic joy in merging into nature." The third, "Jeu divin," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed.

[illegible] Concerto is a frail tenuous score, mechanical and labored in construction, lacking in musical ideas of even a faint distinction. I find it difficult to understand what could have induced Mr. Kossewitsky to waste nearly half an evening over it. Prokofieff at his best is clever, entertaining—never important. But in this Concerto he is obviously not at his best. His witticisms seem stale and awkwardly phrased. Evidently he needed a piano concerto to use as a vehicle for orchestral appearances. So he made one. It is so very distinctly made

* * *

THE BALANCE of the evening might have been very pleasant—a charming orchestration by Maximilian Steinberg of an old Galliard Sonata "for bassoon or violincello with a thorough bass for the harpsichord," the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz, and Rimsky's "Scheherazade"—had it not been for Mr. Koussewitsky, who insisted on placing himself between the music and the audience. Mr. Koussewitsky is an individualist, and no one would protest were his position as such achieved with less obvious strain and direct intention. Temperament for art's sake is one thing and temperament for temperament's sake is another. Mr. Kousewitsky exhibits the latter motto conspicuously on his shield.

Of Rimsky's perennial excursion through lands of wonder and fantasy, he gave the most affected, exasperating reading within my experience. If as it has been remarked, Mr. Koussewitsky strives to make Schubert "sound like Rimsky-Korsakow," then let it also be said that he strives to make "Scheherazade" sound like Strawinsky. The results

175

Music : Olga Samaroff's Daily Column — Boston Symphony Orchestra

IN THE fifth book of the Kasidah, Haji Abdu El-yezdi, as Sir Richard Burton liked to call himself in his Oriental literary incarnation, writes:

There is no Good, there is no Bad;
These be the whims of mortal will:
What works me weal that I call "good";
What harms and hurts I hold as "ill";

They change with place, they shift with race;
And in the veriest span of Time,
Each Vice has worn a Virtue's crown;
All Good was banned as Sin or Crime.

Mme. Olga Samaroff

Sir Richard was undoubtedly thinking life and ethics, but as I listened to Prokofieff's piano concerto last night the lines came into my mind as highly applicable to art, for the thing I liked least in the work was a too frank and reminiscent return to "virtuous" diatonic romanticism in parts of the last movement, while the things which seemed vital, personal and stirring would have been considered highly iniquitous only a few years ago, and perhaps even today might invite some censure from the ultra-conservative. There seems no doubt, however, that Prokofieff in his third piano concerto, played last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the composer at the piano, is much less dissonant and much less concerned with innovation than he was in his first concerto, which I heard some years ago in private. Prokofieff is concerned with making music, and, in my opinion, one thing which gives him his real importance among modern composers is the fact that his ideas and his idiom fit. He thinks and feels the way he writes and he could not express himself otherwise.

This sincerity is in itself convincing, but it has double value when the work in question contains as much force and imagination as Mr. Prokofieff's concerto, which, by the way, he played superbly, with intense musical feeling and a sweeping virtuosity, in the best sense of the word. I liked the second movement best. When a modern composer can succeed in making a movement in variation form interesting throughout, it seems to mean that he has something to say. The thematic and rhythmic shapes of which this whole concerto as a musical structure is built seemed to me highly individual and often exciting. It is a work I should very much like to hear again, and it was received with great warmth by the audience.

Fate has decreed that I should hear Mr. Koussevitzky only in modern or Russian music! I read accounts of his giving other programs, but whenever time and space permit

They seem to keep alive the vision of ecstasy which Scriabine undoubtedly had and put into the essence of the work, while the listener at certain points can scarcely escape the sense of length and repetition which are deadly enemies of ecstasy. For this reason, in spite of a strong admiration for the inherent sensuous beauty of the "Pœme de l'Extase," I usually come away from a performance of it with mixed and baffled feelings.

Mr. Koussevitzky condusted with an almost febrile ardor and an evident enthusiasm for the work. The orchestra displayed great beauty of tone and general polish of a high order. It is a pleasure to see the Boston Symphony restored to its high estate after the vicissitudes which at one time seemed to threaten the future of the famous organization which has played such a great part in American musical history.

A Criticism of Critics

In a recent editorial the Musical Courier, a weekly publication devoted to musical affairs, has some very unkind things to say about critics in general, and Mr. Henderson and Mr. Olin Downes, in particular. It is scarcely necessary for me to leap to the defense of these distinguished writers, but some of the statements made in the Musical Courier's editorial invite comment in a column which is supposed to be devoted to a frank and fearless discussion of musical affairs in general as well as the reviewing of specific performances.

The Musical Courier expresses with a goodly amount of contempt the opinion that a music critic is only a musical reporter and should keep his place. Obviously musical reporting is the only form of criticism which is practicable in the pages of a publication which derives its greatest revenue from the large advertising contracts with individual artists and organizations who would very probably withdraw their business if they encountered adverse criticism in the columns of the advertising publication. But it seems questionable, to say the least, whether musical reporting is the only function demanded of a critic employed on an important daily paper. I believe on the contrary, that his knowledge and experience should be placed at the disposal of a general reading public in the shape of throwing what light he can on things connected with the music he reviews.

The second point in the Musical Courier editorial was an attack upon two articles written recently by Mr. Henderson and Mr. Olin Downes on singing and conducting from memory respectively. The Musical Courier, to put it briefly, would have us believe these gentlemen did not know what they were writing about. I did not happen to read Mr. Henderson's article on singing, but his long record can speak for itself.

I did read Mr. Downes' article on conducting from memory. Now, it may be that the editorial staff of the Musical Courier contains a writer who knows much more about conducting than I do, but, judging from what modest knowledge I have been able to pick up during a long career as a professional musician, during which I have played with most of the leading orchestras of Europe and America, besides living close to orchestra affairs, I should say that the Musical Courier's statements about Mr. Downes' article are untrue and unjust. Mr. Downes' article contained personal opinions which were musically and psychologically perfectly sound, and the subject and its treatment were eminently calculated to interest a public in the life of which orchestras play such a large part.

I have always felt that individual artists who wished to condemn musical criticism

ner certainly not to attack an individ

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 7 - 1926

AGAINST CACOPHONY.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Good for Mr. Higbie! His letter in a recent issue, that you brightly head "Driven Out of the Din," strikes a needed note of protest against the cheap and noisy "novelties" with which, as Mr. Higbie well says, New York audiences are being "bombarded." He uses an artilleryman's figure of speech, and he is right in so doing. The "music" is the music of bombshells!

I have been a subscriber to the concerts—for example—of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a good many years (first in Boston, and for about seventeen years at Carnegie Hall); and I should like the privilege of saying that Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart, Tchaikovsky, Schubert, Handel and their compeers are plenty good enough for me.

Maybe I'm old-fashioned—so be it! I'm also old-fashioned enough to like good literature (never mind a lot of names—you know whom I mean), good food, good manners and good company.

A combination of steam whistles and barnyard outcries isn't music—it is just foolish noise. Let's stick to music—real music. There's quite sufficient for variety. Programs are not difficult. I join with Mr. Higbie in his disgust with deafening discord and his call for the melodies of the masters.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SUBSCRIBER.
New York, Jan. 25, 1926.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 7 - 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall introduced in New York a sonata by Galliard orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg. The remainder of the program consisted of a repetition of Serge Prokofieff's third piano concerto, with the composer as pianist—the same work which had been played at the Boston Symphony concert of the preceding Thursday afternoon and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

The Galliard sonata is delicious music. The introduction is somewhat conventional, though broad and melodious enough in the manner of the period, which is that of the early eighteenth century. The music that follows, in fast and slow tempi, is charming, full of spirit and rhythm in the fast movements, eloquent in a manner not vouchsafed to composers of today in the andante. The performance was expressive, polished, aglow with the life and beauty of the composer's ideas.

For the sonata of this Galliard—John Ernest Gailliard, son of a French wigmaker—Steinberg has employed a small orchestra. (The sonata was instrumentated at Mr. Koussevitzky's request, for him.) Is the instrumentation wholly fitting as the garment of the thought? For this writer, in spite of the modest dimensions of the orchestra, it is a little commonplace, lacking in certain passages the transparency and lightness associated with eighteenth century music. Be this as it may, the sonata is delightful music and well worth the hearing.

Perhaps, also, this sonata was designed to take the curse off modernism from the concerto of Mr. Prokofieff. If this was the case, it was hardly required, at least for those who heard the concerto the second time. For a second hearing of this composition is disillusionizing, both as to its modernity and its value. The score would have been ultra-modern twenty years ago, but it is not that today. The ideas, on close scrutiny, are thin and poor material for anything but virtuoso tricks. Dissonance? Yes! But dissonance in itself is commonplace as consonance, and these dissonances, as we have said, are out of style. That is one of the dangers of dissonance. The composer must go so fast if he would keep apace of the latest fashion.

What gives a superficial and temporary pleasure is the go, the bounce, the nervousness and flambuoyancy of Mr. Prokofieff's piece. Also, he is a very brilliant pianist, with wrists of steel. As at the previous performance, the audience applauded him with relish. They applauded exciting rhythms, scintillating combinations of instruments, dazzling feats of bravura. All the same the piece as a whole is bunkum. It is not to be concluded from this that Mr. Prokofieff writes nothing but bunkum. But it is probable that he writes too much, and he is constantly confronted with his special facility for effects and with the demoralizing modern appetite for such things.

As for Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite, it requires no comment here, save the remark, that with all the adventures of Russian composers in the Orient, few have returned with such fascinating accounts as Rimsky-Korsakoff in his ("Antar") symphony and "Scheherazade" suite, and still fewer employ Oriental idioms and colors with the masterly restraint, variety, and fi- hat

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO,
N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 7 1926

President and Mrs. Coolidge Attend Tea.

Mrs. Collidge accompanied the President to the tea given by the National Board of Farm Organizations, Charles S. Bennett, chairman and host, Wednesday afternoon in the historic old house recently purchased by the board for their headquarters. Mrs. Dawes, wife of the Vice President, headed the receiving line which had in it also Mrs. Kellogg, wife of the Secretary of State; Mrs. Jardine, wife of the Secretary of Agriculture; the wives of a number of justices of the Supreme Court, senators, representatives and residents. The presence of the President and Mrs. Collidge was a delightful surprise all around as their coming had been unheralded. When they left, Mrs. Coolidge dropped the President at the White House and she went on to the concert of the Boston Symphony, where she occupied the presidential box and had with her Mrs. Charles S. Deneen, wife of the senator from Illinois. The first lady's costume that day was of a brownish sand colored silk with a hat of medium brim with long ostrich plume reaching from one side to the opposite shoulder.

Mrs. Melvin B. Ericson, daughter of the Vice President, who came unexpectedly last month to visit her parents had a quiet little visit, not accepting invitations for entertainments, but just staying at home and enjoying her visit. She left a few days ago for New York and from there will return to her home in Evanston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN

FEB 7 1926

ducted all afternoon.

CROWD HEARS BOSTON MEN.

At Carnegie Hall yesterday the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard by a capacity matinee audience.

Koussevitzky, following his plan established earlier in the week, arranged a programme of decidedly Russian flavor. And while some of its music may have been caviar to the general, its performance was of decided appeal to practically the entire house.

The novelty on the list was a graceful, delicate and enticing sonata by Gailliard, an eighteenth century French composer, but arranged for small modern orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, a Russian musician of considerable achievement.

The sonata was followed by Prokofieff's piano concerto, the composer at the piano, a work held over from Thursday night's programme.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE

Herald N.Y.

FEB 7 1926

Boston Symphony Plays Under Baton Of Koussevitzky

Serge Prokofieff Displays Notable Pianistic Talent in Third Concerto Here; "Scheherazade" Played

By F. D. Perkins

Three Russians, of whom two, Serge Koussevitzky and Serge Prokofieff were present and actively employed, figured yesterday in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third matinee of the season at Carnegie Hall. The third Russian was Rimsky-Korsakoff, whose "Scheherazade" made its first appearance upon one of Mr. Koussevitzky's Manhattan programs.

Mr. Prokofieff was again the soloist in his own third piano concerto, which followed an opening non-Russian number, a sonata in G minor, originally one of a set of six for cello or bassoon with a thorough bass for harpsichord by John Ernest Galliard, a contemporary of Handel, who, like Handel, was born in Germany, but pursued most of his career in England. But the free transcription for strings, flute, oboe and bassoon used yesterday is by a Russian, Maximilian Steinberg, pupil and son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Steinberg, who made this transcription especially for Mr. Koussevitzky, has wrought discreetly and effectively, his orchestral version retained the atmosphere of the time and place of a work typical of its period. Not dry, and with a distinct liveliness in the allegros which followed respectively a lento and an andante, the work, heard at least in this version, for the first time here, seemed a useful addition to our eighteenth century orchestral repertoire.

The Serges fared very well in the Prokofieff concerto, but, in spite of the well applied vigor, technical brilliance and interpretative skill of Mr. Prokofieff's playing, the work did not seem very interesting. Its flavor, very mildly, almost sweetly acid, gave at least one hearer an impression of individuality, but lack of variety of color. But it gave Mr. Pokofieff ample chance to display his notable pianistic talent.

"Scheherazade," under the Kousevitzky baton, offered no marked variations in the first and third movements from the general average of readings under other leaders. The second movement, the Calendar's Tale, had some idiosyncracies of tempo in accentuated changes and an unusual retarding followed by hurrying of the thrumming of the strings under the cadenza-like passages for woodwind; the Feast at Bagdad went mostly at a swift and furious pace, winding up with a resounding and effective crash. These two movements, very well played, gave an impression of distinct liveliness; the dash of the finale was especially effective.

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
NEW YORK

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JUN 2 7

A number of local people interested in music have been taking advantage of the delightful and ever increasing popular "Pop" concerts which have been held and still are being held in Boston Symphony hall.

The variance of the programs to suit the tastes of all who have an interest in music as well as the distinguished personnel of the orchestra is rapidly rating these concerts as one of the foremost musical attractions in Boston. People are travelling from the surrounding towns to the concerts and the Man About Town has yet to hear any who have done so, make anything other than a commendary remark as to the excellence of the managing and program of the concerts.

Several more concerts yet remain on the program for the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

FEB 7 1926

Russian Score Feature of Symphony Program

Koussevitzky to Introduce Scriabin's "The Divine Poem" With its Mystic Beauty at Capitol Theater Today.

A remarkable score, Scriabin's "The Divine Poem," will be a feature of the appearance of Serge Koussevitzky here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a concert in the Capitol Theater this afternoon at 3 o'clock. This Russian celebrity, now in his second season in America at the head of this orchestra, was first heard in the "Divine Poem," in this country when he performed it in Boston last week. Scriabin, the late Russian composer, may be characterized as an individualist, an idealist, and a mystic in tones. The score is in three parts. The first, "Luttes," ("Struggles"), depicts the soul torn between confident affirmation and doubt. The second, "Voluptes" has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy in merging into nature." The third, "Jeu divan," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed. Koussevitzky was a close friend of Scriabin in Russia, where in full sympathetic understanding with this remarkable composer, he performed his principal scores. Scriabin traveled with Koussevitzky on one of his famous voyages along the Volga river.

The French school will be represented at this concert by Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." Debussy is perhaps best known by this setting in tones of Mallarme's poem, in which the faun (characterized by the flute) tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs. This music of mood and subtle suggestion is in its way more potent than any poetry of words could be. Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of Debussy. He was the first to make the Frenchman's music known in Russia.

There will be one number of Wagner, the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Using the principal themes of this music drama, and stating them in their proper order, Wagner made his prelude a sort of condensation of the entire work. The lightness and festive mood with alternate passages of romantic loveliness which characterize Wagner's one humorous music drama are as eloquently, if more tersely, expressed in the brilliant prelude.

The program will open brilliantly with Berlioz's overture to "Benvenute Cellini." The theater box-office opens at noon today. Reservations may be made from 10 a. m. or by calling 2-0375.

175

Music : Olga Samaroff's Daily Column — Boston Symphony Orchestra

IN THE fifth book of the Kasidah, Haji Abdu El-yezdi, as Sir Richard Burton liked to call himself in his Oriental literary incarnation, writes:

There is no Good, there is no Bad;
These be the whims of mortal will:
What works me weal that I call "good";
What harms and hurts I hold as "ill";

They change with place, they shift with race;
And in the veriest span of Time,
Each Vice has worn a Virtue's crown;
All Good was banned as Sin or Crime.

Mme. Olga Samaroff

Sir Richard was undoubtedly thinking life and ethics, but as I listened to Prokofieff's piano concerto last night the lines came into my mind as highly applicable to art, for the thing I liked least in the work was a too frank and reminiscent return to "virtuous" diatonic romanticism in parts of the last movement, while the things which seemed vital, personal and stirring would have been considered highly iniquitous only a few years ago, and perhaps even today might invite some censure from the ultra-conservative. There seems no doubt, however, that Prokofieff in his third piano concerto, played last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the composer at the piano, is much less dissonant and much less concerned with innovation than he was in his first concerto, which I heard some years ago in private. Prokofieff is concerned with making music, and, in my opinion, one thing which gives him his real importance among modern composers is the fact that his ideas and his idiom fit. He thinks and feels the way he writes and he could not express himself otherwise.

This sincerity is in itself convincing, but it has double value when the work in question contains as much force and imagination as Mr. Prokofieff's concerto, which, by the way, he played superbly, with intense musical feeling and a sweeping virtuosity, in the best sense of the word. I liked the second movement best. When a modern composer can succeed in making a movement in variation form interesting throughout, it seems to mean that he has something to say. The thematic and rhythmic shapes of which this whole concerto as a musical structure is built seemed to me highly individual and often exciting. It is a work I should very much like to hear again, and it was received with great warmth by the audience.

Fate has decreed that I should hear Mr. Koussevitzky only in modern or Russian music! I read accounts of his giving other programs, but whenever time and space

They seem to keep alive the vision of ecstasy which Scriabine undoubtedly had and put into the essence of the work, while the listener at certain points can scarcely escape the sense of length and repetition which are deadly enemies of ecstasy. For this reason, in spite of a strong admiration for the inherent sensuous beauty of the "Pœme de l'Extase," I usually come away from a performance of it with mixed and baffled feelings.

Mr. Koussevitzky condusted with an almost febrile ardor and an evident enthusiasm for the work. The orchestra displayed great beauty of tone and general polish of a high order. It is a pleasure to see the Boston Symphony restored to its high estate after the vicissitudes which at one time seemed to threaten the future of the famous organization which has played such a great part in American musical history.

A Criticism of Critics

In a recent editorial. the Musical Courier, a weekly publication devoted to musical affairs, has some very unkind things to say about critics in general, and Mr. Henderson and Mr. Olin Downes, in particular. It is scarcely necessary for me to leap to the defense of these distinguished writers, but some of the statements made in the Musical Courier's editorial invite comment in a column which is supposed to be devoted to a frank and fearless discussion of musical affairs in general as well as the reviewing of specific performances.

The Musical Courier expresses with a goodly amount of contempt the opinion that a music critic is only a musical reporter and should keep his place. Obviously musical reporting is the only form of criticism which is practicable in the pages of a publication which derives its greatest revenue from the large advertising contracts with individual artists and organizations who would very probably withdraw their business if they encountered adverse criticism in the columns of the advertising publication. But it seems questionable, to say the least, whether musical reporting is the only function demanded of a critic employed on an important daily paper. I believe on the contrary, that his knowledge and experience should be placed at the disposal of a general reading public in the shape of throwing what light he can on things connected with the music he reviews.

The second point in the Musical Courier editorial was an attack upon two articles written recently by Mr. Henderson and Mr. Olin Downes on singing and conducting from memory respectively. The Musical Courier, to put it briefly, would have us believe these gentlemen did not know what they were writing about. I did not happen to read Mr. Henderson's article on singing, but his long record can speak for itself.

I did read Mr. Downes' article on conducting from memory. Now, it may be that the editorial staff of the Musical Courier contains a writer who knows much more about conducting than I do, but, judging from what modest knowledge I have been able to pick up during a long career as a professional musician, during which I have played with most of the leading orchestras of Europe and America, besides living close to orchestra affairs, I should say that the Musical Courier's statements about Mr. Downes' article are untrue and unjust. Mr. Downes' article contained personal opinions which were musically and psychologically perfectly sound, and the subject and its treatment were eminently calculated to interest a public in the life of which orchestras play such a large part.

I have always felt that individual artists who wished to condemn musical criticism

ner certainly not to attack an individu

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 7 - 1926

AGAINST CACOPHONY.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Good for Mr. Higbie! His letter in a recent issue, that you brightly head, "Driven Out of the Din," strikes a needed note of protest against the cheap and noisy "novelties" with which, as Mr. Higbie well says, New York audiences are being "bombarded." He uses an artilleryman's figure of speech, and he is right in so doing. The "music" is the music of bombshells!

I have been a subscriber to the concerts—for example—of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a good many years (first in Boston, and for about seventeen years at Carnegie Hall); and I should like the privilege of saying that Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart, Tchaikovsky, Schubert, Handel and their compeers are plenty good enough for me.

Maybe I'm old-fashioned—so be it! I'm also old-fashioned enough to like good literature (never mind a lot of names—you know whom I mean), good food, good manners and good company.

A combination of steam whistles and barnyard outcries isn't music—it is just foolish noise. Let's stick to music—real music. There's quite sufficient for variety. Programs are not difficult. I join with Mr. Higbie in his disgust with deafening discord and his call for the melodies of the masters.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SUBSCRIBER.
New York, Jan. 25, 1926.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 7 - 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall introduced in New York a sonata by Galliard orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg. The remainder of the program consisted of a repetition of Serge Prokofieff's third piano concerto, with the composer as pianist—the same work which had been played at the Boston Symphony concert of the preceding Thursday afternoon and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

The Galliard sonata is delicious music. The introduction is somewhat conventional, though broad and melodious enough in the manner of the period, which is that of the early eighteenth century. The music that follows, in fast and slow tempi, is charming, full of spirit and rhythm in the fast movements, eloquent in a manner not vouchsafed to composers of today in the andante. The performance was expressive, polished, aglow with the life and beauty of the composer's ideas.

For the sonata of this Galliard—John Ernest Gaillard, son of a French wigmaker—Steinberg has employed a small orchestra. (The sonata was instrumentated at Mr. Koussevitzky's request, for him.) Is the instrumentation wholly fitting as the garment of the thought? For this writer, in spite of the modest dimensions of the orchestra, it is a little commonplace, lacking in certain passages the transparency and lightness associated with eighteenth century music. Be this as it may, the sonata is delightful music and well worth the hearing.

Perhaps, also, this sonata was designed to take the curse off modernism from the concerto of Mr. Prokofieff. If this was the case, it was hardly required, at least for those who heard the concerto the second time. For a second hearing of this composition is disillusionizing, both as to its modernity and its value. The score would have been ultra-modern twenty years ago, but it is not that today. The ideas, on close scrutiny, are thin and poor material for anything but virtuoso tricks. Dissonance? Yes! But dissonance in itself is commonplace as consonance, and these dissonances, as we have said, are out of style. That is one of the dangers of dissonance. The composer must go so fast if he would keep apace of the latest fashion.

What gives a superficial and temporary pleasure is the go, the bounce, the nervousness and flambuoyancy of Mr. Prokofieff's piece. Also, he is a very brilliant pianist, with wrists of steel. As at the previous performance, the audience applauded him with relish. They applauded exciting rhythms, scintillating combinations of instruments, dazzling feats of bravura. All the same the piece as a whole is bunkum. It is not to be concluded from this that Mr. Prokofieff writes nothing but bunkum. But it is probable that he writes too much, and he is constantly confronted with his special facility for effects and with the demoralizing modern appetite for such things.

As for Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite, it requires no comment here, save the remark, that with all the adventures of Russian composers in the Orient, few have returned with such fascinating accounts as Rimsky-Korsakoff in his ("Antar") symphony and "Scheherazade" suite, and still fewer employ Oriental idioms and colors with the masterly restraint, variety, and fi-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN

FEB 7 1926

ducted all afternoon.

CROWD HEARS BOSTON MEN.

At Carnegie Hall yesterday the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard by a capacity matinee audience.

Koussevitzky, following his plan established earlier in the week, arranged a programme of decidedly Russian flavor. And while some of its music may have been caviar to the general, its performance was of decided appeal to practically the entire house.

The novelty on the list was a graceful, delicate and enticing sonata by Gailliard, an eighteenth century French composer, b... arranged for small modern orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, a Russian musician of considerable achievement.

The sonata was followed by Prokofieff's piano concerto, the composer at the piano, a work held over from Thursday night's programme.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y. TIMES

FEB 7 1926

President and Mrs. Coolidge Attend Tea.

Mrs. Collidge accompanied the President to the tea given by the National Board of Farm Organizations, Charles S. Bennett, chairman and host, Wednesday afternoon in the historic old house recently purchased by the board for their headquarters. Mrs. Dawes, wife of the Vice President, headed the receiving line which had in it also Mrs. Kellogg, wife of the Secretary of State; Mrs. Jardine, wife of the Secretary of Agriculture; the wives of a number of justices of the Supreme Court, senators, representatives and residents. The presence of the President and Mrs. Collidge was a delightful surprise all around as their coming had been unheralded. When they left, Mrs. Coolidge dropped the President at the White House and she went on to the concert of the Boston Symphony, where she occupied the presidential box and had with her Mrs. Charles S. Deneen, wife of the senator from Illinois. The first lady's costume that day was of a brownish sand colored silk with a hat of medium brim with long ostrich plume reaching from one side to the opposite shoulder.

Mrs. Melvin B. Ericson, daughter of the Vice President, who came unexpectedly last month to visit her parents had a quiet little visit, not accepting invitations for entertainments, but just staying at home and enjoying her visit. She left a few days ago for New York and from there will return to her home in Evanston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE

FEB 7 1926

Boston Symphony Plays Under Baton Of Koussevitzky

Serge Prokofieff Displays Notable Pianistic Talent in Third Concerto Here; "Scheherazade" Played

By F. D. Perkins

Three Russians, of whom two, Serge Koussevitzky and Serge Prokofieff were present and actively employed, figured yesterday in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third matinee of the season at Carnegie Hall. The third Russian was Rimsky-Korsakoff, whose "Scheherazade" made its first appearance upon one of Mr. Koussevitzky's Manhattan programs.

Mr. Prokofieff was again the soloist in his own third piano concerto, which followed an opening non-Russian number, a sonata in G minor, originally one of a set of six for cello or bassoon with a thorough bass for harpsichord by John Ernest Galliard, a contemporary of Handel, who, like Handel, was born in Germany, but pursued most of his career in England. But the free transcription for strings, flute, oboe and bassoon used yesterday is by a Russian, Maximilian Steinberg, pupil and son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Steinberg, who made this transcription especially for Mr. Koussevitzky, has wrought discreetly and effectively, his orchestral version retained the atmosphere of the time and place of a work typical of its period. Not dry, and with a distinct liveliness in the allegros which followed respectively a lento and an andante, the work, heard at least in this version, for the first time here, seemed a useful addition to our eighteenth century orchestral repertoire.

The Serges fared very well in the Prokofieff concerto, but, in spite of the well applied vigor, technical brilliance and interpretative skill of Mr. Prokofieff's playing, the work did not seem very interesting. Its flavor, very mildly, almost sweetly acid, gave at least one hearer an impression of individuality, but lack of variety of color. But it gave Mr. Pokofieff ample chance to display his notable pianistic talent.

"Scheherazade," under the Kousevitzky baton, offered no marked variations in the first and third movements from the general average of readings under other leaders. The second movement, the Calendar's Tale, had some idiosyncracies of tempo in accentuated changes and an unusual retarding followed by hurrying of the thrumming of the strings under the cadenza-like passages for woodwind; the Feast at Bagdad went mostly at a swift and furious pace, winding up with a resounding and effective crash. These two movements, very well played, gave an impression of distinct liveliness; the dash of the finale was especially effective.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

FEB 7 1926

Russian Score Feature of Symphony Program

Koussevitzky to Introduce Scriabin's "The Divine Poem" With its Mystic Beauty at Capitol Theater Today.

A remarkable score, Scriabin's "The Divine Poem," will be a feature of the appearance of Serge Koussevitzky here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a concert in the Capitol Theater this afternoon at 3 o'clock. This Russian celebrity, now in his second season in America at the head of this orchestra, was first heard in the "Divine Poem," in this country when he performed it in Boston last week. Scriabin, the late Russian composer, may be characterized as an individualist, an idealist, and a mystic in tones. The score is in three parts. The first, "Luttes," ("Struggles"), depicts the soul torn between confident affirmation and doubt. The second, "Voluptes" has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy in merging into nature." The third, "Jeu divan," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed. Koussevitzky was a close friend of Scriabin in Russia, where in full sympathetic understanding with this remarkable composer, he performed his principal scores. Scriabin traveled with Koussevitzky on one of his famous voyages along the Volga river.

The French school will be represented at this concert by Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." Debussy is perhaps best known by this setting in tones of Mallarme's poem, in which the faun (characterized by the flute) tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs. This music of mood and subtle suggestion is in its way more potent than any poetry of words could be. Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of Debussy. He was the first to make the Frenchman's music known in Russia.

There will be one number of Wagner, the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Using the principal themes of this music drama, and stating them in their proper order, Wagner made his prelude a sort of condensation of the entire work. The lightness and festive mood with alternate passages of romantic loveliness which characterize Wagner's one humorous music drama are as eloquently, if more tersely, expressed in the brilliant prelude.

The program will open brilliantly with Berlioz's overture to "Benvenute Cellini." The theater box-office opens at noon today. Reservations may be made from 10 a. m. or by calling 2-0375.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JUN 2 7

A number of local people interested in music have been taking advantage of the delightful and ever increasing popular "Pop" concerts which have been held and still are being held in Boston Symphony hall.

The variance of the programs to suit the tastes of all who have an interest in music as well as the distinguished personnel of the orchestra is rapidly rating these concerts as one of the foremost musical attractions in Boston. People are travelling from the surrounding towns to the concerts and the Man About Town has yet to hear any who have done so, make anything other than a commendary remark as to the excellence of the managing and program of the concerts.

Several more concerts yet remain on the program for the season.

175

Music : Olga Samaroff's Daily Column — Boston Symphony Orchestra

IN THE fifth book of the Kasidah, Haji Abdu El-yezdi, as Sir Richard Burton liked to call himself in his Oriental literary incarnation, writes:

There is no Good, there is no Bad;
These be the whims of mortal will:
What works me weal that I call "good";
What harms and hurts I hold as "ill";
They change with place, they shift with race;
And in the veriest span of Time,
Each Vice has worn a Virtue's crown;
All Good was banned as Sin or Crime.

Mme. Olga Samaroff

Sir Richard was undoubtedly thinking life and ethics, but as I listened to Prokofieff's piano concerto last night the lines came into my mind as highly applicable to art, for the thing I liked least in the work was a too frank and reminiscent return to "virtuous" diatonic romanticism in parts of the last movement, while the things which seemed vital, personal and stirring would have been considered highly iniquitous only a few years ago, and perhaps even today might invite some censure from the ultra-conservative. There seems no doubt, however, that Prokofieff in his third piano concerto, played last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the composer at the piano, is much less dissonant and much less concerned with innovation than he was in his first concerto, which I heard some years ago in private. Prokofieff is concerned with making music, and, in my opinion, one thing which gives him his real importance among modern composers is the fact that his ideas and his idiom fit. He thinks and feels the way he writes and he could not express himself otherwise.

This sincerity is in itself convincing, but it has double value when the work in question contains as much force and imagination as Mr. Prokofieff's concerto, which, by the way, he played superbly, with intense musical feeling and a sweeping virtuosity, in the best sense of the word. I liked the second movement best. When a modern composer can succeed in making a movement in variation form interesting throughout, it seems to mean that he has something to say. The thematic and rhythmic shapes of which this whole concerto as a musical structure is built seemed to me highly individual and often exciting. It is a work I should very much like to hear again, and it was received with great warmth by the audience.

Fate has decreed that I should hear Mr. Koussevitzky only in modern or Russian music! I read accounts of his giving other programs, but whenever time and space permit

They seem to keep alive the vision of ecstasy which Scriabine undoubtedly had and put into the essence of the work, while the listener at certain points can scarcely escape the sense of length and repetition which are deadly enemies of ecstasy. For this reason, in spite of a strong admiration for the inherent sensuous beauty of the "Pœme de l'Extase," I usually come away from a performance of it with mixed and baffled feelings.

Mr. Koussevitzky condusted with an almost febrile ardor and an evident enthusiasm for the work. The orchestra displayed great beauty of tone and general polish of a high order. It is a pleasure to see the Boston Symphony restored to its high estate after the vicissitudes which at one time seemed to threaten the future of the famous organization which has played such a great part in American musical history.

A Criticism of Critics

In a recent editorial. the Musical Courier, a weekly publication devoted to musical affairs, has some very unkind things to say about critics in general, and Mr. Henderson and Mr. Olin Downes, in particular. It is scarcely necessary for me to leap to the defense of these distinguished writers, but some of the statements made in the Musical Courier's editorial invite comment in a column which is supposed to be devoted to a frank and fearless discussion of musical affairs in general as well as the reviewing of specific performances.

The Musical Courier expresses with a goodly amount of contempt the opinion that a music critic is only a musical reporter and should keep his place. Obviously musical reporting is the only form of criticism which is practicable in the pages of a publication which derives its greatest revenue from the large advertising contracts with individual artists and organizations who would very probably withdraw their business if they encountered adverse criticism in the columns of the advertising publication. But it seems questionable, to say the least, whether musical reporting is the only function demanded of a critic employed on an important daily paper. I believe on the contrary, that his knowledge and experience should be placed at the disposal of a general reading public in the shape of throwing what light he can on things connected with the music he reviews.

The second point in the Musical Courier editorial was an attack upon two articles written recently by Mr. Henderson and Mr. Olin Downes on singing and conducting from memory respectively. The Musical Courier, to put it briefly, would have us believe these gentlemen did not know what they were writing about. I did not happen to read Mr. Henderson's article on singing, but his long record can speak for itself.

I did read Mr. Downes' article on conducting from memory. Now, it may be that the editorial staff of the Musical Courier contains a writer who knows much more about conducting than I do, but, judging from what modest knowledge I have been able to pick up during a long career as a professional musician, during which I have played with most of the leading orchestras of Europe and America, besides living close to orchestra affairs, I should say that the Musical Courier's statements about Mr. Downes' article are untrue and unjust. Mr. Downes' article contained personal opinions which were musically and psychologically perfectly sound, and the subject and its treatment were eminently calculated to interest a public in the life of which orchestras play such a large part.

I have always felt that individual artists who wished to condemn musical criticism from adows upon mment is at an ad-are filled es would ts adver-

n around centers,
ducted all afternoon. Mr. Downes in a manner certainly not to attack an individu

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 7 - 1926

AGAINST CACOPHONY.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Good for Mr. Higbie! His letter in a recent issue, that you brightly head "Driven Out of the Din," strikes a needed note of protest against the cheap and noisy "novelties" with which, as Mr. Higbie well says, New York audiences are being "bombarded." He uses an artilleryman's figure of speech, and he is right in so doing. The "music" is the music of bombshells!

I have been a subscriber to the concerts—for example—of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a good many years (first in Boston, and for about seventeen years at Carnegie Hall); and I should like the privilege of saying that Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart, Tchaikovsky, Schubert, Handel and their compeers are plenty good enough for me.

Maybe I'm old-fashioned—so be it! I'm also old-fashioned enough to like good literature (never mind a lot of names—you know whom I mean), good food, good manners and good company.

A combination of steam whistles and barnyard outcries isn't music—it is just foolish noise. Let's stick to music—real music. There's quite sufficient for variety. Programs are not difficult. I join with Mr. Higbie in his disgust with deafening discord and his call for the melodies of the masters.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SUBSCRIBER.
New York, Jan. 25, 1926.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN

FEB 7 1926

CROWD HEARS BOSTON MEN.

At Carnegie Hall yesterday the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard by a capacity matinee audience.

Koussevitzky, following his plan established earlier in the week, arranged a programme of decidedly Russian flavor. And while some of its music may have been caviar to the general, its performance was of decided appeal to practically the entire house.

The novelty on the list was a graceful, delicate and enticing sonata by Gailliard, an eighteenth century French composer, but arranged for small modern orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, a Russian musician of considerable achievement.

The sonata was followed by Prokofieff's piano concerto, the composer at the piano, a work held over from Thursday night's programme.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 7 - 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall introduced in New York a sonata by Galliard orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg. The remainder of the program consisted of a repetition of Serge Prokofieff's third piano concerto, with the composer as pianist—the same work which had been played at the Boston Symphony concert of the preceding Thursday afternoon and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

The Galliard sonata is delicious music. The introduction is somewhat conventional, though broad and melodious enough in the manner of the period, which is that of the early eighteenth century. The music that follows, in fast and slow tempi, is charming, full of spirit and rhythm in the fast movements, eloquent in a manner not vouchsafed to composers of today in the andante. The performance was expressive, polished, aglow with the life and beauty of the composer's ideas.

For the sonata of this Galliard—John Ernest Gaillard, son of a French wigmaker—Steinberg has employed a small orchestra. (The sonata was instrumentated at Mr. Koussevitzky's request, for him.) Is the instrumentation wholly fitting as the garment of the thought? For this writer, in spite of the modest dimensions of the orchestra, it is a little commonplace, lacking in certain passages the transparency and lightness associated with eighteenth century music. Be this as it may, the sonata is delightful music and well worth the hearing.

Perhaps, also, this sonata was designed to take the curse off modernism from the concerto of Mr. Prokofieff. If this was the case, it was hardly required, at least for those who heard the concerto the second time. For a second hearing of this composition is disillusionizing, both as to its modernity and its value. The score would have been ultra-modern twenty years ago, but it is not that today. The ideas, on close scrutiny, are thin and poor material for anything but virtuoso tricks. Dissonance? Yes! But dissonance in itself is commonplace as consonance, and these dissonances, as we have said, are out of style. That is one of the dangers of dissonance. The composer must go so fast if he would keep apace of the latest fashion.

What gives a superficial and temporary pleasure is the go, the bounce, the nervousness and flambuoyancy of Mr. Prokofieff's piece. Also, he is a very brilliant pianist, with wrists of steel. As at the previous performance, the audience applauded him with relish. They applauded exciting rhythms, scintillating combinations of instruments, dazzling feats of bravura. All the same the piece as a whole is bunkum. It is not to be concluded from this that Mr. Prokofieff writes nothing but bunkum. But it is probable that he writes too much, and he is constantly confronted with his special facility for effects and with the demoralizing modern appetite for such things.

As for Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite, it requires no comment here, save the remark, that with all the adventures of Russian composers in the Orient, few have returned with such fascinating accounts as Rimsky-Korsakoff in his ("Antar") symphony and "Scheherazade" suite, and still fewer employ Oriental idioms and colors with the masterly restraint, variety, and fi- hat

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO,
N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 7 1926

President and Mrs. Coolidge Attend Tea.

Mrs. Collidge accompanied the President to the tea given by the National Board of Farm Organizations, Charles S. Bennett, chairman and host, Wednesday afternoon in the historic old house recently purchased by the board for their headquarters. Mrs. Dawes, wife of the Vice President, headed the receiving line which had in it also Mrs. Kellogg, wife of the Secretary of State; Mrs. Jardine, wife of the Secretary of Agriculture; the wives of a number of justices of the Supreme Court, senators, representatives and residents. The presence of the President and Mrs. Collidge was a delightful surprise all around as their coming had been unheralded. When they left, Mrs. Coolidge dropped the President at the White House and she went on to the concert of the Boston Symphony, where she occupied the presidential box and had with her Mrs. Charles S. Deneen, wife of the senator from Illinois. The first lady's costume that day was of a brownish sand colored silk with a hat of medium brim with long ostrich plume reaching from one side to the opposite shoulder.

Mrs. Melvin B. Ericson, daughter of the Vice President, who came unexpectedly last month to visit her parents had a quiet little visit, not accepting invitations for entertainments, but just staying at home and enjoying her visit. She left a few days ago for New York and from there will return to her home in Evanston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE

FEB 7 1926

Boston Symphony Plays Under Baton Of Koussevitzky

Serge Prokofieff Displays Notable Pianistic Talent in Third Concerto Here; "Scheherazade" Played

By F. D. Perkins

Three Russians, of whom two, Serge Koussevitzky and Serge Prokofieff were present and actively employed, figured yesterday in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third matinee of the season at Carnegie Hall. The third Russian was Rimsky-Korsakoff, whose "Scheherazade" made its first appearance upon one of Mr. Koussevitzky's Manhattan programs.

Mr. Prokofieff was again the soloist in his own third piano concerto, which followed an opening non-Russian number, a sonata in G minor, originally one of a set of six for cello or bassoon with a thorough bass for harpsichord by John Ernest Galliard, a contemporary of Handel, who, like Handel, was born in Germany, but pursued most of his career in England. But the free transcription for strings, flute, oboe and bassoon used yesterday is by a Russian, Maximilian Steinberg, pupil and son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Steinberg, who made this transcription especially for Mr. Koussevitzky, has wrought discreetly and effectively, his orchestral version retained the atmosphere of the time and place of a work typical of its period. Not dry, and with a distinct liveliness in the allegros which followed respectively a lento and an andante, the work, heard at least in this version, for the first time here, seemed a useful addition to our eighteenth century orchestral repertoire.

The Serges fared very well in the Prokofieff concerto, but, in spite of the well applied vigor, technical brilliance and interpretative skill of Mr. Prokofieff's playing, the work did not seem very interesting. Its flavor, very mildly, almost sweetly acid, gave at least one hearer an impression of individuality, but lack of variety of color. But it gave Mr. Pokofieff ample chance to display his notable pianistic talent.

"Scheherazade," under the Kousevitzky baton, offered no marked variations in the first and third movements from the general average of readings under other leaders. The second movement, the Calendar's Tale, had some idiosyncracies of tempo in accentuated changes and an unusual retarding followed by hurrying of the thrumming of the strings under the cadenza-like passages for woodwind; the Feast at Bagdad went mostly at a swift and furious pace, winding up with a resounding and effective crash. These two movements, very well played, gave an impression of distinct liveliness; the dash of the finale was especially effective.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JUN 27

A number of local people interested in music have been taking advantage of the delightful and ever increasing popular "Pop" concerts which have been held and still are being held in Boston Symphony hall.

The variance of the programs to suit the tastes of all who have an interest in music as well as the distinguished personnel of the orchestra is rapidly rating these concerts as one of the foremost musical attractions in Boston. People are travelling from the surrounding towns to the concerts and the Man About Town has yet to hear any who have done so, make anything other than a commendary remark as to the excellence of the managing and program of the concerts.

Several more concerts yet remain on the program for the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

FEB 7 1926

Russian Score Feature of Symphony Program

Koussevitzky to Introduce Scriabin's "The Divine Poem" With its Mystic Beauty at Capitol Theater Today.

A remarkable score, Scriabin's "The Divine Poem," will be a feature of the appearance of Serge Koussevitzky here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a concert in the Capitol Theater this afternoon at 3 o'clock. This Russian celebrity, now in his second season in America at the head of this orchestra, was first heard in the "Divine Poem," in this country when he performed it in Boston last week. Scriabin, the late Russian composer, may be characterized as an individualist, an idealist, and a mystic in tones. The score is in three parts. The first, "Luttes," ("Struggles"), depicts the soul torn between confident affirmation and doubt. The second, "Voluptes" has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy in merging into nature." The third, "Jeu divan," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed. Koussevitzky was a close friend of Scriabin in Russia, where in full sympathetic understanding with this remarkable composer, he performed his principal scores. Scriabin traveled with Koussevitzky on one of his famous voyages along the Volga river.

The French school will be represented at this concert by Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." Debussy is perhaps best known by this setting in tones of Mallarme's poem, in which the faun (characterized by the flute) tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs. This music of mood and subtle suggestion is in its way more potent than any poetry of words could be. Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of Debussy. He was the first to make the Frenchman's music known in Russia.

There will be one number of Wagner, the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Using the principal themes of this music drama, and stating them in their proper order, Wagner made his prelude a sort of condensation of the entire work. The lightness and festive mood with alternate passages of romantic loveliness which characterize Wagner's one humorous music drama are as eloquently, if more tersely, expressed in the brilliant prelude.

The program will open brilliantly with Berlioz's overture to "Benvenute Cellini." The theater box-office opens at noon today. Reservations may be made from 10 a. m. or by calling 2-0375.

175

Music : Olga Samaroff's Daily Column — Boston Symphony Orchestra

IN THE fifth book of the Kasidah, Haji Abdu El-yezdi, as Sir Richard Burton liked to call himself in his Oriental literary incarnation, writes:

There is no Good, there is no Bad;
  These be the whims of mortal will:
What works me weal that I call "good";
  What harms and hurts I hold as "ill";

They change with place, they shift with race;
  And in the veriest span of Time,
Each Vice has worn a Virtue's crown;
  All Good was banned as Sin or Crime.

Mme. Olga Samaroff

Sir Richard was undoubtedly thinking life and ethics, but as I listened to Prokofieff's piano concerto last night the lines came into my mind as highly applicable to art, for the thing I liked least in the work was a too frank and reminiscent return to "virtuous" diatonic romanticism in parts of the last movement, while the things which seemed vital, personal and stirring would have been considered highly iniquitous only a few years ago, and perhaps even today might invite some censure from the ultra-conservative. There seems no doubt, however, that Prokofieff in his third piano concerto, played last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the composer at the piano, is much less dissonant and much less concerned with innovation than he was in his first concerto, which I heard some years ago in private. Prokofieff is concerned with making music, and, in my opinion, one thing which gives him his real importance among modern composers is the fact that his ideas and his idiom fit. He thinks and feels the way he writes and he could not express himself otherwise.

This sincerity is in itself convincing, but it has double value when the work in question contains as much force and imagination as Mr. Prokofieff's concerto, which, by the way, he played superbly, with intense musical feeling and a sweeping virtuosity, in the best sense of the word. I liked the second movement best. When a modern composer can succeed in making a movement in variation form interesting throughout, it seems to mean that he has something to say. The thematic and rhythmic shapes of which this whole concerto as a musical structure is built seemed to me highly individual and often exciting. It is a work I should very much like to hear again, and it was received with great warmth by the audience.

Fate has decreed that I should hear Mr. Koussevitzky only in modern or Russian music! I read accounts of his giving other programs, but whenever time and space permit me to h[illegible] hap-

They seem to keep alive the vision of ecstasy which Scriabine undoubtedly had and put into the essence of the work, while the listener at certain points can scarcely escape the sense of length and repetition which are deadly enemies of ecstasy. For this reason, in spite of a strong admiration for the inherent sensuous beauty of the "Pœme de l'Extase," I usually come away from a performance of it with mixed and baffled feelings.

Mr. Koussevitzky condusted with an almost febrile ardor and an evident enthusiasm for the work. The orchestra displayed great beauty of tone and general polish of a high order. It is a pleasure to see the Boston Symphony restored to its high estate after the vicissitudes which at one time seemed to threaten the future of the famous organization which has played such a great part in American musical history.

A Criticism of Critics

In a recent editorial, the Musical Courier, a weekly publication devoted to musical affairs, has some very unkind things to say about critics in general, and Mr. Henderson and Mr. Olin Downes, in particular. It is scarcely necessary for me to leap to the defense of these distinguished writers, but some of the statements made in the Musical Courier's editorial invite comment in a column which is supposed to be devoted to a frank and fearless discussion of musical affairs in general as well as the reviewing of specific performances.

The Musical Courier expresses with a goodly amount of contempt the opinion that a music critic is only a musical reporter and should keep his place. Obviously musical reporting is the only form of criticism which is practicable in the pages of a publication which derives its greatest revenue from the large advertising contracts with individual artists and organizations who would very probably withdraw their business if they encountered adverse criticism in the columns of the advertising publication. But it seems questionable, to say the least, whether musical reporting is the only function demanded of a critic employed on an important daily paper. I believe on the contrary, that his knowledge and experience should be placed at the disposal of a general reading public in the shape of throwing what light he can on things connected with the music he reviews.

The second point in the Musical Courier editorial was an attack upon two articles written recently by Mr. Henderson and Mr. Olin Downes on singing and conducting from memory respectively. The Musical Courier, to put it briefly, would have us believe these gentlemen did not know what they were writing about. I did not happen to read Mr. Henderson's article on singing, but his long record can speak for itself.

I did read Mr. Downes' article on conducting from memory. Now, it may be that the editorial staff of the Musical Courier contains a writer who knows much more about conducting than I do, but, judging from what modest knowledge I have been able to pick up during a long career as a professional musician, during which I have played with most of the leading orchestras of Europe and America, besides living close to orchestra affairs, I should say that the Musical Courier's statements about Mr. Downes' article are untrue and unjust. Mr. Downes' article contained personal opinions which were musically and psychologically perfectly sound, and the subject and its treatment were eminently calculated to interest a public in the life of which orchestras play such a large part.

I have always felt that individual artists who wished to condemn musical criticism [illegible] from ad- [illegible] ows upon [illegible] mment is [illegible] at an ad- [illegible] are filled [illegible] es would [illegible] ts adver- [illegible] n around [illegible] centers, [illegible] Mr. Downes in a manner certainly not to attack an individu[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 7 - 1926

AGAINST CACOPHONY.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Good for Mr. Higbie! His letter in a recent issue, that you brightly head, "Driven Out of the Din," strikes a needed note of protest against the cheap and noisy "novelties" with which, as Mr. Higbie well says, New York audiences are being "bombarded." He uses an artilleryman's figure of speech, and he is right in so doing. The "music" is the music of bombshells!

I have been a subscriber to the concerts—for example—of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a good many years (first in Boston, and for about seventeen years at Carnegie Hall); and I should like the privilege of saying that Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart, Tchaikovsky, Schubert, Handel and their compeers are plenty good enough for me.

Maybe I'm old-fashioned—so be it! I'm also old-fashioned enough to like good literature (never mind a lot of names—you know whom I mean), good food, good manners and good company.

A combination of steam whistles and barnyard outcries isn't music—it is just foolish noise. Let's stick to music—real music. There's quite sufficient for variety. Programs are not difficult. I join with Mr. Higbie in his disgust with deafening discord and his call for the melodies of the masters.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SUBSCRIBER.
New York, Jan. 25, 1926.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN

FEB 7 1926

ducted all afternoon.

CROWD HEARS BOSTON MEN.

At Carnegie Hall yesterday the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard by a capacity matinee audience.

Koussevitzky, following his plan established earlier in the week, arranged a programme of decidedly Russian flavor. And while some of its music may have been caviar to the general, its performance was of decided appeal to practically the entire house.

The novelty on the list was a graceful, delicate and enticing sonata by Gailliard, an eighteenth century French composer, b[illegible] arranged for small modern orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, a Russian musician of considerable achievement.

The sonata was followed by Prokofieff's piano concerto, the composer at the piano, a work held over from Thursday night's programme.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 7 - 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall introduced in New York a sonata by Galliard orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg. The remainder of the program consisted of a repetition of Serge Prokofieff's third piano concerto, with the composer as pianist—the same work which had been played at the Boston Symphony concert of the preceding Thursday afternoon and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

The Galliard sonata is delicious music. The introduction is somewhat conventional, though broad and melodious enough in the manner of the period, which is that of the early eighteenth century. The music that follows, in fast and slow tempi, is charming, full of spirit and rhythm in the fast movements, eloquent in a manner not vouchsafed to composers of today in the andante. The performance was expressive, polished, aglow with the life and beauty of the composer's ideas.

For the sonata of this Galliard—John Ernest Gaillard, son of a French wigmaker—Steinberg has employed a small orchestra. (The sonata was instrumentated at Mr. Koussevitzky's request, for him.) Is the instrumentation wholly fitting as the garment of the thought? For this writer, in spite of the modest dimensions of the orchestra, it is a little commonplace, lacking in certain passages the transparency and lightness associated with eighteenth century music. Be this as it may, the sonata is delightful music and well worth the hearing.

Perhaps, also, this sonata was designed to take the curse off modernism from the concerto of Mr. Prokofieff. If this was the case, it was hardly required, at least for those who heard the concerto the second time. For a second hearing of this composition is disillusionizing, both as to its modernity and its value. The score would have been ultra-modern twenty years ago, but it is not that today. The ideas, on close scrutiny, are thin and poor material for anything but virtuoso tricks. Dissonance? Yes! But dissonance in itself is commonplace as consonance, and these dissonances, as we have said, are out of style. That is one of the dangers of dissonance. The composer must go so fast if he would keep apace of the latest fashion.

What gives a superficial and temporary pleasure is the go, the bounce, the nervousness and flambuoyancy of Mr. Prokofieff's piece. Also, he is a very brilliant pianist, with wrists of steel. As at the previous performance, the audience applauded him with relish. They applauded exciting rhythms, scintillating combinations of instruments, dazzling feats of bravura. All the same the piece as a whole is bunkum. It is not to be concluded from this that Mr. Prokofieff writes nothing but bunkum. But it is probable that he writes too much, and he is constantly confronted with his special facility for effects and with the demoralizing modern appetite for such things.

As for Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite, it requires no comment here, save the remark, that with all the adventures of Russian composers in the Orient, few have returned with such fascinating accounts as Rimsky-Korsakoff in his ("Antar") symphony and "Scheherazade" suite, and still fewer employ Oriental idioms and colors with the masterly restraint, variety, and fi[illegible] that

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO,
N. Y.
TIMES

[illegible] 7 [illegible]

President and Mrs. Coolidge Attend Tea.

Mrs. Collidge accompanied the President to the tea given by the National Board of Farm Organizations, Charles S. Bennett, chairman and host, Wednesday afternoon in the historic old house recently purchased by the board for their headquarters. Mrs. Dawes, wife of the Vice President, headed the receiving line which had in it also Mrs. Kellogg, wife of the Secretary of State; Mrs. Jardine, wife of the Secretary of Agriculture; the wives of a number of justices of the Supreme Court, senators, representatives and residents. The presence of the President and Mrs. Collidge was a delightful surprise all around as their coming had been unheralded. When they left, Mrs. Coolidge dropped the President at the White House and she went on to the concert of the Boston Symphony, where she occupied the presidential box and had with her Mrs. Charles S. Deneen, wife of the senator from Illinois. The first lady's costume that day was of a brownish sand colored silk with a hat of medium brim with long ostrich plume reaching from one side to the opposite shoulder.

Mrs. Melvin B. Ericson, daughter of the Vice President, who came unexpectedly last month to visit her parents had a quiet little visit, not accepting invitations for entertainments, but just staying at home and enjoying her visit. She left a few days ago for New York and from there will return to her home in Evanston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE

[illegible] 7 1926

Boston Symphony Plays Under Baton Of Koussevitzky

Serge Prokofieff Displays Notable Pianistic Talent in Third Concerto Here; "Scheherazade" Played

By F. D. Perkins

Three Russians, of whom two, Serge Koussevitzky and Serge Prokofieff were present and actively employed, figured yesterday in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third matinee of the season at Carnegie Hall. The third Russian was Rimsky-Korsakoff, whose "Scheherazade" made its first appearance upon one of Mr. Koussevitzky's Manhattan programs.

Mr. Prokofieff was again the soloist in his own third piano concerto, which followed an opening non-Russian number, a sonata in G minor, originally one of a set of six for cello or bassoon with a thorough bass for harpsichord by John Ernest Galliard, a contemporary of Handel, who, like Handel, was born in Germany, but pursued most of his career in England. But the free transcription for strings, flute, oboe and bassoon used yesterday is by a Russian, Maximilian Steinberg, pupil and son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Steinberg, who made this transcription especially for Mr. Koussevitzky, has wrought discreetly and effectively, his orchestral version retained the atmosphere of the time and place of a work typical of its period. Not dry, and with a distinct liveliness in the allegros which followed respectively a lento and an andante, the work, heard at least in this version, for the first time here, seemed a useful addition to our eighteenth century orchestral repertoire.

The Serges fared very well in the Prokofieff concerto, but, in spite of the well applied vigor, technical brilliance and interpretative skill of Mr. Prokofieff's playing, the work did not seem very interesting. Its flavor, very mildly, almost sweetly acid, gave at least one hearer an impression of individuality, but lack of variety of color. But it gave Mr. Pokofieff ample chance to display his notable pianistic talent.

"Scheherazade," under the Kousevitzky baton, offered no marked variations in the first and third movements from the general average of readings under other leaders. The second movement, the Calendar's Tale, had some idiosyncracies of tempo in accentuated changes and an unusual retarding followed by hurrying of the thrumming of the strings under the cadenza-like passages for woodwind; the Feast at Bagdad went mostly at a swift and furious pace, winding up with a resounding and effective crash. These two movements, very well played, gave an impression of distinct liveliness; the dash of the finale was especially effective.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

FEB 7 . 1926

Russian Score Feature of Symphony Program

Koussevitzky to Introduce Scriabin's "The Divine Poem" With its Mystic Beauty at Capitol Theater Today.

A remarkable score, Scriabin's "The Divine Poem," will be a feature of the appearance of Serge Koussevitzky here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a concert in the Capitol Theater this afternoon at 3 o'clock. This Russian celebrity, now in his second season in America at the head of this orchestra, was first heard in the "Divine Poem," in this country when he performed it in Boston last week. Scriabin, the late Russian composer, may be characterized as an individualist, an idealist, and a mystic in tones. The score is in three parts. The first, "Luttes," ("Struggles"), depicts the soul torn between confident affirmation and doubt. The second, "Voluptes" has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy in merging into nature." The third, "Jeu divan," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed. Koussevitzky was a close friend of Scriabin in Russia, where in full sympathetic understanding with this remarkable composer, he performed his principal scores. Scriabin traveled with Koussevitzky on one of his famous voyages along the Volga river.

The French school will be represented at this concert by Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." Debussy is perhaps best known by this setting in tones of Mallarme's poem, in which the faun (characterized by the flute) tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs. This music of mood and subtle suggestion is in its way more potent than any poetry of words could be. Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of Debussy. He was the first to make the Frenchman's music known in Russia.

There will be one number of Wagner, the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Using the principal themes of this music drama, and stating them in their proper order, Wagner made his prelude a sort of condensation of the entire work. The lightness and festive mood with alternate passages of romantic loveliness which characterize Wagner's one humorous music drama are as eloquently, if more tersely, expressed in the brilliant prelude.

The program will open brilliantly with Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." The theater box-office opens at noon today. Reservations may be made from 10 a. m. or by calling 2-0375.

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
NEW YORK
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TELEGRAM

[illegible] 7 [illegible]

A number of local people interested in music have been taking advantage of the delightful and ever increasing popular "Pop" concerts which have been held and still are being held in Boston Symphony hall.

The variance of the programs to suit the tastes of all who have an interest in music as well as the distinguished personnel of the orchestra is rapidly rating these concerts as one of the foremost musical attractions in Boston. People are travelling from the surrounding towns to the concerts and the Man About Town has yet to hear any who have done so, make anything other than a commendary remark as to the excellence of the managing and program of the concerts.

Several more concerts yet remain on the program for the season.

Music : Olga Samaroff's Daily Column — Boston Symphony Orchestra

IN THE fifth book of the Kasidah, Haji Abdu El-yezdi, as Sir Richard Burton liked to call himself in his Oriental literary incarnation, writes:

There is no Good, there is no Bad;
These be the whims of mortal will:
What works me weal that I call "good";
What harms and hurts I hold as "ill";
They change with place, they shift with race;
And in the veriest span of Time,
Each Vice has worn a Virtue's crown;
All Good was banned as Sin or Crime.

Mme. Olga Samaroff

Sir Richard was undoubtedly thinking life and ethics, but as I listened to Prokofieff's piano concerto last night the lines came into my mind as highly applicable to art, for the thing I liked least in the work was a too frank and reminiscent return to "virtuous" diatonic romanticism in parts of the last movement, while the things which seemed vital, personal and stirring would have been considered highly iniquitous only a few years ago, and perhaps even today might invite some censure from the ultra-conservative. There seems no doubt, however, that Prokofieff in his third piano concerto, played last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the composer at the piano, is much less dissonant and much less concerned with innovation than he was in his first concerto, which I heard some years ago in private. Prokofieff is concerned with making music, and, in my opinion, one thing which gives him his real importance among modern composers is the fact that his ideas and his idiom fit. He thinks and feels the way he writes and he could not express himself otherwise.

This sincerity is in itself convincing, but it has double value when the work in question contains as much force and imagination as Mr. Prokofieff's concerto, which, by the way, he played superbly, with intense musical feeling and a sweeping virtuosity, in the best sense of the word. I liked the second movement best. When a modern composer can succeed in making a movement in variation form interesting throughout, it seems to mean that he has something to say. The thematic and rhythmic shapes of which this whole concerto as a musical structure is built seemed to me highly individual and often exciting. It is a work I should very much like to hear again, and it was received with great warmth by the audience.

Fate has decreed that I should hear Mr. Koussevitzky only in modern or Russian music! I read accounts of his giving other programs, but whenever time and space permit

They seem to keep alive the vision of ecstasy which Scriabine undoubtedly had and put into the essence of the work, while the listener at certain points can scarcely escape the sense of length and repetition which are deadly enemies of ecstasy. For this reason, in spite of a strong admiration for the inherent sensuous beauty of the "Pœme de l'Extase," I usually come away from a performance of it with mixed and baffled feelings.

Mr. Koussevitzky condusted with an almost febrile ardor and an evident enthusiasm for the work. The orchestra displayed great beauty of tone and general polish of a high order. It is a pleasure to see the Boston Symphony restored to its high estate after the vicissitudes which at one time seemed to threaten the future of the famous organization which has played such a great part in American musical history.

A Criticism of Critics

In a recent editorial the Musical Courier, a weekly publication devoted to musical affairs, has some very unkind things to say about critics in general, and Mr. Henderson and Mr. Olin Downes, in particular. It is scarcely necessary for me to leap to the defense of these distinguished writers, but some of the statements made in the Musical Courier's editorial invite comment in a column which is supposed to be devoted to a frank and fearless discussion of musical affairs in general as well as the reviewing of specific performances.

The Musical Courier expresses with a goodly amount of contempt the opinion that a music critic is only a musical reporter and should keep his place. Obviously musical reporting is the only form of criticism which is practicable in the pages of a publication which derives its greatest revenue from the large advertising contracts with individual artists and organizations who would very probably withdraw their business if they encountered adverse criticism in the columns of the advertising publication. But it seems questionable, to say the least, whether musical reporting is the only function demanded of a critic employed on an important daily paper. I believe on the contrary, that his knowledge and experience should be placed at the disposal of a general reading public in the shape of throwing what light he can on things connected with the music he reviews.

The second point in the Musical Courier editorial was an attack upon two articles written recently by Mr. Henderson and Mr. Olin Downes on singing and conducting from memory respectively. The Musical Courier, to put it briefly, would have us believe these gentlemen did not know what they were writing about. I did not happen to read Mr. Henderson's article on singing, but his long record can speak for itself.

I did read Mr. Downes' article on conducting from memory. Now, it may be that the editorial staff of the Musical Courier contains a writer who knows much more about conducting than I do, but, judging from what modest knowledge I have been able to pick up during a long career as a professional musician, during which I have played with most of the leading orchestras of Europe and America, besides living close to orchestra affairs, I should say that the Musical Courier's statements about Mr. Downes' article are untrue and unjust. Mr. Downes' article contained personal opinions which were musically and psychologically perfectly sound, and the subject and its treatment were eminently calculated to interest a public in the life of which orchestras play such a large part.

I have always felt that individual artists who wished to condemn [illegible] criticism ducted all afternoon. [illegible] Mr. Downes in a manner certainly not to attack an individu

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 7 - 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall introduced in New York a sonata by Galliard orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg. The remainder of the program consisted of a repetition of Serge Prokofieff's third piano concerto, with the composer as pianist—the same work which had been played at the Boston Symphony concert of the preceding Thursday afternoon and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

The Galliard sonata is delicious music. The introduction is somewhat conventional, though broad and melodious enough in the manner of the period, which is that of the early eighteenth century. The music that follows, in fast and slow tempi, is charming, full of spirit and rhythm in the fast movements, eloquent in a manner not vouchsafed to composers of today in the andante. The performance was expressive, polished, aglow with the life and beauty of the composer's ideas.

For the sonata of this Galliard—John Ernest Gailliard, son of a French wig-maker—Steinberg has employed a small orchestra. (The sonata was instrumentated at Mr. Koussevitzky's request, for him.) Is the instrumentation wholly fitting as the garment of the thought? For this writer, in spite of the modest dimensions of the orchestra, it is a little commonplace, lacking in certain passages the transparency and lightness associated with eighteenth century music. Be this as it may, the sonata is delightful music and well worth the hearing.

Perhaps, also, this sonata was designed to take the curse off modernism from the concerto of Mr. Prokofieff. If this was the case, it was hardly required, at least for those who heard the concerto the second time. For a second hearing of this composition is disillusionizing, both as to its modernity and its value. The score would have been ultra-modern twenty years ago, but it is not that today. The ideas, on close scrutiny, are thin and poor material for anything but virtuoso tricks. Dissonance? Yes! But dissonance in itself is commonplace as consonance, and these dissonances, as we have said, are out of style. That is one of the dangers of dissonance. The composer must go so fast if he would keep apace of the latest fashion.

What gives a superficial and temporary pleasure is the go, the bounce, the nervousness and flambuoyancy of Mr. Prokofieff's piece. Also, he is a very brilliant pianist, with wrists of steel. As at the previous performance, the audience applauded him with relish. They applauded exciting rhythms, scintillating combinations of instruments, dazzling feats of bravura. All the same the piece as a whole is bunkum. It is not to be concluded from this that Mr. Prokofieff writes nothing but bunkum. But it is probable that he writes too much, and he is constantly confronted with his special facility for effects and with the demoralizing modern appetite for such things.

As for Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite, it requires no comment here, save the remark, that with all the adventures of Russian composers in the Orient, few have returned with such fascinating accounts as Rimsky-Korsakoff in his ("Antar") symphony and "Scheherazade" suite, and still fewer employ Oriental idioms and colors with the masterly restraint, variety, and fi-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE

FEB 7 1926

Boston Symphony Plays Under Baton Of Koussevitzky

Serge Prokofieff Displays Notable Pianistic Talent in Third Concerto Here; "Scheherazade" Played

By F. D. Perkins

Three Russians, of whom two, Serge Koussevitzky and Serge Prokofieff were present and actively employed, figured yesterday in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third matinee of the season at Carnegie Hall. The third Russian was Rimsky-Korsakoff, whose "Scheherazade" made its first appearance upon one of Mr. Koussevitzky's Manhattan programs.

Mr. Prokofieff was again the soloist in his own third piano concerto, which followed an opening non-Russian number, a sonata in G minor, originally one of a set of six for cello or bassoon with a thorough bass for harpsichord by John Ernest Galliard, a contemporary of Handel, who, like Handel, was born in Germany, but pursued most of his career in England. But the free transcription for strings, flute, oboe and bassoon used yesterday is by a Russian, Maximilian Steinberg, pupil and son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Steinberg, who made this transcription especially for Mr. Koussevitzky, has wrought discreetly and effectively, his orchestral version retained the atmosphere of the time and place of a work typical of its period. Not dry, and with a distinct liveliness in the allegros which followed respectively a lento and an andante, the work, heard at least in this version, for the first time here, seemed a useful addition to our eighteenth century orchestral repertoire.

The Serges fared very well in the Prokofieff concerto, but, in spite of the well applied vigor, technical brilliance and interpretative skill of Mr. Prokofieff's playing, the work did not seem very interesting. Its flavor, very mildly, almost sweetly acid, gave at least one hearer an impression of individuality, but lack of variety of color. But it gave Mr. Pokofieff ample chance to display his notable pianistic talent.

"Scheherazade," under the Kousevitzky baton, offered no marked variations in the first and third movements from the general average of readings under other leaders. The second movement, the Calendar's Tale, had some idiosyncracies of tempo in accentuated changes and an unusual retarding followed by hurrying of the thrumming of the strings under the cadenza-like passages for woodwind; the Feast at Bagdad went mostly at a swift and furious pace, winding up with a resounding and effective crash. These two movements, very well played, gave an impression of distinct liveliness; the dash of the finale was especially effective.

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
NEW YORK

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JUN 27 [illegible]

A number of local people interested in music have been taking advantage of the delightful and ever increasing popular "Pop" concerts which have been held and still are being held in Boston Symphony hall.

The variance of the programs to suit the tastes of all who have an interest in music as well as the distinguished personnel of the orchestra is rapidly rating these concerts as one of the foremost musical attractions in Boston. People are travelling from the surrounding towns to the concerts and the Man About Town has yet to hear any who have done so, make anything other than a commendary remark as to the excellence of the managing and program of the concerts.

Several more concerts yet remain on the program for the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

FEB 7 1926

Russian Score Feature of Symphony Program

Koussevitzky to Introduce Scriabin's "The Divine Poem" With its Mystic Beauty at Capitol Theater Today.

A remarkable score, Scriabin's "The Divine Poem," will be a feature of the appearance of Serge Koussevitzky here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a concert in the Capitol Theater this afternoon at 3 o'clock. This Russian celebrity, now in his second season in America at the head of this orchestra, was first heard in the "Divine Poem," in this country when he performed it in Boston last week. Scriabin, the late Russian composer, may be characterized as an individualist, an idealist, and a mystic in tones. The score is in three parts. The first, "Luttes," ("Struggles"), depicts the soul torn between confident affirmation and doubt. The second, "Voluptes" has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy in merging into nature." The third, "Jeu divan," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed. Koussevitzky was a close friend of Scriabin in Russia, where in full sympathetic understanding with this remarkable composer, he performed his principal scores. Scriabin traveled with Koussevitzky on one of his famous voyages along the Volga river.

The French school will be represented at this concert by Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." Debussy is perhaps best known by this setting in tones of Mallarme's poem, in which the faun (characterized by the flute) tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs. This music of mood and subtle suggestion is in its way more potent than any poetry of words could be. Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of Debussy. He was the first to make the Frenchman's music known in Russia.

There will be one number of Wagner, the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Using the principal themes of this music drama, and stating them in their proper order, Wagner made his prelude a sort of condensation of the entire work. The lightness and festive mood with alternate passages of romantic loveliness which characterize Wagner's one humorous music drama are as eloquently, if more tersely, expressed in the brilliant prelude.

The program will open brilliantly with Berlioz's overture to "Benvenute Cellini." The theater box-office opens at noon today. Reservations may be made from 10 a. m. or by calling 2-0375.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 7 - 1926

AGAINST CACOPHONY.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Good for Mr. Higbie! His letter in a recent issue, that you brightly head "Driven Out of the Din," strikes a needed note of protest against the cheap and noisy "novelties" with which, as Mr. Higbie well says, New York audiences are being "bombarded." He uses an artilleryman's figure of speech, and he is right in so doing. The "music" is the music of bombshells!

I have been a subscriber to the concerts—for example—of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a good many years (first in Boston, and for about seventeen years at Carnegie Hall); and I should like the privilege of saying that Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart, Tchaikovsky, Schubert, Handel and their compeers are plenty good enough for me.

Maybe I'm old-fashioned—so be it! I'm also old-fashioned enough to like good literature (never mind a lot of names—you know whom I mean), good food, good manners and good company.

A combination of steam whistles and barnyard outcries isn't music—it is just foolish noise. Let's stick to music—real music. There's quite sufficient for variety. Programs are not difficult. I join with Mr. Higbie in his disgust with deafening discord and his call for the melodies of the masters.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SUBSCRIBER.
New York, Jan. 25, 1926.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN

FEB 7 1926

CROWD HEARS BOSTON MEN.

At Carnegie Hall yesterday the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard by a capacity matinee audience.

Koussevitzky, following his plan established earlier in the week, arranged a programme of decidedly Russian flavor. And while some of its music may have been caviar to the general, its performance was of decided appeal to practically the entire house.

The novelty on the list was a graceful, delicate and enticing sonata by Gailliard, an eighteenth century French composer, but arranged for small modern orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, a Russian musician of considerable achievement.

The sonata was followed by Prokofieff's piano concerto, the composer at the piano, a work held over from Thursday night's programme.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO,
N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 7 1926

President and Mrs. Coolidge Attend Tea.

Mrs. Collidge accompanied the President to the tea given by the National Board of Farm Organizations, Charles S. Bennett, chairman and host, Wednesday afternoon in the historic old house recently purchased by the board for their headquarters. Mrs. Dawes, wife of the Vice President, headed the receiving line which had in it also Mrs. Kellogg, wife of the Secretary of State; Mrs. Jardine, wife of the Secretary of Agriculture; the wives of a number of justices of the Supreme Court, senators, representatives and residents. The presence of the President and Mrs. Collidge was a delightful surprise all around as their coming had been unheralded. When they left, Mrs. Coolidge dropped the President at the White House and she went on to the concert of the Boston Symphony, where she occupied the presidential box and had with her Mrs. Charles S. Deneen, wife of the senator from Illinois. The first lady's costume that day was of a brownish sand colored silk with a hat of medium brim with long ostrich plume reaching from one side to the opposite shoulder.

Mrs. Melvin B. Ericson, daughter of the Vice President, who came unexpectedly last month to visit her parents had a quiet little visit, not accepting invitations for entertainments, but just staying at home and enjoying her visit. She left a few days ago for New York and from there will return to her home in Evanston.

175

Music : Olga Samaroff's Daily Column — Boston Symphony Orchestra

IN THE fifth book of the Kasidah, Haji Abdu El-yezdi, as Sir Richard Burton liked to call himself in his Oriental literary incarnation, writes:

There is no Good, there is no Bad;
These be the whims of mortal will:
What works me weal that I call "good";
What harms and hurts I hold as "ill";

They change with place, they shift with race;
And in the veriest span of Time,
Each Vice has worn a Virtue's crown;
All Good was banned as Sin or Crime.

Mme. Olga Samaroff

Sir Richard was undoubtedly thinking life and ethics, but as I listened to Prokofieff's piano concerto last night the lines came into my mind as highly applicable to art, for the thing I liked least in the work was a too frank and reminiscent return to "virtuous" diatonic romanticism in parts of the last movement, while the things which seemed vital, personal and stirring would have been considered highly iniquitous only a few years ago, and perhaps even today might invite some censure from the ultra-conservative. There seems no doubt, however, that Prokofieff in his third piano concerto, played last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the composer at the piano, is much less dissonant and much less concerned with innovation than he was in his first concerto, which I heard some years ago in private. Prokofieff is concerned with making music, and, in my opinion, one thing which gives him his real importance among modern composers is the fact that his ideas and his idiom fit. He thinks and feels the way he writes and he could not express himself otherwise.

This sincerity is in itself convincing, but it has double value when the work in question contains as much force and imagination as Mr. Prokofieff's concerto, which, by the way, he played superbly, with intense musical feeling and a sweeping virtuosity, in the best sense of the word. I liked the second movement best. When a modern composer can succeed in making a movement in variation form interesting throughout, it seems to mean that he has something to say. The thematic and rhythmic shapes of which this whole concerto as a musical structure is built seemed to me highly individual and often exciting. It is a work I should very much like to hear again, and it was received with great warmth by the audience.

Fate has decreed that I should hear Mr. Koussevitzky only in modern or Russian music! I read accounts of his giving other programs, but whenever time and space permit me to hear him in concert it happens that the program is composed of the above-mentioned types of music. Therefore, I have a very one-sided impression of him as a conductor and must perforce concentrate more on reviewing specific performances than upon his general artistic make-up.

The program last night began with a colorful performance of "La nuit sur la Montagne Chauve" of Moussorgsky and ended with the "Pœme de l'Extase" of Scriabine. It seems paradoxical, but I believe this latter music is emotionally more difficult to listen to successfully than to perform—always, of course, assuming the means of performance lie within grasp.

The performer is absorbed in the intense feeling of every detail and does not sense the diffuseness of form, as the listener almost inevitably does. I have never conducted the work, needless to say, but the impression I have comes from talking with conductors after performances.

They seem to keep alive the vision of ecstasy which Scriabine undoubtedly had and put into the essence of the work, while the listener at certain points can scarcely escape the sense of length and repetition which are deadly enemies of ecstasy. For this reason, in spite of a strong admiration for the inherent sensuous beauty of the "Pœme de l'Extase," I usually come away from a performance of it with mixed and baffled feelings.

Mr. Koussevitzky condusted with an almost febrile ardor and an evident enthusiasm for the work. The orchestra displayed great beauty of tone and general polish of a high order. It is a pleasure to see the Boston Symphony restored to its high estate after the vicissitudes which at one time seemed to threaten the future of the famous organization which has played such a great part in American musical history.

A Criticism of Critics

In a recent editorial, the Musical Courier, a weekly publication devoted to musical affairs, has some very unkind things to say about critics in general, and Mr. Henderson and Mr. Olin Downes, in particular. It is scarcely necessary for me to leap to the defense of these distinguished writers, but some of the statements made in the Musical Courier's editorial invite comment in a column which is supposed to be devoted to a frank and fearless discussion of musical affairs in general as well as the reviewing of specific performances.

The Musical Courier expresses with a goodly amount of contempt the opinion that a music critic is only a musical reporter and should keep his place. Obviously musical reporting is the only form of criticism which is practicable in the pages of a publication which derives its greatest revenue from the large advertising contracts with individual artists and organizations who would very probably withdraw their business if they encountered adverse criticism in the columns of the advertising publication. But it seems questionable, to say the least, whether musical reporting is the only function demanded of a critic employed on an important daily paper. I believe on the contrary, that his knowledge and experience should be placed at the disposal of a general reading public in the shape of throwing what light he can on things connected with the music he reviews.

The second point in the Musical Courier editorial was an attack upon two articles written recently by Mr. Henderson and Mr. Olin Downes on singing and conducting from memory respectively. The Musical Courier, to put it briefly, would have us believe these gentlemen did not know what they were writing about. I did not happen to read Mr. Henderson's article on singing, but his long record can speak for itself.

I did read Mr. Downes' article on conducting from memory. Now, it may be that the editorial staff of the Musical Courier contains a writer who knows much more about conducting than I do, but, judging from what modest knowledge I have been able to pick up during a long career as a professional musician, during which I have played with most of the leading orchestras of Europe and America, besides living close to orchestra affairs, I should say that the Musical Courier's statements about Mr. Downes' article are untrue and unjust. Mr. Downes' article contained personal opinions which were musically and psychologically perfectly sound, and the subject and its treatment were eminently calculated to interest a public in the life of which orchestras play such a large part.

I have always felt that individual artists who wished to condemn musical criticism as an institution should refrain from advertising, with the praise it bestows upon them, and the writing of this comment is largely inspired by the feeling that an advertising publication whose pages are filled with reproductions of press notices would be wiser in the interests of its advertisers not to attack an institution around which so much of its business centers, and writer such as Mr. Downes in a manner certainly not to attack an individu

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 7 - 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall introduced in New York a sonata by Galliard orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg. The remainder of the program consisted of a repetition of Serge Prokofieff's third piano concerto, with the composer as pianist—the same work which had been played at the Boston Symphony concert of the preceding Thursday afternoon and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

The Galliard sonata is delicious music. The introduction is somewhat conventional, though broad and melodious enough in the manner of the period, which is that of the early eighteenth century. The music that follows, in fast and slow tempi, is charming, full of spirit and rhythm in the fast movements, eloquent in a manner not vouchsafed to composers of today in the andante. The performance was expressive, polished, aglow with the life and beauty of the composer's ideas.

For the sonata of this Galliard—John Ernest Gaillard, son of a French wigmaker—Steinberg has employed a small orchestra. (The sonata was instrumentated at Mr. Koussevitzky's request, for him.) Is the instrumentation wholly fitting as the garment of the thought? For this writer, in spite of the modest dimensions of the orchestra, it is a little commonplace, lacking in certain passages the transparency and lightness associated with eighteenth century music. Be this as it may, the sonata is delightful music and well worth the hearing.

Perhaps, also, this sonata was designed to take the curse off modernism from the concerto of Mr. Prokofieff. If this was the case, it was hardly required, at least for those who heard the concerto the second time. For a second hearing of this composition is disillusionizing, both as to its modernity and its value. The score would have been ultra-modern twenty years ago, but it is not that today. The ideas, on close scrutiny, are thin and poor material for anything but virtuoso tricks. Dissonance? Yes! But dissonance in itself is commonplace as consonance, and these dissonances, as we have said, are out of style. That is one of the dangers of dissonance. The composer must go so fast if he would keep apace of the latest fashion.

What gives a superficial and temporary pleasure is the go, the bounce, the nervousness and flambuoyancy of Mr. Prokofieff's piece. Also, he is a very brilliant pianist, with wrists of steel. As at the previous performance, the audience applauded him with relish. They applauded exciting rhythms, scintillating combinations of instruments, dazzling feats of bravura. All the same the piece as a whole is bunkum. It is not to be concluded from this that Mr. Prokofieff writes nothing but bunkum. But it is probable that he writes too much, and he is constantly confronted with his special facility for effects and with the demoralizing modern appetite for such things.

As for Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite, it requires no comment here, save the remark, that with all the adventures of Russian composers in the Orient, few have returned with such fascinating accounts as Rimsky-Korsakoff in his ("Antar") symphony and "Scheherazade" suite, and still fewer employ Oriental idioms and colors with the masterly restraint, variety, and finally unsurpassed richness of tint that he provides in a familiar but lasting masterpiece. The music is especially in Mr. Koussevitzky's vein, and it is hardlly needful to say that his performance gave much pleasure to the audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE

FEB 7 1926

Boston Symphony Plays Under Baton Of Koussevitzky

Serge Prokofieff Displays Notable Pianistic Talent in Third Concerto Here; "Scheherazade" Played

By F. D. Perkins

Three Russians, of whom two, Serge Koussevitzky and Serge Prokofieff were present and actively employed, figured yesterday in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third matinee of the season at Carnegie Hall. The third Russian was Rimsky-Korsakoff, whose "Scheherazade" made its first appearance upon one of Mr. Koussevitzky's Manhattan programs.

Mr. Prokofieff was again the soloist in his own third piano concerto, which followed an opening non-Russian number, a sonata in G minor, originally one of a set of six for cello or bassoon with a thorough bass for harpsichord by John Ernest Galliard, a contemporary of Handel, who, like Handel, was born in Germany, but pursued most of his career in England. But the free transcription for strings, flute, oboe and bassoon used yesterday is by a Russian, Maximilian Steinberg, pupil and son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Steinberg, who made this transcription especially for Mr. Koussevitzky, has wrought discreetly and effectively, his orchestral version retained the atmosphere of the time and place of a work typical of its period. Not dry, and with a distinct liveliness in the allegros which followed respectively a lento and an andante, the work, heard at least in this version, for the first time here, seemed a useful addition to our eighteenth century orchestral repertoire.

The Serges fared very well in the Prokofieff concerto, but, in spite of the well applied vigor, technical brilliance and interpretative skill of Mr. Prokofieff's playing, the work did not seem very interesting. Its flavor, very mildly, almost sweetly acid, gave at least one hearer an impression of individuality, but lack of variety of color. But it gave Mr. Pokofieff ample chance to display his notable pianistic talent.

"Scheherazade," under the Kousevitzky baton, offered no marked variations in the first and third movements from the general average of readings under other leaders. The second movement, the Calendar's Tale, had some idiosyncracies of tempo in accentuated changes and an unusual retarding followed by hurrying of the thrumming of the strings under the cadenza-like passages for woodwind; the Feast at Bagdad went mostly at a swift and furious pace, winding up with a resounding and effective crash. These two movements, very well played, gave an impression of distinct liveliness; the dash of the finale was especially effective.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU NEW YORK
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TELEGRAM

[illegible] 7 [illegible]

A number of local people interested in music have been taking advantage of the delightful and ever increasing popular "Pop" concerts which have been held and still are being held in Boston Symphony hall.

The variance of the programs to suit the tastes of all who have an interest in music as well as the distinguished personnel of the orchestra is rapidly rating these concerts as one of the foremost musical attractions in Boston. People are travelling from the surrounding towns to the concerts and the Man About Town has yet to hear any who have done so, make anything other than a commendary remark as to the excellence of the managing and program of the concerts.

Several more concerts yet remain on the program for the season.

Feature
ny Program

Koussevitzky to Introduce Scriabin's "The Divine Poem" With its Mystic Beauty at Capitol Theater Today.

A remarkable score, Scriabin's "The Divine Poem," will be a feature of the appearance of Serge Koussevitzky here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a concert in the Capitol Theater this afternoon at 3 o'clock. This Russian celebrity, now in his second season in America at the head of this orchestra, was first heard in the "Divine Poem," in this country when he performed it in Boston last week. Scriabin, the late Russian composer, may be characterized as an individualist, an idealist, and a mystic in tones. The score is in three parts. The first, "Luttes," ("Struggles"), depicts the soul torn between confident affirmation and doubt. The second, "Voluptes" has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy in merging into nature." The third, "Jeu divan," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed. Koussevitzky was a close friend of Scriabin in Russia, where in full sympathetic understanding with this remarkable composer, he performed his principal scores. Scriabin traveled with Koussevitzky on one of his famous voyages along the Volga river.

The French school will be represented at this concert by Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." Debussy is perhaps best known by this setting in tones of Mallarme's poem, in which the faun (characterized by the flute) tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs. This music of mood and subtle suggestion is in its way more potent than any poetry of words could be. Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of Debussy. He was the first to make the Frenchman's music known in Russia.

There will be one number of Wagner, the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Using the principal themes of this music drama, and stating them in their proper order, Wagner made his prelude a sort of condensation of the entire work. The lightness and festive mood with alternate passages of romantic loveliness which characterize Wagner's one humorous music drama are as eloquently, if more tersely, expressed in the brilliant prelude.

The program will open brilliantly with Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." The theater box-office opens at noon today. Reservations may be made from 10 a. m. or by calling 2-0375.

---

of its

to the general, its performance was of decided appeal to practically the entire house.

The novelty on the list was a graceful, delicate and enticing sonata by Gailliard, an eighteenth century French composer, b ar- ranged for small modern orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, a Russian musician of considerable achievement.

The sonata was followed by Prokofieff's piano concerto, the composer at the piano, a work held over from Thursday night's programme.

---

the Secretary of Agriculture, the wives of a number of justices of the Supreme Court, senators, representatives and residents. The presence of the President and Mrs. Collidge was a delightful surprise all around as their coming had been unheralded. When they left, Mrs. Coolidge dropped the President at the White House and she went on to the concert of the Boston Symphony, where she occupied the presidential box and had with her Mrs. Charles S. Deneen, wife of the senator from Illinois. The first lady's costume that day was of a brownish sand colored silk with a hat of medium brim with long ostrich plume reaching from one side to the opposite shoulder.

Mrs. Melvin B. Ericson, daughter of the Vice President, who came unexpectedly last month to visit her parents had a quiet little visit, not accepting invitations for entertainments, but just staying at home and enjoying her visit. She left a few days ago for New York and from there will return to her home in Evanston.

PARADE
HAS BEEN BROADCASTED THROUGHOUT the COUNTRY AS A GREAT FILM.
IT IS!"

Music : Olga Samaroff's Daily Column — Boston Symphony Orchestra

IN THE fifth book of the Kasidah, Haji Abdu El-yezdi, as Sir Richard Burton liked to call himself in his Oriental literary incarnation, writes:

There is no Good, there is no Bad;
These be the whims of mortal will:
What works me weal that I call "good";
What harms and hurts I hold as "ill";

They change with place, they shift with race;
And in the veriest span of Time,
Each Vice has worn a Virtue's crown;
All Good was banned as Sin or Crime.

Mme. Olga Samaroff

Sir Richard was undoubtedly thinking life and ethics, but as I listened to Prokofieff's piano concerto last night the lines came into my mind as highly applicable to art, for the thing I liked least in the work was a too frank and reminiscent return to "virtuous" diatonic romanticism in parts of the last movement, while the things which seemed vital, personal and stirring would have been considered highly iniquitous only a few years ago, and perhaps even today might invite some censure from the ultra-conservative. There seems no doubt, however, that Prokofieff in his third piano concerto, played last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the composer at the piano, is much less dissonant and much less concerned with innovation than he was in his first concerto, which I heard some years ago in private. Prokofieff is concerned with making music, and, in my opinion, one thing which gives him his real importance among modern composers is the fact that his ideas and his idiom fit. He thinks and feels the way he writes and he could not express himself otherwise.

This sincerity is in itself convincing, but it has double value when the work in question contains as much force and imagination as Mr. Prokofieff's concerto, which, by the way, he played superbly, with intense musical feeling and a sweeping virtuosity, in the best sense of the word. I liked the second movement best. When a modern composer can succeed in making a movement in variation form interesting throughout, it seems to mean that he has something to say. The thematic and rhythmic shapes of which this whole concerto as a musical structure is built seemed to me highly individual and often exciting. It is a work I should very much like to hear again, and it was received with great warmth by the audience.

Fate has decreed that I should hear Mr. Koussevitzky only in modern or Russian music! I read accounts of his giving other programs, but whenever time and space permit me to hear him in concert it happens that the program is composed of the above-mentioned types of music. Therefore, I have a very one-sided impression of him as a conductor and must perforce concentrate more on reviewing specific performances than upon his general artistic make-up.

The program last night began with a colorful performance of "La nuit sur la Montagne Chauve" of Moussorgsky and ended with the "Pœme de l'Extase" of Scriabine. It seems paradoxical, but I believe this latter music is emotionally more difficult to listen to successfully than to perform—always, of course, assuming the means of performance lie within grasp.

The performer is absorbed in the intense feeling of every detail and does not sense the diffuseness of form, as the listener almost inevitably does. I have never conducted the work, needless to say, but the impression I have comes from talking with conductors after performances.

They seem to keep alive the vision of ecstasy which Scriabine undoubtedly had and put into the essence of the work, while the listener at certain points can scarcely escape the sense of length and repetition which are deadly enemies of ecstasy. For this reason, in spite of a strong admiration for the inherent sensuous beauty of the "Pœme de l'Extase," I usually come away from a performance of it with mixed and baffled feelings.

Mr. Koussevitzky condusted with an almost febrile ardor and an evident enthusiasm for the work. The orchestra displayed great beauty of tone and general polish of a high order. It is a pleasure to see the Boston Symphony restored to its high estate after the vicissitudes which at one time seemed to threaten the future of the famous organization which has played such a great part in American musical history.

A Criticism of Critics

In a recent editorial. the Musical Courier, a weekly publication devoted to musical affairs, has some very unkind things to say about critics in general, and Mr. Henderson and Mr. Olin Downes, in particular. It is scarcely necessary for me to leap to the defense of these distinguished writers, but some of the statements made in the Musical Courier's editorial invite comment in a column which is supposed to be devoted to a frank and fearless discussion of musical affairs in general as well as the reviewing of specific performances.

The Musical Courier expresses with a goodly amount of contempt the opinion that a music critic is only a musical reporter and should keep his place. Obviously musical reporting is the only form of criticism which is practicable in the pages of a publication which derives its greatest revenue from the large advertising contracts with individual artists and organizations who would very probably withdraw their business if they encountered adverse criticism in the columns of the advertising publication. But it seems questionable, to say the least, whether musical reporting is the only function demanded of a critic employed on an important daily paper. I believe on the contrary, that his knowledge and experience should be placed at the disposal of a general reading public in the shape of throwing what light he can on things connected with the music he reviews.

The second point in the Musical Courier editorial was an attack upon two articles written recently by Mr. Henderson and Mr. Olin Downes on singing and conducting from memory respectively. The Musical Courier, to put it briefly, would have us believe these gentlemen did not know what they were writing about. I did not happen to read Mr. Henderson's article on singing, but his long record can speak for itself.

I did read Mr. Downes' article on conducting from memory. Now, it may be that the editorial staff of the Musical Courier contains a writer who knows much more about conducting than I do, but, judging from what modest knowledge I have been able to pick up during a long career as a professional musician, during which I have played with most of the leading orchestras of Europe and America, besides living close to orchestra affairs, I should say that the Musical Courier's statements about Mr. Downes' article are untrue and unjust. Mr. Downes' article contained personal opinions which were musically and psychologically perfectly sound, and the subject and its treatment were eminently calculated to interest a public in the life of which orchestras play such a large part.

I have always felt that individual artists who wished to condemn musical criticism as an institution should refrain from advertising, with the praise it bestows upon them, and the writing of this comment is largely inspired by the feeling that an advertising publication whose pages are filled with reproductions of press notices would be wiser in the interests of its advertisers not to attack an institution around which so much of its business centers, and writer such as Mr. Downes in a manner certainly not to attack an individual which, in my opinion, was both uncalled for and unjust.

OLGA SAMAROFF.

Copyright, 1926, by N. Y. Evening Post, Inc.

---

noon in Carnegie New York a sonata by Galliard orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg. The remainder of the program consisted of a repetition of Serge Prokofieff's third piano concerto, with the composer as pianist—the same work which had been played at the Boston Symphony concert of the preceding Thursday afternoon and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

The Galliard sonata is delicious music. The introduction is somewhat conventional, though broad and melodious enough in the manner of the period, which is that of the early eighteenth century. The music that follows, in fast and slow tempi, is charming, full of spirit and rhythm in the fast movements, eloquent in a manner not vouchsafed to composers of today in the andante. The performance was expressive, polished, aglow with the life and beauty of the composer's ideas.

For the sonata of this Galliard—John Ernest Gaillard, son of a French wigmaker—Steinberg has employed a small orchestra. (The sonata was instrumentated at Mr. Koussevitzky's request, for him.) Is the instrumentation wholly fitting as the garment of the thought? For this writer, in spite of the modest dimensions of the orchestra, it is a little commonplace, lacking in certain passages the transparency and lightness associated with eighteenth century music. Be this as it may, the sonata is delightful music and well worth the hearing.

Perhaps, also, this sonata was designed to take the curse off modernism from the concerto of Mr. Prokofieff. If this was the case, it was hardly required, at least for those who heard the concerto the second time. For a second hearing of this composition is disillusionizing, both as to its modernity and its value. The score would have been ultra-modern twenty years ago, but it is not that today. The ideas, on close scrutiny, are thin and poor material for anything but virtuoso tricks. Dissonance? Yes! But dissonance in itself is commonplace as consonance, and these dissonances, as we have said, are out of style. That is one of the dangers of dissonance. The composer must go so fast if he would keep apace of the latest fashion.

What gives a superficial and temporary pleasure is the go, the bounce, the nervousness and flambuoyancy of Mr. Prokofieff's piece. Also, he is a very brilliant pianist, with wrists of steel. As at the previous performance, the audience applauded him with relish. They applauded exciting rhythms, scintillating combinations of instruments, dazzling feats of bravura. All the same the piece as a whole is bunkum. It is not to be concluded from this that Mr. Prokofieff writes nothing but bunkum. But it is probable that he writes too much, and he is constantly confronted with his special facility for effects and with the demoralizing modern appetite for such things.

As for Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite, it requires no comment here, save the remark, that with all the adventures of Russian composers in the Orient, few have returned with such fascinating accounts as Rimsky-Korsakoff in his ("Antar") symphony and "Scheherazade" suite, and still fewer employ Oriental idioms and colors with the masterly restraint, variety, and finally unsurpassed richness of tint that he provides in a familiar but lasting masterpiece. The music is especially in Mr. Koussevitzky's vein, and it is hardly needful to say that his performance gave much pleasure to the audience.

---

by John Ernest Galliard, a contemporary of Handel, who, like Handel, was born in Germany, but pursued most of his career in England. But the free transcription for strings, flute, oboe and bassoon used yesterday is by a Russian, Maximilian Steinberg, pupil and son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Steinberg, who made this transcription especially for Mr. Koussevitzky, has wrought discreetly and effectively, his orchestral version retained the atmosphere of the time and place of a work typical of its period. Not dry, and with a distinct liveliness in the allegros which followed respectively a lento and an andante, the work, heard at least in this version, for the first time here, seemed a useful addition to our eighteenth century orchestral repertoire.

The Serges fared very well in the Prokofieff concerto, but, in spite of the well applied vigor, technical brilliance and interpretative skill of Mr. Prokofieff's playing, the work did not seem very interesting. Its flavor, very mildly, almost sweetly acid, gave at least one hearer an impression of individuality, but lack of variety of color. But it gave Mr. Pokofieff ample chance to display his notable pianistic talent.

"Scheherazade," under the Kousevitzky baton, offered no marked variations in the first and third movements from the general average of readings under other leaders. The second movement, the Calendar's Tale, had some idiosyncracies of tempo in accentuated changes and an unusual retarding followed by hurrying of the thrumming of the strings under the cadenza-like passages for woodwind; the Feast at Bagdad went mostly at a swift and furious pace, winding up with a resounding and effective crash. These two movements, very well played, gave an impression of distinct liveliness; the dash of the finale was especially effective.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TELEGRAM

[illegible] 27 [illegible]

A number of local people interested in music have been taking advantage of the delightful and ever increasing popular "Pop" concerts which have been held and still are being held in Boston Symphony hall.

The variance of the programs to suit the tastes of all who have an interest in music as well as the distinguished personnel of the orchestra is rapidly rating these concerts as one of the foremost musical attractions in Boston. People are travelling from the surrounding towns to the concerts and the Man About Town has yet to hear any who have done so, make anything other than a commendary remark as to the excellence of the managing and program of the concerts.

Several more concerts yet remain on the program for the season.

Feature

...ny Program

Koussevitzky to Introduce Scriabin's "The Divine Poem" With its Mystic Beauty at Capitol Theater Today.

A remarkable score, Scriabin's "The Divine Poem," will be a feature of the appearance of Serge Koussevitzky here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a concert in the Capitol Theater this afternoon at 3 o'clock. This Russian celebrity, now in his second season in America at the head of this orchestra, was first heard in the "Divine Poem," in this country when he performed it in Boston last week. Scriabin, the late Russian composer, may be characterized as an individualist, an idealist, and a mystic in tones. The score is in three parts. The first, "Luttes," ("Struggles"), depicts the soul torn between confident affirmation and doubt. The second, "Voluptes" has been called "the spirit's ecstatic joy in merging into nature." The third, "Jeu divan," is a final, triumphant realization of the hopes first expressed. Koussevitzky was a close friend of Scriabin in Russia, where in full sympathetic understanding with this remarkable composer, he performed his principal scores. Scriabin traveled with Koussevitzky on one of his famous voyages along the Volga river.

The French school will be represented at this concert by Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." Debussy is perhaps best known by this setting in tones of Mallarme's poem, in which the faun (characterized by the flute) tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs. This music of mood and subtle suggestion is in its way more potent than any poetry of words could be. Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of Debussy. He was the first to make the Frenchman's music known in Russia.

There will be one number of Wagner, the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Using the principal themes of this music drama, and stating them in their proper order, Wagner made his prelude a sort of condensation of the entire work. The lightness and festive mood with alternate passages of romantic loveliness which characterize Wagner's one humorous music drama are as eloquently, if more tersely, expressed in the brilliant prelude.

The program will open brilliantly with Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." The theater box-office opens at noon today. Reservations may be made from 10 a. m. or by calling 2-0375.

---

of its music to the general, its performance was of decided appeal to practically the entire house.

The novelty on the list was a graceful, delicate and enticing sonata by Gailliard, an eighteenth century French composer, b ar-ranged for small modern orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, a Russian musician of considerable achievement.

The sonata was followed by Prokofieff's piano concerto, the composer at the piano, a work held over from Thursday night's programme.

Secretary of Agriculture, the wives of a number of justices of the Supreme Court, senators, representatives and residents. The presence of the President and Mrs. Collidge was a delightful surprise all around as their coming had been unheralded. When they left, Mrs. Coolidge dropped the President at the White House and she went on to the concert of the Boston Symphony, where she occupied the presidential box and had with her Mrs. Charles S. Deneen, wife of the senator from Illinois. The first lady's costume that day was of a brownish sand colored silk with a hat of medium brim with long ostrich plume reaching from one side to the opposite shoulder.

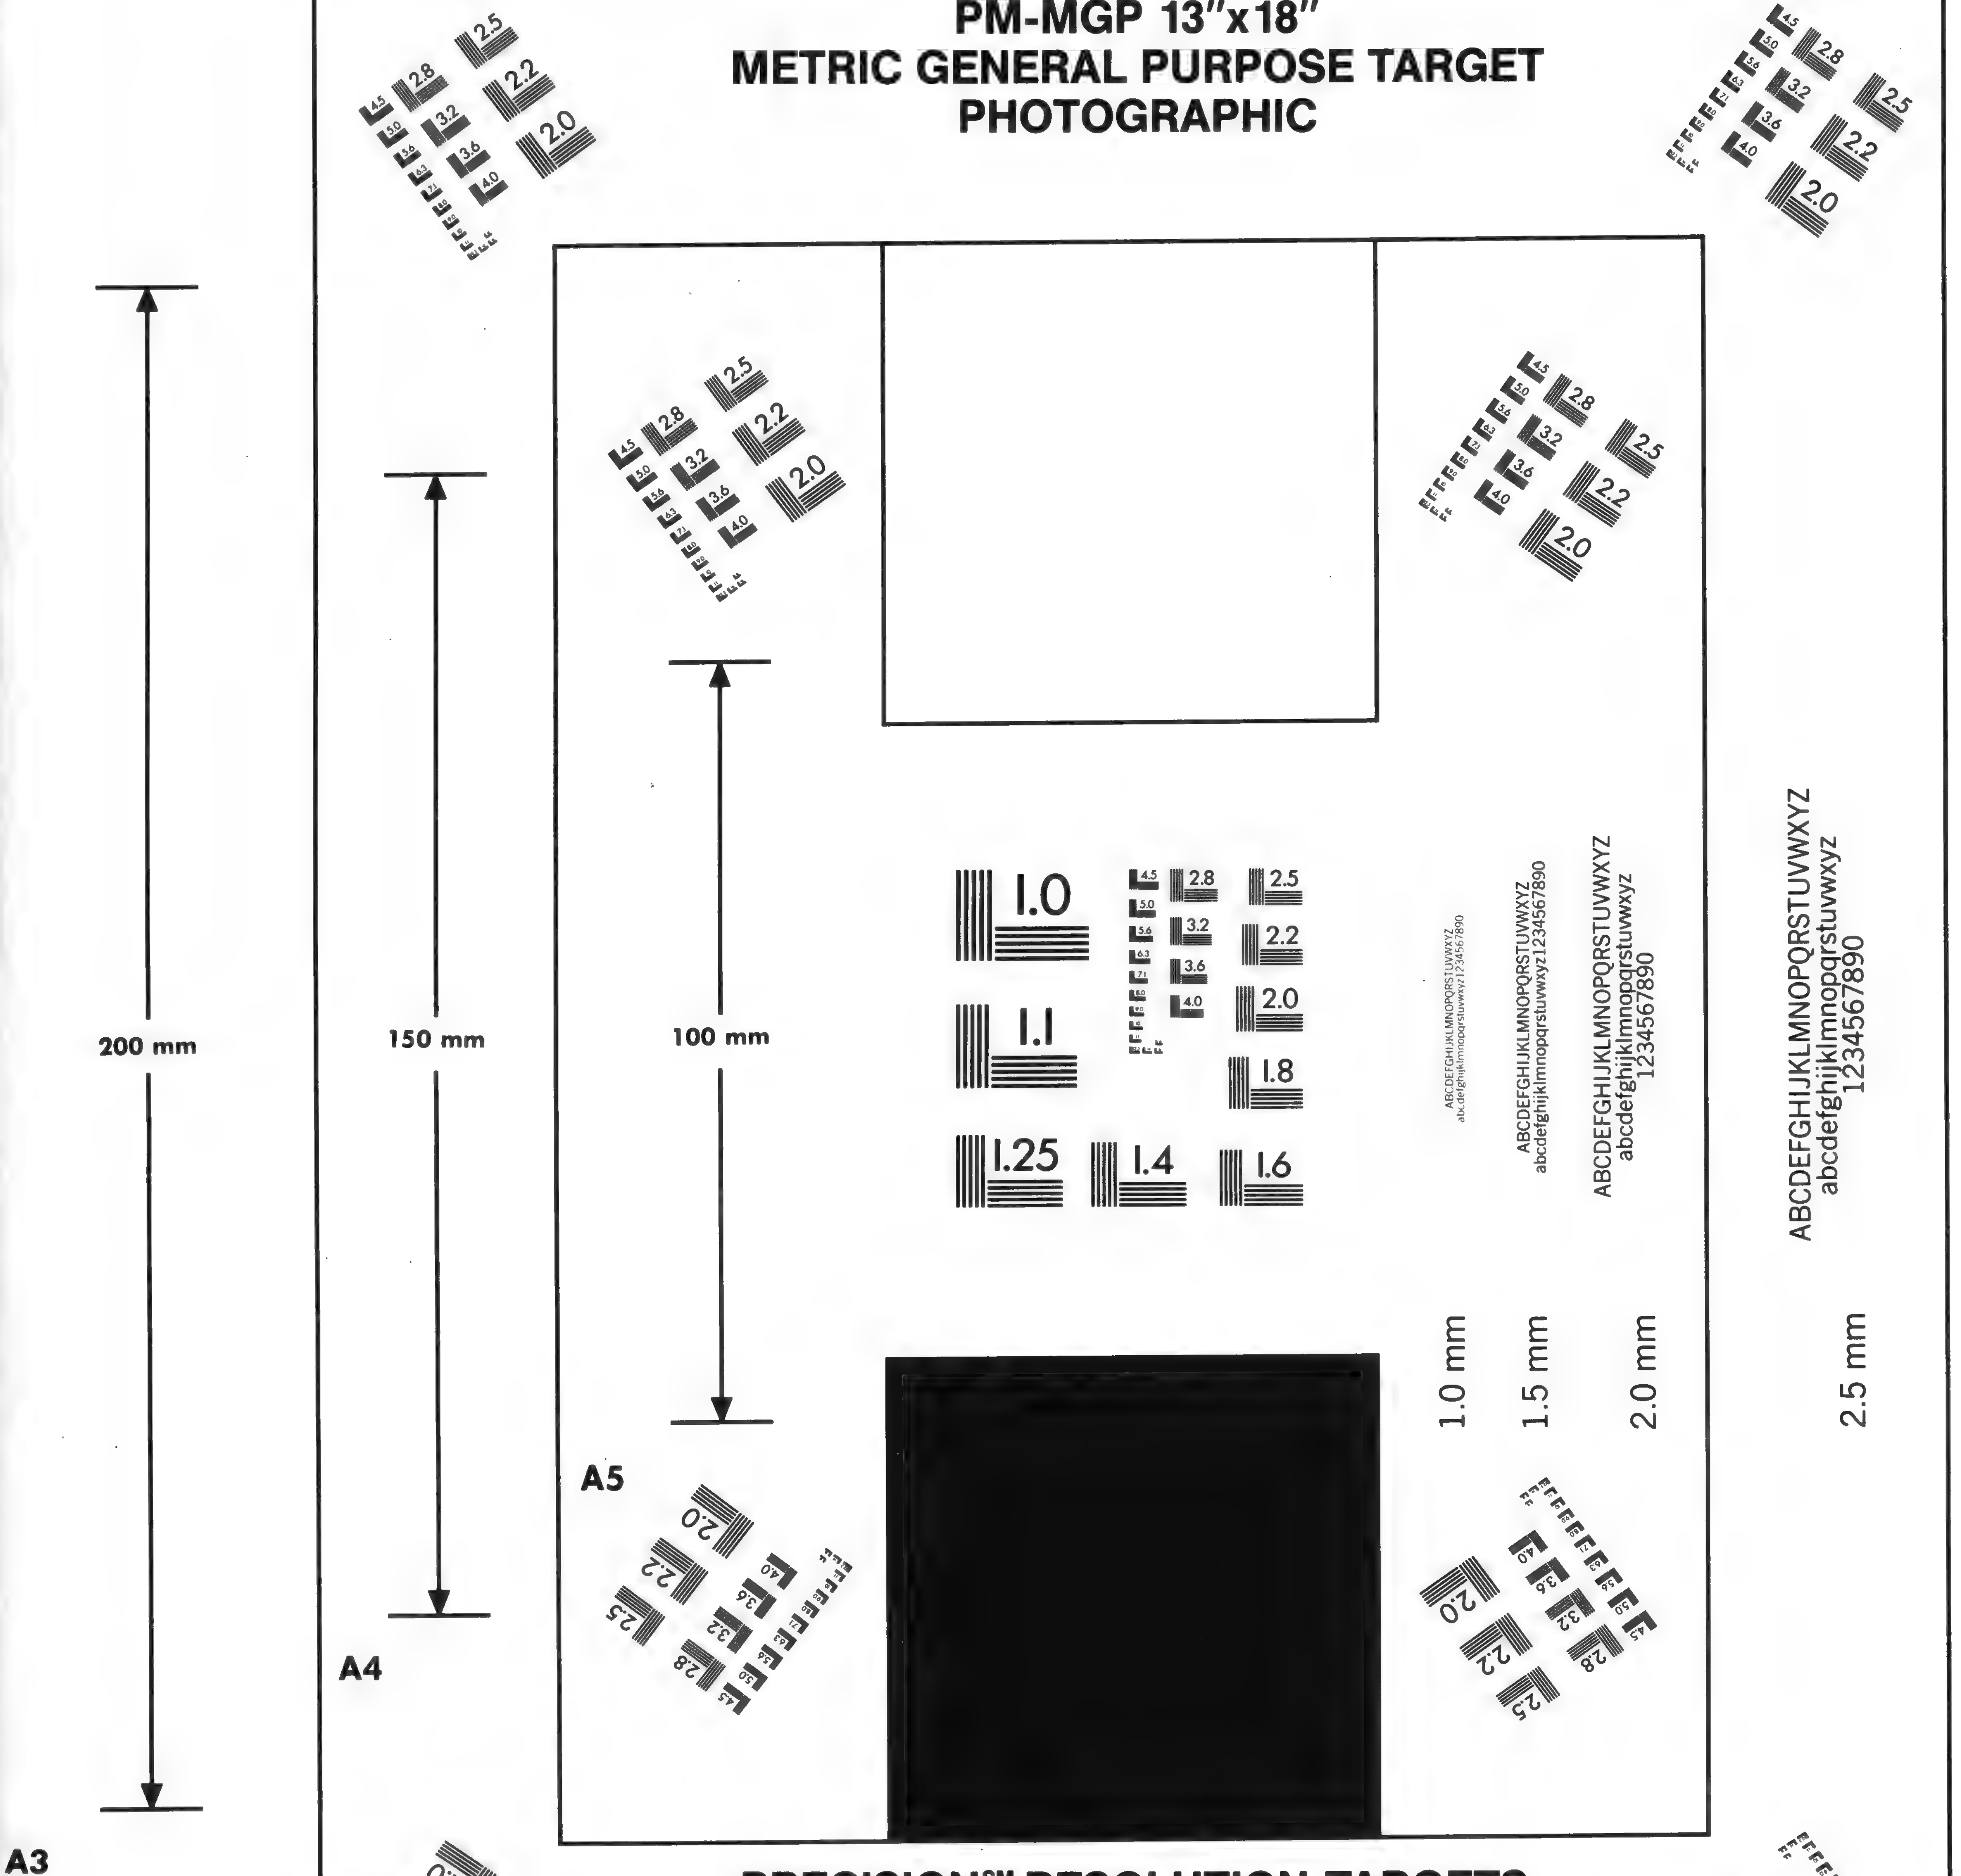
Mrs. Melvin B. Ericson, daughter of the Vice President, who came unexpectedly last month to visit her parents had a quiet little visit, not accepting invitations for entertainments, but just staying at home and enjoying her visit. She left a few days ago for New York and from there will return to her home in Evanston.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

176

FEB 13 1926

Symphony Orchestra Broadcast Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will present another of its famous radio concerts which have delighted music lovers, tonight at 8.10. The concert will be broadcast direct from Symphony Hall, Boston, by Station WEEI, which will relay it to Station WCSH, at Portland, Me. for simultaneous broadcasting.

Since inaugurating this series of Saturday night symphony concerts a few weeks ago, WEEI and the sponsors for this rare musical treat which brings directly to the homes of thousands the best in music have received many letters of appreciation.

Items of the Day

Though Respighi's new tone-poem, "Pines of Rome," is published by Casa Ricordi, which—to its credit—has no use for the radio with symphonic music, the piece is likely to be heard in the broadcasting of the Symphony Concert on Saturday evening. Faithful to their new parts as purveyors to the radio, the trustees of the orchestra have asked the desired permission and are likely to receive it

Trans Feb 11

BOSTON, May 13.—The broadcast of the Boston Symphony orchestra here tonight was cut short by an S O S call from Providence, R. I., where a four-alarm fire was in progress. The symphony musicians donned their rubber coats and tin hats and made Providence in three-quarters of an hour. They extinguished the fire with sixteen violins and two cellos. The conductor's baton also helped. The loss was confined to $250,000 and one Stradivarius.

TRANSCRIPT, FEBRUARY 13, 1926

Tune In on Beethoven

Broadcasting of the Symphony Concerts as given rise to a new symphony. A eat chorus of popular voices, concordant d united, has made itself heard in welme and praise of Boston's superlative chestra as heard on the radio. To the nefactor responsible for the broadcast tters of appreciation have come in a nall deluge from people in every walk of e, old and young, humble and high. Men affairs, who rarely give time to write eir opinions of radio programs, have been pains to express their approval in the ost positive terms. Hundreds of persons o have always been interested in good usic, and hundreds who never knew bere that they were interested in good usic, have sent word of their enjoyment of their appreciation. Even school ildren have joined in the letters of gratide.

year or two ago Mr. William Arms sher made a remarkably careful and actical nation-wide study of radio proams and of the actual wishes of the blic concerning them. He found, everyere, a strong desire expressed for betmusic in broadcasting. If ever a piece research was proved accurate in its consions, this one has been upheld by the sponse given to the Symphony Concerts the wireless. The broad- ... the to tter the ven Bewill of city not by hen

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

FEB 26 1926

Hearing an Italian Nightingale by Radio.

hen the Boston Symphony Orchesra broadcast Respighi's tone poem "The Pines of Rome.")

last! At last I hear, who never heard ightingale. I know, who had not known se moonlit forest glades where one brown bird
y make song's immortality its own.

w the winged peris of the air have brought
t of the winter sky this lyric spring;
d love, long quieted, and grief, new taught,
er beneath such poignant caroling.

bird, adored of beauty's worshipers,
g the desert night to overflowing limpid melody, what music stirs
soul with power like yours, that all unknowing,
ling the stars and spanning alien seas,
ound my heart and brought me to my knees?

Broadcasting Boston Symphony Means Expert Radio Engineering

Boston And Portland Telephone Engineers Put Week Into Hook-up Lines And Installation For Saturday Evening Concerts Through WCSH And WEEI

Arthur F. Edes, announcing Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts for WEEI, Boston.

Archie W. Legro, announcing Boston Symphony and intermission broadcasts Saturday evenings for WCSH.

To the uninitiated, the linking of broadcasting stations in mysterious. For that matter, the broadcasting of programs through a station from points outside the regular studio is also a vague procedure.

Instances have come to the attention of the officials of WCSH, the Congress Square Hotel, Portland, in which uniformed persons apparently held the belief that to broadcast a program from outside the station studio necessitated only the placing of a microphone at the stated place. Others have evidenced the opinion that a private wire must be run from the hall or theater where a program was to be presented and a microphone connecting with the radio station installed at the hall or theater, and nothing more in order to broadcast the music or voice available.

It may be of interest to radio listeners who have heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast Saturday evenings from WCSH in conjunction with WEEI of Boston to know something of the technical installation and operation that makes such hook-ups for WCSH possible.

It has been noted previously that credit for broadcasting the Boston Symphony belongs, so far as Boston and the possibility of broadcasting is concerned, to W. S. Quimby. Locally, making it possible for WCSH to broadcast the symphony, credit goes to the Rines Brothers Company of Portland who underwrote the expense of bringing the musical output of the famed Boston orchestra to the input equipment of WCSH.

To the radio engineers of the New England Telephone & Telegraph Co., both of the Boston and the Portland branches, however, belongs the credit for the pick-up and delivery to WEEI in Boston and WCSH in Portland. They worked for more than a week to arrange and install the apparatus and perfect delivery over the lines to the two radio stations, and their labors covered more than one night in that period.

Installation of the speech input equipment at Symphony Hall, Boston, where the big orchestra presents its programs, was the first step. This apparatus of necessity was placed in a position where the playing of the orchestra could not be heard by the operators during a concert. This was owing to the need of having these operator hear the music only through their loud speaker or earphones, taking the sound from the monitor circuit just as it was going out on the lines to WEEI and WCSH, so that they could fairly judge its transmission for volume, modulation and other qualities. An unfinished attic at the end of the second balcony in the building proved the best location for the speech input equipment, and this is where the operators at the hall do their work during a symphony broadcast.

The michophones were carefully placed to pick up each section of the big orchestra. These pick up the sound waves and convert them inot electrical waves or currents which pass over wires to the mixing panel of the speech input apparatus. At the mixing panel, the operators are able to control the microphones and to mix from them the proper amount of energy of each to produce the best results.

The output of the mixer is connected to an amplifier which increases the energy from the microphones. The necessity of amplification arises from the fact that unless amplified, the currents would be so weak that crosstalk might be picked up from other telephone circuits in the same cable. The volume indicator is the only unit of the input apparatus and this shows, by reading of a galvanometer the amount of power being put into the telephone line at each intsant.

It was found that the best locotian for the microphones was as follows: one over the conductor's head, for the ensemble effect; one over the right of the stage to pick up the bass viols and strings, and one at the left of the stage for the violas, harp and other instruments. Tests showed that this arrangement was ample insurance against the tones of the trumpets and shrill-toned instruments to avoid harshness.

It then remained for the telephone engineers to equalize the telephone lines to WEEI and WCSH. This was required to bring all the various frequencies of the sounds of music from approximately 100 to 5,000 cycles per second to pass over the line with the same loss. With a telephone line not properly equalized the higher frequencies undergo greater losses than the lower frequencies, which would cause distortion of music sent over the line. Equalizing the lines to WEEI and WCSH required an engineer at Symphony Hall and one in the toll test room at 125 Milk Street, Boston, another at the local toll test room in the telephone building on Forest Avenue, and others at Wakefield, at WEEI, Boston and WCSH in Portland.

At the Milk Street station, Boston, a line amplifier was used on the Portland circuit, and another at Wakefield, Mass., on the same line. None was needed at the telephone toll test room here the amplifier at WCSH being sufficient for the Portland end of the broadcast.

The men responsible for the installation at Boston and Portland include: James G. Patterson, staff engineer, in complete charge of the work; Ernest R. Moore, radio engineer, in charge of operation; his assistants, Marcy Eager, Wesley Gray, Charles C. Ables, Charles Vassell, Ralph Scott, Elmer Leavitt, all of Boston; Ralph A. Williams, transmission engineer, in charge of the Portland work, and his assistants, T. Eugene Davis, John Battles, John Tirrill and Thomas Curran, all of Portland.

The number of men required for operation during the broadcast of the Boston Symphony weekly is probably little appreciated by the general public. The personnel actually on duty during these broadcasts include:

Arthur F. Edes, announcer at Boston; Archie W. Legro, announcer at Portland; Ralph Scott, handling the amplifier at Symphony Hall; Wesley Gray, handling the amplifier at Wakefield; Thomas Curran, handling the controls at Portland toll test room; Ernest R. Moore, Ralph A. Williams, in supervision at Boston and Portland respectively.

Controlling communication on separate lines between Symphony Hall, toll test in Boston, toll test in Portland, Wakefield, WEEI and WCSH, are the following: T. Eugene Davis, John Battles, John Tirrell, Charles C. Ables, Marcy Eager.

Also necessary in broadcasting the symphony are the operators of WEEI and WCSH. At WEEI are Ralph W. Matthewson, chief operator, and his assistant, Leon Hentz; at WCSH are James E. Nicholson, chief operator, and his assistant, John R. Fraser.

76

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1926

ebits and

TONIGHT'S RADIO RAREBITS

By Richard D. Grant

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra comes again on the air tonight through WEEI and WCSH, after an absence of two weeks. During the customary brief intermission, Joseph Lautner, leader of the Harvard Glee Club and organizer of the University Double Quartet, will sing several solos from the WEEI studio. A particularly interesting incident in connection with tonight's Symphony broadcast will be the use of a phonograph for conveying the desired sound in a certain passage in one of the selections to be played. Mr. Koussevitzky was unable to decide what instrument might best imitate the song of a nightingale in Respighi's new symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," but finally solved the difficulty by substituting a phonograph record of the voice of a real nightingale The Symphony broadcast will begin at 8.10.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
NEWS

FEB 13 1926

RADIO PATRON DONATES $12,000 FOR CONCERTS

Boston, Mass., Feb. 13.—For the first time in its history, and after a long series of attempts to secure permission, concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra are to be broadcast from station WEEI through the generosity of a Boston business man, Winfield S. Quinby. Mr. Quinby has given $1,000 for each of the twelve concerts to pay for the privilege of having them broadcast from the regular Saturday afternoon programs of the orchestra at Sympathy hall

---

FEB 6 1926

Boston Symphony to Be Broadcast Over WEEI

Winfield S. Quinby Gives $1,000 for Each of Twelve Concerts

BOSTON.—For the first time in its history, and after a long series of attempts to secure permission, concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra are to be broadcast from Station WEEI through the generosity of a Boston business man, Winfield S. Quinby. Mr. Quinby has given $1,000 for each of the twelve concerts to pay for the privilege of having them broadcast from the regular Saturday afternoon programs of the orchestra at Symphony hall. The first two concerts were broadcast January 23 and 30, and one thereafter will be given each Saturday for ten additional weeks.

It is possible that the concerts will be relayed to other stations in New England

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET
FEB 13 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY BROADCAST TONIGHT

Lovers of good music will hear another programme by the Boston Symphony orchestra tonight at 8:10 from WEEI.

The programme, like all in the Boston Symphony series, is broadcast direct from Symphony Hall and is given to the radio audience of New England through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby. The orchestra will be heard under the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 7 1926

Boston Symphony Goes on the Air

Long anxious to broadcast some of its concerts, but unable to do so because of the expense involved, the Boston Symphony Orchestra finally went on the air recently through the generosity of a friend, and the very first night ran up against the copyright snag. Listeners were forced to stand by for 15 minutes while the orchestra played a number which is held under exclusive copyright by a concern which refused to let it be broadcast.

This frequently encountered problem involving the ... music held under ... up at a ... or- ... ds of ... dis- ... mber ... nfon- ... was con- ... his

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

FEB 8 1926

Y 13, 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ON AIR TONIGHT

Globe Feb 13

Joseph Lautner, Tenor, to Sing From WEEI

Lovers of good music will hear another program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight at 8:10 from WEEI and WCSH of Portland, Me.

Photo by Notman

JOSEPH LAUTNER

This program, like all in the Boston Symphony series, is broadcast direct from Symphony Hall and is given to the radio audience of New England through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby. The orchestra will be heard under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

The Symphony's program for this evening includes 3 superb compositions that have never been played in Boston as yet, and since the Symphony broadcasts only from Boston it seems that these works have never yet been broadcast.

During the brief intermission at Symphony Hall, Joseph Lautner, leader of the Harvard Glee Club and organizer of the University Double Quartet, will give several tenor solos from WEEI's studio.

FEB 14 1926

Outstanding in the week's local music schedule is the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony series Tuesday evening, ~~which will~~ be featured by the appearance of Serge Prokofieff, a leading Russian composer and piano virtuoso, who will play his "Third Piano Concerto," with Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra. Through the week ~~there~~ are also several other events of special interest including a recital this afternoon by Giuseppe Camilloni, local musician, and the University Glee Club concert, Ruth Breton, soloist, on Friday evening. Next Sunday Guy Maier and Lee Pattison appear here in a recital of music for two pianos.

* * *

A change in the programme for the symphony concert as announced last Sunday was made during the week by Conductor Koussevitzky who substituted Vivaldi's "Concerto for String Orchestra" for Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain," as the opening number. Instead of Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," will occupy the last part of the programme.

There is particular interest among local music lovers in the appearance of Mr. Prokofieff, one of the leaders of the younger generation of Russian composers and a pianist of exceptional ability. Prokofieff's Concerto has been performed by the orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston and New York, with the composer appearing as soloist, and everywhere it has excited unusual enthusiasm. Incidentally, Mr. Prokofieff is the first soloist to appear here with the orchestra this season.

Another feature of the concert will be the performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite. The eloquent interpretation on this score by Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians is reported to have caused great admiration when performed in Boston and New York recently.

The revised programme, which is described in Warren Storey Smith's article, is as follows: "Concerto for String Orchestra," (Vigoroso, Largo, Allegro) Vi- ... edited by A. ...stovski; "Third

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

FEB 1 1926

WCSH To Hook Up With WEEI Monday Nights

Black Iron Shiners Will Feature Weekly Program

Another hook-up with WEEI, the Edison Electric Illuminating Company of Boston, has been accomplished for WCSH, the Congress Square Hotel of Portland. This time it is a treat for those who are fond of old fashioned dance music, and these radio listeners who have already become familiar with this particular broadcast from WEEI on Monday evenings from 7.30 to 8.15 will find it available from WCSH hereafter at the same hour.

Beginning this evening at 7.30, WCSH in its hook-up with WEEI will broadcast each Monday night the Black Iron Shriners, an old fashioned dance orchestra of excellence. The Black Iron Shriners have been on the air on Monday evenings from WEEI for some time.

WCSH has for several weeks been connected with WEEI for the broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evenings from Symphony Hall, Boston, but the connections with the WEEI studio in the Edison Building, Boston, were not established until a day or two ago. These having been put through however,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM STATES
NEW ORLEANS, LA.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

FEB 17 1926

In the Boston Symphony concerts this week the excellent choir of the Cecelia Society, prepared by Malcolm Lang, will share the program with the orchestra in an all-Liszt program. First will come the abbe's musical setting of Psalm XIII., for tenor solo, chorus and orchestra in which Charles Stratton will sing the solo part. The principal item on the program will be A Faust Symphony in which the composer attempted to draw three character pictures in music—Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles. In this symphony the voices are not employed until the final pages of the work. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct.

FEB 1 3 1926

Symphony Orchestra Broadcast Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will present another of its famous radio concerts which have delighted music lovers, tonight at 8.10. The concert will be broadcast direct from Symphony Hall, Boston, by Station WEEI, which will relay it to Station WCSH, at Portland, Me. for simultaneous broadcasting.

Since inaugurating this series of Saturday night symphony concerts a few weeks ago, WEEI and the sponsors for this rare musical treat which brings directly to the homes of thousands the best in music have received many letters of appreciation.

Items of the Day

Though Respighi's new tone-poem, "Pines of Rome," is published by Casa Ricordi, which—to its credit—has no use for the radio with symphonic music, the piece is likely to be heard in the broadcasting of the Symphony Concert on Saturday evening. Faithful to their new parts as purveyors to the radio, the trustees of the orchestra have asked the desired permission and are likely to receive it

Trans Feb 11

BOSTON, May 13.—The broadcast of the Boston Symphony orchestra here tonight ~~was cut~~ short by an S O S call from Providence, R. I., where a four-alarm fire was in progress. The symphony musicians donned their rubber coats and tin hats and made Providence in three-quarters of an hour. They extinguished the fire with sixteen violins and two cellos. The conductor's baton also helped. The loss was confined to $250,000 and one Stradivarius.

TRANSCRIPT,

FEBRUARY 13, 1926

Tune In on Beethoven

Broadcasting of the Symphony Concerts as given rise to a new symphony. A eat chorus of popular voices, concordant d united, has made itself heard in welme and praise of Boston's superlative chestra as heard on the radio. To the nefactor responsible for the broadcast tters of appreciation have come in a nall deluge from people in every walk of e, old and young, humble and high. Men affairs, who rarely give time to write eir opinions of radio programs, have been pains to express their approval in the ost positive terms. Hundreds of persons io have always been interested in good usic, and hundreds who never knew bere that they were interested in good usic, have sent word of their enjoyment d of their appreciation. Even school ildren have joined in the letters of gratiie.

A year or two ago Mr. William Arms sher made a remarkably careful and actical nation-wide study of radio proams, and of the actual wishes of the blic concerning them. He found, everyere, a strong desire expressed for bet- music in broadcasting. If ever a piece research was proved accurate in its conisions, this one has been upheld by the sponse given to the Symphony Concerts r the wireless. The broad-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

FEB 2 6 1926

Hearing an Italian Nightingale by Radio.

hen the Boston Symphony Orchesra broadcast Respighi's tone poem "The Pines of Rome.")

last! At last I hear, who never heard ightingale, I know, who had not known
se moonlit forest glades where one brown bird
y make song's immortality its own.

w the winged peris of the air have brought
t of the winter sky this lyric spring:
d love, long quieted, and grief, new taught,
er beneath such poignant caroling.

bird, adored of beauty's worshipers,
ig the desert night to overflowing
limpid melody, what music stirs
soul with power like yours, that all unknowing,
ling the stars and spanning alien seas,
ound my heart and brought me to my knees?

[illegible]

Broadcasting Boston Symphony Means Expert Radio Engineering

Boston And Portland Telephone Engineers Put Week Into Hook-up Lines And Installation For Saturday Evening Concerts Through WCSH And WEEI

Arthur F. Edes, announcing Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts for WEEI, Boston.

Archie W. Legro, announcing Boston Symphony and intermission broadcasts Saturday evenings for WCSH.

To the uninitiated, the linking of broadcasting stations in mysterious. For that matter, the broadcasting of programs through a station from points outside the regular studio is also a vague procedure.

Instances have come to the attention of the officials of WCSH, the Congress Square Hotel, Portland, in which uniformed persons apparently held the belief that to broadcast a program from outside the station studio necessitated only the placing of a microphone at the stated place. Others have evidenced the opinion that a private wire must be run from the hall or theater where a program was to be presented and a microphone connecting with the radio station installed at the hall or theater, and nothing more in order to broadcast the music or voice available.

It may be of interest to radio listeners who have heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast Saturday evenings from WCSH in conjunction with WEEI of Boston to know something of the technical installation and operation that makes such hook-ups for WCSH possible.

It has been noted previously that credit for broadcasting the Boston Symphony belongs, so far as Boston and the possibility of broadcasting is concerned, to W. S. Quinby. Locally, making it possible for WCSH to broadcast the symphony, credit goes to the Rines Brothers Company of Portland who underwrote the expense of bringing the musical output of the famed Boston orchestra to the input equipment of WCSH.

To tho radio engineers of the New England Telephone & Telegraph Co., both of the Boston and the Portland branches, however, belongs the credit for the pick-up and delivery to WEEI in Boston and WCSH in Portland. They worked for more than a week to arrange and install the apparatus and perfect delivery over the lines to the two radio stations, and their labors covered more than one night in that period.

Installation of the speech input equipment at Symphony Hall, Boston, where the big orchestra presents its programs, was the first step. This apparatus of necessity was placed in a position where the playing of the orchestra could not be heard by the operators during a concert. This was owing to the need of having these operator hear the music only through their loud speaker or earphones, taking the sound from the monitor circuit just as it was going out on the lines to WEEI and WCSH, so that they could fairly judge its transmission for volume, modulation and other qualities. An unfinished attic at the end of the second balcony in the building proved the best location for the speech input equipment, and this is where the operators at the hall do their work during a symphony broadcast.

The michophones were carefully placed to pick up each section of the big orchestra. These pick up the sound waves and convert them inot electrical waves or currents which pass over wires to the mixing panel of the speech input apparatus. At the mixing panel, the operators are able to control the microphones and to mix from them the proper amount of energy of each to produce the best results.

The output of the mixer is connected to an amplifier which increases the energy from the microphones. The necessity of amplification arises from the fact that unless amplified, the currents would be so weak that crosstalk might be picked up from other telephone circuits in the same cable. The volume indicator is the only unit of the input apparatus and this shows, by reading of a galvanometer the amount of power being put into the telephone line at each intsant.

It was found that the best locotian for the microphones was as follows: one over the conductor's head, for the ensemble effect; one over the right of the stage to pick up the bass viols and strings, and one at the left of the stage for the violas, harps and other instruments. Tests showed that this arrangement was ample insurance against the tones of the trumpets and shrill-toned instruments to avoid harshness.

It then remained for the telephone engineers to equalize the telephone lines to WEEI and WCSH. This was required to bring all the various frequencies of the sounds of music from approximately 100 to 5,000 cycles per second to pass over the line with the same loss. With a telephone line not properly equalized the higher frequencies undergo greater losses than the lower frequencies, which would cause distortion of music sent over the line. Equalizing the lines to WEEI and WCSH required an engineer at Symphony Hall and one in the toll test room at 125 Milk Street, Boston, another at the local toll test room in the telephone building on Forest Avenue, and others at Wakefield, at WEEI, Boston and WCSH in Portland.

At the Milk Street station, Boston, a line amplifier was used on the Portland circuit, and another at Wakefield, Mass., on the same line. None was needed at the telephone toll test room here the amplifier at WCSH being sufficient for the Portland end of the broadcast.

The men responsible for the installation at Boston and Portland include: James G. Patterson, staff engineer, in complete charge of the work; Ernest R. Moore, radio engineer, in charge of operation; his assistants, Marcy Eager, Wesley Gray, Charles C. Ables, Charles Vassell, Ralph Scott, Elmer Leavitt, all of Boston: Ralph A. Williams, transmission engineer, in charge of the Portland work, and his assistants, T. Eugene Davis, John Battles, John Tirrill and Thomas Curran, all of Portland.

The number of men required for operation during the broadcast of the Boston Symphony weekly is probably little appreciated by the general public. The personnel actually on duty during these broadcasts include:

Arthur F. Edes, announcer at Boston; Archie W. Legro, announcer at Portland; Ralph Scott, handling the amplifier at Symphony Hall; Wesley Gray, handling the amplifier at Wakefield; Thomas Curran, handling the controls at Portland toll test room; Ernest R. Moore, Ralph A. Williams, in supervision at Boston and Portland respectively.

Controlling communication on separate lines between Symphony Hall, toll test in Boston, toll test in Portland, Wakefield, WEEI and WCSH, are the following: T. Eugene Davis, John Battles, John Tirrell, Charles C. Ables, Marcy Eager.

Also necessary in broadcasting the symphony are the operators of WEEI and WCSH. At WEEI are Ralph W. Matthewson, chief operator, and his assistant, Leon Hentz; at WCSH are James E. Nicholson, chief operator, and his assistant, John R. Fraser.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY

FEBRUARY 13, 1926

ebits and

TONIGHT'S RADIO RAREBITS

By Richard D. Grant

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra comes again on the air tonight through WEEI and WCSH, after an absence of two weeks. During the customary brief intermission, Joseph Lautner, leader of the Harvard Glee Club and organizer of the University Double Quartet, will sing several solos from the WEEI studio. A particularly interesting incident in connection with tonight's Symphony broadcast will be the use of a phonograph for conveying the desired sound in a certain passage in one of the selections to be played. Mr. Koussevitzky was unable to decide what instrument might best imitate the song of a nightingale in Respighi's new symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," but finally solved the difficulty by substituting a phonograph record of the voice of a real nightingale The Symphony broadcast will begin at 8.10.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
NEWS

FEB 1 2 1926

RADIO PATRON DONATES $12,000 FOR CONCERTS

Boston, Mass., Feb. 13.—For the first time in its history, and after a long series of attempts to secure permission, concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra are to be broadcast from station WEEI through the generosity of a Boston business man, Winfield S. Quinby. Mr. Quinby has given $1,000 for each of the twelve concerts to pay for the privilege of having them broadcast from the regular Saturday afternoon programs of the orchestra at Sympathy hall.

FEB 6 1926

Boston Symphony to Be Broadcast Over WEEI

Winfield S. Quinby Gives $1,000 for Each of Twelve Concerts

BOSTON.—For the first time in its history, and after a long series of attempts to secure permission, concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra are to be broadcast from Station WEEI through the generosity of a Boston business man, Winfield S. Quinby. Mr. Quinby has given $1,000 for each of the twelve concerts to pay for the privilege of having them broadcast from the regular Saturday afternoon programs of the orchestra at Symphony hall. The first two concerts were broadcast January 23 and 30, and one thereafter will be given each Saturday for ten additional weeks.

It is possible that the concerts will be relayed to other stations in New Eng-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET
FEB 13 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY BROADCAST TONIGHT

Lovers of good music will hear another programme by the Boston Symphony orchestra tonight at 8:10 from WEEI.

The programme, like all in the Boston Symphony series, is broadcast direct from Symphony Hall and is given to the radio audience of New England through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby. The orchestra will be heard under the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 7 1926

Boston Symphony Goes on the Air

Long anxious to broadcast some of its concerts, but unable to do so because of the expense involved, the Boston Symphony Orchestra finally went on the air recently through the generosity of a friend, and the very first night ran up against the copyright snag. Listeners were forced to stand by for 15 minutes while the orchestra played a number which is held under exclusive copyright by a concern which refused to let it be broadcast.

This frequently encountered problem involving the b[illegible] music held under

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

FEB 8 1926

Y 13, 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ON AIR TONIGHT

Globe — Feb 13

Joseph Lautner, Tenor, to Sing From WEEI

Lovers of good music will hear another program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight at 8:10 from WEEI and WCSH of Portland, Me.

Photo by Notman

JOSEPH LAUTNER

This program, like all in the Boston Symphony series, is broadcast direct from Symphony Hall and is given to the radio audience of New England through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby. The orchestra will be heard under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

The Symphony's program for this evening includes 3 superb compositions that have never been played in Boston as yet, and since the Symphony broadcasts only from Boston it seems that these works have never yet been broadcast.

During the brief intermission at Symphony Hall, Joseph Lautner, leader of the Harvard Glee Club and organizer of the University Double Quartet, will give several tenor solos from WEEI's studio.

JOURNAL

176

[illegible] 2 1926

Outstanding in the week's local music schedule is the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony series Tuesday evening, which will be featured by the appearance of Serge Prokofieff, a leading Russian composer and piano virtuoso, who will play his "Third Piano Concerto," with Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra. Through the week there are also several other events of special interest including a recital this afternoon by Giuseppe Camilloni, local musician, and the University Glee Club concert, Ruth Breton, soloist, on Friday evening. Next Sunday Guy Maier and Lee Pattison appear here in a recital of music for two pianos.

* * *

A change in the programme [illegible] symphony concert as announced last Sunday was made during the week by Conductor Kou[illegible]tzky who substituted Vivaldi's "Concerto for String Orchestra" for Moussorgsky's "A Night on [illegible] Mountain," as the opening number instead of Scriabin's Third Symphony, [illegible] Divine Poem. Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," will occ[illegible] the last part of the programme.

There is particular interest among [illegible] music lovers in the appearance of [illegible] Prokofieff, one of the leaders of the younger generation of Russian composers [illegible] a pianist of [illegible] ability. Prokofieff [illegible] Concerto has been performed by the orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston and New [illegible] with the composer appearing as [illegible] and everywhere it has excited un[illegible] enthusiasm. Incidentally, Mr. Prokofi[illegible] the first soloist to appear [illegible] orchestra this [illegible] son.

Anoth[illegible] of the concert will be the perf[illegible] of Rimsky-Korsakov [illegible] Symphoni[illegible] The eloquent interpretation on [illegible] by Mr. Koussevitzky and his [illegible] is reported to have caused grea[illegible] when performed in Boston [illegible] New York recently.

The revis[illegible] programme, which is described in [illegible] Storey Smith's article, is as follow[illegible] Concerto for String Orchestra." ([illegible] Largo, Allegro) Vi[illegible] edited [illegible] Zelstovski: "Third [illegible] Op. 26 (Andante A[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

FEB [illegible]

WCSH To Hook Up With WEEI Monday Nights

Black Iron Shiners Will Feature Weekly Program

Another hook-up with WEEI, the Edison Electric Illuminating Company of Boston, has been accomplished for WCSH, the Congress Square Hotel of Portland. This time it is a treat for those who are fond of old fashioned dance music, and these radio listeners who have already become familiar with this particular broadcast from WEEI on Monday evenings from 7.30 to 8.15 will find it available from WCSH hereafter at the same hour.

Beginning this evening at 7.30, WCSH in its hook-up with WEEI will broadcast each Monday night the Black Iron Shriners, an old fashioned dance orchestra of excellence. The Black Iron Shriners have been on the air on Monday evenings from WEEI for some time.

WCSH has for several weeks been connected with WEEI for the broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evenings from Symphony Hall, Boston, but the connections with the WEEI studio in the Edison Building, Boston, were not established until a day or two ago. These having been put through however. WCSH

THIS CLIPPING FROM
STATES
NEW ORLEANS, LA.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

FEB 1 1926

In the Boston Symphony concerts this week the excellent choir of the Cecelia Society, prepared by Malcolm Lang, will share the program with the orchestra in an all-Liszt program. First will come the abbe's musical setting of Psalm XIII. for tenor solo, chorus and orchestra in which Charles Stratton will sing the solo part. The principal item on the program will be A Faust Symphony in which the composer attempted to draw three character pictures in music—Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles. In this symphony the voices are not employed until the final pages of the work. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct.

176

FEB 1 3 1926

Symphony Orchestra Broadcast Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will present another of its famous radio concerts which have delighted music lovers, tonight at 8.10. The concert will be broadcast direct from Symphony Hall, Boston, by Station WEEI, which will relay it to Station WCSH, at Portland, Me. for simultaneous broadcasting.

Since inaugurating this series of Saturday night symphony concerts a few weeks ago, WEEI and the sponsors for this rare musical treat which brings directly to the homes of thousands the best in music have received many letters of appreciation.

Items of the Day

Though Respighi's new tone-poem, "Pines of Rome," is published by Casa Ricordi, which—to its credit—has no use for the radio with symphonic music, the piece is likely to be heard in the broadcasting of the Symphony Concert on Saturday evening. Faithful to their new parts as purveyors to the radio, the trustees of the orchestra have asked the desired permission and are likely to receive it

Trans Feb 11

BOSTON, May 13.—The broadcast of the Boston Symphony orchestra here tonight was cut short by an S O S call from Providence, R. I., where a four-alarm fire was in progress. The symphony musicians donned their rubber coats and tin hats and made Providence in three-quarters of an hour. They extinguished the fire with sixteen violins and two cellos. The conductor's baton also helped. The loss was confined to $250,000 and one Stradivarius.

TRANSCRIPT,
FEBRUARY 13, 1926

Tune In on Beethoven

Broadcasting of the Symphony Concerts has given rise to a new symphony. A great chorus of popular voices, concordant and united, has made itself heard in welcome and praise of Boston's superlative orchestra as heard on the radio. To the benefactor responsible for the broadcast letters of appreciation have come in a small deluge from people in every walk of life, old and young, humble and high. Men of affairs, who rarely give time to write their opinions of radio programs, have been at pains to express their approval in the most positive terms. Hundreds of persons who have always been interested in good music, and hundreds who never knew before that they were interested in good music, have sent word of their enjoyment and of their appreciation. Even school children have joined in the letters of gratitude.

A year or two ago Mr. William Arms Fisher made a remarkably careful and practical nation-wide study of radio programs, and of the actual wishes of the public concerning them. He found, everywhere, a strong desire expressed for better music in broadcasting. If ever a piece of research was proved accurate in its conclusions, this one has been upheld by the response given to the Symphony Concerts on the wireless. The broadcasting of the concerts has made directly available to thousands of listeners not only "better music" but supremely good music; and the offering has been acclaimed beyond even the donor's most hopeful anticipations. Beyond question, this series on the radio will contribute to a general elevation of the public's taste in music, and capacity for enjoyment of the best. If you cannot attend the Symphony Concert tonight, by all means tune in to the orchestra when Mr. Koussevitzky lifts his baton.

Broadcasting Boston Symphony Means Expert Radio Engineering

Boston And Portland Telephone Engineers Put Week Into Hook-up Lines And Installation For Saturday Evening Concerts Through WCSH And WEEI

Arthur F. Edes, announcing Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts for WEEI, Boston.

Archie W. Legro, announcing Boston Symphony and intermission broadcasts Saturday evenings for WCSH.

To the uninitiated, the linking of broadcasting stations in mysterious. For that matter, the broadcasting of programs through a station from points outside the regular studio is also a vague procedure.

Instances have come to the attention of the officials of WCSH, the Congress Square Hotel, Portland, in which uninformed persons apparently held the belief that to broadcast a program from outside the station studio necessitated only the placing of a microphone at the stated place. Others have evidenced the opinion that a private wire must be run from the hall or theater where a program was to be presented and a microphone connecting with the radio station installed at the hall or theater, and nothing more in order to broadcast the music or voice available.

It may be of interest to radio listeners who have heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast Saturday evenings from WCSH in conjunction with WEEI of Boston to know something of the technical installation and operation that makes such hook-ups for WCSH possible.

It has been noted previously that credit for broadcasting the Boston Symphony belongs, so far as Boston and the possibility of broadcasting is concerned, to W. S. Quimby. Locally, making it possible for WCSH to broadcast the symphony, credit goes to the Rines Brothers Company of Portland who underwrote the expense of bringing the musical output of the famed Boston orchestra to the input equipment of WCSH.

To the radio engineers of the New England Telephone & Telegraph Co., both of the Boston and the Portland branches, however, belongs the credit for the pick-up and delivery to WEEI in Boston and WCSH in Portland. They worked for more than a week to arrange and install the apparatus and perfect delivery over the lines to the two radio stations, and their labors covered more than one night in that period.

Installation of the speech input equipment at Symphony Hall, Boston, where the big orchestra presents its programs, was the first step. This apparatus of necessity was placed in a position where the playing of the orchestra could not be heard by the operators during a concert. This was owing to the need of having these operator hear the music only through their loud speaker or earphones, taking the sound from the monitor circuit just as it was going out on the lines to WEEI and WCSH, so that they could fairly judge its transmission for volume, modulation and other qualities. An unfinished attic at the end of the second balcony in the building proved the best location for the speech input equipment, and this is where the operators at the hall do their work during a symphony broadcast.

The michophones were carefully placed to pick up each section of the big orchestra. These pick up the sound waves and convert them inot electrical waves or currents which pass over wires to the mixing panel of the speech input apparatus. At the mixing panel, the operators are able to control the microphones and to mix from them the proper amount of energy of each to produce the best results.

The output of the mixer is connected to an amplifier which increases the energy from the microphones. The necessity of amplification arises from the fact that unless amplified, the currents would be so weak that crosstalk might be picked up from other telephone circuits in the same cable. The volume indicator is the only unit of the input apparatus and this shows, by reading of a galvanometer the amount of power being put into the telephone line at each intsant.

It was found that the best locotian for the microphones was as follows: one over the conductor's head, for the ensemble effect; one over the right of the stage to pick up the bass viols and strings, and one at the left of the stage for the violas, harp and other instruments. Tests showed that this arrangement was ample insurance against the tones of the trumpets and shrill-toned instruments to avoid harshness.

It then remained for the telephone engineers to equalize the telephone lines to WEEI and WCSH. This was required to bring all the various frequencies of the sounds of music from approximately 100 to 5,000 cycles per second to pass over the line with the same loss. With a telephone line not properly equalized the higher frequencies undergo greater losses than the lower frequencies, which would cause distortion of music sent over the line. Equalizing the lines to WEEI and WCSH required an engineer at Symphony Hall and one in the toll test room at 125 Milk Street, Boston, another at the local toll test room in the telephone building on Forest Avenue, and others at Wakefield, at WEEI, Boston and WCSH in Portland.

At the Milk Street station, Boston, a line amplifier was used on the Portland circuit, and another at Wakefield, Mass., on the same line. None was needed at the telephone toll test room here the amplifier at WCSH being sufficient for the Portland end of the broadcast.

The men responsible for the installation at Boston and Portland include: James G. Patterson, staff engineer, in complete charge of the work; Ernest R. Moore, radio engineer, in charge of operation; his assistants, Marcy Eager, Wesley Gray, Charles C. Ables, Charles Vassell, Ralph Scott, Elmer Leavitt, all of Boston; Ralph A. Williams, transmission engineer, in charge of the Portland work, and his assistants, T. Eugene Davis, John Battles, John Tirrill and Thomas Curran, all of Portland.

The number of men required for operation during the broadcast of the Boston Symphony weekly is probably little appreciated by the general public. The personnel actually on duty during these broadcasts include:

Arthur F. Edes, announcer at Boston; Archie W. Legro, announcer at Portland; Ralph Scott, handling the amplifier at Symphony Hall; Wesley Gray, handling the amplifier at Wakefield; Thomas Curran, handling the controls at Portland toll test room; Ernest R. Moore, Ralph A. Williams, in supervision at Boston and Portland respectively.

Controlling communication on separate lines between Symphony Hall, toll test in Boston, toll test in Portland, Wakefield, WEEI and WCSH, are the following: T. Eugene Davis, John Battles, John Tirrell, Charles C. Ables, Marcy Eager.

Also necessary in broadcasting the symphony are the operators of WEEI and WCSH. At WEEI are Ralph W. Matthewson, chief operator, and his assistant, Leon Hentz; at WCSH are James E. Nicholson, chief operator, and his assistant, John R. Fraser.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY,
FEBRUARY 13, 1926

TONIGHT'S RADIO RAREBITS

By Richard D. Grant

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra comes again on the air tonight through WEEI and WCSH, after an absence of two weeks. During the customary brief intermission, Joseph Lautner, leader of the Harvard Glee Club and organizer of the University Double Quartet, will sing several solos from the WEEI studio. A particularly interesting incident in connection with tonight's Symphony broadcast will be the use of a phonograph for conveying the desired sound in a certain passage in one of the selections to be played. Mr. Koussevitzky was unable to decide what instrument might best imitate the song of a nightingale in Respighi's new symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," but finally solved the difficulty by substituting a phonograph record of the voice of a real nightingale. The Symphony broadcast will begin at 8.10.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
NEWS

FEB 1 3 1926

RADIO PATRON DONATES $12,000 FOR CONCERTS

Boston, Mass., Feb. 13.—For the first time in its history, and after a long series of attempts to secure permission, concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra are to be broadcast from station WEEI through the generosity of a Boston business man, Winfield S. Quinby. Mr. Quinby has given $1,000 for each of the twelve concerts to pay for the privilege of having them broadcast from the regular Saturday afternoon programs of the orchestra at Sympathy hall.

FEB 6 1926

Boston Symphony to Be Broadcast Over WEEI

Winfield S. Quinby Gives $1,000 for Each of Twelve Concerts

BOSTON.—For the first time in its history, and after a long series of attempts to secure permission, concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra are to be broadcast from Station WEEI through the generosity of a Boston business man, Winfield S. Quinby. Mr. Quinby has given $1,000 for each of the twelve concerts to pay for the privilege of having them broadcast from the regular Saturday afternoon programs of the orchestra at Symphony hall. The first two concerts were broadcast January 23 and 30, and one thereafter will be given each Saturday for ten additional weeks.

It is possible that the concerts will be relayed to other stations in New England

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET
FEB 13 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY BROADCAST TONIGHT

Lovers of good music will hear another programme by the Boston Symphony orchestra tonight at 8:10 from WEEI.

The programme, like all in the Boston Symphony series, is broadcast direct from Symphony Hall and is given to the radio audience of New England through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby. The orchestra will be heard under the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 7 1926

Boston Symphony Goes on the Air

Long anxious to broadcast some of its concerts, but unable to do so because of the expense involved, the Boston Symphony Orchestra finally went on the air recently through the generosity of a friend, and the very first night ran up against the copyright snag. Listeners were forced to stand by for 15 minutes while the orchestra played a number which is held under exclusive copyright by a concern which refused to let it be broadcast.

This frequently encountered problem involving the broadcasting of music held under exclusive copyright bobbed up at a peculiarly annoying time. It was the orchestra's debut on the air, thousands of listeners who had tuned in were displeased at the wait, and the number which caused the trouble was "Sinfonietta" by Eugene Goossens, who was appearing that evening as guest conductor, and who was anxious that his work should be made available to the radio audience as well as to those in Symphony Hall.

As a result of the difficulty, thousands of letters from music lovers and radio fans throughout New England poured in with the request that some arrangement be made to obviate similar interruptions in future concerts. It happened that Serge Koussevitsky had arranged a programme for the second broadcast which included no music with exclusive copyrights, and it seems probable now that all broadcast programmes will be so arranged in the future.

Confronted with the same problem, Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra, which broadcasts concerts from New York frequently, has omitted all music with an exclusive copyright when he has not been able to obtain permission to broadcast it. Orchestras in Philadelphia and Cincinnati have followed his example.

Despite protests of radio stations and listeners throughout the country, a ruling was made about a year ago in favor of the American Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers to prevent matter controlled by them to be broadcast without their permission. When permission cannot be obtained, the microphone must be shut off while the piece is being rendered. It is felt by those interested in the broadcasting of the symphony concerts that if long breaks in the programme occur there will be considerably less interest in the concerts among radio fans.

MENU FOR SUNDAY, FEB 14

BREAKFAST
Tangerines.
Dry Cereal with Cream.
Baked Beans. Mustard Pickle.
Brown Bread.
Doughnuts. Coffee.

DINNER
Cream of Spinach Soup.
Olives. Stuffed Celery.
Roast Lamb. Mint Sauce.
Creamed Potatoes. Boiled Squash.
Fruit Salad.
Orange Sherbet. Coffee.

SUPPER
Chicken Salad.
Valentine Sandwiches.
Ginger Hearts.
Tea.

DOUGHNUTS
Beat 2 eggs until light

FEB 1 4 1926

Outstanding in the week's local music schedule is the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony series Tuesday evening, which will be featured by the appearance of Serge Prokofieff, a leading Russian composer and piano virtuoso, who will play his "Third Piano Concerto," with Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra. Through the week there are also several other events of special interest including a recital this afternoon by Giuseppe Camilloni, local musician, and the University Glee Club concert, Ruth Breton, soloist, on Friday evening. Next Sunday Guy Maier and Lee Pattison appear here in a recital of music for two pianos.

* * *

A change in the programme for the symphony concert as announced last Sunday was made during the week by Conductor Koussevitzky who substituted Vivaldi's "Concerto for String Orchestra" for Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain," as the opening number. Instead of Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," will occupy the last part of the programme.

There is particular interest among local music lovers in the appearance of Mr. Prokofieff, one of the leaders of the younger generation of Russian composers and a pianist of exceptional ability. Prokofieff's Concerto has been performed by the orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston and New York, with the composer appearing as soloist, and everywhere it has excited unusual enthusiasm. Incidentally, Mr. Prokofieff is the first soloist to appear here with the orchestra this season.

Another feature of the concert will be the performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite. The eloquent interpretation on this score by Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians is reported to have caused great admiration when performed in Boston and New York recently.

The revised programme, which is described in Warren Storey Smith's article, is as follows: "Concerto for String Orchestra," (Vigoroso, Largo, Allegro) Vivaldi, edited by A. [illegible]stovski; "Third

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

FEB 1 4 1926

WCSH To Hook Up With WEEI Monday Nights

Black Iron Shiners Will Feature Weekly Program

Another hook-up with WEEI, the Edison Electric Illuminating Company of Boston, has been accomplished for WCSH, the Congress Square Hotel of Portland. This time it is a treat for those who are fond of old fashioned dance music, and these radio listeners who have already become familiar with this particular broadcast from WEEI on Monday evenings from 7.30 to 8.15 will find it available from WCSH hereafter at the same hour.

Beginning this evening at 7.30, WCSH in its hook-up with WEEI will broadcast each Monday night the Black Iron Shriners, an old fashioned dance orchestra of excellence. The Black Iron Shriners have been on the air on Monday evenings from WEEI for some time.

WCSH has for several weeks been connected with WEEI for the broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evenings from Symphony Hall, Boston, but the connections with the WEEI studio in the Edison Building, Boston, were not established until a day or two ago. These having been put through however, WCSH is

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
STATES
NEW ORLEANS, LA.

FEB 1 2 1926

BOSTON, May 13.—The broadcast of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here tonight was cut short by an S. O. S. call from Providence, R. I., where a four-alarm fire was in progress. The symphony musicians donned their rubber coats and tin hats and made Providence in three-quarters of an hour. They extinguished the fire with sixteen violins and two cellos. The conductor's baton also helped. The loss was confined to $250,000 and one Stradivarius.

FEB 1 3 1926

Symphony Orchestra Broadcast Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will present another of its famous radio concerts which have delighted music lovers, tonight at 8.10. The concert will be broadcast direct from Symphony Hall, Boston, by Station WEEI, which will relay it to Station WCSH, at Portland, Me. for simultaneous broadcasting.

Since inaugurating this series of Saturday night symphony concerts a few weeks ago, WEEI and the sponsors for this rare musical treat which brings directly to the homes of thousands the best in music have received many letters of appreciation.

Items of the Day

Though Respighi's new tone-poem, "Pines of Rome," is published by Casa Ricordi, which—to its credit—has no use for the radio with symphonic music, the piece is likely to be heard in the broadcasting of the Symphony Concert on Saturday evening. Faithful to their new parts as purveyors to the radio, the trustees of the orchestra have asked the desired permission and are likely to receive it

Trans Feb 11

BOSTON, May 13.—The broadcast of the Boston Symphony orchestra here tonight ~~was cut~~ short by an S O S call from Providence, R. I., where a four-alarm fire was in progress. The symphony musicians donned their rubber coats and tin hats and made Providence in three-quarters of an hour. They extinguished the fire with sixteen violins and two cellos. The conductor's baton also helped. The loss was confined to $250,000 and one Stradivarius.

TRANSCRIPT,
FEBRUARY 13, 1926

Tune In on Beethoven

Broadcasting of the Symphony Concerts has given rise to a new symphony. A great chorus of popular voices, concordant and united, has made itself heard in welcome and praise of Boston's superlative orchestra as heard on the radio. To the benefactor responsible for the broadcast letters of appreciation have come in a small deluge from people in every walk of life, old and young, humble and high. Men of affairs, who rarely give time to write their opinions of radio programs, have been at pains to express their approval in the most positive terms. Hundreds of persons who have always been interested in good music, and hundreds who never knew before that they were interested in good music, have sent word of their enjoyment and of their appreciation. Even school children have joined in the letters of gratitude.

A year or two ago Mr. William Arms Fisher made a remarkably careful and practical nation-wide study of radio programs, and of the actual wishes of the public concerning them. He found, everywhere, a strong desire expressed for better music in broadcasting. If ever a piece of research was proved accurate in its conclusions, this one has been upheld by the response given to the Symphony Concerts on the wireless. The broadcasting of the concerts has made directly available to thousands of listeners not only "better music" but supremely good music; and the offering has been acclaimed beyond even the donor's most hopeful anticipations. Beyond question, this series on the radio will contribute to a general elevation of the public's taste in music, and capacity for enjoyment of the best. If you cannot attend the Symphony Concert tonight, by all means tune in to the orchestra when Mr. Koussevitzky lifts his baton.

---

soul with
all unknowing,
ding the stars and spanning
alien seas,
ound my heart and brought me
to my knees?
Grace [illegible] Howes.

Broadcasting Boston Symphony Means Expert Radio Engineering

Boston And Portland Telephone Engineers Put Week Into Hook-up Lines And Installation For Saturday Evening Concerts Through WCSH And WEEI

Arthur F. Edes, announcing Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts ~~for~~ WEEI, Boston.

Archie W. Legro, announcing Boston Symphony and intermission broadcasts Saturday evenings for WCSH.

To the uninitiated, the linking of broadcasting stations in mysterious. For that matter, the broadcasting of programs through a station from points outside the regular studio is also a vague procedure.

Instances have come to the attention of the officials of WCSH, the Congress Square Hotel, Portland, in which uniformed persons apparently held the belief that to broadcast a program from outside the station studio necessitated only the placing of a microphone at the stated place. Others have evidenced the opinion that a private wire must be run from the hall or theater where a program was to be presented and a microphone connecting with the radio station installed at the hall or theater, and nothing more in order to broadcast the music or voice available.

It may be of interest to radio listeners who have heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast Saturday evenings from WCSH in conjunction with WEEI of Boston to know something of the technical installation and operation that makes such hook-ups for WCSH possible.

It has been noted previously that credit for broadcasting the Boston Symphony belongs, so far as Boston and the possibility of broadcasting is concerned, to W. S. Quimby. Locally, making it possible for WCSH to broadcast the symphony, credit goes to the Rines Brothers Company of Portland who underwrote the expense of bringing the musical output of the famed Boston orchestra to the input equipment of WCSH.

To the radio engineers of the New England Telephone & Telegraph Co., both of the Boston and the Portland branches, however, belongs the credit for the pick-up and delivery to WEEI in Boston and WCSH in Portland. They worked for more than a week to arrange and install the apparatus and perfect delivery over the lines to the two radio stations, and their labors covered more than one night in that period.

Installation of the speech input equipment at Symphony Hall, Boston, where the big orchestra presents its programs, was the first step. This apparatus of necessity was placed in a position where the playing of the orchestra could not be heard by the operators during a concert. This was owing to the need of having these operator hear the music only through their loud speaker or earphones, taking the sound from the monitor circuit just as it was going out on the lines to WEEI and WCSH, so that they could fairly judge its transmission for volume, modulation and other qualities. An unfinished attic at the end of the second balcony in the building proved the best location for the speech input equipment, and this is where the operators at the hall do their work during a symphony broadcast.

The michophones were carefully placed to pick up each section of the big orchestra. These pick up the sound waves and convert them inot electrical waves or currents which pass over wires to the mixing panel of the speech input apparatus. At the mixing panel, the operators are able to control the microphones and to mix from them the proper amount of energy of each to produce the best results.

The output of the mixer is connected to an amplifier which increases the energy from the microphones. The necessity of amplification arises from the fact that unless amplified, the currents would be so weak that crosstalk might be picked up from other telephone circuits in the same cable. The volume indicator is the only unit of the input apparatus and this shows, by reading of a galvanometer the amount of power being put into the telephone line at each intsant.

It was found that the best locotian for the microphones was as follows: one over the conductor's head, for the ensemble effect; one over the right of the stage to pick up the bass viols and strings, and one at the left of the stage for the violas, harps and other instruments. Tests showed that this arrangement was ample insurance against the tones of the trumpets and shrill-toned instruments to avoid harshness.

It then remained for the telephone engineers to equalize the telephone lines to WEEI and WCSH. This was required to bring all the various frequencies of the sounds of music from approximately 100 to 5,000 cycles per second to pass over the line with the same loss. With a telephone line not properly equalized the higher frequencies undergo greater losses than the lower frequencies, which would cause distortion of music sent over the line. Equalizing the lines to WEEI and WCSH required an engineer at Symphony Hall and one in the toll test room at 125 Milk Street, Boston, another at the local toll test room in the telephone building on Forest Avenue, and others at Wakefield, at WEEI, Boston and WCSH in Portland.

At the Milk Street station, Boston, a line amplifier was used on the Portland circuit, and another at Wakefield, Mass., on the same line. None was needed at the telephone toll test room here the amplifier at WCSH being sufficient for the Portland end of the broadcast.

The men responsible for the installation at Boston and Portland include: James G. Patterson, staff engineer, in complete charge of the work; Ernest R. Moore, radio engineer, in charge of operation; his assistants, Marcy Eager, Wesley Gray, Charles C. Ables, Charles Vassell, Ralph Scott, Elmer Leavitt, all of Boston; Ralph A. Williams, transmission engineer, in charge of the Portland work, and his assistants, T. Eugene Davis, John Battles, John Tirrill and Thomas Curran, all of Portland.

The number of men required for operation during the broadcast of the Boston Symphony weekly is probably little appreciated by the general public. The personnel actually on duty during these broadcasts include:

Arthur F. Edes, announcer at Boston; Archie W. Legro, announcer at Portland; Ralph Scott, handling the amplifier at Symphony Hall; Wesley Gray, handling the amplifier at Wakefield; Thomas Curran, handling the controls at Portland toll test room; Ernest R. Moore, Ralph A. Williams, in supervision at Boston and Portland respectively.

Controlling communication on separate lines between Symphony Hall, toll test in Boston, toll test in Portland, Wakefield, WEEI and WCSH, are the following: T. Eugene Davis, John Battles, John Tirrell, Charles C. Ables, Marcy Eager.

Also necessary in broadcasting the symphony are the operators of WEEI and WCSH. At WEEI are Ralph W. Matthewson, chief operator, and his assistant, Leon Hentz; at WCSH are James E. Nicholson, chief operator, and his assistant, John R. Fraser.

176

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY
FEBRUARY 13, 1926

TONIGHT'S RADIO RAREBITS

By Richard D. Grant

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra comes again on the air tonight through WEEI and WCSH, after an absence of two weeks. During the customary brief intermission, Joseph Lautner, leader of the Harvard Glee Club and organizer of the University Double Quartet, will sing several solos from the WEEI studio. A particularly interesting incident in connection with tonight's Symphony broadcast will be the use of a phonograph for conveying the desired sound in a certain passage in one of the selections to be played. Mr. Koussevitzky was unable to decide what instrument might best imitate the song of a nightingale in Respighi's new symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," but finally solved the difficulty by substituting a phonograph record of the voice of a real nightingale The Symphony broadcast will begin at 8.10.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
NEWS

FEB 1 3 1926

RADIO PATRON DONATES $12,000 FOR CONCERTS

Boston, Mass., Feb. 13.—For the first time in its history, and after a long series of attempts to secure permission, concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra are to be broadcast from station WEEI through the generosity of a Boston business man, Winfield S. Quinby. Mr. Quinby has given $1,000 for each of the twelve concerts to pay for the privilege of having them broadcast from the regular Saturday afternoon programs of the orchestra at Sympathy hall.

FEB 6 1926

Boston Symphony to Be Broadcast Over WEEI

Winfield S. Quinby Gives $1,000 for Each of Twelve Concerts

BOSTON.—For the first time in its history, and after a long series of attempts to secure permission, concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra are to be broadcast from Station WEEI through the generosity of a Boston business man, Winfield S. Quinby. Mr. Quinby has given $1,000 for each of the twelve concerts to pay for the privilege of having them broadcast from the regular Saturday afternoon programs of the orchestra at Symphony hall. The first two concerts were broadcast January 23 and 30, and one thereafter will be given each Saturday for ten additional weeks.

It is possible that the concerts will be relayed to other stations in New Eng-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET
FEB 13 1926

Hair."

BOSTON SYMPHONY BROADCAST TONIGHT

Lovers of good music will hear another programme by the Boston Symphony orchestra tonight at 8:10 from WEEI.

The programme, like all in the Boston Symphony series, is broadcast direct from Symphony Hall and is given to the radio audience of New England through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby. The orchestra will be heard under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

The symphony's programme for this evening includes three superb compositions that have never been played in Boston as yet, and since the symphony broadcasts only from Boston it seems that these works have never yet been broadcast.

During the brief intermission at Symphony Hall, Joseph Lautner, leader of the Harvard Glee Club, and organizer of the University double quartette, will give several tenor solos from WEEI'S studio.

---

in future concerts. It happened that Serge Koussevitsky had arranged a programme for the second broadcast which included no music with exclusive copyrights, and it seems probable now that all broadcast programmes will be so arranged in the future.

Confronted with the same problem, Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra, which broadcasts concerts from New York frequently, has omitted all music with an exclusive copyright when he has not been able to obtain permission to broadcast it. Orchestras in Philadelphia and Cincinnati have followed his example.

Despite protests of radio stations and listeners throughout the country, a ruling was made about a year ago in favor of the American Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers to prevent matter controlled by them to be broadcast without their permission. When permission cannot be obtained, the microphone must be shut off while the piece is being rendered. It is felt by those interested in the broadcasting of the symphony concerts that if long breaks in the programme occur there will be considerably less interest in the concerts among radio fans.

MENU FOR SUNDAY, FEB 14

BREAKFAST

Tangerines.
Dry Cereal with Cream.
Baked Beans. Mustard Pickle.
Brown Bread.
Doughnuts. Coffee.

DINNER

Cream of Spinach Soup.
Olives. Stuffed Celery.
Roast Lamb. Mint Sauce.
Creamed Potatoes. Boiled Squash.
Fruit Salad.
Orange Sherbet. Coffee.

SUPPER

Chicken Salad.
Valentine Sandwiches.
Ginger Hearts.
Tea.

DOUGHNUTS

Beat 2 eggs until light, add 1 cup of

Hous

176

FEB 1 4 1926

Outstanding in the week's local music schedule is the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony series Tuesday evening, ~~which will~~ be featured by the appearance of Serge Prokofieff, a leading Russian composer and piano virtuoso, who will play his "Third Piano Concerto," with Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra. Through the week there are also several other events of special interest including a recital this afternoon by Giuseppe Camilloni, local musician, and the University Glee Club concert, Ruth Breton, soloist, on Friday evening. Next Sunday Guy Maier and Lee Pattison appear here in a recital of music for two pianos.

* * *

A change in the programme for the symphony concert as announced last Sunday was made during the week by Conductor Koussevitzky who substituted Vivaldi's "Concerto for String Orchestra" for Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain," as the opening number. Instead of Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," will occupy the last part of the programme.

There is particular interest among local music lovers in the appearance of Mr. Prokofieff, one of the leaders of the younger generation of Russian composers and a pianist of exceptional ability. Prokofieff's Concerto has been performed by the orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston and New York, with the composer appearing as soloist, and everywhere it has excited unusual enthusiasm. Incidentally, Mr. Prokofieff is the first soloist to appear here with the orchestra this season.

Another feature of the concert will be the performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite. The eloquent interpretation on this score by Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians is reported to have caused great admiration when performed in Boston and New York recently.

The revised programme, which is described in Warren Storey Smith's article, is as follows: "Concerto for String Orchestra," (Vigoroso, Largo, Allegro) Vivaldi, edited by A. Mistovski; "Third Concerto for Piano," Op. 26 (Andante, Allegro, Theme, Andantino, variations—listesso tempo, allegro, allegro moderato, andante meditative and allegro giusto, Allegro, ma non troppo) Prokofieff; Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," ("The Thousand and One Nights") Op. 35, ("The Sea and Sinbad's Ship," "The Story of the Kalandar Prince," "The Young Prince and the Young Princess," "Festival at Bagdad") Rimsky-Korsakov.

---

pany of Boston, has plished for WCSH, the Congress Square Hotel of Portland. This time it is a treat for those who are fond of old fashioned dance music, and these radio listeners who have already become familiar with this particular broadcast from WEEI on Monday evenings from 7.30 to 8.15 will find it available from WCSH hereafter at the same hour.

Beginning this evening at 7.30, WCSH in its hook-up with WEEI will broadcast each Monday night the Black Iron Shriners, an old fashioned dance orchestra of excellence. The Black Iron Shriners have been on the air on Monday evenings from WEEI for some time.

WCSH has for several weeks been connected with WEEI for the broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evenings from Symphony Hall, Boston, but the connections with the WEEI studio in the Edison Building, Boston, were not established until a day or two ago. These having been put through however,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
STATES
NEW ORLEANS, LA.

FEB 1 2 1926

BOSTON, May 13.—The broadcast of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here tonight ~~was~~ cut short by an S. O. S. call from Providence, R. I., where a four-alarm fire was in progress. The symphony musicians donned their rubber coats and tin hats and made Providence in three-quarters of an hour. They extinguished the fire with sixteen violins and two cellos. The conductor's baton also helped. The loss was confined to $250,000 and one Stradivarius.

FEB 1 3 1926

Symphony Orchestra Broadcast Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will present another of its famous radio concerts which have delighted music lovers, tonight at 8.10. The concert will be broadcast direct from Symphony Hall, Boston, by Station WEEI, which will relay it to Station WCSH, at Portland, Me. for simultaneous broadcasting.

Since inaugurating this series of Saturday night symphony concerts a few weeks ago, WEEI and the sponsors for this rare musical treat which brings directly to the homes of thousands the best in music have received many letters of appreciation.

Items of the Day

Though Respighi's new tone-poem, "Pines of Rome," is published by Casa Ricordi, which—to its credit—has no use for the radio with symphonic music, the piece is likely to be heard in the broadcasting of the Symphony Concert on Saturday evening. Faithful to their new parts as purveyors to the radio, the trustees of the orchestra have asked the desired permission and are likely to receive it

Trans Feb 11

BOSTON, May 13.—The broadcast of the Boston Symphony orchestra here tonight was cut short by an S O S call from Providence, R. I., where a four-alarm fire was in progress. The symphony musicians donned their rubber coats and tin hats and made Providence in three-quarters of an hour. They extinguished the fire with sixteen violins and two cellos. The conductor's baton also helped. The loss was confined to $250,000 and one Stradivarius.

TRANSCRIPT,
FEBRUARY 13, 1926

Tune In on Beethoven

Broadcasting of the Symphony Concerts has given rise to a new symphony. A great chorus of popular voices, concordant and united, has made itself heard in welcome and praise of Boston's superlative orchestra as heard on the radio. To the benefactor responsible for the broadcast letters of appreciation have come in a small deluge from people in every walk of life, old and young, humble and high. Men of affairs, who rarely give time to write their opinions of radio programs, have been at pains to express their approval in the most positive terms. Hundreds of persons who have always been interested in good music, and hundreds who never knew before that they were interested in good music, have sent word of their enjoyment and of their appreciation. Even school children have joined in the letters of gratitude.

A year or two ago Mr. William Arms Fisher made a remarkably careful and practical nation-wide study of radio programs, and of the actual wishes of the public concerning them. He found, everywhere, a strong desire expressed for better music in broadcasting. If ever a piece of research was proved accurate in its conclusions, this one has been upheld by the response given to the Symphony Concerts over the wireless. The broadcasting of the concerts has made directly available to thousands of listeners not only "better music" but supremely good music; and the offering has been acclaimed beyond even the donor's most hopeful anticipations. Beyond question, this series on the radio will contribute to a general elevation of the public's taste in music, and capacity for enjoyment of the best. If you cannot attend the Symphony Concert tonight, by all means tune in to the orchestra when Mr. Koussevitzky lifts his baton.

---

soul with
all unknowing,
ding the stars and spanning
alien seas,
ound my heart and brought me
to my knees?

Broadcasting Boston Symphony Means Expert Radio Engineering

Boston And Portland Telephone Engineers Put Week Into Hook-up Lines And Installation For Saturday Evening Concerts Through WCSH And WEEI

Arthur F. Edes, announcing Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts for WEEI, Boston.

Archie W. Legro, announcing Boston Symphony and intermission broadcasts Saturday evenings for WCSH.

To the uninitiated, the linking of broadcasting stations in mysterious. For that matter, the broadcasting of programs through a station from points outside the regular studio is also a vague procedure.

Instances have come to the attention of the officials of WCSH, the Congress Square Hotel, Portland, in which uniformed persons apparently held the belief that to broadcast a program from outside the station studio necessitated only the placing of a microphone at the stated place. Others have evidenced the opinion that a private wire must be run from the hall or theater where a program was to be presented and a microphone connecting with the radio station installed at the hall or theater, and nothing more in order to broadcast the music or voice available.

It may be of interest to radio listeners who have heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast Saturday evenings from WCSH in conjunction with WEEI of Boston to know something of the technical installation and operation that makes such hook-ups for WCSH possible.

It has been noted previously that credit for broadcasting the Boston Symphony belongs, so far as Boston and the possibility of broadcasting is concerned, to W. S. Quimby. Locally, making it possible for WCSH to broadcast the symphony, credit goes to the Rines Brothers Company of Portland who underwrote the expense of bringing the musical output of the famed Boston orchestra to the input equipment of WCSH.

To the radio engineers of the New England Telephone & Telegraph Co., both of the Boston and the Portland branches, however, belongs the credit for the pick-up and delivery to WEEI in Boston and WCSH in Portland. They worked for more than a week to arrange and install the apparatus and perfect delivery over the lines to the two radio stations, and their labors covered more than one night in that period.

Installation of the speech input equipment at Symphony Hall, Boston, where the big orchestra presents its programs, was the first step. This apparatus of necessity was placed in a position where the playing of the orchestra could not be heard by the operators during a concert. This was owing to the need of having these operator hear the music only through their loud speaker or earphones, taking the sound from the monitor circuit just as it was going out on the lines to WEEI and WCSH, so that they could fairly judge its transmission for volume, modulation and other qualities. An unfinished attic at the end of the second balcony in the building proved the best location for the speech input equipment, and this is where the operators at the hall do their work during a symphony broadcast.

The michophones were carefully placed to pick up each section of the big orchestra. These pick up the sound waves and convert them inot electrical waves or currents which pass over wires to the mixing panel of the speech input apparatus. At the mixing panel, the operators are able to control the microphones and to mix from them the proper amount of energy of each to produce the best results.

The output of the mixer is connected to an amplifier which increases the energy from the microphones. The necessity of amplification arises from the fact that unless amplified, the currents would be so weak that crosstalk might be picked up from other telephone circuits in the same cable. The volume indicator is the only unit of the input apparatus and this shows, by reading of a galvanometer the amount of power being put into the telephone line at each intsant.

It was found that the best locotian for the microphones was as follows: one over the conductor's head, for the ensemble effect; one over the right of the stage to pick up the bass viols and strings, and one at the left of the stage for the violas, harps and other instruments. Tests showed that this arrangement was ample insurance against the tones of the trumpets and shrill-toned instruments to avoid harshness.

It then remained for the telephone engineers to equalize the telephone lines to WEEI and WCSH. This was required to bring all the various frequencies of the sounds of music from approximately 100 to 5,000 cycles per second to pass over the line with the same loss. With a telephone line not properly equalized the higher frequencies undergo greater losses than the lower frequencies, which would cause distortion of music sent over the line. Equalizing the lines to WEEI and WCSH required an engineer at Symphony Hall and one in the toll test room at 125 Milk Street, Boston, another at the local toll test room in the telephone building on Forest Avenue, and others at Wakefield, at WEEI, Boston and WCSH in Portland.

At the Milk Street station, Boston, a line amplifier was used on the Portland circuit, and another at Wakefield, Mass., on the same line. None was needed at the telephone toll test room here the amplifier at WCSH being sufficient for the Portland end of the broadcast.

The men responsible for the installation at Boston and Portland include: James G. Patterson, staff engineer, in complete charge of the work; Ernest R. Moore, radio engineer, in charge of operation; his assistants, Marcy Eager, Wesley Gray, Charles C. Ables, Charles Vassell, Ralph Scott, Elmer Leavitt, all of Boston; Ralph A. Williams, transmission engineer, in charge of the Portland work, and his assistants, T. Eugene Davis, John Battles, John Tirrill and Thomas Curran, all of Portland.

The number of men required for operation during the broadcast of the Boston Symphony weekly is probably little appreciated by the general public. The personnel actually on duty during these broadcasts include:

Arthur F. Edes, announcer at Boston; Archie W. Legro, announcer at Portland; Ralph Scott, handling the amplifier at Symphony Hall; Wesley Gray, handling the amplifier at Wakefield; Thomas Curran, handling the controls at Portland toll test room; Ernest R. Moore, Ralph A. Williams, in supervision at Boston and Portland respectively.

Controlling communication on separate lines between Symphony Hall, toll test in Boston, toll test in Portland, Wakefield, WEEI and WCSH, are the following: T. Eugene Davis, John Battles, John Tirrell, Charles C. Ables, Marcy Eager.

Also necessary in broadcasting the symphony are the operators of WEEI and WCSH. At WEEI are Ralph W. Matthewson, chief operator, and his assistant, Leon Hentz; at WCSH are James E. Nicholson, chief operator, and his assistant, John R. Fraser.

16

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY,
FEBRUARY 13, 1926

ebits and

TONIGHT'S RADIO RAREBITS

By Richard D. Grant

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra comes again on the air tonight through WEEI and WCSH, after an absence of two weeks. During the customary brief intermission, Joseph Lautner, leader of the Harvard Glee Club and organizer of the University Double Quartet, will sing several solos from the WEEI studio. A particularly interesting incident in connection with tonight's Symphony broadcast will be the use of a phonograph for conveying the desired sound in a certain passage in one of the selections to be played. Mr. Koussevitzky was unable to decide what instrument might best imitate the song of a nightingale in Respighi's new symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," but finally solved the difficulty by substituting a phonograph record of the voice of a real nightingale The Symphony broadcast will begin at 8.10.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
NEWS

FEB 1 3 1926

RADIO PATRON DONATES $12,000 FOR CONCERTS

Boston, Mass., Feb. 13.—For the first time in its history, and after a long series of attempts to secure permission, concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra are to be broadcast from station WEEI through the generosity of a Boston business man, Winfield S. Quinby. Mr. Quinby has given $1,000 for each of the twelve concerts to pay for the privilege of having them broadcast from the regular Saturday afternoon programs of the orchestra at Sympathy hall.

FEB 6 1926

Boston Symphony to Be Broadcast Over WEEI

Winfield S. Quinby Gives $1,000 for Each of Twelve Concerts

BOSTON.—For the first time in its history, and after a long series of attempts to secure permission, concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra are to be broadcast from Station WEEI through the generosity of a Boston business man, Winfield S. Quinby. Mr. Quinby has given $1,000 for each of the twelve concerts to pay for the privilege of having them broadcast from the regular Saturday afternoon programs of the orchestra at Symphony hall. The first two concerts were broadcast January 23 and 30, and one thereafter will be given each Saturday for ten additional weeks.

It is possible that the concerts will be relayed to other stations in New England, particularly WTAG, Worcester, and QCSH, Portland, Me. This feature is dependent upon the arrangements that WEEI officials can make with other stations and with the telephone company.

Arthur F. Edes of the WEEI announcing staff, known to listeners as EFA., is to have charge of the microphone at all the twelve concerts.

---

ton Symphony series, is broadcast direct from Symphony Hall and is given to the radio audience of New England through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby. The orchestra will be heard under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

The symphony's programme for this evening includes three superb compositions that have never been played in Boston as yet, and since the symphony broadcasts only from Boston it seems that these works have never yet been broadcast.

During the brief intermission at Symphony Hall, Joseph Lautner, leader of the Harvard Glee Club, and organizer of the University double quartette, will give several tenor solos from WEEI'S studio.

---

in future concerts. It happened that Serge Koussevitsky had arranged a programme for the second broadcast which included no music with exclusive copyrights, and it seems probable now that all broadcast programmes will be so arranged in the future.

Confronted with the same problem, Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra, which broadcasts concerts from New York frequently, has omitted all music with an exclusive copyright when he has not been able to obtain permission to broadcast it. Orchestras in Philadelphia and Cincinnati have followed his example.

Despite protests of radio stations and listeners throughout the country, a ruling was made about a year ago in favor of the American Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers to prevent matter controlled by them to be broadcast without their permission. When permission cannot be obtained, the microphone must be shut off while the piece is being rendered. It is felt by those interested in the broadcasting of the symphony concerts that if long breaks in the programme occur there will be considerably less interest in the concerts among radio fans.

MENU FOR SUNDAY, FEB 14

BREAKFAST
Tangerines.
Dry Cereal with Cream.
Baked Beans. Mustard Pickle.
Brown Bread.
Doughnuts. Coffee.

DINNER
Cream of Spinach Soup.
Olives. Stuffed Celery.
Roast Lamb. Mint Sauce.
Creamed Potatoes. Boiled Squash.
Fruit Salad.
Orange Sherbet. Coffee.

SUPPER
Chicken Salad.
Valentine Sandwiches.
Ginger Hearts.
Tea.

DOUGHNUTS
Beat 2 eggs until light, add 1 cup of

Hous

FEB 1 4 1926

Outstanding in the week's local music schedule is the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony series Tuesday evening, which will be featured by the appearance of Serge Prokofieff, a leading Russian composer and piano virtuoso, who will play his "Third Piano Concerto," with Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra. Through the week there are also several other events of special interest including a recital this afternoon by Giuseppe Camilloni, local musician, and the University Glee Club concert, Ruth Breton, soloist, on Friday evening. Next Sunday Guy Maier and Lee Pattison appear here in a recital of music for two pianos.

* * *

A change in the programme for the symphony concert as announced last Sunday was made during the week by Conductor Koussevitzky who substituted Vivaldi's "Concerto for String Orchestra" for Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain," as the opening number. Instead of Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," will occupy the last part of the programme.

There is particular interest among local music lovers in the appearance of Mr. Prokofieff, one of the leaders of the younger generation of Russian composers and a pianist of exceptional ability. Prokofieff's Concerto has been performed by the orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston and New York, with the composer appearing as soloist, and everywhere it has excited unusual enthusiasm. Incidentally, Mr. Prokofieff is the first soloist to appear here with the orchestra this season.

Another feature of the concert will be the performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite. The eloquent interpretation on this score by Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians is reported to have caused great admiration when performed in Boston and New York recently.

The revised programme, which is described in Warren Storey Smith's article, is as follows: "Concerto for String Orchestra," (Vigoroso, Largo, Allegro) Vivaldi, edited by A. Mistovski; "Third Concerto for Piano," Op. 26 (Andante, Allegro, Theme, Andantino, variations—listesso tempo, allegro, allegro moderato, andante meditative and allegro giusto, Allegro, ma non troppo) Prokofieff; Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," ("The Thousand and One Nights") Op. 35, ("The Sea and Sinbad's Ship," "The Story of the Kalandar Prince," "The Young Prince and the Young Princess," "Festival at Bagdad") Rimsky-Korsakov.

Edison Electric [illegible] pany of Boston, has [illegible] plished for WCSH, the Congress Square Hotel of Portland. This time it is a treat for those who are fond of old fashioned dance music, and these radio listeners who have already become familiar with this particular broadcast from WEEI on Monday evenings from 7.30 to 8.15 will find it available from WCSH hereafter at the same hour.

Beginning this evening at 7.30, WCSH in its hook-up with WEEI will broadcast each Monday night the Black Iron Shriners, an old fashioned dance orchestra of excellence. The Black Iron Shriners have been on the air on Monday evenings from WEEI for some time.

WCSH has for several weeks been connected with WEEI for the broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evenings from Symphony Hall, Boston, but the connections with the WEEI studio in the Edison Building, Boston, were not established until a day or two ago. These having been put through however, WCSH

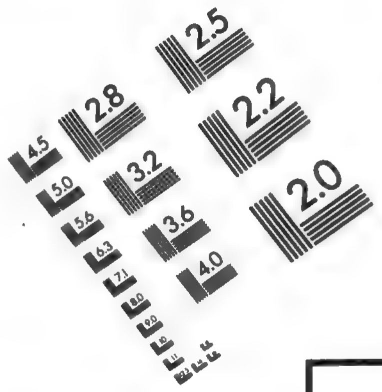
THIS CLIPPING FROM
STATES
NEW ORLEANS, LA.

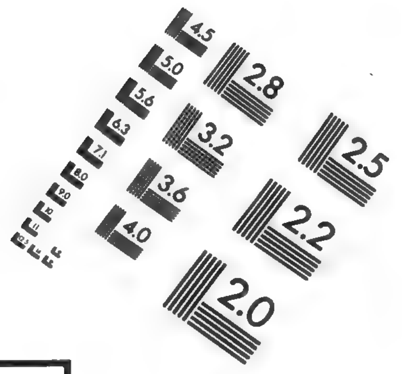
FEB 1 2 1926

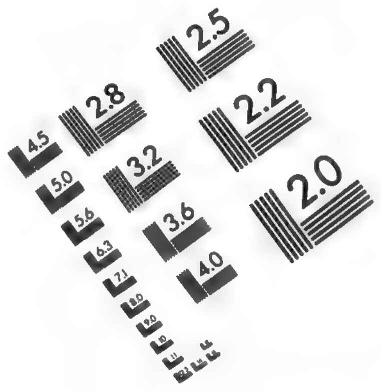
BOSTON, May 13.—The broadcast of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here tonight was cut short by an S. O. S. call from Providence, R. I., where a four-alarm fire was in progress. The symphony musicians donned their rubber coats and tin hats and made Providence in three-quarters of an hour. They extinguished the fire with sixteen violins and two cellos. The conductor's baton also helped. The loss was confined to $250,000 and one Stradivarius.

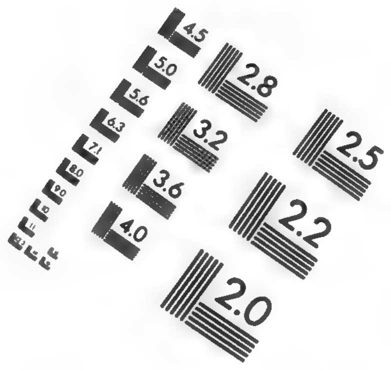
REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC





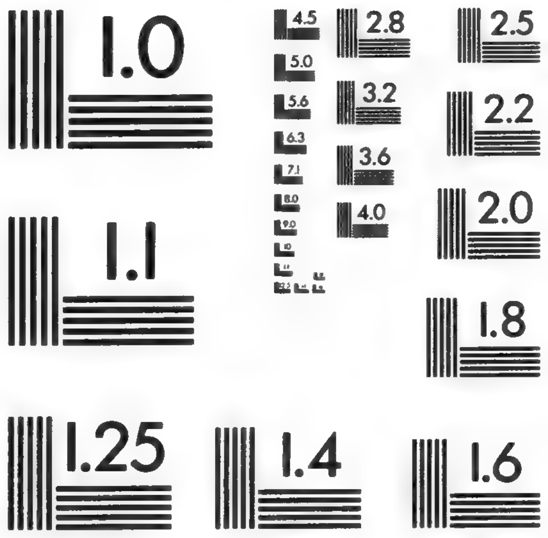




200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

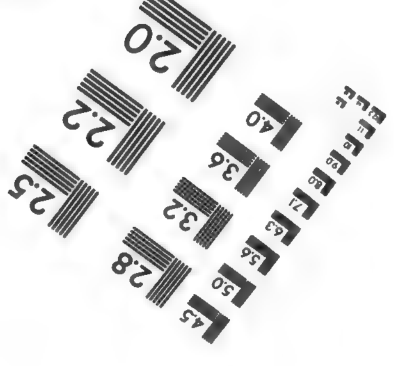
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

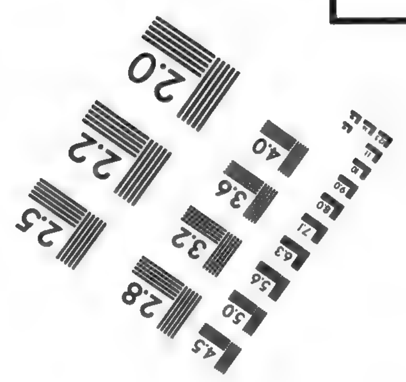
2.5 mm

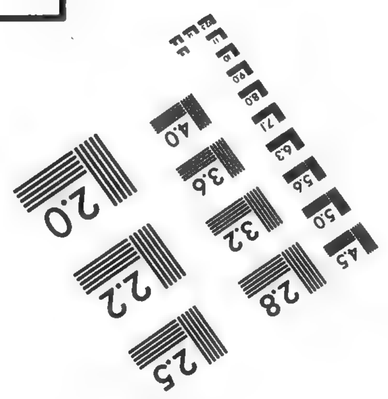
A5



A4

A3





PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

THIRD OF TUESDAY CONCERTS

Symphony Brings List to Third Quarter of Last Century

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's new Tuesday Series brought these historical programmes yesterday to the third quarter of the Nineteenth Century and to the music of Wagner, Saint-Saens, Tchaikovsky and Brahms, as the order of the afternoon rather than their strict chronology grouped them.

"ROMEO" THE SHOW PIECE

From the first-named came the Prelude to "The Mastersingers," while the others were respectively represented by the symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," the Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," and the C minor Symphony. Though in no disrespect to Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretations of the pieces by Wagner, Brahms and Saint-Saens, it may yet be said that his reading of Tchaikovsky's tone poem --for such it really is—was the most distinguished achievement of the afternoon.

Before Mr. Koussevitzky's came Symphony as eloquent and revealing as those he conducts, notable as is his version of each of these pieces. The composition of Saint-Saens requires little of a conductor save suppleness, sensitiveness and a nice feeling for tone and rhythm and for the curve of a melody. And while Mr. Koussevitzky possesses and yesterday displayed such qualities, they are in no sense a unique accomplishment.

"Not Since Nikisch."

But in his reading of the "Romeo and Juliet," one encounters something for which, certainly, the last 25 years of the Symphony concerts offers no parallel. Those whose memory of these concerts goes back sufficiently far, say of Mr. Koussevitzky's "Romeo": "Not since Nikisch" those whose Symphony experience began somewhat later may well say: "Never." At a pair of regular subscription concerts and at a Monday evening concert, Mr. Koussevitzky last season conducted this "Overture-Fantasia," yet remarkable as these performances were, that of yesterday seemed, if anything, even more finely proportioned, more dramatic, more passionate.

Polishes Saint-Saens

Only in Saint-Saens' piece did yesterday's concert offer a work which Mr. Koussevitzky had not already, and more than once, conducted here. As was intimated above, he led the orchestra through a beautifully finished performance of this deftly made and ingratiating, if slight, composition.

Again the concert was preceded by a few words of explanation from Professor Walter R. Spalding of the purport and content of the music. Waxing eloquent over the surpassing excellence that, despite a forbidding exterior, resides in the symphonies of Brahms, Mr. Spalding inadvertently brought to mind the celebrated comment of Artemus Ward that the music of Wagner was probably better than it sounded.

177

Symphony Leader to Put Liszt's Faust "On the Air"

Post — Feb 14

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Since Liszt's great "Faust Symphony" was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra no longer ago than March, 1923, the performance scheduled for the Symphony Concerts of this week may scarcely be termed a revival.

Nevertheless Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this music may well be awaited with keen anticipation by subscribers to these concerts and by that indeterminate audience who may make their first acquaintance with it "on the air." For it seems safe to prophesy that at Mr. Koussevitzky's hands the work will be fully restored to the prestige it enjoyed here in the days of Dr. Muck, who, in his great admiration for and understanding of this, Liszt's masterpiece, was the first to give Boston an inkling of its true quality.

It has been said that the various settings of Goethe's poem number between 30 to 35. Most of these are not, of course, familiar to the average music-lover; he will undoubtedly think first in this connection of Gounod's opera, and then of Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust" or perhaps of Boito's "Mefistofele." It is altogether possible that he will have, too, a recollection of this "Faust Symphony" of Liszt and of the "Faust Overture" of Wagner, while he may also be aware that Schumann's "Scenes from Faust," although rarely performed these days, is rated among that composer's masterpieces. And these half-dozen works do actually comprise the viable musical commentary upon the poem of "Faust," despite the numerous composers who have been inspired by it.

It is unfortunate for the reputation—and the appreciation—of Goethe's poem that the form in which it is chiefly known outside of German-speaking lands is that of Gounod's "Faust," which is in fact less an interpretation than a perversion in that it lays all its stress upon a single episode, treating that episode in conventionalized operatic fashion. Occasionally, to be sure, the spirit of Goethe's original appears therein; yet the Germans will not call the opera "Faust" at all, but dub it, and more appropriately, "Margarethe."

As it is, we find the nearest approach to the ideal symphonic Faust in the symphony of Liszt, composed in 1853-54 and revised in 1857, and incidentally the most important single work that Liszt has left us.

Those who know Liszt as orchestral composer only through such things as the two piano concertos, the symphonic poems, "Les Preludes," "Tasso," "Mazeppa" and "The Battle of the Huns," or the orchestral transcriptions of the Hungarian Rhapsodies—in all of which much dross is mingled with the gold—will find in the 'Faust Symphony" a wholly different order of composer. Here Liszt forgets altogether his empty rhetoric, his obvious sentimentality, his flamboyant orchestration, and becomes a searching and eloquent poet in tones, the creator of perhaps the greatest example of musical psychoanalysis that we yet possess.

The "Faust Symphony" bears no programme beyond the respective labelling of the three movements as "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles."

A sombre introduction begins the first of these divisions in which are exposed two themes, the first a groping, almost tortured subject that may well have been intended to express Faust's search for knowledge, while the second, characterized by an everywhere recognizable descent of a seventh, plainly suggests the disappointed philosopher. An affecting episode heard later in the movement, obviously referring to Faust's love for Gretchen (the Marguerite of Gounod's opera), is derived from this same melody.

One of the most tenderly beautiful and delicately sensuous movements in the whole range of orchestral music, the second section gives us a faithful picture of Goethe's heroine, innocent yet passionate. The love-theme of the first movement enters here and has now specific reference to Faust.

And with masterly cunning Liszt writes no new theme for Mephistopheles, but taking as his cue the words "I am the spirit that denies," he contents himself with parodying the themes of Faust. Once, in the midst of the din and mockery, there appears the vision of Gretchen, but it quickly fades, and the biting irony, the demoniacal furies resume their course. At length, however, a change comes over the music; it becomes transformed, ennobled; and a tenor voice and male chorus sing in apotheosis the words of Goethe's Chorus Mysticus, which have been thus rendered into English prose: "All that is transitory is only a simile; the insufficient here becomes event; the indescribable is here done; the Ever-Feminine draws us on."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POTTSVILLE, PA.
Morning Paper

FEB 12 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO BROADCAST FROM WEEI

For the first time in its hitsory and after a long series of attempts to secure permission, conerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra are to be broadcast from Station WEEI Boston through the generosity of a Boston business man Wi field S Quinby. Mr. Quinby has given $1,000 for each of the twelve concerts to pay for the privilege of having them broadcast from the regular Saturday afternoon programs of the orchestra at Symphony hall. The first two concerts were broadcast January 23 and 30, and one hereafter will be given each Saturday for ten additional weeks.

It is possible that the concerts will be relayed to other stations in New England, particularly WTAG Worcester, and QCSH, Portland Me. This feature is dependent upon the arrangements that WEEI officals can make with other stations and with the telephone company.

Arthur F. Edes of the WEEI announcing staff know to listeners as EFA, is to have charge of the microphone at all the twelve concerts.

Over a million radio fans in the Soviet Union listen in on the programs of the Government stations every day, according to a report of the Soviet radio industry received by the Russian information Burea here. The number is increasing by

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

FEB 17 1926

SYMPHONY WILL DISCONTINUE

Boston Musical Organization to Quit Providence After Next Concert

Greater love for music hath no man than this—that he will endure the tortures which only the hard seats of Infantry Hall could inflict upon him, to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Even music cannot charm the hard beast that lurks in those monastic stools. They, as well as the music, leave their imprint.

This mournful wail is but the preliminary to the greater calamity announced last night in a little white sheet of paper stuck in Philip Hale's notes addressed "To Our Subs…" which read as f…

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 13 1926

RUSSIAN COMPOSER WILL COME HERE WITH SYMPHONY

Serge Prokofieff to Play Own Concerto Tuesday Evening.

Next Tuesday evening, in Infantry Hall, at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will be heard for the last time but one in Providence this season. The soloist of the evening will be Serge Prokofieff, the distinguished young Russian composer and pianist, who will appear in his own Third Pianoforte Concerto. Prokofieff has played his concerto with his orchestra in Boston, New York, Brooklyn and other cities, exciting in each case great enthusiasm by his creative skill as a composer, and by his utter technical mastery of the piano.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

FEB 17 1926

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
FALL RIVER
MASS.
Globe

ISSUE OF

FEB 17 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAY CEASE VISITS TO PROVIDENCE

PROVIDENCE, Feb. 17.—Providence will hear one more concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and that will be the last—unless this city, between now and next fall, provides an auditorium fitted for the presentation of the great gathering of musicians and capable of accommodating the thousands of persons who yearly await the coming of the inspiring orchestra.

Infantry Hall, the home of orchestral music in this city, is to be used for other purposes and the Boston orchestra will be without a home here after the last concert is given March 16.

This information was contained in a pamphlet given to patrons of the orchestra at the concert last night and which read as follows:

"After giving nearly 200 concerts in Providence over a period of many years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be compelled, for lack of an auditorium, to discontinue its visits to Providence after this season.

"The fifth and last concert of the present season on Tuesday evening, March 16, will therefore be in the nature of a farewell. The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra regrets this situation, particularly in view of the ever-widening interest in these concerts under Mr. Koussevitzky.

"Mr. Koussevitzky has in mind to prepare a programme of special interest for the final concert in Providence on March 16."

SYMPHONY IN THIRD PERIOD CONCERT

Wagner, Saint-Saens, Brahms, Tschaikowsky on Program

Herald Feb 10

In Symphony hall yesterday afternoon, the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, and Prof. Walter Spalding of Harvard the preliminary lecturer, gave the third of the series of historical concerts of the Tuesday afternoon series. The program included Wagner prelude to "The Meistersingers"; Saint-Saens, symphonic poem No. 1, "Le Rouet d'Ompale"; Tschaikowsky, overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," and Brahms, first symphony in C minor.

The program of the third of this historical series, considered no especial group or movement except that, as Prof. Spalding said in his commentary, it was "a continuation of the previous concert." And so it ranged from Wagner, the Wagner of the Meistersingers prelude, through Saint-Saens at his most Lisztian, and Tschaikowsky to the Brahms of the C minor symphony.

In Wagner, and especially the Wagner of the prelude, Prof. Spalding noted the return to polyphony, and to the overture form as it was practised by Weber. Saint-Saens, and Tschaikowsky were both continuations of the literary text and impulse of the romantics, and also indicative of the currents of nationalism, outside of Germany. In Brahms, and in particular the Brahms of the C minor symphony, he saw the culmination of both the polyphonic return, and of a romanticism chastened, sublimated, lacking in sensuous appeal.

But history, ligne, musical currents, and raison d'etre aside, ahe concert yesterday was one of the most brilliant ones that Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra have given of late, from the Wagner which to us has never sounded quite so magnificent and so burnished, through the last triumphant bars of the Brahms.

Mr. Koussevitzky's way with both the Wagner and the Tschaikowsky is already known. The Saint-Saens, which sounded even more trifling and slim of substance following so closely upon the Wagner, and the Brahm's C minor are not so well known. With him the little, Lisztian symphonic poem of Saint-Saens became exquisitely polished, clear cut, a slim and lovely trifle.

But it was with the Brahms, as with the earlier Wagner, that the orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky outdid themselves. As is Mr. Koussevitzky's way, this symphony lost whatever touches of pedantry and of distinction it may have in the hands of a more literal conductor and became again, fresh, and impelling, rhythmically and methodically vibrant, almost a romantic document.

E. G. H.

Boston Symphony Plays At Baltimore

Many Local Choral and Club Events

So satisfactory were the three concerts for children last year that the same number was scheduled for this season. The first took place Jan. 23. Again a prize of ten dollars will be awarded the winner of a written criticism contest following each performance.

There was delightful music by the London String Quartet at Peabody Conservatory Jan. 22. Excellence of ensemble was well in evidence. The recitalist there Jan. 29 was Austin Conradi, pianist, of the teaching staff.

Frederick R. Huber, municipal direc… a talk on "Baltimore the Cradle of … Fortnightly Club of Walbrook.

Irma Payne Schiaffino, soprano, and … tenor, with Marie Shriver and Agnes … companists, sang at Stieff Hall Jan. … of St. Leo's Orphanage.

"Humor in Music" was the basis o… by Virginia Blackhead and Bessie E… the preparatory department at Peabo… Jan. 26.

SYMPHONY CONCERT DELIGHTS BIG CROWD

Sergei Prokofieff, Pianist-Composer, Plays His Ultra-Modern Concerto.

Sergei Prokofieff, composer-pianist, shared with Sergei Koussevitsky, brilliant conductor, the honors of an all-Russian programme given last night by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Infantry Hall, Providence. The concert, the fourth of the series in Providence, was attended by a capacity crowd.

Announcement was made that the famous organization would be unable to continue its Providence visits after this season because of the lack of a suitable auditorium. One more concert is planned this season. Mr. Koussevitsky is arranging a special farewell programme. The Boston Symphony orchestra's visits to Providence cover a 50-year period and undoubtedly strenuous efforts will be made to provide an auditorium by next year or 1928 at the latest.

The programme last night provided an interesting contrast study for students of music. Mr. Koussevitsky first presented the old, stately, melodic Vivaldo Concerto in E-minor for string orchestra. Containing simple phrasing and a theme that rang in one's ears long after the final crashing chord of the ensemble had died away, the concerto found ready favor.

Then came Prokofieff, the modernist, with his discordant Third Concerto for piano in its various movements. A young man, who already has cram
A young man, who already has

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

FEB 14 1926

MUSICAL MENTION

Next Tuesday evening, in Infantry Hall, at 8:15, the Bostom Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be heard for the last time but one in Providence this season. The soloist of the evening will be Serge Prokolieff, the distinguished young Russian composer and pianist, who will appear in his own Third Pianoforte Concerto. Prokofieff has played his concerto with this orchestra in Boston, New York, Brooklyn and other cities, exciting in each case great enthusiasm by his creative skill as a composer, and by his utter technical mastery of the piano.

Despite the certain importance which attends the first appearance in Providence of this composer, nevertheless to some perhaps the principal event of the evening will be the performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade." Koussevitzky's reading, in the opinion of many, is stirring and masterful even beyond the many brilliant interpretations of this score with which we are now familiar. Perhaps no score is more difficult and exacting than this, nor better calculated to reveal the attainments of a virtuoso orchestra. There are important solos upon each of the principal instruments—the violin, Viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, flute, bossoon, trumpet, trombone, horn; even the drum. The violin solo is the most important of these and a sensuous cadenza like theme with which the concertmaster intersperses the music depicts Scheherazade, the Sultan's consort, beginning another of her thousand and one tales.

The events described in this score by Rimsky-Korsakov, who was always fond of setting fairy tales to music are—The Sea and Sindbad's Ship. The story of the Kalander-Prince. The Young Prince and the Young Princess. Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces against a rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion. Th… attention to lating measure describir… which Sindbad's Ship …

…ong been famous, the climax of the …hipwreck near the close is such to make …veryone sit on the edge of his seat.

…Koussevitzky will introduce the pro…ram with a Concerto for strings, by …e early Italian composer, Vivaldi.

UNIVERSITY GLEE CLUB

Miss Ruth Breton, violinist, is the solo…t who will appear with the University …

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

FEB 14 1926

WHAT BOSTON CRITICS SAID OF GOOSSENS

Brief Compendium of Press Comment on His Visit.

The following Boston correspondence of The Musical Digest, printed in its last issue, is a brief compendium of the opinion expressed by Boston critics of the visit to that city by Engene Goossens as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony:

Boston's music lovers had no cause to complain of the lack of musical events during the past week. Eugene Goossens made his first appearance here as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Henry Hadley again led the People's Symphony; and concerts were given by the Flonzaley Quartet, Pablo Casals, Albert Spalding, Harold Bauer, and others.

Eugene Goossens proved a "versatile conductor on his first appearance here at last week's Symphony concerts," according to Philip Hale of the Herald. The concert, which was a "brilliant" one, included Mr. Goossens' own Sinfonietta, Weber's Der Freischeutz Overture, Brahm's Fourth Symphony, Debussy's Iberia and Delius' On Hearing the First Cnckoo in Spring. In Mr. Hale's opinion, the conductor "in each instance interpreted as if he was the sworn champion of that particular school," although the program was a varied one.

The orchestra "played with great brilliance and imaginative power," ob-

---

THIRD HISTORICAL SYMPHONY PROGRAM

…chosen pieces. An audience which filled the hall seemed pleased.

Tchaikovsky's overture "Romeo and Juliet" was superbly played and with that imaginative sympathy for the composer's intention which is better than any mere technical virtuosity. Mr Koussevitzky is the finest interpreter of Tchaikovsky Boston has heard in the past 15 years. Here, in the music of a fellow Slav, prone like himself to overemphasis, to almost hysterical excitement, Mr Koussevitzky is throughly at home, as he is also in the music of Skriabin.

Saint-Saens' graceful but trivial, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" Mr Koussevitzky used as a show-piece to illustrate the remarkable virtuosity of the orchestra. Why, when he and the players are capable of giving such delicate and subtle tonal shadings, such perfect tonal balance, as one heard in this number, do they not play so more frequently?

In the beginning of Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude the brass drowned out everything else at a point where the strings should have been as clearly audible. Throughout most of this number, except at the famous passage where the three chief themes are combined, there was a sad lack of proportion and restraint. After all, quality of tone is more important musically than quantity of sound.

Mr Koussevitzky repeated the highly individual and often irritating interpretation of Brahms' C minor symphony with which the present season's concerts began. The third movement he quickens and makes more beautiful by hurrying the tempo. The slow movement he took too slowly, making some of it more lugubrious than pathetic. In the finale he failed to establish an even tempo. He conceives this movement, the finest Brahms ever wrote, not as a meditation followed by a song of triumph, but as a rhapsody ending in hysterical shouts. One cannot but recall Muck's noble interpretation of this music.

The fourth concert of this series w… be given March 2.

P. R.

177

Symphony Leader to Put Liszt's Faust "On the Air"

Post Feb 14

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Since Liszt's great "Faust Symphony" was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra no longer ago than March, 1923, the performance scheduled for the Symphony Concerts of this week may scarcely be termed a revival.

Nevertheless Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this music may well be awaited with keen anticipation by subscribers to these concerts and by that indeterminate audience who may make their first acquaintance with it "on the air." For it seems safe to prophesy that at Mr. Koussevitzky's hands the work will be fully restored to the prestige it enjoyed here in the days of Dr. Muck, who, in his great admiration for and understanding of this, Liszt's masterpiece, was the first to give Boston an inkling of its true quality.

It has been said that the various settings of Goethe's poem number between 30 to 35. Most of these are not, of course, familiar to the average music-lover; he will undoubtedly think first in this connection of Gounod's opera, and then of Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust" or perhaps of Boito's "Mefistofele." It is altogether possible that he will have, too, a recollection of this "Faust Symphony" of Liszt and of the "Faust Overture" of Wagner, while he may also be aware that Schumann's "Scenes from Faust," although rarely performed these days, is rated among that composer's masterpieces. And these half-dozen works do actually comprise the viable musical commentary upon the poem of "Faust," despite the numerous composers who have been inspired by it.

It is unfortunate for the reputation—and the appreciation—of Goethe's poem that the form in which it is chiefly known outside of German-speaking lands is that of Gounod's "Faust," which is in fact less an interpretation than a perversion in that it lays all its stress upon a single episode, treating that episode in conventionalized operatic fashion. Occasionally, to be sure, the spirit of Goethe's original appears therein; yet the Germans will not call the opera "Faust" at all, but dub it, and more appropriately, "Margarethe."

As it is, we find the nearest approach to the ideal symphonic Faust in the symphony of Liszt, composed in 1853-54 and revised in 1857, and incidentally the most important single work that Liszt has left us.

Those who know Liszt as orchestral composer only through such things as the two piano concertos, the symphonic poems, "Les Preludes," "Tasso," "Mazeppa" and "The Battle of the Huns," or the orchestral transcriptions of the Hungarian Rhapsodies—in all of which much dross is mingled with the gold—will find in the 'Faust Symphony" a wholly different order of composer. Here Liszt forgets altogether his empty rhetoric, his obvious sentimentality, his flamboyant orchestration, and becomes a searching and eloquent poet in tones, the creator of perhaps the greatest example of musical psychoanalysis that we yet possess.

The "Faust Symphony" bears no programme beyond the respective labelling of the three movements as "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles."

A sombre introduction begins the first of these divisions in which are exposed two themes, the first a groping, almost tortured subject that may well have been intended to express Faust's search for knowledge, while the second, characterized by an everywhere recognizable descent of a seventh, plainly suggests the disappointed philosopher. An affecting episode heard later in the movement, obviously referring to Faust's love for Gretchen (the Marguerite of Gounod's opera), is derived from this same melody.

One of the most tenderly beautiful and delicately sensuous movements in the whole range of orchestral music, the second section gives us a faithful picture of Goethe's heroine, innocent yet passionate. The love-theme of the first movement enters here and has now specific reference to Faust.

And with masterly cunning Liszt writes no new theme for Mephistopheles, but taking as his cue the words "I am the spirit that denies," he contents himself with parodying the themes of Faust. Once, in the midst of the din and mockery, there appears the vision of Gretchen, but it quickly fades, and the biting irony, the demoniacal furies resume their course. At length, however, a change comes over the music; it becomes transformed, ennobled; and a tenor voice and male chorus sing in apotheosis the words of Goethe's Chorus Mysticus, which have been thus rendered into English prose: "All that is transitory is only a simile; the insufficient here becomes event; the indescribable is here done; the Ever-Feminine draws us on."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POTTSVILLE, PA.
Morning Paper

space permitting.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO BROADCAST FROM WEEI

For the first time in its hitsory and after a long series of attempts to secure permission, conerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra are to be broadcast from Station WEEI Boston through the generosity of a Boston business man Winfield S Quinby. Mr. Quinby has given $1,000 for each of the twelve concerts to pay for the privilege of having them broadcast from the regular Saturday afternoon programs of the orchestra at Symphony hall. The first two concerts were broadcast January 23 and 30, and one hereafter will be given each Saturday for ten additional weeks.

It is possible that the concerts will be relayed to other stations in New England, particularly WTAG Worcester, and QCSH, Portland Me. This feature is dependent upon the arrangements that WEEI officals can make with other stations and with the telephone company.

Arthur F. Edes of the WEEI announcing staff know to listeners as EFA, is to have charge of the microphone at all the twelve concerts.

Over a million radio fans in the Soviet Union listen in on the programs of the Government stations every day, according to a report of the Soviet radio industry received by the Russian information Burea here. The number is increasing by

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

FEB 17 1926

SYMPHONY WILL DISCONTINUE

Boston Musical Organization to Quit Providence After Next Concert

Greater love for music hath no man than this—that he will endure the tortures which only the hard seats of Infantry Hall could inflict upon him, to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Even music cannot charm the hard beast that lurks in those monastic stools. They, as well as the music, leave their imprint.

This mournful wail is but the preliminary to the greater calamity announced last night in a little white sheet of paper stuck in Philip Hale's notes addressed "To Our Subs... s" which read as fo...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 18 1926

RUSSIAN COMPOSER WILL COME HERE WITH SYMPHONY

Serge Prokofieff to Play Own Concerto Tuesday Evening.

Next Tuesday evening, in Infantry Hall, at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will be heard for the last time but one in Providence this season. The soloist of the evening will be Serge Prokofieff, the distinguished young Russian composer and pianist, who will appear in his own Third Pianoforte Concerto. Prokofieff has played his concerto with his orchestra in Boston, New York, Brooklyn and other cities, exciting in each case great enthusiasm by his creative skill as a composer, and by his utter technical mastery of the piano.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
FALL RIVER
MASS.

ISSUE OF

FEB 17 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAY CEASE VISITS TO PROVIDENCE

PROVIDENCE, Feb. 17.—Providence will hear one more concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and that will be the last—unless this city, between now and next fall, provides an auditorium fitted for the presentation of the great gathering of musicians and capable of accommodating the thousands of persons who yearly await the coming of the inspiring orchestra.

Infantry Hall, the home of orchestral music in this city, is to be used for other purposes and the Boston orchestra will be without a home here after the last concert is given March 16.

This information was contained in a pamphlet given to patrons of the orchestra at the concert last night and which read as follows:

"After giving nearly 200 concerts in Providence over a period of many years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be compelled, for lack of an auditorium, to discontinue its visits to Providence after this season.

"The fifth and last concert of the present season on Tuesday evening, March 16, will therefore be in the nature of a farewell. The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra regrets this situation, particularly in view of the ever-widening interest in these concerts under Mr. Koussevitzky.

"Mr. Koussevitzky has in mind to prepare a programme of special interest for the final concert in Providence on March 16."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

FEB 17 1926

...phony Orchestra
...situation particularly

SYMPHONY IN THIRD PERIOD CONCERT

Wagner, Saint-Saens, Brahms, Tschaikowsky on Program

Herald Feb 10

In Symphony hall yesterday afternoon, the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, and Prof. Walter Spalding of Harvard the preliminary lecturer, gave the third of the series of historical concerts of the Tuesday afternoon series. The program included Wagner prelude to "The Meistersingers"; Saint-Saens, symphonic poem No. 1, "Le Rouet d'Ompale"; Tschaikowsky, overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," and Brahms, first symphony in C minor.

The program of the third of this historical series, considered no especial group or movement except that, as Prof. Spalding said in his commentary, it was "a continuation of the previous concert." And so it ranged from Wagner, the Wagner of the Meistersingers prelude, through Saint-Saens at his most Lisztian, and Tschaikowsky to the Brahms of the C minor symphony.

In Wagner, and especially the Wagner of the prelude, Prof. Spalding noted the return to polyphony, and to the overture form as it was practised by Weber. Saint-Saens, and Tschaikowsky were both continuations of the literary text and impulse of the romantics, and also indicative of the currents of nationalism, outside of Germany. In Brahms, and in particular the Brahms of the C minor symphony, he saw the culmination of both the polyphonic return, and of a romanticism chastened, sublimated, lacking in sensuous appeal.

But history, ligne, musical currents, and raison d'etre aside, the concert yesterday was one of the most brilliant ones that Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra have given of late, from the Wagner which to us has never sounded quite so magnificent and so burnished, through the last triumphant bars of the Brahms.

Mr. Koussevitzky's way with both the Wagner and the Tschaikowsky is already known. The Saint-Saens, which sounded even more trifling and slim of substance following so closely upon the Wagner, and the Brahm's C minor are not so well known. With him the little, Lisztian symphonic poem of Saint-Saens became exquisitely polished, clear cut, a slim and lovely trifle.

But it was with the Brahms, as with the earlier Wagner, that the orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky outdid themselves. As is Mr. Koussevitzky's way, this symphony lost whatever touches of pedantry and of distinction it may have in the hands of a more literal conductor and became again, fresh, and impelling, rhythmically and methodically vibrant, almost a romantic document.

E. gen

FEB 11 1926

Boston Symphony Plays At Baltimore

Many Local Choral and Club Events

So satisfactory were the three concerts for children last year that the same number was scheduled for this season. The first took place Jan. 23. Again a prize of ten dollars will be awarded the winner of a written criticism contest following each performance.

There was delightful music by the London String Quartet at Peabody Conservatory Jan. 22. Excellence of ensemble was well in evidence. The recitalist there Jan. 29 was Austin Conradi, pianist, of the teaching staff.

Frederick R. Huber, municipal direc... a talk on "Baltimore the Cradle of ... Fortnightly Club of Walbrook.

Irma Payne Schiaffino, soprano, and ... tenor, with Marie Shriver and Agnes ... companists, sang at Stieff Hall Jan. ... of St. Leo's Orphanage.

"Humor in Music" was the basis o... by Virginia Blackhead and Bessie E... the preparatory department at Peabo... Jan. 26.

SYMPHONY CONCERT DELIGHTS BIG CROWD

Serge Prokofieff, Pianist-Composer, Plays His Ultra-Modern Concerto.

Serge Prokofieff, composer-pianist, shared with Sergei Koussevitsky, brilliant conductor, the honors of an all-Russian programme given last night by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Infantry Hall, Providence. The concert, the fourth of the series in Providence, was attended by a capacity crowd.

Announcement was made that the famous organization would be unable to continue its Providence visits after this season because of the lack of a suitable auditorium. One more concert is planned this season. Mr. Koussevitsky is arranging a special farewell programme. The Boston Symphony orchestra's visits to Providence cover a 50-year period and undoubtedly strenuous efforts will be made to provide an auditorium by next year or 1928 at the latest.

The programme last night provided an interesting contrast study for students of music. Mr. Koussevitsky first presented the old, stately, melodic Vivaldo Concerto in E-minor for string orchestra. Containing simple phrasing and a theme that rang in one's ears long after the final crashing chord of the ensemble had died away, the concerto found ready favor.

Then came Prokofieff, the modernist, with his discordant Third Concerto for piano in its various movements. A young man, who already has cram A young man, who already has

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

FEB 14 1926

MUSICAL MENTION

Next Tuesday evening, in Infantry Hall, at 8:15, the Bostom Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be heard for the last time but one in Providence this season. The soloist of the evening will be Serge Prokofieff, the distinguished young Russian composer and pianist, who will appear in his own Third Pianoforte Concerto. Prokofieff has played his concerto with this orchestra in Boston, New York Brooklyn and other cities, exciting in each case great enthusiasm by his creative skill as a composer, and by his utter technical mastery of the piano.

Despite the certain importance which attends the first appearance in Providence of this composer, nevertheless to some perhaps the principal event of the evening will be the performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade." Koussevitzky's reading, in the opinion of many, is stirring and masterful even beyond the many brilliant interpretations of this score with which we are now familiar. Perhaps no score is more difficult and exacting than this, nor better calculated to reveal the attainments of a virtuoso orchestra. There are important solos upon each of the principal instruments—the violin, Viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, flute, bassoon, trumpet, trombone, horn; even the drum. The violin solo is the most important of these and a sensuous cadenza like theme with which the concertmaster intersperses the music depicts Scheherezade, the Sultan's consort, beginning another of her thousand and one tales.

The events described in this score by Rimsky-Korsakov, who was always fond of setting fairy tales to music are—The Sea and Sindbad's Ship. The story of the Kalander-Prince. The Young Prince and the Young Princess. Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces against a rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion. Th... lating measure describ... which Sindbad's Ship...

...attention to ...schools in sev-

ong been famous, the climax of the hipwreck near the close is such to make veryone sit on the edge of his seat.

Koussevitzky will introduce the program with a Concerto for strings, by he early Italian composer, Vivaldi.

UNIVERSITY GLEE CLUB

Miss Ruth Breton, violinist, is the soloist who will appear with the University chosen pieces. An audience which filled the hall seemed pleased.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

FEB 14 1926

WHAT BOSTON CRITICS SAID OF GOOSSENS

Brief Compendium of Press Comment on His Visit.

The following Boston correspondence of The Musical Digest, printed in its last issue, is a brief compendium of the opinion expressed by Boston critics of the visit to that city by Eugene Goossens as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony:

Boston's music lovers had no cause to complain of the lack of musical events during the past week. Eugene Goossens made his first appearance here as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Henry Hadley again led the People's Symphony; and concerts were given by the Flonzaley Quartet, Pablo Casals, Albert Spalding, Harold Bauer, and others.

Eugene Goossens proved a "versatile conductor on his first appearance here at last week's Symphony concerts," according to Philip Hale of the Herald. The concert, which was a "brilliant" one, included Mr. Goossens' own Sinfonietta, Weber's Der Freischeutz Overture, Brahm's Fourth Symphony, Debussy's Iberia and Delius' On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring. In Mr. Hale's opinion, the conductor "in each instance interpreted as if he was the sworn champion of that particular school," although the program was a varied one.

The orchestra "played with great brilliance and imaginative power," ob-

---

THIRD HISTORICAL SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Tchaikovsky's overture "Romeo and Juliet" was superbly played and with that imaginative sympathy for the composer's intention which is better than any mere technical virtuosity. Mr Koussevitzky is the finest interpreter of Tchaikovsky Boston has heard in the past 15 years. Here, in the music of a fellow Slav, prone like himself to overemphasis, to almost hysterical excitement, Mr Koussevitzky is throughly at home, as he is also in the music of Skriabin.

Saint-Saens' graceful but trivial, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" Mr Koussevitzky used as a show-piece to illustrate the remarkable virtuosity of the orchestra. Why, when he and the players are capable of giving such delicate and subtle tonal shadings, such perfect tonal balance, as one heard in this number, do they not play so more frequently?

In the beginning of Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude the brass drowned out everything else at a point where the strings should have been as clearly audible. Throughout most of this number, except at the famous passage where the three chief themes are combined, there was a sad lack of proportion and restraint. After all, quality of tone is more important musically than quantity of sound.

Mr Koussevitzky repeated the highly individual and often irritating interpretation of Brahms' C minor symphony with which the present season's concerts began. The third movement he quickens and makes more beautiful by hurrying the tempo. The slow movement he took too slowly, making some of it more lugubrious than pathetic. In the finale he failed to establish an even tempo. He conceives this movement, the finest Brahms ever wrote, not as a meditation followed by a song of triumph, but as a rhapsody ending in hysterical shouts. One cannot but recall Muck's noble interpretation of this music.

The fourth concert of this series will be given March 2.

P. R.

177

Symphony Leader to Put Liszt's Faust "On the Air"

Post Feb 14

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Since Liszt's great "Faust Symphony" was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra no longer ago than March, 1923, the performance scheduled for the Symphony Concerts of this week may scarcely be termed a revival.

Nevertheless Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this music may well be awaited with keen anticipation by subscribers to these concerts and by that indeterminate audience who may make their first acquaintance with it "on the air." For it seems safe to prophesy that at Mr. Koussevitzky's hands the work will be fully restored to the prestige it enjoyed here in the days of Dr. Muck, who, in his great admiration for and understanding of this, Liszt's masterpiece, was the first to give Boston an inkling of its true quality.

It has been said that the various settings of Goethe's poem number between 30 to 35. Most of these are not, of course, familiar to the average music-lover; he will undoubtedly think first in this connection of Gounod's opera, and then of Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust" or perhaps of Boito's "Mefistofele." It is altogether possible that he will have, too, a recollection of this "Faust Symphony" of Liszt and of the "Faust Overture" of Wagner, while he may also be aware that Schumann's "Scenes from Faust," although rarely performed these days, is rated among that composer's masterpieces. And these half-dozen works do actually comprise the viable musical commentary upon the poem of "Faust," despite the numerous composers who have been inspired by it.

It is unfortunate for the reputation—and the appreciation—of Goethe's poem that the form in which it is chiefly known outside of German-speaking lands is that of Gounod's "Faust," which is in fact less an interpretation than a perversion in that it lays all its stress upon a single episode, treating that episode in conventionalized operatic fashion. Occasionally, to be sure, the spirit of Goethe's original appears therein; yet the Germans will not call the opera "Faust" at all, but dub it, and more appropriately, "Margarethe."

As it is, we find the nearest approach to the ideal symphonic Faust in the symphony of Liszt, composed in 1853-54 and revised in 1857, and incidentally the most important single work that Liszt has left us.

Those who know Liszt as orchestral composer only through such things as the two piano concertos, the symphonic poems, "Les Preludes," "Tasso," "Mazeppa" and "The Battle of the Huns," or the orchestral transcriptions of the Hungarian Rhapsodies—in all of which much dross is mingled with the gold—will find in the 'Faust Symphony" a wholly different order of composer. Here Liszt forgets altogether his empty rhetoric, his obvious sentimentality, his flamboyant orchestration, and becomes a searching and eloquent poet in tones, the creator of perhaps the greatest example of musical psychoanalysis that we yet possess.

The "Faust Symphony" bears no programme beyond the respective labelling of the three movements as "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles."

A sombre introduction begins the first of these divisions in which are exposed two themes, the first a groping, almost tortured subject that may well have been intended to express Faust's search for knowledge, while the second, characterized by an everywhere recognizable descent of a seventh, plainly suggests the disappointed philosopher. An affecting episode heard later in the movement, obviously referring to Faust's love for Gretchen (the Marguerite of Gounod's opera), is derived from this same melody.

One of the most tenderly beautiful and delicately sensuous movements in the whole range of orchestral music, the second section gives us a faithful picture of Goethe's heroine, innocent yet passionate. The love-theme of the first movement enters here and has now specific reference to Faust.

And with masterly cunning Liszt writes no new theme for Mephistopheles, but taking as his cue the words "I am the spirit that denies," he contents himself with parodying the themes of Faust. Once, in the midst of the din and mockery, there appears the vision of Gretchen, but it quickly fades, and the biting irony, the demoniacal furies resume their course. At length, however, a change comes over the music; it becomes transformed, ennobled; and a tenor voice and male chorus sing in apotheosis the words of Goethe's Chorus Mysticus, which have been thus rendered into English prose: "All that is transitory is only a simile; the insufficient here becomes event; the indescribable is here done; the Ever-Feminine draws us on."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POTTSVILLE, PA.
Morning Paper

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO BROADCAST FROM WEEI

For the first time in its hitsory and after a long series of attempts to secure permission, conerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra are to be broadcast from Station WEEI Boston through the generosity of a Boston business man Wi field S Quinby. Mr. Quinby has given $1,000 for each of the twelve concerts to pay for the privilege of having them broadcast from the regular Saturday afternoon programs of the orchestra at Symphony hall. The first two concerts were broadcast January 23 and 30, and one hereafter will be given each Saturday for ten additional weeks.

It is possible that the concerts will be relayed to other stations in New England, particularly WTAG, Worcester, and QCSH, Portland Me. This feature is dependent upon the arrangements that WEEI officals can make with other stations and with the telephone company.

Arthur F. Edes of the WEEI announcing staff know to listeners as EFA, is to have charge of the microphone at all the twelve concerts.

Over a million radio fans in the Soviet Union listen in on the programs of the Government stations every day, according to a report of the Soviet radio industry received by the Russian information Burea here. The number is increasing by

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 1 0 1926

RUSSIAN COMPOSER WILL COME HERE WITH SYMPHONY

Serge Prokofieff to Play Own Concerto Tuesday Evening.

Next Tuesday evening, in Infantry Hall, at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will be heard for the last time but one in Providence this season. The soloist of the evening will be Serge Prokofieff, the distinguished young Russian composer and pianist, who will appear in his own Third Pianoforte Concerto. Prokofieff has played his concerto with his orchestra in Boston, New York, Brooklyn and other cities, exciting in each case great enthusiasm by his creative skill as a composer, and by his utter technical mastery of the piano.

Despite the certain importance which attends the first appearance in Providence of this composer, nevertheless to some perhaps the principal event of the evening will be the performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." Koussevitzky's reading, in the opinion of many, is stirring and masterful even beyond the many brilliant interpretations of this score with which we are now familiar. Perhaps no score is more difficult and exacting than this, nor better calculated to reveal the attainments of a virtuoso orchestra. There are important solos upon each of the principal instruments—the violin, viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, flute, bassoon, trumpet, trombone, horn; even the drum. The violin solo is the most important of these and a sensuous cadenza-like theme with which the concertmaster intersperses the music depicts Schelherazade, the Sultan's consort, beginning another of her thousand and one tales. The events described in this score by Rimsky-Korsakov, who was always fond of setting fairy tales to music, are "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship," "The Story of the Kalander-Prince," "The Young Prince and the Young Princess," "Festival at Bagdad," "The Sea," "The Ship Goes to Pieces Against a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior," "Conclusion." The undulating measure describing the sea on which Sinbad's ship is wrecked have long been famous, the climax of the shipwreck near the close is such to make everyone sit on the edge of his seat.

Koussevitzky will introduce the programme with a concerto for strings by the early Italian composer, Vivaldi.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

FEB 1 7 1926

SYMPHONY WILL DISCONTINUE

Boston Musical Organization to Quit Providence After Next Concert

Greater love for music hath no man than this—that he will endure the tortures which only the hard seats of Infantry Hall could inflict upon him, to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Even music cannot charm the hard beast that lurks in those monastic stools. They, as well as the music, leave their imprint.

This mournful wail is but the preliminary to the greater calamity announced last night in a little white sheet of paper stuck in Philip Hale's notes addressed "To Our Subscribers" which read as follows: "After giving nearly two hundred concerts in Providence over a period of many years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be compelled, for lack of an auditorium, to discontinue its visits to Providence after this season. The fifth and last concert of the present season on Tuesday evening, March 16th, will therefore be in the nature of a farewell. The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra regrets this situation, particularly in view of the ever-widening interest in these concerts under Mr. Koussevitsky."

The fortitude with it requires to suffer the chairs in Infantry Hall will now be called upon to sustain the people of Providence under this heavy blow. It would be unfortunate if the Boston Symphony management adheres to its plans. The Boston Symphony is one of the things which keep us in contact with civilization, and we should be the poorer for its loss. Some way should be found by interested parties to forestall the impending tragedy. Our beautiful Benedict Memorial to Music would be a mockery without the inspiration that the Boston organization brings.

Mr. Koussevitsky's program last night included the Concerto in E minor for string orchestra, by Vivaldi, edited by A. Mistovski; the Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night," by Rimsky-Korsakov; and the Third Concerto for Piano, Opus 26, by Serge Prokofieff, with the author as the piano soloist.

It was a well-rounded program, covering three periods in music: Vivaldi's the eighteenth century, with the strings carrying the tenuous pure melody; Rimsky-Korsakov's the conventional suite; and Prokofieff's the modernist contribution. The principal virtues of the Vivaldi number, as pointed out in the program, were "simple clearness of design and superfiscial effectiveness." It does not attempt to express an idea; it is beautiful and light melody. The Rimsky-Korsakoff suite is entirely familiar. The Prokofieff contribution was a puzzle to the audience last night, most of whom were brought up in the traditional school. Looks of blank amazement, as well as suppressed chuckles, could be seen and heard as the Russian composer, aided by the orchestra, rode merrily through what seemed to be brazen discords but which were, in reality, if the modernists are to be believed, ideas that could not be conveyed in any other manner. The technique was way over the heads of the audience last night, but they must have found some kinship with the composer, who was called back five times to take bows. He was, it is true, a very likeable chap.

Boston Symphony Plays At Baltimore

Many Local Choral and Club Events

So satisfactory were the three concerts for children last year that the same number was scheduled for this season. The first took place Jan. 23. Again a prize of ten dollars will be awarded the winner of a written criticism contest following each performance.

There was delightful music by the London String Quartet at Peabody Conservatory Jan. 22. Excellence of ensemble was well in evidence. The recitalist there Jan. 29 was Austin Conradi, pianist, of the teaching staff.

Frederick R. Huber, municipal direc a talk on "Baltimore the Cradle of Fortnightly Club of Walbrook.

Irma Payne Schiaffino, soprano, and tenor, with Marie Shriver and Agnes companists, sang at Stieff Hall Jan. of St. Leo's Orphanage.

"Humor in Music" was the basis of by Virginia Blackhead and Bessie E the preparatory department at Peabo Jan. 26.

SYMPHONY CONCERT DELIGHTS BIG CROWD

Sergei Prokofieff, Pianist-Composer, Plays His Ultra-Modern Concerto.

Sergei Prokofieff, composer-pianist, shared with Sergei Koussevitzky, brilliant conductor, the honors of an all-Russian programme given last night by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Infantry Hall, Providence. The concert, the fourth of the series in Providence, was attended by a capacity crowd.

Announcement was made that the famous organization would be unable to continue its Providence visits after this season because of the lack of a suitable auditorium. One more concert is planned this season. Mr. Koussevitsky is arranging a special farewell programme. The Boston Symphony orchestra's visits to Providence cover a 50-year period and undoubtedly strenuous efforts will be made to provide an auditorium by next year or 1928 at the latest.

The programme last night provided an interesting contrast study for students of music. Mr. Koussevitsky first presented the old, stately, melodic Vivaldo Concerto in E-minor for string orchestra. Containing simple phrasing and a theme that rang in one's ears long after the final crashing chord of the ensemble had died away, the concerto found ready favor.

Then came Prokofieff, the modernist, with his discordant Third Concerto for piano in its various movements. A young man, who already has cram A young man, who already has crammed into his brief life the adventures of the Russian political debacle and a flight across Siberia to America, his hurried existence was reflected in his concerto. Mr. Prokofieff seems to have evolved a composition to test his own remarkable powers as a pianist. Restless, strange, the music appears to tell a story of a flight. Mr. Koussevitsky's treatment of the orchestral accompaniment was strikingly well done. Mr. Prokofieff was given a great ovation, Mr. Koussevitsky leading in the applause for his brilliant countryman.

Rimsky-Korsakov's musical fairy tale, the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," concluded the programme. Telling the story of the famed charmer who saved her life by weaving wondrous tales for her would-be executioner, the composition enthralled the audience as an Anderson fable holds the attention of a child. A solo violin, played by Mr. Brugin, the concert master, brought out the story of the suite sweetly and softly. Above all the blending of the symphonic instruments could be heard this plaint voice telling its stories, first of "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship," then "The Story of the Kalandar Prince," next "The Young Prince and the Young Princess" and finally "The Festival at Bagdad."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

FEB 1 4 1926

WHAT BOSTON CRITICS SAID OF GOOSSENS

Brief Compendium of Press Comment on His Visit.

The following Boston correspondence of The Musical Digest, printed in its last issue, is a brief compendium of the opinion expressed by Boston critics of the visit to that city by Eugene Goossens as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony:

Boston's music lovers had no cause to complain of the lack of musical events during the past week. Eugene Goossens made his first appearance here as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Henry Hadley again led the People's Symphony; and concerts were given by the Flonzaley Quartet, Pablo Casals, Albert Spalding, Harold Bauer, and others.

Eugene Goossens proved a "versatile conductor on his first appearance here at last week's Symphony concerts," according to Philip Hale of the Herald. The concert, which was a "brilliant" one, included Mr. Goossens' own Sinfonietta, Weber's Der Freischeutz Overture, Brahm's Fourth Symphony, Debussy's Iberia and Delius' On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring. In Mr. Hale's opinion, the conductor "in each instance interpreted as if he was the sworn champion of that particular school," although the program was a varied one.

The orchestra "played with great brilliance and imaginative power," ob-

---

THIRD HISTORICAL SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Koussevitzky Interprets Brahms and Wagner

Boston Globe Feb. 10

The third program of the new Tuesday Symphony series covering the history of music included four not too well assorted composers, Wagner, Saint-Saens, Tchaikovsky and Brahms. Mr Koussevitzky gave, as usual, individual and energetic interpretations of the chosen pieces. An audience which filled the hall seemed pleased.

Tchaikovsky's overture "Romeo and Juliet" was superbly played and with that imaginative sympathy for the composer's intention which is better than any mere technical virtuosity. Mr Koussevitzky is the finest interpreter of Tchaikovsky Boston has heard in the past 15 years. Here, in the music of a fellow Slav, prone like himself to overemphasis, to almost hysterical excitement, Mr Koussevitzky is throughly at home, as he is also in the music of Skriabin.

Saint-Saens' graceful but trivial, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" Mr Koussevitzky used as a show-piece to illustrate the remarkable virtuosity of the orchestra. Why, when he and the players are capable of giving such delicate and subtle tonal shadings, such perfect tonal balance, as one heard in this number, do they not play so more frequently?

In the beginning of Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude the brass drowned out everything else at a point where the strings should have been as clearly audible. Throughout most of this number, except at the famous passage where the three chief themes are combined, there was a sad lack of proportion and restraint. After all, quality of tone is more important musically than quantity of sound.

Mr Koussevitzky repeated the highly individual and often irritating interpretation of Brahms' C minor symphony with which the present season's concerts began. The third movement he quickens and makes more beautiful by hurrying the tempo. The slow movement he took too slowly, making some of it more lugubrious than pathetic. In the finale he failed to establish an even tempo. He conceives this movement, the finest Brahms ever wrote, not as a meditation followed by a song of triumph, but as a rhapsody ending in hysterical shouts. One cannot but recall Muck's noble interpretation of this music.

The fourth concert of this series will be given March 2. P. R.

177

Symphony Leader to Put Liszt's Faust "On the Air"

Post — Feb 14

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Since Liszt's great "Faust Symphony" was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra no longer ago than March, 1923, the performance scheduled for the Symphony Concerts of this week may scarcely be termed a revival.

Nevertheless Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this music may well be awaited with keen anticipation by subscribers to these concerts and by that indeterminate audience who may make their first acquaintance with it "on the air." For it seems safe to prophesy that at Mr. Koussevitzky's hands the work will be fully restored to the prestige it enjoyed here in the days of Dr. Muck, who, in his great admiration for and understanding of this, Liszt's masterpiece, was the first to give Boston an inkling of its true quality.

It has been said that the various settings of Goethe's poem number between 30 to 35. Most of these are not, of course, familiar to the average music-lover; he will undoubtedly think first in this connection of Gounod's opera, and then of Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust" or perhaps of Boito's "Mefistofele." It is altogether possible that he will have, too, a recollection of this "Faust Symphony" of Liszt and of the "Faust Overture" of Wagner, while he may also be aware that Schumann's "Scenes from Faust," although rarely performed these days, is rated among that composer's masterpieces. And these half-dozen works do actually comprise the viable musical commentary upon the poem of "Faust," despite the numerous composers who have been inspired by it.

It is unfortunate for the reputation—and the appreciation—of Goethe's poem that the form in which it is chiefly known outside of German-speaking lands is that of Gounod's "Faust," which is in fact less an interpretation than a perversion in that it lays all its stress upon a single episode, treating that episode in conventionalized operatic fashion. Occasionally, to be sure, the spirit of Goethe's original appears therein; yet the Germans will not call the opera "Faust" at all, but dub it, and more appropriately, "Margarethe."

As it is, we find the nearest approach to the ideal symphonic Faust in the symphony of Liszt, composed in 1853-54 and revised in 1857, and incidentally the most important single work that Liszt has left us.

Those who know Liszt as orchestral composer only through such things as the two piano concertos, the symphonic poems, "Les Preludes," "Tasso," "Mazeppa" and "The Battle of the Huns," or the orchestral transcriptions of the Hungarian Rhapsodies—in all of which much dross is mingled with the gold—will find in the 'Faust Symphony" a wholly different order of composer. Here Liszt forgets altogether his empty rhetoric, his obvious sentimentality, his flamboyant orchestration, and becomes a searching and eloquent poet in tones, the creator of perhaps the greatest example of musical psychoanalysis that we yet possess.

The "Faust Symphony" bears no programme beyond the respective labelling of the three movements as "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles."

A sombre introduction begins the first of these divisions in which are exposed two themes, the first a groping, almost tortured subject that may well have been intended to express Faust's search for knowledge, while the second, characterized by an everywhere recognizable descent of a seventh, plainly suggests the disappointed philosopher. An affecting episode heard later in the movement, obviously referring to Faust's love for Gretchen (the Marguerite of Gounod's opera), is derived from this same melody.

One of the most tenderly beautiful and delicately sensuous movements in the whole range of orchestral music, the second section gives us a faithful picture of Goethe's heroine, innocent yet passionate. The love-theme of the first movement enters here and has now specific reference to Faust.

And with masterly cunning Liszt writes no new theme for Mephistopheles, but taking as his cue the words "I am the spirit that denies," he contents himself with parodying the themes of Faust. Once, in the midst of the din and mockery, there appears the vision of Gretchen, but it quickly fades, and the biting irony, the demoniacal furies resume their course. At length, however, a change comes over the music; it becomes transformed, ennobled; and a tenor voice and male chorus sing in apotheosis the words of Goethe's Chorus Mysticus, which have been thus rendered into English prose: "All that is transitory is only a simile; the insufficient here becomes event; the indescribable is here done; the Ever-Feminine draws us on."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POTTSVILLE, PA.
Morning Paper

space permitting.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO BROADCAST FROM WEEI

For the first time in its hitsory and after a long series of attempts to secure permission, conerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra are to be broadcast from Station WEEI Boston through the generosity of a Boston business man Wi field S Quinby. Mr. Quinby has given $1,000 for each of the twelve concerts to pay for the privilege of having them broadcast from the regular Saturday afternoon programs of the orchestra at Symphony hall. The first two concerts were broadcast January 23 and 30, and one hereafter will be given each Saturday for ten additional weeks.

It is possible that the concerts will be relayed to other stations in New England, particularly WTAG Worcester, and QCSH, Portland Me. This feature is dependent upon the arrangements that WEEI officals can make with other stations and with the telephone company.

Arthur F. Edes of the WEEI announcing staff know to listeners as EFA, is to have charge of the microphone at all the twelve concerts.

Over a million radio fans in the Soviet Union listen in on the programs of the Government stations every day, according to a report of the Soviet radio industry received by the Russian information Burea here. The number is increasing by

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

FEB 1 7 192

SYMPHONY WILL DISCONTINUE

Boston Musical Organization to Quit Providence After Next Concert

Greater love for music hath no man than this—that he will endure the tortures which only the hard seats of Infantry Hall could inflict upon him, to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Even music cannot charm the hard beast that lurks in those monastic stools. They, as well as the music, leave their imprint.

This mournful wail is but the preliminary to the greater calamity announced last night in a little white sheet of paper stuck in Philip Hale's notes addressed "To Our Subscribers" which read as follows: "After giving nearly two hundred concerts in Providence over a period of many years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be compelled, for lack of an auditorium, to discontinue its visits to Providence after this season. The fifth and last concert of the present season on Tuesday evening, March 16th, will therefore be in the nature of a farewell. The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra regrets this situation, particularly in view of the ever-widening interest in these concerts under Mr. Koussevitsky."

The fortitude with it requires to suffer the chairs in Infantry Hall will now be called upon to sustain the people of Providence under this heavy blow. It would be unfortunate if the Boston Symphony management adheres to its plans. The Boston Symphony is one of the things which keep us in contact with civilization, and we should be the poorer for its loss. Some way should be found by interested parties to forestall the impending tragedy. Our beautiful Benedict Memorial to Music would be a mockery without the inspiration that the Boston organization brings.

Mr. Koussevitsky's program last night included the Concerto in E minor for string orchestra, by Vivaldi, edited by A. Mistovski; the Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night," by Rimsky-Korsakov; and the Third Concerto for Piano, Opus 26, by Serge Prokofieff, with the author as the piano soloist.

It was a well-rounded program, covering three periods in music: Vivaldi's the eighteenth century, with the strings carrying the tenuous pure melody; Rimsky-Korsakov's the conventional suite; and Prokofieff's the modernist contribution. The principal virtues of the Vivaldi number, as pointed out in the program, were "simple clearness of design and superfiscial effectiveness." It does not attempt to express an idea; it is beautiful and light melody. The Rimsky-Korsakoff suite is entirely familiar. The Prokofieff contribution was a puzzle to the audience last night, most of whom were brought up in the traditional school. Looks of blank amazement, as well as suppressed chuckles could be seen and heard as the Russian composer, aided by the orchestra, rode merrily through what seemed to be brazen discords but which were, in reality, if the modernists are to be believed, ideas that could not be conveyed in any other manner. The technique was way over the heads of the audience last night, but they must have found some kinship with the composer, who was called back five times to take bows. He was, it is true, a very likeable chap.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 1 3 192

RUSSIAN COMPOSER WILL COME HERE WITH SYMPHONY

Serge Prokofieff to Play Own Concerto Tuesday Evening.

Next Tuesday evening, in Infantry Hall, at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will be heard for the last time but one in Providence this season. The soloist of the evening will be Serge Prokofieff, the distinguished young Russian composer and pianist, who will appear in his own Third Pianoforte Concerto. Prokofieff has played his concerto with his orchestra in Boston, New York, Brooklyn and other cities, exciting in each case great enthusiasm by his creative skill as a composer, and by his utter technical mastery of the piano.

Despite the certain importance which attends the first appearance in Providence of this composer, nevertheless to some perhaps the principal event of the evening will be the performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." Koussevitzky's reading, in the opinion of many, is stirring and masterful even beyond the many brilliant interpretations of this score with which we are now familiar. Perhaps no score is more difficult and exacting than this, nor better calculated to reveal the attainments of a virtuoso orchestra. There are important solos upon each of the principal instruments—the violin, viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, flute, bassoon, trumpet, trombone, horn; even the drum. The violin solo is the most important of these and a sensuous cadenza-like theme with which the concertmaster intersperses the music depicts Scheherazade, the Sultan's consort, beginning another of her thousand and one tales. The events described in this score by Rimsky-Korsakov, who was always fond of setting fairy tales to music, are "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship," "The Story of the Kalander-Prince," "The Young Prince and the Young Princess," "Festival at Bagdad," "The Sea," "The Ship Goes to Pieces Against a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior," "Conclusion." The undulating measure describing the sea on which Sinbad's ship is wrecked have long been famous, the climax of the shipwreck near the close is such to make everyone sit on the edge of his seat.

Koussevitzky will introduce the programme with a concerto for strings by the early Italian composer, Vivaldi.

Announcing that
Dr. Clarence P. Sullivan
DENTIST
Specialist in Plate Work
Office Hours—1 to 5 and 7 to 8 p. m.
1331 PLEASANT STREET
Impressions by the latest Dr. Hall and Teeth Methods

Moore Building Phone 1788-W
Dr. C. W. Stansfield
EYE, EAR, NOSE AND THROAT
FRANKLIN BUILDING
Rooms 1 and 2
Cor. Franklin and Purchase Sts.
1 to 4 P. M. 6:45 to 7:45 P. M.

Boston Symphony Plays At Baltimore

Many Local Choral and Club Events

So satisfactory were the three concerts for children last year that the same number was scheduled for this season. The first took place Jan. 23. Again a prize of ten dollars will be awarded the winner of a written criticism contest following each performance.

There was delightful music by the London String Quartet at Peabody Conservatory Jan. 22. Excellence of ensemble was well in evidence. The recitalist there Jan. 29 was Austin Conradi, pianist, of the teaching staff.

Frederick R. Huber, municipal direc a talk on "Baltimore the Cradle of Fortnightly Club of Walbrook.

Irma Payne Schiaffino, soprano, and tenor, with Marie Shriver and Agnes companists, sang at Stieff Hall Jan. of St. Leo's Orphanage.

"Humor in Music" was the basis of by Virginia Blackhead and Bessie E the preparatory department at Peabo Jan. 26.

SYMPHONY CONCERT DELIGHTS BIG CROWD

Sergei Prokofieff, Pianist-Composer, Plays His Ultra-Modern Concerto.

Sergei Prokofieff, composer-pianist, shared with Sergei Koussevitsky, brilliant conductor, the honors of an all-Russian programme given last night by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Infantry Hall, Providence. The concert, the fourth of the series in Providence, was attended by a capacity crowd.

Announcement was made that the famous organization would be unable to continue its Providence visits after this season because of the lack of a suitable auditorium. One more concert is planned this season. Mr. Koussevitsky is arranging a special farewell programme. The Boston Symphony orchestra's visits to Providence cover a 50-year period and undoubtedly strenuous efforts will be made to provide an auditorium by next year or 1928 at the latest.

The programme last night provided an interesting contrast study for students of music. Mr. Koussevitsky first presented the old, stately, melodic Vivaldo Concerto in E-minor for string orchestra. Containing simple phrasing and a theme that rang in one's ears long after the final crashing chord of the ensemble had died away, the concerto found ready favor.

Then came Prokofieff, the modernist, with his discordant Third Concerto for piano in its various movements. A young man, who already has cram A young man, who already has crammed into his brief life the adventures of the Russian political debacle and a flight across Siberia to America, his hurried existence was reflected in his concerto. Mr. Prokofieff seems to have evolved a composition to test his own remarkable powers as a pianist. Restless, strange, the music appears to tell a story of a flight. Mr. Koussevitsky's treatment of the orchestral accompaniment was strikingly well done. Mr. Prokofieff was given a great ovation, Mr. Koussevitsky leading in the applause for his brilliant countryman.

Rimsky-Korsakov's musical fairy tale, the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," concluded the programme. Telling the story of the famed charmer who saved her life by weaving wondrous tales for her would-be executioner, the composition enthralled the audience as an Anderson fable holds the attention of a child. A solo violin, played by Mr. Brugin, the concert master, brought out the story of the suite sweetly and softly. Above all the blending of the symphonic instruments could be heard this plaint voice telling its stories, first of "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship," then "The Story of the Kalandar Prince," next "The Young Prince and the Young Princess" and finally "The Festival at Bagdad."

---

of Suite.
ading.
ng and bril-
with

score is more difficult and exacting than this, nor better calculated to reveal the attainments of a virtuoso orchestra. There are important solos upon each of the principal instruments—the violin, Viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, flute, bassoon, trumpet, trombone, horn; even the drum. The violin solo is the most important of these and a sensuous cadenza like theme with which the concertmaster intersperses the music depicts Scheherezade, the Sultan's consort, beginning another of her thousand and one tales.

The events described in this score by Rimsky-Korsakov, who was always fond of setting fairy tales to music are— The Sea and Sindbad's Ship. The story of the Kalander-Prince. The Young Prince and the Young Princess. Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces against a rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion. T lating measure describing attention to which Sindbad's Ship

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

FEB 1 4 1926

WHAT BOSTON CRITICS SAID OF GOOSSENS

Brief Compendium of Press Comment on His Visit.

The following Boston correspondence of The Musical Digest, printed in its last issue, is a brief compendium of the opinion expressed by Boston critics of the visit to that city by Eugene Goossens as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony:

Boston's music lovers had no cause to complain of the lack of musical events during the past week. Eugene Goossens made his first appearance here as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Henry Hadley again led the People's Symphony; and concerts were given by the Flonzaley Quartet, Pablo Casals, Albert Spalding, Harold Bauer, and others.

Eugene Goossens proved a "versatile conductor on his first appearance here at last week's Symphony concerts," according to Philip Hale of the Herald. The concert, which was a "brilliant" one, included Mr. Goossens' own Sinfonietta, Weber's Der Freischeutz Overture, Brahm's Fourth Symphony, Debussy's Iberia and Delius' On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring. In Mr. Hale's opinion, the conductor "in each instance interpreted as if he was the sworn champion of that particular school," although the program was a varied one.

The orchestra "played with great brilliance and imaginative power," ob-

---

THIRD HISTORICAL SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Koussevitzky Interprets Brahms and Wagner

Boston Globe Feb. 10

The third program of the new Tuesday Symphony series covering the history of music included four not too well assorted composers, Wagner, Saint-Saens, Tchaikovsky and Brahms. Mr Koussevitzky gave, as usual, individual and energetic interpretations of the chosen pieces. An audience which filled the hall seemed pleased.

Tchaikovsky's overture "Romeo and Juliet" was superbly played and with that imaginative sympathy for the composer's intention which is better than any mere technical virtuosity. Mr Koussevitzky is the finest interpreter of Tchaikovsky Boston has heard in the past 15 years. Here, in the music of a fellow Slav, prone like himself to overemphasis, to almost hysterical excitement, Mr Koussevitzky is throughly at home, as he is also in the music of Skriabin.

Saint-Saens' graceful but trivial, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" Mr Koussevitzky used as a show-piece to illustrate the remarkable virtuosity of the orchestra. Why, when he and the players are capable of giving such delicate and subtle tonal shadings, such perfect tonal balance, as one heard in this number, do they not play so more frequently?

In the beginning of Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude the brass drowned out everything else at a point where the strings should have been as clearly audible. Throughout most of this number, except at the famous passage where the three chief themes are combined, there was a sad lack of proportion and restraint. After all, quality of tone is more important musically than quantity of sound.

Mr Koussevitzky repeated the highly individual and often irritating interpretation of Brahms' C minor symphony with which the present season's concerts began. The third movement he quickens and makes more beautiful by hurrying the tempo. The slow movement he took too slowly, making some of it more lugubrious than pathetic. In the finale he failed to establish an even tempo. He conceives this movement, the finest Brahms ever wrote, not as a meditation followed by a song of triumph, but as a rhapsody ending in hysterical shouts. One cannot but recall Muck's noble interpretation of this music.

The fourth concert of this series w be given March 2.

P. R

177

Symphony Leader to Put Liszt's Faust "On the Air"

Post — Feb 14

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Since Liszt's great "Faust Symphony" was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra no longer ago than March, 1923, the performance scheduled for the Symphony Concerts of this week may scarcely be termed a revival.

Nevertheless Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this music may well be awaited with keen anticipation by subscribers to these concerts and by that indeterminate audience who may make their first acquaintance with it "on the air." For it seems safe to prophesy that at Mr. Koussevitzky's hands the work will be fully restored to the prestige it enjoyed here in the days of Dr. Muck, who, in his great admiration for and understanding of this, Liszt's masterpiece, was the first to give Boston an inkling of its true quality.

It has been said that the various settings of Goethe's poem number between 30 to 35. Most of these are not, of course, familiar to the average music-lover; he will undoubtedly think first in this connection of Gounod's opera, and then of Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust" or perhaps of Boito's "Mefistofele." It is altogether possible that he will have, too, a recollection of this "Faust Symphony" of Liszt and of the "Faust Overture" of Wagner, while he may also be aware that Schumann's "Scenes from Faust," although rarely performed these days, is rated among that composer's masterpieces. And these half-dozen works do actually comprise the viable musical commentary upon the poem of "Faust," despite the numerous composers who have been inspired by it.

It is unfortunate for the reputation—and the appreciation—of Goethe's poem that the form in which it is chiefly known outside of German-speaking lands is that of Gounod's "Faust," which is in fact less an interpretation than a perversion in that it lays all its stress upon a single episode, treating that episode in conventionalized operatic fashion. Occasionally, to be sure, the spirit of Goethe's original appears therein; yet the Germans will not call the opera "Faust" at all, but dub it, and more appropriately, "Margarethe."

As it is, we find the nearest approach to the ideal symphonic Faust in the symphony of Liszt, composed in 1853-54 and revised in 1857, and incidentally the most important single work that Liszt has left us.

Those who know Liszt as orchestral composer only through such things as the two piano concertos, the symphonic poems, "Les Preludes," "Tasso," "Mazeppa" and "The Battle of the Huns," or the orchestral transcriptions of the Hungarian Rhapsodies—in all of which much dross is mingled with the gold—will find in the 'Faust Symphony" a wholly different order of composer. Here Liszt forgets altogether his empty rhetoric, his obvious sentimentality, his flamboyant orchestration, and becomes a searching and eloquent poet in tones, the creator of perhaps the greatest example of musical psychoanalysis that we yet possess.

The "Faust Symphony" bears no programme beyond the respective labelling of the three movements as "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles."

A sombre introduction begins the first of these divisions in which are exposed two themes, the first a groping, almost tortured subject that may well have been intended to express Faust's search for knowledge, while the second, characterized by an everywhere recognizable descent of a seventh, plainly suggests the disappointed philosopher. An affecting episode heard later in the movement, obviously referring to Faust's love for Gretchen (the Marguerite of Gounod's opera), is derived from this same melody.

One of the most tenderly beautiful and delicately sensuous movements in the whole range of orchestral music, the second section gives us a faithful picture of Goethe's heroine, innocent yet passionate. The love-theme of the first movement enters here and has now specific reference to Faust.

And with masterly cunning Liszt writes no new theme for Mephistopheles, but taking as his cue the words "I am the spirit that denies," he contents himself with parodying the themes of Faust. Once, in the midst of the din and mockery, there appears the vision of Gretchen, but it quickly fades, and the biting irony, the demoniacal furies resume their course. At length, however, a change comes over the music; it becomes transformed, ennobled; and a tenor voice and male chorus sing in apotheosis the words of Goethe's Chorus Mysticus, which have been thus rendered into English prose: "All that is transitory is only a simile; the insufficient here becomes event; the indescribable is here done; the Ever-Feminine draws us on."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POTTSVILLE, PA.
Morning Paper

FEB 1 2 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO BROADCAST FROM WEEI

For the first time in its hitsory and after a long series of attempts to secure permission, conerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra are to be broadcast from Station WEEI Boston through the generosity of a Boston business man Wi 'ield S Quinby. Mr. Quinby has given $1,000 for each of the twelve concerts to pay for the privilege of having them broadcast from the regular Saturday afternoon programs of the orchestra at Symphony hall. The first two concerts were broad cast January 23 and 30, and one hereafter will be given each Saturday for ten additional weeks.

It is possible that the concerts will be relayed to other stations in New England, particularly WTAG, Worcester, and QCSH, Portland Me. This feature is dependent upon the arrangements that WEEI offical can make with other stations an with the telephone company.

Arthur F. Edes of the WEEI announcing staff know to listeners a EFA. is to have charge of the microphone at all the twelve concerts.

Cy Berg, the "Hawaiian Swede" and president of the I. O. O. S. Y. S L. I. is back at KYW, Chicago to explojnt a lot of new things to Radio fans who tune in the oCngress carnivals at midnight each Saturday.

For those who are not acquainted with the long string of symbols above mentioned it all means "Internation Order of Sky Yumpers, Snuse Chewers and Lutefisk Inhalers."

Over a million radio fans in the Soviet Union listen in on the programs of the Government stations every day, according to a report of the Soviet radio industry received by the Russian information Burea here. The number is increasing by scores of thousands each week. Village libraries in 400 villages in Moscow and Leningrad Provinces have been equipped with powerful receiving sets and loud speakers and 300 workers clubs in the two cities have been similarly fitted out. The hospitals and the larger hotels are rapidly being supplied with radio apparatus and the demand for sets from the numerous cooperative apartment houses grows rapidly.

Boston, New York, Brooklyn and other cities, exciting in each case great enthusiasm by his creative skill as a composer, and by his utter technical mastery of the piano.

Despite the certain importance which attends the first appearance in Providence of this composer, nevertheless to some perhaps the principal event of the evening will be the performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." Koussevitzky's reading, in the opinion of many, is stirring and masterful even beyond the many brilliant interpretations of this score with which we are now familiar. Perhaps no score is more difficult and exacting than this, nor better calculated to reveal the attainments of a virtuoso orchestra. There are important solos upon each of the principal instruments—the violin, viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, flute, bassoon, trumpet, trombone, horn; even the drum. The violin solo is the most important of these and a sensuous cadenza-like theme with which the concertmaster intersperses the music depicts Scheherazade, the Sultan's consort, beginning another of her thousand and one tales. The events described in this score by Rimsky-Korsakov, who was always fond of setting fairy tales to music, are "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship," "The Story of the Kalander-Prince," "The Young Prince and the Young Princess," "Festival at Bagdad," "The Sea," "The Ship Goes to Pieces Against a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior," "Conclusion." The undulating measure describing the sea on which Sinbad's ship is wrecked have long been famous, the climax of the shipwreck near the close is such to make everyone sit on the edge of his seat.

Koussevitzky will introduce the programme with a concerto for strings by the early Italian composer, Vivaldi.

---

hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Even music cannot charm the hard beast that lurks in those monastic stools. They, as well as the music, leave their imprint.

This mournful wail is but the preliminary to the greater calamity announced last night in a little white sheet of paper stuck in Philip Hale's notes addressed "To Our Subscribers" which read as follows: "After giving nearly two hundred concerts in Providence over a period of many years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be compelled, for lack of an auditorium, to discontinue its visits to Providence after this season. The fifth and last concert of the present season on Tuesday evening, March 16th, will therefore be in the nature of a farewell. The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra regrets this situation, particularly in view of the ever-widening interest in these concerts under Mr. Koussevitsky."

The fortitude with it requires to suffer the chairs in Infantry Hall will now be called upon to sustain the people of Providence under this heavy blow. It would be unfortunate if the Boston Symphony management adheres to its plans. The Boston Symphony is one of the things which keep us in contact with civilization, and we should be the poorer for its loss. Some way should be found by interested parties to forestall the impending tragedy. Our beautiful Benedict Memorial to Music would be a mockery without the inspiration that the Boston organization brings.

Mr. Koussevitsky's program last night included the Concerto in E minor for string orchestra, by Vivaldi, edited by A. Mistovski; the Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night," by Rimsky-Korsakov; and the Third Concerto for Piano, Opus 26, by Serge Prokofieff, with the author as the piano soloist.

It was a well-rounded program, covering three periods in music: Vivaldi's the eighteenth century, with the strings carrying the tenuous pure melody; Rimsky-Korsakov's the conventional suite; and Prokofieff's the modernist contribution. The principal virtues of the Vivaldi number, as pointed out in the program, were "simple clearness of design and superfiscial effectiveness." It does not attempt to express an idea; it is beautiful and light melody. The Rimsky-Korsakoff suite is entirely familiar. The Prokofieff contribution was a puzzle to the audience last night, most of whom were brought up in the traditional school. Looks of blank amazement, as well as suppressed chuckles could be seen and heard as the Russian composer, aided by the orchestra, rode merrily through what seemed to be brazen discords but which were, in reality, if the modernists are to be believed, ideas that could not be conveyed in any other manner. The technique was way over the heads of the audience last night, but they must have found some kinship with the composer, who was called back five times to take bows. He was, it is true, a very likeable chap.

Boston Symphony Plays At Baltimore

Many Local Choral and Club Events

So satisfactory were the three concerts for children last year that the same number was scheduled for this season. The first took place Jan. 23. Again a prize of ten dollars will be awarded the winner of a written criticism contest following each performance.

There was delightful music by the London String Quartet at Peabody Conservatory Jan. 22. Excellence of ensemble was well in evidence. The recitalist there Jan. 29 was Austin Conradi, pianist, of the teaching staff.

Frederick R. Huber, municipal director of music, gave a talk on "Baltimore the Cradle of Music" before the Fortnightly Club of Walbrook.

Irma Payne Schiaffino, soprano, and Albert Almoney, tenor, with Marie Shriver and Agnes L. Garret as accompanists, sang at Stieff Hall Jan. 28 for the benefit of St. Leo's Orphanage.

"Humor in Music" was the basis of a lecture-recital by Virginia Blackhead and Bessie Evans, teachers in the preparatory department at Peabody Conservatory, Jan. 26.

SYMPHONY CONCERT DELIGHTS BIG CROWD

Sergei Prokofieff, Pianist Composer, Plays His Ultra-Modern Concerto.

Sergei Prokofieff, composer-pianist, shared with Sergei Koussevitsky, brilliant conductor, the honors of an all-Russian programme given last night by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Infantry Hall, Providence. The concert, the fourth of the series in Providence, was attended by a capacity crowd.

Announcement was made that the famous organization would be unable to continue its Providence visits after this season because of the lack of a suitable auditorium. One more concert is planned this season. Mr. Koussevitsky is arranging a special farewell programme. The Boston Symphony orchestra's visits to Providence cover a 50-year period and undoubtedly strenuous efforts will be made to provide an auditorium by next year or 1928 at the latest.

The programme last night provided an interesting contrast study for students of music. Mr. Koussevitsky first presented the old, stately, melodic Vivaldo Concerto in E-minor for string orchestra. Containing simple phrasing and a theme that rang in one's ears long after the final crashing chord of the ensemble had died away, the concerto found ready favor.

Then came Prokofieff, the modernist, with his discordant Third Concerto for piano in its various movements. A young man, who already has cram A young man, who already has crammed into his brief life the adventures of the Russian political debacle and a flight across Siberia to America, his hurried existence was reflected in his concerto. Mr. Prokofieff seems to have evolved a composition to test his own remarkable powers as a pianist. Restless, strange, the music appears to tell a story of a flight. Mr. Koussevitsky's treatment of the orchestral accompaniment was strikingly well done. Mr. Prokofieff was given a great ovation, Mr. Koussevitsky leading in the applause for his brilliant countryman.

Rimsky-Korsakov's musical fairy tale, the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," concluded the programme. Telling the story of the famed charmer who saved her life by weaving wondrous tales for her would-be executioner, the composition enthralled the audience as an Anderson fable holds the attention of a child. A solo violin, played by Mr. Brugin, the concert master, brought out the story of the suite sweetly and softly. Above all the blending of the symphonic instruments could be heard this plaint voice telling its stories, first of "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship," then 'The Story of the Kalandar Prince," next "The Young Prince and the Young Princess" and finally "The Festival at Bagdad."

Press Comment on His Visit.

The following Boston correspondence of The Musical Digest, printed in its last issue, is a brief compendium of the opinion expressed by Boston critics of the visit to that city by Engene Goossens as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony:

Boston's music lovers had no cause to complain of the lack of musical events during the past week. Eugene Goossens made his first appearance here as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Henry Hadley again led the People's Symphony; and concerts were given by the Flonzaley Quartet, Pablo Casals, Albert Spalding, Harold Bauer, and others.

Eugene Goossens proved a "versatile conductor on his first appearance here at last week's Symphony concerts," according to Philip Hale of the Herald. The concert, which was a "brilliant" one, included Mr. Goossens' own Sinfonietta, Weber's Der Freischeutz Overture, Brahm's Fourth Symphony, Debussy's Iberia and Delius' On Hearing the First Cnckoo in Spring. In Mr. Hale's opinion, the conductor "in each instance interpreted as if he was the sworn champion of that particular school," although the program was a varied one.

The orchestra "played with great brilliance and imaginative power," observed the Globe reviewer. "The program except to a musician was not of the most attractive, but the first-rate performance made amends." According to the Post, the Goossens work was the most interesting on the program.

"It is an unpretentions affair, even for a piece of that unassuming title, yet in its chromatic second section . . . there is genuine beauty, and the other divisions of the piece compel by their nervous vitality, their characteristically modern terseness and directness of utterance," he reported.

The Transcript chronicler, who agreed with other writers that the performance was a splendid one, remarked that "with Mr. Goossens they (the orchestra) seemed to play more freely as man to man and musician to musician. . . . Moreover, being a new and able comer, he was also a stimulus."

The program, which was broadcast from Station WEEI, was the first to be heard over the radio.

---

score is more difficult and exacting than this, nor better calculated to reveal the attainments of a virtuoso orchestra. There are important solos upon each of the principal instruments—the violin, Viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, flute, bossoon, trumpet, trombone, horn; even the drum. The violin solo is the most important of these and a sensuous cadenza like theme with which the concertmaster intersperses the music depicts Scheherezade, the Sultan's consort, beginning another of her thousand and one tales.

The events described in this score by Rimsky-Korsakov, who was always fond of setting fairy tales to music are—The Sea and Sindbad's Ship. The story of the Kalander-Prince. The Young Prince and the Young Princess. Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces against a rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion. [illegible] attention to [illegible] lating measure describ[illegible] which Sindbad's Ship [illegible]

Moore Building Phone 1786-W
Dr. C. W. Stansfield
EYE, EAR, NOSE AND THROAT.
FRANKLIN BUILDING
Cor. Franklin and Purchase Sts.
Rooms 1 and 2
1 to 4 P. M. 6:45 to 7:45 P. M.

Announcing that
Dr. Clarence P. Sullivan
DENTIST
Specialist in Plate Work
Office Hours—1 to 5 and 7 to 8 p. m.
1351 PLEASANT STREET
Impressions by the latest Dr. Hall and Tench Methods

126

177

Symphony Leader to Put Liszt's Faust "On the Air"

Post — Feb 14

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Since Liszt's great "Faust Symphony" was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra no longer ago than March, 1923, the performance scheduled for the Symphony Concerts of this week may scarcely be termed a revival.

Nevertheless Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this music may well be awaited with keen anticipation by subscribers to these concerts and by that indeterminate audience who may make their first acquaintance with it "on the air." For it seems safe to prophesy that at Mr. Koussevitzky's hands the work will be fully restored to the prestige it enjoyed here in the days of Dr. Muck, who, in his great admiration for and understanding of this, Liszt's masterpiece, was the first to give Boston an inkling of its true quality.

It has been said that the various settings of Goethe's poem number between 30 to 35. Most of these are not, of course, familiar to the average music-lover; he will undoubtedly think first in this connection of Gounod's opera, and then of Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust" or perhaps of Boito's "Mefistofele." It is altogether possible that he will have, too, a recollection of this "Faust Symphony" of Liszt and of the "Faust Overture" of Wagner, while he may also be aware that Schumann's "Scenes from Faust," although rarely performed these days, is rated among that composer's masterpieces. And these half-dozen works do actually comprise the viable musical commentary upon the poem of "Faust," despite the numerous composers who have been inspired by it.

It is unfortunate for the reputation—and the appreciation—of Goethe's poem that the form in which it is chiefly known outside of German-speaking lands is that of Gounod's "Faust," which is in fact less an interpretation than a perversion in that it lays all its stress upon a single episode, treating that episode in conventionalized operatic fashion. Occasionally, to be sure, the spirit of Goethe's original appears therein; yet the Germans will not call the opera "Faust" at all, but dub it, and more appropriately, "Margarethe."

As it is, we find the nearest approach to the ideal symphonic Faust in the symphony of Liszt, composed in 1853-54 and revised in 1857, and incidentally the most important single work that Liszt has left us.

Those who know Liszt as orchestral composer only through such things as the two piano concertos, the symphonic poems, "Les Preludes," "Tasso," "Mazeppa" and "The Battle of the Huns," or the orchestral transcriptions of the Hungarian Rhapsodies—in all of which much dross is mingled with the gold—will find in the 'Faust Symphony" a wholly different order of composer. Here Liszt forgets altogether his empty rhetoric, his obvious sentimentality, his flamboyant orchestration, and becomes a searching and eloquent poet in tones, the creator of perhaps the greatest example of musical psychoanalysis that we yet possess.

The "Faust Symphony" bears no programme beyond the respective labelling of the three movements as "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles."

A sombre introduction begins the first of these divisions in which are exposed two themes, the first a groping, almost tortured subject that may well have been intended to express Faust's search for knowledge, while the second, characterized by an everywhere recognizable descent of a seventh, plainly suggests the disappointed philosopher. An affecting episode heard later in the movement, obviously referring to Faust's love for Gretchen (the Marguerite of Gounod's opera), is derived from this same melody.

One of the most tenderly beautiful and delicately sensuous movements in the whole range of orchestral music, the second section gives us a faithful picture of Goethe's heroine, innocent yet passionate. The love-theme of the first movement enters here and has now specific reference to Faust.

And with masterly cunning Liszt writes no new theme for Mephistopheles, but taking as his cue the words "I am the spirit that denies," he contents himself with parodying the themes of Faust. Once, in the midst of the din and mockery, there appears the vision of Gretchen, but it quickly fades, and the biting irony, the demoniacal furies resume their course. At length, however, a change comes over the music; it becomes transformed, ennobled; and a tenor voice and male chorus sing in apotheosis the words of Goethe's Chorus Mysticus, which have been thus rendered into English prose: "All that is transitory is only a simile; the insufficient here becomes event; the indescribable is here done; the Ever-Feminine draws us on."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POTTSVILLE, PA.
Morning Paper

space permitting.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO BROADCAST FROM WEEI

For the first time in its hitsory and after a long series of attempts to secure permission, conerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra are to be broadcast from Station WEEI Boston through the generosity of a Boston business man Wi field S Quinby. Mr. Quinby has given $1,000 for each of the twelve concerts to pay for the privilege of having them broadcast from the regular Saturday afternoon programs of the orchestra at Symphony hall. The first two concerts were broadcast January 23 and 30, and one hereafter will be given each Saturday for ten additional weeks.

It is possible that the concerts will be relayed to other stations in New England, particularly WTAG, Worcester, and QCSH, Portland Me. This feature is dependent upon the arrangements that WEEI officals can make with other stations and with the telephone company.

Arthur F. Edes of the WEEI announcing staff know to listeners as EFA, is to have charge of the microphone at all the twelve concerts.

Cy Berg, the "Hawaiian Swede" and president of the I. O. O. S. Y. S. L. I. is back at KYW, Chicago to explpoint a lot of new things to Radio fans who tune in the oCngress carnivals at midnight each Saturday.

For those who are not acquainted with the long string of symbols above mentioned it all means "Internation Order of Sky Yumpers, Snuse Chewers and Lutefisk Inhalers."

Over a million radio fans in the Soviet Union listen in on the programs of the Government stations every day, according to a report of the Soviet radio industry received by the Russian information Burea here. The number is increasing by scores of thousands each week. Village libraries in 400 villages in Moscow and Leningrad Provinces have been equipped with powerful receiving sets and loud speakers and 300 workers clubs in the two cities have been similarly fitted out. The hospitals and the larger hotels are rapidly being supplied with radio apparatus and the demand for sets from the numerous cooperative apartment houses grows rapidly.

---

hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Even music cannot charm the hard beast that lurks in those monastic stools. They, as well as the music, leave their imprint.

This mournful wail is but the preliminary to the greater calamity announced last night in a little white sheet of paper stuck in Philip Hale's notes addressed "To Our Subscribers" which read as follows: "After giving nearly two hundred concerts in Providence over a period of many years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be compelled, for lack of an auditorium, to discontinue its visits to Providence after this season. The fifth and last concert of the present season on Tuesday evening, March 16th, will therefore be in the nature of a farewell. The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra regrets this situation, particularly in view of the ever-widening interest in these concerts under Mr. Koussevitsky."

The fortitude with it requires to suffer the chairs in Infantry Hall will now be called upon to sustain the people of Providence under this heavy blow. It would be unfortunate if the Boston Symphony management adheres to its plans. The Boston Symphony is one of the things which keep us in contact with civilization, and we should be the poorer for its loss. Some way should be found by interested parties to forestall the impending tragedy. Our beautiful Benedict Memorial to Music would be a mockery without the inspiration that the Boston organization brings.

Mr. Koussevitsky's program last night included the Concerto in E minor for string orchestra, by Vivaldi, edited by A. Mistovski; the Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night," by Rimsky-Korsakov; and the Third Concerto for Piano, Opus 26, by Serge Prokofieff, with the author as the piano soloist.

It was a well-rounded program, covering three periods in music: Vivaldi's the eighteenth century, with the strings carrying the tenuous pure melody; Rimsky-Korsakov's the conventional suite; and Prokofieff's the modernist contribution. The principal virtues of the Vivaldi number, as pointed out in the program, were "simple clearness of design and superfiscial effectiveness." It does not attempt to express an idea; it is beautiful and light melody. The Rimsky-Korsakoff suite is entirely familiar. The Prokofieff contribution was a puzzle to the audience last night, most of whom were brought up in the traditional school. Looks of blank amazement, as well as suppressed chuckles, could be seen and heard as the Russian composer, aided by the orchestra, rode merrily through what seemed to be brazen discords but which were, in reality, if the modernists are to be believed, ideas that could not be conveyed in any other manner. The technique was way over the heads of the audience last night, but they must have found some kinship with the composer, who was called back five times to take bows. He was, it is true, a very likeable chap.

Boston, New York, Brooklyn and other cities, exciting in each case great enthusiasm by his creative skill as a composer, and by his utter technical mastery of the piano.

Despite the certain importance which attends the first appearance in Providence of this composer, nevertheless to some perhaps the principal event of the evening will be the performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." Koussevitzky's reading, in the opinion of many, is stirring and masterful even beyond the many brilliant interpretations of this score with which we are now familiar. Perhaps no score is more difficult and exacting than this, nor better calculated to reveal the attainments of a virtuoso orchestra. There are important solos upon each of the principal instruments—the violin, viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, flute, bassoon, trumpet, trombone, horn; even the drum. The violin solo is the most important of these and a sensuous cadenza-like theme with which the concertmaster intersperses the music depicts Scheherazade, the Sultan's consort, beginning another of her thousand and one tales. The events described in this score by Rimsky-Korsakov, who was always fond of setting fairy tales to music, are "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship," "The Story of the Kalander-Prince," "The Young Prince and the Young Princess," "Festival at Bagdad," "The Sea," "The Ship Goes to Pieces Against a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior," "Conclusion." The undulating measure describing the sea on which Sinbad's ship is wrecked have long been famous, the climax of the shipwreck near the close is such to make everyone sit on the edge of his seat.

Koussevitzky will introduce the programme with a concerto for strings by the early Italian composer, Vivaldi.

Boston Symphony Plays At Baltimore

Many Local Choral and Club Events

So satisfactory were the three concerts for children last year that the same number was scheduled for this season. The first took place Jan. 23. Again a prize of ten dollars will be awarded the winner of a written criticism contest following each performance.

There was delightful music by the London String Quartet at Peabody Conservatory Jan. 22. Excellence of ensemble was well in evidence. The recitalist there Jan. 29 was Austin Conradi, pianist, of the teaching staff.

Frederick R. Huber, municipal director of music, gave a talk on "Baltimore the Cradle of Music" before the Fortnightly Club of Walbrook.

Irma Payne Schiaffino, soprano, and Albert Almoney, tenor, with Marie Shriver and Agnes L. Garret as accompanists, sang at Stieff Hall Jan. 28 for the benefit of St. Leo's Orphanage.

"Humor in Music" was the basis of a lecture-recital by Virginia Blackhead and Bessie Evans, teachers in the preparatory department at Peabody Conservatory, Jan. 26.

SYMPHONY CONCERT DELIGHTS BIG CROWD.

Sergei Prokofieff, Pianist Composer, Plays His Ultra-Modern Concerto.

Sergei Prokofieff, composer-pianist, shared with Sergei Koussevitsky, brilliant conductor, the honors of an all-Russian programme given last night by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Infantry Hall, Providence. The concert, the fourth of the series in Providence, was attended by a capacity crowd.

Announcement was made that the famous organization would be unable to continue its Providence visits after this season because of the lack of a suitable auditorium. One more concert is planned this season. Mr. Koussevitsky is arranging a special farewell programme. The Boston Symphony orchestra's visits to Providence cover a 50-year period and undoubtedly strenuous efforts will be made to provide an auditorium by next year or 1928 at the latest.

The programme last night provided an interesting contrast study for students of music. Mr. Koussevitsky first presented the old, stately, melodic Vivaldo Concerto in E-minor for string orchestra. Containing simple phrasing and a theme that rang in one's ears long after the final crashing chord of the ensemble had died away, the concerto found ready favor.

Then came Prokofieff, the modernist, with his discordant Third Concerto for piano in its various movements. A young man, who already has cram A young man, who already has crammed into his brief life the adventures of the Russian political debacle and a flight across Siberia to America, his hurried existence was reflected in his concerto. Mr. Prokofieff seems to have evolved a composition to test his own remarkable powers as a pianist. Restless, strange, the music appears to tell a story of a flight. Mr. Koussevitsky's treatment of the orchestral accompaniment was strikingly well done. Mr. Prokofieff was given a great ovation, Mr. Koussevitsky leading in the applause for his brilliant countryman.

Rimsky-Korsakov's musical fairy tale, the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," concluded the programme. Telling the story of the famed charmer who saved her life by weaving wondrous tales for her would-be executioner, the composition enthralled the audience as an Anderson fable holds the attention of a child. A solo violin, played by Mr. Brugin, the concert master, brought out the story of the suite sweetly and softly. Above all the blending of the symphonic instruments could be heard this plaint voice telling its stories, first of "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship," then "The Story of the Kalandar Prince," next "The Young Prince and the Young Princess" and finally "The Festival at Bagdad."

Press Comment on His Visit.

The following Boston correspondence of The Musical Digest, printed in its last issue, is a brief compendium of the opinion expressed by Boston critics of the visit to that city by Engene Goossens as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony:

Boston's music lovers had no cause to complain of the lack of musical events during the past week. Eugene Goossens made his first appearance here as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Henry Hadley again led the People's Symphony; and concerts were given by the Flonzaley Quartet, Pablo Casals, Albert Spalding, Harold Bauer, and others.

Eugene Goossens proved a "versatile conductor on his first appearance here at last week's Symphony concerts," according to Philip Hale of the Herald. The concert, which was a "brilliant" one, included Mr. Goossens' own Sinfonietta, Weber's Der Freischeutz Overture, Brahm's Fourth Symphony, Debussy's Iberia and Delius' On Hearing the First Cnckoo in Spring. In Mr. Hale's opinion, the conductor "in each instange interpreted as if he was the sworn champion of that particular school," although the program was a varied one.

The orchestra "played with great brilliance and imaginative power," observed the Globe reviewer. "The program except to a musician was not of the most attractive, but the first-rate performance made amends." According to the Post, the Goossens work was the most interesting on the program.

"It is an unpretentions affair, even for a piece of that unassuming title, yet in its chromatic second section . . . there is genuine beauty, and the other divisions of the piece compel by their nervous vitality, their characteristically modern terseness and directness of utterance," he reported.

The Transcript chronicler, who agreed with other writers that the performance was a splendid one, remarked that "with Mr. Goossens they (the orchestra) seemed to play more freely as man to man and musician to musician. . . . Moreover, being a new and able comer, he was also a stimulus."

The program, which was broadcast from Station WEEI, was the first to be heard over the radio.

---

score is more difficult and exacting than this, nor better calculated to reveal the attainments of a virtuoso orchestra. There are important solos upon each of the principal instruments—the violin, Viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, flute, bossoon, trumpet, trombone, horn; even the drum. The violin solo is the most important of these and a sensuous cadenza like theme with which the concertmaster intersperses the music depicts Scheherezade, the Sultan's consort, beginning another of her thousand and one tales.

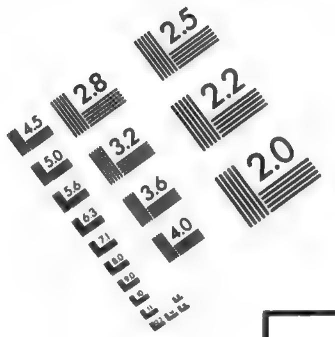
The events described in this score by Rimsky-Korsakov, who was always fond of setting fairy tales to music are—The Sea and Sindbad's Ship. The story of the Kalander-Prince. The Young Prince and the Young Princess. Festival at Pagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces against a rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion. The undulating measure describing which Sindbad's Ship

REDUCTION

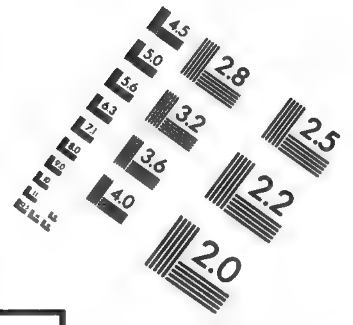
RATIO

14x

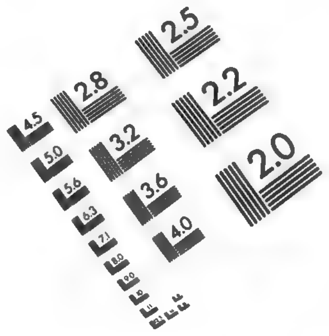
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



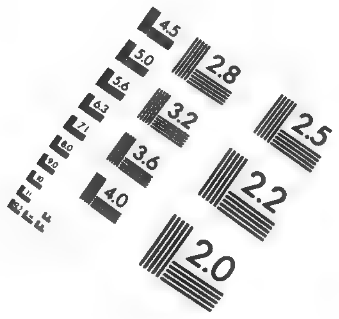
2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0
7.1



4.5
5.0
2.8
5.6
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0
7.1

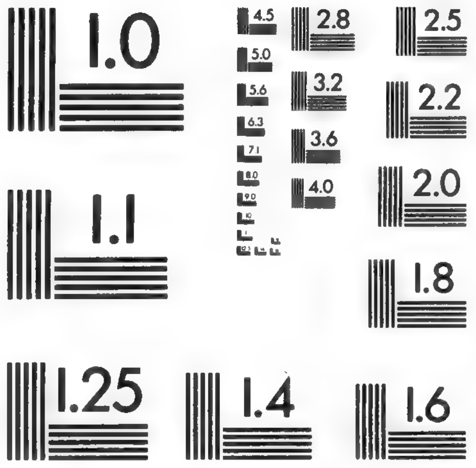


4.5
2.8
5.0
5.6
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
2.8
2.5
5.0
3.2
5.6
2.2
6.3
3.6
7.1
2.0
4.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

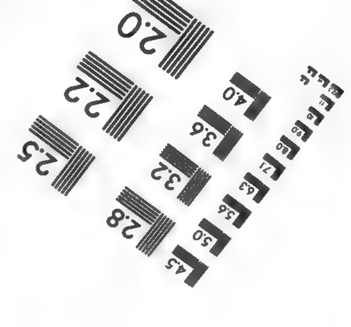
1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5

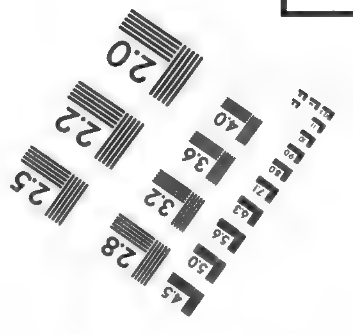


2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5

2.0
4.0
3.6
2.2
3.2
5.0
2.8
4.5
2.5

A4

A3



2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5

2.0
4.0
3.6
2.2
3.2
2.8
2.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

1926

Serge Prokofieff Will Appear as Soloist at This Week's Symphony Concert

178

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A contemporary piece of more than usual interest, with the composer himself to bear a part in the performance of it, figures on the programme that Mr. Koussevitzky has set for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall ~~next~~ Tuesday evening. This composer is Serge Prokofieff, a Russian, not yet 35, haled at the outset of his career as the "enfant terrible" of modern music but of late become more conservative in his tendencies, and the piece in which he will appear as soloist in his Third Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, first sketched in 1918 and completed three years later.

At a recent Symphony Concert in Boston Mr. Prokofieff played this same Concerto. There and then the piece pleased by reason of its lucidity, its daring though by no means unduly dissonant harmony, its frequent melodiousness and its brilliant and effective orchestral setting, while Prokofieff himself, a tall and undemonstrative young man, made an altogether agreeable impression by his modesty of demeanor and his unassuming though really remarkable gifts as pianist. Like many another of the younger moderns Prokofieff does not court emotion in his music. He seems to compose less with his heart than with his head. Yet in his music there is little hint of dryness. For all its lack of sensuous appeal it possesses a distinct charm.

So much for the modern side of the programme. To begin the concert Mr. Koussevitzky has chosen a Concerto for String Orchestra by the Italian Vivaldi, a contemporary of Bach whose music the conductor seems greatly to cherish, and a piece as yet unheard in Boston at the time these comments are written. Hence no details regarding it may here be set forth beyond the fact that its three movements are labelled respectively Vigoroso, Largo and Allegro, and that the resurrecting and editing hand, seemingly essential in the bringing of these elder Italian pieces before the public of the 20th century, is that of A. Mistovski.

For conclusion will come Rimsky-Korsakov's masterpiece, the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade;" and the audience will hear a performance not likely to be duplicated in their experience, unless they again hear this music from Mr. Koussevitzky or from another conductor (if such there be) equally possessed of Slavic fire and Slavic imagination, similarly aflame with the quest for musical beauty, directing an orchestra capable of realizing to the fullest and to the minutest detail his every intention.

When Rimsky-Korsakov wrote in his engrossing autobiography: "During the summer of 1888 at Neyzhgovitsy I finished 'Scheherazade' (in four movements) and an Easter Overture," he recorded in the first instance the completion of a work not only unexcelled but even unapproached in its particular domain, namely the musical picturing of Eastern life and legend.

On the occasion of the first performance of the suite, in what was then St. Petersburg, Rimsky gave as the titles of the four movements: "The Sea and Sindbad's Ship;" "The Story of the Kalandar Prince";

the theme which is thereafter associated with the sea upon which sailed Sindbad's ship, this melody is borne along through the orchestra upon modulations of enchanting subtlety. Himself a sailor in his younger days, Rimsky cherished always a special affection for the sea, and although this sea in "Scheherazade" is less that of our experience than the magical sea of Arabian legend, we are nevertheless vividly reminded in the course of this movement of the ocean's swell and of the play of sunlight upon the waves.

When he gave his name to the second movement Rimsky purposely kept his hearers in the dark as to which of the Kalandar Prince's tales inspired his imagination. We must, then, look upon this division of the Suite merely as music generally, and here and there poignantly, suggestive of the life of the Orient. There is a pronounced Eastern flavor to the chief melody first sung by the bassoon and to the strange fanfares for trombone and trumpet, while that episode wherein wind instruments are heard above a curious strumming accompaniment of the strings of the orchestra bears no relation to the music of the Occident.

With the third movement we are again reminded of a specific one of the Thousand and One Nights—the tale of the Prince Kamar-al-Zaman and the Princess Budur, who were "the likest of all folk, each to other, as they were twins or an only brother and sister." Besides the charming themes which characterize the lovers, the music of this third episode contains also a livelier melody, which recurs in the final movement, a theme of true seductiveness set off by a bewildering rhythmic accompaniment of percussion instruments.

In the final movement comes a vivid and colorful portrayal of the life of ancient Bagdad at its gayest and most abandoned. And then, at the moment these revelings reach their greatest excitement, the scene suddenly changes and once more there is spread before us the sea and the ship of Sindbad. With unprecedented splendor the sea-theme is now sounded by the full orchestra. But of a sudden a fearful doom overtakes the ship and the unhappy ones upon it. For as it chances the ship sails too near to that magnetic mountain whose irresistible force draws to it all that is metal, even the nails that hold the planks of the vessel's sides, and the ship itself crashes upon the rock.

Binding together the four movements of the suite is the theme of Scheherazade herself, she who night by night told to the Sultan Schahriar the thousand-and-one fabulous tales, thereby holding his interest from eve to eve and so postponing and finally evading altogether the fate which had befallen each of her predecessors. For the Sultan, convinced of the falseness and faithlessness of women, had sworn to put to death each of his wives after the first night, but ere Scheherazade had told her thousand-and-first tale he had abandoned his bloody plan. Played by a solo-violin against harp accompaniment, this Scheherazade-motive exerts upon the listener a curious spell.

Nor may this recounting be deemed complete without mention of the gorgeous instrumental dress in which Rimsky has clothed his musical thoughts. Admittedly one of the greatest of orchestral colorists, not elsewhere has he spread upon his palette brighter, richer or more subtle hues. And the wonder of it is that in this score he uses no vast array of instruments. Like Tchaikovsky in his Pathetic" Symphony, Rimsky-Korsakov has here demonstrated that color is not so much a matter of the number and variety of instruments used as of the manner in which they are employed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 1 7 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY VISITS NEXT YEAR ARE STILL LIKELY

The statement in the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall last night, that the orchestra will be forced to discontinue its visits to Providence after the March 16 concert, because of lack of an auditorium, is not to be construed as meaning that the orchestra will give no more concerts here, Assistant Manager G. E. Judd declared this morning.

"That statement was addressed to our subscribers in Providence and merely refers to the series of concerts. At present there is no auditorium available for a concert series next year. It is quite conceivable that special concerts may be arranged," said Mr. Judd.

Asked if he had considered the Rhode Island Auditorium, now under construction on North Main street, Mr. Judd said it would be impossible to pass judgment until it is completed. The suitability of the auditorium for concerts, particularly its acoustic properties, he explained, cannot be determined until the structure is finished.

Mr. Judd admitted that it is possible the building may be finished in time for the management of the orchestra to judge its adaptability and to arrange a series of concerts there for next winter, but he thought the possibility extremely remote.

Special Concerts Probable.

He said it is quite probable special Sunday concerts in theatres may be arranged if no other auditorium can be found.

Infantry Hall, for generations the home of orchestral music in Providence, is to be used for other purposes, leaving the Boston orchestra without a hall here after March 16, the date of the last concert of this winter's series.

This information was contained in a pamphlet given to patrons of the orchestra at the concert last night and which read as follows:

"After giving nearly 200 concerts in Providence over a period of many years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be compelled, for lack of an auditorium, to discontinue its visits to Providence after this season.

"The fifth and last concert of the present season on Tuesday evening, March 16, will therefore be in the nature of a farewell. The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra regrets this situation, particularly in view of the ever-widening interest in these concerts under Mr. Koussevitzky.

"Mr. Koussevitzky has in mind to prepare a programme of special interest for the final concert in Providence on March 16."

Here for 50 Years

For near 50 years Providence has been privileged to hear what is conceded among world critics to be one of the greatest aggregations of musicians ever gathered under one leader. The visit of the Boston orchestra to any city in the United States is an event. Critics and patrons await it with keen anticipation and a concert anywhere is followed by columns of comment in every newspaper.

Providence has been given nearly 200 concerts by this orchestra. Great figures of the music world have stood on Infantry Hall stage and wielded the baton which has brought forth from the instruments of a hundred players the music of the masters, and the greatest soloists of the concert stage, instrumentalists and singers, have come here with the orchestra to present their inspired offerings of beauty.

This yearly source of what is to many Providence people their greatest pleasure and inspiration may be cut off, the management of the orchestra says, if this city cannot offer an auditorium in which the art of music may present its message to those who would listen.

During the past half century the Boston orchestra has appeared here and during the past few years its patronage has been steadily growing, so that now, it is believed, the cessation of its concerts would mean a loud and violent protest on the part of its adherents.

Gericke, Nikisch, the great Hungarian; Paur, German wizard of the baton; Karl Muck, inspired musician whom the United States deported when he declined to play the "Star Spangled Banner" because he did not believe it was an artistic composition; Pierre Monteux and last and, in the opinion of many, greatest, Serge Koussevitzky, the emotional and fiery Russian—these are some of the men who have led the Boston Symphony Orchestra before Providence audiences.

Patronage Increases

Since the regime of Paur, the patronage has grown. With the advent of Muck came unprecedented popularity. Monteux added to the ever-growing list of those who scrambled for tickets when the orchestra came to town.

The story of Koussevitsky's vogue is known to all Providence people interested in music and tickets are at a premium when the artist of Petrograd, London and Paris stands at the conductor's desk in Infantry Hall.

The symphony orchestra has the powerful backing of wealthy Boston men. Frederick P. Cabot is a member of its governing board and a million-dollar endowment has been left by the late Maj. Higginson, who helped the organization during the lean years of its inception.

Philip Hale, one of Boston's leading music critics, through his compilation of the programmes, has given to America's music lovers what has been called an extraordinary library of historical and critical information set forth with great force and literary dexterity. In each programme Mr. Hale now writes expositions on the compositions presented, interesting lights upon the composer and an erudite and enlightening treatise on the composer's inspiration, methods and genius.

In Boston the orchestra has one of the finest homes ever given an institution of its kind, Symphony Hall on Huntington avenue, a fit setting for the inspiration and pleasure of thousands.

Such a hall Providence must have if it is not to be deprive dof the regular visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HOMELESS

After giving nearly two hundred concerts in Providence over a period of many years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be compelled, for lack of an auditorium, to discontinue its visits to Providence after this season.

The fifth and last concert of the present season on Tuesday evening, March 16, will therefore be in the nature of a farewell. The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra regrets this situation, particularly in view of the ever-widening interest in these concerts under Mr. Koussevitzky.

Mr. Koussevitzky has in mind to prepare a program of special interest for the final concert in Providence, March 16.

The enjoyment of last night's splendid concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra must have been alloyed, in the minds of many in the audience, by this terse announcement enclosed within the familiar buff-covered program. That this, the 192nd concert of the organization in Providence, was all but the last is a painful thought, and the reason for the discontinuance of the brilliant performances provokes humiliating reflections on the part of those who care anything about the cultural repute of our city.

It has been bad enough, in all conscience, to put up for so long with the barnlike trappings, the ghastly lights and the weird acoustics of the venerable edifice which has so long represented the best hospitality that Providence could offer to visiting artists. And now even that must go. We are turning Art out into the cold and locking the door.

What is to be done? We have repeatedly pointed out the need of an adequate theatre or other auditorium in Providence. We believe that this city would support such an enterprise. We believe that it would pay.

There are two possible solutior
wealthy and public-spirited citize forward to provide a home for a may elect to undertake the erect auditorium. One thing or the oth and the sooner the better. Prov afford to banish from its life the t
beautiful.

Is it to be a diverting thoug visitors to the proud capital of iams

-:- MUSIC -:-

Prospero Koussevitzky

Goethe said that the mark of great art was not its originality but its sincerity. We thought of that dictum frequently last night while Serge Prokofieff was playing his Concerto No. 3 at the Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall. Mr. Prokofieff's ingenuity and inventiveness are beyond question; his tonal effects are terrible as an army with banners; he has a power of musical phrase that is intellectual, supercilious, damnably critical of life and, at the end, somewhat futile. So it appeared to us as, indeed, did another of Mr. Prokofieff's compositions when he played in New York some years ago.

"The will is somewhat, somewhat, too, the power," Browning makes his Andrea del Sarto say. Mr. Prokofieff's will is tremendous, so is his power, but the will and the power seem to have been concentrated on minor things. He is still in a mood of protest, and art is essentially positive. Some day, maybe, this subtle and resourceful technician will acquire the ability to recollect emotion in tranquillity—Wordsworth's definition of poetry, or thereabouts. If he does, the world will give him a niche with the great composers.

Mr. Koussevitzky opened last night's program with a composition by Vivaldi, who was born in Venice in 1680 and died there in 1743, a work interesting historically and doubly interesting for its predictions of how music would develop in the later eighteenth century, a formal creation and as lovely as one of Joachim du Bellay's poems. But it
ing passion.
o Koussevitzky took
Mr. Koussevitzky's
eded to play Rimsky-
phonic suite. "Scheh-
as magical work, this,
ky knows Rimsky's
t better than Rimsky

in, perhaps, this Rus-hought more of his
han of his immediate
at hardly mattered.
again in the Arabian
where the imagina-
of the desert was
the most glorious
ime. Here, we said
a poet, a creator not
a genius whose coax-
g the eternal things

R. de A. J.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

DETROIT, MICH.

NEWS

FEB 2 5 1926

NOTED ORCHESTRA LEADER GIVES HIS FIRST U. S. SOLO

(By the Associated Press)

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 25.—Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, con-

---

KOUSSEVITZKY THRILLS IN SOLO

Globe — Feb 25

Plays in Brown Chapel After Receiving Degree

Roy Chapman Andrews Honored Also by University

Audience Gives Ovation to Boston Conductor

PROVIDENCE, Feb 24 (A. P.)—Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, responded in the medium of his art when Brown University this afternoon conferred on him the honorary degre of doctor of music. He played with thrilling beauty, upon a bass violin, Handel's largo and the andante from his own concert, composed some 20 years ago.

The university also honored Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer, who has traced the origin of prehistoric man to Central Asia, conferred on him the honorary degree of doctor of science.

Impressive exercises, paying gracious tribute to two men distinguished in widely diverse fields of endeavor, were held in Sayles Hall, the university chapel.

In conferring the degree upon M Koussevitzky, Pres William H. P. Faunce spoke of him as "a distinguished virtuoso and interpreter of the music of all peoples; leader of concerts in London, Madrid, Barcelona and Warsaw, who has crossed the seas to convey to prosaic America some of his own insight into the arts in the universal language of music." A tremendous ovation was accorded the conductor's recital.

In his citation of Mr Andrews, Pres Faunce said: "Roy Chapman Andrews, indefatigable student and intrepid explorer, who has made the dead past speak to the living present, and is making civilization realize its youth and the vast achievements yet to come."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Journal - Courier

FEB 2 7 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE MARCH 11

It is indeed a brilliant musical event that Rudolph Steinert has planned for music lovers of this vicinity on Thursday evening, March 11, for at that time at Woolsey hall, the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by its distinguished leader, Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard for a single concert. The event will mark the conclusion of the Steinert concert series for the present season, a series, which, by the way, has proven tremendously successful. That the final offering is to be one of such magnitude as this great Hub City organization of 107 picked musicians bespeaks great praise for the booking ability of Mr. Steinert, under whose managerial direction the Yale School of Music offers the attractions.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

It goes without saying that Serge Koussevitzky, as leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, now holds the attention of America as a striking and unusual personality in our world of music. In Europe he is as prominent likewise, having conducted with great success last summer his usual series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, and his his series as conductor of the London Symphony orchestra.

It is probable that Koussevitzky's genius has found its finest expression in the famous Boston Symphony orchestra which he now commands, for surely in its long and distinguished history, there never has been such a demand for concerts as at present for this famed musical organization. Indeed, each series in New York and Boston this season were oversubscribed far in advance.

The impending visit here of the Boston Symphony orchestra of more than five score players, and under the leadership of its conductor who has become a world celebrity, will surely constitute one of the most remarkable concerts which has been heard in this city for a long time.

Tickets are now on sale for the event at Steinert's, 183 Church street.

N.Y. Times Feb. 25

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY APPEARS AS SOLOIST

Plays With Beauty Bass Violin After Brown Confers on Him Degree of Doctor of Music.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 24 (AP).—Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, responded in the medium of his art when Brown University this afternoon conferred on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Music. He played with thrilling beauty upon a bass violin, Handel's Largo and the Andante from his own concerto composed some twenty years ago.

The university also honored Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer who has traced the origin of pre-historic man to Central Asia, conferring on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Science.

Impressive exercises, paying gracious tribute to two men distinguished in widely diverse fields of endeavor, were held in Sayles Hall, the university chapel.

In conferring the degree upon M. Koussevitzky, President William H. P. Faunce spoke of

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

WASHINGTON, D. C.

STAR

KOUSSEVITZKY HONORED.

Conductor Plays Bass Violin When Given Degree by Brown.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., February (AP).—Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, responded in the medium of his art when Brown University yesterday conferred on him the honorary degree of doctor of music. He received an ovation after playing with thrilling beauty upon a bass violin Handel's "Largo" and the "Andante" from his own concerto, composed some 20 years ago.

The university also honored Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer, who has traced the origin of prehistoric man to Central Asia, conferring on him the honorary degree of doctor of science.

1926

Serge Prokofieff Will Appear as Soloist at This Week's Symphony Concert

178

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A contemporary piece of more than usual interest, with the composer himself to bear a part in the performance of it, figures on the programme that Mr. Koussevitzky has set for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall ~~next~~ Tuesday evening. This composer is Serge Prokofieff, a Russian, not yet 35, haled at the outset of his career as the "enfant terrible" of modern music but of late become more conservative in his tendencies, and the piece in which he will appear as soloist is his Third Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, first sketched in 1918 and completed three years later.

At a recent Symphony Concert in Boston Mr. Prokofieff played this same Concerto. There and then the piece pleased by reason of its lucidity, its daring though by no means unduly dissonant harmony, its frequent melodiousness and its brilliant and effective orchestral setting, while Prokofieff himself, a tall and undemonstrative young man, made an altogether agreeable impression by his modesty of demeanor and his unassuming though really remarkable gifts as pianist. Like many another of the younger moderns Prokofieff does not court emotion in his music. He seems to compose less with his heart than with his head. Yet in his music there is little hint of dryness. For all its lack of sensuous appeal it possesses a distinct charm.

So much for the modern side of the programme. To begin the concert Mr. Koussevitzky has chosen a Concerto for ~~String~~ Orchestra by the Italian Vivaldi, a contemporary of Bach whose music the conductor seems greatly to cherish, and a piece as yet unheard in Boston at the time these comments are written. Hence no details regarding it may here be set forth beyond the fact that its three movements are labelled respectively Vigoroso, Largo and Allegro, and that the resurrecting and editing hand, seemingly essential in the bringing of these elder Italian pieces before the public of the 20th century, is that of A. Mistovski.

For conclusion will come Rimsky-Korsakov's masterpiece, the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade;" and the audience will hear a performance not likely to be duplicated in their experience, unless they again hear this music from Mr. Koussevitzky or from another conductor (if such there be) equally possessed of Slavic fire and Slavic imagination, similarly aflame with the quest for musical beauty, directing an orchestra capable of realizing to the fullest and to the minutest detail his every intention.

When Rimsky-Korsakov wrote in his engrossing autobiography: "During the summer of 1888 at Neyzhgovitsy I finished 'Scheherazade' (in four movements) and an Easter Overture," he recorded in the first instance the completion of a work not only unexcelled but even unapproached in its particular domain, namely the musical picturing of Eastern life and legend.

On the occasion of the first performance of the suite, in what was then St. Petersburg, Rimsky gave as the titles of the four movements: "The Sea and Sindbad's Ship;" "The Story of the Kalandar Prince"

the theme which is thereafter associated with the sea upon which sailed Sindbad's ship, this melody is borne along through the orchestra upon modulations of enchanting subtlety. Himself a sailor in his younger days, Rimsky cherished always a special affection for the sea, and although this sea in "Scheherazade" is less that of our experience than the magical sea of Arabian legend, we are nevertheless vividly reminded in the course of this movement of the ocena's swell and of the play of sunlight upon the waves.

When he gave his name to the second movement Rimsky purposely kept his hearers in the dark as to which of the Kalandar Prince's tales inspired his imagination. We must, then, look upon this division of the Suite merely as music generally, and here and there poignantly, suggestive of the life of the Orient. There is a pronounced Eastern flavor to the chief melody first sung by the bassoon and to the strange fanfares for trombone and trumpet, while that episode wherein wind instruments are heard above a curious strumming accompaniment of the strings of the orchestra bears no relation to the music of the Occident.

With the third movement we are again reminded of a specific one of the Thousand and One Nights—the tale of the Prince Kamar-al-Zaman and the Princess Budur, who were "the likest of all folk, each to other, as they were twins or an only brother and sister." Besides the charming themes which characterize the lovers, the music of this third episode contains also a livelier melody, which recurs in the final movement, a theme of true seductiveness set off by a bewildering rhythmic accompaniment of percussion instruments.

In the final movement comes a vivid and colorful portrayal of the life of ancient Bagdad at its gayest and most abandoned. And then, at the moment these revelings reach their greatest excitement, the scene suddenly changes and once more there is spread before us the sea and the ship of Sindbad. With unprecedented splendor the sea-theme is now sounded by the full orchestra. But of a sudden a fearful doom overtakes the ship and the unhappy ones upon it. For as it chances the ship sails too near to that magnetic mountain whose irresistible force draws to it all that is metal, even the nails that hold the planks of the vessel's sides, and the ship itself crashes upon the rock.

Binding together the four movements of the suite is the theme of Scheherazade herself, she who night by night told to the Sultan Schahriar the thousand-and-one fabulous tales, thereby holding his interest from eve to eve and so postponing and finally evading altogether the fate which had befallen each of her predecessors. For the Sultan, convinced of the falseness and faithlessness of women, had sworn to put to death each of his wives after the first night, but ere Scheherazade had told her thousand-and-first tale he had abandoned his bloody plan. Played by a solo-violin against harp accompaniment, this Scheherazade-motive exerts upon the listener a curious spell.

Nor may this recounting be deemed complete without mention of the gorgeous instrumental dress in which Rimsky has clothed his musical thoughts. Admittedly one of the greatest of orchestral colorists, not elsewhere has he spread upon his palette brighter, richer or more subtle hues. And the wonder of it is that in this score he uses no vast array of instruments. Like Tchaikovsky in his Pathetic" Symphony, Rimsky-Korsakov has here demonstrated that color is not so much a matter of the number and variety of instruments used as of the manner in which they are employed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

7 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY VISITS NEXT YEAR ARE STILL LIKELY

The statement in the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall last night, that the orchestra will be forced to discontinue its visits to Providence after the March 16 concert, because of lack of an auditorium, is not to be construed as meaning that the orchestra will give no more concerts here, Assistant Manager G. E. Judd declared this morning.

"That statement was addressed to our subscribers in Providence and merely refers to the series of concerts. At present there is no auditorium available for a concert series next year. It is quite conceivable that special concerts may be arranged," said Mr. Judd.

Asked if he had considered the Rhode Island Auditorium, now under construction on North Main street, Mr. Judd said it would be impossible to pass judgment until it is completed. The suitability of the auditorium for concerts, particularly its acoustic properties, he explained, cannot be determined until the structure is finished.

Mr. Judd admitted that it is possible the building may be finished in time for the management of the orchestra to judge its adaptability and to arrange a series of concerts there for next winter, but he thought the possibility extremely remote.

Special Concerts Probable.

He said it is quite probable special Sunday concerts in theatres may be arranged if no other auditorium can be found.

Infantry Hall, for generations the home of orchestral music is Providence, is to be used for other purposes,* leaving the Boston orchestra without a hall here after March 16, the date of the last concert of this winter's series.

This information was contained in a pamphlet given to patrons of the orchestra at the concert last night and which read as follows:

"After giving nearly 200 concerts in Providence over a period of many years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be compelled, for lack of an auditorium, to discontinue its visits to Providence after this season.

"The fifth and last concert of the present season on Tuesday evening, March 16, will therefore be in the nature of a farewell. The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra regrets this situation, particularly in view of the ever-widening interest in these concerts under Mr. Koussevitzky.

"Mr. Koussevitzky has in mind to prepare a programme of special interest for the final concert in Providence on March 16."

Here for 50 Years

For near 50 years Providence has been privileged to hear what is conceded among world critics to be one of the greatest aggregations of musicians ever gathered under one leader. The visit of the Boston orchestra to any city in the United States is an event. Critics and patrons await it with keen anticipation and a concert anywhere is followed by columns of comment in every newspaper.

Providence has been given nearly 200 concerts by this orchestra. Great figures of the music world have stood on Infantry Hall stage and wielded the baton which has brought forth from the instruments of a hundred players the music of the masters, and the greatest soloists of the concert stage, instrumentalists and singers, have come here with the orchestra to present their inspired offerings of beauty.

This yearly source of what is to many Providence people their greatest pleasure and inspiration may be cut off, the management of the orchestra says, if this city cannot offer an auditorium in which the art of music may present its message to those who would listen.

During the past half century the Boston orchestra has appeared here and during the past few years its patronage has been steadily growing, so that now, it is believed, the cessation of its concerts would mean a loud and violent protest on the part of its adherents.

Gericke, Nikisch, the great Hungarian; Paur, German wizard of the baton; Karl Muck, inspired musician whom the United States deported when he declined to play the "Star Spangled Banner" because he did not believe it was an artistic composition; Pierre Monteux and last and, in the opinion of many, greatest, Serge Koussevitzky, the emotional and fiery Russian—these are some of the men who have led the Boston Symphony Orchestra before Providence audiences.

Patronage Increases

Since the regime of Paur, the patronage has grown. With the advent of Muck came unprecedented popularity. Monteux added to the ever-growing list of those who scrambled for tickets when the orchestra came to town.

The story of Koussevitsky's vogue is known to all Providence people interested in music and tickets are at a premium when the artist of Petrograd, London and Paris stands at the conductor's desk in Infantry Hall.

The symphony orchestra has the powerful backing of wealthy Boston men. Frederick P. Cabot is a member of its governing board and a million-dollar endowment has been left by the late Maj. Higginson, who helped the organization during the lean years of its inception.

Philip Hale, one of Boston's leading music critics, through his compilation of the programmes, has given to America's music lovers what has been called an extraordinary library of historical and critical information set forth with great force and literary dexterity. In each programme Mr. Hale now writes expositions on the compositions presented, interesting lights upon the composer and an erudite and enlightening treatise on the composer's inspiration, methods and genius.

In Boston the orchestra has one of the finest homes ever given an institution of its kind, Symphony Hall on Huntington avenue, a fit setting for the inspiration and pleasure of thousands.

Such a hall Providence must have if it is not to be deprive dof the regular visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HOMELESS

After giving nearly two hundred concerts in Providence over a period of many years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be compelled, for lack of an auditorium, to discontinue its visits to Providence after this season.

The fifth and last concert of the present season on Tuesday evening, March 16, will therefore be in the nature of a farewell. The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra regrets this situation, particularly in view of the ever-widening interest in these concerts under Mr. Koussevitzky.

Mr. Koussevitzky has in mind to prepare a program of special interest for the final concert in Providence, March 16.

The enjoyment of last night's splendid concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra must have been alloyed, in the minds of many in the audience, by this terse announcement enclosed within the familiar buff-covered program. That this, the 192nd concert of the organization in Providence, was all but the last is a painful thought, and the reason for the discontinuance of the brilliant performances provokes humiliating reflections on the part of those who care anything about the cultural repute of our city.

It has been bad enough, in all conscience, to put up for so long with the barnlike trappings, the ghastly lights and the weird acoustics of the venerable edifice which has so long represented the best hospitality that Providence could offer to visiting artists. And now even that must go. We are turning Art out into the cold and locking the door.

What is to be done? We have repeatedly pointed out the need of an adequate theatre or other auditorium in Providence. We believe that this city would support such an enterprise. We believe that it would pay.

There are two possible solutior
wealthy and public-spirited citize
forward to provide a home for a
may elect to undertake the erect auditorium. One thing or the othe and the sooner the better. Prov afford to banish from its life the t
beautiful.

Is it to be a diverting thoug visitors to the proud capital of
iams

-:- MUSIC -:-

Prospero Koussevitzky

Goethe said that the mark of great art was not its originality but its sincerity. We thought of that dictum frequently last night while Serge Prokofieff was playing his Concerto No. 3 at the Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall. Mr. Prokofieff's ingenuity and inventiveness are beyond question; his tonal effects are terrible as an army with banners; he has a power of musical phrase that is intellectual, supercilious, damnably critical of life and, at the end, somewhat futile. So it appeared to us as, indeed, did another of Mr. Prokofieff's compositions when he played in New York some years ago.

"The will is somewhat, somewhat, too, the power," Browning makes his Andrea del Sarto say. Mr. Prokofieff's will is tremendous, so is his power, but the will and the power seem to have been concentrated on minor things. He is still in a mood of protest, and art is essentially positive. Some day, maybe, this subtle and resourceful technician will acquire the ability to recollect emotion in tranquillity—Wordsworth's definition of poetry, or thereabouts. If he does, the world will give him a niche with the great composers.

Mr. Koussevitzky opened last night's program with a composition by Vivaldi, who was born in Venice in 1680 and died there in 1743, a work interesting historically and doubly interesting for its predictions of how music would develop in the later eighteenth century, a formal creation and as lovely as one of Joachim du Bellay's poems. But it
ing passion.
o Koussevitzky took
Mr. Koussevitzky's
eded to play Rimsky-
phonic suite, "Scheh-
as magical work, this,
ky knows Rimsky's
t better than Rimsky

in, perhaps, the Rus-
hought more of his
han of his immediate
at hardly mattered.
again in the Arabian
where the imagina-
of the desert was
the most glorious
ime. Here, we said
a poet, a creator not
a genius whose coax-
g the eternal things

R. de A.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

NOTED ORCHESTRA LEADER GIVES HIS FIRST U. S. SOLO

(By the Associated Press)

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 25.—Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, con-

---

KOUSSEVITZKY THRILLS IN SOLO

Globe Feb 25

Plays in Brown Chapel After Receiving Degree

Roy Chapman Andrews Honored Also by University

Audience Gives Ovation to Boston Conductor

PROVIDENCE, Feb 24 (A. P.)—Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, responded in the medium of his art when Brown University this afternoon conferred on him the honorary degre of doctor of music. He played with thrilling beauty, upon a bass violin, Handel's largo and the andante from his own concert, composed some 20 years ago.

The university also honored Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer, who has traced the origin of prehistoric man to Central Asia, conferred on him the honorary degree of doctor of science.

Impressive exercises, paying gracious tribute to two men distinguished in widely diverse fields of endeavor, were held in Sayles Hall, the university chapel.

In conferring the degree upon M Koussevitzky, Pres William H. P. Faunce spoke of him as "a distinguished virtuoso and interpreter of the music of all peoples; leader of concerts in London, Madrid, Barcelona and Warsaw, who has crossed the seas to convey to prosaic America some of his own insight into the arts in the universal language of music." A tremendous ovation was accorded the conductor's recital.

In his citation of Mr Andrews, Pres Faunce said: "Roy Chapman Andrews, indefatigable student and intrepid explorer, who has made the dead past speak to the living present, and is making civilization realize its youth and the vast achievements yet to come."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE MARCH 11

It is indeed a brilliant musical event that Rudolph Steinert has planned for music lovers of this vicinity on Thursday evening, March 11, for at that time at Woolsey hall, the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by its distinguished leader, Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard for a single concert. The event will mark the conclusion of the Steinert concert series for the present season, a series, which, by the way, has proven tremendously successful. That the final offering is to be one of such magnitude as this great Hub City organization of 107 picked musicians bespeaks great praise for the booking ability of Mr. Steinert, under whose managerial direction the Yale School of Music offers the attractions.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

It goes without saying that Serge Koussevitzky, as leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, now holds the attention of America as a striking and unusual personality in our world of music. In Europe he is as prominent likewise, having conducted with great success last summer his usual series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, and his his series as conductor of the London Symphony orchestra.

It is probable that Koussevitzky's genius has found its finest expression in the famous Boston Symphony orchestra which he now commands, for surely in its long and distinguished history, there never has been such a demand for concerts as at present for this famed musical organization. Indeed, each series in New York and Boston this season were oversubscribed far in advance.

The impending visit here of the Boston Symphony orchestra of more than five score players, and under the leadership of its conductor who has become a world celebrity, will surely constitute one of the most remarkable concerts which has been heard in this city for a long time.

Tickets are now on sale for the event at Steinert's, 183 Church street.

N.Y. Times Feb 25

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY APPEARS AS SOLOIST

Plays With Beauty Bass Violin After Brown Confers on Him Degree of Doctor of Music.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 24 (AP).—Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, responded in the medium of his art when Brown University this afternoon conferred on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Music. He played with thrilling beauty upon a bass violin, Handel's Largo and the Andante from his own concerto composed some twenty years ago.

The university also honored Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer who has traced the origin of pre-historic man to Central Asia, conferring on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Science.

Impressive exercises, paying gracious tribute to two men distinguished in widely diverse fields of endeavor, were held in Sayles Hall, the university chapel.

In conferring the degree upon M. Koussevitzky, President William H. P. Faunce spoke of him

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

KOUSSEVITZKY HONORED.

Conductor Plays Bass Violin When Given Degree by Brown.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., February [illegible] (AP).—Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, responded in the medium of his art when Brown University yesterday conferred on him the honorary degree of doctor of music. He received an ovation after playing with thrilling beauty upon a bass violin Handel's "Largo" and the "Andante" from his own concerto, composed some 20 years ago.

The university also honored Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer, who has traced the origin of prehistoric man to Central Asia, conferring on him the honorary degree of doctor of science.

… 1926

Serge Prokofieff Will Appear as Soloist at This Week's Symphony Concert

178

Written for the Sunday Journal

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A contemporary piece of more than usual interest, with the composer himself to bear a part in the performance of it, figures on the programme that Mr. Koussevitzky has set for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall ~~next~~ Tuesday evening. This composer is Serge Prokofieff, a Russian, not yet 35, haled at the outset of his career as the "enfant terrible" of modern music but of late become more conservative in his tendencies, and the piece in which he will appear as soloist in his Third Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, first sketched in 1918 and completed three years later.

At a recent Symphony Concert in Boston Mr. Prokofieff played this same Concerto. There and then the piece pleased by reason of its lucidity, its daring though by no means unduly dissonant harmony, its frequent melodiousness and its brilliant and effective orchestral setting, while Prokofieff himself, a tall and undemonstrative young man, made an altogether agreeable impression by his modesty of demeanor and his unassuming though really remarkable gifts as pianist. Like many another of the younger moderns Prokofieff does not court emotion in his music. He seems to compose less with his heart than with his head. Yet in his music there is little hint of dryness. For all its lack of sensuous appeal it possesses a distinct charm.

So much for the modern side of the programme. To begin the concert Mr. Koussevitzky has chosen a Concerto for ~~String~~ Orchestra by the Italian Vivaldi, a contemporary of Bach whose music the conductor seems greatly to cherish, and a piece as yet unheard in Boston at the time these comments are written. Hence no details regarding it may here be set forth beyond the fact that its three movements are labelled respectively Vigoroso, Largo and Allegro, and that the resurrecting and editing hand, seemingly essential in the bringing of these elder Italian pieces before the public of the 20th century, is that of A. Mistovski.

For conclusion will come Rimsky-Korsakov's masterpiece, the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade;" and the audience will hear a performance not likely to be duplicated in their experience, unless they again hear this music from Mr. Koussevitzky or from another conductor (if such there be) equally possessed of Slavic fire and Slavic imagination, similarly aflame with the quest for musical beauty, directing an orchestra capable of realizing to the fullest and to the minutest detail his every intention.

When Rimsky-Korsakov wrote in his engrossing autobiography: "During the summer of 1888 at Neyzhgovitsy I finished 'Scheherazade' (in four movements) and an Easter Overture," he recorded in the first instance the completion of a work not only unexcelled but even unapproached in its particular domain, namely the musical picturing of Eastern life and legend.

On the occasion of the first performance of the suite, in what was then St. Petersburg, Rimsky gave as the titles of the four movements: "The Sea and Sindbad's Ship;" "The Story of the Kalandar Prince;" "The Young Prince and the Young Princess," and "Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship Goes to Pieces Against a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion." And although, presumably through some change of heart on the part of the composer, the published score does not divulge these titles, they are invariably used to-day in connection with performance of the music. Nor would the composer's meaning be entirely clear to us without them.

After a preliminary announcement of the theme which is thereafter associated with the sea upon which sailed Sindbad's ship, this melody is borne along through the orchestra upon modulations of enchanting subtlety. Himself a sailor in his younger days, Rimsky cherished always a special affection for the sea, and although this sea in "Scheherazade" is less that of our experience than the magical sea of Arabian legend, we are nevertheless vividly reminded in the course of this movement of the ocena's swell and of the play of sunlight upon the waves.

When he gave his name to the second movement Rimsky purposely kept his hearers in the dark as to which of the Kalandar Prince's tales inspired his imagination. We must, then, look upon this division of the Suite merely as music generally, and here and there poignantly, suggestive of the life of the Orient. There is a pronounced Eastern flavor to the chief melody first sung by the bassoon and to the strange fanfares for trombone and trumpet, while that episode wherein wind instruments are heard above a curious strumming accompaniment of the strings of the orchestra bears no relation to the music of the Occident.

With the third movement we are again reminded of a specific one of the Thousand and One Nights—the tale of the Prince Kamar-al-Zaman and the Princess Budur, who were "the likest of all folk, each to other, as they were twins or an only brother and sister." Besides the charming themes which characterize the lovers, the music of this third episode contains also a livelier melody, which recurs in the final movement, a theme of true seductiveness set off by a bewildering rhythmic accompaniment of percussion instruments.

In the final movement comes a vivid and colorful portrayal of the life of ancient Bagdad at its gayest and most abandoned. And then, at the moment these revelings reach their greatest excitement, the scene suddenly changes and once more there is spread before us the sea and the ship of Sindbad. With unprecedented splendor the sea-theme is now sounded by the full orchestra. But of a sudden a fearful doom overtakes the ship and the unhappy ones upon it. For as it chances the ship sails too near to that magnetic mountain whose irresistible force draws to it all that is metal, even the nails that hold the planks of the vessel's sides, and the ship itself crashes upon the rock.

Binding together the four movements of the suite is the theme of Scheherazade herself, she who night by night told to the Sultan Schahriar the thousand-and-one fabulous tales, thereby holding his interest from eve to eve and so postponing and finally evading altogether the fate which had befallen each of her predecessors. For the Sultan, convinced of the falseness and faithlessness of women, had sworn to put to death each of his wives after the first night, but ere Scheherazade had told her thousand-and-first tale he had abandoned his bloody plan. Played by a solo-violin against harp accompaniment, this Scheherazade-motive exerts upon the listener a curious spell.

Nor may this recounting be deemed complete without mention of the gorgeous instrumental dress in which Rimsky has clothed his musical thoughts. Admittedly one of the greatest of orchestral colorists, not elsewhere has he spread upon his palette brighter, richer or more subtle hues. And the wonder of it is that in this score he uses no vast array of instruments. Like Tchaikovsky in his Pathetic" Symphony, Rimsky-Korsakov has here demonstrated that color is not so much a matter of the number and variety of instruments used as of the manner in which they are employed.

HOMELESS

After giving nearly two hundred concerts in Providence over a period of many years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be compelled, for lack of an auditorium, to discontinue its visits to Providence after this season.

The fifth and last concert of the present season on Tuesday evening, March 16, will therefore be in the nature of a farewell. The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra regrets this situation, particularly in view of the ever-widening interest in these concerts under Mr. Koussevitzky.

Mr. Koussevitzky has in mind to prepare a program of special interest for the final concert in Providence, March 16.

The enjoyment of last night's splendid concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra must have been alloyed, in the minds of many in the audience, by this terse announcement enclosed within the familiar buff-covered program. That this, the 192nd concert of the organization in Providence, was all but the last is a painful thought, and the reason for the discontinuance of the brilliant performances provokes humiliating reflections on the part of those who care anything about the cultural repute of our city.

It has been bad enough, in all conscience, to put up for so long with the barnlike trappings, the ghastly lights and the weird acoustics of the venerable edifice which has so long represented the best hospitality that Providence could offer to visiting artists. And now even that must go. We are turning Art out into the cold and locking the door.

What is to be done? We have repeatedly pointed out the need of an adequate theatre or other auditorium in Providence. We believe that this city would support such an enterprise. We believe that it would pay.

There are two possible solutions: a group of wealthy and public-spirited citizens may come forward to provide a home for art or the city may elect to undertake the erection of a civic auditorium. One thing or the other must come, and the sooner the better. Providence cannot afford to banish from its life the things that are beautiful.

Is it to be a diverting thought for future visitors to the proud capital of Rhode Island that we have, in Roger Williams Park, a shrine to Music such as few cities can boast—and no place to hear a concert?

-:- MUSIC -:-

Prospero Koussevitzky

Goethe said that the mark of great art was not its originality but its sincerity. We thought of that dictum frequently last night while Serge Prokofieff was playing his Concerto No. 3 at the Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall. Mr. Prokofieff's ingenuity and inventiveness are beyond question; his tonal effects are terrible as an army with banners; he has a power of musical phrase that is intellectual, supercilious, damnably critical of life and, at the end, somewhat futile. So it appeared to us as, indeed, did another of Mr. Prokofieff's compositions when he played in New York some years ago.

"The will is somewhat, somewhat, too, the power," Browning makes his Andrea del Sarto say. Mr. Prokofieff's will is tremendous, so is his power, but the will and the power seem to have been concentrated on minor things. He is still in a mood of protest, and art is essentially positive. Some day, maybe, this subtle and resourceful technician will acquire the ability to recollect emotion in tranquillity—Wordsworth's definition of poetry, or thereabouts. If he does, the world will give him a niche with the great composers.

Mr. Koussevitzky opened last night's program with a composition by Vivaldi, who was born in Venice in 1680 and died there in 1743, a work interesting historically and doubly interesting for its predictions of how music would develop in the later eighteenth century, a formal creation and as lovely as one of Joachim du Bellay's poems. But it roused no sleeping passion.

Then Prospero Koussevitzky took the baton from Mr. Koussevitzky's hands and proceeded to play Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." It was magical work, this, for Koussevitzky knows Rimsky's fairyland almost better than Rimsky himself knew it.

Now and again, perhaps, this Russian Prospero thought more of his whole picture than of his immediate rhythm, but that hardly mattered. We were back again in the Arabian Nights, back to where the imaginative fecundity of the desert was blossoming with the most glorious stories of all time. Here, we said to ourselves, is a poet, a creator not an interpreter, a genius whose coaxing fingers bring the eternal things into our midst.

R. de A. J.

The statement in the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall last night, that the orchestra will be forced to discontinue its visits to Providence after the March 16 concert, because of lack of an auditorium, is not to be construed as meaning that the orchestra will give no more concerts here, Assistant Manager G. E. Judd declared this morning.

"That statement was addressed to our subscribers in Providence and merely refers to the series of concerts. At present there is no auditorium available for a concert series next year. It is quite conceivable that special concerts may be arranged," said Mr. Judd.

Asked if he had considered the Rhode Island Auditorium, now under construction on North Main street, Mr. Judd said it would be impossible to pass judgment until it is completed. The suitability of the auditorium for concerts, particularly its acoustic properties, he explained, cannot be determined until the structure is finished.

Mr. Judd admitted that it is possible the building may be finished in time for the management of the orchestra to judge its adaptability and to arrange a series of concerts there for next winter, but he thought the possibility extremely remote.

Special Concerts Probable.

He said it is quite probable special Sunday concerts in theatres may be arranged if no other auditorium can be found.

Infantry Hall, for generations the home of orchestral music is Providence, is to be used for other purposes,* leaving the Boston orchestra without a hall here after March 16, the date of the last concert of this winter's series.

This information was contained in a pamphlet given to patrons of the orchestra at the concert last night and which read as follows:

"After giving nearly 200 concerts in Providence over a period of many years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be compelled, for lack of an auditorium, to discontinue its visits to Providence after this season.

"The fifth and last concert of the present season on Tuesday evening, March 16, will therefore be in the nature of a farewell. The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra regrets this situation, particularly in view of the ever-widening interest in these concerts under Mr. Koussevitzky.

"Mr. Koussevitzky has in mind to prepare a programme of special interest for the final concert in Providence on March 16."

Here for 50 Years

For near 50 years Providence has been privileged to hear what is conceded among world critics to be one of the greatest aggregations of musicians ever gathered under one leader. The visit of the Boston orchestra to any city in the United States is an event. Critics and patrons await it with keen anticipation and a concert anywhere is followed by columns of comment in every newspaper.

Providence has been given nearly 200 concerts by this orchestra. Great figures of the music world have stood on Infantry Hall stage and wielded the baton which has brought forth from the instruments of a hundred players the music of the masters, and the greatest soloists of the concert stage, instrumentalists and singers, have come here with the orchestra to present their inspired offerings of beauty.

This yearly source of what is to many Providence people their greatest pleasure and inspiration may be cut off, the management of the orchestra says, if this city cannot offer an auditorium in which the art of music may present its message to those who would listen.

During the past half century the Boston orchestra has appeared here and during the past few years its patronage has been steadily growing, so that now, it is believed, the cessation of its concerts would mean a loud and violent protest on the part of its adherents.

Gericke, Nikisch, the great Hungarian; Paur, German wizard of the baton; Karl Muck, inspired musician whom the United States deported when he declined to play the "Star Spangled Banner" because he did not believe it was an artistic composition; Pierre Monteux and last and, in the opinion of many, greatest, Serge Koussevitzky, the emotional and fiery Russian—these are some of the men who have led the Boston Symphony Orchestra before Providence audiences.

Patronage Increases

Since the regime of Paur, the patronage has grown. With the advent of Muck came unprecedented popularity. Monteux added to the ever-growing list of those who scrambled for tickets when the orchestra came to town.

The story of Koussevitsky's vogue is known to all Providence people interested in music and tickets are at a premium when the artist of Petrograd, London and Paris stands at the conductor's desk in Infantry Hall.

The symphony orchestra has the powerful backing of wealthy Boston men. Frederick P. Cabot is a member of its governing board and a million-dollar endowment has been left by the late Maj. Higginson, who helped the organization during the lean years of its inception.

Philip Hale, one of Boston's leading music critics, through his compilation of the programmes, has given to America's music lovers what has been called an extraordinary library of historical and critical information set forth with great force and literary dexterity. In each programme Mr. Hale now writes expositions on the compositions presented, interesting lights upon the composer and an erudite and enlightening treatise on the composer's inspiration, methods and genius.

In Boston the orchestra has one of the finest homes ever given an institution of its kind, Symphony Hall on Huntington avenue, a fit setting for the inspiration and pleasure of thousands.

Such a hall Providence must have if it is not to be deprive dof the regular visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

KOUSSEVITZKY THRILLS IN SOLO

Globe — Feb 25

Plays in Brown Chapel After Receiving Degree

Roy Chapman Andrews Honored Also by University

Audience Gives Ovation to Boston Conductor

PROVIDENCE, Feb 24 (A. P.)—Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, responded in the medium of his art when Brown University this afternoon conferred on him the honorary degre of doctor of music. He played with thrilling beauty, upon a bass violin, Handel's largo and the andante from his own concert, composed some 20 years ago.

The university also honored Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer, who has traced the origin of prehistoric man to Central Asia, conferred on him the honorary degree of doctor of science.

Impressive exercises, paying gracious tribute to two men distinguished in widely diverse fields of endeavor, were held in Sayles Hall, the university chapel.

In conferring the degree upon M Koussevitzky, Pres William H. P. Faunce spoke of him as "a distinguished virtuoso and interpreter of the music of all peoples; leader of concerts in London, Madrid, Barcelona and Warsaw, who has crossed the seas to convey to prosaic America some of his own insight into the arts in the universal language of music." A tremendous ovation was accorded the conductor's recital.

In his citation of Mr Andrews, Pres Faunce said: "Roy Chapman Andrews, indefatigable student and intrepid explorer, who has made the dead past speak to the living present, and is making civilization realize its youth and the vast achievements yet to come."

---

leader, Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard for a single concert. The event will mark the conclusion of the Steinert concert series for the present season, a series, which, by the way, has proven tremendously successful. That the final offering is to be one of such magnitude as this great Hub City organization of 107 picked musicians bespeaks great praise for the booking ability of Mr. Steinert, under whose managerial direction the Yale School of Music offers the attractions.

It goes without saying that Serge Koussevitzky, as leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, now holds the attention of America as a striking and unusual personality in our world of music. In Europe he is as prominent likewise, having conducted with great success last summer his usual series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, and his his series as conductor of the London Symphony orchestra.

It is probable that Koussevitzky's genius has found its finest expression in the famous Boston Symphony orchestra which he now commands, for surely in its long and distinguished history, there never has been such a demand for concerts as at present for this famed musical organization. Indeed, each series in New York and Boston this season were oversubscribed far in advance.

The impending visit here of the Boston Symphony orchestra of more than five score players, and under the leadership of its conductor who has become a world celebrity, will surely constitute one of the most remarkable concerts which has been heard in this city for a long time.

Tickets are now on sale for the event at Steinert's, 183 Church street.

N.Y. Times Feb 25

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY APPEARS AS SOLOIST

Plays With Beauty Bass Violin After Brown Confers on Him Degree of Doctor of Music.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 24.—Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, responded in the medium of his art when Brown University this afternoon conferred on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Music. He played with thrilling beauty upon a bass violin, Handel's Largo and the Andante from his own concerto composed some twenty years ago.

The university also honored Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer who has traced the origin of prehistoric man to Central Asia, conferring on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Science.

Impressive exercises, paying gracious tribute to two men distinguished in widely diverse fields of endeavor, were held in Sayles Hall, the university chapel.

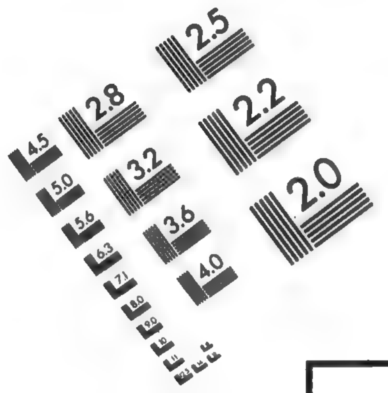
In conferring the degree upon M. Koussevitzky, President William H. P. Faunce spoke of him as "a distinguished virtuoso and interpreter of the music of all peoples; leader of concerts in London, Madrid, Barcelona and Warsaw, who has crossed the seas to convey to prosaic America some of his own insight into the arts in the universal language of music."

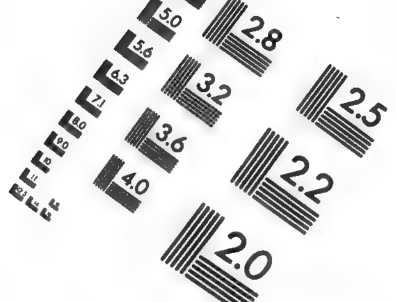
A ripple of applause greeted Dr. Faunce's announcement that "since M. Koussevitzky does not desire to use our English tongue in public, he will respond in the language of music which all can understand." A tremendous ovation was accorded the conductor's recital.

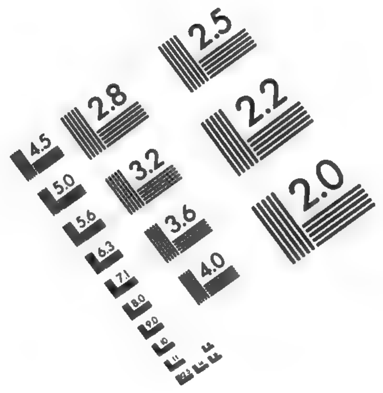
In his citation of Mr. Andrews, President Faunce said, "Roy Chapman Andrews, indefatigable student and intrepid explorer, who has made the dead past speak to the living present, and is making civilization realize its youth and the vast achievement yet to come."

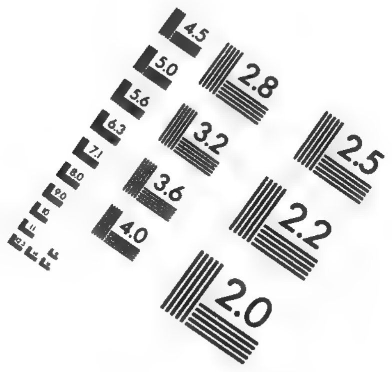
REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC





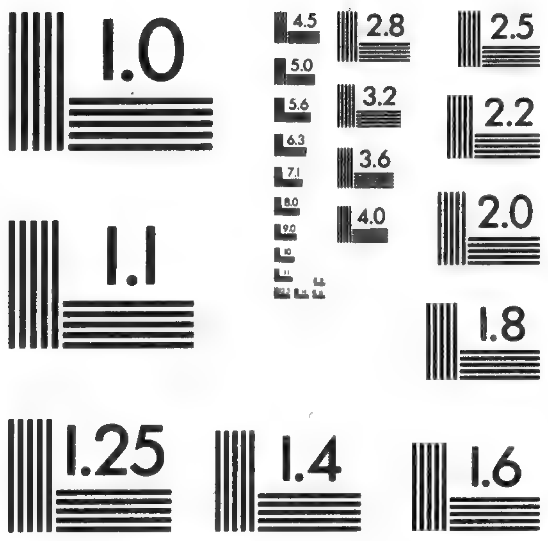




200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

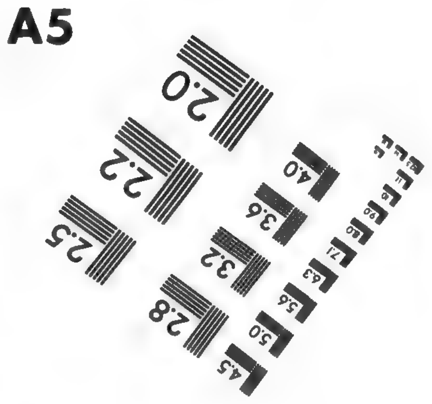
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

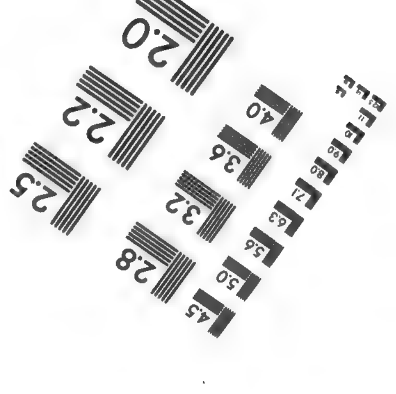
2.5 mm

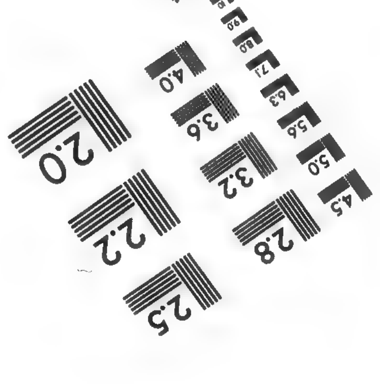
A5



A4

A3





PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

FEB 17 1926

KOUSSEVITSKY LEADS BRILLIANT CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes Fourth Appearance Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening made its fourth appearance of the season at Infantry Hall. Mr. Koussevitsky, at the conductor's desk after an absence of one concert, celebrated his return by brilliant leadership in a programme of violent contrast. Three numbers of more widely divergent style scarcely could be found.

Further interest in the evening's entertainment came in the appearance of the Russian composer-pianist, Serge Prokofieff, the first soloist to grace the present series. Mr. Prokofieff played his Third Concerto for piano and orchestra, the performance arousing the big audience to an unusually hearty demonstration.

This was the programme:

Vivaldi.
Concerto in E-minor for String Orchestra (Edited by A. Mistovski.)
Vigoroso.
Largo.
Allegro.
Prokofieff....Third Concerto for piano, op. 26
Andante—Allegro.
Theme—Andantino.
Variation I. Listesso tempo.
Variation II. Allegro.
Variation III. Allegro moderato.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Koussevitzky Conducts Liszt's "Faust Symphony"

MONITOR —— FEB 20

The sixteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, was devoted to the compositions of Franz Liszt. Assisted by the Cecilia Society, Malcolm Lang, conductor, the orchestra gave his setting of the Thirteenth Psalm, "Lord, how long wilt Thou forget me?" and "A Faust Symphony."

It would seem that only now is Liszt receiving his due as a composer. Too long has he been recognized as the composer of "Les Préludes" and "Tasso," with an occasional hearing of "Mazeppa" outside of his familiar piano works. Two reasons may be assigned for this apparent neglect: his reputation as a virtuoso, and the fact that he was more often than not an experimenter, leaving the more complete working out of his bold and original thoughts to others. It is a commonplace to call attention to the debt which Wagner owes to him, or the Russians one and all. Thus did Monteverde reap the profit of the daring innovations of Peri and Caccini; or Beethoven of the way carefully broken out by Philip Emmanuel Bach and Rust; or Berlioz of the original ideas of his teacher Lesueur.

Yet Liszt is deserving of much in his own right. And if proof is needed, yesterday afternoon offered it in more than sufficient quantity. To be sure there is much in his setting of the Thirteenth Psalm which has by now become the stock in trade of every composer, but even so the same may be said of Beethoven and many another. No one on hearing this music, however, may honestly deny its sincerity and its nobility, its moments of real beauty and power. Only Liszt could have attained the dramatic intensity of the opening tenor solo or of many of the succeeding passages for the chorus.

And of the "Faust Symphony" even more may justly be said. In these days of returning admiration for a more "classic" style, the music of the Romanticists often strikes a note of disturbing affectation. Some of its romantic poses and formulas (little did its originators realize that they were writing as many formulas as their classical predecessors) sound outmoded and artificial. But this is only to be noted here and there in the "Faust Symphony." It is and will for long remain one of the masterpieces of the Romantic school if not of all music. The genius of its creator shines forth from page after page, and it often rises to sublime heights of emotional expression.

The music of yesterday afternoon was well suited to the talents of Mr. Koussevitzky. Even Dr. Muck's reading of this symphony, near perfection as it undoubtedly was, often smacked of cynicism. Not so with Mr. Koussevitzky, who completely surrendered to its message. Consequently the interpretation as a whole, if not as nearly perfect in technical detail as some of those in the past, was outstandingly beautiful and poetic. If Dr. Muck excelled in the movement of Mephistophelian parody, surely he did not attain to the exquisite loveliness of Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of the one devoted to the portrayal of Gretchen. In short, it was the most complete performance which Mr. Koussevitzky has given of any large work here so far.

The Cecilia Society has not in recent years been conspicuous for the pliability and responsiveness of its singing. Even Mr. Koussevitzky, with all his ardor, could not communicate a spark of emotion to them yesterday afternoon. They sang intelligently, with Bostonian reserve. They sang in an eminently respectable manner. But they did not once apparently lose themselves in the beauty of the music. No doubt they keenly felt the appeal of the music, but they gave no exterior evidence of it.

Mr. Charles Stratton sang the tenor solos with fervor, often with tonal beauty, occasionally marred by undue forcing of his voice. But his performance exhibited the requisite amount of musical understanding and was on the whole satisfactory.

The orchestra accomplished truly wonderful feats of virtuosity. S. M.

FEB 21 1926

BROWN PREPARES FOR VISITING DAY

Public May Attend Convocation Wednesday, When Honorary Degrees Will Be Given.

ALUMNI WILL HOLD SESSION

Dr. W. H. P. Faunce to Give Resume of Year.—Serge Koussevitzky and Roy Chapman Andrews Will Be Honored

With annual Visiting Day at Brown University next Wednesday enhanced by the special convocation at which President W. H. P. Faunce will confer honorary degrees on Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews, explorer of Asia, it is expected that more alumni than ever before will take part in the programme arranged by the university authorities.

A special chapel service in Sayles Hall at 9 o'clock will start the day's programme. All visitors have been invited to occupy the chairs below the platform. After chapel members of the visiting committees will attend classes and see the university in action.

At noon the committees, together with the members of the corporation and the faculty, will assemble at the Faculty Club, 13 Brown street, and at 12:45 o'clock President Faunce and Prof. Henry T. Fowler will give a review of the academic year. Luncheon will follow at 1:15 after which T. F. I. McDonnell, chairman of the board of trustees of the Brown Alumni Loyalty Fund, will speak briefly before the class agents on the progress of the fund in connection with the present endowment and buildings fund campaign.

The visiting committees will confer at 2 o'clock with the officers of instruction at the offices of the various departments. Shortly before 4 o'clock the college bell will summon the alumni and visitors to form in academic procession on the campus at the east end of University Hall for the march to Sayles Hall, where at 4:15 President Faunce will confer the degree on M. Koussevitzky and Mr. Andrews. The convocation is open to the public.

The programme for the convocation will begin with an organ selection by Professor Gene Ware. Invocation will follow and then Albert Lyon Scott of the Board of Fellows will present M. Koussevitzky for the conferring of the degree by President Faunce. Dr. Hermon Carey Bumpus, also of the Board of Fellows and secretary of the corporation, will present Mr. Andrews. The audience will join in singing "O Mother Dear, Brunonia," and the exercises will conclude with an organ postlude by Professor Ware.

During Wednesday morning, beginning at 9:30, the advisory board of the Associated Alumni will continue its annual session, which will open at 6:30 o'clock Tuesday evening with a dinner at the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 27 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL BE ON AIR AGAIN TO-NIGHT

Station WEAN Plans to Make Concert One of Weekly Features.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing at Symphony Hall, Boston, will again be broadcast this evening from station WEAN, The Shepard Stores, of this city, through the courtesy of station WEEI, of Boston. This special feature met with such a response last Saturday night, that it is planned to make it a weekly feature, as long as the season lasts.

The programme will be as follows: 1—The first Symphony No. 6; "The Surprise," by Handn; Adadio Vivace Assai; Andante Menuetto Allegro di Malto; 2—Symphonic Paice, by Gilbert; Intermission; 3—Tone Poem don Juan Opus 28, Strauss; 4—Orchestra Fragments, from the ballad Daphnis and Chloe; second Suite Reveo; Dawn, Pantamon General Pance.

FEB 17 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAY CEASE VISITS

Will Play Last Concert Here March 16 Unless Suitable Hall is Provided.

LOSES PRESENT AUDITORIUM

Infantry Hall to Be Used for Other Purposes.—Orchestra, Coming Here for Nearly 50 Years, Now Has Big Following

Providence will hear one more concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and that will be the last—unless this city, between now and next fall, provides an auditorium fitted for the presentation of the great gathering of musicians and capable of accommodating the thousands of persons who yearly await the coming of the inspiring orchestra.

Infantry Hall, the home of orchestral music in this city, is to be used for other purposes and the Boston orchestra will be without a home here after the last concert is given March 16.

This information was contained in a pamphlet given to patrons of the orchestra at the concert last night and which read as follows:

"After giving nearly 200 concerts in Providence over a period of many years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be compelled, for lack of an auditorium, to discontinue its visits to Providence after this season.

"The fifth and last concert of the present season on Tuesday evening, March 16 will therefore be in the nature of a farewell. The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra regrets this situation, particularly in view of the ever widening interest in these concerts under Mr. Koussevitzky.

"Mr. Koussevitzky has in mind to prepare a programme of special interest for the final concert in Providence on March 16."

For near 50 years Providence has been privileged to hear what is conceded among world critics to be one of the greatest aggregations of musicians ever gathered under one leader. The visit of the Boston orchestra to any city in the United States is an event. Critics and patrons await it with keen anticipation and a concert anywhere is followed by columns of comment in every newspaper.

Providence has been given nearly 200 concerts by this orchestra. Great figures of the music world have stood on Infantry Hall stage and wielded the baton which has brought forth from the instruments of a hundred players the music of the masters, and the greatest soloists of the concert stage, instrumentalists and singers, have come here with the orchestra to present their inspired offerings of beauty.

This yearly source of what is to many Providence people their greatest pleasure and inspiration will be cut off, the management of the orchestra says, if this city cannot offer an auditorium in which the art of music may present its message to those who would listen.

During the past half century the Boston orchestra has appeared here and during the past few years its patronage has been steadily growing, so that now, it is believed, the cessation of its concerts would mean a loud and violent protest on the part of its adherents.

Gericke, Nikisch, the great Hungarian; Paur, German wizard of the baton; Karl Muck, inspired musician whom the United States deported when he declined to play the "Star Spangled Banner" because he did not believe it was an artistic composition; Pierre Monteux and last and, in the opinion of many, greatest, Serge Koussevitzky, the emotional and fiery Russian—these are some of the men who have led the Boston Symphony Orchestra before Providence audiences.

Since the regime of Paur, the patronage has grown. With the advent of Muck came unprecedented popularity. Monteux added to the ever-growing list of those who scrambled for tickets when the orchestra came to town.

The story of Koussevitzky's vogue is known to all Providence people interested in music and tickets are at a premium when the artist of Petrograd, London and Paris stands at the conductor's desk in Infantry Hall.

The symphony orchestra has the powerful backing of wealthy Boston men. Frederick P. Cabot is a member of its governing board and a million-dollar endowment has been left by the late Maj. Higginson, who helped the organization during the lean years of its inception.

Philip Hale, one of Boston's leading music critics, through his compilation of the programmes, has given to America's music lovers what has been called an extraordinary library of historical and critical information set forth with great force and literary dexterity. In each programme Mr. Hale now writes expositions on the compositions presented, interesting lights upon the composer and an erudite and enlightening treatise on the composer's inspiration, methods and genius.

In Boston the orchestra has one of the finest homes ever given an institution of its kind, Symphony Hall on Huntington avenue, a fit setting for the inspiration and pleasure of thousands.

Such a hall Providence must have if it is not to be deprived of the visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

---

mposer is a modernist and to judge by is example of his work nearly if not ite deserves the prefix "ultra." It is concerto that undoubtedly would strike
rror to the heart of a player less techcally gifted than Mr. Prokofieff, who ssesses tremendous energy and fingers
steel.
Upon the few occasions the score
rmitted the appear

which make their appearance in rapid succession. Abrupt changes of tempo and rhythm also have a share in the surprises that greet the ear.

It would be interesting to know the inspiration of such a work. Is it a deliberate attempt to say something new in modern scoring? If so the composer has succeeded. And likewise he has been successful in creating a musical work that is of absorbing interest from the standpoint of technical mastery of orchestration. But such discordant creations are not for regular musical diet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 19 1926

A Home for the Symphony

For many years the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been coming to Providence. As we are but forty-four miles distant from its home base, it has found it easy to make frequent pilgrimages here, giving us more of its concerts every season than any other American community outside of Boston, with one or two possible exceptions. But now it is faced with the fact that Infantry Hall, where it has been accustomed to play, is about to disappear, and accordingly the audience at the concert last Tuesday evening found inside the programmes a notice of the anticipated cessation of the visits of the orchestra to Providence at the close of this season.

Facilities for its much-prized performances here may not, indeed, be lacking next fall, but this is not enough. A determined effort should be made at once to assure the orchestra of a suitable place in which to play. Its part in our musical education and development is vital. There is a new interest in musical affairs in this city, and it would be deplorable if we were suddenly deprived of the assistance rendered by this fine instrumental organization. Its long training and excellent traditions, its admirable technique and accomplished leadership, its presentation of the greatest orchestral compositions new and old—all these are needed in our musical scheme of things.

The attendance at the Symphony concerts in the last few years has been much greater than it used to be. The large hall last Tuesday evening was filled with enthusiastic auditors. The programme was an unusual one, the second number—an ultra-modern piece by a young Russian composer—being in sharp contrast to the measured rhythm and suave beauty of an elder day; but it does us good to be shaken up in our musical ideas, even if we do not relish such jolts as a regular thing; and M. Koussevitzky accompanied the Russian novelty with an ultra-conservative Italian composition of the seventeenth-century school and a Rimsky-Karanow composition of exceptional melody and loveliness, so that the audience had no reason to complain. Indeed it must have been conscious, at the close of the evening, of an intellectual and emotional stimulation that it might not have received from a more conventional programme. In a musical education, as in every other kind, we need a well rounded variety.

Several suggestions have been made to remedy the present lack of accommodations for the orchestra. One suggestion is that a new theatre be built. Another is that the spacious Masonic Hall, about to rise near the State Capitol, be utilized. A third is that the Rhode Island Auditorium, at present well under way on North Main street, be used. Very likely we shall hear of other proposals first and last. But whatever is done, a fitting place must be provided for the continued visits of our welcome Boston visitors. Providence could not afford to lose the entertainment, cultural background and inspiration that they have been offering us so long.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

BROWN WILL HONOR FAMOUS MEN TO-DAY

Serge Koussevitzky and Roy Chapman Andrews Get Honorary Degrees.

SIMILAR EVENTS RECALLED

Cardinal Mercier, Marshal Foch and President Angell of Yale Have Been Honored at Special Convocations Since 1919

Brown University will follow a precedent established on College Hill in 1919, when it confers honorary degrees on Serge Koussevitzky, musician, and on Roy Chapman Andrews, explorer, at a special convocation in Sayles Hall this afternoon at 4:30 o'clock.

The recipient of the degree on an occasion memorable in Brown history, in 1919, was the late Cardinal Mercier of Belgium, and the degree was that of Doctor of Laws. In 1921 there was another colorful ceremony, "out of season," when President Faunce, in the presence of a large crowd on the middle campus, conferred an LL. D. on Ferdinand Foch Marshal of France.

Then again, in 1923, preceding the dedication of the Jesse Metcalf Chemical Laboratory, a similar degree was given President James Rowland Angell of Yale University, son of James Burrill Angell, of the Brown class of 1849, former President of the University of Michigan, and, before he was called to that office, editor of the Providence Journal. President Angell of Yale, owing to his duties at New Haven in June, is barred from receiving honorary degrees at Commencement time.

The special convocation to-day has been called because M. Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has contracts requiring his presence in E... in June, and Mr. Andrews will

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

FEB 25 1926

Koussevitzky Gets Degree at Brown

Boston Symphony Conductor Plays Violin; Explorer Also Honored.

PROVIDENCE, Feb. 24—(AP) Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, responded in the medium of his art, when Brown University this afternoon conferred on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Music. He played with thrilling beauty upon a bass violin, Handel's Largo and the Andante from his own concert, composed some 20 years ago.

The university also honored Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer who has traced the origin of pre-historic man to Central Asia, conferring on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Science.

A ripple of applause greeted President W. P. H. Faunce's announcement that, "since M. Koussevitzky does not desire to use our English tongue in public, he will respond in the language of music which all can understand."

In his citation of Mr. Andrews Dr. Faunce said "Roy Chapman Andrews, indefatigable student and intrepid explorer who has made the dead past speak to the living present, and is making civilization realize its youth and the vast achievements yet to come."

7 1926

KOUSSEVITSKY LEADS BRILLIANT CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes Fourth Appearance Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening made its fourth appearance of the season at Infantry Hall. Mr. Koussevitsky, at the conductor's desk after an absence of one concert, celebrated his return by brilliant leadership in a programme of violent contrast. Three numbers of more widely divergent style scarcely could be found.

Further interest in the evening's entertainment came in the appearance of the Russian composer-pianist, Serge Prokofieff, the first soloist to grace the present series. Mr. Prokofieff played his Third Concerto for piano and orchestra, the performance arousing the big audience to an unusually hearty demonstration.

This was the programme:

Vivaldi.
Concerto in E-minor for String Orchestra
(Edited by A. Mistovski.)
Vigoroso.
Largo.
Allegro.
Prokofieff....Third Concerto for piano, op. 26
Andante—Allegro.
Theme—Andantino.
Variation I. Listesso tempo.
Variation II. Allegro.
Variation III. Allegro moderato.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

---

mposer is a modernist and to judge by ds example of his work nearly if not ite deserves the prefix "ultra." It is concerto that undoubtedly would strike
rror to the heart of a player less techcally gifted than Mr. Prokofieff, who ssesses tremendous energy and fingers
steel.
Upon the few occasions the score
rmitted the appear
r pur-n the
the
to

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 1 9 1926

---

which make their appearance in rapid succession. Abrupt changes of tempo and rhythm also have a share in the surprises that greet the ear.

It would be interesting to know the inspiration of such a work. Is it a deliberate attempt to say something new in modern scoring? If so the composer has succeeded. And likewise he has been successful in creating a musical work that is of absorbing interest from the standpoint of technical mastery of orchestration. But such discordant creations are not for regular musical diet.

THIS CLIPPING FR
PROVIDENCE, R.
JOURNAL

174

Koussevitzky Conducts Liszt's "Faust Symphony"

Monitor — Feb 20

The sixteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, was devoted to the compositions of Franz Liszt. Assisted by the Cecilia Society, Malcolm Lang, conductor, the orchestra gave his setting of the Thirteenth Psalm, "Lord, how long wilt Thou forget me?" and "A Faust Symphony."

It would seem that only now is Liszt receiving his due as a composer. Too long has he been recognized as the composer of "Les Préludes" and "Tasso," with an occasional hearing of "Mazeppa" outside of his familiar piano works. Two reasons may be assigned for this apparent neglect: his reputation as a virtuoso, and the fact that he was more often than not an experimenter, leaving the more complete working out of his bold and original thoughts to others. It is a commonplace to call attention to the debt which Wagner owes to him, or the Russians one and all. Thus did Monteverde reap the profit of the daring innovations of Peri and Caccini; or Beethoven of the way carefully broken out by Philip Emmanuel Bach and Rust; or Berlioz of the original ideas of his teacher Lesueur.

Yet Liszt is deserving of much in his own right. And if proof is needed, yesterday afternoon offered it in more than sufficient quantity. To be sure there is much in his setting of the Thirteenth Psalm which has by now become the stock in trade of every composer, but even so the same may be said of Beethoven and many another. No one on hearing this music, however, may honestly deny its sincerity and its nobility, its moments of real beauty and power. Only Liszt could have attained the dramatic intensity of the opening tenor solo or of many of the succeeding passages for the chorus.

And of the "Faust Symphony" even more may justly be said. In these days of returning admiration for a more "classic" style, the music of the Romanticists often strikes a note of disturbing affectation. Some of its romantic poses and formulas (little did its originators realize that they were writing as many formulas as their classical predecessors) sound outmoded and artificial. But this is only to be noted here and there in the "Faust Symphony." It is and will for long remain one of the masterpieces of the Romantic school if not of all music. The genius of its creator shines forth from page after page, and it often rises to sublime heights of emotional expression.

The music of yesterday afternoon was well suited to the talents of Mr. Koussevitzky. Even Dr. Muck's reading of this symphony, near perfection as it undoubtedly was, often smacked of cynicism. Not so with Mr. Koussevitzky, who completely surrendered to its message. Consequently the interpretation as a whole, if not as nearly perfect in technical detail as some of those in the past, was outstandingly beautiful and poetic. If Dr. Muck excelled in the movement of Mephistophelian parody, surely he did not attain to the exquisite loveliness of Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of the one devoted to the portrayal of Gretchen. In short, it was the most complete performance which Mr. Koussevitzky has given of any large work here so far.

The Cecilia Society has not in recent years been conspicuous for the pliability and responsiveness of its singing. Even Mr. Koussevitzky, with all his ardor, could not communicate a spark of emotion to them yesterday afternoon. They sang intelligently, with Bostonian reserve. They sang in an eminently respectable manner. But they did not once apparently lose themselves in the beauty of the music. No doubt they keenly felt the appeal of the music, but they gave no exterior evidence of it.

Mr. Charles Stratton sang the tenor solos with fervor, often with tonal beauty, occasionally marred by undue forcing of his voice. But his performance exhibited the requisite amount of musical understanding and was on the whole satisfactory.

The orchestra accomplished truly derful feats of virtuosity. S. M.

FEB 2 1 192

BROWN PREPARES FOR VISITING DAY

Public May Attend Convocation Wednesday, When Honorary Degrees Will Be Given.

ALUMNI WILL HOLD SESSION

Dr. W. H. P. Faunce to Give Resume of Year.—Serge Koussevitzky and Roy Chapman Andrews Will Be Honored

With annual Visiting Day at Brown University next Wednesday enhanced by the special convocation at which President W. H. P. Faunce will confer honorary degrees on Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews, explorer of Asia, it is expected that more alumni than ever before will take part in the programme arranged by the university authorities.

A special chapel service in Sayles Hall at 9 o'clock will start the day's programme. All visitors have been invited to occupy the chairs below the platform. After chapel members of the visiting committees will attend classes and see the university in action.

At noon the committees, together with the members of the corporation and the faculty, will assemble at the Faculty Club, 13 Brown street, and at 12:45 o'clock President Faunce and Prof. Henry T. Fowler will give a review of the academic year. Luncheon will follow at 1:15 after which T. F. I. McDonnell, chairman of the board of trustees of the own Alumni Loyalty Fund, will speak briefly before the class agents on the progress of the fund in connection with the present endowment and buildings fund campaign.

The visiting committees will confer at 2 o'clock with the officers of instruction at the offices of the various departments. Shortly before 4 o'clock the college bell will summon the alumni and visitors to form in academic procession on the campus at the east end of University Hall for the march to Sayles Hall, where at 4:15 President Faunce will confer the degree on M. Koussevitzky and Mr. Andrews. The convocation is open to the public.

The programme for the convocation will begin with an organ selection by Professor Gene Ware. Invocation will follow and then Albert Lyon Scott of the Board of Fellows will present M. Koussevitzky for the conferring of the degree by President Faunce. Dr. Hermon Carey Bumpus, also of the Board of Fellows and secretary of the corporation, will present Mr. Andrews. The audience will join in singing "O Mother Dear, Brunonia," and the exercises will conclude with an organ postlude by Professor Ware.

During Wednesday morning, beginning at 9:30, the advisory board of the Associated Alumni will continue its annual session, which will open at 6:30 o'clock Tuesday evening with a dinner at the President Henry G.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL BE ON AIR AGAIN TO-NIGHT

Station WEAN Plans to Make Concert One of Weekly Features.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing at Symphony Hall, Boston, will again be broadcast this evening from station WEAN, The Shepard Stores, of this city, through the courtesy of statio WEEI, of Boston. This special featur met with such a response last Saturday night, that it is planned to make it a weekly feature, as long as the season lasts.

The programme will be as follows: 1—The first Symphony No. 6; "The Surprise," by Handn; Adadio Vivace Assai; Andante Menuetto Allegro di Malto; 2—Symphonic Paice, by Gilbert; Intermission; 3—Tone Poem don Juan Opus 28, Strauss; 4—Orchestra Fragments, from the ballad Daphnis and Chloe; second Suite Reveo; Dawn, Pantamon General Pance.

---

7 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAY CEASE VISITS

Will Play Last Concert Here March 16 Unless Suitable Hall is Provided.

LOSES PRESENT AUDITORIUM

Infantry Hall to Be Used for Other Purposes.—Orchestra, Coming Here for Nearly 50 Years, Now Has Big Following

Providence will hear one more concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and that will be the last—unless this city, between now and next fall, provides an auditorium fitted for the presentation of the great gathering of musicians and capable of accommodating the thousands of persons who yearly await the coming of the inspiring orchestra.

Infantry Hall, the home of orchestral music in this city, is to be used for other purposes and the Boston orchestra will be without a home here after the last concert is given March 16.

This information was contained in a pamphlet given to patrons of the orchestra at the concert last night and which read as follows:

"After giving nearly 200 concerts in Providence over a period of many years the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be compelled, for lack of an auditorium, to discontinue its visits to Providence after this season.

"The fifth and last concert of the present season on Tuesday evening, March 16 will therefore be in the nature of a farewell. The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra regrets this situation, particularly in view of the ever widening interest in these concerts under Mr. Koussevitzky.

"Mr. Koussevitzky has in mind to prepare a programme of special interest for the final concert in Providence on March 16."

For near 50 years Providence has been privileged to hear what is conceded among world critics to be one of the greatest aggregations of musicians ever gathered under one leader. The visit of the Boston orchestra to any city in the United States is an event. Critics and patrons await it with keen anticipation and a concert anywhere is followed by columns of comment in every newspaper.

Providence has been given nearly 200 concerts by this orchestra. Great figures of the music world have stood on Infantry Hall stage and wielded the baton which has brought forth from the instruments of a hundred players the music of the masters, and the greatest soloists of the concert stage, instrumentalists and singers, have come here with the orchestra to present their inspired offerings of beauty.

This yearly source of what is to many Providence people their greatest pleasure and inspiration will be cut off, the management of the orchestra says, if this city cannot offer an auditorium in which the art of music may present its message to those who would listen.

During the past half century the Boston orchestra has appeared here and during the past few years its patronage has been steadily growing, so that now, it is believed, the cessation of its concerts would mean a loud and violent protest on the part of its adherents.

Gericke, Nikisch, the great Hungarian; Paur, German wizard of the baton; Karl Muck, inspired musician whom the United States deported when he declined to play the "Star Spangled Banner" because he did not believe it was an artistic composition; Pierre Monteux and last and, in the opinion of many, greatest, Serge Koussevitzky, the emotional and fiery Russian—these are some of the men who have led the Boston Symphony Orchestra before Providence audiences.

Since the regime of Paur, the patronage has grown. With the advent of Muck came unprecedented popularity. Monteux added to the ever-growing list of those who scrambled for tickets when the orchestra came to town.

The story of Koussevitsky's vogue is known to all Providence people interested in music and tickets are at a premium when the artist of Petrograd, London and Paris stands at the conductor's desk in Infantry Hall.

The symphony orchestra has the powerful backing of wealthy Boston men. Frederick P. Cabot is a member of its governing board and a million-dollar ndowment has been left by the late Maj. Higginson, who helped the organization during the lean years of its inception.

Philip Hale, one of Boston's leading music critics, through his compilation of the programmes, has given to America's music lovers what has been called an extraordinary library of historical and critical information set forth with great force and literary dexterity. In each programme Mr. Hale now writes expositions on the compositions presented, interesting lights upon the composer and an erudite and enlightening treatise on the composer's inspiration, methods and genius.

In Boston the orchestra has one of the finest homes ever given an institution of its kind, Symphony Hall on Huntington avenue, a fit setting for the inspiration and pleasure of thousands.

Such a hall Providence must have if it is not to be deprived of the visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A Home for the Symphony

For many years the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been coming to Providence. As we are but forty-four miles distant from its home base, it has found it easy to make frequent pilgrimages here, giving us more of its concerts every season than any other American community outside of Boston, with one or two possible exceptions. But now it is faced with the fact that Infantry Hall, where it has been accustomed to play, is about to disappear, and accordingly the audience at the concert last Tuesday evening found inside the programmes a notice of the anticipated cessation of the visits of the orchestra to Providence at the close of this season.

Facilities for its much-prized performances here may not, indeed, be lacking next fall, but this is not enough. A determined effort should be made at once to assure the orchestra of a suitable place in which to play. Its part in our musical education and development is vital. There is a new interest in musical affairs in this city, and it would be deplorable if we were suddenly deprived of the assistance rendered by this fine instrumental organization. Its long training and excellent traditions, its admirable technique and accomplished leadership, its presentation of the greatest orchestral compositions new and old—all these are needed in our musical scheme of things.

The attendance at the Symphony concerts in the last few years has been much greater than it used to be. The large hall last Tuesday evening was filled with enthusiastic auditors. The programme was an unusual one, the second number—an ultra-modern piece by a young Russian composer—being in sharp contrast to the measured rhythm and suave beauty of an elder day; but it does us good to be shaken up in our musical ideas, even if we do not relish such jolts as a regular thing; and M. Koussevitzky accompanied the Russian novelty with an ultra- conservative Italian composition of the seventeenth-century school and a Rimsky-Karanov composition of exceptional melody and loveliness, so that the audience had no reason to complain. Indeed it must have been conscious, at the close of the evening, of an intellectual and emotional stimulation that it might not have received from a more conventional programme. In a musical education, as in every other kind, we need a well rounded variety.

Several suggestions have been made to remedy the present lack of accommodations for the orchestra. One suggestion is that a new theatre be built. Another is that the spacious Masonic Hall, about to rise near the State Capitol, be utilized. A third is that the Rhode Island Auditorium, at present well under way on North Main street, be used. Very likely we shall hear of other proposals first and last. But whatever is done, a fitting place must be provided for the continued visits of our welcome Boston visitors. Providence could not afford to lose the entertainment, cultural background and inspiration that they have been offering us so long.

BROWN WILL HONOR FAMOUS MEN TO-DAY

Serge Koussevitzky and Roy Chapman Andrews Get Honorary Degrees.

SIMILAR EVENTS RECALLED

Cardinal Mercier, Marshal Foch and President Angell of Yale Have Been Honored at Special Convocations Since 1919

Brown University will follow a precedent established on College Hill in 1919, when it confers honorary degrees on Serge Koussevitzky, musician, and on Roy Chapman Andrews, explorer, at a special convocation in Sayles Hall this afternoon at 4:30 o'clock.

The recipient of the degree on an occasion memorable in Brown history, in 1919, was the late Cardinal Mercier of Belgium, and the degree was that of Doctor of Laws. In 1921 there was another colorful ceremony, "out of season," when President Faunce, in the presence of a large crowd on the middle campus conferred an LL. D. on Ferdinand Foch Marshal of France.

Then again, in 1923, preceding the dedication of the Jesse Metcalf Chemical Laboratory, a similar degree was given President James Rowland Angell of Yale University, son of James Burrill Angell, of the Brown class of 1849, former President of the University of Michigan, and, before he was called to that office, editor of the Providence Journal. President Angell of Yale, owing to his duties at New Haven in June, is barred from receiving honorary degrees at Commencement time.

The special convocation to-day has been called because M. Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has contracts requiring his presence in E in June and Mr. Andrews will

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

5

Koussevitsky Gets Degree at Brown

Boston Symphony Conductor Plays Violin; Explorer Also Honored.

PROVIDENCE, Feb. 24—(AP) Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, responded in the medium of his art, when Brown University this afternoon conferred on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Music. He played with thrilling beauty upon a bass violin, Handel's Largo and the Andante from his own concert, composed some 20 years ago.

The university also honored Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer who has traced the origin of pre-hi toric man to Central Asia, conferri on him the honorary degree of Dc tor of Science.

A ripple of applause greeted Pre dent W. P. H. Faunce's announcemen that, "since M. Koussevitsky does not desire to use our English tongue in public, he will respond in the language of music which all can understand."

In his citation of Mr. Andrews Dr. Faunce said "Roy Chapman Andrew indefatigable student and intrepid explorer who has made the dead past speak to the living present, and is making civilization realize its yout and the vast achievements yet come."

7 1926

KOUSSEVITSKY LEADS BRILLIANT CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes Fourth Appearance Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening made its fourth appearance of the season at Infantry Hall. Mr. Koussevitsky, at the conductor's desk after an absence of one concert, celebrated his return by brilliant leadership in a programme of violent contrast. Three numbers of more widely divergent style scarcely could be found.

Further interest in the evening's entertainment came in the appearance of the Russian composer-pianist, Serge Prokofieff, the first soloist to grace the present series. Mr. Prokofieff played his Third Concerto for piano and orchestra, the performance arousing the big audience to an unusually hearty demonstration.

This was the programme:

Vivaldi.
Concerto in E-minor for String Orchestra
(Edited by A. Mistovski.)
Vigoroso.
Largo.
Allegro.
Prokofieff....Third Concerto for piano, op. 26
Andante—Allegro.
Theme—Andantino.
Variation I. Listesso tempo.
Variation II. Allegro.
Variation III. Allegro moderato.
Variation IV. Andante meditativo.
Variation V. Allegro giusto.
Theme Listesso tempo.
Allegro, ma non troppo.
Rimski-Korsakov.
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), op. 35.
The Sea and Sindbad's Ship.
The Story of the Kalandar Prince.
The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces Against a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.

In these days when discordant modernist scores jar the ear such a work as the Vivaldi concerto in E-minor for string orchestra seems somewhat old fashioned. But it is real music, melodious and comparatively simple in structure, the kind we learned to love in our earlier years before it became the fashion to write "modern" music.

Vivaldi was a melodist like most Italians of his day and the concerto in E-minor is a good example of his style of writing. There is strength and vigor in its melodic flow, clever treatment of thematic material, and contrast is attained in surprising measure considering the limited means at his disposal. Mr. Koussevitzky discovered unsuspected possibilities in such straightforward, formal scores and perhaps Vivaldi himself would have been surprised to hear the work as played under the Russian's baton. There was delightfully finished phrasing, delicate adjustment of tone volume and together the strings sang as one, either in the gentle rise and fall of soft passages or the broad measures of fortissimo.

In absolute contrast to this opening number came the Prokofieff concerto. Its composer is a modernist and to judge by this example of his work nearly if not quite deserves the prefix "ultra." It is a concerto that undoubtedly would strike terror to the heart of a player less technically gifted than Mr. Prokofieff, who possesses tremendous energy and fingers of steel.

Upon the few occasions when the score permitted the solo instrument to appear alone he revealed a tone of singular purity and sweetness. But in the main the piano takes its place as a voice in the orchestral ensemble, a leading voice to be sure, but not in the sense of solo part with an accompaniment. There are, however, occasions when the soloist embellishes the orchestral harmony with florid runs and figure work of great brilliance.

The concerto is extremely modern in its general effect. Dissonance is never absent and the restless energy of the strange and ever changing harmonic tide keeps the listener in interested suspense. From beginning to end the work is filled with astonishing effects of instrumentation which make their appearance in rapid succession. Abrupt changes of tempo and rhythm also have a share in the surprises that greet the ear.

It would be interesting to know the inspiration of such a work. Is it a deliberate attempt to say something new in modern scoring? If so the composer has succeeded. And likewise he has been successful in creating a musical work that is of absorbing interest from the standpoint of technical mastery of orchestration. But such discordant creations are not for regular musical diet.

The Rimsky Korsakov Symphonic Poem, modern in a sense, came as a soothing summer breeze after the jarring disonances of the concerto. Here we have the Russian tone painter at his best. Perhaps in no other work has he set forth in his colorful style such truly descriptive music. One needs little imagination to follow the tales of Scheherazade. The solo violin throughout the several movements gives the theme which presents the narrator.

Mr. Brugin played this violin part with

Koussevitzky Conducts Liszt's "Faust Symphony"

MONITOR — FEB 20

The sixteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, was devoted to the compositions of Franz Liszt. Assisted by the Cecilia Society, Malcolm Lang, conductor, the orchestra gave his setting of the Thirteenth Psalm, "Lord, how long wilt Thou forget me?" and "A Faust Symphony."

It would seem that only now is Liszt receiving his due as a composer. Too long has he been recognized as the composer of "Les Préludes" and "Tasso," with an occasional hearing of "Mazeppa" outside of his familiar piano works. Two reasons may be assigned for this apparent neglect: his reputation as a virtuoso, and the fact that he was more often than not an experimenter, leaving the more complete working out of his bold and original thoughts to others. It is a commonplace to call attention to the debt which Wagner owes to him, or the Russians one and all. Thus did Monteverde reap the profit of the daring innovations of Peri and Caccini; or Beethoven of the way carefully broken out by Philip Emmanuel Bach and Rust; or Berlioz of the original ideas of his teacher Lesueur.

Yet Liszt is deserving of much in his own right. And if proof is needed, yesterday afternoon offered it in more than sufficient quantity. To be sure there is much in his setting of the Thirteenth Psalm which has by now become the stock in trade of every composer, but even so the same may be said of Beethoven and many another. No one on hearing this music, however, may honestly deny its sincerity and its nobility, its moments of real beauty and power. Only Liszt could have attained the dramatic intensity of the opening tenor solo or of many of the succeeding passages for the chorus.

And of the "Faust Symphony" even more may justly be said. In these days of returning admiration for a more "classic" style, the music of the Romanticists often strikes a note of disturbing affectation. Some of its romantic poses and formulas (little did its originators realize that they were writing as many formulas as their classical predecessors) sound outmoded and artificial. But this is only to be noted here and there in the "Faust Symphony." It is and will for long remain one of the masterpieces of the Romantic school if not of all music. The genius of its creator shines forth from page after page, and it often rises to sublime heights of emotional expression.

The music of yesterday afternoon was well suited to the talents of Mr. Koussevitzky. Even Dr. Muck's reading of this symphony, near perfection as it undoubtedly was, often smacked of cynicism. Not so with Mr. Koussevitzky, who completely surrendered to its message. Consequently the interpretation as a whole, if not as nearly perfect in technical detail as some of those in the past, was outstandingly beautiful and poetic. If Dr. Muck excelled in the movement of Mephistophelian parody, surely he did not attain to the exquisite loveliness of Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of the one devoted to the portrayal of Gretchen. In short, it was the most complete performance which Mr. Koussevitzky has given of any large work here so far.

The Cecilia Society has not in recent years been conspicuous for the pliability and responsiveness of its singing. Even Mr. Koussevitzky, with all his ardor, could not communicate a spark of emotion to them yesterday afternoon. They sang intelligently, with Bostonian reserve. They sang in an eminently respectable manner. But they did not once apparently lose themselves in the beauty of the music. No doubt they keenly felt the appeal of the music, but they gave no exterior evidence of it.

Mr. Charles Stratton sang the tenor solos with fervor, often with tonal beauty, occasionally marred by undue forcing of his voice. But his performance exhibited the requisite amount of musical understanding and was on the whole satisfactory.

The orchestra accomplished truly wonderful feats of virtuosity. S. M.

Dr. W. H. P. Faunce to Give Resume of Year.—Serge Koussevitzky and Roy Chapman Andrews Will Be Honored

With annual Visiting Day at Brown University next Wednesday enhanced by the special convocation at which President W. H. P. Faunce will confer honorary degrees on Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews, explorer of Asia, it is expected that more alumni than ever before will take part in the programme arranged by the university authorities.

A special chapel service in Sayles Hall at 9 o'clock will start the day's programme. All visitors have been invited to occupy the chairs below the platform. After chapel members of the visiting committees will attend classes and see the university in action.

At noon the committees, together with the members of the corporation and the faculty, will assemble at the Faculty Club, 13 Brown street, and at 12:45 o'clock President Faunce and Prof. Henry T. Fowler will give a review of the academic year. Luncheon will follow at 1:15 after which T. F. I. McDonnell, chairman of the board of trustees of the Brown Alumni Loyalty Fund, will speak briefly before the class agents on the progress of the fund in connection with the present endowment and buildings fund campaign.

The visiting committees will confer at 2 o'clock with the officers of instruction at the offices of the various departments. Shortly before 4 o'clock the college bell will summon the alumni and visitors to form in academic procession on the campus at the east end of University Hall for the march to Sayles Hall, where at 4:15 President Faunce will confer the degree on M. Koussevitzky and Mr. Andrews. The convocation is open to the public.

The programme for the convocation will begin with an organ selection by Professor Gene Ware. Invocation will follow and then Albert Lyon Scott of the Board of Fellows will present M. Koussevitzky for the conferring of the degree by President Faunce. Dr. Hermon Carey Bumpus, also of the Board of Fellows and secretary of the corporation, will present Mr. Andrews. The audience will join in singing "O Mother Dear, Brunonia," and the exercises will conclude with an organ postlude by Professor Ware.

During Wednesday morning, beginning at 9:30, the advisory board of the Associated Alumni will continue its annual session, which will open at 6:30 o'clock Tuesday evening with a dinner at the University Club. President Henry G. Clark of the Associated Alumni will preside and among the guests will be Dr. Albert D. Mead, who will represent the university, Dean Otis E. Randall, Dr. H. C. Bumpus and Noel M. Field and Mark F. Coles of the class of 1926.

Responses from the Brown clubs, which are scattered from Providence to San Francisco, Seattle and Los Angeles, indicate that the representation at the advisory board meetings will be a widespread one. The sessions will be conducted for the first time under the new constitution of the Associated Alumni, adopted last June.

No. 6; "The Surprise," by Handn; Adadio Vivace Assai; Andante Menuetto Allegro di Malto; 2—Symphonic Paice, by Gilbert; Intermission; 3—Tone Poem don Juan Opus 28, Strauss; 4—Orchestra Fragments, from the ballad Daphnis and Chloe; second Suite Reveo; Dawn, Pantamon General Pance.

Rich Richard Says:

pected to live.

Tuesday evening, will th[illegible]ore be in the nature [illegible] well. The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra regrets this situation, particularly in view of the ever widening interest in these concerts under Mr. Koussevitzky.

"Mr. Koussevitzky has in mind to prepare a programme of special interest for the final concert in Providence on March 16."

For near 50 years Providence has been privileged to hear what is conceded among world critics to be one of the greatest aggregations of musicians ever gathered under one leader. The visit of the Boston orchestra to any city in the United States is an event. Critics and patrons await it with keen anticipation and a concert anywhere is followed by columns of comment in every newspaper.

Providence has been given nearly 200 concerts by this orchestra. Great figures of the music world have stood on Infantry Hall stage and wielded the baton which has brought forth from the instruments of a hundred players the music of the masters, and the greatest soloists of the concert stage, instrumentalists and singers, have come here with the orchestra to present their inspired offerings of beauty.

This yearly source of what is to many Providence people their greatest pleasure and inspiration will be cut off, the management of the orchestra says, if this city cannot offer an auditorium in which the art of music may present its message to those who would listen.

During the past half century the Boston orchestra has appeared here and during the past few years its patronage has been steadily growing, so that now, it is believed, the cessation of its concerts would mean a loud and violent protest on the part of its adherents.

Gericke, Nikisch, the great Hungarian; Paur, German wizard of the baton; Karl Muck, inspired musician whom the United States deported when he declined to play the "Star Spangled Banner" because he did not believe it was an artistic composition; Pierre Monteux and last and, in the opinion of many, greatest, Serge Koussevitzky, the emotional and fiery Russian—these are some of the men who have led the Boston Symphony Orchestra before Providence audiences.

Since the regime of Paur, the patronage has grown. With the advent of Muck came unprecedented popularity. Monteux added to the ever-growing list of those who scrambled for tickets when the orchestra came to town.

The story of Koussevitsky's vogue is known to all Providence people interested in music and tickets are at a premium when the artist of Petrograd, London and Paris stands at the conductor's desk in Infantry Hall.

The symphony orchestra has the powerful backing of wealthy Boston men. Frederick P. Cabot is a member of its governing board and a million-dollar endowment has been left by the late Maj. Higginson, who helped the organization during the lean years of its inception.

Philip Hale, one of Boston's leading music critics, through his compilation of the programmes, has given to America's music lovers what has been called an extraordinary library of historical and critical information set forth with great force and literary dexterity. In each programme Mr. Hale now writes expositions on the compositions presented, interesting lights upon the composer and an erudite and enlightening treatise on the composer's inspiration, methods and genius.

In Boston the orchestra has one of the finest homes ever given an institution of its kind, Symphony Hall on Huntington avenue, a fit setting for the inspiration and pleasure of thousands.

Such a hall Providence must have if it is not to be deprived of the visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

---

er

ton,

But

at Infantry n accustomed to play, is about to disappear, and accordingly the audience at the concert last Tuesday evening found inside the programmes a notice of the anticipated cessation of the visits of the orchestra to Providence at the close of this season.

Facilities for its much-prized performances here may not, indeed, be lacking next fall, but this is not enough. A determined effort should be made at once to assure the orchestra of a suitable place in which to play. Its part in our musical education and development is vital. There is a new interest in musical affairs in this city, and it would be deplorable if we were suddenly deprived of the assistance rendered by this fine instrumental organization. Its long training and excellent traditions, its admirable technique and accomplished leadership, its presentation of the greatest orchestral compositions new and old—all these are needed in our musical scheme of things.

The attendance at the Symphony concerts in the last few years has been much greater than it used to be. The large hall last Tuesday evening was filled with enthusiastic auditors. The programme was an unusual one, the second number—an ultra-modern piece by a young Russian composer—being in sharp contrast to the measured rhythm and suave beauty of an elder day; but it does us good to be shaken up in our musical ideas, even if we do not relish such jolts as a regular thing; and M. Koussevitzky accompanied the Russian novelty with an ultra- conservative Italian composition of the seventeenth-century school and a Rimsky-Karanov composition of exceptional melody and loveliness, so that the audience had no reason to complain. Indeed it must have been conscious, at the close of the evening, of an intellectual and emotional stimulation that it might not have received from a more conventional programme. In a musical education, as in every other kind, we need a well rounded variety.

Several suggestions have been made to remedy the present lack of accommodations for the orchestra. One suggestion is that a new theatre be built. Another is that the spacious Masonic Hall, about to rise near the State Capitol, be utilized. A third is that the Rhode Island Auditorium, at present well under way on North Main street, be used. Very likely we shall hear of other proposals first and last. But whatever is done, a fitting place must be provided for the continued visits of our welcome Boston visitors. Providence could not afford to lose the entertainment, cultural background and inspiration that they have been offering us so long.

S LED

Marshal Foch and President Angell of Yale Have Been Honored at Special Convocations Since 1919

Brown University will follow a precedent established on College Hill in 1919, when it confers honorary degrees on Serge Koussevitzky, musician, and on Roy Chapman Andrews, explorer, at a special convocation in Sayles Hall this afternoon at 4:30 o'clock.

The recipient of the degree on an occasion memorable in Brown history, in 1919, was the late Cardinal Mercier of Belgium, and the degree was that of Doctor of Laws. In 1921 there was another colorful ceremony, "out of season," when President Faunce, in the presence of a large crowd on the middle campus conferred an LL. D. on Ferdinand Foch Marshal of France.

Then again, in 1923, preceding the dedication of the Jesse Metcalf Chemical Laboratory, a similar degree was given President James Rowland Angell of Yale University, son of James Burrill Angell, of the Brown class of 1849, former President of the University of Michigan, and, before he was called to that office, editor of the Providence Journal. President Angell of Yale, owing to his duties at New Haven in June, is barred from receiving honorary degrees at Commencement time.

The special convocation to-day has been called because M. Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has contracts requiring his presence in Europe in June, and Mr. Andrews will sail about March 1 for Asia.

The glamor that attended the Mercier and Foch ceremonies may be missing today in Sayles Hall, but there is more than passing interest in the convocation because it will be the first time that any American university has honored M. Koussevitzky. The academic procession, which will start for Sayles Hall at 4 o'clock, will be vivid in its color. It is expected that many alumni, present for visiting day, will join in the march, and that there will be a large gathering of the general public to look on as Brown honors the famous musician and the equally well-known explorer.

M. Koussevitzky will be presented for his degree by Albert Lyon Scott of the class of 1900, while Mr. Andrews will have as his sponsor, Dr. Hermon Carey Bumpus, secretary of the Brown corporation. Prof. Gene Ware will furnish the music for the occasion.

Dallo, were fined $150 on charges of illegal transportation of liquor, and Coyle was fined $25 for failing to stop when signalled by an officer.

GETS TWO MONTHS IN JAIL, APPEALS

Spencer Man Convicted of Illegal Practise of

MISSING
PAGE(S)

FEB 1 4 1926

CECILIA SOCIETY WITH SYMPHONY

181

Globe Feb 20

In Tonight's Broadcast From WEEI and Chain

Music lovers will hear the Cecilia Society with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during their broadcast tonight from Symphony Hall. This program will be given New England fans through WEEI, Boston; WCSH, Portland, and WEAN, Providence. During the remaining broadcasts, therefore, these concerts, sponsored by W. S. Quinby, will be given to the radio fans throughout Southern New England from WEAN at Providence.

MISHIMI

JEAN MacDONALD

Miss Jean Macdonald, well-known contralto soloist, will be the featured studio soloist during the regular Symphony intermission. Miss Macdonald is a Bostonian and recently achieved success on the occasion of her New York debut. Inasmuch as Miss Macdonald is of Gaelic descent, it is natural that she include in her program songs of Celtic origin.

The regular Symphony program consists of two selections by Liszt. The first is Psalm 13, "Lord, How Long Wilt Thou Forget Me?" This selection is for chorus and tenor soloist. The Cecilia Society, under the direction of Malcolm Lang, with Charles Stratton, tenor, will assist in this program. The final selection by Liszt is a Faust Symphony in three character pictures after Goethe.

Story of Orchestra

Beginning tonight the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast will be featured by a new plan of announcing which will run as a continued story through the nine concerts still to go on the air. This plan is based upon the belief that the thousands of people who are enjoying these concerts are interested in knowing something about the technical construction of a great orchestra like the Boston Symphony and also about its personnel.

Like a mammoth building, or a battle

American Feb 20

NEW PLAN FOR SYMPHONY

Beginning tonight, the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast through WEEI, will be featured by a new plan of announcing, which will run as a continued story through the nine concerts still to go on the air through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company.

The make-up of the orchestra will therefore be discussed in nine chapters, the first of which will be tonight—the story of violins and the part they play in a big orchestra like the Boston Symphony.

Music lovers will hear the Cecilia Society with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during their broadcast tonight from Symphony Hall. This program will be given the New England fans through WEEI, Boston; WCSH, Portland, and this week WEAN, Providence, has been added to the small New England network.

During the remaining broadcasts, therefore, these concerts, sponsored by W. S. Quinby, will be given to the radio fans throughout southern New England from WEAN at Providence.

Miss Jean MacDonald, well known contralto soloist, who is scheduled to give a recital in Jordan Hall on March 18, will be the featured soloist during the regular intermission.

The regular Symphony program consists of but two selections. Both of these are by Liszt. The first is Psalm 13, "Lord, How Long Wilt Thou Forget Me?" This selection is for chorus and tenor soloist. The Cecilia Society is under the direction of Malcolm Lang, with Charles Stratton, tenor, assisting in this program.

The final selection by Liszt is a Faust Symphony in three character pictures from Goethe. I—Faust. II—Gretchen. III—Mephistopheles.

At succeeding concerts other units of the orchestra will be subjects for discussion. Some of these are as follows: violas, violincellos, basses, flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, horns, trumpets, trombones, harps, timpanis, percussion, etc.

FEB 2 7 1926

Koussevitzky Leads Symphony Orchestra Under "Doctor" Title

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert yesterday conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky; until then it had always been Mr. Koussevitzky. His new title was bestowed upon him Wednesday by Brown University, making the fourth time in the history of the institution that the degree of Doctor of Music had been awarded.

The concert, held in Symphony Hall, Boston, had as its piece de resistance, Gilbert's "Symphonic Piece," rendered for the first time. It is characterized by its thoroughly American inspiration and manner.

SYMPHONY IN THIRD MONDAY CONCERT

Globe Feb 23

Irene Scharrer Makes Her American Debut

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr Koussevitzy conducting, gave its third concert of the Monday evening series last evening before its usual audience. The program consisted of Vivaldi's Concerto in E minor for string orchestra, Schumann's A minor piano concerto played by Irene Scharrer, Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres Midi d'un Faune" and Respighi's "Pines of Rome." With the exception of the concerto all of the music had been previously heard this season in the regular series.

Miss Scharrer, the English pianist, made her American debut last evening under favorable circumstances. She is a young woman of attractive simplicity and modesty who plays admirably in many ways. She employs a large palette, utilizes pianissimos and fortis-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
TAMPA, FLA.

FEB 2 4 1926

SYMPHONY SPONSORS PIANIST

Post Feb 23

Irene Scharrer Makes American Debut at Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The American debut of Irene Scharrer, an English pianist, in Schumann's Concerto, constituted the novel element in last evening's Symphony concert. The rest ran to repetitions from the current "regular" subscription concerts, and offered Vivaldi's E minor Concerto for strings, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

AT HOME AT PIANO

A single performance of even so comprehensive a piece as Schumann's Concerto may hardly disclose the full measure of any pianist. We will know Mme. Scharrer better when we have heard her in recital. Last evening she seemed fully at home in Schumann's music; responded to its poetry, its romantic content; observed the changefullness of mood in the first movement; caught the improvisational fancy of the intermezzo, and rose to the brilliance of the finale. In other words hers was an adequate, an altogether sympathetic performance. That it shed any new light upon the music or even revealed in the pianist herself any conspicuous or arresting individuality is not so certain.

Once more Respighi's "Pines," the most attractive new music that has come to us in many a day, found much favor, while the resounding March again carried all before it. But a second hearing of the piece makes one even more distrustful of the photograph-rendered nightingale of the third movement. Last evening these chirpings brought the uncomfortable feeling that some impious hand had thrust a canary, cage and all, upon the stage of Symphony Hall, there to let its twitterings mingle with the immeasurably more eloquent voices of the orchestra. It would seem that Respighi, heretofore always a sensitive and discriminating musician, had in this instance been most unadvisedly literal.

THIRD IN SYMPHONY MONDAY CONCERTS

Herald Feb 23

Respighi and Vivaldi Pieces Are Played

Ten days ago Mr. Koussevitzky played at a concert the Vivaldi concerto in E minor for string orchestra (edited by A. Mistovski), a piece by Leken, Respighi's new "Pini di Roma," and Beethoven's first symphony. Last night, at the third concert of the Monday series, he played once more the Respighi and Vivaldi pieces, replaced the Leken composition with Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and, instead of the symphony, treated the audience to a concerto, Schumann's to wit, with Irene Scharrer playing the piano part.

Most people, without much doubt, would prefer Debussy's prelude to the music by Leken. But, if a referendum could be taken would the majority vote in favor of a concerto or a purely orchestral piece?

Because of its necessary soloist, some musical people declare a concerto brings personality to the fore, to the distraction of their attention from the music itself. No doubt they are right. But there is an answer awaiting them. A concert without personality is indeed a sorry affair.

Other musical people protest that the tone of a piano and that of other instruments are hopelessly at odds; they never can agree. Hence, away with piano concertos. When certain pianists do the playing it must be admitted that these musical people have ground for their contention. But they must be blessed—or cursed—with ears abnormally sensitive if they found sounds to offend them in the first two movements of last night's concerto.

For Mr. Koussevitzky had set his mind, so much was evident, to making the accompaniment sound beautiful. Admirably he succeeded. And Miss Scharrer, with her exquisitely clear and mellow tone, was plainly inclined, not to display, but to do her part in a performance that should be beautiful through and through.

So, with tone most artfully colored and in strength just right she furnished accompaniments to solos, and arabesques of a loveliness very rare. To her own solo passages she brought an excellent singing tone and the nicest taste in phrasing.

Of musical beauty one could not ask more than Miss Scharrer gave in these two movements. That Schumann's concerto gains when played with a warmer sentiment, with rhythm more vitally accented, is not to be denied. Miss Scharrer was warmly applauded. Clearly, the audience last night had no dis-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Public Ledger

FEB 2 5 1926

UNABLE TO SPEAK ENGLISH, ACCEPTS DEGREE WITH SOLO

Koussevitsky Plays Bass Viol as Brown University Honors Him

Providence, R. I., Feb. 24.—(AP)—For the first time in America, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared as a soloist today. He played the double bass at a special convocation of Brown University, called for the purpose of conferring honorary degrees on M. Koussevitsky and Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor, M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier
FEB 2 5 1926

Brown Confers Degree On Koussevitzku

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BULLETIN
PHILA. PA.

FEB 2 4 1926

SAYS IT WITH DOUBLE BASS

Boston Symphony Conductor Uses Music to Express Gratitude

(By Associated Press.)

Providence, R. I., Feb. 24.—For the first time in America, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear as a soloist today.

He will play the double bass at a special convocation of Brown University, called for the purpose of conferring honorary degrees on him and Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor, M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso.

In announcing that he would play, M. Koussevitsky explained his inability to speak English made it impossible for him to express in words his appreciation of the honor conferred by the United States, so he decided to express it in terms of music. He will use an instrument dating from the seventeenth century.

FEB 2 5 1926

HONORARY DEGREE IS CONFERRED ON MUSIC CONDUCTOR

Providence, R. I., Feb. 25.—(AP)—Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, responded in the medium of his art, when Brown university conferred on him the honorary degree of doctor of music, Wednesday.

He received an ovation after playing with thrilling beauty upon a bass vio- … Andante … seven-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
STATES
NEW ORLEANS, LA.

FEB 2 4 1926

Serge To Say It With His Double Bass Horn

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 24.—(By A. P.)—For the first time in America Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear as a soloist today. He will play the double bass at a special convocation of Brown University, called to confer honorary degrees on M. Koussevitsky and Roy Champan Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor, M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso and he explained that because of his inability to speak the English language he had decided to express in music his appreciation of the honor conferred by the university. He will use an instrument dating from the seventeenth century which he brought with him to America.

Musician to Play "Bull Fiddle" As He Gets Degree

Providence, Feb. 24.—For the first time in America, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra will appear as a soloist today. He will play the double bass at a special convocation of Brown university, called to confer honorary degrees on M. Koussevitsky and Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor, M. Koussevitsky was widely

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
CHICAGO, ILL.

FEB 2 4 1926

Koussevitsky to Play Solo on Double Bass

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 24.—(AP)—For the first time in America, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will appear

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

FEB 2 8 1926

Koussevitsky Will Direct Symphony Concert Here

[illegible]day evening, March [illegible]th, at Woolsey Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by its distinguished leader, Serge Koussevitsky, will be heard for a single concert. The event will mark the conclusion of the Steinert Concert Series for the present season, a series, which, by the way, has proven tremendously successful.

That the final offering is to be one of such magnitude as this great Hub City organization of 107 picked musicians bespeaks great praise for the booking ability of Mr. Steinert, under whose managerial direction the Yale School of Music offers the attractions.

Serge Koussevitsky, as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now holds the attention of America as a striking and unusual personality in the world of music. In Europe he is as prominent likewise, having conducted with great success last Summer his usual series of "Concerts Koussevitsky" in Paris, and his series as conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening made its fourth appearance of the season at Infantry Hall. Mr. Koussevitsky, at the conductor's desk after an absence of one concert, celebrated his return by brilliant leadership in a programme of violent contrast. Three numbers of more widely divergent style scarcely could be found.

Further interest in the evening's entertainment came in the appearance of the Russian composer-pianist, Serge Prokofieff, the first soloist to grace the present series. Mr. Prokofieff played his Third Concerto for piano and orchestra, the performance arousing the big audience to an unusually hearty demonstration.

This was the programme:

Vivaldi.
  Concerto in E-minor for String Orchestra
    (Edited by A. Mistovski.)
  Vigoroso.
  Largo.
  Allegro.
Prokofieff....Third Concerto for piano, op. 26
  Andante—Allegro.
  Theme—Andantino.
  Variation I. Listesso tempo.
  Variation II. Allegro.
  Variation III. Allegro moderato.
  Variation IV. Andante meditativo.
  Variation V. Allegro giusto.
  Theme Listesso tempo.
  Allegro, ma non troppo.
Rimski-Korsakov.
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), op. 35.
  The Sea and Sindbad's Ship.
  The Story of the Kalandar Prince.
  The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
  Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces Against a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.

In these days when discordant modernist scores jar the ear such a work as the Vivaldi concerto in E-minor for string orchestra seems somewhat old fashioned. But it is real music, melodious and comparatively simple in structure, the kind we learned to love in our earlier years before it became the fashion to write "modern" music.

Vivaldi was a melodist like most Italians of his day and the concerto in E minor is a good example of his style of writing. There is strength and vigor in its melodic flow, clever treatment of thematic material, and contrast is attained in surprising measure considering the limited means at his disposal. Mr. Koussevitzky discovered unsuspected possibilities in such straightforward, formal scores and perhaps Vivaldi himself would have been surprised to hear the work as played under the Russian's baton. There was delightfully finished phrasing, delicate adjustment of tone volume and together the strings sang as one, either in the gentle rise and fall of soft passages or the broad measures of fortissimo.

In absolute contrast to this opening number came the Prokofieff concerto. Its composer is a modernist and to judge by this example of his work nearly if not quite deserves the prefix "ultra." It is a concerto that undoubtedly would strike terror to the heart of a player less technically gifted than Mr. Prokofieff, who possesses tremendous energy and fingers of steel.

Upon the few occasions when the score permitted the solo instrument to appear alone he revealed a tone of singular purity and sweetness. But in the main the piano takes its place as a voice in the orchestral ensemble, a leading voice to be sure, but not in the sense of solo part with an accompaniment. There are, however, occasions when the soloist embellishes the orchestral harmony with florid runs and figure work of great brilliance.

The concerto is extremely modern in its general effect. Dissonance is never absent and the restless energy of the strange and ever changing harmonic tide keeps the listener in interested suspense. From beginning to end the work is filled with astonishing effects of instrumentation which make their appearance in rapid succession. Abrupt changes of tempo and rhythm also have a share in the surprises that greet the ear.

It would be interesting to know the inspiration of such a work. Is it a deliberate attempt to say something new in modern scoring? If so the composer has succeeded. And likewise he has been successful in creating a musical work that is of absorbing interest from the standpoint of technical mastery of orchestration. But such discordant creations are not for regular musical diet.

The Rimsky Korsakov Symphonic Poem, modern in a sense, came as a … stirring … have … Per- … th

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB [illegible] 7 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL BE ON AIR AGAIN TO-NIGHT

Station WEAN Plans to Make Concert One of Weekly Features.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing at Symphony Hall, Boston, will again be broadcast this evening from station WEAN, The Shepard Stores, of this city, through the courtesy of station WEEI, of Boston. This special feature met with such a response last Saturday night, that it is planned to make it a weekly feature, as long as the season lasts.

The programme will be as follows: 1—The first Symphony No. 6; "The Surprise," by Handn; Adadio Vivace Assai; Andante Menuetto Allegro di Malto; 2—Symphonic Paice, by Gilbert; Intermission; 3—Tone Poem don Juan Opus 28, Strauss; 4—Orchestra Fragments, from the ballad Daphnis and Chloe; second Suite Reveo; Dawn, Pantamon General Pance.

181

CECILIA SOCIETY WITH SYMPHONY

Globe Feb 20

In Tonight's Broadcast From WEEI and Chain

Music lovers will hear the Cecilia Society with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during their broadcast tonight from Symphony Hall. This program will be given New England fans through WEEI, Boston; WCSH, Portland, and WEAN, Providence. During the remaining broadcasts, therefore, these concerts, sponsored by W. S. Quinby, will be given to the radio fans throughout Southern New England from WEAN at Providence.

MISHIMI

JEAN MacDONALD

Miss Jean Macdonald, well-known contralto soloist, will be the featured studio soloist during the regular Symphony intermission. Miss Macdonald is a Bostonian and recently achieved success on the occasion of her New York debut. Inasmuch as Miss Macdonald is of Gaelic descent, it is natural that she include in her program songs of Celtic origin.

The regular Symphony program consists of two selections by Liszt. The first is Psalm 13, "Lord, How Long Wilt Thou Forget Me?" This selection is for chorus and tenor soloist. The Cecilia Society, under the direction of Malcolm Lang, with Charles Stratton, tenor, will assist in this program. The final selection by Liszt is a Faust Symphony in three character pictures after Goethe.

Story of Orchestra

Beginning tonight the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast will be featured by a new plan of announcing which will run as a continued story through the nine concerts still to go on the air. This plan is based upon the belief that the thousands of people who are enjoying these concerts are interested in knowing something about the technical construction of a great orchestra like the Boston Symphony and also about its personnel.

Like a mammoth building, or a battle

American Feb 20

NEW PLAN FOR SYMPHONY

Beginning tonight, the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast through WEEI, will be featured by a new plan of announcing, which will run as a continued story through the nine concerts still to go on the air through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company.

The make-up of the orchestra will therefore be discussed in nine chapters, the first of which will be tonight—the story of violins and the part they play in a big orchestra like the Boston Symphony.

Music lovers will hear the Cecilia Society with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during their broadcast tonight from Symphony Hall. This program will be given the New England fans through WEEI, Boston; WCSH, Portland, and this week WEAN, Providence, has been added to the small New England network.

During the remaining broadcasts, therefore, these concerts, sponsored by W. S. Quinby, will be given to the radio fans throughout southern New England from WEAN at Providence.

Miss Jean MacDonald, well known contralto soloist, who is scheduled to give a recital in Jordan Hall on March 18, will be the featured soloist during the regular intermission.

The regular Symphony program consists of but two selections. Both of these are by Liszt. The first is Psalm 13, "Lord, How Long Wilt Thou Forget Me?" This selection is for chorus and tenor soloist. The Cecilia Society is under the direction of Malcolm Lang, with Charles Stratton, tenor, assisting in this program.

The final selection by Liszt is a Faust Symphony in three character pictures from Goethe. I—Faust. II—Gretchen. III—Mephistopheles.

At succeeding concerts other units of the orchestra will be subjects for discussion. Some of these are as follows: violas, violincellos, basses, flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, horns, trumpets, trombones, harps, timpanis, percussion, etc.

FEB 27 1926

Koussevitzky Leads Symphony Orchestra Under "Doctor" Title

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert yesterday conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky; until then it had always been Mr. Koussevitzky. His new title was bestowed upon him Wednesday by Brown University, making the fourth time in the history of the institution that the degree of Doctor of Music had been awarded.

The concert, held in Symphony Hall, Boston, had as its piece de resistance, Gilbert's "Symphonic Piece," rendered for the first time. It is characterized by its thoroughly American inspiration and manner.

SYMPHONY IN THIRD MONDAY CONCERT

Globe Feb 23

Irene Scharrer Makes Her American Debut

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr Koussevitzy conducting, gave its third concert of the Monday evening series last evening before its usual audience The program consisted of Vivaldi's Concerto in E minor for string orchestra, Schumann's A minor piano concerto played by Irene Scharrer, Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres Midi d'un Faune" and Respighi's "Pines of Rome." With the exception of the concerto all of the music had been previously heard this season in the regular series.

Miss Scharrer, the English pianist, made her American debut last evening under favorable circumstances. She is a young woman of attractive simplicity and modesty who plays admirably in many ways. She employs a large palette, utilizes pianissimos and fortis-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
TAMPA, FLA.

FEB 24 1926

SYMPHONY SPONSORS PIANIST

Post Feb 23

Irene Scharrer Makes American Debut at Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The American debut of Irene Scharrer, an English pianist, in Schumann's Concerto, constituted the novel element in last evening's Symphony concert. The rest ran to repetitions from the current "regular" subscription concerts, and offered Vivaldi's E minor Concerto for strings, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

AT HOME AT PIANO

A single performance of even so comprehensive a piece as Schumann's Concerto may hardly disclose the full measure of any pianist. We will know Mme. Scharrer better when we have heard her in recital. Last evening she seemed fully at home in Schumann's music; responded to its poetry, its romantic content; observed the changefullness of mood in the first movement; caught the improvisational fancy of the intermezzo, and rose to the brilliance of the finale. In other words hers was an adequate, an altogether sympathetic performance. That it shed any new light upon the music or even revealed in the pianist herself any conspicuous or arresting individuality is not so certain.

Once more Respighi's "Pines," the most attractive new music that has come to us in many a day, found much favor, while the resounding March again carried all before it. But a second hearing of the piece makes one even more distrustful of the photograph-rendered nightingale of the third movement. Last evening these chirpings brought the uncomfortable feeling that some impious hand had thrust a canary, cage and all, upon the stage of Symphony Hall, there to let its twitterings mingle with the immeasurably more eloquent voices of the orchestra. It would seem that Respighi, heretofore always a sensitive and discriminating musician, had in this instance been most unadvisedly literal.

THIRD IN SYMPHONY MONDAY CONCERTS

Herald Feb 23

Respighi and Vivaldi Pieces Are Played

Ten days ago Mr. Koussevitzky played at a concert the Vivaldi concerto in E minor for string orchestra (edited by A. Mistovski), a piece by Leken, Respighi's new "Pini di Roma," and Beethoven's first symphony. Last night, at the third concert of the Monday series, he played once more the Respighi and Vivaldi pieces, replaced the Leken composition with Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and, instead of the symphony, treated the audience to a concerto, Schumann's to wit, with Irene Scharrer playing the piano part.

Most people, without much doubt, would prefer Debussy's prelude to the music by Leken. But, if a referendum could be taken would the majority vote in favor of a concerto or a purely orchestral piece?

Because of its necessary soloist, some musical people declare a concerto brings personality to the fore, to the distraction of their attention from the music itself. No doubt they are right. But there is an answer awaiting them. A concert without personality is indeed a sorry affair.

Other musical people protest that the tone of a piano and that of other instruments are hopelessly at odds; they never can agree. Hence, away with piano concertos. When certain pianists do the playing it must be admitted that these musical people have ground for their contention. But they must be blessed—or cursed—with ears abnormally sensitive if they found sounds to offend them in the first two movements of last night's concerto.

For Mr. Koussevitzky had set his mind, so much was evident, to making the accompaniment sound beautiful. Admirably he succeeded. And Miss Scharrer, with her exquisitely clear and mellow tone, was plainly inclined, not to display, but to do her part in a performance that should be beautiful through and through.

So, with tone most artfully colored and in strength just right she furnished accompaniments to solos, and arabesques of a loveliness very rare. To her own solo passages she brought an excellent singing tone and the nicest taste in phrasing.

Of musical beauty one could not ask more than Miss Scharrer gave in these two movements. That Schumann's concerto gains when played with a warmer sentiment, with rhythm more vitally accented, is not to be denied. Miss Scharrer was warmly applauded. Clearly, the audience last night had no dis-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Public Ledger

FEB 25 1926

UNABLE TO SPEAK ENGLISH, ACCEPTS DEGREE WITH SOLO

Koussevitsky Plays Bass Viol as Brown University Honors Him

Providence, R. I., Feb. 24.—(AP)—For the first time in America, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared as a soloist today. He played the double bass at a special convocation of Brown University, called for the purpose of conferring honorary degrees on M. Koussevitsky and Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor, M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier

FEB 25 1926

Brown Confers Degree On Koussevitzku

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BULLETIN
PHILA. PA.

FEB 24 1926

SAYS IT WITH DOUBLE BASS

Boston Symphony Conductor Uses Music to Express Gratitude

(By Associated Press.)

Providence, R. I., Feb. 24.—For the first time in America, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear as a soloist today.

He will play the double bass at a special convocation of Brown University, called for the purpose of conferring honorary degrees on him and Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor, M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso.

In announcing that he would play, M. Koussevitsky explained his inability to speak English made it impossible for him to express in words his appreciation of the honor conferred by the United States, so he decided to express it in terms of music. He will use an instrument dating from the seventeenth century.

FEB 25 1926

HONORARY DEGREE IS CONFERRED ON MUSIC CONDUCTOR

Providence, R. I., Feb. 25.—(AP)—Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, responded in the medium of his art, when Brown university conferred on him the honorary degree of doctor of music, Wednesday.

He received an ovation after playing with thrilling beauty upon a bass vio-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
STATES
NEW ORLEANS, LA.

FEB 24 1926

Serge To Say It With His Double Bass Horn

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 24.—(By A. P.)—For the first time in America Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear as a soloist today. He will play the double bass at a special convocation of Brown University, called to confer honorary degrees on M. Koussevitsky and Roy Champan Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor, M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso and he explained that because of his inability to speak the English language he had decided to express in music his appreciation of the honor conferred by the university. He will use an instrument dating from the seventeenth century which he brought with him to America.

Musician to Play "Bull Fiddle" As He Gets Degree

Providence, Feb. 24.—For the first time in America, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra will [illegible] a soloist today. He will play the double bass at a special convocation of Brown university, called to confer honorary degrees on M. Koussevitsky and Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor, M. Koussevitsky was widely

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
CHICAGO, ILL.

FEB 24 1926

Koussevitsky to Play Solo on Double Bass

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 24.—(AP)—For the first time in America, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will appear

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

FEB 8 1926

Koussevitsky Will Direct Symphony Concert Here

Tuesday evening, March 4th, at Woolsey Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by its distinguished leader, Serge Koussevitsky, will be heard for a single concert. The event will mark the conclusion of the Steinert Concert Series for the present season, a series, which, by the way, has proven tremendously successful.

That the final offering is to be one of such magnitude as this great Hub City organization of 107 picked musicians bespeaks great praise for the booking ability of Mr. Steinert, under whose managerial direction the Yale School of Music offers the attractions.

Serge Koussevitsky, as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now holds the attention of America as a striking and unusal personality in the world of music. In Europe he is as prominent likewise, having conducted with great success last Summer his usual series of "Concerts Koussevitsky" in Paris, and his series as conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening made its fourth appearance of the season at Infantry Hall. Mr. Koussevitsky, at the conductor's desk after an absence of one concert, celebrated his return by brilliant leadership in a programme of violent contrast. Three numbers of more widely divergent style scarcely could be found.

Further interest in the evening's entertainment came in the appearance of the Russian composer-pianist, Serge Prokofieff, the first soloist to grace the present series. Mr. Prokofieff played his Third Concerto for piano and orchestra, the performance arousing the big audience to an unusually hearty demonstration.

This was the programme:

Vivaldi.
  Concerto in E-minor for String Orchestra
  (Edited by A. Mistovski.)
  Vigoroso.
  Largo.
  Allegro.
Prokofieff....Third Concerto for piano, op. 26
  Andante—Allegro.
  Theme—Andantino.
  Variation I. Listesso tempo.
  Variation II. Allegro.
  Variation III. Allegro moderato.
  Variation IV. Andante meditativo.
  Variation V. Allegro giusto.
  Theme Listesso tempo.
  Allegro, ma non troppo.
Rimski-Korsakov.
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), op. 35.
  The Sea and Sindbad's Ship.
  The Story of the Kalandar Prince.
  The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
  Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces Against a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.

In these days when discordant modernist scores jar the ear such a work as the Vivaldi concerto in E-minor for string orchestra seems somewhat old fashioned. But it is real music, melodious and comparatively simple in structure, the kind we learned to love in our earlier years before it became the fashion to write "modern" music.

Vivaldi was a melodist like most Italians of his day and the concerto in E-minor is a good example of his style of writing. There is strength and vigor in its melodic flow, clever treatment of thematic material, and contrast is attained in surprising measure considering the limited means at his disposal. Mr. Koussevitzky discovered unsuspected possibilities in such straightforward, formal scores and perhaps Vivaldi himself would have been surprised to hear the work as played under the Russian's baton. There was delightfully finished phrasing, delicate adjustment of tone volume and together the strings sang as one, either in the gentle rise and fall of soft passages or the broad measures of fortissimo.

In absolute contrast to this opening number came the Prokofieff concerto. Its composer is a modernist and to judge by this example of his work nearly if not quite deserves the prefix "ultra." It is a concerto that undoubtedly would strike terror to the heart of a player less technically gifted than Mr. Prokofieff, who possesses tremendous energy and fingers of steel.

Upon the few occasions when the score permitted the solo instrument to appear alone he revealed a tone of singular purity and sweetness. But in the main the piano takes its place as a voice in the orchestral ensemble, a leading voice to be sure, but not in the sense of solo part with an accompaniment. There are, however, occasions when the soloist embellishes the orchestral harmony with florid runs and figure work of great brilliance.

The concerto is extremely modern in its general effect. Dissonance is never absent and the restless energy of the strange and ever changing harmonic tide keeps the listener in interested suspense. From beginning to end the work is filled with astonishing effects of instrumentation which make their appearance in rapid succession. Abrupt changes of tempo and rhythm also have a share in the surprises that greet the ear.

It would be interesting to know the inspiration of such a work. Is it a deliberate attempt to say something new in modern scoring? If so the composer has succeeded. And likewise he has been successful in creating a musical work that is of absorbing interest from the standpoint of technical mastery of orchestration. But such discordant creations are not for regular musical diet.

The Rimsky Korsakov Symphonic Poem, modern in a sense, came

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL BE ON AIR AGAIN TO-NIGHT

Station WEAN Plans to Make Concert One of Weekly Features.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing at Symphony Hall, Boston, will again be broadcast this evening from station WEAN, The Shepard Stores, of this city, through the courtesy of station WEEI, of Boston. This special feature met with such a response last Saturday night, that it is planned to make it a weekly feature, as long as the season lasts.

The programme will be as follows: 1—The first Symphony No. 6; "The Surprise," by Handn; Adadio Vivace Assai; Andante Menuetto Allegro di Malto; 2—Symphonic Paice, by Gilbert: Intermission; 3—Tone Poem don Juan Opus 28, Strauss; 4—Orchestra Fragments, from the ballad Daphnis and Chloe; second Suite Reveo; Dawn, Pantamon Genera Pance.

181

CECILIA SOCIETY WITH SYMPHONY

Globe Feb 20

In Tonight's Broadcast From WEEI and Chain

Music lovers will hear the Cecilia Society with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during their broadcast tonight from Symphony Hall. This program will be given New England fans through WEEI, Boston; WCSH, Portland, and WEAN, Providence. During the remaining broadcasts, therefore, these concerts, sponsored by W. S. Quinby, will be given to the radio fans throughout Southern New England from WEAN at Providence.

MISHIMI

JEAN MacDONALD

Miss Jean Macdonald, well-known contralto soloist, will be the featured studio soloist during the regular Symphony intermission. Miss Macdonald is a Bostonian and recently achieved success on the occasion of her New York debut. Inasmuch as Miss Macdonald is of Gaelic descent, it is natural that she include in her program songs of Celtic origin.

The regular Symphony program consists of two selections by Liszt. The first is Psalm 13, "Lord, How Long Wilt Thou Forget Me?" This selection is for chorus and tenor soloist. The Cecilia Society, under the direction of Malcolm Lang, with Charles Stratton, tenor, will assist in this program. The final selection by Liszt is a Faust Symphony in three character pictures after Goethe.

Story of Orchestra

Beginning tonight the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast will be featured by a new plan of announcing which will run as a continued story through the nine concerts still to go on the air. This plan is based upon the belief that the thousands of people who are enjoying these concerts are interested in knowing something about the technical construction of a great orchestra like the Boston Symphony, and also about its personnel.

Like a mammoth building, or a battleship, or a fine piece of music, an orchestra is built according to a plan. As applied to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this plan takes into consideration all the elements of sound, harmony, balance of tone, volume and many other things which are necessary to secure perfection in the finished result.

The makeup of the orchestra will therefore be discussed in nine chapters, the first of which will be tonight—the story of violins and the part they play in an orchestra like the Boston Symphony. At succeeding concerts other units of the orchestra will be subjects for discussion. Some of these are as follows: Violas, violoncellos, basses, flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, horns, trumpets, trombones, harps, timpanis, percussion, etc.

Another interesting feature of this announcement plan will be stories of men who have succeeded supremely well in their life work. In this particular case these men have devoted their lives to the mastering of musical instruments, and the artists who will be mentioned are among the world's greatest players.

---

of these are by Liszt. The first is Psalm 13, "Lord, How Long Wilt Thou Forget Me?" This selection is for chorus and tenor soloist. The Cecilia Society is under the direction of Malcolm Lang, with Charles Stratton, tenor, assisting in this program.

The final selection by Liszt is a Faust Symphony in three character pictures from Goethe. I—Faust. II—Gretchen. III—Mephistopheles.

At succeeding concerts other units of the orchestra will be subjects for discussion. Some of these are as follows: violas, violincellos, basses, flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, horns, trumpets, trombones, harps, timpanis, percussion, etc.

FEB 27 1926

Koussevitzky Leads Symphony Orchestra Under "Doctor" Title

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert yesterday conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky; until then it had always been Mr. Koussevitzky. His new title was bestowed upon him Wednesday by Brown University, making the fourth time in the history of the institution that the degree of Doctor of Music had been awarded.

The concert, held in Symphony Hall, Boston, had as its piece de resistance, Gilbert's "Symphonic Piece," rendered for the first time. It is characterized by its thoroughly American inspiration and manner.

SYMPHONY IN THIRD MONDAY CONCERT

Globe Feb 23

Irene Scharrer Makes Her American Debut

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr Koussevitzy conducting, gave its third concert of the Monday evening series last evening before its usual audience. The program consisted of Vivaldi's Concerto in E minor for string orchestra, Schumann's A minor piano concerto played by Irene Scharrer, Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres Midi d'un Faune" and Respighi's "Pines of Rome." With the exception of the concerto all of the music had been previously heard this season in the regular series.

Miss Scharrer, the English pianist, made her American debut last evening under favorable circumstances. She is a young woman of attractive simplicity and modesty who plays admirably in many ways. She employs a large palette, utilizes pianissimos and fortissimos with discretion and produces the latter without great effort and without any recourse to pounding. She is willing to submerge her instrument in the orchestra, always the sign of a musician. Certain quiet passages she played with an exquisite tempered romanticism.

On the other side of the picture is her somewhat mannered use of arms and hands, her distinct lack of flexibility and lightness in trills and passage work, her rather patchy phrasing with its concurrent tendency to slur. It would be unwise and unfair to judge her abilities by the performance of this one concerto and it is far better to reserve final judgment of her powers to the imminent date of her first Boston recital.

So much has been written about the poor little one-minute nightingale song in the "Pines of Rome" as to cause one to wonder why it has come in for all this praise or blame. Not everyone who has discoursed on it at length has done so because of an ardent desire to take a stand on one or the other side of the question of the advisability of introducing genuine naturalism into the field of music. Can it be that some have chosen this way of avoiding a pronouncement? For be assured, were this music by Respighi a soul-stirring one, no one would notice the nightingale save casually.

The performance was of Mr Koussevitzky's best, particularly in the first and last movements, which contain music of the type in which he excels. One could not but question whether the thrilling march of the Roman legions owed more to the conductor than to the composer.

Vivaldi's concerto pleased as it did in the regular series and Mr Koussevitzky's languorous faun displeased, also as was the case before. All in all the march of the legions seemed best.

movement. Last evening these chirpings brought the uncomfortable feeling that some impious hand had thrust a canary, cage and all, upon the stage of Symphony Hall, there to let its twitterings mingle with the immeasurably more eloquent voices of the orchestra. It would seem that Respighi, heretofore always a sensitive and discriminating musician, had in this instance been most unadvisedly literal.

THIRD IN SYMPHONY MONDAY CONCERTS

Herald Feb 23

Respighi and Vivaldi Pieces Are Played

Ten days ago Mr. Koussevitzky played at a concert the Vivaldi concerto in E minor for string orchestra (edited by A. Mistovski), a piece by Leken, Respighi's new "Pini di Roma," and Beethoven's first symphony. Last night, at the third concert of the Monday series, he played once more the Respighi and Vivaldi pieces, replaced the Leken composition with Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and, instead of the symphony, treated the audience to a concerto, Schumann's to wit, with Irene Scharrer playing the piano part.

Most people, without much doubt, would prefer Debussy's prelude to the music by Leken. But, if a referendum could be taken would the majority vote in favor of a concerto or a purely orchestral piece?

Because of its necessary soloist, some musical people declare a concerto brings personality to the fore, to the distraction of their attention from the music itself. No doubt they are right. But there is an answer awaiting them. A concert without personality is indeed a sorry affair.

Other musical people protest that the tone of a piano and that of other instruments are hopelessly at odds; they never can agree. Hence, away with piano concertos. When certain pianists do the playing it must be admitted that these musical people have ground for their contention. But they must be blessed—or cursed—with ears abnormally sensitive if they found sounds to offend them in the first two movements of last night's concerto.

For Mr. Koussevitzky had set his mind, so much was evident, to making the accompaniment sound beautiful. Admirably he succeeded. And Miss Scharrer, with her exquisitely clear and mellow tone, was plainly inclined, not to display, but to do her part in a performance that should be beautiful through and through.

So, with tone most artfully colored and in strength just right she furnished accompaniments to solos, and arabesques of a loveliness very rare. To her own solo passages she brought an excellent singing tone and the nicest taste in phrasing.

Of musical beauty one could not ask more than Miss Scharrer gave in these two movements. That Schumann's concerto gains when played with a warmer sentiment, with rhythm more vitally accented, is not to be denied. Miss Scharrer was warmly applauded. Clearly, the audience last night had no dis-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Public Ledger

FEB 25 1926

UNABLE TO SPEAK ENGLISH, ACCEPTS DEGREE WITH SOLO

Koussevitsky Plays Bass Viol as Brown University Honors Him

Providence, R. I., Feb. 24.—(AP)—For the first time in America, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared as a soloist today. He played the double bass at a special convocation of Brown University, called for the purpose of conferring honorary degrees on M. Koussevitsky and Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor, M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Journal - Courier

FEB 25 1926

Brown Confers Degree On Koussevitzky

Providence, R. I., Feb. 24—(AP)—Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, responded in the medium of his art when Brown university this afternoon conferred on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Music. He played with thrilling beauty upon a bass violin, Handel's Largo and the Andante from his own concert, composed some 20 years ago.

The university also honored Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer, who has traced the origin of pre-historic man to Central Asia, conferring on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Science.

FEB 25 1926

HONORARY DEGREE IS CONFERRED ON MUSIC CONDUCTOR

Providence, R. I., Feb. 25.—(AP)—Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, responded in the medium of his art, when Brown university conferred on him the honorary degree of doctor of music, Wednesday.

He received an ovation after playing with thrilling beauty upon a bass vio-

THIS CLIPPING FROM

STATES

NEW ORLEANS, LA.

FEB 24 1926

Serge To Say It With His Double Bass Horn

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 24.—(By A. P.)—For the first time in America Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear as a soloist today. He will play the double bass at a special convocation of Brown University, called to confer honorary degrees on M. Koussevitsky and Roy Champan Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor, M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso and he explained that because of his inability to speak the English language he had decided to express in music his appreciation of the honor conferred by the university. He will use an instrument dating from the seventeenth century which he brought with him to America.

Musician to Play "Bull Fiddle" As He Gets Degree

Providence, Feb. 24.—For the first time in America, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra will appear as a soloist today. He will play the double bass at a special convocation of Brown university, called to confer honorary degrees on M. Koussevitsky and Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor, M. Koussevitsky was widely

THIS CLIPPING FROM

POST

CHICAGO, ILL.

FEB 24 1926

Koussevitsky to Play Solo on Double Bass

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 24.—(AP)—For the first time in America, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will appear as a soloist today. He will play the double bass at a special convocation of Brown university, called for the purpose of conferring honorary degrees on M. Koussevitsky and Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer. Before he became a conductor, M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso.

Woolsey Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by its distinguished leader, Serge Koussevitsky, will be heard for a single concert. The event will mark the conclusion of the Steinert Concert Series for the present season, a series, which, by the way, has proven tremendously successful.

That the final offering is to be one of such magnitude as this great Hub City organization of 107 picked musicians bespeaks great praise for the booking ability of Mr. Steinert, under whose managerial direction the Yale School of Music offers the attractions.

Serge Koussevitsky, as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now holds the attention of America as a striking and unusal personality in the world of music. In Europe he is as prominent likewise, having conducted with great success last Summer his usual series of "Concerts Koussevitsky" in Paris, and his series as conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening made its fourth appearance of the season at Infantry Hall. Mr. Koussevitsky, at the conductor's desk after an absence of one concert, celebrated his return by brilliant leadership in a programme of violent contrast. Three numbers of more widely divergent style scarcely could be found.

Further interest in the evening's entertainment came in the appearance of the Russian composer-pianist, Serge Prokofieff, the first soloist to grace the present series. Mr. Prokofieff played his Third Concerto for piano and orchestra, the performance arousing the big audience to an unusually hearty demonstration.

This was the programme:

Vivaldi.
Concerto in E-minor for String Orchestra
(Edited by A. Mistovski.)
Vigoroso.
Largo.
Allegro.
Prokofieff....Third Concerto for piano, op. 26
Andante—Allegro.
Theme—Andantino.

Variation I.	Listesso tempo.
Variation II.	Allegro.
Variation III.	Allegro moderato.
Variation IV.	Andante meditativo.
Variation V.	Allegro giusto.
Theme	Listesso tempo.

Allegro, ma non troppo.
Rimski-Korsakov.
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), op. 35.
The Sea and Sindbad's Ship.
The Story of the Kalandar Prince.
The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces Against a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.

In these days when discordant modernist scores jar the ear such a work as the Vivaldi concerto in E-minor for string orchestra seems somewhat old fashioned. But it is real music, melodious and comparatively simple in structure, the kind we learned to love in our earlier years before it became the fashion to write "modern" music.

Vivaldi was a melodist like most Italians of his day and the concerto in E-minor is a good example of his style of writing. There is strength and vigor in its melodic flow, clever treatment of thematic material, and contrast is attained in surprising measure considering the limited means at his disposal. Mr. Koussevitzky discovered unsuspected possibilities in such straightforward, formal scores and perhaps Vivaldi himself would have been surprised to hear the work as played under the Russian's baton. There was delightfully finished phrasing, delicate adjustment of tone volume and together the strings sang as one, either in the gentle rise and fall of soft passages or the broad measures of fortissimo.

In absolute contrast to this opening number came the Prokofieff concerto. Its composer is a modernist and to judge by this example of his work nearly if not quite deserves the prefix "ultra." It is a concerto that undoubtedly would strike terror to the heart of a player less technically gifted than Mr. Prokofieff, who possesses tremendous energy and fingers of steel.

Upon the few occasions when the score permitted the solo instrument to appear alone he revealed a tone of singular purity and sweetness. But in the main the piano takes its place as a voice in the orchestral ensemble, a leading voice to be sure, but not in the sense of solo part with an accompaniment. There are, however, occasions when the soloist embellishes the orchestral harmony with florid runs and figure work of great brilliance.

The concerto is extremely modern in its general effect. Dissonance is never absent and the restless energy of the strange and ever changing harmonic tide keeps the listener in interested suspense. From beginning to end the work is filled with astonishing effects of instrumentation which make their appearance in rapid succession. Abrupt changes of tempo and rhythm also have a share in the surprises that greet the ear.

It would be interesting to know the inspiration of such a work. Is it a deliberate attempt to say something new in modern scoring? If so the composer has succeeded. And likewise he has been successful in creating a musical work that is of absorbing interest from the standpoint of technical mastery of orchestration. But such discordant creations are not for regular musical diet.

The Rimsky Korsakov Symphonic Poem, modern in a sense, came as a soothing summer breeze after the jarring disonances of the concerto. Here we have the Russian tone painter at his best. Perhaps in no other work has he set forth in his colorful style such truly descriptive music. One needs little imagination to follow the tales of Scheherazade. The solo violin throughout the several movements gives the theme which presents the narrator.

Mr. Brugin played this violin part with nice effect and the orchestra responded brilliantly to Conductor Koussevitzky's effective conception of the score.

A. F. P.

---

first Symphony No. 6; "The Surprise," by Handn; Adadio Vivace Assai; Andante Menuetto Allegro di Malto; 2—Symphonic Palce, by Gilbert; Intermission; 3—Tone Poem don Juan Opus 28, Strauss; 4—Orchestra Fragments, from the ballad Daphnis and Chloe; second Suite Reveo; Dawn, Pantamon General Pance.

TUESDAY and WEDNESDAY AGAIN!
We Offer You Exceptional Bargains In All Departments
Sugar Cured Sliced BACON lb. 31c 5 lb. Box $1.39
Genuine Spring RIB LAMB CHOPS, lb. 37c
Fancy Top Round STEAK lb. 37c
Very Special
Sugar Cured Stockinette HAMS Whole or Half Shank lb. 24c

1926

Serge Prokofieff

CECILIA SOCIETY WITH SYMPHONY

181

Globe Feb 20

In Tonight's Broadcast From WEEI and Chain

Music lovers will hear the Cecilia Society with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during their broadcast tonight from Symphony Hall. This program will be given New England fans through WEEI, Boston; WCSH, Portland, and WEAN, Providence. During the remaining broadcasts, therefore, these concerts, sponsored by W. S. Quinby, will be given to the radio fans throughout Southern New England from WEAN at Providence.

MISHIMI

JEAN MacDONALD

Miss Jean Macdonald, well-known contralto soloist, will be the featured studio soloist during the regular Symphony intermission. Miss Macdonald is a Bostonian and recently achieved success on the occasion of her New York debut. Inasmuch as Miss Macdonald is of Gaelic descent, it is natural that she include in her program songs of Celtic origin.

The regular Symphony program consists of two selections by Liszt. The first is Psalm 13, "Lord, How Long Wilt Thou Forget Me?" This selection is for chorus and tenor soloist. The Cecilia Society, under the direction of Malcolm Lang, with Charles Stratton, tenor, will assist in this program. The final selection by Liszt is a Faust Symphony in three character pictures after Goethe.

Story of Orchestra

Beginning tonight the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast will be featured by a new plan of announcing which will run as a continued story through the nine concerts still to go on the air. This plan is based upon the belief that the thousands of people who are enjoying these concerts are interested in knowing something about the technical construction of a great orchestra like the Boston Symphony, and also about its personnel.

Like a mammoth building, or a battleship, or a fine piece of music, an orchestra is built according to a plan. As applied to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this plan takes into consideration all the elements of sound, harmony, balance of tone, volume and many other things which are necessary to secure perfection in the finished result.

The makeup of the orchestra will therefore be discussed in nine chapters, the first of which will be tonight—the story of violins and the part they play in an orchestra like the Boston Symphony. At succeeding concerts other units of the orchestra will be subjects for discussion. Some of these are as follows: Violas, violoncellos, basses, flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, horns, trumpets, trombones, harps, timpanis, percussion, etc.

Another interesting feature of this announcement plan will be stories of men who have succeeded supremely well in their life work. In this particular case these men have devoted their lives to the mastering of musical instruments, and the artists who will be mentioned are among the world's greatest players.

---

or these are by Liszt. The first is Psalm 13, "Lord, How Long Wilt Thou Forget Me?" This selection is for chorus and tenor soloist. The Cecilia Society is under the direction of Malcolm Lang, with Charles Stratton, tenor, assisting in this program.

The final selection by Liszt is a Faust Symphony in three character pictures from Goethe. I—Faust. II—Gretchen. III—Mephistopheles.

At succeeding concerts other units of the orchestra will be subjects for discussion. Some of these are as follows: violas, violincellos, basses, flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, horns, trumpets, trombones, harps, timpanis, percussion, etc.

FEB 2 7 1926

Koussevitzky Leads Symphony Orchestra Under "Doctor" Title

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert yesterday conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky; until then it had always been Mr. Koussevitzky. His new title was bestowed upon him Wednesday by Brown University, making the fourth time in the history of the institution that the degree of Doctor of Music had been awarded.

The concert, held in Symphony Hall, Boston, had as its piece de resistance, Gilbert's "Symphonic Piece," rendered for the first time. It is characterized by its thoroughly American inspiration and manner.

SYMPHONY IN THIRD MONDAY CONCERT

Globe Feb 23

Irene Scharrer Makes Her American Debut

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr Koussevitzy conducting, gave its third concert of the Monday evening series last evening before its usual audience. The program consisted of Vivaldi's Concerto in E minor for string orchestra, Schumann's A minor piano concerto played by Irene Scharrer, Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres Midi d'un Faune" and Respighi's "Pines of Rome." With the exception of the concerto all of the music had been previously heard this season in the regular series.

Miss Scharrer, the English pianist, made her American debut last evening under favorable circumstances. She is a young woman of attractive simplicity and modesty who plays admirably in many ways. She employs a large palette, utilizes pianissimos and fortissimos with discretion and produces the latter without great effort and without any recourse to pounding. She is willing to submerge her instrument in the orchestra, always the sign of a musician. Certain quiet passages she played with an exquisite tempered romanticism.

On the other side of the picture is her somewhat mannered use of arms and hands, her distinct lack of flexibility and lightness in trills and passage work, her rather patchy phrasing with its concurrent tendency to slur. It would be unwise and unfair to judge her abilities by the performance of this one concerto and it is far better to reserve final judgment of her powers to the imminent date of her first Boston recital.

So much has been written about the poor little one-minute nightingale song in the "Pines of Rome" as to cause one to wonder why it has come in for all this praise or blame. Not everyone who has discoursed on it at length has done so because of an ardent desire to take a stand on one or the other side of the question of the advisability of introducing genuine naturalism into the field of music. Can it be that some have chosen this way of avoiding a pronouncement? For be assured, were this music by Respighi a soul-stirring one, no one would notice the nightingale save casually.

The performance was of Mr Koussevitzky's best, particularly in the first and last movements, which contain music of the type in which he excels. One could not but question whether the thrilling march of the Roman legions owed more to the conductor than to the composer.

Vivaldi's concerto pleased as it did in the regular series and Mr Koussevitzky's languorous faun displeased, also as was the case before. All in all the march of the legions seemed best.

---

movement. Last evening these chirpings brought the uncomfortable feeling that some impious hand had thrust a canary, cage and all, upon the stage of Symphony Hall, there to let its twitterings mingle with the immeasurably more eloquent voices of the orchestra. It would seem that Respighi, heretofore always a sensitive and discriminating musician, had in this instance been most unadvisedly literal.

THIRD IN SYMPHONY MONDAY CONCERTS

Herald Feb 23

Respighi and Vivaldi Pieces Are Played

Ten days ago Mr. Koussevitzky played at a concert the Vivaldi concerto in E minor for string orchestra (edited by A. Mistovski), a piece by Leken, Respighi's new "Pini di Roma," and Beethoven's first symphony. Last night, at the third concert of the Monday series, he played once more the Respighi and Vivaldi pieces, replaced the Leken composition with Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and, instead of the symphony, treated the audience to a concerto, Schumann's to wit, with Irene Scharrer playing the piano part.

Most people, without much doubt, would prefer Debussy's prelude to the music by Leken. But, if a referendum could be taken would the majority vote in favor of a concerto or a purely orchestral piece?

Because of its necessary soloist, some musical people declare a concerto brings personality to the fore, to the distraction of their attention from the music itself. No doubt they are right. But there is an answer awaiting them. A concert without personality is indeed a sorry affair.

Other musical people protest that the tone of a piano and that of other instruments are hopelessly at odds; they never can agree. Hence, away with piano concertos. When certain pianists do the playing it must be admitted that these musical people have ground for their contention. But they must be blessed—or cursed—with ears abnormally sensitive if they found sounds to offend them in the first two movements of last night's concerto.

For Mr. Koussevitzky had set his mind, so much was evident, to making the accompaniment sound beautiful. Admirably he succeeded. And Miss Scharrer, with her exquisitely clear and mellow tone, was plainly inclined, not to display, but to do her part in a performance that should be beautiful through and through.

So, with tone most artfully colored and in strength just right she furnished accompaniments to solos, and arabesques of a loveliness very rare. To her own solo passages she brought an excellent singing tone and the nicest taste in phrasing.

Of musical beauty one could not ask more than Miss Scharrer gave in these two movements. That Schumann's concerto gains when played with a warmer sentiment, with rhythm more vitally accented, is not to be denied. Miss Scharrer was warmly applauded. Clearly, the audience last night had no dis

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Public Ledger

FEB 2 5 1926

UNABLE TO SPEAK ENGLISH, ACCEPTS DEGREE WITH SOLO

Koussevitsky Plays Bass Viol as Brown University Honors Him

Providence, R. I., Feb. 24.—(AP)—For the first time in America, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared as a soloist today. He played the double bass at a special convocation of Brown University, called for the purpose of conferring honorary degrees on M. Koussevitsky and Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor, M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso.

In announcing that he would play today, M. Koussevitsky explained that his inability to speak the English language made it impossible for him to express in words his appreciation of the honor conferred by the university, and so he decided to express it in terms of music. He will use an instrument of the seventeenth century, which he brought with him when he came to America.

---

ex-

who has traced the origin of pre-historic man to Central Asia, conferring on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Science.

FEB 2 5 1926

HONORARY DEGREE IS CONFERRED ON MUSIC CONDUCTOR

Providence, R. I., Feb. 25.—(AP)—Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, responded in the medium of his art, when Brown university conferred on him the honorary degree of doctor of music, Wednesday.

He received an ovation after playing with thrilling beauty upon a bass violin Handel's Largo and the Andante from his own concert, composed twenty years ago.

The university also honored Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer, who has traced the origin of prehistoric man to central Asia, conferring on Andrews the honorary degree of doctor of science.

---

co-

bass at a special convocation of Brown University, called to confer honorary degrees on M. Koussevitsky and Roy Champan Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor, M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso and he explained that because of his inability to speak the English language he had decided to express in music his appreciation of the honor conferred by the university. He will use an instrument dating from the seventeenth century which he brought with him to America.

Musician to Play "Bull Fiddle" As He Gets Degree

Providence, Feb. 24.—For the first time in America, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra will a[illegible]a soloist today. He will play the double bass at a special convocation of Brown university, called to confer honorary degrees on M. Koussevitsky and Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor, M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso and he explained that because of his inability to speak the English language he had decided to express in music his appreciation of the honor conferred by the university. He will use an instrument dating from the 17th century which he brought with him to America.

Woolsey Hall, the Orchestra, conducted by its distinguished leader, Serge Koussevitsky, will be heard for a single concert. The event will mark the conclusion of the Steinert Concert Series for the present season, a series, which, by the way, has proven tremendously successful.

That the final offering is to be one of such magnitude as this great Hub City organization of 107 picked musicians bespeaks great praise for the booking ability of Mr. Steinert, under whose managerial direction the Yale School of Music offers the attractions.

Serge Koussevitsky, as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now holds the attention of America as a striking and unusal personality in the world of music. In Europe he is as prominent likewise, having conducted with great success last Summer his usual series of "Concerts Koussevitsky" in Paris, and his series as conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening made its fourth appearance of the season at Infantry Hall. Mr. Koussevitsky, at the conductor's desk after an absence of one concert, celebrated his return by brilliant leadership in a programme of violent contrast. Three numbers of more widely divergent style scarcely could be found.

Further interest in the evening's entertainment came in the appearance of the Russian composer-pianist, Serge Prokofieff, the first soloist to grace the present series. Mr. Prokofieff played his Third Concerto for piano and orchestra, the performance arousing the big audience to an unusually hearty demonstration.

This was the programme:

Vivaldi.
Concerto in E-minor for String Orchestra (Edited by A. Mistovski.)
Vigoroso.
Largo.
Allegro.
Prokofieff....Third Concerto for piano, op. 26
Andante—Allegro.
Theme—Andantino.
Variation I. Listesso tempo.
Variation II. Allegro.
Variation III. Allegro moderato.
Variation IV. Andante meditativo.
Variation V. Allegro giusto.
Theme Listesso tempo.
Allegro, ma non troppo.
Rimski-Korsakov.
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), op. 35.
The Sea and Sindbad's Ship.
The Story of the Kalandar Prince.
The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces Against a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.

In these days when discordant modernist scores jar the ear such a work as the Vivaldi concerto in E-minor for string orchestra seems somewhat old fashioned. But it is real music, melodious and comparatively simple in structure, the kind we learned to love in our earlier years before it became the fashion to write "modern" music.

Vivaldi was a melodist like most Italians of his day and the concerto in E-minor is a good example of his style of writing. There is strength and vigor in its melodic flow, clever treatment of thematic material, and contrast is attained in surprising measure considering the limited means at his disposal. Mr. Koussevitzky discovered unsuspected possibilities in such straightforward, formal scores and perhaps Vivaldi himself would have been surprised to hear the work as played under the Russian's baton. There was delightfully finished phrasing, delicate adjustment of tone volume and together the strings sang as one, either in the gentle rise and fall of soft passages or the broad measures of fortissimo.

In absolute contrast to this opening number came the Prokofieff concerto. Its composer is a modernist and to judge by this example of his work nearly if not quite deserves the prefix "ultra." It is a concerto that undoubtedly would strike terror to the heart of a player less technically gifted than Mr. Prokofieff, who possesses tremendous energy and fingers of steel.

Upon the few occasions when the score permitted the solo instrument to appear alone he revealed a tone of singular purity and sweetness. But in the main the piano takes its place as a voice in the orchestral ensemble, a leading voice to be sure, but not in the sense of solo part with an accompaniment. There are, however, occasions when the soloist embellishes the orchestral harmony with florid runs and figure work of great brilliance.

The concerto is extremely modern in its general effect. Dissonance is never absent and the restless energy of the strange and ever changing harmonic tide keeps the listener in interested suspense. From beginning to end the work is filled with astonishing effects of instrumentation which make their appearance in rapid succession. Abrupt changes of tempo and rhythm also have a share in the surprises that greet the ear.

It would be interesting to know the inspiration of such a work. Is it a deliberate attempt to say something new in modern scoring? If so the composer has succeeded. And likewise he has been successful in creating a musical work that is of absorbing interest from the standpoint of technical mastery of orchestration. But such discordant creations are not for regular musical diet.

The Rimsky Korsakov Symphonic Poem, modern in a sense, came as a soothing summer breeze after the jarring disonances of the concerto. Here we have the Russian tone painter at his best. Perhaps in no other work has he set forth in his colorful style such truly descriptive music. One needs little imagination to follow the tales of Scheherazade. The solo violin throughout the several movements gives the theme which presents the narrator.

Mr. Brugin played this violin part with nice effect and the orchestra responded brilliantly to Conductor Koussevitzky's effective conception of the score.

A. F. P.

1—The first Symphony No. 6; "The Surprise," by Handn; Adadio Vivace Assai; 2—Andante Menuetto Allegro di Malto; 2—Symphonic Paice, by Gilbert; Intermission; 3—Tone Poem don Juan Opus 28 Strauss; 4—Orchestra Fragments, from the ballad Daphnis and Chloe; second Suite Reveo; Dawn, Pantamon General Pance.

1926

Serge Prokofieff W

CECILIA SOCIETY WITH SYMPHONY

Globe Feb 20

In Tonight's Broadcast From WEEI and Chain

Music lovers will hear the Cecilia Society with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during their broadcast tonight from Symphony Hall. This program will be given New England fans through WEEI, Boston; WCSH, Portland, and WEAN, Providence. During the remaining broadcasts, therefore, these concerts, sponsored by W. S. Quinby, will be given to the radio fans throughout Southern New England from WEAN at Providence.

MISHIMI

JEAN MacDONALD

Miss Jean Macdonald, well-known contralto soloist, will be the featured studio soloist during the regular Symphony intermission. Miss Macdonald is a Bostonian and recently achieved success on the occasion of her New York debut. Inasmuch as Miss Macdonald is of Gaelic descent, it is natural that she include in her program songs of Celtic origin.

The regular Symphony program consists of two selections by Liszt. The first is Psalm 13, "Lord, How Long Wilt Thou Forget Me?" This selection is for chorus and tenor soloist. The Cecilia Society, under the direction of Malcolm Lang, with Charles Stratton, tenor, will assist in this program. The final selection by Liszt is a Faust Symphony in three character pictures after Goethe.

Story of Orchestra

Beginning tonight the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast will be featured by a new plan of announcing which will run as a continued story through the nine concerts still to go on the air. This plan is based upon the belief that the thousands of people who are enjoying these concerts are interested in knowing something about the technical construction of a great orchestra like the Boston Symphony, and also about its personnel.

Like a mammoth building, or a battleship, or a fine piece of music, an orchestra is built according to a plan. As applied to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this plan takes into consideration all the elements of sound, harmony, balance of tone, volume and many other things which are necessary to secure perfection in the finished result.

The makeup of the orchestra will therefore be discussed in nine chapters, the first of which will be tonight—the story of violins and the part they play in an orchestra like the Boston Symphony. At succeeding concerts other units of the orchestra will be subjects for discussion. Some of these are as follows: Violas, violoncellos, basses, flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, horns, trumpets, trombones, harps, timpanis, percussion, etc.

Another interesting feature of this announcement plan will be stories of men who have succeeded supremely well in their life work. In this particular case these men have devoted their lives to the mastering of musical instruments, and the artists who will be mentioned are among the world's greatest players, of these are by Liszt. The first is Psalm 13, "Lord, How Long Wilt Thou Forget Me?" This selection is for chorus and tenor soloist. The Cecilia Society is under the direction of Malcolm Lang, with Charles Stratton, tenor, assisting in this program.

---

The final selection by Liszt is a Faust Symphony in three character pictures from Goethe. I—Faust. II—Gretchen. III—Mephistopheles.

At succeeding concerts other units of the orchestra will be subjects for discussion. Some of these are as follows: violas, violincellos, basses, flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, horns, trumpets, trombones, harps, timpanis, percussion, etc.

FEB 27 1926

Koussevitzky Leads Symphony Orchestra Under "Doctor" Title

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert yesterday conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky; until then it had always been Mr. Koussevitzky. His new title was bestowed upon him Wednesday by Brown University, making the fourth time in the history of the institution that the degree of Doctor of Music had been awarded.

The concert, held in Symphony Hall, Boston, had as its piece de resistance, Gilbert's "Symphonic Piece," rendered for the first time. It is characterized by its thoroughly American inspiration and manner.

SYMPHONY IN THIRD MONDAY CONCERT

Globe Feb 23

Irene Scharrer Makes Her American Debut

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr Koussevitzy conducting, gave its third concert of the Monday evening series last evening before its usual audience. The program consisted of Vivaldi's Concerto in E minor for string orchestra, Schumann's A minor piano concerto played by Irene Scharrer, Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres Midi d'un Faune" and Respighi's "Pines of Rome." With the exception of the concerto all of the music had been previously heard this season in the regular series.

Miss Scharrer, the English pianist, made her American debut last evening under favorable circumstances. She is a young woman of attractive simplicity and modesty who plays admirably in many ways. She employs a large palette, utilizes pianissimos and fortissimos with discretion and produces the latter without great effort and without any recourse to pounding. She is willing to submerge her instrument in the orchestra, always the sign of a musician. Certain quiet passages she played with an exquisite tempered romanticism.

On the other side of the picture is her somewhat mannered use of arms and hands, her distinct lack of flexibility and lightness in trills and passage work, her rather patchy phrasing with its concurrent tendency to slur. It would be unwise and unfair to judge her abilities by the performance of this one concerto and it is far better to reserve final judgment of her powers to the imminent date of her first Boston recital.

So much has been written about the poor little one-minute nightingale song in the "Pines of Rome" as to cause one to wonder why it has come in for all this praise or blame. Not everyone who has discoursed on it at length has done so because of an ardent desire to take a stand on one or the other side of the question of the advisability of introducing genuine naturalism into the field of music. Can it be that some have chosen this way of avoiding a pronouncement? For be assured, were this music by Respighi a soul-stirring one, no one would notice the nightingale save casually.

The performance was of Mr Koussevitzky's best, particularly in the first and last movements, which contain music of the type in which he excels. One could not but question whether the thrilling march of the Roman legions owed more to the conductor than to the composer.

Vivaldi's concerto pleased as it did in the regular series and Mr Koussevitzky's languorous faun displeased, also as was the case before. All in all the march of the legions seemed best.

Heels of contrasting color or m terial are one of the new shoe modes.

TUESDAY and WEDNESDAY
AGAIN!
We Offer You Exceptional Bargains
In All Departments

Sugar Cured Sliced
BACON lb. 31c
5 lb. Box $1.39

Genuine Spring
RIB LAMB CHOPS, lb. 37c

Fancy Top Round
STEAK lb. 37c
Very Special

Sugar Cured Stockinette
HAMS Whole or Shank Half lb. 24c

but a second piece makes one even mistrustful of the photograph-rendered nightingale of the third movement. Last evening these chirpings brought the uncomfortable feeling that some impious hand had thrust a canary, cage and all, upon the stage of Symphony Hall, there to let its twitterings mingle with the immeasurably more eloquent voices of the orchestra. It would seem that Respighi, heretofore always a sensitive and discriminating musician, had in this instance been most unadvisedly literal.

THIRD IN SYMPHONY MONDAY CONCERTS

Herald Feb 23

Respighi and Vivaldi Pieces Are Played

Ten days ago Mr. Koussevitzky played at a concert the Vivaldi concerto in E minor for string orchestra (edited by A. Mistovski), a piece by Leken, Respighi's new "Pini di Roma," and Beethoven's first symphony. Last night, at the third concert of the Monday series, he played once more the Respighi and Vivaldi pieces, replaced the Leken composition with Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and, instead of the symphony, treated the audience to a concerto, Schumann's to wit, with Irene Scharrer playing the piano part.

Most people, without much doubt, would prefer Debussy's prelude to the music by Leken. But, if a referendum could be taken would the majority vote in favor of a concerto or a purely orchestral piece?

Because of its necessary soloist, some musical people declare a concerto brings personality to the fore, to the distraction of their attention from the music itself. No doubt they are right. But there is an answer awaiting them. A concert without personality is indeed a sorry affair.

Other musical people protest that the tone of a piano and that of other instruments are hopelessly at odds; they never can agree. Hence, away with piano concertos. When certain pianists do the playing it must be admitted that these musical people have ground for their contention. But they must be blessed—or cursed—with ears abnormally sensitive if they found sounds to offend them in the first two movements of last night's concerto.

For Mr. Koussevitzky had set his mind, so much was evident, to making the accompaniment sound beautiful. Admirably he succeeded. And Miss Scharrer, with her exquisitely clear and mellow tone, was plainly inclined, not to display, but to do her part in a performance that should be beautiful through and through.

So, with tone most artfully colored and in strength just right she furnished accompaniments to solos, and arabesques of a loveliness very rare. To her own solo passages she brought an excellent singing tone and the nicest taste in phrasing.

Of musical beauty one could not ask more than Miss Scharrer gave in these two movements. That Schumann's concerto gains when played with a warmer sentiment, with rhythm more vitally accented, is not to be denied. Miss Scharrer was warmly applauded. Clearly, the audience last night had no distaste for a fine concerto when musically played.

Of the orchestral pieces it is not necessary to speak, since they all have been recently played. Both Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were at their best. The next Monday concert will be March 22.

R. R. G.

Providence, R. I.,

For the first time in America, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared as a soloist today. He played the double bass at a special convocation of Brown University, called for the purpose of conferring honorary degrees on M. Koussevitsky and Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor, M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso.

In announcing that he would play today, M. Koussevitsky explained that his inability to speak the English language made it impossible for him to express in words his appreciation of the honor conferred by the university, and so he decided to express it in terms of music. He will use an instrument of the seventeenth century, which he brought with him when he came to America.

ex-

who has traced the origin of pre-historic man to Central Asia, conferring on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Science.

FEB 25 1926

HONORARY DEGREE IS CONFERRED ON MUSIC CONDUCTOR

Providence, R. I., Feb. 25.—(AP)—Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, responded in the medium of his art, when Brown university conferred on him the honorary degree of doctor of music, Wednesday.

He received an ovation after playing with thrilling beauty upon a bass violin Handel's Largo and the Andante from his own concert, composed twenty years ago.

The university also honored Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer, who has traced the origin of prehistoric man to central Asia, conferring on Andrews the honorary degree of doctor of science.

---

co-

bass at a special convocation of Brown University, called to confer honorary degrees on M. Koussevitsky and Roy Champan Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor, M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso and he explained that because of his inability to speak the English language he had decided to express in music his appreciation of the honor conferred by the university. He will use an instrument dating from the seventeenth century which he brought with him to America.

Musician to Play "Bull Fiddle" As He Gets Degree

Providence, Feb. 24.—For the first time in America, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra will appear as a soloist today. He will play the double bass at a special convocation of Brown university, called to confer honorary degrees on M. Koussevitsky and Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor, M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso and he explained that because of his inability to speak the English language he had decided to express in music his appreciation of the honor conferred by the university. He will use an instrument dating from the 17th century which he brought with him to America.

Woolsey Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by its distinguished leader, Serge Koussevitsky, will be heard for a single concert. The event will mark the conclusion of the Steinert Concert Series for the present season, a series, which, by the way, has proven tremendously successful.

That the final offering is to be one of such magnitude as this great Hub City organization of 107 picked musicians bespeaks great praise for the booking ability of Mr. Steinert, under whose managerial direction the Yale School of Music offers the attractions.

Serge Koussevitsky, as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now holds the attention of America as a striking and unusal personality in the world of music. In Europe he is as prominent likewise, having conducted with great success last Summer his usual series of "Concerts Koussevitsky" in Paris, and his series as conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra.

FEB 27 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening made its fourth appearance of the season at Infantry Hall. Mr. Koussevitsky, at the conductor's desk after an absence of one concert, celebrated his return by brilliant leadership in a programme of violent contrast. Three numbers of more widely divergent style scarcely could be found.

Further interest in the evening's entertainment came in the appearance of the Russian composer-pianist, Serge Prokofieff, the first soloist to grace the present series. Mr. Prokofieff played his Third Concerto for piano and orchestra, the performance arousing the big audience to an unusually hearty demonstration.

This was the programme:

Vivaldi.
  Concerto in E-minor for String Orchestra
  (Edited by A. Mistovski.)
  Vigoroso.
  Largo.
  Allegro.
Prokofieff....Third Concerto for piano, op. 26
  Andante—Allegro.
  Theme—Andantino.
  Variation I. Listesso tempo.
  Variation II. Allegro.
  Variation III. Allegro moderato.
  Variation IV. Andante meditativo.
  Variation V. Allegro giusto.
  Theme. Listesso tempo.
  Allegro, ma non troppo.
Rimski-Korsakov.
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), op. 35.
  The Sea and Sindbad's Ship.
  The Story of the Kalandar Prince.
  The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
  Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces Against a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.

In these days when discordant modernist scores jar the ear such a work as the Vivaldi concerto in E-minor for string orchestra seems somewhat old fashioned. But it is real music, melodious and comparatively simple in structure, the kind we learned to love in our earlier years before it became the fashion to write "modern" music.

Vivaldi was a melodist like most Italians of his day and the concerto in E-minor is a good example of his style of writing. There is strength and vigor in its melodic flow, clever treatment of thematic material, and contrast is attained in surprising measure considering the limited means at his disposal. Mr. Koussevitzky discovered unsuspected possibilities in such straightforward, formal scores and perhaps Vivaldi himself would have been surprised to hear the work as played under the Russian's baton. There was delightfully finished phrasing, delicate adjustment of tone volume and together the strings sang as one, either in the gentle rise and fall of soft passages or the broad measures of fortissimo.

In absolute contrast to this opening number came the Prokofieff concerto. Its composer is a modernist and to judge by this example of his work nearly if not quite deserves the prefix "ultra." It is a concerto that undoubtedly would strike terror to the heart of a player less technically gifted than Mr. Prokofieff, who possesses tremendous energy and fingers of steel.

Upon the few occasions when the score permitted the solo instrument to appear alone he revealed a tone of singular purity and sweetness. But in the main the piano takes its place as a voice in the orchestral ensemble, a leading voice to be sure, but not in the sense of solo part with an accompaniment. There are, however, occasions when the soloist embellishes the orchestral harmony with florid runs and figure work of great brilliance.

The concerto is extremely modern in its general effect. Dissonance is never absent and the restless energy of the strange and ever changing harmonic tide keeps the listener in interested suspense. From beginning to end the work is filled with astonishing effects of instrumentation which make their appearance in rapid succession. Abrupt changes of tempo and rhythm also have a share in the surprises that greet the ear.

It would be interesting to know the inspiration of such a work. Is it a deliberate attempt to say something new in modern scoring? If so the composer has succeeded. And likewise he has been successful in creating a musical work that is of absorbing interest from the standpoint of technical mastery of orchestration. But such discordant creations are not for regular musical diet.

The Rimsky Korsakov Symphonic Poem, modern in a sense, came as a soothing summer breeze after the jarring disonances of the concerto. Here we have the Russian tone painter at his best. Perhaps in no other work has he set forth in his colorful style such truly descriptive music. One needs little imagination to follow the tales of Scheherazade. The solo violin throughout the several movements gives the theme which presents the narrator.

Mr. Brugin played this violin part with nice effect and the orchestra responded brilliantly to Conductor Koussevitzky's effective conception of the score.

A. F. F.

1—The first Symphony No. 6; "The Surprise," by Handn; Adadio Vivace Assai; Andante Menuetto Allegro di Malto; 2—Symphonic Paice, by Gilbert; Intermission; 3—Tone Poem don Juan Opus 28 Strauss; 4—Orchestra Fragments, from the ballad Daphnis and Chloe; second Suite Reveo; Dawn, Pantamon General Pance.

LISZT PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe — Feb 20

"Faust" Symphony and 13th Psalm Heard

Liszt's "A Faust Symphony," and his setting of the 13th Psalm for chorus, tenor solo and orchestra, filled yesterday's Symphony program. A mixed chorus from the Cecilia Society, trained by Malcolm Lang, and charles Stratton, tenor, assisted. In the finale for male chorus of Liszt's symphony members of other local choruses assisted, though the programs contained no mention of the fact.

The concert is of unusual length. One can enjoy more than two hours of nothing but Beethoven, Mozart, Bach, or Wagner. But when it comes to nothing but Liszt from 2:30 to 4:45 the pleasures of that composer's work, such as they are, begin to pall.

The setting of the 13th Psalm, which began the concert, has never been performed before in Boston. It was composed in 1855. The only American performance on record was given in New York in 1890. This is not music likely to please persons not already fervent worshippers of Liszt's work. Since it antedates Wagner's "Tristan" and "Ring" music, the Wagnerish harmonic changes and turns of melody must be accounted as evidence in favor of those who claim that Wagner learned a great deal from his prospective father-in-law.

But neither the pleadingly reiterated "How long, O Lord," of the theatrically gloomy opening section nor the final bombastic outburst, "I will sing unto the Lord, because He has dealt bountifully with me," succeed in stirring genuine emotion in the listener.

One could always see in one's mind's eye the familiar Liszt of the photographs saying to himself as he planned his effects, "That ought to make them sit up!"

Charles Stratton sang the tenor solo in this psalm with an obvious endeavor to use his voice as though it were a violoncello. It was an effective stage play, but one vastly preferred his wholly admirable singing of the solo in the finale of Liszt's familiar symphony.

Mr Stratton is notably the best tenor who has been assisting soloist with the Boston Symphony in a choral concert in the past 15 seasons. One doubts whether the older generation can recall his superior in this capacity. His singing was an outstanding feature of yesterday's concert.

Dr Muck made a dazzling success with Liszt's "A Faust Symphony" at the Symphony concerts a decade ago. Three performances in two seasons increased rather than diminished the impression his interpretation produced. Mr Monteux in a single performance failed to interest those who recalled Muck's version.

Mr Koussevitzky's interpretation was therefore awaited with not a little curiosity. It is individual, energetic, particularly effective at climaxes and in the two song themes in the "Gretchen" movement. The last movement yesterday held the attention throughout its somewhat needless lengths, but in the numerous repetitions and artistically superfluous pages of the other movements it was at times an effort of will to go on listening instead of dropping off into a day dream or a doze.

The audience applauded after each movement, and Mr Koussevitzky acknowledged this aplause, no doubt because except in name this music is not a symphony, but merely an unconnected series of tone pictures.

There is no need for rehashing all the old controversy about the merits and demerits of Liszt as a composer. His prodigious cleverness, his genuine gift of harmonic invention, his flair for orchestral effects, his ability to make a trifling melodic invention go a long way are undeniable.

But yesterday one thought of Byron. This symphony is in the vein of his "Manfred," equally hollow and artificial when it tries to be dramatic and when it tries to be sentimental. As in Byron's case only the irony, the empty mocking laughter of "Don Juan," of "Mephistopheles," the "spirit that denies," seems alive in this unromantic age.

It ought in fairness to be conceded that the final climax with the chorus and tenor hammering in the moral that "the eternal feminine bears us upward and onward" does stir the emo- [illegible] than suspects [illegible] ves not

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FREE PRESS
BURLINGTON, VT.

FEB 25 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra Conductor Appears as Soloist

Plays Bass Violin—Brown University Awards Him Honorary Degree

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 24. (AP)—Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra responded in the medium of his art when Brown University this afternoon conferred on him the honorary degree of doctor of music. He played with thrilling beauty upon a bass violin, Handel's Largo and the Andante from his own concert, composed some 20 years ago.

In conferring the degree upon M. Koussevitzky, President William H. P. Faunce spoke of him "as a distinguished virtuoso and interpreter of the music of all peoples; leader of concerts in London, Madrid, Barcelona and Warsaw, who has crossed the seas to convey to prosaic America some of his own ins[illegible]ht into the arts in the universal lang[illegible]e of music."

Visiting Day at Brown

Dame Nature smiled on Alma Mater yesterday, when a large company of graduates of Brown University returned for the annual Visiting Day, which is now a recognized institution on the Hill. There have been cold and sleety Visiting Days in the past, but yesterday was ideal and the visitors found their visit correspondingly agreeable.

Some of them came from the immediate neighborhood. Brown calls upon her sons and daughters in Providence, Pawtucket and other nearby cities and towns as inspectors and inspirers once a year. But many others made longer journeys to attend the various departmental meetings and to join in a common gathering at the Faculty Club to hear Dr. Faunce report upon the progress registered during the year, of the problems encountered and in some instances solved, and of the institution's hopes and desires for the future.

By no means the least interesting event of the day was the special convocation at Sayles Hall in the afternoon, when a great throng assembled for the conferring of honorary degrees upon M. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mr. Roy Chapman Andrews, who has made a distinguished name for himself by his scientific expeditions to all parts of the world and his extraordinary discoveries, particularly in the realm of archaeology. M. Koussevitzky bears one of the most honored names in contemporary music. He is a familiar figure in Providence, where he has directed many recent concerts, to the marked pleasure of large audiences. No other American university has granted him such an award as Brown bestowed upon him yesterday, a fact that gives special significance to his well-deserved degree. Fortunately, also, the degree he received fits his particular case,—something that cannot always be said of academic awards. The degree of doctor of laws, for examp [illegible] ently [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.

FEB 25 1926

BROWN HONORS KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony Conductor and Roy Chapman Andrews Given Honorary Degrees

ROVIDENCE, Feb. 24. (A. P)—pearing for the first time in this ntry as a soloist rather than a nductor, Serge Koussev'tzky, conctor of the Boston Spmphony orhestra, responded in the medium of is art when Brown university this afternoon conferred on him the honorary degree of doctor of music. He played with thrilling beauty upon a bass violin, "Handel's Largo and the Andante from his own concert, composed some 20 years ago.

The university also honored Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer who has traced the origin of prehistoric man to Central Asia, conferring on him the honorary degree of doctor of science.

Impressive exercises, paying gracious tribute to two men distinguishe in widely dverse fields and endeaco were held in Sayles hall, the university chapel.

In conferring the degree upon M Koussevitzky, President William H. P. Faunce spoke of him as "a distinguished virtuoso and interpreter of the music of all peoples; leader of concerts in London, Madrid, Barcelon and Warsaw, who has crossed th seas to convey to prosaic Americ some of his own insight into the art in the universal language of music

A ripple of applause greeted Dr Faunce's announcement that, "sine M. Koussevitzky does not desire to use our English tongue in public, he will respond in the language of musi which all can understand." A tremendous ovation was accorded the conductor's recital.

In his citation of Mr. Andrews, President Faunce said: "Roy Chapman Andrews, indefatigable studen and intrepid explorer, who has ma the dead past speak to the livin present and is making civilizati realize its youth and the vast achievments yet to come."

GILBERT'S MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe — Feb 27

First Performance of His "Symphonic Piece"

A new "Symphonic Piece" by Henry F. Gilbert, well known Boston composer was given its first performance anywhere at yesterday's Symphony concert. Mr Koussevitzky (who perhaps should now be called Dr Koussevitzky because of his honorary degree, received from Brown University this week) has changed the program from that announced in advance.

As actually played it begins with Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, and besides Mr Gilbert's music includes Strauss' "Don Juan," and the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe."

Yesterday's is one of the most attractive programs of the season, a familiar classic, an interesting novelty, and two notable modern works which can bear repeated hearings without sating one's curiosity. One wishes Mr Koussevitzky would more often follow the outlines of this program.

What one really wants to hear at these concerts is the great classics, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner and the rest; and important music of the 20th century. The work of minor living writers like Dukas and Glazunoff should be sparingly and infrequently performed.

Mr Gilbert has not given his new piece a title suggesting any event or literary work because "it aims to be a piece of absolute music, something of a rarity in these days of the overworked program idea—ornithological, botanical, or what not." It was written originally as the first movement of a symphony, but last Fall when Mr Gilbert finished it, friends persuaded him to let it be played as it stands.

In his illuminating program note Mr Gilbert gives an interesting statement of his artistic creed applicable to the new "Symphonic Piece."

"My constant aim, ever since beginning composition, has been to write some American music—i. e., some music which would not naturally have been written in any other country, and which should reflect, or express, certain aspects of the American character or spirit, felt by myself. That spirit, as I see it, is energetic, optimistic, nervous, impatient of restraint, and in its highest aspect, a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth, renascence of the human spirit which is America, is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration. Plenty of jingoism, vulgarity, and 'hurrah boys' attache [illegible]

tively and brilliantly with a verve that redeems the lack of concision, the often sprawling style, and the use of not a little banal material. Here as in no other orchestral music the actual America finds poetic utterances.

It was a great pleasure to listen to Haydn's charming familiar symphony again, in a graceful and spirited performance. One wishes Mr Koussevitzky turned oftener to the great 18th century masters and less often to the archaelogical relics of that era. He scants his audiences on Mozart and Haydn, for whom Vivaldi and Boccherini are poor substitutes.

The Koussevitzky of Strauss' "Don Juan" is too slow in the slow passages and a bit turgid at climaxes, but otherwise thrilling and satisfying. The Ravel suite, already played this season, again seemed a masterpiece with more breadth and depth than its composer is usually credited with.

The radio audience tonight should hear Haydn's lightly scored symphony well, and follow its simple tunes readily. The "Surprise," that gives the piece its English nickname, is a sudden loud chord in the second movement, after the entire theme has been played very softly. The story that Haydn put this chord in to wake up the slumbering old ladies in his original audience is appealing, but not well documented.

The other three pieces to be played are all of unusual brilliance and sonority, with salient passages for brass and wood wind which should be well transmitted. This is perhaps the most attractive of all the programs so far broadcast.

Next week's program as now planned includes Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, an unfamiliar concerto by Chausson for violin, pianoforte and orchestra, with Georges Enesco and Ernest Hutcheson as soloists, and modern pieces by Bloch, Hindemith, and Tailleferre.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

KOUSSEVITSKY PLAYS THANKS

Expresses Gratitude to Brown on Bass Violin. Andrews Speaks

Serge Koussevitsky expressed gratitude on a 17th century bass violin and Explorer Roy Chapman Andrews furnished verbal thanks for both the Russian composer and himself at a special convocation in Sayles Hall on the Brown University campus yesterday afternoon, when President William H. P. Faunce conferred honorary degrees on both notables in behalf of the university.

M. Koussevitsky, although he has been director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1921, was appearing as a soloist for the first time in America and he held his audience in complete captivation.

In conferring a Doctor of Science degree on Mr. Andrews, president Faunce said: "Roy Chapman Andrews, indefatigable student and intrepid explorer, who has made the dead past speak to the living present and is making civilization realize its youth and the vast achievements yet to come."

The impressive ceremonies attended by hundreds of alumni, faculty members and undergraduates, in addition to many representatives of the general public in non-academic walks of life, were preceded by an academic procession from University Hall.

M. Koussevitsky, who was introduced by Albert Scott Lyon of the Brown board of fellows was called "a distinguished virtuoso" by President Faunce, who in conferring a Doctor of Music degree further referred to the composer as "an interpreter of the music of all peoples; leader of concerts in London, Madrid, Barcelona and Warsaw, who has crossed the seas to convey to prosaic America some of his own insight into the arts in the universal language of music."

Outlining the career of Mr. Andrews, Dr. Herman Carey Bumpus of the board of fellows stated that the explorer had been engaged in scientific research since the age of 24, when, he said, Mr. Andrews began the study of marine life in the most remote part of the Atlantic nd Pacific.

Dr. Bumpus referred to the explorer's 912 achievement in following the Yellow river from its source in Korea to the sea and said that Mr. Andrews would again leave for China, where he will organize the fourth expedition of the American Museum of Natural History into the Gobi Des[illegible] for a new search into that wilder[illegible] [illegible] early human re-

---

SYMPHONY GIVES 17TH CONCERT

Herald — Feb 27

Brilliant Performance of Gilbert, Haydn and Strauss

"DON JUAN" PLAYED MOST ELOQUENTLY

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Haydn, Symphony, G-major, "The Surprise"; Gilbert, Symphonic Piece (first performance); Strauss, Tone Poem, "Don Juan"; Ravel, Second Suite from "Daphnis and Chloe."

Seeking inspiration for his symphonic poem, Mr. Gilbert did not go to Greece or Scandinavia. He did not hunt for a myth; he did not dream of sketching the tonal character of Machiavelli, Oliv Cromwell, or Catherine of Russia; was far from his thought to paint tones Sahara or the Aurora Borealis.

As an American he wished to express the spirit of his countrymen a they rush, shout, and also sentimentalize. He understands the vulgarit with the amazing energy of many captains of industry; of the suddenly rich even of the flamboyant profiteers. H has heard the boasting; he is aware o the spread-eagleism that endears us t older and foreign nations. He woul charge his music with this America spirit, realizing the might and the goodness that lie underneath the surface If he can hurrah in music, so too h can set forth the curious sentimentalism, which is a characteristic of ou people.

The born melodist among Americans, he greatest natural melodist we have had, was Stephen C. Foster. His airs were for many years this nation's folk songs (for there are even in 1926 other Americans than negroes, creoles, and hat copper-colored race which once uled this land). The words of Foster's ongs were at times maudlin in their entimentalism. The women of whom he ang were borne at an early age to their ast resting place. His favorite trees vere the cypress and the weeping wilbw. But in the best of his melodies, and he best are many, Foster was not naudlin. They were of an appealing incerity. A sincerity, haunting, without he taint of affectation.

In his song-theme of the "Symphonic Piece," Mr. Gilbert remembered Foster's simple art, and, without distressng imitation, he wrote in Foster's vein, ot forgetting a couple of bars from hat fine old ditty, "The Arkansaw Traveler." With this exception there is no uggestion of folk-song.

As many of us delight in Walt Whitman's "barbaric yawp," knowing is conscientiousness as an artist which ed him to constant filing and revision, o we exult in this hilarious, screaming, xciting outburst of Mr. Gilbert's rugged fuse. No one but an American, reardless of traditions, free from Euroean influence and academic conventionalism, could have written this music. Let no one think for a moment hat it is only an attempt to express the ge of Jazz. There is much more than hythmic eccentricity. Here is no gloried cake-walk. There is no unbending f scholastic dignity merely to please hose whose only interest is in heelnd-toe rhythm and stimulating noise. Here is a musical expression of a naion's spirit. Mr. Gilbert knew what he rished to do and he has done it adairably.

Mr.—or shall we now say Dr.?—Koussevitzky, heartily welcomed, as if the audience rejoiced in the honor paid him this week by Brown University, conducted the "Symphonic Piece" with infinite gusto. He emphasized the defiant opening and following measures; he did not put too much stress on the episodes of charming sentiment. The audience was enthusiastic. Mr. Gilbert was called to the platform several times.

It was a brilliant concert throughout. Haydn's Symphony was delightfully interpreted. Familiar as it is to players and hearers, by the performance it was as fresh, with the exceptions of the period's formulas, as if it were of today. Mr. Koussevitzky's taste and art were especially displayed in his treatment of the Andante. The lively movements, and they should be lively, tested technical proficiency.

Strauss's "Don Juan" was read and played in a most eloquent manner, whether the pages were those portraying the rake-helly hero or the sensuous sections picturing [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST STANDARD
SYRACUSE, N. Y.

182

FEB 25 1926

BROWN CONFERS TWO HONORARY DEGREES

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 24. (AP)—Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, responded in the medium of his art when Brown university this afternoon conferred on him the honorary degree of doctor of music. He received an ovation after playing with thrilling beauty upon a bass viol. Handel's Largo and the Andante from his own concerto, composed some 20 years ago.

The university also honored Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer who has traced the origin of prehistoric man to Central Asia, conferring on him the honorary degree of doctor of science.

Mother of 14 Has Third Set of Twins

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y., Feb. 26 AP)—Mrs. Antonio Vislo of this city became the mother of twins today for the third time. She has been married 16 years and has had 14 children, all but two of whom are living.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

FEB 25 1926

Two Honorary Degrees.

Brown University honored itself as well as two distinguished men when it conferred degrees upon M. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and upon Mr. Roy Chapman Andrews, explorer and scientist, in Sayles Hall yesterday afternoon. Brown has been unusually discriminating in its choice of men to be honored, and the addition of M. Koussevitsky and Mr. Andrews continues a splendid tradition.

It was especially gracious of M. Koussevitsky, as an expression of pleasure and gratitude in receiving the honor, to give selections from his own works on the double bass, familiarly known as the "bull fiddle." M. Koussevitsky, a Russian, knows no English, and he would not speak to the audience in French. He, therefore, sounded his thanks upon the thick strings of the double bass. It was his first appearance as a soloist in America. In Europe he is known as the master of the double bass. We usually associate this instrument with accompaniment, but under the genius of the Russian it became a medium of great individual beauty. Brown has articulated for the people of Providence the pleasure which M. Koussevitsky has given us with the Boston Symphony during the past two seasons, and he responded graciously.

Mr. Andrews's explorations and scientific research have made his name familiar. He has brought to the modern world an appreciation and understanding of civilization and cultures that have been buried by the inexorable passing of the years. He joins a list of other distinguished scientists who have been honored by Brown.

PHONY

Orchestra last appearance of
all. Mr. Kous-
s desk after an celebrated his ship in a pro-
t. Three numlivergent style

vening's enterearance of the Serge Proko-ce the present
yed his Third orchestra, the big audience to nstration.
e:

String Orchestra
ovski.)

r piano, op. 26

" (after "The
"), op. 35.

nce.
ng Princess.
a. The Ship
k Surmounted nclusion.

ant modern-work as the
for string fashioned.
s and com-
, the kind arlier years to write

most Italerto in Eis style of nd vigor in ent of the-
is attained dering the posal. Mr.
pected pos-ard, formal mself would he work as
ton. There sing, deli-me and to-one, either
f soft pass of fortis-

his opening oncerto. Its to judge by early if not tra." It is would strike
er less techkofleff, who and fingers

en the score
t to appear singular purhe main the voice in the

LISZT PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe — Feb 20

"Faust" Symphony and 13th Psalm Heard

Liszt's "A Faust Symphony," and his setting of the 13th Psalm for chorus, tenor solo and orchestra, filled yesterday's Symphony program. A mixed chorus from the Cecilia Society, trained by Malcolm Lang, and charles Stratton, tenor, assisted. In the finale for male chorus of Liszt's symphony members of other local choruses assisted, though the programs contained no mention of the fact.

The concert is of unusual length. One can enjoy more than two hours of nothing but Beethoven, Mozart, Bach, or Wagner. But when it comes to nothing but Liszt from 2:30 to 4:45 the pleasures of that composer's work, such as they are, begin to pall.

The setting of the 13th Psalm, which began the concert, has never been performed before in Boston. It was composed in 1855. The only American performance on record was given in New York in 1890. This is not music likely to please persons not already fervent worshippers of Liszt's work. Since it antedates Wagner's "Tristan" and "King" music, the Wagnerish harmonic changes and turns of melody must be accounted as evidence in favor of those who claim that Wagner learned a great deal from his prospective father-in-law.

But neither the pleadingly reiterated "How long, O Lord," of the theatrically gloomy opening section nor the final bombastic outburst, "I will sing unto the Lord, because He has dealt bountifully with me," succeed in stirring genuine emotion in the listener.

One could always see in one's mind's eye the familiar Liszt of the photographs saying to himself as he planned his effects, "That ought to make them sit up!"

Charles Stratton sang the tenor solo in this psalm with an obvious endeavor to use his voice as though it were a violoncello. It was an effective stage play, but one vastly preferred his wholly admirable singing of the solo in the finale of Liszt's familiar symphony.

Mr Stratton is notably the best tenor who has been assisting soloist with the Boston Symphony in a choral concert in the past 15 seasons. One doubts whether the older generation can recall his superior in this capacity. His singing was an outstanding feature of yesterday's concert.

Dr Muck made a dazzling success with Liszt's "A Faust Symphony" at the Symphony concerts a decade ago. Three performances in two seasons increased rather than diminished the impression his interpretation produced. Mr Monteux in a single performance failed to interest those who recalled Muck's version.

Mr Koussevitzky's interpretation was therefore awaited with not a little curiosity. It is individual, energetic, particularly effective at climaxes and in the two song themes in the "Gretchen" movement. The last movement yesterday held the attention throughout its somewhat needless lengths, but in the numerous repetitions and artistically superfluous pages of the other movements it was at times an effort of will to go on listening instead of dropping off into a day dream or a doze.

The audience applauded after each movement, and Mr Koussevitzky acknowledged this aplause, no doubt because except in name this music is not a symphony, but merely an unconnected series of tone pictures.

There is no need for rehashing all the old controversy about the merits and demerits of Liszt as a composer. His prodigious cleverness, his genuine gift of harmonic invention, his flair for orchestral effects, his ability to make a trifling melodic invention go a long way are undeniable.

But yesterday one thought of Byron. This symphony is in the vein of his "Manfred," equally hollow and artificial when it tries to be dramatic and when it tries to be sentimental. As in Byron's cane only the irony, the empty mocking laughter of "Don Juan," of "Mephistopheles," the "spirit that denies," seems alive in this unromantic age.

It ought in fairness to be conceded that the final climax with the chorus and tenor hammering in the moral that "the eternal feminine bears us upward and onward" does stir the emo- [illegible] more than suspects [illegible] ves not

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FREE PRESS
BURLINGTON, VT.

2 5 19

Boston Symphony Orchestra Conductor Appears as Soloist

Plays Bass Violin—Brown University Awards Him Honorary Degree

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 24. (AP)—Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra responded in the medium of his art when Brown University this afternoon conferred on him the honorary degree of doctor of music. He played with thrilling beauty upon a bass violin, Handel's Largo and the Andante from his own concert, composed some 20 years ago.

In conferring the degree upon M. Koussevitzky, President William H. P. Faunce spoke of him "as a distinguished virtuoso and interpreter of the music of all peoples; leader of concerts in London, Madrid, Barcelona and Warsaw, who has crossed the seas to convey to prosaic America some of his own insight into the arts in the universal language of music."

Visiting Day at Brown

Dame Nature smiled on Alma Mater yesterday, when a large company of graduates of Brown University returned for the annual Visiting Day, which is now a recognized institution on the Hill. There have been cold and sleety Visiting Days in the past, but yesterday was ideal and the visitors found their visit correspondingly agreeable.

Some of them came from the immediate neighborhood. Brown calls upon her sons and daughters in Providence, Pawtucket and other nearby cities and towns as inspectors and inspirers once a year. But many others made longer journeys to attend the various departmental meetings and to join in a common gathering at the Faculty Club to hear Dr. Faunce report upon the progress registered during the year, of the problems encountered and in some instances solved, and of the institution's hopes and desires for the future.

By no means the least interesting event of the day was the special convocation at Sayles Hall in the afternoon, when a great throng assembled for the conferring of honorary degrees upon M. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mr. Roy Chapman Andrews, who has made a distinguished name for himself by his scientific expeditions to all parts of the world and his extraordinary discoveries, particularly in the realm of archaeology. M. Koussevitzky bears one of the most honored names in contemporary music. He is a familiar figure in Providence, where he has directed many recent concerts, to the marked pleasure of large audiences. No other American university has granted him such an award as Brown bestowed upon him yesterday, a fact that gives special significance to his well-deserved degree. Fortunately, also, the degree he received fits his particular case,—something that cannot always be said of academic awards. The degree of doctor of laws, for example, [illegible] ently [illegible] ose [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.

FEB 2 5 1926

BROWN HONORS KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony Conductor and Roy Chapman Andrews Given Honorary Degrees

PROVIDENCE, Feb. 24. (A. P.)—Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussev'tzky, conductor of the Boston Spmphony orchestra, responded in the medium of his art when Brown university this afternoon conferred on him the honorary degree of doctor of music. He played with thrilling beauty upon a bass violin, "Handel's Largo and the Andante from his own concert, composed some 20 years ago.

The university also honored Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer who has traced the origin of prehistoric man to Central Asia, conferring on him the honorary degree of doctor of science.

Impressive exercises, paying gracious tribute to two men distinguished in widely dverse fields and endeavor were held in Sayles hall, the university chapel.

In conferring the degree upon M. Koussevitzky, President William H. P. Faunce spoke of him as "a distinguished virtuoso and interpreter of the music of all peoples; leader of concerts in London, Madrid, Barcelona and Warsaw, who has crossed the seas to convey to prosaic America some of his own insight into the art in the universal language of music."

A ripple of applause greeted Dr. Faunce's announcement that, "since M. Koussevitzky does not desire to use our English tongue in public, he will respond in the language of music which all can understand." A tremendous ovation was accorded the conductor's recital.

In his citation of Mr. Andrews, President Faunce said: "Roy Chapman Andrews, indefatigable student and intrepid explorer who has made the dead past speak to the living present and is making civilization realize its youth and the vast achievements yet to come."

GILBERT'S MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe — Feb 27

First Performance of His "Symphonic Piece"

A new "Symphonic Piece" by Henry F. Gilbert, well known Boston composer was given its first performance anywhere at yesterday's Symphony concert. Mr Koussevitzky (who perhaps should now be called Dr Koussevitzky because of his honorary degree, received from Brown University this week) has changed the program from that announced in advance.

As actually played it begins with Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, and besides Mr Gilbert's music includes Strauss' "Don Juan," and the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe."

Yesterday's is one of the most attractive programs of the season, a familiar classic, an interesting novelty, and two notable modern works which can bear repeated hearings without sating one's curiosity. One wishes Mr Koussevitzky would more often follow the outlines of this program.

What one really wants to hear at these concerts is the great classics, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner and the rest; and important music of the 20th century. The work of minor living writers like Dukas and Glazunoff should be sparingly and infrequently performed.

Mr Gilbert has not given his new piece a title suggesting any event or literary work because "it aims to be a piece of absolute music, something of a rarity in these days of the overworked program idea—ornithological, botanical, or what not." It was written originally as the first movement of a symphony, but last Fall when Mr Gilbert finished it, friends persuaded him to let it be played as it stands.

In his illuminating program note Mr Gilbert gives an interesting statement of his artistic creed applicable to the new "Symphonic Piece."

"My constant aim, ever since beginning composition, has been to write some American music—i. e., some music which would not naturally have been written in any other country, and which should reflect, or express, certain aspects of the American character or spirit, felt by myself. That spirit, as I see it, is energetic, optimistic, nervous, impatient of restraint, and in its highest aspect, a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth, renascence of the human spirit which is America, is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration. Plenty of jingoism, vulgarity, and 'hurrah boys' attache[illegible]

tively and brilliantly with a verve that redeems the lack of concision, the often sprawling style, and the use of not a little banal material. Here as in no other orchestral music the actual America finds poetic utterances.

It was a great pleasure to listen to Haydn's charming familiar symphony again, in a graceful and spirited performance. One wishes Mr Koussevitzky turned oftener to the great 18th century masters and less often to the archaelogical relics of that era. He scants his audiences on Mozart and Haydn, for whom Vivaldi and Boccherini are poor substitutes.

The Koussevitzky of Strauss' "Don Juan" is too slow in the slow passages and a bit turgid at climaxes, but otherwise thrilling and satisfying. The Ravel suite, already played this season, again seemed a masterpiece with more breadth and depth than its composer is usually credited with.

The radio audience tonight should hear Haydn's lightly scored symphony well, and follow its simple tunes readily. The "Surprise," that gives the piece its English nickname, is a sudden loud chord in the second movement, after the entire theme has been played very softly. The story that Haydn put this chord in to wake up the slumbering old ladies in his original audience is appealing, but not well documented.

The other three pieces to be played are all of unusual brilliance and sonority, with salient passages for brass and wood wind which should be well transmitted. This is perhaps the most attractive of all the programs so far broadcast.

Next week's program as now planned includes Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, an unfamiliar concerto by Chausson for violin, pianoforte and orchestra, with Georges Enesco and Ernest Hutcheson as soloists, and modern pieces by Bloch, Hindemith, and Tailleferre.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

KOUSSEVITSKY PLAYS THANKS

Expresses Gratitude to Brown on Bass Violin. Andrews Speaks

Serge Koussevitsky expressed gratitude on a 17th century bass violin and Explorer Roy Chapman Andrews furnished verbal thanks for both the Russian composer and himself at a special convocation in Sayles Hall on the Brown University campus yesterday afternoon, when President William H. P. Faunce conferred honorary degrees on both notables in behalf of the university.

M. Koussevitsky, although he has been director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1924, was appearing as a soloist for the first time in America and he held his audience in complete captivation.

In conferring a Doctor of Science degree on Mr. Andrews, president Faunce said: "Roy Chapman Andrews, indefatigable student and intrepid explorer, who has made the dead past speak to the living present and is making civilization realize its youth and the vast achievements yet to come."

The impressive ceremonies attended by hundreds of alumni, faculty members and undergraduates, in addition to many representatives of the general public in non-academic walks of life, were preceded by an academic procession from University Hall.

M. Koussevitsky, who was introduced by Albert Scott Lyon of the Brown board of fellows was called "a distinguished virtuoso" by President Faunce, who in conferring a Doctor of Music degree further referred to the composer as "an interpreter of the music of all peoples; leader of concerts in London, Madrid, Barcelona and Warsaw, who has crossed the seas to convey to prosaic America some of his own insight into the arts in the universal language of music."

Outlining the career of Mr. Andrews, Dr. Herman Carey Bumpus of the board of fellows stated that the explorer had been engaged in scientific research since the age of 21, when, he said, Mr. Andrews began the study of marine life in the most remote part of the Atlantic and Pacific.

Dr. Bumpus referred to the explorer's 1912 achievement in following the Yellow river from its source in Korea to the sea and said that Mr. Andrews would again leave for China, where he will organize the fourth expedition of the American Museum of Natural History into the Gobi Desert for a new search into that wilder[illegible] it [illegible] early human re-

---

SYMPHONY GIVES 17TH CONCERT

Herald — Feb 27

Brilliant Performance of Gilbert, Haydn and Strauss

"DON JUAN" PLAYED MOST ELOQUENTLY

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Haydn, Symphony, G-major, "The Surprise"; Gilbert, Symphonic Piece (first performance); Strauss, Tone Poem, "Don Juan"; Ravel, Second Suite from "Daphnis and Chloe."

Seeking inspiration for his symphonic poem, Mr. Gilbert did not go to Greece or Scandinavia. He did not hunt for a myth; he did not dream of sketching the tonal character of Machiavelli, Oliv[illegible] Cromwell, or Catherine of Russia; [illegible] was far from his thought to paint [illegible] tones Sahara or the Aurora Borealis.

As an American he wished to express the spirit of his countrymen a[illegible] they rush, shout, and also sentimentalize. He understands the vulgarit[illegible] with the amazing energy of many captains of industry; of the suddenly rich even of the flamboyant profiteers. He has heard the boasting; he is aware of the spread-eagleism that endears us to older and foreign nations. He would charge his music with this American spirit, realizing the might and the goodness that lie underneath the surface. If he can hurrah in music, so too he can set forth the curious sentimentalism, which is a characteristic of our people.

The born melodist among Americans, the greatest natural melodist we have had, was Stephen C. Foster. His airs were for many years this nation's folk songs (for there are even in 1926 other Americans than negroes, creoles, and that copper-colored race which once ruled this land). The words of Foster's songs were at times maudlin in their sentimentalism. The women of whom he sang were borne at an early age to their last resting place. His favorite trees were the cypress and the weeping willow. But in the best of his melodies, and the best are many, Foster was not maudlin. They were of an appealing sincerity. A sincerity, haunting, without the taint of affectation.

In his song-theme of the "Symphonic Piece," Mr. Gilbert remembered Foster's simple art, and, without distressing imitation, he wrote in Foster's vein, not forgetting a couple of bars from that fine old ditty, "The Arkansaw Traveler." With this exception there is no suggestion of folk-song.

As many of us delight in Walt Whitman's "barbaric yawp," knowing his conscientiousness as an artist which led him to constant filing and revision, so we exult in this hilarious, screaming, exciting outburst of Mr. Gilbert's rugged muse. No one but an American, regardless of traditions, free from European influence and academic conventionalism, could have written this music. Let no one think for a moment that it is only an attempt to express the age of Jazz. There is much more than rhythmic eccentricity. Here is no glorified cake-walk. There is no unbending of scholastic dignity merely to please those whose only interest is in heel-and-toe rhythm and stimulating noise. Here is a musical expression of a nation's spirit. Mr. Gilbert knew what he wished to do and he has done it admirably.

Mr.—or shall we now say Dr.?—Koussevitzky, heartily welcomed, as if the audience rejoiced in the honor paid him this week by Brown University, conducted the "Symphonic Piece" with infinite gusto. He emphasized the defiant opening and following measures; he did not put too much stress on the episodes of charming sentiment. The audience was enthusiastic. Mr. Gilbert was called to the platform several times.

It was a brilliant concert throughout. Haydn's Symphony was delightfully interpreted. Familiar as it is to players and hearers, by the performance it was as fresh, with the exceptions of the period's formulas, as if it were of today. Mr. Koussevitzky's taste and art were especially displayed in his treatment of the Andante. The lively movements, and they should be lively, tested technical proficiency.

Strauss's "Don Juan" was read and played in a most eloquent manner, whether the pages were those portraying the rake-helly hero or the sensuous sections picturing [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST STANDARD
SYRACUSE, N. Y.

182

FEB 2 5 1926

BROWN CONFERS TWO HONORARY DEGREES

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 24. (AP)—Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, responded in the medium of his art when Brown university this afternoon conferred on him the honorary degree of doctor of music. He received an ovation after playing with thrilling beauty upon a bass viol, Handel's Largo and the Andante from his own concerto, composed some 20 years ago.

The university also honored Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer who has traced the origin of prehistoric man to Central Asia, conferring on him the honorary degree of doctor of science.

Mother of 14 Has Third Set of Twins

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y., Feb. 26 AP)—Mrs. Antonio Visio of this city became the mother of twins today for the third time. She has been married 16 years and has had 14 children, all but two of whom are living.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

FEB 2

Two Honorary Degrees.

Brown University honored itself as well as two distinguished men when it conferred degrees upon M. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and upon Mr. Roy Chapman Andrews, explorer and scientist, in Sayles Hall yesterday afternoon. Brown has been unusually discriminating in its choice of men to be honored, and the addition of M. Koussevitzky and Mr. Andrews continues a splendid tradition.

It was especially gracious of M. Koussevitsky, as an expression of pleasure and gratitude in receiving the honor, to give selections from his own works on the double bass, familiarly known as the "bull fiddle." M. Koussevitsky, a Russian, knows no English, and he would not speak to the audience in French. He, therefore, sounded his thanks upon the thick strings of the double bass. It was his first appearance as a soloist in America. In Europe he is known as the master of the double bass. We usually associate this instrument with accompaniment, but under the genius of the Russian it became a medium of great individual beauty. Brown has articulated for the people of Providence the pleasure which M. Koussevitsky has given us with the Boston Symphony during the past two seasons, and he responded graciously.

Mr. Andrews's explorations and scientific research have made his name familiar. He has brought to the modern world an appreciation and understanding of civilization and cultures that have been buried by the inexorable passing of the years. He joins a list of other distinguished scientists who have been honored by Brown.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

LISZT PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe — Feb 20

"Faust" Symphony and 13th Psalm Heard

Liszt's "A Faust Symphony," and his setting of the 13th Psalm for chorus, tenor solo and orchestra, filled yesterday's Symphony program. A mixed chorus from the Cecilia Society, trained by Malcolm Lang, and charles Stratton, tenor, assisted. In the finale for male chorus of Liszt's symphony members of other local choruses assisted, though the programs contained no mention of the fact.

The concert is of unusual length. One can enjoy more than two hours of nothing but Beethoven, Mozart, Bach, or Wagner. But when it comes to nothing but Liszt from 2:30 to 4:45 the pleasures of that composer's work, such as they are, begin to pall.

The setting of the 13th Psalm, which began the concert, has never been performed before in Boston. It was composed in 1855. The only American performance on record was given in New York in 1890. This is not music likely to please persons not already fervent worshippers of Liszt's work. Since it antedates Wagner's "Tristan" and "Ring" music, the Wagnerish harmonic changes and turns of melody must be accounted as evidence in favor of those who claim that Wagner learned a great deal from his prospective father-in-law.

But neither the pleadingly reiterated "How long, O Lord," of the theatrically gloomy opening section nor the final bombastic outburst, "I will sing unto the Lord, because He has dealt bountifully with me," succeed in stirring genuine emotion in the listener.

One could always see in one's mind's eye the familiar Liszt of the photographs saying to himself as he planned his effects, "That ought to make them sit up!"

Charles Stratton sang the tenor solo in this psalm with an obvious endeavor to use his voice as though it were a violoncello. It was an effective stage play, but one vastly preferred his wholly admirable singing of the solo in the finale of Liszt's familiar symphony.

Mr Stratton is notably the best tenor who has been assisting soloist with the Boston Symphony in a choral concert in the past 15 seasons. One doubts whether the older generation can recall his superior in this capacity. His singing was an outstanding feature of yesterday's concert.

Dr Muck made a dazzling success with Liszt's "A Faust Symphony" at the Symphony concerts a decade ago. Three performances in two seasons increased rather than diminished the impression his interpretation produced. Mr Monteux in a single performance failed to interest those who recalled Muck's version.

Mr Koussevitzky's interpretation was therefore awaited with not a little curiosity. It is individual, energetic, particularly effective at climaxes and in the two song themes in the "Gretchen" movement. The last movement yesterday held the attention throughout its somewhat needless lengths, but in the numerous repetitions and artistically superfluous pages of the other movements it was at times an effort of will to go on listening instead of dropping off into a day dream or a doze.

The audience applauded after each movement, and Mr Koussevitzky acknowledged this aplause, no doubt because except in name this music is not a symphony, but merely an unconnected series of tone pictures.

There is no need for rehashing all the old controversy about the merits and demerits of Liszt as a composer. His prodigious cleverness, his genuine gift of harmonic invention, his flair for orchestral effects, his ability to make a trifling melodic invention go a long way are undeniable.

But yesterday one thought of Byron. This symphony is in the vein of his "Manfred," equally hollow and artificial when it tries to be dramatic and when it tries to be sentimental. As in Byron's cane only the irony, the empty mocking laughter of "Don Juan," of "Mephistopheles," the "spirit that denies," seems alive in this unromantic age.

It ought in fairness to be conceded that the final climax with the chorus and tenor hammering in the moral that "the eternal feminine bears us upward and onward" does stir the emotions, even if one more than suspects the emotion to be from the nerves, not from the heart.

The radio audience tonight, if the choral portion of the concert is well transmitted, should enjoy the last part of the last movement of the symphony the most. The slow movement, especially the theme for oboe solo near the beginning, should also prove attractive. The point of the third movement will be lost unless one recalls the themes of the earlier movements, which are here mercilessly parodied. Mr Stratton's voice ought to come through well both in the Psalm and in the finale.

Next week's program is entirely filled with unfamiliar music by present day composers, Glazunov's "Middle Ages," Dukas' Symphony in C major, the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" and a new "Symphonic Piece" by Henry F. Gilbert of Cambridge, long well-known here as a composer with individuality of style and variety of mood.

Mr Gilbert will lecture at the Boston Public Library Thursday, Feb 25, at 5, on this program, including his own work.

P. R.

Visiting Day at Brown

Dame Nature smiled on Alma Mater yesterday, when a large company of graduates of Brown University returned for the annual Visiting Day, which is now a recognized institution on the Hill. There have been cold and sleety Visiting Days in the past, but yesterday was ideal and the visitors found their visit correspondingly agreeable.

Some of them came from the immediate neighborhood. Brown calls upon her sons and daughters in Providence, Pawtucket and other nearby cities and towns as inspectors and inspirers once a year. But many others made longer journeys to attend the various departmental meetings and to join in a common gathering at the Faculty Club to hear Dr. Faunce report upon the progress registered during the year, of the problems encountered and in some instances solved, and of the institution's hopes and desires for the future.

By no means the least interesting event of the day was the special convocation at Sayles Hall in the afternoon, when a great throng assembled for the conferring of honorary degrees upon M. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mr. Roy Chapman Andrews, who has made a distinguished name for himself by his scientific expeditions to all parts of the world and his extraordinary discoveries, particularly in the realm of archaeology. M. Koussevitzky bears one of the most honored names in contemporary music. He is a familiar figure in Providence, where he has directed many recent concerts, to the marked pleasure of large audiences. No other American university has granted him such an award as Brown bestowed upon him yesterday, a fact that gives special significance to his well-deserved degree. Fortunately, also, the degree he received fits his particular case,—something that cannot always be said of academic awards. The degree of doctor of laws, for example, has frequently been employed to honor men whose recognition might better have come in some such form as that of "doctor of achievement," though that itself is perhaps an awkward and inadequate phrase. But in the case of a great musician like M. Koussevitzky, the degree of doctor of music is of course exactly right.

The degree of doctor of science, bestowed on Mr. Andrews, is equally appropriate. He has earned for himself a great reputation in scientific research. President Faunce's characterization of his fame emphasized this point, as his citation of M. Koussevitzky did also the case of the Russian conductor. Altogether it was a very pleasant occa at Brown. May there be many others.

time in this rather than a vitzky con

ealing in huge sums of money.
"The president of such a corporaion usually has a board of directors ho are, first, very heavily interested their own financial behalf—men long and wide experience in busi-
s. It is composed—this board very few men, rarely more than zen. The financial statements e business are before them, comto the day of the last precedthem it is made ap-

M. Koussevitzky ... re use our English tongue in public, h will respond in the language of musi which all can understand." A tremendous ovation was accorded the conductor's recital.

In his citation of Mr. Andrews, President Faunce said: "Roy Chapman Andrews, indefatigable studen and intrepid explorer who has ma the dead past speak to the livi present and is making civilizati realize its youth and the vast achiev ments yet to come."

GILBERT'S MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe — Feb 27

First Performance of His "Symphonic Piece"

A new "Symphonic Piece" by Henry F. Gilbert, well known Boston composer was given its first performance anywhere at yesterday's Symphony concert. Mr Koussevitzky (who perhaps should now be called Dr Koussevitzky because of his honorary degree, received from Brown University this week) has changed the program from that announced in advance.

As actually played it begins with Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, and besides Mr Gilbert's music includes Strauss' "Don Juan," and the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe."

Yesterday's is one of the most attractive programs of the season, a familiar classic, an interesting novelty, and two notable modern works which can bear repeated hearings without sating one's curiosity. One wishes Mr Koussevitzky would more often follow the outlines of this program.

What one really wants to hear at these concerts is the great classics, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner and the rest; and important music of the 20th century. The work of minor living writers like Dukas and Glazunoff should be sparingly and infrequently performed.

Mr Gilbert has not given his new piece a title suggesting any event or literary work because "it aims to be a piece of absolute music, something of a rarity in these days of the overworked program idea—ornithological, botanical, or what not." It was written originally as the first movement of a symphony, but last Fall when Mr Gilbert finished it, friends persuaded him to let it be played as it stands.

In his illuminating program note Mr Gilbert gives an interesting statement of his artistic creed applicable to the new "Symphonic Piece."

"My constant aim, ever since beginning composition, has been to write some American music—i. e., some music which would not naturally have been written in any other country, and which should reflect, or express, certain aspects of the American character or spirit, felt by myself. That spirit, as I see it, is energetic, optimistic, nervous, impatient of restraint, and in its highest aspect, a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth, renascence of the human spirit which is America, is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration. Plenty of jingoism, vulgarity, and 'hurrah boys' attaches to it, but the spirit of the new birth underlies all. Some of this American mood I have tried to reflect in my composition."

Mr Gilbert has in truth here written obstreperous, buoyant music, with a first theme which recalls Whitman's phrase about his verse, "my barbaric yawp," and a second frankly melodious and genuinely sentimental theme, which, as Mr Gilbert himself notes, "has a slight Fosterian twang." It contains, as he says, "a remote suggestion of 'Old Folks at Home,' interspersed with a couple of measures from 'The Arkansas Traveler,'" but no other "folk suggestions," to borrow his phrase.

This "Symphonic Piece," admirably performed by Mr Koussevitzky and the orchestra and applauded with not a little warmth by the audience, seemed yesterday one of the very few really significant and interesting orchestral works yet written by an American. A complete list of such works knows to the writer would include only Griffes' "Khubla Khan," Schelling's "A Victory Ball," Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," Chadwick's "Melpomene Overture," Copland's "Music for the Theatre" and now Gilbert's "Symphonic Piece."

Mr Gilbert has here written imaginatively and brilliantly with a verve that redeems the lack of concision, the often sprawling style, and the use of not a little banal material. Here as in no other orchestral music the actual America finds poetic utterances.

It was a great pleasure to listen to Haydn's charming familiar symphony again, in a graceful and spirited performance. One wishes Mr Koussevitzky turned oftener to the great 18th century masters and less often to the archaelogical relics of that era. He scants his audiences on Mozart and Haydn, for whom Vivaldi and Boccherini are poor substitutes.

The Koussevitzky of Strauss' "Don Juan" is too slow in the slow passages and a bit turgid at climaxes, but otherwise thrilling and satisfying. The Ravel suite, already played this season, again seemed a masterpiece with more breadth and depth than its composer is usually credited with.

The radio audience tonight should hear Haydn's lightly scored symphony well, and follow its simple tunes readily. The "Surprise," that gives the piece its English nickname, is a sudden loud chord in the second movement, after the entire theme has been played very softly. The story that Haydn put this chord in to wake up the slumbering old ladies in his original audience is appealing, but not well documented.

The other three pieces to be played are all of unusual brilliance and sonority, with salient passages for brass and wood wind which should be well transmitted. This is perhaps the most attractive of all the programs so far broadcast.

Next week's program as now planned includes Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, an unfamiliar concerto by Chausson for violin, pianoforte and orchestra, with Georges Enesco and Ernest Hutcheson as soloists, and modern pieces by Bloch, Hindemith, and Tailleferre.

A feature of the hearing was the oposition to the measure voiced by forner Representative Patrick E. Dillon of entral Falls. He scored the profesional prohibitionists and said that he vas perhaps the only person in the aulience who stopped drinking because of rohibition." His remarks caused some the leaders of the dry cause to blush nd feel a bit uneasy but were not dis-ceded by an academic procession from University Hall.

M. Koussevitsky, who was introduced by Albert Scott Lyon of the Brown board of fellows was called "a distinguished virtuoso" by President Faunce, who in conferring a Doctor of Music degree further referred to the composer as "an interpreter of the music of all peoples; leader of concerts in London, Madrid, Barcelona and Warsaw, who has crossed the seas to convey to prosaic America some of his own insight into the arts in the universal language of music."

Outlining the career of Mr. Andrews, Dr. Herman Carey Bumpus of the board of fellows stated that the explorer had been engaged in scientific research since the age of 24, when, he said, Mr. Andrews began the study of marine life in the most remote part of the Atlantic nd Pacific.

Dr. Bumpus referred to the explorer's 912 achievement in following the Yellow river from its source in Korea to the sea and said that Mr. Andrews would again leave for China, where he will organize the fourth expedition of the American Museum of Natural History into the Gobi Des [illegible] for a new search into that wilder [illegible] it [illegible] early human re-

---

SYMPHONY GIVES 17TH CONCERT

Herald — Feb 27

Brilliant Performance of Gilbert, Haydn and Strauss

"DON JUAN" PLAYED MOST ELOQUENTLY

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Haydn, Symphony, G-major, "The Surprise"; Gilbert, Symphonic Piece (first performance); Strauss, Tone Poem, "Don Juan"; Ravel, Second Suite from "Daphnis and Chloe."

Seeking inspiration for his symphonic poem, Mr. Gilbert did not go to Greece or Scandinavia. He did not hunt for a myth; he did not dream of sketching the tonal character of Machiavelli, Oliver Cromwell, or Catherine of Russia; it was far from his thought to paint in tones Sahara or the Aurora Borealis.

As an American he wished to express the spirit of his countrymen as they rush, shout, and also sentimentalize. He understands the vulgarity with the amazing energy of many captains of industry; of the suddenly rich, even of the flamboyant profiteers. He has heard the boasting; he is aware of the spread-eagleism that endears us to older and foreign nations. He would charge his music with this American spirit, realizing the might and the goodness that lie underneath the surface. If he can hurrah in music, so too he can set forth the curious sentimentalism, which is a characteristic of our people.

The born melodist among Americans, the greatest natural melodist we have had, was Stephen C. Foster. His airs were for many years this nation's folk songs (for there are even in 1926 other Americans than negroes, creoles, and that copper-colored race which once ruled this land). The words of Foster's songs were at times maudlin in their sentimentalism. The women of whom he sang were borne at an early age to their last resting place. His favorite trees were the cypress and the weeping willow. But in the best of his melodies, and the best are many, Foster was not maudlin. They were of an appealing sincerity. A sincerity, haunting, without the taint of affectation.

In his song-theme of the "Symphonic Piece," Mr. Gilbert remembered Foster's simple art, and, without distressing imitation, he wrote in Foster's vein, not forgetting a couple of bars from that fine old ditty, "The Arkansaw Traveler." With this exception there is no suggestion of folk-song.

As many of us delight in Walt Whitman's "barbaric yawp," knowing his conscientiousness as an artist which led him to constant filing and revision, so we exult in this hilarious, screaming, exciting outburst of Mr. Gilbert's rugged Muse. No one but an American, regardless of traditions, free from European influence and academic conventionalism, could have written this music. Let no one think for a moment that it is only an attempt to express the age of Jazz. There is much more than rhythmic eccentricity. Here is no glorified cake-walk. There is no unbending of scholastic dignity merely to please those whose only interest is in heel-and-toe rhythm and stimulating noise. Here is a musical expression of a nation's spirit. Mr. Gilbert knew what he wished to do and he has done it admirably.

Mr.—or shall we now say Dr.?—Koussevitzky, heartily welcomed, as if the audience rejoiced in the honor paid him this week by Brown University, conducted the "Symphonic Piece" with infinite gusto. He emphasized the defiant opening and following measures; he did not put too much stress on the episodes of charming sentiment. The audience was enthusiastic. Mr. Gilbert was called to the platform several times.

It was a brilliant concert throughout. Haydn's Symphony was delightfully interpreted. Familiar as it is to players and hearers, by the performance it was as fresh, with the exceptions of the period's formulas, as if it were of today. Mr. Koussevitzky's taste and art were especially displayed in his treatment of the Andante. The lively movements, and they should be lively, tested technical proficiency.

Strauss's "Don Juan" was read and played in a most eloquent manner, whether the pages were those portraying the rake-helly hero or the sensuous sections picturing his too-willing victims. (As yet no censor has forbidden the performance of this tone poem on account of the "moral turpitude" of the dashing Don.) The music of Ravel, heard earlier in the season, did not lose in beauty and fascination after the glowing instrumentation of Strauss.

This concert will be depeated tonight. The program announced for next week reads: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8 F major. Chausson, concert for violin (Mr. Enesco), piano (Mr. Hutcheson) and string quartet. Tailleferre, "Out-Door Games." Hindemith, concerto for orchestra op. 38. Bloch, Three Jewish Poems: Dance, Rite, Funeral Procession.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST STANDARD
SYRACUSE, N. Y.

182

FEB 25 1926

BROWN CONFERS TWO HONORARY DEGREES

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 24. (AP)—Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, responded in the medium of his art when Brown university this afternoon conferred on him the honorary degree of doctor of music. He received an ovation after playing with thrilling beauty upon a bass viol. Handel's Largo and the Andante from his own concerto, composed some 20 years ago.

The university also honored Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer who has traced the origin of prehistoric man to Central Asia, conferring on him the honorary degree of doctor of science.

Mother of 14 Has Third Set of Twins

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y., Feb. 26 AP)—Mrs. Antonio Visio of this city became the mother of twins today for the third time. She has been married 16 years and has had 14 children, all but two of whom are living.

He, therefore, sounded his thanks upon the thick strings of the double bass. It was his first appearance as a soloist in America. In Europe he is known as the master of the double bass. We usually associate this instrument with accompaniment, but under the genius of the Russian it became a medium of great individual beauty. Brown has articulated for the people of Providence the pleasure which M. Koussevitsky has given us with the Boston Symphony during the past two seasons, and he responded graciously.

Mr. Andrews's explorations and scientific research have made his name familiar. He has brought to the modern world an appreciation and understanding of civilization and cultures that have been buried by the inexorable passing of the years. He joins a list of other distinguished scientists who have been honored by Brown.

B 2 4 1926

183

KOUSSEVITSKY WILL PLAY APPRECIATION

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

FEB 2 4 1926

secretary of the Brown University Corporation, sponsoring Mr. Andrews.

The first and perhaps most notable conferring ceremony at Brown was in the fall of 1919, when the late Cardinal Mercier was awarded a Doctor of Laws degree on the steps of Rockefeller Hall. Marshal Foch was similarly honored in 1921, two years later, at the dedication of the Metcalf Chemical Laboratory. President James Rowland Angell of Yale was the university's guest.

Koussevitsky to Play Appreciation

For the first time in America Serge Koussevitsky will appear as a soloist to-day, playing the double bass.

Before he became a conductor M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso. When he was a student of music in Moscow the conservatory ruled that each pupil should master some instrument, and M. Koussevitsky chose the double bass, the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS DOUBLE BASS HORN IN RETURN FOR DEGREE

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 2 3 1926

Symphony Leader and Explorer Andrews Honored at Brown

For the first time in America Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was to appear as a soloist today. He was to play the double bass horn at a special convocation of Brown University called for the purpose of confering honorary degrees on him and on Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor M. Koussevitzky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso. When he was a student of music in Moscow the conservatory ruled that each pupil should master some instrument, and Koussevitzky chose the double bass, the great horn usually seen at the back of the orchestra. He became a virtuoso on this rare instrument, and later toured Europe and acquired a great reputation. He composed a concerto for the double bass, and his selection for today was the slow movement from that work.

CAN'T SPEAK; WILL PLAY.

In announcing that he would play today M. Koussevetizky explained that as usual.

At 9 o'clock this morning President W. H. P. Faunce addressed the student body and the visiting alumni, assembled in Sayles hall, with a talk on the celebrities who have come to Brown to receive doctors' degrees. The remainder of the morning was devoted to an inspection by alumni committees of the classrooms and the university buildings. At 12 o'clock the alumni committee gathered at the Faculty Club on Brown street to hear President Faunce speak to them on the progress of Brown during the last academic year. A luncheon followed, which ended when the visiting committees went to the offices of the various departments of the college to confer with the department heads.

INVESTED IN HOODS

Convocation exercises, at which M. Koussevitzky and Mr. Andrews were to be invested with their doctors' hoods and diplomas, were to take place at 4:15 o'clock, when the faculty of the university robed in their long black gowns and mortarboard caps, were to march into Sayles hall. At the head of the procession, dressed in his elaborate costume, Prof. Crosby was to lead as marshal, followed by the members of the corporation and the colorfully attored professors. The chairs had been removed from the hall and the audience composed of alumni and the general public, were to remain standing while Roy Chapman Andrews and Serge Koussevitzky were led to the platform in succession to receive their honorary degrees. As Mr. Andrews was to receive the brilliant yellow hood of doctor of science and M. Koussevitsky the beautiful pink velvet hood of doctor of music.

Visitors' day wil end at sunset with a dinner at the Faculty Club in honor of the newly-invested Dr. Andrews. M. Koussevitzky was not expected to be present because he was to return to Boston soon after receiving his degree.

Brown follows today a precedent established in 1919. In that year the degree of doctor of laws was conferred on the then Cardinal Mercier of Belgium. In 1921 there was another special convocation to honor Marshal Foch of France, and in 1923 President Angell of Yale was similarly honored.

In the present instance it was impossible to confer the degrees at the June commencement exercises because Mr. Andrews will sail for Asia next week and M. Koussevitzky has summer engagements in Europe.

NOTED MEN'S VISITS TO BE RECALLED AT BROWN TO-MORROW

M. Koussevitsky, Boston Symphony Leader, and Chapman, Explorer, to Follow Marshal Foch and Late Cardinal Mercier as Degree Recipients.

Brown University will follow a precedent established on College Hill in 1919, when it confers honorary degrees on Serge Koussevitzky, musician, and on Roy Chapman Andrews, explorer, at a special convocation in Sayles Hall tomorrow afternoon at 4:30 o'clock.

The recipient of the degree on an occasion memorable in Brown history, in 1919, was the late Cardinal Mercier of Belgium, and the degree was that of Doctor of Laws. In 1921 there was another colorful ceremony, "out of season," when President Faunce, in the presence of a large crowd on the middle campus, conferred an LL. D. on Ferdinand Foch, Marshal of France.

Then again, in 1923, preceding the dedication of the Jesse Metcalf Chemical Laboratory, a similar degree was given President James Rowland Angell of Yale University, son of James Burrill Angell, of the Brown class of 1849, former President of the University of Michigan, and, before he was called to that office, editor of the Providence Journal. President Angell of Yale, owing to his duties at New Haven in June, is barred from receiving honorary degrees at Commencement time.

The special convocation to-morrow has been called because M. Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has contracts requiring his presence in Europe in June, and Mr. Andrews will sail about March 1 for Asia, where he will once more resume the fascinating task of hunting down traces of animal life of the ages when man was about as consequential in the scheme of things as an icicle is in the Arctic regions.

The glamor that attended the Mercier and Foch ceremonies may be missing tomorrow in Sayles Hall, but there is more than passing interest in the convocation because it will be the first time that any American university has honored M. Koussevitzky. The academic procession, which will start for Sayles Hall at 4 o'clock, will be vivid in its color. It is expected that many alumni, present for visiting day, will join in the march, and that there will be a large gathering of the general public to look on as Brown honors the famous musician and the equally well-known explorer.

M. Koussevitzky will be presented for his degree by Albert Lyon Scott of the class of 1900, while Mr. Andrews will have as his sponsor, Dr. Hermon Carey

---

KOUSSEVITSKY IN U. S. DEBUT AS DOUBLE BASS SOLOIST

Conductor of Boston Symphony to Play After Receiving Honorary Degree at Brown University.

Providence, R. I., Feb. 24.—(AP)—For the first time in America, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will appear as a soloist to-day. He will play the double bass at a special convocation of Brown university called for the purpose of conferring Honorary degrees on M. Koussevitsky and Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso. When he was a student of music in Moscow the conservatory ruled that each pupil should master some instrument, and M. Koussevitsky chose the double bass, the great horn usually seen at the back of the orchestra. He became a virtuoso on this rare instrument, and later toured Europe and acquired a great reputation. He composed a concerto for the double bass, and his selection for to-day is the slow movement from that work.

In announcing that he would play to-day M. Koussevitsky made it impossible for him to express in words his appreciation of the honor conferred by the university and so he decided to express it in terms of music. He will use an instrument dating from the seventeenth century which he brought with him when he first came to America.

Brown University will follow a pprecedent established in 1919 when it confers honorary degrees on Mr. Andrews and M. Koussevitsky at special convocation. In that year the degree of doctor of laws was conferred on the late Cardinal Mercier of Belgium. In 1921 there was another special convocation to honor Marshal Foch of France, and in 1923 President Angell of Yale was similarly honored.

In the present instance it was impossible to confer the degrees at the June commencement exercises because Mr Andrews will sail for Asia next week and M. Koussevitsky has summer engagements in Europe.

C. S. Monitor Feb 27th

Boston Orchestra Plays New Work by H. F. Gilbert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its seventeenth Friday afternoon concert of the season in Symphony Hall, Boston, yesterday. The program, to be repeated this evening, follows:

Haydn—Symphony in G major, "The Surprise"
H. F. Gilbert—Symphonic Piece
Strauss—"Don Juan"
Ravel—Orchestral Fragments from "Daphnis et Chloé" Ballet (Second Suite)

This was Mr. Koussevitzky's first Boston appearance since he acquired the new dignity of a Doctor of Music of Brown University, and there was a touch of extra warmth in the applause that greeted him as he came upon the platform.

Mr. Gilbert's work had its first performance at this concert. According to notes supplied by the composer, it has no program, but is intended as absolute music; indeed, was designed originally as the first movement of a symphony. Nevertheless, he has tried to reflect in it the "American spirit," which, "as I see it, is energetic — optimistic — nervous — impatient of restraint—and, in its highest aspect, a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit, which is America, is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration. Plenty of jingoism, vulgarity, and 'hurrah boys!' attaches to it, but the spirit of the new-birth underlies all, for him who can see it."

Using the composer's own terminology, a single hearing of the piece leaves one aware less of the "new birth of the human spirit" than of the jingoism and vulgarity, and also the sentimentality, that characterize certain phases of American life. There are reminiscences of "Johnny get your gun" and of "Go down Moses"; there is plenty of hurrah-ing, some syncopation and a touch of jazz; there is vast exuberance, with an appropriate flavor of dissonance; but if "the spirit of the new-birth" underlies this music, then the present reviewer, at least on a first hearing, is not one of those who can see it. Did not the composer's gifts find a more suitable means of expression in "The Dance in Place Congo" and the Negro Rhapsody—more frankly program music?

This is not to say that the "symphonic piece" is without merit. On the contrary, it is well contrived music, and if its thematic material seems somewhat commonplace, and if one gets the effect of a good deal of repetition, still the piece has those qualities of color and effectiveness that may well have their appeal. Yesterday, for example, the composer was called to the platform several times to acknowledge the applause.

Haydn's symphony, with its little trick which seems now so naïvely charming, was heard with pleasure. The Andante and the Menuetto proceeded at a rather German pace, it is true, but the Allegro di molto was performed with a delightfully Hadynesque quality.

It is a curious custom, though, that Mr. Koussevitzky has developed, of stilling applause, but nevertheless permitting a long pause, between movements of a symphony. If late-

---

Hindemith To Be Heard For First Time at Symphony

Post Feb 28

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

"The freshest and most full-blooded talent among the younger German composers": thus does Riemann's music-lexicon describe Paul Hindemith, whose name this week appears for the first time upon the programmes of our Symphony Concerts.

Virtually unknown in Boston and but little played in other cities of this country, Hindemith has nevertheless for the past few years occupied a large share of European critical attention, where he is generally held to be one of the most promising figures among the younger composers, not only of Germany but of the world at large. And in him Germany has, perhaps, a composer destined to restore her temporarily lost prestige.

Until the end of the 19th century Teutonic supremacy in music had, for nearly 200 years, been well-nigh absolute. A mighty line was that of Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Schumann, Wagner, Brahms and the earlier Richard Strauss. But with the dawn of the 20th century the musical hegemony passed for a time to France, and during the first decade and a half Debussy and Ravel were the composers of the hour as French impressionism swept the world of music. Therewith even Richard Strauss became "old hat" to the cognoscenti, while picturesque as they were, even the Russians could not actually dispute the Parisian rule. Then, in Igor Stravinsky, Russia did in fact produce a champion who definitely vanquished the Gauls, and although a small group of composers has preferred to follow in the footsteps of the Viennese Schoenberg, Stravinsky's has been, and for that matter still remains, the dominating contemporary influence.

Where Schoenberg fits in the scheme of things may not yet be definitely determined. Surely after Strauss he is the most important composer of the German-speaking lands. But his dissonant, keyless music is still the horror of the conservative, and it is easy to believe it quite as much contrived as inspired. It is, however, one of the two chief currents of modern music, the atonal, that has its source in him, while it is Stravinsky who has chiefly furthered, if he did not actually father, the other, that of polytony, or the simultaneous employment of more than one key.

Hindemith, it would seem, writes atonal or polytonal music at pleasure, and now and again he condescends to the old-fashioned major and minor. His use of the first-named idiom has particularly distressed Richard Strauss, who is reported to have said to his younger confrere: "But why do you write atonally, when you have talent?"

It is by a Concerto for Orchestra, Opus 38, that Hindemith is now to be represented at the Symphony Concerts. Whether it is written atonally, polytonally or tonally—or in all three styles—remains to be seen. In any event its performance should prove one of the major events of the Symphony season.

FEB 2

BROWN PAYS HONOR TO NOTED EXPLORER, SYMPHONY LEADER

Serge Kousevitzky and Roy C. Chapman Receive Honorary Degrees.—Former Responds With Double Bass Solo.—Latter's Love of Mankind Praised

In conferring honorary degrees yesterday upon Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and upon Roy Chapman Andrews, discoverer of the traces of Neanderthal or Stone Age man in the Gobi desert of China, President W. H. P. Faunce of Brown University described the famous Russian as "a distinguished virtuso and interpreter of the music of all peoples," and Mr. Andrews as "an indefatigable student and intrepid explorer."

M. Koussevitzky responded in the medium of his art to Brown's tribute to his genius in awarding him the honorary degree of Doctor of Music, while Mr. Andrews, in a gracious speech, acknowledging the university's presentation to him of the honorary degree of Doctor of Science, expressed his appreciation of the support that graduates of Brown had given him in his undertakings, and said that "through them I came to admire and love this great university."

Mr. Andrews Presented

In presenting Mr. Andrews, Dr. Herman Carey Bumpus of the Board of Fellows described him as a native of Wisconsin, a graduate of Beloit College and a recipient of the degree of Master of Arts from Columbia University.

"At the age of 24," continued Dr. Bumpus, "he began the study of marine mammalia, penetrating to the most remote parts of the Atlantic and Pacific. In 1912 he entered Korea and followed the Yellow river from its source to the sea. He labored in Alaska. In the war he served us in Mongolia.

"But it is because of his high ideals, his determination, his singular form of kindly leadership, his fondness for men and their fondness for him," continued Dr. Bumpus, "that the Board of Fellows commends him to you as worthy of special distinction."

In conferring the degree upon Mr. Andrews, President W. H. P. Faunce said in part: "Roy Chapman Andrews, indefatigable student and intrepid explorer who has made the dead past speak to the living present and is making civilization realize its youth and the vast achievements yet to come."

Koussevitzky's Career

"Born in Russia, M. Koussevitzky at the age of 12 began to conduct an orchestra," said Albert Scott Lyon of the Board of Fellows in introducting the famous virtuoso. "In 1908," he continued, "he formed an orchestra in Moscow which became one of the most notable in Europe. He toured Russia and other countries on the Continent. At his own expense he founded a publishing house designed to bring to light the works of young composers. He is a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor and on his return to Paris will conduct his sixth orchestral season there."

Dr. Faunce, in conferring the degree upon M. Koussevitzky, spoke of him as "a distinguished virtuoso and interpreter of the music of all peoples; leader of concerts in London, Madrid, Barcelona, and Warsaw, who has crossed the seas to convey to prosaic America some of his own insight into the arts in the universal language of music.

"Since M. Koussevitzky does not desire to use our English tongue in public," continued President Faunce, "he will respond in the language of music which a[illegible] can understand."

Rare Privilege

To hear Koussevitzky in the role [illegible] soloist is a rare privilege. Few inde[illegible] among the thousands of Boston Sympho[illegible] patrons have had that pleasure. T[illegible] many know and admire him as an orche[illegible]tral conductor, one whose remarkab[illegible] qualities are revealed in his conceptio[illegible] of the great polyphonic works of th[illegible] classicists.

Like practically all orchestral leaders, Koussevitzky rose from the ranks. Before he became famous as conductor he was known as an exceptionally fine player upon the double bass, and his interest in and love for the great sonorous toned instrument has not been lessened by the exacting demands of conducting.

This was made evident yesterday when M. Koussevitzky played two numbers, first a sarabande, closing with an andante from his own concerto for double bass.

Although this instrument is not commonly heard in solo work it has great possibilities when so used in the hands of an artist. And Koussevitzky could be nothing else. His selections were melodious, not technically showy, and were given with finished style and express[illegible]. He owns a fine instrument, the tone of which rang pure and sweet in both numbers. The upper register of the double bass naturally is more effective for solo playing and the artist made these upper tones as musical and expressive as those of a 'cello.

An interesting and enjoyable performance, it brought treemndous applause from the appreciative listeners.

Mr. Andrews's Response

"I greatly appreciate the honor which Brown University has done me," said Mr. Andrews in his response, "and particularly in behalf of M. Koussevitzky I extend appreciation of this convocation."

He said that there [illegible] for m[illegible] comrades" in the [illegible] for [illegible]

drews was introduced by Dr. Bumpus, secretary of the corporation.

The guest's contribution to the affair was an exhibition of motion pictures and "stills" of his last two expeditions into Mongolia.

successf

183

KOUSSEVITSKY WILL PLAY APPRECIATION

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

2 4 1926

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS DOUBLE BASS HORN IN RETURN FOR DEGREE

secretary of the Brown University Corporation, sponsoring Mr. Andrews.

The first and perhaps most notable conferring ceremony at Brown was in the fall of 1919, when the late Cardinal Mercier was awarded a Doctor of Laws degree on the steps of Rockefeller Hall. Marshal Foch was similarly honored in 1921, two years later, at the dedication of the Metcalf Chemical Laboratory. President James Rowland Angell of Yale was the university's guest.

Koussevitsky to Play Appreciation

For the first time in America Serge Koussevitsky will appear as a soloist to-day, playing the double bass.

Before he became a conductor M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso. When he was a student of music in Moscow the conservatory ruled that each pupil should master some instrument, and M. Koussevitsky chose the double bass, the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

·26

Symphony Leader and Explorer Andrews Honored at Brown

For the first time in America Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was to appear as a soloist today. He was to play the double bass horn at a special convocation of Brown University called for the purpose of confering honorary degrees on him and on Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor M. Koussevitzky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso. When he was a student of music in Moscow the conservatory ruled that each pupil should master some instrument, and Koussevitzky chose the double bass, the great horn usually seen at the back of the orchestra. He became a virtuoso on this rare instrument, and later toured Europe and acquired a great reputation. He composed a concerto for the double bass, and his selection for today was the slow movement from that work.

CAN'T SPEAK; WILL PLAY.

In announcing that he would play today M. Koussevetizky explained that

NOTED MEN'S VISITS TO BE RECALLED AT BROWN TO-MORROW

M. Koussevitsky, Boston Symphony Leader, and Chapman, Explorer, to Follow Marshal Foch and Late Cardinal Mercier as Degree Recipients.

Brown University will follow a precedent established on College Hill in 1919, when it confers honorary degrees on Serge Koussevitzky, musician, and on Roy Chapman Andrews, explorer, at a special convocation in Sayles Hall to-morrow afternoon at 4:30 o'clock.

The recipient of the degree on an occasion memorable in Brown history, in 1919, was the late Cardinal Mercier of Belgium, and the degree was that of Doctor of Laws. In 1921 there was another colorful ceremony, "out of season," when President Faunce, in the presence of a large crowd on the middle campus, conferred an LL. D. on Ferdinand Foch, Marshal of France.

Then again, in 1923, preceding the dedication of the Jesse Metcalf Chemical Laboratory, a similar degree was given President James Rowland Angell of Yale University, son of James Burrill Angell, of the Brown class of 1849, former President of the University of Michigan, and, before he was called to that office, editor of the Providence Journal. President Angell of Yale, owing to his duties at New Haven in June, is barred from receiving honorary degrees at Commencement time.

The special convocation to-morrow has been called because M. Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has contracts requiring his presence in Europe in June, and Mr. Andrews will sail about March 1 for Asia, where he will once more resume the fascinating task of hunting down traces of animal life of the ages when man was about as consequential in the scheme of things as an icicle is in the Arctic regions.

The glamor that attended the Mercier and Foch ceremonies may be missing to-morrow in Sayles Hall, but there is more than passing interest in the convocation because it will be the first time that any American university has honored M. Koussevitzky. The academic procession, which will start for Sayles Hall at 4 o'clock, will be vivid in its color. It is expected that many alumni, present for visiting day, will join in the march, and that there will be a large gathering of the general public to look on as Brown honors the famous musician and the equally well-known explorer.

M. Koussevitzky will be presented for his degree by Albert Lyon Scott of the class of 1900, while Mr. Andrews will have as his sponsor, Dr. Hermon Carey

as usual.

At 9 o'clock this morning President W. H. P. Faunce addressed the student body and the visiting alumni, assembled in Sayles hall, with a talk on the celebrities who have come to Brown to receive doctors' degrees. The remainder of the morning was devoted to an inspection by alumni committees of the classrooms and the university buildings. At 12 o'clock the alumni committee gathered at the Faculty Club on Brown street to hear President Faunce speak to them on the progress of Brown during the last academic year. A luncheon followed, which ended when the visiting committees went to the offices of the various departments of the college to confer with the department heads.

INVESTED IN HOODS

Convocation exercises, at which M. Koussevitzky and Mr. Andrews were to be invested with their doctors' hoods and diplomas, were to take place at 4:15 o'clock, when the faculty of the university robed in their long black gowns and mortarboard caps, were to march into Sayles hall. At the head of the procession, dressed in his elaborate costume, Prof. Crosby was to lead as marshal, followed by the members of the corporation and the colorfully attored professors. The chairs had been removed from the hall and the audience composed of alumni and the general public, were to remain standing while Roy Chapman Andrews and Serge Koussevitzky were led to the platform in succession to receive their honorary degrees. As Mr. Andrews was to receive the brilliant yellow hood of doctor of science and M. Koussevitzky the beautiful pink velvet hood of doctor of music.

Visitors' day wil end at sunset with a dinner at the Faculty Club in honor of the newly-invested Dr. Andrews. M. Koussevitzky was not expected to be present because he was to return to Boston soon after receiving his degree.

Brown follows today a precedent established in 1919. In that year the degree of doctor of laws was conferred on the then Cardinal Mercier of Belgium. In 1921 there was another special convocation to honor Marshal Foch of France, and in 1923 President Angell of Yale was similarly honored.

In the present instance it was impossible to confer the degrees at the June commencement exercises because Mr. Andrews wil sail for Asia next week and M. Koussevitzky has summer engagements in Europe.

KOUSSEVITSKY IN U. S. DEBUT AS DOUBLE BASS SOLOIST

Conductor of Boston Symphony to Play After Receiving Honorary Degree at Brown University.

Providence, R. I., Feb. 24.—(AP)—For the first time in America, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will appear as a soloist to-day. He will play the double bass at a special convocation of Brown university called for the purpose of conferring Honorary degrees on M. Koussevitsky and Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso. When he was a student of music in Moscow the conservatory ruled that each pupil should master some instrument, and M. Koussevitsky chose the double bass, the great horn usually seen at the back of the orchestra. He became a virtuoso on this rare instrument, and later toured Europe and acquired a great reputation. He composed a concerto for the double bass, and his selection for to-day is the slow movement from that work.

In announcing that he would play to-day M. Koussevitsky made it impossible for him to express in words his appreciation of the honor conferred by the university and so he decided to express it in terms of music. He will use an instrument dating from the seventeenth century which he brought with him when he first came to America.

Brown University will follow a pprecedent established in 1919 when it confers honorary degrees on Mr. Andrews and M. Koussevitsky at special convocation. In that year the degree of doctor of laws was conferred on the late Cardinal Mercier of Belgium. In 1921 there was another special convocation to honor Marshal Foch of France, and in 1923 President Angell of Yale was similarly honored.

In the present instance it was impossible to confer the degrees at the June commencement exercises because Mr Andrews will sail for Asia next week and M. Koussevitsky has summer engagements in Europe.

C. S. Monitor Feb 27th

Boston Orchestra Plays New Work by H. F. Gilbert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its seventeenth Friday afternoon concert of the season in Symphony Hall, Boston, yesterday. The program, to be repeated this evening, follows:

Haydn—Symphony in G major, "The Surprise"
H. F. Gilbert—Symphonic Piece
Strauss—"Don Juan"
Ravel—Orchestral Fragments from "Daphnis et Chloé" Ballet (Second Suite)

This was Mr. Koussevitzky's first Boston appearance since he acquired the new dignity of a Doctor of Music of Brown University, and there was a touch of extra warmth in the applause that greeted him as he came upon the platform.

Mr. Gilbert's work had its first performance at this concert. According to notes supplied by the composer, it has no program, but is intended as absolute music; indeed, was designed originally as the first movement of a symphony. Nevertheless, he has tried to reflect in it the "American spirit," which, "as I see it, is energetic — optimistic — nervous — impatient of restraint—and, in its highest aspect, a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit, which is America, is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration. Plenty of jingoism, vulgarity, and 'hurrah boys!' attaches to it, but the spirit of the new-birth underlies all, for him who can see it."

Using the composer's own terminology, a single hearing of the piece leaves one aware less of the "new birth of the human spirit" than of the jingoism and vulgarity, and also the sentimentality, that characterize certain phases of American life. There are reminiscences of "Johnny get your gun" and of "Go down Moses"; there is plenty of hurrah-ing, some syncopation and a touch of jazz; there is vast exuberance, with an appropriate flavor of dissonance; but if "the spirit of the new-birth" underlies this music, then the present reviewer, at least on a first hearing, is not one of those who can see it. Did not the composer's gifts find a more suitable means of expression in "The Dance in Place Congo" and the Negro Rhapsody—more frankly program music?

This is not to say that the "symphonic piece" is without merit. On the contrary, it is well contrived music, and if its thematic material seems somewhat commonplace, and if one gets the effect of a good deal of repetition, still the piece has those qualities of color and effectiveness that may well have their appeal. Yesterday, for example, the composer was called to the platform several times to acknowledge the applause.

Haydn's symphony, with its little trick which seems now so naïvely charming, was heard with pleasure. The Andante and the Menuetto proceeded at a rather German pace, it is true, but the Allegro di molto was performed with a delightfully Hadynesque quality.

It is a curious custom, though, that Mr. Koussevitzky has developed, of stilling applause, but nevertheless permitting a long pause, between movements of a symphony. If late-

---

Hindemith To Be Heard For First Time at Symphony

Post Feb 28

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

"The freshest and most full-blooded talent among the younger German composers": thus does Riemann's music-lexicon describe Paul Hindemith, whose name this week appears for the first time upon the programmes of our Symphony Concerts.

Virtually unknown in Boston and but little played in other cities of this country, Hindemith has nevertheless for the past few years occupied a large share of European critical attention, where he is generally held to be one of the most promising figures among the younger composers, not only of Germany but of the world at large. And in him Germany has, perhaps, a composer destined to restore her temporarily lost prestige.

Until the end of the 19th century Teutonic supremacy in music had, for nearly 200 years, been well-nigh absolute. A mighty line was that of Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Schumann, Wagner, Brahms and the earlier Richard Strauss. But with the dawn of the 20th century the musical hegemony passed for a time to France, and during the first decade and a half Debussy and Ravel were the composers of the hour as French impressionism swept the world of music. Therewith even Richard Strauss became "old hat" to the cognoscenti, while picturesque as they were, even the Russians could not actually dispute the Parisian rule. Then, in Igor Stravinsky, Russia did in fact produce a champion who definitely vanquished the Gauls, and although a small group of composers has preferred to follow in the footsteps of the Viennese Schoenberg, Stravinsky's has been, and for that matter still remains, the dominating contemporary influence.

Where Schoenberg fits in the scheme of things may not yet be definitely determined. Surely after Strauss he is the most important composer of the German-speaking lands. But his dissonant, keyless music is still the horror of the conservative, and it is easy to believe it quite as much contrived as inspired. It is, however, one of the two chief currents of modern music, the atonal, that has its source in him, while it is Stravinsky who has chiefly furthered, if he did not actually father, the other, that of polytony, or the simultaneous employment of more than one key.

Hindemith, it would seem, writes atonal or polytonal music at pleasure, and now and again he condescends to the old-fashioned major and minor. His use of the first-named idiom has particularly distressed Richard Strauss, who is reported to have said to his younger confrere: "But why do you write atonally, when you have talent?"

It is by a Concerto for Orchestra, Opus 38, that Hindemith is now to be represented at the Symphony Concerts. Whether it is written atonally, polytonally or tonally—or in all three styles—remains to be seen. In any event its performance should prove one of the major events of the Symphony season.

BROWN PAYS HONOR TO NOTED EXPLORER, SYMPHONY LEADER

Serge Kousevitzky and Roy C. Chapman Receive Honorary Degrees.—Former Responds With Double Bass Solo.—Latter's Love of Mankind Praised

In conferring honorary degrees yesterday upon Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and upon Roy Chapman Andrews, discoverer of the traces of Neanderthal or Stone Age man in the Gobi desert of China, President W. H. P. Faunce of Brown University described the famous Russian as "a distinguished virtuso and interpreter of the music of all peoples," and Mr. Andrews as "an indefatigable student and intrepid explorer."

M. Koussevitzky responded in the medium of his art to Brown's tribute to his genius in awarding him the honorary degree of Doctor of Music, while Mr. Andrews, in a gracious speech, acknowledging the university's presentation to him of the honorary degree of Doctor of Science, expressed his appreciation of the support that graduates of Brown had given him in his undertakings, and said that "through them I came to admire and love this great university."

Mr. Andrews Presented

In presenting Mr. Andrews, Dr. Herman Carey Bumpus of the Board of Fellows described him as a native of Wisconsin, a graduate of Beloit College and a recipient of the degree of Master of Arts from Columbia University.

"At the age of 24," continued Dr. Bumpus, "he began the study of marine mammalia, penetrating to the most remote parts of the Atlantic and Pacific. In 1912 he entered Korea and followed the Yalu river from its source to the sea. He labored in Alaska. In the war he served us in Mongolia.

"But it is because of his high ideals, his determination, his singular form of kindly leadership, his fondness for men and their fondness for him," continued Dr. Bumpus, "that the Board of Fellows commends him to you as worthy of special distinction."

In conferring the degree upon Mr. Andrews, President W. H. P. Faunce said in part: "Roy Chapman Andrews, indefatigable student and intrepid explorer who has made the dead past speak to the living present and is making civilization realize its youth and the vast achievements yet to come."

drews was introduced by Dr. Bumpus, secretary of the corporation.

The guest's contribution to the affair was an exhibition of motion pictures and "stills" of his last two expeditions into Mongolia.

Koussevitzky's Career

"Born in Russia, M. Koussevitzky at the age of 12 began to conduct an orchestra," said Albert Scott Lyon of the Board of Fellows in introducing the famous virtuoso. "In 1908," he continued, "he formed an orchestra in Moscow which became one of the most notable in Europe. He toured Russia and other countries on the Continent. At his own expense he founded a publishing house designed to bring to light the works of young composers. He is a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor and on his return to Paris will conduct his sixth orchestral season there."

Dr. Faunce, in conferring the degree upon M. Koussevitzky, spoke of him as "a distinguished virtuoso and interpreter of the music of all peoples; leader of concerts in London, Madrid, Barcelona, and Warsaw, who has crossed the seas to convey to prosaic America some of his own insight into the art in the universal language of music.

"Since M. Koussevitzky does not desire to use our English tongue in public," continued President Faunce, "he will respond in the language of music which all can understand."

Rare Privilege

To hear Koussevitzky in the role of soloist is a rare privilege. Few indeed among the thousands of Boston Symphony patrons have had that pleasure. [illegible] many know and admire him as an orchestral conductor, one whose remarkable qualities are revealed in his [illegible] of the great polyphonic works [illegible] classicists.

Like practically all orchestral leaders, Koussevitzky rose from the ranks. Before he became famous as conductor he was known as an exceptionally fine player upon the double bass, and his interest in and love for the great sonorous instrument has not been lessened by the exacting demands of conducting.

This was made evident yesterday when M. Koussevitzky played two numbers, first a sarabande, closing with an andante from his own concerto for double bass.

Although this instrument is not commonly heard in solo work it has great possibilities when so used in the hands of an artist. And Koussevitzky could be nothing else. His selections were melodious, not technically showy, and were given with finished style and expression. He owns a fine instrument, the tone of which rang pure and sweet in both numbers. The upper register of the double bass naturally is more effective for solo playing and the artist made these upper tones as musical and expressive as those of a 'cello.

An interesting and enjoyable performance, it brought treemndous applause from the appreciative listeners.

Mr. Andrews's Response

"I greatly appreciate the honor which Brown University has done me," said Mr. Andrews in his response, "and particularly in behalf of M. Koussevitzky I extend appreciation of this convocation."

He said that there [illegible] for m[illegible] "comrades" in the [illegible] men for th[illegible]

KOUSSEVITSKY WILL PLAY APPRECIATION

183

...IS CLIPPING FRO...
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

...EB 2 4 1926

KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS DOUBLE BASS HORN IN RETURN FOR DEGREE

secretary of the Brown University Corporation, sponsoring Mr. Andrews.

The first and perhaps most notable conferring ceremony at Brown was in the fall of 1919, when the late Cardinal Mercier was awarded a Doctor of Laws degree on the steps of Rockefeller Hall. Marshal Foch was similarly honored in 1921, two years later, at the dedication of the Metcalf Chemical Laboratory. President James Rowland Angell of Yale was the university's guest.

Koussevitsky to Play Appreciation

For the first time in America Serge Koussevitsky will appear as a soloist to-day, playing the double bass.

Before he became a conductor M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso. When he was a student of music in Moscow the conservatory ruled that each pupil should master some instrument, and M. Koussevitsky chose the double bass, the great horn usually seen at the back of the orchestra. He became a virtuoso on this rare instrument, and later toured Europe and acquired a great reputation. He composed a concerto for the double bass, and his selection for to-day is the slow movement from that work.

In announcing that he would play today M Koussevitsky explained that his inability to speak the English language made it impossible for him to express in words his appreciation of the honor conferred by the university and so he decided to express it in terms of music. He will use an instrument dating from the 17th century which he brought with him when he first came to America.

...al Foch an[illegible]er-cier as Degree Recipients.

Brown University will follow a precedent established on College Hill in 1919, when it confers honorary degrees on Serge Koussevitzky, musician, and on Roy Chapman Andrews, explorer, at a special convocation in Sayles Hall to-morrow afternoon at 4:30 o'clock.

The recipient of the degree on an occasion memorable in Brown history, in 1919, was the late Cardinal Mercier of Belgium, and the degree was that of Doctor of Laws. In 1921 there was another colorful ceremony, "out of season," when President Faunce, in the presence of a large crowd on the middle campus, conferred an LL. D. on Ferdinand Foch, Marshal of France.

Then again, in 1923, preceding the dedication of the Jesse Metcalf Chemical Laboratory, a similar degree was given President James Rowland Angell of Yale University, son of James Burrill Angell, of the Brown class of 1849, former President of the University of Michigan, and, before he was called to that office, editor of the Providence Journal. President Angell of Yale, owing to his duties at New Haven in June, is barred from receiving honorary degrees at Commencement time.

The special convocation to-morrow has been called because M. Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has contracts requiring his presence in Europe in June, and Mr. Andrews will sail about March 1 for Asia, where he will once more resume the fascinating task of hunting down traces of animal life of the ages when man was about as consequential in the scheme of things as an icicle is in the Arctic regions.

The glamor that attended the Mercier and Foch ceremonies may be missing tomorrow in Sayles Hall, but there is more than passing interest in the convocation because it will be the first time that any

---

Symphony Leader and Explorer Andrews Honored at Brown

For the first time in America Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was to appear as a soloist today. He was to play the double bass horn at a special convocation of Brown University called for the purpose of confering honorary degrees on him and on Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor M. Koussevitzky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso. When he was a student of music in Moscow the conservatory ruled that each pupil should master some instrument, and Koussevitzky chose the double bass, the great horn usually seen at the back of the orchestra. He became a virtuoso on this rare instrument, and later toured Europe and acquired a great reputation. He composed a concerto for the double bass, and his selection for today was the slow movement from that work.

CAN'T SPEAK; WILL PLAY.

In announcing that he would play today M. Koussevetizky explained that his inability to speak the English language made it impossible for him to express in words his appreciation of the honor conferred by the university and so he decided to express it in terms of music. He was to use an instrument dating from the 17th century which he brought with him when he first came to America.

Professors in brilliantly-colored hoods and gowns, and a general holiday spirit pervading the campus, make Brown the scene of elaborate pageantry and ceremony. Professors and old graduates together made the day one of celebration and festivity, although the undergraduates had to go through their daily routine of study and classes as usual.

At 9 o'clock this morning President W. H. P. Faunce addressed the student body and the visiting alumni, assembled in Sayles hall, with a talk on the celebrities who have come to Brown to receive doctors' degrees. The remainder of the morning was devoted to an inspection by alumni committees of the classrooms and the university buildings. At 12 o'clock the alumni committee gathered at the Faculty Club on Brown street to hear President Faunce speak to them on the progress of Brown during the last academic year. A luncheon followed, which ended when the visiting committees went to the offices of the various departments of the college to confer with the department heads.

INVESTED IN HOODS

Convocation exercises, at which M. Koussevitzky and Mr. Andrews were to be invested with their doctors' hoods and diplomas, were to take place at 4:15 o'clock, when the faculty of the university robed in their long black gowns and mortarboard caps, were to march into Sayles hall. At the head of the procession, dressed in his elaborate costume, Prof. Crosby was to lead as marshal, followed by the members of the corporation and the colorfully attored professors. The chairs had been removed from the hall and the audience composed of alumni and the general public, were to remain standing while Roy Chapman Andrews and Serge Koussevitzky were led to the platform in succession to receive their honorary degrees. As Mr. Andrews was to receive the brilliant yellow hood of doctor of science and M. Koussevitsky the beautiful pink velvet hood of doctor of music.

Visitors' day wil end at sunset with a dinner at the Faculty Club in honor of the newly-invested Dr. Andrews. M. Koussevitzky was not expected to be present because he was to return to Boston soon after receiving his degree.

Brown follows today a precedent established in 1919. In that year the degree of doctor of laws was conferred on the then Cardinal Mercier of Belgium. In 1921 there was another special convocation to honor Marshal Foch of France, and in 1923 President Angell of Yale was similarly honored.

In the present instance it was impossible to confer the degrees at the June commencement exercises because Mr. Andrews wil sail for Asia next week and M. Koussevitzky has summer engagements in Europe.

KOUSSEVITSKY IN U. S. DEBUT AS DOUBLE BASS SOLOIST

Conductor of Boston Symphony to Play After Receiving Honorary Degree at Brown University.

Providence, R. I., Feb. 24.—(AP)—For the first time in America, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will appear as a soloist to-day. He will play the double bass at a special convocation of Brown university called for the purpose of conferring Honorary degrees on M. Koussevitsky and Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso. When he was a student of music in Moscow the conservatory ruled that each pupil should master some instrument, and M. Koussevitsky chose the double bass, the great horn usually seen at the back of the orchestra. He became a virtuoso on this rare instrument, and later toured Europe and acquired a great reputation. He composed a concerto for the double bass, and his selection for to-day is the slow movement from that work.

In announcing that he would play to-day M. Koussevitsky made it impossible for him to express in words his appreciation of the honor conferred by the university and so he decided to express it in terms of music. He will use an instrument dating from the seventeenth century which he brought with him when he first came to America.

Brown University will follow a pprecedent established in 1919 when it confers honorary degrees on Mr. Andrews and M. Koussevitsky at special convocation. In that year the degree of doctor of laws was conferred on the late Cardinal Mercier of Belgium. In 1921 there was another special convocation to honor Marshal Foch of France, and in 1923 President Angell of Yale was similarly honored.

In the present instance it was impossible to confer the degrees at the June commencement exercises because Mr Andrews will sail for Asia next week and M. Koussevitsky has summer engagements in Europe.

C. S. Monitor Feb 27th

Boston Orchestra Plays New Work by H. F. Gilbert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its seventeenth Friday afternoon concert of the season in Symphony Hall, Boston, yesterday. The program, to be repeated this evening, follows:

Haydn—Symphony in G major, "The Surprise"
H. F. Gilbert—Symphonic Piece
Strauss—"Don Juan"
Ravel — Orchestral Fragments from "Daphnis et Chloé" Ballet (Second Suite)

This was Mr. Koussevitzky's first Boston appearance since he acquired the new dignity of a Doctor of Music of Brown University, and there was a touch of extra warmth in the applause that greeted him as he came upon the platform.

Mr. Gilbert's work had its first performance at this concert. According to notes supplied by the composer, it has no program, but is intended as absolute music; indeed, was designed originally as the first movement of a symphony. Nevertheless, he has tried to reflect in it the "American spirit," which, "as I see it, is energetic — optimistic — nervous — impatient of restraint—and, in its highest aspect, a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit, which is America, is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration. Plenty of jingoism, vulgarity, and 'hurrah boys!' attaches to it, but the spirit of the new-birth underlies all, for him who can see it."

Using the composer's own terminology, a single hearing of the piece leaves one aware less of the "new birth of the human spirit" than of the jingoism and vulgarity, and also the sentimentality, that characterize certain phases of American life. There are reminiscences of "Johnny get your gun" and of "Go down Moses"; there is plenty of hurrah-ing, some syncopation and a touch of jazz; there is vast exuberance, with an appropriate flavor of dissonance; but if "the spirit of the new-birth" underlies this music, then the present reviewer, at least on a first hearing, is not one of those who can see it. Did not the composer's gifts find a more suitable means of expression in "The Dance in Place Congo" and the Negro Rhapsody—more frankly program music?

This is not to say that the "symphonic piece" is without merit. On the contrary, it is well contrived music, and if its thematic material seems somewhat commonplace, and if one gets the effect of a good deal of repetition, still the piece has those qualities of color and effectiveness that may well have their appeal. Yesterday, for example, the composer was called to the platform several times to acknowledge the applause.

Haydn's symphony, with its little trick which seems now so naïvely charming, was heard with pleasure. The Andante and the Menuetto proceeded at a rather German pace, it is true, but the Allegro di molto was performed with a delightfully Hadynesque quality.

It is a curious custom, though, that Mr. Koussevitzky has developed, of stilling applause, but nevertheless permitting a long pause, between movements of a symphony. If latecomers are to be admitted, why raise the magisterial hand against manifestations of approval? The mood is broken in any event. And if there is to be no applause, why not go on with the story?

Mr. Koussevitzky evidently has a strong affection for Strauss. At two pairs of concerts this season the "Alpine Symphony," at another "Tod und Verklärung" and now "Don Juan." Or perhaps the conductor wants to remind his audiences that there was a time when Strauss really looked as if he might become Richard the Second. By all means, if we are to have Strauss, let it be the dazzling young Pretender of those earlier years. Except for one most distressing lapse, the performance yesterday was brilliant. So was that of the Ravel, though the placing of it after the Strauss was not the happiest of arrangements.

L. A. S.

---

passed for a time to France, and during the first decade and a half Debussy and Ravel were the composers of the hour as French impressionism swept the world of music. Therewith even Richard Strauss became "old hat" to the cognoscenti, while picturesque as they were, even the Russians could not actually dispute the Parisian rule. Then, in Igor Stravinsky, Russia did in fact produce a champion who definitely vanquished the Gauls, and although a small group of composers has preferred to follow in the footsteps of the Viennese Schoenberg, Stravinsky's has been, and for that matter still remains, the dominating contemporary influence.

Where Schoenberg fits in the scheme of things may not yet be definitely determined. Surely after Strauss he is the most important composer of the German-speaking lands. But his dissonant, keyless music is still the horror of the conservative, and it is easy to believe it quite as much contrived as inspired. It is, however, one of the two chief currents of modern music, the atonal, that has its source in him, while it is Stravinsky who has chiefly furthered, if he did not actually father, the other, that of polytony, or the simultaneous employment of more than one key.

Hindemith, it would seem, writes atonal or polytonal music at pleasure, and now and again he condescends to the old-fashioned major and minor. His use of the first-named idiom has particularly distressed Richard Strauss, who is reported to have said to his younger confrere: "But why do you write atonally, when you have talent?"

It is by a Concerto for Orchestra, Opus 38, that Hindemith is now to be represented at the Symphony Concerts. Whether it is written atonally, polytonally or tonally—or in all three styles—remains to be seen. In any event its performance should prove one of the major events of the Symphony season.

BROWN PAYS HONOR TO NOTED EXPLORER, SYMPHONY LEADER

Serge Kousevitzky and Roy C. Chapman Receive Honorary Degrees.—Former Responds With Double Bass Solo.—Latter's Love of Mankind Praised.

In conferring honorary degrees yesterday upon Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and upon Roy Chapman Andrews, discoverer of the traces of Neanderthal or Stone Age man in the Gobi desert of China, President W. H. P. Faunce of Brown University described the famous Russian as "a distinguished virtuso and interpreter of the music of all peoples," and Mr. Andrews as "an indefatigable student and intrepid explorer."

M. Koussevitzky responded in the medium of his art to Brown's tribute to his genius in awarding him the honorary degree of Doctor of Music, while Mr. Andrews, in a gracious speech, acknowledging the university's presentation to him of the honorary degree of Doctor of Science, expressed his appreciation of the support that graduates of Brown had given him in his undertakings, and said that "through them I came to admire and love this great university."

Mr. Andrews Presented

In presenting Mr. Andrews, Dr. Herman Carey Bumpus of the Board of Fellows described him as a native of Wisconsin, a graduate of Beloit College and a recipient of the degree of Master of Arts from Columbia University.

"At the age of 24," continued Dr. Bumpus, "he began the study of marine mammalia, penetrating to the most remote parts of the Atlantic and Pacific. In 1912 he entered Korea and followed the Yellow river from its source to the sea. He labored in Alaska. In the war he served us in Mongolia.

"But it is because of his high ideals, his determination, his singular form of kindly leadership, his fondness for men and their fondness for him," continued Dr. Bumpus, "that the Board of Fellows commends him to you as worthy of special distinction."

In conferring the degree upon Mr. Andrews, President W. H. P. Faunce said in part: "Roy Chapman Andrews, indefatigable student and intrepid explorer who has made the dead past speak to the living present and is making civilization realize its youth and the vast achievements yet to come."

Koussevitzky's Career

"Born in Russia, M. Koussevitzky at the age of 12 began to conduct an orchestra," said Albert Scott Lyon of the Board of Fellows in introducting the famous virtuoso. "In 1908," he continued, "he formed an orchestra in Moscow which became one of the most notable in Europe. He toured Russia and other countries on the Continent. At his own expense he founded a publishing house designed to bring to light the works of young composers. He is a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor and on his return to Paris will conduct his sixth orchestral season there."

Dr. Faunce, in conferring the degree upon M. Koussevitzky, spoke of him as "a distinguished virtuoso and interpreter of the music of all peoples; leader of concerts in London, Madrid, Barcelona, and Warsaw, who has crossed the seas to convey to prosaic America some of his own insight into the arts in the universal language of music.

"Since M. Koussevitzky does not desire to use our English tongue in public," continued President Faunce, "he will respond in the language of music which a can understand."

Rare Privilege

To hear Koussevitzky in the role soloist is a rare privilege. Few inde among the thousands of Boston Sympho patrons have had that pleasure. T many know and admire him as an orchetral conductor, one whose remarkal qualities are revealed in his conception of the great polyphonic works th classicists.

Like practically all orchestral leaders, Koussevitzky rose from the ranks. Before he became famous as conductor he was known as an exceptionally fine player upon the double bass, and his interest in and love for the great sonorous toned instrument has not been lessened by the exacting demands of conducting.

This was made evident yesterday when M. Koussevitzky played two numbers, first a sarabande, closing with an andante from his own concerto for double bass.

Although this instrument is not commonly heard in solo work it has great possibilities when so used in the hands of an artist. And Koussevitzky could be nothing else. His selections were melodious, not technically showy, and were given with finished style and expression. He owns a fine instrument, the tone of which rang pure and sweet in both numbers. The upper register of the double bass naturally is more effective for sol playing and the artist made these upper tones as musical and expressive as those of a 'cello.

An interesting and enjoyable performance, it brought treemndous applause from the appreciative listeners.

Mr. Andrews's Response

"I greatly appreciate the honor which Brown University has done me," said Mr. Andrews in his response, "and particularly in behalf of M. Koussevitzky I extend appreciation of this convocation."

He said that there [illegible] for my comrades" in the [illegible] een for th [illegible]

drews was introduced by Dr. Bumpus, secretary of the corporation.

The guest's contribution to the affair was an exhibition of motion pictures and "stills" of his last two expeditions into Mongolia.

…1 2 1926

183

KOUSSEVITSKY WILL PLAY APPRECIATION

Conductor of Symphony (at Brown and Render Explorer Andrews A

Honorary degrees will be conferred at Brown University for the fourth time since the World War when President W. H. P. Faunce in Sayles Hall this afternoon honors Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews, explorer of international renown.

The academic procession, which starts at 4 o'clock from the faculty rooms in University Hall, is expected to include scores of alumni in this city for annual visiting day. M. Koussevitsky will be presented by Albert Lyon Scott, class of 1900, with Dr. Herman Carey Bumpus, secretary of the Brown University Corporation, sponsoring Mr. Andrews.

The first and perhaps most notable conferring ceremony at Brown was in the fall of 1919, when the late Cardinal Mercier was awarded a Doctor of Laws degree on the steps of Rockefeller Hall. Marshal Foch was similarly honored in 1921, two years later, at the dedication of the Metcalf Chemical Laboratory. President James Rowland Angell of Yale was the university's guest.

Koussevitsky to Play Appreciation

For the first time in America Serge Koussevitsky will appear as a soloist to-day, playing the double bass.

Before he became a conductor M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso. When he was a student of music in Moscow the conservatory ruled that each pupil should master some instrument, and M. Koussevitsky chose the double bass, the great horn usually seen at the back of the orchestra. He became a virtuoso on this rare instrument, and later toured Europe and acquired a great reputation. He composed a concerto for the double bass, and his selection for to-day is the slow movement from that work.

In announcing that he would play to-day M. Koussevitsky explained that his inability to speak the English language made it impossible for him to express in words his appreciation of the honor conferred by the university and so he decided to express it in terms of music. He will use an instrument dating from the 17th century which he brought with him when he first came to America.

Foch an…

U… ale … of … ngell, former Presi… Michigan, and, b… that office, editor o… rnal. President Ange… g to his duties at New Haven … is barred from receiving honorary degrees at Commencement time.

The special convocation to-morrow has been called because M. Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has contracts requiring his presence in Europe in June, and Mr. Andrews will sail about March 1 for Asia, where he will once more resume the fascinating task of hunting down traces of animal life of the ages when man was about as consequential in the scheme of things as an icicle is in the Arctic regions.

The glamor that attended the Mercier and Foch ceremonies may be missing to-morrow in Sayles Hall, but there is more than passing interest in the convocation because it will be the first time that any

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

FEB 2 5 1926

Koussevitsky Gets Degree at Brown

Boston Symphony Conductor Plays Violin; Explorer Also Honored.

PROVIDENCE, Feb. 24—(AP) Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, responded in the medium of his art, when Brown University this afternoon conferred on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Music. He played with thrilling beauty upon a bass violin, Handel's Largo and the Andante from his own concert, composed some 20 years ago.

The university also honored Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer who has traced the origin of pre-historic man to Central Asia, conferring on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Science.

A ripple of applause greeted President W. P. H. Faunce's announcement that, "since M. Koussevitsky does not desire to use our English tongue in public, he will respond in the language of music which all can understand."

In his citation of Mr. Andrews Dr. Faunce said "Roy Chapman Andrews, indefatigable student and intrepid explorer who has made the dead past speak to the living present, and is making civilization realize its youth and the vast achievements yet to come."

---

the … of the corporation and the colorfully attored professors. The chairs had been removed from the hall and the audience composed of alumni and the general public, were to remain standing while Roy Chapman Andrews and Serge Koussevitzky were led to the platform in succession to receive their honorary degrees. As Mr. Andrews was to receive the brilliant yellow hood of doctor of science and M. Koussevitsky the beautiful pink velvet hood of doctor of music.

Visitors' day wil end at sunset with a dinner at the Faculty Club in honor of the newly-invested Dr. Andrews. M. Koussevitzky was not expected to be present because he was to return to Boston soon after receiving his degree.

Brown follows today a precedent established in 1919. In that year the degree of doctor of laws was conferred on the then Cardinal Mercier of Belgium. In 1921 there was another special convocation to honor Marshal Foch of France, and in 1923 President Angell of Yale was similarly honored.

In the present instance it was impossible to confer the degrees at the June commencement exercises because Mr. Andrews wil sail for Asia next week and M. Koussevitzky has summer engagements in Europe.

KOUSSEVITSKY IN U. S. DEBUT AS DOUBLE BASS SOLOIST

Conductor of Boston Symphony to Play After Receiving Honorary Degree at Brown University.

Providence, R. I., Feb. 24.—(AP)—For the first time in America, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will appear as a soloist to-day. He will play the double bass at a special convocation of Brown university called for the purpose of conferring Honorary degrees on M. Koussevitsky and Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso. When he was a student of music in Moscow the conservatory ruled that each pupil should master some instrument, and M. Koussevitsky chose the double bass, the great horn usually seen at the back of the orchestra. He became a virtuoso on this rare instrument, and later toured Europe and acquired a great reputation. He composed a concerto for the double bass, and his selection for to-day is the slow movement from that work.

In announcing that he would play to-day M. Koussevitsky made it impossible for him to express in words his appreciation of the honor conferred by the university and so he decided to express it in terms of music. He will use an instrument dating from the seventeenth century which he brought with him when he first came to America.

Brown University will follow a pprecedent established in 1919 when it confers honorary degrees on Mr. Andrews and M. Koussevitsky at special convocation. In that year the degree of doctor of laws was conferred on the late Cardinal Mercier of Belgium. In 1921 there was another special convocation to honor Marshal Foch of France, and in 1923 President Angell of Yale was similarly honored.

In the present instance it was impossible to confer the degrees at the June commencement exercises because Mr Andrews will sail for Asia next week and M. Koussevitsky has summer engagements in Europe.

C. S. Monitor Feb 27th

Boston Orchestra Plays New Work by H. F. Gilbert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its seventeenth Friday afternoon concert of the season in Symphony Hall, Boston, yesterday. The program, to be repeated this evening, follows:

Haydn—Symphony in G major, "The Surprise"
H. F. Gilbert—Symphonic Piece
Strauss—"Don Juan"
Ravel — Orchestral Fragments from "Daphnis et Chloé" Ballet (Second Suite)

This was Mr. Koussevitzky's first Boston appearance since he acquired the new dignity of a Doctor of Music of Brown University, and there was a touch of extra warmth in the applause that greeted him as he came upon the platform.

Mr. Gilbert's work had its first performance at this concert. According to notes supplied by the composer, it has no program, but is intended as absolute music; indeed, was designed originally as the first movement of a symphony. Nevertheless, he has tried to reflect in it the "American spirit," which, "as I see it, is energetic — optimistic — nervous — impatient of restraint—and, in its highest aspect, a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit, which is America, is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration. Plenty of jingoism, vulgarity and 'hurrah boys!' attaches to it, but the spirit of the new-birth underlies all, for him who can see it."

Using the composer's own terminology, a single hearing of the piece leaves one aware less of the "new birth of the human spirit" than of the jingoism and vulgarity, and also the sentimentality, that characterize certain phases of American life. There are reminiscences of "Johnny get your gun" and of "Go down Moses"; there is plenty of hurrah-ing, some syncopation and a touch of jazz; there is vast exuberance, with an appropriate flavor of dissonance; but if "the spirit of the new-birth" underlies this music, then the present reviewer, at least on a first hearing, is not one of those who can see it. Did not the composer's gifts find a more suitable means of expression in "The Dance in Place Congo" and the Negro Rhapsody—more frankly program music?

This is not to say that the "symphonic piece" is without merit. On the contrary, it is well contrived music, and if its thematic material seems somewhat commonplace, and if one gets the effect of a good deal of repetition, still the piece has those qualities of color and effectiveness that may well have their appeal. Yesterday, for example, the composer was called to the platform several times to acknowledge the applause.

Haydn's symphony, with its little trick which seems now so naïvely charming, was heard with pleasure. The Andante and the Menuetto proceeded at a rather German pace, it is true, but the Allegro di molto was performed with a delightfully Hadynesque quality.

It is a curious custom, though, that Mr. Koussevitzky has developed, of stilling applause, but nevertheless permitting a long pause, between movements of a symphony. If latecomers are to be admitted, why raise the magisterial hand against manifestations of approval? The mood is broken in any event. And if there is to be no applause, why not go on with the story?

Mr. Koussevitzky evidently has a strong affection for Strauss. At two pairs of concerts this season the "Alpine Symphony," at another "Tod und Verklärung" and now "Don Juan." Or perhaps the conductor wants to remind his audiences that there was a time when Strauss really looked as if he might become Richard the Second. By all means, if we are to have Strauss, let it be the dazzling young Pretender of those earlier years. Except for one most distressing lapse, the performance yesterday was brilliant. So was that of the Ravel, though the placing of it after the Strauss was not the happiest of arrangements.

L. A. S.

---

passed for a time to France, and during the first decade and a half Debussy and Ravel were the composers of the hour as French impressionism swept the world of music. Therewith even Richard Strauss became "old hat" to the cognoscenti, while picturesque as they were, even the Russians could not actually dispute the Parisian rule. Then, in Igor Stravinsky, Russia did in fact produce a champion who definitely vanquished the Gauls, and although a small group of composers has preferred to follow in the footsteps of the Viennese Schoenberg, Stravinsky's has been, and for that matter still remains, the dominating contemporary influence.

Where Schoenberg fits in the scheme of things may not yet be definitely determined. Surely after Strauss he is the most important composer of the German-speaking lands. But his dissonant, keyless music is still the horror of the conservative, and it is easy to believe it quite as much contrived as inspired. It is, however, one of the two chief currents of modern music, the atonal, that has its source in him, while it is Stravinsky who has chiefly furthered, if he did not actually father, the other, that of polytony, or the simultaneous employment of more than one key.

Hindemith, it would seem, writes atonal or polytonal music at pleasure, and now and again he condescends to the old-fashioned major and minor. His use of the first-named idiom has particularly distressed Richard Strauss, who is reported to have said to his younger confrere: "But why do you write atonally, when you have talent?"

It is by a Concerto for Orchestra, Opus 38, that Hindemith is now to be represented at the Symphony Concerts. Whether it is written atonally, polytonally or tonally—or in all three styles—remains to be seen. In any event its performance should prove one of the major events of the Symphony season.

FEB 2

BROWN PAYS HONOR TO NOTED EXPLORER, SYMPHONY LEADER

Serge Kousevitzky and Roy C. Chapman Receive Honorary Degrees.—Former Responds With Double Bass Solo.—Latter's Love of Mankind Praised

In conferring honorary degrees yesterday upon Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and upon Roy Chapman Andrews, discoverer of the traces of Neanderthal or Stone Age man in the Gobi desert of China, President W. H. P. Faunce of Brown University described the famous Russian as "a distinguished virtuso and interpreter of the music of all peoples," and Mr. Andrews as "an indefatigable student and intrepid explorer."

M. Koussevitzky responded in the medium of his art to Brown's tribute to his genius in awarding him the honorary degree of Doctor of Music, while Mr. Andrews, in a gracious speech, acknowledging the university's presentation to him of the honorary degree of Doctor of Science, expressed his appreciation of the support that graduates of Brown had given him in his undertakings, and said that "through them I came to admire and love this great university."

Mr. Andrews Presented

In presenting Mr. Andrews, Dr. Herman Carey Bumpus of the Board of Fellows described him as a native of Wisconsin, a graduate of Beloit College and a recipient of the degree of Master of Arts from Columbia University.

"At the age of 24," continued Dr. Bumpus, "he began the study of marine mammalia, penetrating to the most remote parts of the Atlantic and Pacific. In 1912 he entered Korea and followed the Yellow river from its source to the sea. He labored in Alaska. In the war he served us in Mongolia.

"But it is because of his high ideals, his determination, his singular form of kindly leadership, his fondness for men and their fondness for him," continued Dr. Bumpus, "that the Board of Fellows commends him to you as worthy of special distinction."

In conferring the degree upon Mr. Andrews, President W. H. P. Faunce said in part: "Roy Chapman Andrews, indefatigable student and intrepid explorer who has made the dead past speak to the living present and is making civilization realize its youth and the vast achievements yet to come."

Koussevitzky's Career

"Born in Russia, M. Koussevitzky at the age of 12 began to conduct an orchestra," said Albert Scott Lyon of the Board of Fellows in introducting the famous virtuoso. "In 1908," he continued, "he formed an orchestra in Moscow which became one of the most notable in Europe. He toured Russia and other countries on the Continent. At his own expense he founded a publishing house designed to bring to light the works of young composers. He is a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor and on his return to Paris will conduct his sixth orchestral season there."

Dr. Faunce, in conferring the degree upon M. Koussevitzky, spoke of him as "a distinguished virtuoso and interpreter of the music of all peoples; leader of concerts in London, Madrid, Barcelona, and Warsaw, who has crossed the seas to convey to prosaic America some of his own insight into the arts in the universal language of music.

"Since M. Koussevitzky does not desire to use our English tongue in public," continued President Faunce, "he will respond in the language of music which a… can understand."

Rare Privilege

To hear Koussevitzky in the role … soloist is a rare privilege. Few inde… among the thousands of Boston Sympho… patrons have had that pleasure. T… many know and admire him as an orche… tral conductor, one whose remarka… qualities are revealed in his conceptio… of the great polyphonic works of th… classicists.

Like practically all orchestral leaders, Koussevitzky rose from the ranks. Before he became famous as conductor he was known as an exceptionally fine player upon the double bass, and his interest in and love for the great sonorous toned instrument has not been lessened by the exacting demands of conducting.

This was made evident yesterday when M. Koussevitzky played two numbers, first a sarabande, closing with an andante from his own concerto for double bass.

Although this instrument is not commonly heard in solo work it has great possibilities when so used in the hands of an artist. And Koussevitzky could be nothing else. His selections were melodious, not technically showy, and were given with finished style and expression. He owns a fine instrument, the tone of which rang pure and sweet in both numbers. The upper register of the double bass naturally is more effective for solo playing and the artist made these upper tones as musical and expressive as those of a 'cello.

An interesting and enjoyable performance, it brought treemndous applause from the appreciative listeners.

Mr. Andrews's Response

"I greatly appreciate the honor which Brown University has done me," said Mr. Andrews in his response, "and particularly in behalf of M. Koussevitzky I extend appreciation of this convocation."

He said that there … for m… comrades" in the … een for th…

drews was introduced by Dr. Bump… secretary of the corporation.

The guest's contribution to the af… was an exhibition of motion pictures … "stills" of his last two expeditions … Mongolia.

1926

183

KOUSSEVITSKY WILL PLAY APPRECIATION

Conductor of Symphony Orchestra to Get Degree at Brown and Render Double Bass Solo. Explorer Andrews Also To Be Honored

Honorary degrees will be conferred at Brown University for the fourth time since the World War when President W. H. P. Faunce in Sayles Hall this afternoon honors Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Roy Chapman Andrews, explorer of international renown.

The academic procession, which starts at 4 o'clock from the faculty rooms in University Hall, is expected to include scores of alumni in this city for annual visiting day. M. Koussevitsky will be presented by Albert Lyon Scott, class of 1900, with Dr. Herman Carey Bumpus, secretary of the Brown University Corporation, sponsoring Mr. Andrews.

The first and perhaps most notable conferring ceremony at Brown was in the fall of 1919, when the late Cardinal Mercier was awarded a Doctor of Laws degree on the steps of Rockefeller Hall. Marshal Foch was similarly honored in 1921, two years later, at the dedication of the Metcalf Chemical Laboratory. President James Rowland Angell of Yale was the university's guest.

Koussevitsky to Play Appreciation

For the first time in America Serge Koussevitsky will appear as a soloist to-day, playing the double bass.

Before he became a conductor M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso. When he was a student of music in Moscow the conservatory ruled that each pupil should master some instrument, and M. Koussevitsky chose the double bass, the great horn usually seen at the back of the orchestra. He became a virtuoso on this rare instrument, and later toured Europe and acquired a great reputation. He composed a concerto for the double bass, and his selection for to-day is the slow movement from that work.

In announcing that he would play to-day M Koussevitsky explained that his inability to speak the English language made it impossible for him to express in words his appreciation of the honor conferred by the university and so he decided to express it in terms of music. He will use an instrument dating from the 17th century which he brought with him when he first came to America.

Foch and

Ur ... ale ... of ... ngell, ... former Presi ... Michigan, and, b ... that office, editor o ... urnal. President Ange ... to his duties at New Haven in ..., is barred from receiving honorary degrees at Commencement time.

The special convocation to-morrow has been called because M. Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has contracts requiring his presence in Europe in June, and Mr. Andrews will sail about March 1 for Asia, where he will once more resume the fascinating task of hunting down traces of animal life of the ages when man was about as consequential in the scheme of things as an icicle is in the Arctic regions.

The glamor that attended the Mercier and Foch ceremonies may be missing to-morrow in Sayles Hall, but there is more than passing interest in the convocation because it will be the first time that any

---

...Conductor Plays Violin; Explorer Also Honored.

PROVIDENCE, Feb. 24—(AP) Appearing for the first time in this country as a soloist rather than a conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, responded in the medium of his art, when Brown University this afternoon conferred on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Music. He played with thrilling beauty upon a bass violin, Handel's Largo and the Andante from his own concert, composed some 20 years ago.

The university also honored Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer who has traced the origin of pre-historic man to Central Asia, conferring on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Science.

A ripple of applause greeted President W. P. H. Faunce's announcement that, "since M. Koussevitsky does not desire to use our English tongue in public, he will respond in the language of music which all can understand."

In his citation of Mr. Andrews Dr. Faunce said "Roy Chapman Andrews, indefatigable student and intrepid explorer who has made the dead past speak to the living present, and is making civilization realize its youth and the vast achievements yet to come."

the members of the corporation and the colorfully attored professors. The chairs had been removed from the hall and the audience composed of alumni and the general public, were to remain standing while Roy Chapman Andrews and Serge Koussevitzky were led to the platform in succession to receive their honorary degrees. As Mr. Andrews was to receive the brilliant yellow hood of doctor of science and M. Koussevitzky the beautiful pink velvet hood of doctor of music.

Visitors' day wil end at sunset with a dinner at the Faculty Club in honor of the newly-invested Dr. Andrews. M. Koussevitzky was not expected to be present because he was to return to Boston soon after receiving his degree.

Brown follows today a precedent established in 1919. In that year the degree of doctor of laws was conferred on the then Cardinal Mercier of Belgium. In 1921 there was another special convocation to honor Marshal Foch of France, and in 1923 President Angell of Yale was similarly honored.

In the present instance it was impossible to confer the degrees at the June commencement exercises because Mr. Andrews wil sail for Asia next week and M. Koussevitzky has summer engagements in Europe.

Miss Atkinso

A New Se

Free Cook

STARTING I

Course XI.—

(This Course is Intended Prospective Brides, But is Beginning Monday, Mar

Course XII.--"Dis

... and ... world.

... checks, money ... transfer money by cable to any part of the ... also issue commercial letters of credit and future delivery of exchange.

---

successfu

KOUSSEVITSKY IN U. S. DEBUT AS DOUBLE BASS SOLOIST

Conductor of Boston Symphony to Play After Receiving Honorary Degree at Brown University.

Providence, R. I., Feb. 24.—(AP)—For the first time in America, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will appear as a soloist to-day. He will play the double bass at a special convocation of Brown university called for the purpose of conferring Honorary degrees on M. Koussevitsky and Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer.

Before he became a conductor M. Koussevitsky was widely known in Europe as a double bass virtuoso. When he was a student of music in Moscow the conservatory ruled that each pupil should master some instrument, and M. Koussevitsky chose the double bass, the great horn usually seen at the back of the orchestra. He became a virtuoso on this rare instrument, and later toured Europe and acquired a great reputation. He composed a concerto for the double bass, and his selection for to-day is the slow movement from that work.

In announcing that he would play to-day M. Koussevitsky made it impossible for him to express in words his appreciation of the honor conferred by the university and so he decided to express it in terms of music. He will use an instrument dating from the seventeenth century which he brought with him when he first came to America.

Brown University will follow a pprecedent established in 1919 when it confers honorary degrees on Mr. Andrews and M. Koussevitsky at special convocation. In that year the degree of doctor of laws was conferred on the late Cardinal Mercier of Belgium. In 1921 there was another special convocation to honor Marshal Foch of France, and in 1923 President Angell of Yale was similarly honored.

In the present instance it was impossible to confer the degrees at the June commencement exercises because Mr Andrews will sail for Asia next week and M. Koussevitsky has summer engagements in Europe.

C. S. Monitor Feb 27th

Boston Orchestra Plays New Work by H. F. Gilbert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its seventeenth Friday afternoon concert of the season in Symphony Hall, Boston, yesterday. The program, to be repeated this evening, follows:

Haydn—Symphony in G major, "The Surprise"
H. F. Gilbert—Symphonic Piece
Strauss—"Don Juan"
Ravel — Orchestral Fragments from "Daphnis et Chloé" Ballet (Second Suite)

This was Mr. Koussevitzky's first Boston appearance since he acquired the new dignity of a Doctor of Music of Brown University, and there was a touch of extra warmth in the applause that greeted him as he came upon the platform.

Mr. Gilbert's work had its first performance at this concert. According to notes supplied by the composer, it has no program, but is intended as absolute music; indeed, was designed originally as the first movement of a symphony. Nevertheless, he has tried to reflect in it the "American spirit," which, "as I see it, is energetic — optimistic — nervous — impatient of restraint—and, in its highest aspect, a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit, which is America, is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration. Plenty of jingoism, vulgarity and 'hurrah boys!' attaches to it, but the spirit of the new-birth underlies all, for him who can see it."

Using the composer's own terminology, a single hearing of the piece leaves one aware less of the "new birth of the human spirit" than of the jingoism and vulgarity, and also the sentimentality, that characterize certain phases of American life. There are reminiscences of "Johnny get your gun" and of "Go down Moses"; there is plenty of hurrah-ing, some syncopation and a touch of jazz; there is vast exuberance, with an appropriate flavor of dissonance; but if "the spirit of the new-birth" underlies this music, then the present reviewer, at least on a first hearing, is not one of those who can see it. Did not the composer's gifts find a more suitable means of expression in "The Dance in Place Congo" and the Negro Rhapsody—more frankly program music?

This is not to say that the "symphonic piece" is without merit. On the contrary, it is well contrived music, and if its thematic material seems somewhat commonplace, and if one gets the effect of a good deal of repetition, still the piece has those qualities of color and effectiveness that may well have their appeal. Yesterday, for example, the composer was called to the platform several times to acknowledge the applause.

Haydn's symphony, with its little trick which seems now so naïvely charming, was heard with pleasure. The Andante and the Menuetto proceeded at a rather German pace, it is true, but the Allegro di molto was performed with a delightfully Hadyn-esque quality.

It is a curious custom, though, that Mr. Koussevitzky has developed, of stilling applause, but nevertheless permitting a long pause, between movements of a symphony. If latecomers are to be admitted, why raise the magisterial hand against manifestations of approval? The mood is broken in any event. And if there is to be no applause, why not go on with the story?

Mr. Koussevitzky evidently has a strong affection for Strauss. At two pairs of concerts this season the "Alpine Symphony," at another "Tod und Verklärung" and now "Don Juan." Or perhaps the conductor wants to remind his audiences that there was a time when Strauss really looked as if he might become Richard the Second. By all means, if we are to have Strauss, let it be the dazzling young Pretender of those earlier years. Except for one most distressing lapse, the performance yesterday was brilliant. So was that of the Ravel, though the placing of it after the Strauss was not the happiest of arrangements.

L. A. S.

Medieval reasoning sometimes carries wholesome humor. Professor Chadwick, at Williams College, tells his students that "were it not for the bumblebee England would not be mistress of the seas." He explained that "the strong men of England who reign supreme on the seas" are beef eaters. The lowly bumblebee, he added, fertilized the clover: the cattle ate the clover passed for a time to France, and during the first decade and a half Debussy and Ravel were the composers of the hour as French impressionism swept the world of music. Therewith even Richard Strauss became "old hat" to the cognoscenti, while picturesque as they were, even the Russians could not actually dispute the Parisian rule. Then, in Igor Stravinsky, Russia did in fact produce a champion who definitely vanquished the Gauls, and although a small group of composers has preferred to follow in the footsteps of the Viennese Schoenberg, Stravinsky's has been, and for that matter still remains, the dominating contemporary influence.

---

Where Schoenberg fits in the scheme of things may not yet be definitely determined. Surely after Strauss he is the most important composer of the German-speaking lands. But his dissonant, keyless music is still the horror of the conservative, and it is easy to believe it quite as much contrived as inspired. It is, however, one of the two chief currents of modern music, the atonal, that has its source in him, while it is Stravinsky who has chiefly furthered, if he did not actually father, the other, that of polytony, or the simultaneous employment of more than one key.

Hindemith, it would seem, writes atonal or polytonal music at pleasure, and now and again he condescends to the old-fashioned major and minor. His use of the first-named idiom has particularly distressed Richard Strauss, who is reported to have said to his younger confrere: "But why do you write atonally, when you have talent?"

It is by a Concerto for Orchestra, Opus 38, that Hindemith is now to be represented at the Symphony Concerts. Whether it is written atonally, polytonally or tonally—or in all three styles—remains to be seen. In any event its performance should prove one of the major events of the Symphony season.

FEB 2 5

BROWN PAYS HONOR TO NOTED EXPLORER, SYMPHONY LEADER

Serge Kousevitzky and Roy C. Chapman Receive Honorary Degrees.—Former Responds With Double Bass Solo.—Latter's Love of Mankind Praised

In conferring honorary degrees yesterday upon Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and upon Roy Chapman Andrews, discoverer of the traces of Neanderthal or Stone Age man in the Gobi desert of China, President W. H. P. Faunce of Brown University described the famous Russian as "a distinguished virtuso and interpreter of the music of all peoples," and Mr. Andrews as "an indefatigable student and intrepid explorer."

M. Koussevitzky responded in the medium of his art to Brown's tribute to his genius in awarding him the honorary degree of Doctor of Music, while Mr. Andrews, in a gracious speech, acknowledging the university's presentation to him of the honorary degree of Doctor of Science, expressed his appreciation of the support that graduates of Brown had given him in his undertakings, and said that "through them I came to admire and love this great university."

Mr. Andrews Presented

In presenting Mr. Andrews, Dr. Herman Carey Bumpus of the Board of Fellows described him as a native of Wisconsin, a graduate of Beloit College and a recipient of the degree of Master of Arts from Columbia University.

"At the age of 24," continued Dr. Bumpus, "he began the study of marine mammalia, penetrating to the most remote parts of the Atlantic and Pacific. In 1912 he entered Korea and followed the Yellow river from its source to the sea. He labored in Alaska. In the war he served us in Mongolia.

"But it is because of his high ideals, his determination, his singular form of kindly leadership, his fondness for men and their fondness for him," continued Dr. Bumpus, "that the Board of Fellows commends him to you as worthy of special distinction."

In conferring the degree upon Mr. Andrews, President W. H. P. Faunce said in part: "Roy Chapman Andrews, indefatigable student and intrepid explorer who has made the dead past speak to the living present and is making civilization realize its youth and the vast achievements yet to come."

Koussevitzky's Career

"Born in Russia, M. Koussevitzky at the age of 12 began to conduct an orchestra," said Albert Scott Lyon of the Board of Fellows in introducting the famous virtuoso. "In 1908," he continued, "he formed an orchestra in Moscow which became one of the most notable in Europe. He toured Russia and other countries on the Continent. At his own expense he founded a publishing house designed to bring to light the works of young composers. He is a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor and on his return to Paris will conduct his sixth orchestral season there."

Dr. Faunce, in conferring the degree upon M. Koussevitzky, spoke of him as "a distinguished virtuoso and interpreter of the music of all peoples; leader of concerts in London, Madrid, Barcelona, and Warsaw, who has crossed the seas to convey to prosaic America some of his own insight into the arts in the universal language of music.

"Since M. Koussevitzky does not desire to use our English tongue in public," continued President Faunce, "he will respond in the language of music which a... can understand."

Rare Privilege

To hear Koussevitzky in the role ... soloist is a rare privilege. Few inde... among the thousands of Boston Sympho... patrons have had that pleasure. T... many know and admire him as an orche... tral conductor, one whose remarkab... qualities are revealed in his conceptio... of the great polyphonic works of th... classicists.

Like practically all orchestral leaders, Koussevitzky rose from the ranks. Before he became famous as conductor he was known as an exceptionally fine player upon the double bass, and his interest in and love for the great sonorous ... instrument has not been lessened by the exacting demands of conducting.

This was made evident yesterday when M. Koussevitzky played two numbers, first a sarabande, closing with an andante from his own concerto for double bass.

Although this instrument is not commonly heard in solo work it has great possibilities when so used in the hands of an artist. And Koussevitzky could be nothing else. His selections were melodious, not technically showy, and were given with finished style and expression. He owns a fine instrument, the tone of which rang pure and sweet in both numbers. The upper register of the double bass naturally is more effective for solo playing and the artist made these upper tones as musical and expressive as those of a 'cello.

An interesting and enjoyable performance, it brought treemndous applause from the appreciative listeners.

Mr. Andrews's Response

"I greatly appreciate the honor which Brown University has done me," said Mr. Andrews in his response, "and particularly in behalf of M. Koussevitzky I extend appreciation of this convocation."

He said that there ... for m... comrades" in the ... men for th...

drews was introduced by Dr. Bumpus, secretary of the corporation.

The guest's contribution to the affair was an exhibition of motion pictures and "stills" of his last two expeditions into Mongolia.

184

SYMPHONY GLORIFIES AMERICAN

Boston Post
Feb 27

Gilberts' "Piece" Warms Orchestra and Audience

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The possibilities, the potential eloquence, of Simon-pure Americanism in music, were put to the test at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon in the performance of a new "Symphonic Piece" from the hand of Henry F. Gilbert. And the outcome may hardly be set down either as failure or yet as unqualified triumph.

RAGTIME AND FIDDLE TUNE

More than any other among the American composers entitled to serious consideration Mr. Gilbert has ever endeavored to voice in his music a national consciousness, by which token some have not hestitated to proclaim him our foremost music-maker. Conceiving the term "American" in the broader sense of non-European, Mr. Gilbert has in the past made use from time to time of Negro and Indian themes, but in this "Symphonic Piece" of yesterday he has eschewed, and wisely, these spiritual if not geographical exotics.

In rough analysis this "Symphonic Piece" may be described as a Gilbertian blend of rag-time Fosterian sentiment and fiddle-tune, the whole enriched by modern harmonic, polyphonic and orchestral resource. That the American composer should in such manner draw his strength from the musical soil of his own country many have long believed.

Characteristic Idioms

We have had more than enough of music near-German, semi-French, quasi-Russian or pseudo-Oriental. Yet there is no blinking the fact that in its original state our folk-material, though not without vitality, is hardly distinguished. And although Mr. Gilbert has indulged in no thematic borrowings beyond a passing reference to "Old Folks at Home" and the "Arkansas Traveller," he has nevertheless relied upon the characteristic American idioms to an extent well-nigh unprecedented in symphonic composition. In so doing, while he has achieved vigor, he has not wholly escaped banality, but for all that the exhilaration, the tonic quality of his piece are as indisputable as its excellent workmanship, its strength of facture, and that the audience of yesterday warmed to it was evident.

Brought to the stage by Mr. Koussevitzky, the composer was accorded a prolonged ovation.

Koussevitzky Likes It

In retrospect it is possible to wonder whether our familiarity with the idioms from which Mr. Gilbert moulded his "Symphonic Piece" would not inevitably engender some feeling of contempt for the resultant structure. By way of comparison it would be an invaluable—if impossible—experience to hear certain pieces by Tchaikovsky with Russian or some of Grieg with Norwegian ears. And in this connection it should be noted that Mr. Koussevitzky, to whom it must sound a little strange, is said tremendously to admire Mr. Gilbert's piece. Surely enthusiasm was evident in his conducting of it.

To make the rest of an exceptionally brilliant and entertaining concert came a delightful performance of Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, a vivid and stirring performance of Strauss' "Don Juan," and one of like qualities of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," played here earlier in the season and then, as yesterday, to be recognized as a triumph of orchestral virtuosity.

BIG CARGO OF HARD COAL REACHES HUB

Another big shipment of foreign coal arrived in the harbor yesterday, in the holds of the British steamer Wilston, Captain W. D. Davidson, coming in after a 26-day passage from Port Talbot, Wales. Stormy weather delayed the progress of the freighter to such an extent that she was a full week late in reaching port. Her cargo consisted of 4747 tons of anthracite for the Metropolitan Coal Company. Three full cargoes of fuel arrived Thursday, and several others are due in the next few days.

Many people earn money today on part-time occupation. The Boston Post Classified Ads bring together those seeking this kind of sales-aid and those wanting such work.

HONORED BY BROWN UNIVERSITY

Two prominent figures in music and science were awarded degrees at Brown University by President Faunce, shown in the center. At the left is Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was given the degree of doctor of music; and at the right is Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer, given the degree of doctor of science.

THREE ORCHESTRAS, THREE CONDUCTORS, VARIOUS PLEASURES

Trans Feb 15

"PINES OF ROME" IN EXCELLING REPETITION

A Performance at Acme—Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Toscanini—Mr. Goodrich, the People's Band and a New Fantasia for Piano from Mr. Converse—Mr. Schelling Exhibits a Prodigy-Child

REPEATING Respighi's new tone-poem on Saturday evening before an audience that outpoured applause, Mr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra excelled themselves. Since the golden age of the band under Dr. Muck there has been no such performance, in Symphony Hall, of a virtuoso-piece. To the old acme, from the foundations laid by Mr. Monteux, the conductor has now lifted the new orchestra. If practised, susceptible, remembering ear-witnesses are to be trusted, he also fell not a whit below Mr. Toscanini in heightening response to Respighi's matter and mood. At Mr. Koussevitzky's hands, the march of the legions was no less multitudinous tumult and imperial proclamation. Equally expert were the two conductors with the rhythmic intricacies of the playing children; while neither exceeded the other in the grave ecstasy of the music of the catacombs, or the sensuous loveliness of the music of the night.

It was in the quality of the orchestra—the informed say—that the performance in Boston of "Pines of Rome" excelled those "incomparable" performances among the Manhattanese. Masterful and inspiriting as Mr. Toscanini is, he could not whip the Philharmonic Society to such prowess as the Symphony Orchestra readily returned. The texture of its tone through the night-piece was a miracle of richness, transparency and suffused beauty. The pace, pliancy and certainty, the sheer velocity and volatility, with which it tossed off the children's music, were equal marvel. On the wing, as it were, it wove an intricate tonal pattern with the lightest of hands and the gayest of spirits. A deep and lustrous resonance permeated the chant of the catacombs; while the legions' march ran the gamut of orchestral frenzy and orchestral power. As marshal was Mr. Koussevitzky to this rhythming, pounding clanging, glittering instrumental host. In the new orchestra of 1925-26 stood the old orchestra of 1915-16 renewed. Ten years of vicissitude have not been too much to pay.

As for the much-mooted nightingale, that prisoned and phonographic bird cut no better figure on Saturday than it had on Friday. Mr. Holy is a highly accomplished harpist; but he proved an indifferent hand in the adjustment of a Victrola; while frequent usage has made the record itself worn and scratchy. There are, it appears, "dry" spots in a nightingale's song and Respighi's fowl did not escape the fate of the species. At his best he piped and trilled but feebly, diminished, as it seemed, by the superior works of men around him—the clarinet, the flute or the shimmering strings. They, and not a phonograph; Respighi's pen, and not a bird's throat, should have sung the nightingale's song. Long since, Stravinsky, writing his opera-ballet-tone-poem, chose this wiser way.

H. T. P.

At Best Bostonian

LES CONCERTS "La Patrie"

"LA SYMPHONIE DE BOSTON"

Montreal

Au Forum, sous la direction de Serge Koussevitzky.

L'orchestre symphonique de Boston est venu donner un concert au F rum, hier soir. Salle enthousiaste, élégante, qui a fait une chaleureuse ception à Koussevitzky et à ses musiciens.

C'est le pivilège du véritable chef-d'orchestre d'imprimer sa perso nalité, le génie de son interprétation, aux musiciens qu'il dirige, et comn l'écrit Camille Bellaigue dans ses "Impressions musicales et littéraires", chef d'orchestre est l'auteur et le créateur silencieux d'un monde sonor Voilà pourquoi le chef d'orchestre accomplit une étrange et magnifique fonc tion d'art. C'est l'expression d'une volonté personnelle et obéie.

On a dit justement que le chef qui manie avec tant de puissance cett pâte sonore joue lui-même en quelque sorte de l'orchestre; mais très supé rieur au virtuose, le chef d'orchestre est le moins jaloux et le plus sincère d tous les artistes. Au lieu de faire tort aux autres il les fait valoir, les éclaire les initie, les inspire.

Pour cette raison, un groupe d'instrumentistes de premier ordre qui sous un autre chef, donnerait une interprétation quelconque prend, sous direction d'un maître, un caractère hautement supérieur.

Tel est le cas de la Symphonie de Boston dirigée par Koussevitzky.

Le programme d'hier soir a débuté par l'ouverture d'"Euryanthe" de Wéber et la "Symphonie Pathétique" de Tschaikowsky. La seconde partie consacrée à l'école française, nous a fait entendre "L'apprenti Sorcier" de Dukas, les "Escales" de Jacques Ibert, et enfin la "Marche Hongroise" de Berlioz" cette page éblouissante où s'affirment les dons de coloris et de richesse instrumentale de l'auteur de la "Damnation de Faust", précurseu de l'orchestration moderne.

Dès l'apparition de Koussevitzky au pupitre, l'auditoire sentit qu'un maître dominait l'orchestre. Après l'ouverture d'"Euryante" exécutée d'une manière toute frémissante, ce fut la "Symphonie Pathétique" de Tschaikowsky, aimée du public et dont les thèmes chantés avec ferveur révélèrent les beaux éléments sonores de l'orchestre et les nuances bien ménagées passant des pianissimos les plus lointains aux forte pleins d'ampleurs et d'une sonorité toujours moëlleuse.

Admirons en passant le calme, la pondération, la sensibilit la belle ordonnance du rythme de la phrase, même dans les mouvements rapides. C'est par des sanglots que se termine cette symphonie. Comb Koussevitzky a su en indiquer l'expression profonde et tour à tour en var les effets!

On a remarqué, au début, l'ensemble parfait des contrebasses do l'unisson fut véritablement prodigieux. De même le thème confié aux violoncelles fut chanté avec un élan chaleureux. Disons aussi que le hautbois, dans la seconde partie des "Escales" et le basson, dans l'"Apprenti Sorcier" de Paul Dukas se sont montrés individuellement colorés et spirituels.

L'intérêt capital du programme, pour ceux qui s'intéressent au mouvement musical contemporain, fut fourni par les "Escales" de Jacques Ibert. Ce poème symphonique est une véritable série de tableaux frémissants de vie, hauts en couleur.

Il est évident que nous faisons escale dans quelque port d'Orient où mille bruits sonores viennent encadrer de langoureuses mélopées soupirées par le hautbois.

Le poème de Jacques Ibert débute par un solo de flute avec un accompagnement très rythmé de cordes, en sourdine. Parmi le coloris des harpes, des bois et des cordes, ce thème est répété, développé à l'infini pour arriver à un fortissimo éclatant. C'est la première partie: de "Rome à Palerme". Puis les trompettes et les cors alternent leurs sonorités. Le calme revient avec le thème du début. Dans la seconde partie, le hautbois domin du commencement à la fin; cependant l'accompagnement n'est pas languissant, il est au contraire tambouriné par les seconds violons et les violoncelles et d'une jolie couleur orientale. La troisième partie, "Valence" semble directement inspirée des rhapsodies espagnoles de Chabrier: il y a une grande richesse mélodique et l'on surprend le thème de "Rome à Palerme" qui vient s'enchaîner aux autres. L'oeuvre est descriptive à souhait et utilise toutes les ressources de l'orchestre. Son originalité est incontestable.

La "Marche Hongroise" de Berlioz terminait le concert. Nous avons entendu souvent cette pièce bâtie sur des thèmes bohémiens aux rythmes irréguliers; elle possède tout le charme sauvage de la musique des tziganes. L'interprétation qu'en a donné Koussevitzky a fait ressortir magnifiquement l'orchestration de Berlioz qui demeure un modèle du genre. Vivement applaudi, Koussevitzky dût reprendre la "Marche Hongroise" à la demande du public et termina ainsi ce concert qui peut être considéré comme l'événement capital de la saison.

Henri LETONDAL.

184

SYMPHONY GLORIFIES AMERICAN

Boston Post
Feb. 7

Gilberts' "Piece" Warms Orchestra and Audience

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The possibilities, the potential eloquence, of Simon-pure Americanism in music, were put to the test at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon in the performance of a new "Symphonic Piece" from the hand of Henry F. Gilbert. And the outcome may hardly be set down either as failure or yet as unqualified triumph.

RAGTIME AND FIDDLE TUNE

More than any other among the American composers entitled to serious consideration Mr. Gilbert has ever endeavored to voice in his music a national consciousness, by which token some have not hestitated to proclaim him our foremost music-maker. Conceiving the term "American" in the broader sense of non-European, Mr. Gilbert has in the past made use from time to time of Negro and Indian themes, but in this "Symphonic Piece" of yesterday he has eschewed, and wisely, these spiritual if not geographical exotics.

In rough analysis this "Symphonic Piece" may be described as a Gilbertian blend of rag-time Fosterian sentiment and fiddle-tune, the whole enriched by modern harmonic, polyphonic and orchestral resource. That the American composer should in such manner draw his strength from the musical soil of his own country many have long believed.

Characteristic Idioms

We have had more than enough of music near-German, semi-French, quasi-Russian or pseudo-Oriental. Yet there is no blinking the fact that in its original state our folk-material, though not without vitality, is hardly distinguished. And although Mr. Gilbert has indulged in no thematic borrowings beyond a passing reference to "Old Folks at Home" and the "Arkansas Traveller," he has nevertheless relied upon the characteristic American idioms to an extent well-nigh unprecedented in symphonic composition. In so doing, while he has achieved vigor, he has not wholly escaped banality, but for all that the exhilaration, the tonic quality of his piece are as indisputable as its excellent workmanship, its strength of facture, and that the audience of yesterday warmed to it was evident.

Brought to the stage by Mr. Koussevitzky, the composer was accorded a prolonged ovation.

Koussevitzky Likes It

In retrospect it is possible to wonder whether our familiarity with the idioms from which Mr. Gilbert moulded his "Symphonic Piece" would not inevitably engender some feeling of contempt for the resultant structure. By way of comparison it would be an invaluable—if impossible—experience to hear certain pieces by Tchaikovsky with Russian or some of Grieg with Norwegian ears. And in this connection it should be noted that Mr. Koussevitzky, to whom it must sound a little strange, is said tremendously to admire Mr. Gilbert's piece. Surely enthusiasm was evident in his conducting of it.

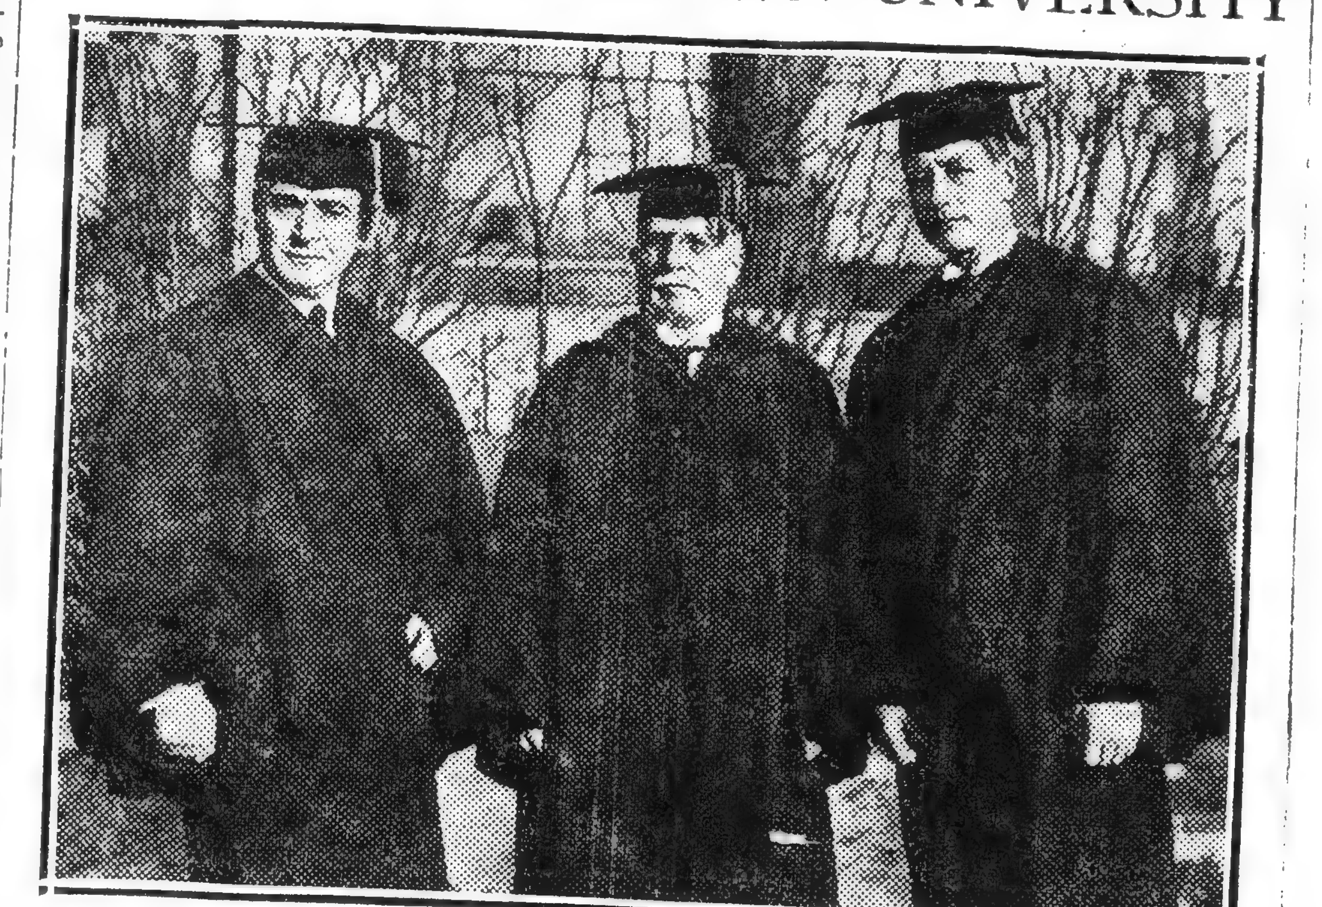
To make the rest of an exceptionally brilliant and entertaining concert came a delightful performance of Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, a vivid and stirring performance of Strauss' "Don Juan," and one of like qualities of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," played here earlier in the season and then, as yesterday, to be recognized as a triumph of orchestral virtuosity.

BIG CARGO OF HARD COAL REACHES HUB

Another big shipment of foreign coal arrived in the harbor yesterday, in the holds of the British steamer Wilston, Captain W. D. Davidson, coming in after a 26-day passage from Port Talbot, Wales. Stormy weather delayed the progress of the freighter to such an extent that she was a full week late in reaching port. Her cargo consisted of 4747 tons of anthracite for the Metropolitan Coal Company. Three full cargoes of fuel arrived Thursday, and several others are due in the next few days.

Many people earn money today on part-time occupation. The Boston Post Classified Ads bring together those seeking this kind of sales-aid and those wanting such work.

HONORED BY BROWN UNIVERSITY



Two prominent figures in music and science were awarded degrees at Brown University by President Faunce, shown in the center. At the left is Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was given the degree of doctor of music; and at the right is Roy Chapman Andrews, the explorer, given the degree of doctor of science.

THREE ORCHESTRAS, THREE CONDUCTORS, VARIOUS PLEASURES

Trans Feb 15

"PINES OF ROME" IN EXCELLING REPETITION

A Performance at Acme—Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Toscanini—Mr. Goodrich, the People's Band and a New Fantasia for Piano from Mr. Converse—Mr. Schelling Exhibits a Prodigy-Child

REPEATING Respighi's new tone-poem on Saturday evening before an audience that outpoured applause, Mr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra excelled themselves. Since the golden age of the band under Dr. Muck there has been no such performance, in Symphony Hall, of a virtuoso-piece. To the old acme, from the foundations laid by Mr. Monteux, the conductor has now lifted the new orchestra. If practised, susceptible, remembering ear-witnesses are to be trusted, he also fell not a whit below Mr. Toscanini in heightening response to Respighi's matter and mood. At Mr. Koussevitzky's hands, the march of the legions was no less multitudinous tumult and imperial proclamation. Equally expert were the two conductors with the rhythmic intricacies of the playing children; while neither exceeded the other in the grave ecstasy of the music of the catacombs, or the sensuous loveliness of the music of the night.

It was in the quality of the orchestra—the informed say—that the performance in Boston of "Pines of Rome" excelled those "incomparable" performances among the Manhattanese. Masterful and inspiriting as Mr. Toscanini is, he could not whip the Philharmonic Society to such prowess as the Symphony Orchestra readily returned. The texture of its tone through the night-piece was a miracle of richness, transparency and suffused beauty. The pace, pliancy and certainty, the sheer velocity and volatility, with which it tossed off the children's music, were equal marvel. On the wing, as it were, it wove an intricate tonal pattern with the lightest of hands and the gayest of spirits. A deep and lustrous resonance permeated the chant of the catacombs; while the legions' march ran the gamut of orchestral frenzy and orchestral power. As marshal was Mr. Koussevitzky to this rhythming, pounding clanging, glittering instrumental host. In the new orchestra of 1925-26 stood the old orchestra of 1915-16 renewed. Ten years of vicissitude have not been too much to pay.

As for the much-mooted nightingale, that prisoned and phonographic bird cut no better figure on Saturday than it had on Friday. Mr. Holy is a highly accomplished harpist; but he proved an indifferent hand in the adjustment of a Victrola; while frequent usage has made the record itself worn and scratchy. There are, it appears, "dry" spots in a nightingale's song and Respighi's fowl did not escape the fate of the species. At his best he piped and trilled but feebly, diminished, as it seemed, by the superior works of men around him—the clarinet, the flute or the shimmering strings. They, and not a phonograph; Respighi's pen, and not a bird's throat, should have sung the nightingale's song. Long since, Stravinsky, writing his opera-ballet-tone-poem, chose this wiser way.

H. T. P.

At Best Bostorian

LES CONCERTS "La Patrie"

"LA SYMPHONIE DE BOSTON"

Montreal

Au Forum, sous la direction de Serge Koussevitzky.

L'orchestre symphonique de Boston est venu donner un concert au F rum, hier soir. Salle enthousiaste, élégante, qui a fait une chaleureuse ception à Koussevitzky et à ses musiciens.

C'est le pivilège du véritable chef-d'orchestre d'imprimer sa perso nalité, le génie de son interprétation, aux musiciens qu'il dirige, et comn l'écrit Camille Bellaigue dans ses "Impressions musicales et littéraires", chef d'orchestre est l'auteur et le créateur silencieux d'un monde sonor Voilà pourquoi le chef d'orchestre accomplit une étrange et magnifique fonc tion d'art. C'est l'expression d'une volonté personnelle et obéie.

On a dit justement que le chef qui manie avec tant de puissance cett pâte sonore joue lui-même en quelque sorte de l'orchestre; mais très supé rieur au virtuose, le chef d'orchestre est le moins jaloux et le plus sincère d tous les artistes. Au lieu de faire tort aux autres il les fait valoir, les éclaire les initie, les inspire.

Pour cette raison, un groupe d'instrumentistes de premier ordre qui sous un autre chef, donnerait une interprétation quelconque prend, sous direction d'un maître, un caractère hautement supérieur.

Tel est le cas de la Symphonie de Boston dirigée par Koussevitzky.

Le programme d'hier soir a débuté par l'ouverture d'"Euryanthe" de Wéber et la "Symphonie Pathétique" de Tschaikowsky. La seconde partie consacrée à l'école française, nous a fait entendre "L'apprenti Sorcier" de Dukas, les "Escales" de Jacques Ibert, et enfin la "Marche Hongroise" de Berlioz" cette page éblouissante où s'affirment les dons de coloris et de richesse instrumentale de l'auteur de la "Damnation de Faust", précurseu de l'orchestration moderne.

Dès l'apparition de Koussevitzky au pupitre, l'auditoire sentit qu'un maître dominait l'orchestre. Après l'ouverture d'"Euryante" exécutée d'une manière toute frémissante, ce fut la "Symphonie Pathétique" de Tschaikowsky, aimée du public et dont les thèmes chantés avec ferveur révélèrent les beaux éléments sonores de l'orchestre et les nuances bien ménagées passant des pianissimos les plus lointains aux forte pleins d'ampleurs et d'une sonorité toujours moëlleuse.

Admirons en passant le calme, la pondération, la sensibilit la belle ordonnance du rythme de la phrase, même dans les mouvements rapides. C'est par des sanglots que se termine cette symphonie. Comb Koussevitzky a su en indiquer l'expression profonde et tour à tour en va les effets!

On a remarqué, au début, l'ensemble parfait des contrebasses do l'unisson fut véritablement prodigieux. De même le thème confié aux violoncelles fut chanté avec un élan chaleureux. Disons aussi que le hautbois, dans la seconde partie des "Escales" et le basson, dans l'"Apprenti Sorcier" de Paul Dukas se sont montrés individuellement colorés et spirituels.

L'intérêt capital du programme, pour ceux qui s'intéressent au mouvement musical contemporain, fut fourni par les "Escales" de Jacques Ibert. Ce poème symphonique est une véritable série de tableaux frémissants de vie, hauts en couleur.

Il est évident que nous faisons escale dans quelque port d'Orient où mille bruits sonores viennent encadrer de langoureuses mélopées soupirées par le hautbois.

Le poème de Jacques Ibert débute par un solo de flute avec un accompagnement très rythmé de cordes, en sourdine. Parmi le cōloris des harpes, des bois et des cordes, ce thème est répété, développé à l'infini pour arriver à un fortissimo éclatant. C'est la première partie: de "Rome à Palerme". Puis les trompettes et les cors alternent leurs sonorités. Le calme revient avec le thème du début. Dans la seconde partie, le hautbois domin du commencement à la fin; cependant l'accompagnement n'est pas languissant, il est au contraire tambouriné par les seconds violons et les violoncelles et d'une jolie couleur orientale. La troisième partie, "Valence" semble directement inspirée des rhapsodies espagnoles de Chabrier: il y a une grande richesse mélodique et l'on surprend le thème de "Rome à Palerme" qui vient s'enchaîner aux autres. L'oeuvre est descriptive à souhait et utilise toutes les ressources de l'orchestre. Son originalité est incontestable.

La "Marche Hongroise" de Berlioz terminait le concert. Nous avons entendu souvent cette pièce bâtie sur des thèmes bohémiens aux rythmes irréguliers; elle possède tout le charme sauvage de la musique des tziganes. L'interprétation qu'en a donné Koussevitzky a fait ressortir magnifiquement l'orchestration de Berlioz qui demeure un modèle du genre. Vivement applaudi, Koussevitzky dût reprendre la "Marche Hongroise" à la demande du public et termina ainsi ce concert qui peut être considéré comme l'événement capital de la saison.

Henri LETONDAL.

THE PROVIDENCE JOURNAL, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1926

MEN HONORED WITH HONORARY DEGREES BY BROWN UNIVERSITY IN SPECIAL CONVOCATION IN SAYLES HALL YESTERDAY, AND PRESIDENT WILLIAM H. P. FAUNCE

Serge Koussevitzky, at Left, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Is Made Doctor of Music, While at the Right Is Roy Chapman Andrews, Explorer, Who Received the Degree of Doctor of Science. The Degrees Were Presented at Thibs Time Rather Than at the June Commencement, Because M. Koussevitzky Has Summer Engagements in Europe and Mr. Andrews Sails for Asia Next Week Where He Will Explore the Gobi Desert.

Providence Journal Photo

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAPH

MAR 1 2 1926

The Bostonians.

A visit of Serge Koussevitzky and his men usually brings some new piece of music before the New York public, and last night's concert at Carnegie was no exception. The novelty this time was Henry Gilbert's latest effort to promote Americanism in music, called "Symphonic Piece."

It attempted to give an idea of the character of American ideas, with "plenty of jingoism," but with the spirit of a new birth underlying all. Mr. Gilbert, in his Bostonian way, has introduced jazz cadences and negro thematic material to

---

Symphony Conductor in His Academic Robes

HERALD MAR 1st

(Photo by Bachrach)
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Recently made doctor of music by Brown University.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

MAR 7 1926

Musical Notes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its last appearance of the season, which will also conclude the Providence series of concerts, in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, March 16th.

Serge Koussevitzky will introduce a notable novelty on this occasion, Respighi's "Pines of Rome." This symphonic poem, by one of the foremost of living Italian composers, has been received with much enthusiasm in the principal cities of the United States, this season. It was introduced in Boston by Koussevitzky and met with so much favor, that it is to be repeated by popular request at the regular concerts there. Respighi's score describes four parts of the capital city in which pines grow. It is pictorial music. The first movement entitled "The Pines of the Villa Borghese," is riotous and rollicking with a suggestion of children's games. The second, entitled "The Pines Near a Catacomb," introduces a trumpet solo off stage, giving the illusion of distance. Then comes a nocturne entitled, "The Pines of the Janiculum," in which the voice of the nightingale is introduced by the use of a phonograph record which reproduces the actual bird call. This innovation has caused much comment.

The closing movement, "The Pines of the Appian Way," depicts the victorious return of the ancient Roman soldiers to their city, through the historical entrance. The modern form of the ancient Roman Bucina is used. The striding tramp of the army is heard, at first softly as it approaches, but growing louder and louder. Gradually an overwhelming mass of sound is piled up, finally bringing one of the most impressing climaxes in music. The concert will open with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F major, the lyrical and humorous symphony which introduces as a slow movement a delightful burlesque of the metronome, an instrument newly invented in the composer's time.

Koussevitzky will close this, his last Providence appearance, with three excerpts from the music dramas of Wagner; the introduction to the third act of the "Mastersingers," the prelude to the same drama, and the "Overture to Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
Times - Picayune

MAR [illegible]

Double-Bass Success

MUSICAL talent has strange ways and manifests itself in freakish directions. There, for instance, is Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which statement is enough to place the maestro in the very forefront of musical ability. To do honor to the leader last week Brown university conferred upon him an honorary degree, in response to which M. Koussevitzky journeyed to Providence and there before a convocation of the university performed an elaborate composition on the—double-bass violin! And that indeed is the solo instrument upon which the master won fame long before he had earned a place among the world's finest orchestra directors.

In the nineties of the last century Koussevitzky toured Europe giving recitals on the big instrument. He was then recognized as one of the greatest if not the greatest master of the cumbersome "fiddle," having been surpassed, if at all, only by Bottesini, the noted Italian who for many years dwelt in Havana, Cuba. We do not know whether Koussevitzky like his Italian confrere used a special instrument somewhat less in size than the customary double-bass for his solo work.

It happens that Bottesini also became an able orchestral leader and composer and by an odd coincidence both musicians came to select their favorite instrument not by choice but by necessity. Both men were conservatoire pupils, one in Russia, the other in Italy, and in both the great music schools there were orchestras made up of pupils. Bottesini and Koussevitzky alike were eager ta play, but found all the desirable places occupied by older matriculants. In both cases, however, the awkward double-bass berth was empty and the young musicians grabbed the chance and thus, almost by accident, grabbed fame and a ladder to fortune.

And Koussevitzky, when made doctor of music by Brown university, returned for an hour to his beloved instrument, playing one movement from a double-bass sonata of his own composition.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

MAR 9 1926

SOCIAL EVENTS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WILL GIVE CONCERT TONIGHT

There Are Still 200 Seats Available for Event Which Will Surpass Any of the Season's Previous Musicales.

Every music lover in the city should be present tonight at the City Hall Auditorium to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Last evening the orchestra gave a concert in John M. Greene Hall in Northampton, and it was the best concert given at Smith College for some time, far surpassing the work done this season by Cleveland orchestra and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

At an early hour this morning there were still 200 seats unsold for this evening's concert, but as the weather man has favored Holyoke with a perfect day and the prospects of a perfect evening, it is expected that a large number of those who have not bought tickets will get theirs tonight at the door. Perfect weather always results in many sales at the door.

At the concert given last evening it was noticed that the Boston Symphony is fast regaining its former position of being the leading symphony orchestra in the country. For a few years it lost its reputation, but the concert given last evening, and those given since Serge Koussevitzky became its director last season, have showed that it is again a magnificent organization.

The program given last evening contained many numbers which are to be given tonight, and they were most enthusiastically received. It was noticed during the program that Mr. Koussevitzky never gives a routine interpretation and that whatever he produces has the breath of life in it. He is an ideal director, and his happy blending of grace and vivacity lends itself ideally to its interpretations.

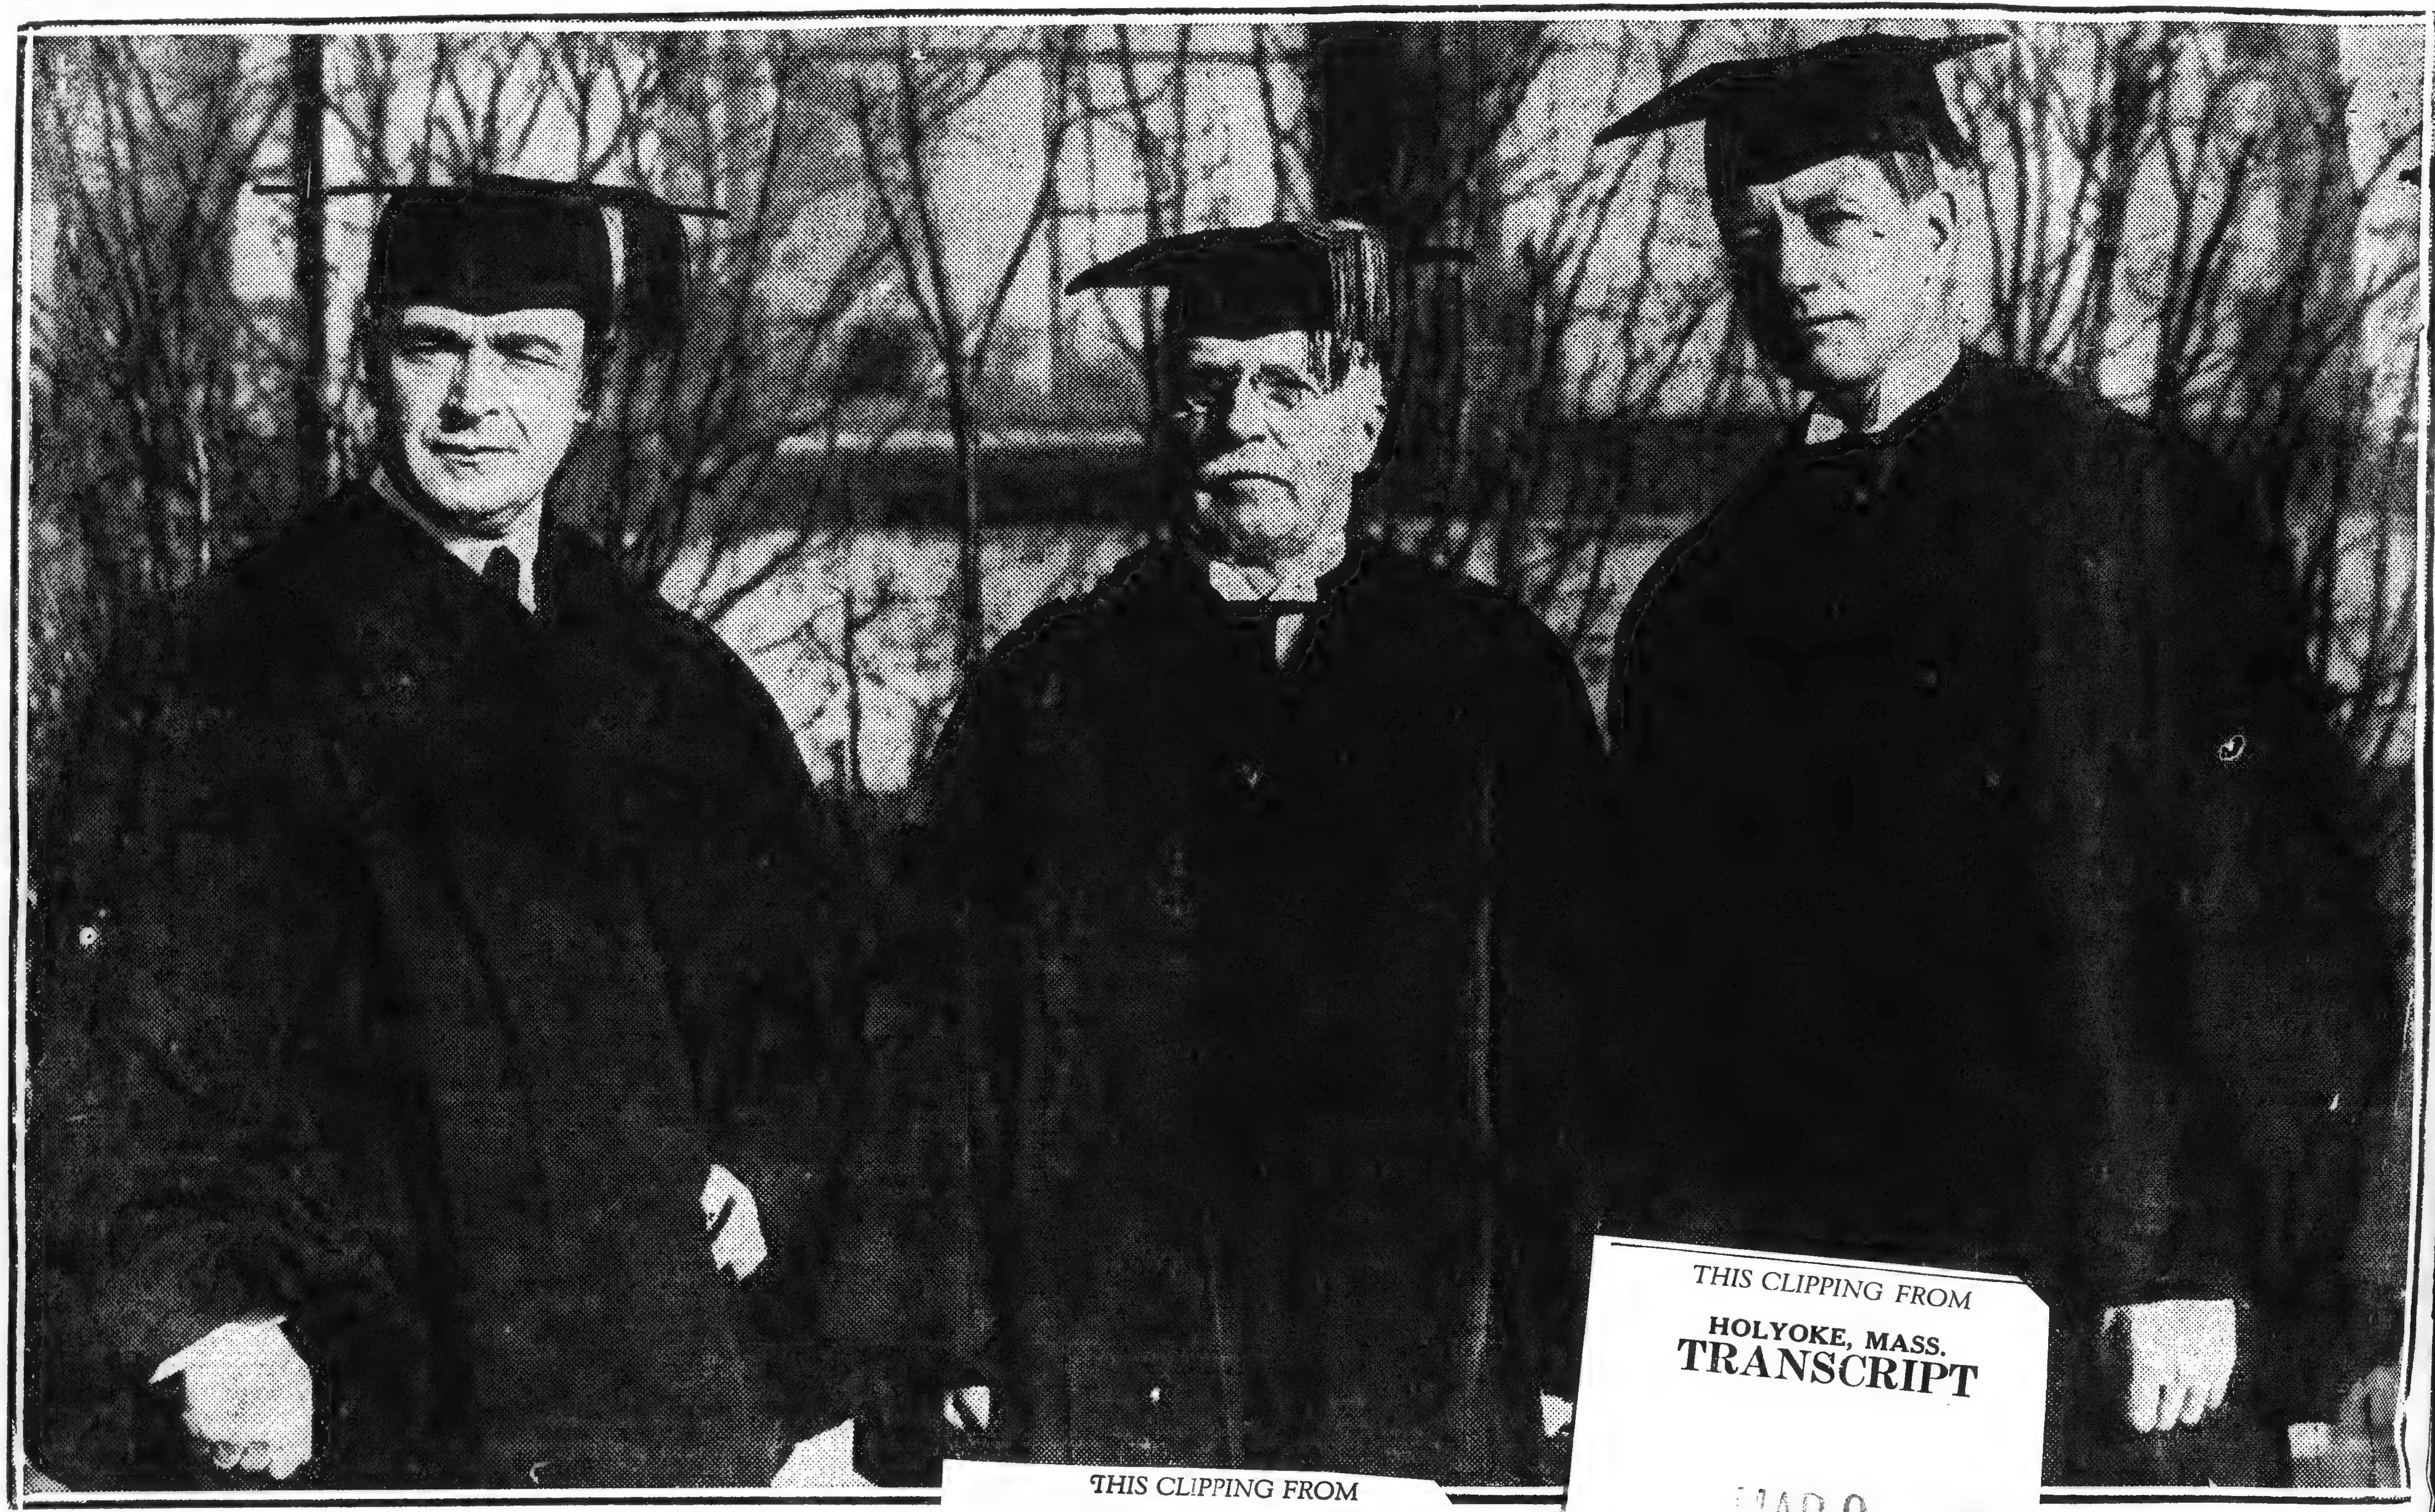
"Hayden's Surprise" symphony is to be the feature of his program tonight, and his interpretation of it is considered second to none. Those who attend tonight's concert are assured of an evening of excellent music.

THE PROVIDENCE JOURNAL, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1926

MEN HONORED WITH HONORARY DEGREES BY BROWN UNIVERSITY IN SPECIAL CONVOCATION IN SAYLES HALL YESTERDAY, AND PRESIDENT WILLIAM H. P. FAUNCE

186

Serge Koussevitzky, at Left, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Is Made Doctor of Music, While at the Right Is Roy Chapman Andrews, Explorer, Who Received the Degree of Doctor of Science. The Degrees Were Presented at Thibs Time Rather Than at the June Commencement, Because M. Koussevitzky Has Summer Engagements in Europe and Mr. Andrews Sails for Asia Next Week Where He Will Explore the Gobi Desert.



Providence Journal Photo

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAPH

The Bostonians.

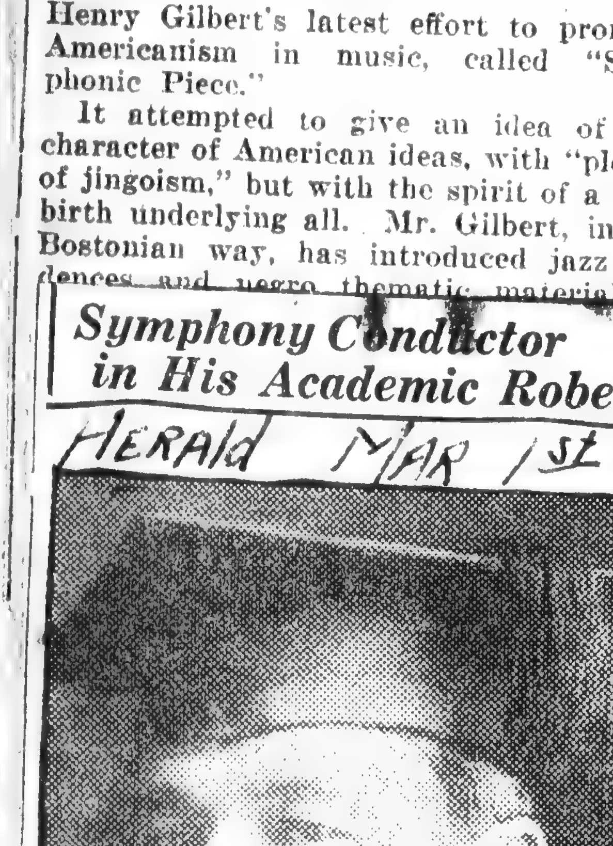
A visit of Serge Koussevitzky and his men usually brings some new piece of music before the New York public, and last night's concert at Carnegie was no exception. The novelty this time was Henry Gilbert's latest effort to promote Americanism in music, called "Symphonic Piece."

It attempted to give an idea of the character of American ideas, with "plenty of jingoism," but with the spirit of a new birth underlying all. Mr. Gilbert, in his Bostonian way, has introduced jazz cadences and negro thematic material to

---

Symphony Conductor in His Academic Robes

HERALD MAR 1st



(Photo by Bachrach)
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
recently made doctor of music by Brown University.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Musical Notes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its last appearance of the season, which will also conclude the Providence series of concerts, in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, March 16th.

Serge Koussevitzky will introduce a notable novelty on this occasion, Respighi's "Pines of Rome." This symphonic poem, by one of the foremost of living Italian composers, has been received with much enthusiasm in the principal cities of the United States, this season. It was introduced in Boston by Koussevitzky and met with so much favor, that it is to be repeated by popular request at the regular concerts there. Respighi's score describes four parts of the capital city in which pines grow. It is pictorial music. The first movement entitled "The Pines of the Villa Borghese," is riotous and rollicking with a suggestion of children's games. The second, entitled "The Pines Near a Catacomb," introduces a trumpet solo off stage, giving the illusion of distance. Then comes a nocturne entitled, "The Pines of the Janiculum," in which the voice of the nightingale is introduced by the use of a phonograph record which reproduces the actual bird call. This innovation has caused much comment.

The closing movement, "The Pines of the Appian Way," depicts the victorious return of the ancient Roman soldiers to their city, through the historical entrance. The modern form of the ancient Roman Bucina is used. The striding tramp of the army is heard, at first softly as it approaches, but growing louder and louder. Gradually an overwhelming mass of sound is piled up, finally bringing one of the most impressing climaxes in music. The concert will open with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F major, the lyrical and humorous symphony which introduces as a slow movement a delightful burlesque of the metronome, an instrument newly invented in the composer's time.

Koussevitzky will close this, his last Providence appearance, with three excerpts from the music dramas of Wagner; the introduction to the third act of the "Mastersingers," the prelude to the same drama, and the "Overture to Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
Times - Picayune

Double-Bass Success

MUSICAL talent has strange ways and manifests itself in freakish directions. There, for instance, is Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which statement is enough to place the maestro in the very forefront of musical ability. To do honor to the leader last week Brown university conferred upon him an honorary degree, in response to which M. Koussevitzky journeyed to Providence and there before a convocation of the university performed an elaborate composition on the—double-bass violin! And that indeed is the solo instrument upon which the master won fame long before he had earned a place among the world's finest orchestra directors.

In the nineties of the last century Koussevitzky toured Europe giving recitals on the big instrument. He was then recognized as one of the greatest if not the greatest master of the cumbersome "fiddle," having been surpassed, if at all, only by Bottesini, the noted Italian who for many years dwelt in Havana, Cuba. We do not know whether Koussevitzky like his Italian confrere used a special instrument somewhat less in size than the customary double-bass for his solo work.

It happens that Bottesini also became an able orchestral leader and composer and by an odd coincidence both musicians came to select their favorite instrument not by choice but by necessity. Both men were conservatoire pupils, one in Russia, the other in Italy, and in both the great music schools there were orchestras made up of pupils. Bottesini and Koussevitzky alike were eager ta play, but found all the desirable places occupied by older matriculants. In both cases, however, the awkward double-bass berth was empty and the young musicians grabbed the chance and thus, almost by accident, grabbed fame and a ladder to fortune.

And Koussevitzky, when made doctor of music by Brown university, returned for an hour to his beloved instrument, playing one movement from a double-bass sonata of his own composition.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

MAR 9 1926

SOCIAL EVENTS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WILL GIVE CONCERT TONIGHT

There Are Still 200 Seats Available for Event Which Will Surpass Any of the Season's Previous Musicales.

Every music lover in the city should be present tonight at the City Hall Auditorium to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Last evening the orchestra gave a concert in John M. Greene Hall in Northampton, and it was the best concert given at Smith College for some time, far surpassing the work done this season by Cleveland orchestra and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

At an early hour this morning there were still 200 seats unsold for this evening's concert, but as the weather man has favored Holyoke with a perfect day and the prospects of a perfect evening, it is expected that a large number of those who have not bought tickets will get theirs tonight at the door. Perfect weather always results in many sales at the door.

At the concert given last evening it was noticed that the Boston Symphony is fast regaining its former position of being the leading symphony orchestra in the country. For a few years it lost its reputation, but the concert given last evening, and those given since Serge Koussevitzky became its director last season, have showed that it is again a magnificent organization.

The program given last evening contained many numbers which are to be given tonight, and they were most enthusiastically received. It was noticed during the program that Mr. Koussevitzky never gives a routine interpretation and that whatever he produces has the breath of life in it. He is an ideal director, and his happy blending of grace and vivacity lends itself ideally to its interpretations.

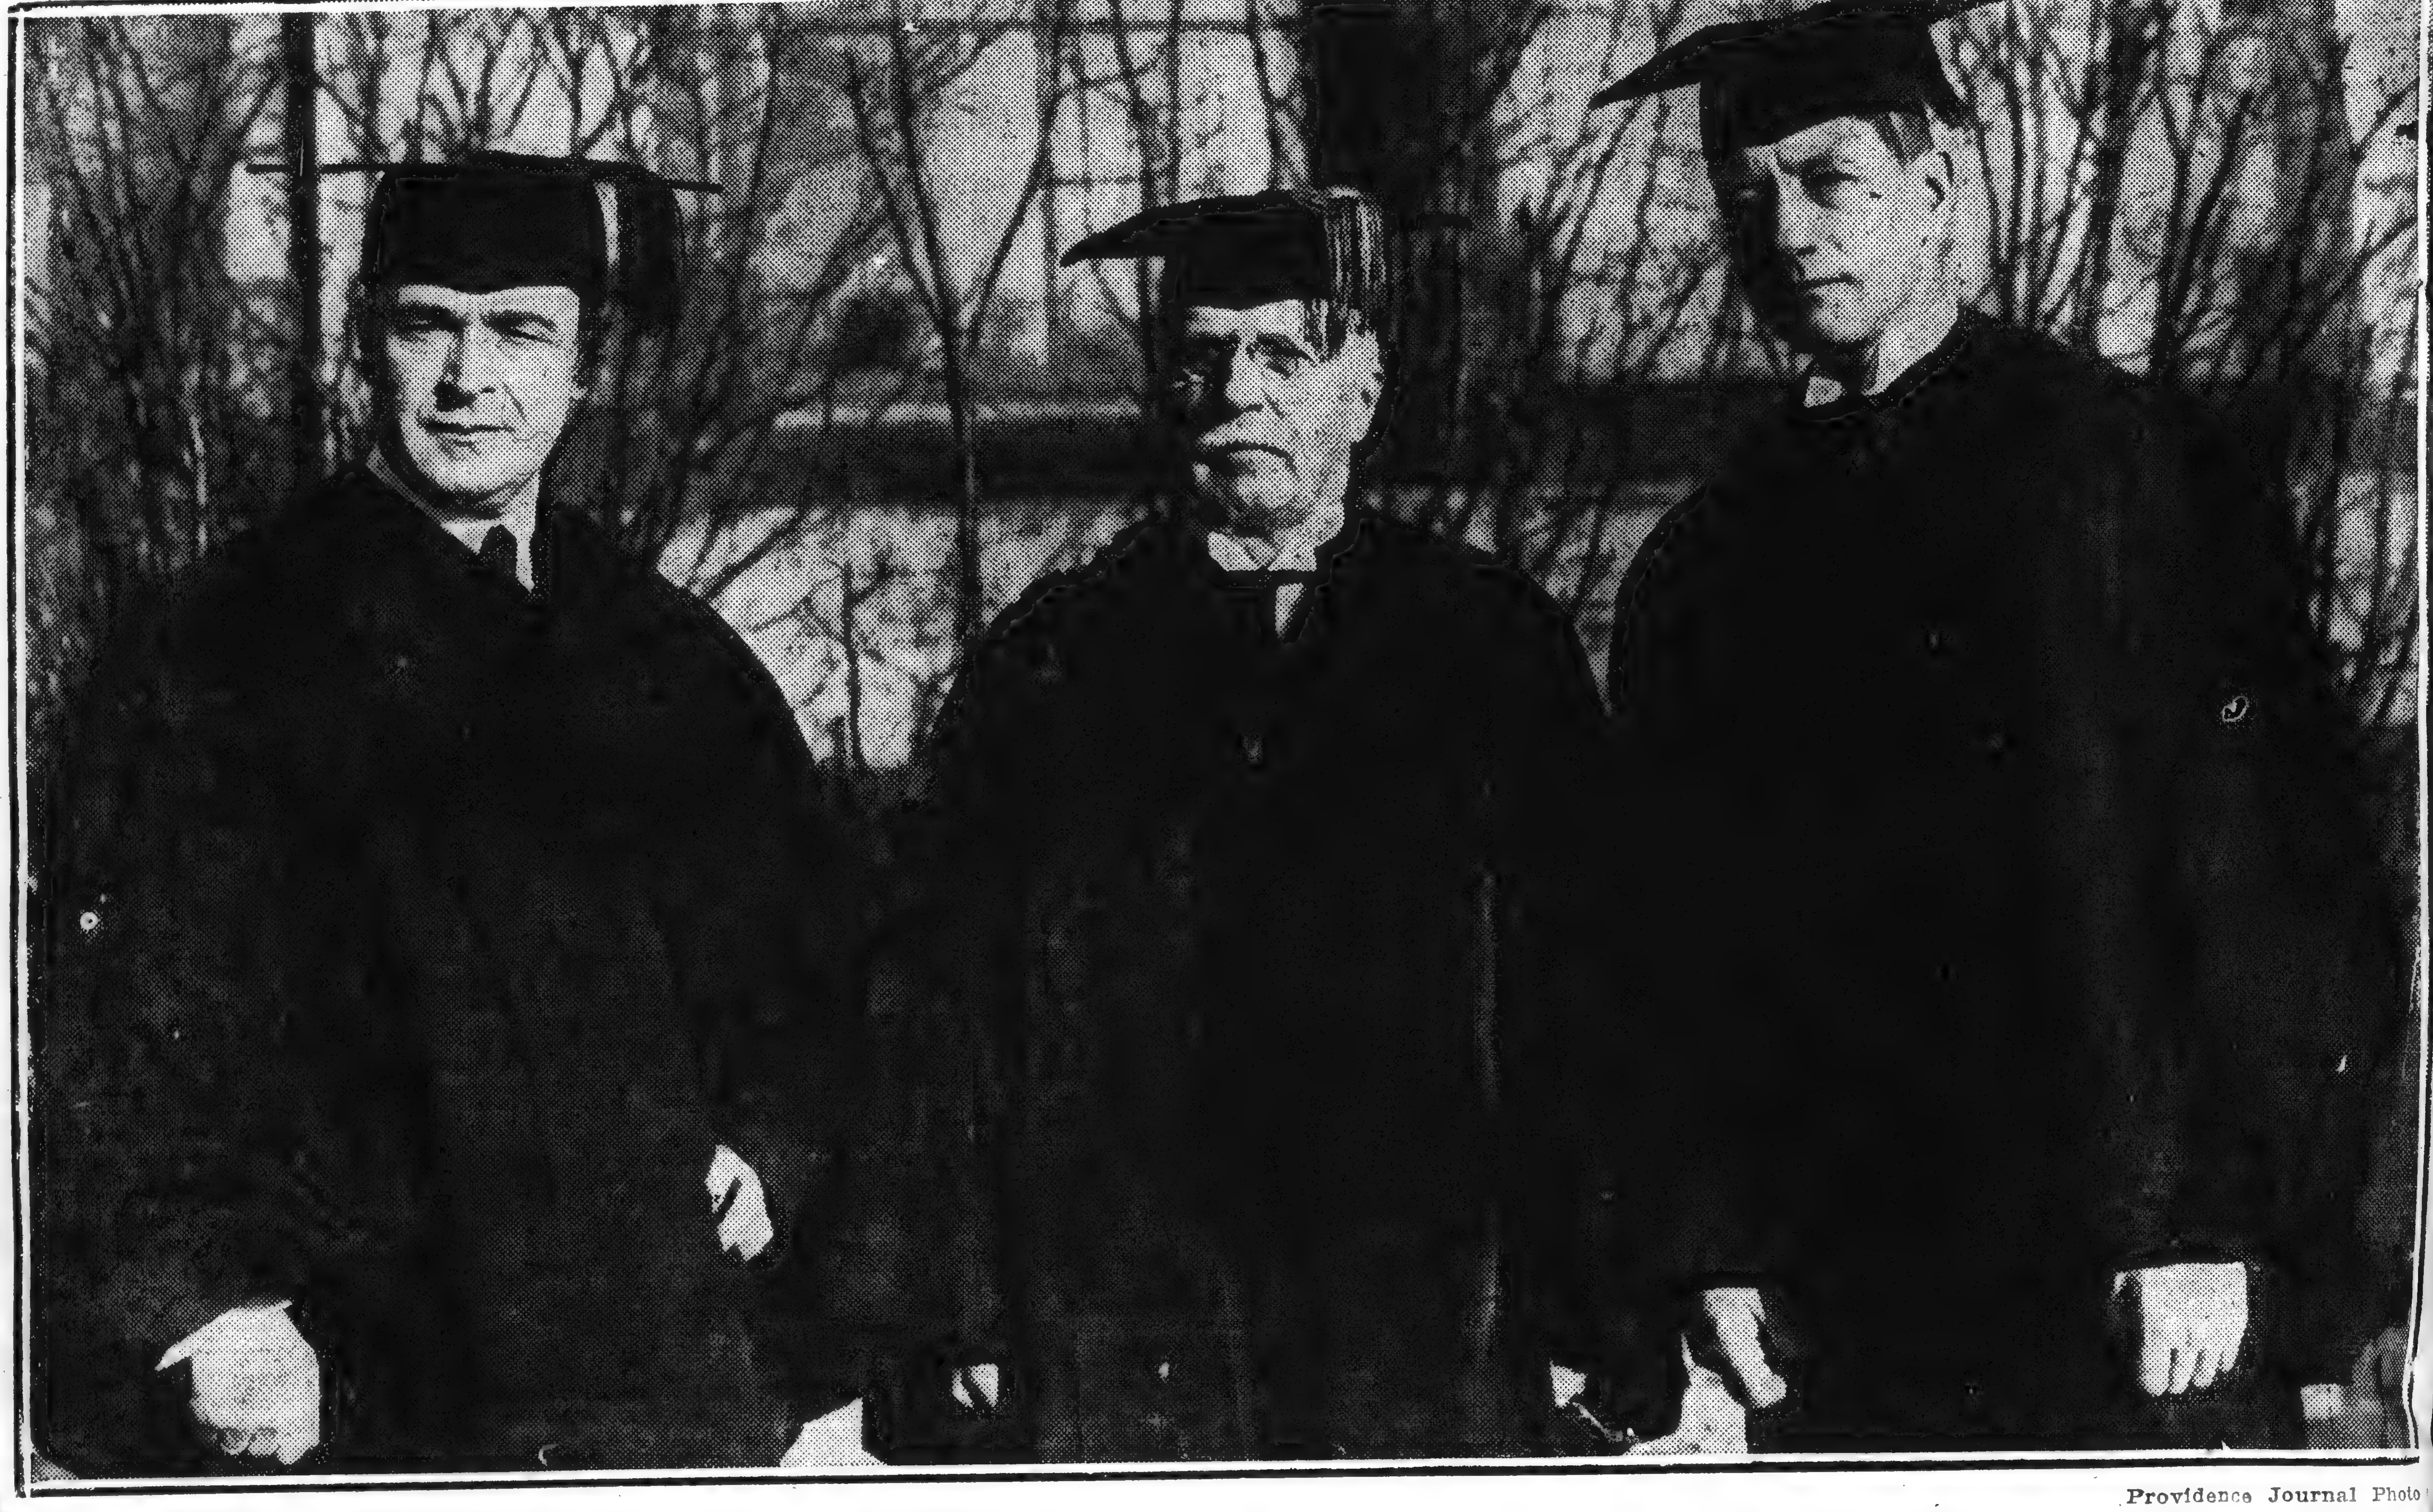
"Hayden's Surprise" symphony is to be the feature of his program tonight, and his interpretation of it is considered second to none. Those who attend tonight's concert are assured of an evening of excellent music.

THE PROVIDENCE JOURNAL, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1926

186

MEN HONORED WITH HONORARY DEGREES BY BROWN UNIVERSITY IN SPECIAL CONVOCATION IN SAYLES HALL YESTERDAY, AND PRESIDENT WILLIAM H. P. FAUNCE

Serge Koussevitzky, at Left, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Is Made Doctor of Music, While at the Right Is Roy Chapman Andrews, Explorer, Who Received the Degree of Doctor of Science. The Degrees Were Presented at Thibs Time Rather Than at the June Commencement, Because M. Koussevitzky Has Summer Engagements in Europe and Mr. Andrews Sails for Asia Next Week Where He Will Explore the Gobi Desert.



Providence Journal Photo

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAPH

[illegible]

The Bostonians.

A visit of Serge Koussevitzky and his men usually brings some new piece of music before the New York public, and last night's concert at Carnegie was no exception. The novelty this time was Henry Gilbert's latest effort to promote Americanism in music, called "Symphonic Piece."

It attempted to give an idea of the character of American ideas, with "plenty of jingoism," but with the spirit of a new birth underlying all. Mr. Gilbert, in his Bostonian way, has introduced jazz cadences and negro thematic material to get over his thought. The result sounds like a cross between Richard Strauss and Dave Stamper. The statement may sound a bit severe, but it isn't, because Mr. Gilbert's opus is entertaining, and therefore we like it.

The other numbers on the program were the Beethoven Eight, Ernest Bloch's Three Poems from his "Jewish Cycle," and Ravel's ravishing ballet music, "Daphnis and Chloe." H. J. P.

COMMODITY PRICES LOWEST SINCE MAY

Prof. Fisher's Index Numbe Shows Drop of One Point i Week

[Special Dispatch to The Herald]

NEW HAVEN, Feb. 28—Prof. Irvin Fisher's index number of America commodity prices for last week based on 100 as the average of 1913, i 155.5 compared with 156.6 a week ag 158.6 two weeks ago, 159.2 three

(Photo by Bachrach)
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Recently made doctor of music by Brown University.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

MAR 7 192

Musical Notes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its last appearance of the season, which will also conclude the Providence series of concerts, in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, March 16th.

Serge Koussevitzky will introduce a notable novelty on this occasion, Respighi's "Pines of Rome." This symphonic poem, by one of the foremost of living Italian composers, has been received with much enthusiasm in the principal cities of the United States, this season. It was introduced in Boston by Koussevitzky and met with so much favor, that it is to be repeated by popular request at the regular concerts there. Respighi's score describes four parts of the capital city in which pines grow. It is pictorial music. The first movement entitled "The Pines of the Villa Borghese," is riotous and rollicking with a suggestion of children's games. The second, entitled "The Pines Near a Catacomb," introduces a trumpet solo off stage, giving the illusion of distance. Then comes a nocturne entitled, "The Pines of the Janiculum," in which the voice of the nightingale is introduced by the use of a phonograph record which reproduces the actual bird call. This innovation has caused much comment.

The closing movement, "The Pines of the Appian Way," depicts the victorious return of the ancient Roman soldiers to their city, through the historical entrance. The modern form of the ancient Roman Bucina is used. The striding tramp of the army is heard, at first softly as it approaches, but growing louder and louder. Gradually an overwhelming mass of sound is piled up, finally bringing one of the most impressing climaxes in music. The concert will open with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F major, the lyrical and humorous symphony which introduces as a slow movement a delightful burlesque of the metronome, an instrument newly invented in the composer's time.

Koussevitzky will close this, his last Providence appearance, with three excerpts from the music dramas of Wagner; the introduction to the third act of the "Mastersingers," the prelude to the same drama, and the "Overture to Tannhauser."

---

nns.
tzky,
conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which statement is enough to place the maestro in the very forefront of musical ability. To do honor to the leader last week Brown university conferred upon him an honorary degree, in response to which M. Koussevitzky journeyed to Providence and there before a convocation of the university performed an elaborate composition on the—double-bass violin! And that indeed is the solo instrument upon which the master won fame long before he had earned a place among the world's finest orchestra directors.

In the nineties of the last century Koussevitzky toured Europe giving recitals on the big instrument. He was then recognized as one of the greatest if not the greatest master of the cumbersome "fiddle," having been surpassed, if at all, only by Bottesini, the noted Italian who for many years dwelt in Havana, Cuba. We do not know whether Koussevitzky like his Italian confrere used a special instrument somewhat less in size than the customary double-bass for his solo work.

It happens that Bottesini also became an able orchestral leader and composer and by an odd coincidence both musicians came to select their favorite instrument not by choice but by necessity. Both men were conservatoire pupils, one in Russia, the other in Italy, and in both the great music schools there were orchestras made up of pupils. Bottesini and Koussevitzky alike were eager ta play, but found all the desirable places occupied by older matriculants. In both cases, however, the awkward double-bass berth was empty and the young musicians grabbed the chance and thus, almost by accident, grabbed fame and a ladder to fortune.

And Koussevitzky, when made doctor of music by Brown university, returned for an hour to his beloved instrument, playing one movement from a double-bass sonata of his own composition.

---

ohn M. Greene Hall in Northampton, and it was the best concert given at Smith College for some time, far surpassing the work done this season by Cleveland orchestra and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

At an early hour this morning there were still 200 seats unsold for this evening's concert, but as the weather man has favored Holyoke with a perfect day and the prospects of a perfect evening, it is expected that a large number of those who have not bought tickets will get theirs tonight at the door. Perfect weather always results in many sales at the door.

At the concert given last evening it was noticed that the Boston Symphony is fast regaining its former position of being the leading symphony orchestra in the country. For a few years it lost its reputation, but the concert given last evening, and those given since Serge Koussevitzky became its director last season, have showed that it is again a magnificent organization.

The program given last evening contained many numbers which are to be given tonight, and they were most enthusiastically received. It was noticed during the program that Mr. Koussevitzky never gives a routine interpretation and that whatever he produces has the breath of life in it. He is an ideal director, and his happy blending of grace and vivacity lends itself ideally to its interpretations.

"Hayden's Surprise" symphony is to be the feature of his program tonight, and his interpretation of it is considered second to none. Those who attend tonight's concert are assured of an evening of excellent music.

REDUCTION

RATIO

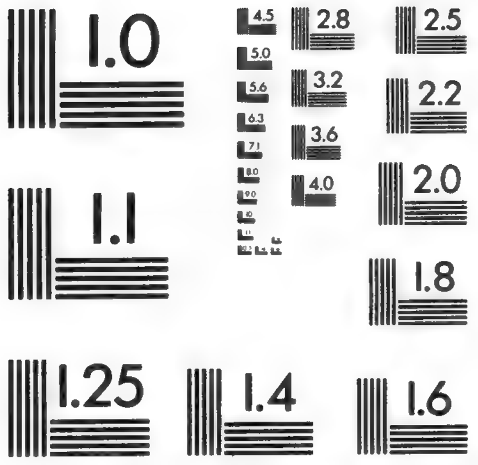
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5

A4

A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

186

KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS TWICE UPON THE DOUBLE BASS

Transcript Feb 25

A DEGREE AND A NOVEL THANK-OFFERING

Brown University Honors the Conductor—He Responds as Virtuoso and Composer, Playing His Own Music, and Handel's, Upon the Instrument of His Youth—By So Much a First Appearance in America—Prelude and Aftermath

THERE IS a fate upon every Russian. The temperament within him marks him as man of destiny. His novels, plays, music, only affirm the brand. It may be a fate of great things—as when Boris Godunov sat for the first time on the throne of the Tsars; or a fate of small things—as when Serge Koussevitzky played the double-bass in public for the first time in America. For it has happened—not in Boston, the city that he frequents; not in New York, the city that he visits often; but in Providence, the city upon which he descends through no more than six evenings of a full year. The present visit, which was by day, will raise the number to seven—plainly a token of destiny

It happened likewise upon special and rare occasion, of which more hereafter. Enough, for this preluding, that it happened at all. Every one knew that Mr. Koussevitzky learned to play the double-bass at music-school; that in the Imperial Opera Houses, he became (as the Germans say) an eminent professor of that instrument; that he made tours as virtuoso like Bottestini and Dragonetti before him; that more than once he contemplated such a visit to the United States. Then a conductor's career absorbed him and the double-bass became occasional relaxation for private pleasure. In Mr. Koussevitzky's house it reposed against the wall; with him it went on journeys; for a few ears it occasionally sounded under his hand. But in public never—until fate willed otherwise.

Where destiny [illegible] there are ways opening broad at one end but closed tight at the other. Upon the Corporation of Brown University came the desire to give Mr. Koussevitzky the honorary degree of Doctor of Music. Mr. Stokowski possesses it and the Curtisian press now and then hails him accordingly. Mr. Stock may also enjoy it; but after his fashion hides the scroll in his deepest pigeon-hole. Even so, it is rare distinction upon a conductor in America. The normal occasion for giving and receiving is, of course, Commencement Day; but in June Mr. Koussevitzky is at work in Paris; while such degrees are not conferred "in absentia." Fortunately, the Corporation at Brown had another honor to bestow. It would make Mr. Roy Chapman Andrews, of the American Museum of Natural History, a Doctor of Science for deep knowledge of European and Asiatic mammalia, and fruitful exploration in those continents. And destiny willed that Mr. Andrews should be departing soon for Asia, long before the Brunonian Commencement Day.

The plain recourse was a "Special Convocation" for the conferring of the two degrees. It came to pass yesterday afternoon in Sayles Hall—an assembly room, roofed like a miniature Memorial at Cambridge, likewise hung with college-worthies according to many arts of portraiture; yet somehow suggesting also the Sheldonian at Oxford, for no discoverable reason—except that it does. Sayles, however, is a much simpler place, since no more than an ingenious pattern of settees is barrier between the academic dignitaries, the onlooking students and the miscellaneous multitude. There were enough of all three yesterday, to fill their several standing places. The robed, hooded, tasseled university procession wended loosely into the foreground; President Faunce and other eminences took their high seats; the organ sounded; a brief prayer was said; Mr. Andrews was "presented" for his degree; received it; returned short and unaffected thanks.

Next it was Mr. Koussevitzky's turn. Mr. Albert Lyon Scott of the Board of Fellows "presented" him—as it seemed half-disguised in the black scholar's gown. The President of the university saluted him in these words:

> Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, distinguished virtuoso and interpreter of the music of all peoples; born in Northern Russia, student at the Moscow Conservatory, double-bass soloist of the Imperial Opera, leader of orchestral concerts in Paris, London, Berlin, Madrid, Barcelona, Rome, Warsaw; then crossing the Atlantic to convey to prosaic America something of his own imaginative insight and energy, and give to "the land of steady habits" fresh understanding of the great poets and dreamers in the universal language of music.

In Mr. Koussevitzky's hand was laid the parchment; over his shoulder the academic hood was slipped. Then a moment of pause while the President smilingly explained that the conductor's command of English—in a public place—was hardly sufficient for the usual response. Instead, availing himself of another speech, he would play two pieces upon the double-bass. (Not for nothing has Mr. Koussevitzky dwelt and worked in Paris. Such

Continued on Following Page

FEB 25

BOSTON EVENING T

Miscellane

As the Nineti

Serge Kou

Virtuoso of the Double Bass:
at Brown

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS TWICE UPON THE DOUBLE BASS

Continued from Preceding Page

a device was Gallic tact and readiness excelling themselves.) The conductor laid aside hood and gown; received his bass-viol; gripped his bow; signalled his secretary, Mr Slominsky, at a modest "piano of accompaniment."

The first number was a Saraband—slow movement from Handel's Concerto for Double-Bass, out of the classic repertory of the instrument. The knowing old master set his music where the double-bass sounds like a violoncello, broadened, deepened, amplified. He shaped his measures into a grave melody, rising and falling in arc-like curve. Mr. Koussevitzky lent it smooth surfaces, rich body, sonorous depths, darkling color. The virtuoso still kept his skill; while piece and instrument bent to a musician's will. . . . After the ancient, a modern—no other than the conductor himself, for the first time as composer before an American audience. In those earlier days, he also wrote a Concerto for Double-Bass. It is his Opus 3; what Opus 1 and Opus 2 may be, report saith not. It is inscribed to the present Mme. Koussevitzky. It contains an Andante which, yesterday was second piece. The music is songful; now musing, now ardent, keeping withal a half-sentimental, half-nervous energy, to this day characteristic of him who made it. The restless modern, however, could not stay content with Handel's range over a none too tractable instrument. Higher or lower he occasionally went, and then all his skill and all his wits were needful to keep the double-bass from grumbling in its throat or rasping through its nose. The deed was done, however, and with this disclosure of the subtler virtuosities, Mr. Koussevitzky laid aside bow and strings for the Doctor of Music's hood and gown.

With the hymn of Brown University the convocation dispersed amid much wagging of tongues. Students and commonalty waited at the door to see the illustrious pass. The academic dignitaries and the new "scholars" went on to supper. The two [illegible]ors ran smoothly down the hill in a [illegible] where they happen to clean snow and [illegible] from the streets. By this time Dr. Koussevitzky is leading a rehearsal in Symphony Hall. Neither there nor in Carnegie do conductors play the double-bass. For university convocations they reserve those gracious exercises in graceless postures.

H. T. P.

LISZTIAN MATINEE, CHORUS ASSISTING, FAUST, WITH PSALM

Trans — Feb 20

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY ENTERS FRESH FIELDS

The Fated "Faust Symphony" Again Misses Fire—This Time Sweetened and Sentimentalized Performance—No Biting Devil but a Properly Ecstatic Close—A Choral Psalm for Prelude and Tedium—Incidental Voices

AS THE YEARS pass over symphony concerts of long standing, one or another piece, descending from conductor to conductor, becomes curiously fated. Here in Boston, the conspicuous instance is Liszt's "Faust Symphony." Thirty-odd seasons ago, it passed into the repertory of the Symphony Orchestra and, through fifteen more, held modest place. Long intervals separated performances; sometimes they included the final chorus; sometimes they cut the voices away. In either case, whoever the conductor, the music made no deep impression upon those that heard; stirred uneasy tongues into hardly a ripple of debate. In the course of his second term in Boston, Dr. Muck revived the "Faust Symphony." He had already proved his ability to give to Liszt's symphonic poems a rhetorical pomp, a romantic intensity, a sweep of imagination, a magnificence of sonority, that reanimated and transfigured them. Hear and believe, cried the Lisztians, our Franz is now sounding as he intended himself to sound, as his own time listened and admired. Observe, retorted the anti-Lisztians, how a conductor with a flair for this base metal, may silver and gild it in the crucible of his sympathies and abilities.

Undoubtedly Dr. Muck possessed this flair for Liszt's music by and large; while in the "Faust Symphony" it became veritable fusion of the conductor's and the composer's idiosyncrasies. The first pair of performances set two audiences agog; they were repeated more than once; New York, as well as Boston, heard and applauded. When Dr. Muck departed, the "Faust Symphony" remained his tallest monument; in the recollection of the public, it had become one of the pieces, like the Prelude to "Tristan," or Brahms's First Symphony, of which great things are anticipated.

Succeeding Dr. Muck, after the Rabaudian interregnum, Mr. Monteux long left the "Faust Symphony" on the shelf. Then, upon a day in 1923, he reached for it with hapless consequences. Highly expectant audiences, remembering the music from Dr. Muck, heard it with blank disappointment and disillusion. Nothing sounded; everything came off tamely. Up and down the lengths of the first movement, Faust no longer wandered in torment; no visions of Gretchen rose hauntingly. Her own "Andante Soave" touched neither listening ears nor susceptible hearts. The "Allegro Ironico" etched in no Mephistopheles. The tonal heavens rolled not back upon the "mystic chorus." Worse still, that drama in music of contrasted, conflicting, interplaying themes, bewept and bemocked—characterizing motivs as truly as Wagner's own—passed inaudible. Yet by it the "Faust Symphony" endures—crown, for invention and imagination, of Liszt's music. Most hearers eyed their neighbors inquiringly, asking what had befallen a piece that a few years before had searched and thrilled them. Not a measure was altered; yet nearly every page was dulled. He must have suspected his failure with what "at these concerts" was a glorified music. Back to the library went the "Faust Symphony."

Early in the season Mr. Koussevitzky took down the fateful score; yesterday brought it to performance, with the orchestra keyed to the task, the men of The Cecilia for choir, Mr. Charles Stratton for tenor voice. Through eight days anticipation had run high. All and sundry agreed that the music "suited" the conductor; that he was likely to work wonders upon it. He came; he played; he only half-conquered. For more than one rose from the performance with expectation unfulfilled; while signs of a restless house were plain. "Das Ewig-Weibliche," sang the tenor, "zieht uns hinan"; but already as Ewig-Weibliche" had departed in mbers at every pause in the Symphony. idently regarding each movement as a parate entity, Mr. Koussevitzky permitted applause at the corresponding interval. was not too hearty; nor at the end did set the welkin a-ringing. Not that the aust Symphony" again fell flat. Rather hung in that unhappy limbo which is half-accomplishment.

To the other extreme from the uncomprehending and unstirred Monteux went Mr. Koussevitzky. He tried to make everything signify; from first measure to last was tireless producer (as they say in the theater) of Liszt's Symphony. Through the "character-pictures" of Faust and Gretchen, he "stage-managed"—there is no other word for it—the entrance of every motiv. Scarcely a transformation, a transition, a modulation, escaped his insistent hand. He drenched with sensuous sentimentality the music of the dreamful Gretchen and the amorous Faust. Over the first movement Faust also mooned his troubled way, as though he were first cousin, beyond the Rhine removed, to the hero of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony." The principal means to these ends were a persistently slow pace, softened rhythms, a long and loving lingering over every songful period, the incessant use in every choir of sensuous tone. (At the least it brought as beautiful horn-playing as Symphony Hall has heard in many a day.) Mr. Monteux had staled the [illegible]ust Symphony" into dry bread. [illegible]ssevitzky was now sopping [illegible]al sugar-plum[illegible] With the one conductor Liszt's music-drama of motivs had died of inanition; with the other it was suffocating in sweetness. Liszt, after all, is not Skriabin

But the "Allegro Ironico," the famous ovement of Mephistopheles, in which the sic mocks, jeers and flouts at the motivs of Faust and Gretchen gone before—the apex of imagination upon the whole symphony, the wonder and admiration of commentators, the only Goethe-like fiend in all the music-dramas and all the tone-poems! These measures would surely save the Koussevitzkian day. Alas and alack! they did not. Plainly enough the Russian is no ironist in music; whereas in these mockeries the Prussian had excelled even his ironic self. True, Mr. Koussevitzky quickened the pace, sharpened the accents, set tang to the orchestral tone. Yet few of the Lisztian ironies bit upon the anticipating ear; while not one of them came and went as acrid parody and satanic jeer. Mr. Koussevitzky's Mephistopheles was much too decent a fiend for the Lisztian company he kept. Not he to turn an orchestra into acid bath and jetting flouts. . . . At the end the conductor's moment did come. In beauty he and the orchestra sustained the suspensive chords; transfigured the returning motiv of Gretchen; released the "mystic chorus" suffused and spiralling. Mr. Stratton, catching infection from the conductor, indeed labored the tenor-part sentimentally; but the epilogue to the symphonic drama stood achieved. Only there do Liszt and Skriabin go mated. To the shelves—it is believable—the "Faust Symphony" will again return. Here in Boston a single conductor, departed, has wrought it in enduring image.

For superfluous prelude, Mr. Koussevitzky added a choral piece from Liszt hitherto unheard in Boston—the setting of the sixteenth Psalm of David, wherein he laments his low estate before his enemies and entreats of Jehovah mercy and salvation. The music is written for tenor—the voice of David—mixed chorus and modestly furnished orchestra. It is also written at length, and with an exceeding prolixity. Nowhere and everywhere it wanders, yet hardly once concentrates an emotion or sustains a musical idea. The chorus is variously employed: the voice of David is diligent; to both the orchestra is assiduous companion. Yet hardly twenty measures seize the ear; while not so many as ten set sparks to answering mood. Liszt does not write in churchly idiom; no more does he cry from the heart romantically; as the darkey phrase has it, "he jest sloshes roun' loose-like."

No zeal of performance may pen and stiffen such music. Mr. Koussevitzky toiled as though he were disclosing a masterpiece; Mr. Stratton bore to heaven's gate every known sentimentality of oratorio-like song; the choir of The Cecilia abounded in transparent, fine-textured, keen-phrased soprano tone. Yet tedium, as it seemed, was heavy upon many an ear. The virus of the opera house fermented often in Liszt's musical "system," though he wrote not one piece for the singing theater. Sometimes, he "worked it off" in a "dramatic oratorio," like "Saint Elizabeth"; again in symphonic music-drama like these "character-pictures" of Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles. In the setting of Psalm XVI. he merely turned it out to pasture. . . . By all odds let Mr. Koussevitzky have a chorus as often as may be; he craves it, he excels with it. But let him also choose music worthy of such powers and ambition. Around the corner Honegger's "King David" and Stravinsky's "Les Noces" are both waiting. Master-modernists wrote them—and did not meander.

H. T. P.

Feb 25

EGREES XPLORER

ssevitzky and ndrews

REPLIES IN MUSIC

o Recognition of His Has Made Dead Tells of Plans bi Desert visiting alumni, faculty mem- graduates and the general pub- Koussevitzky, conductor of the phony Orchestra, was award- rary degree of Doctor of Mu- y Chapman Andrews, eminent ho has traced the origin of man to central Asia, the hon- e of Doctor of Science.

evitzky chose the medium of which to respond to the uni- ognition of his genius. For e in America he appeared as ad of conductor, playing with uty from a concerto of his sed some 20 years ago. His was a double bass, or bass g from the 17th century, ought from Europe when he s country in 1924.

NDREWS PRESENTED

In presenting Mr. Andrews, Dr. Herman Carey Bumpus of the Board of Fellows described him as a native of Wisconsin, a graduate of Beloit College and a recipient of the degree of Master of Arts from Columbia University.

"At the age of 24," continued Dr. Bumpus, "he began the study of marine mammalia, penetrating to the most remote parts of the Atlantic and Pacific. In 1912 he entered Korea and followed the Yellow river from its source to the sea. He labored in Alaska. In the war he served us in Mongolia.

"But it is because of his high ideals, his determination, his singular form of kindly leadership, his fondness for men and their fondness for him," continued Dr. Bumpus, "that the Board of Fellows commends him to you as worthy of special distinction."

In conferring the degree upon Mr. Andrews, President W. H. P. Faunce said in part: "Roy Chapman Andrews, indefatigable student and intrepid explorer who has made the dead past speak to the living present and is making civilization realize its youth and the vast achievements yet to come."

KOUSSEVITZKY'S CAREER

"Born in Russia, M. Koussevitzky at the age of 12 began to conduct an orchestra," said Albert Scott Lyon of the Board of Fellows in introducting the famous victuoso. "In 1908," he continued, "he formed an orchestra in Moscow which became one of the most notable in Europe. He toured Russia and other countries on the Continent. At his own expense he founded a publishing house designed to bring to light the works of young composers. He is a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor and on his return to Paris will conduct his sixth orchestral season there."

Dr. Faunce, in conferring the degree upon M. Koussevitzky, spoke of him as "a distinguished virtuoso and interpreter of the music of all peoples; leader of concerts in London, Madrid, Barcelona, and Warsaw, who has crossed the seas to convey to prosaic America some of his own insight into the arts in the universal language of music.

"Since M. Koussevitzky does not desire to use our English tongue in public," continued President Faunce, "he will respond in the language of music which all can understand."

RARE PRIVILEGE

To hear Koussevitzky in the role of soloist is a rare privilege. Few indeed among the thousands of Boston Symphony patrons have had that pleasure. The many know and admire him as an orchestral conductor, one whose remarkable qualities are revealed in his conceptions of the great polyphonic works of the classicists.

Like practically all orchestral leaders, Koussevitzky rose from the ranks. Before he became famous as conductor he was known as an exceptionally fine player upon the double bass, and his interest in and love for the great sonorous toned instrument has not been lessened by the exacting demands of conducting.

This was made evident yesterday when M. Koussevitzky played two numbers, first a sarabande, closing with an andante from his own concerto for double bass.

Although this instrument is not commonly heard in solo work it has great possibilities when so used in the hands of an artist. And Koussevitzky could be nothing else. His selections were melodious, not technically showy, and were given with finished style and expression. He owns a fine instrument, the tone of which rang pure and sweet in both numbers. The upper register of the doub bass naturally is more effective for s playing and the artist made these u tones as musical and expressive as t of a 'cello.

An interesting and enjoyable pe ance, it brought treemndous a from preciative listeners.

Fr [illegible]
Boston
[illegible]
Page [illegible]

186

Feb 25

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, THU

Miscellaneous Ne

As the Nineties Knew Him

Serge Koussevitzky (Musical Courier)

Virtuoso of the Double Bass: Of Old in Russia; Yesterday at Brown University

---

KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS TWICE UPON THE DOUBLE BASS

Transcript Feb 25

A DEGREE AND A NOVEL THANK-OFFERING

Brown University Honors the Conductor—He Responds as Virtuoso and Composer, Playing His Own Music, and Handel's, Upon the Instrument of His Youth—By So Much a First Appearance in America—Prelude and Aftermath

THERE IS a fate upon every Russian. The temperament within him marks him as man of destiny. His novels, plays, music, only affirm the brand. It may be a fate of great things—as when Boris Godunov sat for the first time on the throne of the Tsars; or a fate of small things—as when Serge Koussevitzky played the double-bass in public for the first time in America. For it has happened—not in Boston, the city that he frequents; not in New York, the city that he visits often; but in Providence, the city upon which he descends through no more than six evenings of a full year. The present visit, which was by day, will raise the number to seven—plainly a token of destiny

It happened likewise upon special and rare occasion, of which more hereafter. Enough, for this preluding, that it happened at all. Every one knew that Mr. Koussevitzky learned to play the double-bass at music-school; that in the Imperial Opera Houses, he became (as the Germans say) an eminent professor of that instrument; that he made tours as virtuoso like Bottestini and Dragonetti before him; that more than once he contemplated such a visit to the United States. Then a conductor's career absorbed him and the double-bass became occasional relaxation for private pleasure. In Mr. Koussevitzky's house it reposed against the wall; with him it went on journeys; for a few ears it occasionally sounded under his hand. But in public never—until fate willed otherwise.

Where destiny is, there are ways opening broad at one end but closed tight at the other. Upon the Corporation of Brown University came the desire to give Mr. Koussevitzky the honorary degree of Doctor of Music. Mr. Stokowski possesses it and the Curtisian press now and then hails him accordingly. Mr. Stock may also enjoy it; but after his fashion hides the scroll in his deepest pigeon-hole. Even so, it is rare distinction upon a conductor in America. The normal occasion for giving and receiving is, of course, Commencement Day; but in June Mr. Koussevitzky is at work in Paris; while such degrees are not conferred "in absentia." Fortunately, the Corporation at Brown had another honor to bestow. It would make Mr. Roy Chapman Andrews, of the American Museum of Natural History, a Doctor of Science for deep knowledge of European and Asiatic mammalia, and fruitful exploration in those continents. And destiny willed that Mr. Andrews should be departing soon for Asia, long before the Brunonian Commencement Day.

The plain recourse was a "Special Convocation" for the conferring of the two degrees. It came to pass yesterday afternoon in Sayles Hall—an assembly room, roofed like a miniature Memorial at Cambridge, likewise hung with college-worthies according to many arts of portraiture; yet somehow suggesting also the Sheldonian at Oxford, for no discoverable reason—except that it does. Sayles, however, is a much simpler place, since no more than an ingenious pattern of settees is barrier between the academic dignitaries, the onlooking students and the miscellaneous multitude. There were enough of all three yesterday, to fill their several standing places. The robed, hooded, tasseled university procession wended loosely into the foreground; President Faunce and other eminences took their high seats; the organ sounded; a brief prayer was said; Mr. Andrews was "presented" for his degree; received it; returned short and unaffected thanks.

Next it was Mr. Koussevitzky's turn. Mr. Albert Lyon Scott of the Board of Fellows "presented" him—as it seemed half-disguised in the black scholar's gown. The President of the university saluted him in these words:

> Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, distinguished virtuoso and interpreter of the music of all peoples; born in Northern Russia, student at the Moscow Conservatory, double-bass soloist of the Imperial Opera, leader of orchestral concerts in Paris, London, Berlin, Madrid, Barcelona, Rome, Warsaw; then crossing the Atlantic to convey to prosaic America something of his own imaginative insight and energy, and give to "the land of steady habits" fresh understanding of the great poets and dreamers in the universal language of music.

In Mr. Koussevitzky's hand was laid the parchment; over his shoulder the academic hood was slipped. Then a moment of pause while the President smilingly explained that the conductor's command of English—in a public place—was hardly sufficient for the usual response. Instead, availing himself of another speech, he would play two pieces upon the double-bass. (Not for nothing has Mr. Koussevitzky dwelt and worked in Paris. Such a device was Gallic tact and readiness excelling themselves.) The conductor laid aside hood and gown; received his bass-viol; gripped his bow; signalled his secretary, Mr Slominsky, at a modest "piano of accompaniment."

Continued on Following Page

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS TWICE UPON THE DOUBLE BASS

Continued from Preceding Page

The first number was a Saraband—slow movement from Handel's Concerto for Double-Bass, out of the classic repertory of the instrument. The knowing old master set his music where the double-bass sounds like a violoncello, broadened, deepened, amplified. He shaped his measures into a grave melody, rising and falling in arc-like curve. Mr. Koussevitzky lent it smooth surfaces, rich body, sonorous depths, darkling color. The virtuoso still kept his skill; while piece and instrument bent to a musician's will. . . . After the ancient, a modern—no other than the conductor himself, for the first time as composer before an American audience. In those earlier days, he also wrote a Concerto for Double-Bass. It is his Opus 3—what Opus 1 and Opus 2 may be, report saith not. It is inscribed to the present Mme. Koussevitzky. It contains an Andante which, yesterday was second piece. The music is songful; now musing, now ardent, keeping withal a half-sentimental, half-nervous energy, to this day characteristic of him who made it. The restless modern, however, could not stay content with Handel's range over a none too tractable instrument. Higher or lower he occasionally went, and then all his skill and all his wits were needful to keep the double-bass from grumbling in its throat or rasping through its nose. The deed was done, however, and with this disclosure of the subtler virtuosities, Mr. Koussevitzky laid aside bow and strings for the Doctor of Music's hood and gown.

With the hymn of Brown University the convocation dispersed amid much wagging of tongues. Students and commonalty waited at the door to see the illustrious pass. The academic dignitaries and the two new "scholars" went on to supper. Motors ran smoothly down the hill in a city where they happen to clean snow and ice from the streets. By this time Dr. Koussevitzky is leading a rehearsal in Symphony Hall. Neither there nor in Carnegie do conductors play the double-bass. For university convocations they reserve those gracious exercises in graceless postures.

H. T. P.

"Allegro Ironico" etched in no Mephistopheles. The tonal heavens rolled not back upon the "mystic chorus." Worse still, that drama in music of contrasted, conflicting, interplaying themes, bewept and bemocked—characterizing motivs as truly as Wagner's own—passed inaudible. Yet by it the "Faust Symphony" endures—crown, for invention and imagination, of Liszt's music. Most hearers eyed their neighbors inquiringly, asking what had befallen a piece that a few years before had searched and thrilled them. Not a measure was altered; yet nearly every page was dulled. He must have suspected his failure with what "at these concerts" was a glorified music. Back to the library went the "Faust Symphony."

Early in the season Mr. Koussevitzky took down the fateful score; yesterday brought it to performance, with the orchestra keyed to the task, the men of The Cecilia for choir, Mr. Charles Stratton for tenor voice. Through eight days anticipation had run high. All and sundry agreed that the music "suited" the conductor; that he was likely to work wonders upon it. He came; he played; he only half-conquered. For more than one rose from the performance with expectation unfulfilled; while signs of a restless house were plain. "Das Ewig-Weibliche," sang the tenor, "zieht uns hinan"; but already as Ewig-Weibliche" had departed in mbers at every pause in the Symphony. idently regarding each movement as a parate entity, Mr. Koussevitzky permitd applause at the corresponding interval. was not too hearty; nor at the end did set the welkin a-ringing. Not that the aust Symphony" again fell flat. Rather hung in that unhappy limbo which is half-accomplishment.

To the other extreme from the uncomprehending and unstirred Monteux went Mr. Koussevitzky. He tried to make everything signify; from first measure to last was tireless producer (as they say in the theater) of Liszt's Symphony. Through the "character-pictures" of Faust and Gretchen, he "stage-managed"—there is no other word for it—the entrance of every motiv. Scarcely a transformation, a transition, a modulation, escaped his insistent hand. He drenched with sensuous sentimentality the music of the dreamful Gretchen and the amorous Faust. Over the first movement Faust also mooned his troubled way, as though he were first cousin, beyond the Rhine removed, to the hero of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony." The principal means to these ends were a persistently slow pace, softened rhythms, a long and loving lingering over every songful period, the incessant use in every choir of sensuous tone. (At the least it brought as beautiful horn-playing as Symphony Hall has heard in many a day.) Mr. Monteux had staled the [illegible]ust Symphony" into dry bread. [illegible] ssevitzky was now sopping [illegible] sugar-plum

---

* * PRICE TWO CENTS. 14 Cents Per Week Delivered by Carrier.

Providence Journal Feb 25

BROWN GIVES DEGREES TO VIRTUOSO, EXPLORER

University Honors Koussevitzky and Roy Chapman Andrews

DISTINGUISHED CONDUCTOR REPLIES IN MUSIC

Responds With Brilliant Bass Solos to Recognition of His Genius.—Intrepid Traveler "Who Has Made Dead Past Speak to Living Present" Tells of Plans for New Expedition to Gobi Desert

Brown University in special convocation yesterday afternoon paid tribute to two men distinguished in widely diverse fields of endeavor for their contributions to the advance of education.

At impressive exercises in Sayles Hall, attended by visiting alumni, faculty members, undergraduates and the general public, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was awarded the honorary degree of Doctor of Music, and Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer, who has traced the origin of prehistoric man to central Asia, the honorary degree of Doctor of Science.

M. Koussevitzky chose the medium of his art in which to respond to the univresity's recognition of his genius. For the first time in America he appeared as soloist instead of conductor, playing with thrilling beauty from a concerto of his own, composed some 20 years ago. His instrument was a double bass, or bass violin, dating from the 17th century, which he brought from Europe when he came to this country in 1924.

MR. ANDREWS PRESENTED

In presenting Mr. Andrews, Dr. Herman Carey Bumpus of the Board of Fellows described him as a native of Wisconsin, a graduate of Beloit College and a recipient of the degree of Master of Arts from Columbia University.

"At the age of 24," continued Dr. Bumpus, "he began the study of marine mammalia, penetrating to the most remote parts of the Atlantic and Pacific. In 1912 he entered Korea and followed the Yellow river from its source to the sea. He labored in Alaska. In the war he served us in Mongolia.

"But it is because of his high ideals, his determination, his singular form of kindly leadership, his fondness for men and their fondness for him," continued Dr. Bumpus, "that the Board of Fellows commends him to you as worthy of special distinction."

In conferring the degree upon Mr. Andrews, President W. H. P. Faunce said in part: "Roy Chapman Andrews, indefatigable student and intrepid explorer who has made the dead past speak to the living present and is making civilization realize its youth and the vast achievements yet to come."

KOUSSEVITZKY'S CAREER

"Born in Russia, M. Koussevitzky at the age of 12 began to conduct an orchestra," said Albert Scott Lyon of the Board of Fellows in introducting the famous victuoso. "In 1908," he continued, "he formed an orchestra in Moscow which became one of the most notable in Europe. He toured Russia and other countries on the Continent. At his own expense he founded a publishing house designed to bring to light the works of young composers. He is a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor and on his return to Paris will conduct his sixth orchestral season there."

Dr. Faunce, in conferring the degree upon M. Koussevitzky, spoke of him as "a distinguished virtuoso and interpreter of the music of all peoples; leader of concerts in London, Madrid, Barcelona, and Warsaw, who has crossed the seas to convey to prosaic America some of his own insight into the arts in the universal language of music.

"Since M. Koussevitzky does not desire to use our English tongue in public," continued President Faunce, "he will respond in the language of music which all can understand."

RARE PRIVILEGE

To hear Koussevitzky in the role of soloist is a rare privilege. Few indeed among the thousands of Boston Symphony patrons have had that pleasure. The many know and admire him as an orchestral conductor, one whose remarkable qualities are revealed in his conceptions of the great polyphonic works of the classicists.

Like practically all orchestral leaders, Koussevitzky rose from the ranks. Before he became famous as conductor he was known as an exceptionally fine player upon the double bass, and his interest in and love for the great sonorous toned instrument has not been lessened by the exacting demands of conducting.

This was made evident yesterday when M. Koussevitzky played two numbers, first a sarabande, closing with an andante from his own concerto for double bass.

Although this instrument is not commonly heard in solo work it has great possibilities when so used in the hands of an artist. And Koussevitzky could be nothing else. His selections were melodious, not technically showy, and were given with finished style and expression. He owns a fine instrument, the tone of which rang pure and sweet in both numbers. The upper register of the doub bass naturally is more effective for s playing and the artist made these up tones as musical and expressive as t of a 'cello.

An interesting and enjoyable per ance, it brought treemndous ap from [illegible]preciative listeners.

For March

BOSTON Criticisms are on Page 203 & 204

186

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS TWICE UPON THE DOUBLE BASS

Transcript Feb 25

A DEGREE AND A NOVEL THANK-OFFERING

Brown University Honors the Conductor—He Responds as Virtuoso and Composer, Playing His Own Music, and Handel's, Upon the Instrument of His Youth—By So Much a First Appearance in America—Prelude and Aftermath

THERE IS a fate upon every Russian. The temperament within him marks him as man of destiny. His novels, plays, music, only affirm the brand. It may be a fate of great things—as when Boris Godunov sat for the first time on the throne of the Tsars; or a fate of small things—as when Serge Koussevitzky played the double-bass in public for the first time in America. For it has happened—not in Boston, the city that he frequents; not in New York, the city that he visits often; but in Providence, the city upon which he descends through no more than six evenings of a full year. The present visit, which was by day, will raise the number to seven—plainly a token of destiny

It happened likewise upon special and rare occasion, of which more hereafter. Enough, for this preluding, that it happened at all. Every one knew that Mr. Koussevitzky learned to play the double-bass at music-school; that in the Imperial Opera Houses, he became (as the Germans say) an eminent professor of that instrument; that he made tours as virtuoso like Bottestini and Dragonetti before him; that more than once he contemplated such a visit to the United States. Then a conductor's career absorbed him and the double-bass became occasional relaxation for private pleasure. In Mr. Koussevitzky's house it reposed against the wall; with him it went on journeys; for a few ears it occasionally sounded under his hand. But in public never—until fate willed otherwise.

Where destiny is there are ways opening broad at one end but closed tight at the other. Upon the Corporation of Brown University came the desire to give Mr. Koussevitzky the honorary degree of Doctor of Music. Mr. Stokowski possesses it and the Curtisian press now and then hails him accordingly. Mr. Stock may also enjoy it; but after his fashion hides the scroll in his deepest pigeon-hole. Even so, it is rare distinction upon a conductor in America. The normal occasion for giving and receiving is, of course, Commencement Day; but in June Mr. Koussevitzky is at work in Paris; while such degrees are not conferred "in absentia." Fortunately, the Corporation at Brown had another honor to bestow. It would make Mr. Roy Chapman Andrews, of the American Museum of Natural History, a Doctor of Science for deep knowledge of European and Asiatic mammalia, and fruitful exploration in those continents. And destiny willed that Mr. Andrews should be departing soon for Asia, long before the Brunonian Commencement Day.

The plain recourse was a "Special Convocation" for the conferring of the two degrees. It came to pass yesterday afternoon in Sayles Hall—an assembly room, roofed like a miniature Memorial at Cambridge, likewise hung with college-worthies according to many arts of portraiture; yet somehow suggesting also the Sheldonian at Oxford, for no discoverable reason—except that it does. Sayles, however, is a much simpler place, since no more than an ingenious pattern of settees is barrier between the academic dignitaries, the onlooking students and the miscellaneous multitude. There were enough of all three yesterday, to fill their several standing places. The robed, hooded, tasseled university procession wended loosely into the foreground; President Faunce and other eminences took their high seats; the organ sounded; a brief prayer was said; Mr. Andrews was "presented" for his degree; received it; returned short and unaffected thanks.

Next it was Mr. Koussevitzky's turn. Mr. Albert Lyon Scott of the Board of Fellows "presented" him—as it seemed half-disguised in the black scholar's gown. The President of the university saluted him in these words:

> Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, distinguished virtuoso and interpreter of the music of all peoples; born in Northern Russia, student at the Moscow Conservatory, double-bass soloist of the Imperial Opera, leader of orchestral concerts in Paris, London, Berlin, Madrid, Barcelona, Rome, Warsaw; then crossing the Atlantic to convey to prosaic America something of his own imaginative insight and energy, and give to "the land of steady habits" fresh understanding of the great poets and dreamers in the universal language of music.

In Mr. Koussevitzky's hand was laid the parchment; over his shoulder the academic hood was slipped. Then a moment of pause while the President smilingly explained that the conductor's command of English—in a public place—was hardly sufficient for the usual response. Instead, availing himself of another speech, he would play two pieces upon the double-bass. (Not for nothing has Mr. Koussevitzky dwelt and worked in Paris. Such

Continued on Following Page

FED 25

Miscellaneous Nev

As the Nineties Knew Him

Serge Koussevitzky (Musical Courier)

Virtuoso of the Double Bass: Of Old in Russia; Yesterday at Brown University

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS TWICE UPON THE DOUBLE BASS

Continued from Preceding Page

a device was Gallic tact and readiness excelling themselves.) The conductor laid aside hood and gown; received his bass-viol; gripped his bow; signalled his secretary, Mr Slominsky, at a modest "piano of accompaniment."

The first number was a Saraband—slow movement from Handel's Concerto for Double-Bass, out of the classic repertory of the instrument. The knowing old master set his music where the double-bass sounds like a violoncello, broadened, deepened, amplified. He shaped his measures into a grave melody, rising and falling in arc-like curve. Mr. Koussevitzky lent it smooth surfaces, rich body, sonorous depths, darkling color. The virtuoso still kept his skill; while piece and instrument bent to a musician's will. . . . After the ancient, a modern—no other than the conductor himself, for the first time as composer before an American audience. In those earlier days, he also wrote a Concerto for Double-Bass. It is his Opus 3—what Opus 1 and Opus 2 may be, report saith not. It is inscribed to the present Mme. Koussevitzky. It contains an Andante which, yesterday was second piece. The music is songful; now musing, now ardent, keeping withal a half sentimental, half-nervous energy, to this day characteristic of him who made it. The restless modern, however, could not stay content with Handel's range over a none too tractable instrument. Higher or lower he occasionally went, and then all his skill and all his wits were needful to keep the double-bass from grumbling in its throat or rasping through its nose. The deed was done, however, and with this disclosure of the subtler virtuosities, Mr. Koussevitzky laid aside bow and strings for the Doctor of Music's hood and gown.

With the hymn of Brown University the convocation dispersed amid much wagging of tongues. Students and commonalty waited at the door to see the illustrious pass. The academic dignitaries and the two new "scholars" went on to supper. Motors ran smoothly down the hill in a city where they happen to clean snow and ice from the streets. By this time Dr. Koussevitzky is leading a rehearsal in Symphony Hall. Neither there nor in Carnegie do conductors play the double-bass. For university convocations they reserve those gracious exercises in graceless postures.

H. T. P.

"Allegro Ironico" etched in no Mephistopheles. The tonal heavens rolled not back upon the "mystic chorus." Worse still, that drama in music of contrasted, conflicting, interplaying themes, bewept and bemocked—characterizing motivs as truly as Wagner's own—passed inaudible. Yet by it the "Faust Symphony" endures—crown, for invention and imagination, of Liszt's music. Most hearers eyed their neighbors inquiringly, asking what had befallen a piece that a few years before had searched and thrilled them. Not a measure was altered; yet nearly every page was dulled. He must have suspected his failure with what "at these concerts" was a glorified music. Back to the library went the "Faust Symphony."

Early in the season Mr. Koussevitzky took down the fateful score; yesterday brought it to performance, with the orchestra keyed to the task, the men of The Cecilia for choir, Mr. Charles Stratton for tenor voice. Through eight days anticipation had run high. All and sundry agreed that the music "suited" the conductor; that he was likely to work wonders upon it. He came; he played; he only half-conquered. For more than one rose from the performance with expectation unfulfilled; while signs of a restless house were plain. "Das Ewig-Weibliche," sang the tenor, "zieht uns hinan"; but already as Ewig-Weibliche" had departed in mbers at every pause in the Symphony. idently regarding each movement as a parate entity, Mr. Koussevitzky permit- applause at the corresponding interval. was not too hearty; nor at the end did set the welkin a-ringing. Not that the aust Symphony" again fell flat. Rather hung in that unhappy limbo which is half-accomplishment.

To the other extreme from the uncomprehending and unstirred Monteux went Mr. Koussevitzky. He tried to make everything signify; from first measure to last was tireless producer (as they say in the theater) of Liszt's Symphony. Through the "character-pictures" of Faust and Gretchen, he "stage-managed"—there is no other word for it—the entrance of every motiv. Scarcely a transformation, a transition, a modulation, escaped his insistent hand. He drenched with sensuous sentimentality the music of the dreamful Gretchen and the amorous Faust. Over the first movement Faust also mooned his troubled way, as though he were first cousin, beyond the Rhine removed, to the hero of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony." The principal means to these ends were a persistently slow pace, softened rhythms, a long and loving lingering over every songful period, the incessant use in every choir of sensuous tone. (At the least it brought as beautiful horn-playing as Symphony Hall has heard in many a day.) Mr. Monteux had staled the [illegible] ust Symphony" into dry bread. [illegible] ssevitzky was now sopping [illegible] al sugar-plum

For Music

Boston

[illegible]

Page 203

---

* * PRICE TWO CENTS. 14 Cents Per Week Delivered by Carrier.

Providence Journal Feb 25

BROWN GIVES DEGREES TO VIRTUOSO, EXPLORER

University Honors Koussevitzky and Roy Chapman Andrews

DISTINGUISHED CONDUCTOR REPLIES IN MUSIC

Responds With Brilliant Bass Solos to Recognition of His Genius.—Intrepid Traveler "Who Has Made Dead Past Speak to Living Present" Tells of Plans for New Expedition to Gobi Desert

Brown University in special convocation yesterday afternoon paid tribute to two men distinguished in widely diverse fields of endeavor for their contributions to the advance of education.

At impressive exercises in Sayles Hall, attended by visiting alumni, faculty members, undergraduates and the general public, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was awarded the honorary degree of Doctor of Music, and Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer, who has traced the origin of prehistoric man to central Asia, the honorary degree of Doctor of Science.

M. Koussevitzky chose the medium of his art in which to respond to the university's recognition of his genius. For the first time in America he appeared as soloist instead of conductor, playing with thrilling beauty from a concerto of his own, composed some 20 years ago. His instrument was a double bass, or bass violin, dating from the 17th century, which he brought from Europe when he came to this country in 1924.

MR. ANDREWS PRESENTED

In presenting Mr. Andrews, Dr. Herman Carey Bumpus of the Board of Fellows described him as a native of Wisconsin, a graduate of Beloit College and a recipient of the degree of Master of Arts from Columbia University.

"At the age of 24," continued Dr. Bumpus, "he began the study of marine mammalia, penetrating to the most remote parts of the Atlantic and Pacific. In 1912 he entered Korea and followed the Yellow river from its source to the sea. He labored in Alaska. In the war he served us in Mongolia.

"But it is because of his high ideals, his determination, his singular form of kindly leadership, his fondness for men and their fondness for him," continued Dr. Bumpus, "that the Board of Fellows commends him to you as worthy of special distinction."

In conferring the degree upon Mr. Andrews, President W. H. P. Faunce said in part: "Roy Chapman Andrews, indefatigable student and intrepid explorer who has made the dead past speak to the living present and is making civilization realize its youth and the vast achievements yet to come."

KOUSSEVITZKY'S CAREER

"Born in Russia, M. Koussevitzky at the age of 12 began to conduct an orchestra," said Albert Scott Lyon of the Board of Fellows in introducting the famous victuoso. "In 1908," he continued, "he formed an orchestra in Moscow which became one of the most notable in Europe. He toured Russia and other countries on the Continent. At his own expense he founded a publishing house designed to bring to light the works of young composers. He is a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor and on his return to Paris will conduct his sixth orchestral season there."

Dr. Faunce, in conferring the degree upon M. Koussevitzky, spoke of him as "a distinguished virtuoso and interpreter of the music of all peoples; leader of concerts in London, Madrid, Barcelona, and Warsaw, who has crossed the seas to convey to prosaic America some of his own insight into the arts in the universal language of music.

"Since M. Koussevitzky does not desire to use our English tongue in public," continued President Faunce, "he will respond in the language of music which all can understand."

RARE PRIVILEGE

To hear Koussevitzky in the role of soloist is a rare privilege. Few indeed among the thousands of Boston Symphony patrons have had that pleasure. The many know and admire him as an orchestral conductor, one whose remarkable qualities are revealed in his conceptions of the great polyphonic works of the classicists.

Like practically all orchestral leaders, Koussevitzky rose from the ranks. Before he became famous as conductor he was known as an exceptionally fine player upon the double bass, and his interest in and love for the great sonorous toned instrument has not been lessened by the exacting demands of conducting.

This was made evident yesterday when M. Koussevitzky played two numbers, first a sarabande, closing with an andante from his own concerto for double bass.

Although this instrument is not commonly heard in solo work it has great possibilities when so used in the hands of an artist. And Koussevitzky could be nothing else. His selections were melodious, not technically showy, and were given with finished style and expression. He owns a fine instrument, the tone of which rang pure and sweet in both numbers. The upper register of the doub bass naturally is more effective for s playing and the artist made these up tones as musical and expressive as t of a 'cello.

An interesting and enjoyable per ance, it brought treemndous ap from the appreciative listeners.

Feb 25

186

. KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS TWICE UPON THE DOUBLE BASS

Transcript Feb 25

A DEGREE AND A NOVEL THANK-OFFERING

Brown University Honors the Conductor—He Responds as Virtuoso and Composer, Playing His Own Music, and Handel's, Upon the Instrument of His Youth—By So Much a First Appearance in America—Prelude and Aftermath

THERE IS a fate upon every Russian. The temperament within him marks him as man of destiny. His novels, plays, music, only affirm the brand. It may be a fate of great things—as when Boris Godunov sat for the first time on the throne of the Tsars; or a fate of small things—as when Serge Koussevitzky played the double-bass in public for the first time in America. For it has happened—not in Boston, the city that he frequents; not in New York, the city that he visits often; but in Providence, the city upon which he descends through no more than six evenings of a full year. The present visit, which was by day, will raise the number to seven—plainly a token of destiny

It happened likewise upon special and rare occasion, of which more hereafter. Enough, for this preluding, that it happened at all. Every one knew that Mr. Koussevitzky learned to play the double-bass at music-school; that in the Imperial Opera Houses, he became (as the Germans say) an eminent professor of that instrument; that he made tours as virtuoso like Bottestini and Dragonetti before him; that more than once he contemplated such a visit to the United States. Then a conductor's career absorbed him and the double-bass became occasional relaxation for private pleasure. In Mr. Koussevitzky's house it reposed against the wall; with him it went on journeys; for a few ears it occasionally sounded under his hand. But in public never—until fate willed otherwise.

Where destiny is, there are ways opening broad at one end but closed tight at the other. Upon the Corporation of Brown University came the desire to give Mr. Koussevitzky the honorary degree of Doctor of Music. Mr. Stokowski possesses it and the Curtisian press now and then hails him accordingly. Mr. Stock may also enjoy it; but after his fashion hides the scroll in his deepest pigeon-hole. Even so, it is rare distinction upon a conductor in America. The normal occasion for giving and receiving is, of course, Commencement Day; but in June Mr. Koussevitzky is at work in Paris; while such degrees are not conferred "in absentia." Fortunately, the Corporation at Brown had another honor to bestow. It would make Mr. Roy Chapman Andrews, of the American Museum of Natural History, a Doctor of Science for deep knowledge of European and Asiatic mammalia, and fruitful exploration in those continents. And destiny willed that Mr. Andrews should be departing soon for Asia, long before the Brunonian Commencement Day.

The plain recourse was a "Special Convocation" for the conferring of the two degrees. It came to pass yesterday afternoon in Sayles Hall—an assembly room, roofed like a miniature Memorial at Cambridge, likewise hung with college-worthies according to many arts of portraiture; yet somehow suggesting also the Sheldonian at Oxford, for no discoverable reason—except that it does. Sayles, however, is a much simpler place, since no more than an ingenious pattern of settees is barrier between the academic dignitaries, the onlooking students and the miscellaneous multitude. There were enough of all three yesterday, to fill their several standing places. The robed, hooded, tasseled university procession wended loosely into the foreground; President Faunce and other eminences took their high seats; the organ sounded; a brief prayer was said; Mr. Andrews was "presented" for his degree; received it; returned short and unaffected thanks.

Next it was Mr. Koussevitzky's turn. Mr. Albert Lyon Scott of the Board of Fellows "presented" him—as it seemed half-disguised in the black scholar's gown. The President of the university saluted him in these words:

> Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, distinguished virtuoso and interpreter of the music of all peoples; born in Northern Russia, student at the Moscow Conservatory, double-bass soloist of the Imperial Opera, leader of orchestral concerts in Paris, London, Berlin, Madrid, Barcelona, Rome, Warsaw; then crossing the Atlantic to convey to prosaic America something of his own imaginative insight and energy, and give to "the land of steady habits" fresh understanding of the great poets and dreamers in the universal language of music.

In Mr. Koussevitzky's hand was laid the parchment; over his shoulder the academic hood was slipped. Then a moment of pause while the President smilingly explained that the conductor's command of English—in a public place—was hardly sufficient for the usual response. Instead, availing himself of another speech, he would play two pieces upon the double-bass. (Not for nothing has Mr. Koussevitzky dwelt and worked in Paris. Such gro Ironico" etched in no Mephisles. The tonal heavens rolled not back the "mystic chorus." Worse still, drama in music of contrasted, conng, interplaying themes, bewept and ocked—characterizing motivs as truly Wagner's own—passed inaudible. Yet it the "Faust Symphony" endures—vn, for invention and imagination, of t's music. Most hearers eyed their hbors inquiringly, asking what had ben a piece that a few years before had ched and thrilled them. Not a measure altered; yet nearly every page was ed. He must have suspected his ire with what "at these concerts" was lorified music. Back to the library t the "Faust Symphony."

Continued on Following Page

---

arly in the season Mr. Koussevitzky down the fateful score; yesterday ght it to performance, with the orcheskeyed to the task, the men of The a for choir, Mr. Charles Stratton for voice. Through eight days anticin had run high. All and sundry ed that the music "suited" the conor; that he was likely to work wonders it. He came; he played; he only conquered. For more than one rose the performance with expectation filled; while signs of a restless house plain. "Das Ewig-Weibliche," sang tenor, "zieht uns hinan"; but already as Ewig-Weibliche" had departed in mbers at every pause in the Symphony. idently regarding each movement as a arate entity, Mr. Koussevitzky permitl applause at the corresponding interval. was not too hearty; nor at the end did set the welkin a-ringing. Not that the aust Symphony" again fell flat. Rather hung in that unhappy limbo which is half-accomplishment.

To the other extreme from the uncomprehending and unstirred Monteux went Mr. Koussevitzky. He tried to make everything signify; from first measure to last was tireless producer (as they say in the theater) of Liszt's Symphony. Through the "character-pictures" of Faust and Gretchen, he "s age-managed"—there is no other word for it—the entrance of every motiv. Scarcely a transform tion, a transition, a modulation, escaped his insistent hand. He drenched with sensuous sentimentality the music of the dreamful Gretchen and the amorous Faust. Over the first movement Faust also mooned his troubled way, as though he were first cousin, beyond the Rhine removed, to the hero of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony." The principal means to these ends were a persistently slow pace, softened rhythms, a long and loving lingering over every songful period, the incessant use in every choir of sensuous tone. (At the least it brought as beautiful horn-playing as Symphony Hall has heard in many a day.) Mr. Monteux had staled the [illegible]ust Symphony" into dry bread. [illegible] [illegible]ssevitzky was now sopping [illegible] [illegible]al sugar-plum

---

Miscellaneous Nev

As the Nineties Knew Him

nely often-eal to Shell Pink,
Rose Nude,
her pleasing Stockings
hem and foot, $2 and $2.50
Pointex" heel.........$2.75
..........$3 and $3.25
All-Over Silk, $4.75 up to $15
STEARNSCO
Full-Fashio

PIANIST—FOR THE MUSIC

Mr. Bruce Simonds Assembles the Ancients in a League of Nations, Plays a Sonata of the "Fiercer" Bax, Tops Off with Other Moderns — For Himself, Change That Is Also Ripening

A YEAR AGO, for the first time in Boston, Mr. Bruce Simonds played upon the piano at Jordan Hall. Last evening in the same room, he played upon it for a second time in this town and in quite another fashion. Yet he remains a pianist who sets his pieces above his playing, the chosen composers above himself. Otherwise he would not have arrayed a program that not once slipped into the ruts. It began with seventeenth and eighteenth-century music, as it seemed of all nations. Scarlatti, for the Italians, took the lead; while Mr. Simonds made his "Cat Fugue"—upon the notes struck by that pet as it crossed the keys—and a Burlesca sound like neat, high-spirited improvisations—light wine and bright sunshine decanted into tones. Next Rameau spoke up for the French; "Les Trois Mains," with frequent crossing of hands, and "Les Cyclopes," which seemed pure caprice, were the titles. As Mr. Simonds played, the ear discovered the Gallic sense of rounded form and ordered progress, the Gallic instinct for grace and polish. (Yet the purists of Rameau's time believed him rough-voiced; no doubt heard Cyclopean stampings in his bass). Then, across the Channel to a harpsichord piece, "The King's Hunt," of Dr. John Bull. These

Amusements
SHUBERT WILBUR
EVES. at 8.00
POP. $2 MAT. SAT. at 2
LAST 4 TIMES
"IS ... V..
A Comedy Kayo

---

ocial season. Mrs. John A. Japhne, have arrived from New York Mrs. Peabody will return North, Saturday. to come back later for the polo.
Rt. Rev. J. N. Conroy, Bishop of Ogdensburg, N. Y., and Rt. Rev. Thomas J. Walsh Bishop of Trenton, N. J., have returned North, following a sojourn at Highland Park Hotel. Arriving there yesterday were N. McL. Sage of Boston, Mr. and Mrs. Raymond E. Streit of New York. Mr. S. F. Streit will give a dinner tonight at the hotel.

Mrs. H. S. Kerr of Washington is a guest of Mrs. Joseph Leiter at Violet Cottage. Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Hitchcock will give a luncheon for twelve, Thursday. Mr. Eben M. Byers and party of Pittsburgh arrived yesterday at the Mouse Trap Villa. Roy A. Rainey of New York is expected to John Mr. Byers for the gun club events in March. Messrs. Joseph Harriman, J. P. Wemple and Grafton H. Pyne are among the tri-weekly players at the Aiken Club tennis court.

Mr. and Mrs. Clarence W. Dolan gave a dinner at their villa last evening in honor of the birthday of their daughter, Miss Rita. Mrs. William H. Davidge of New York is a guest of his sister, Mrs. Charles G. Taylor, at Rye Patch.

Mrs. John Campbell had luncheon with Mr. and Mrs. Allan Forbes yesterday. George G. Bourne had as dinner guests last evening at Willcox's, Miss Nancy Potter, E. N. Potter, Jr., and Miss Charlotte entries for the J. F. Byers Cup. The tournament, a handicap match ludes: Charles Bohlen, Henry M. Thomas Hitchcock, Evander B. uis de Gulliffet, John W. Con-A. Thompson, Goelet Galladd, A. T. West, Nelson Perin, Scouts to

---

* * PRICE TWO CENTS. 14 Cents Per Week Delivered by Carrier.

Providence Journal Feb 25

BROWN GIVES DEGREES TO VIRTUOSO, EXPLORER

University Honors Koussevitzky and Roy Chapman Andrews

DISTINGUISHED CONDUCTOR REPLIES IN MUSIC

Responds With Brilliant Bass Solos to Recognition of His Genius.—Intrepid Traveler "Who Has Made Dead Past Speak to Living Present" Tells of Plans for New Expedition to Gobi Desert

Brown University in special convocation yesterday afternoon paid tribute to two men distinguished in widely diverse fields of endeavor for their contributions to the advance of education.

At impressive exercises in Sayles Hall, attended by visiting alumni, faculty members, undergraduates and the general public, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was awarded the honorary degree of Doctor of Music, and Roy Chapman Andrews, eminent explorer, who has traced the origin of prehistoric man to central Asia, the honorary degree of Doctor of Science.

M. Koussevitzky chose the medium of his art in which to respond to the university's recognition of his genius. For the first time in America he appeared as soloist instead of conductor, playing with thrilling beauty from a concerto of his own, composed some 20 years ago. His instrument was a double bass, or bass violin, dating from the 17th century, which he brought from Europe when he came to this country in 1924.

MR. ANDREWS PRESENTED

ting Mr. Andrews, Dr. Herman of the Board of Fellows native of Wisconsin, College and a re- Master of Arts in fatiga who has living presen realize its youth the vast achievements yet to come."

Bum- n-

KOUSSEVITZKY'S CAREER

"Born in Russia, M. Koussevitzky at the age of 12 began to conduct an orchestra," said Albert Scott Lyon of the Board of Fellows in introducting the famous victuoso. "In 1908," he continued, "he formed an orchestra in Moscow which became one of the most notable in Europe. He toured Russia and other countries on the Continent. At his own expense he founded a publishing house designed to bring to light the works of young composers. He is a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor and on his return to Paris will conduct his sixth orchestral season there."

Dr. Faunce, in conferring the degree upon M. Koussevitzky, spoke of him as "a distinguished virtuoso and interpreter of the music of all peoples; leader of concerts in London, Madrid, Barcelona, and Warsaw, who has crossed the seas to convey to prosaic America some of his own insight into the arts in the universal language of music.

"Since M. Koussevitzky does not desire to use our English tongue in public," continued President Faunce, "he will respond in the language of music which all can understand."

RARE PRIVILEGE

To hear Koussevitzky in the role of soloist is a rare privilege. Few indeed among the thousands of Boston Symphony patrons have had that pleasure. The many know and admire him as an orchestral conductor, one whose remarkable qualities are revealed in his conceptions of the great polyphonic works of the classicists.

Like practically all orchestral leaders, Koussevitzky rose from the ranks. Before he became famous as conductor he was known as an exceptionally fine player upon the double bass, and his interest in and love for the great sonorous toned instrument has not been lessened by the exacting demands of conducting.

This was made evident yesterday when M. Koussevitzky played two numbers, first a sarabande, closing with an andante from his own concerto for double bass.

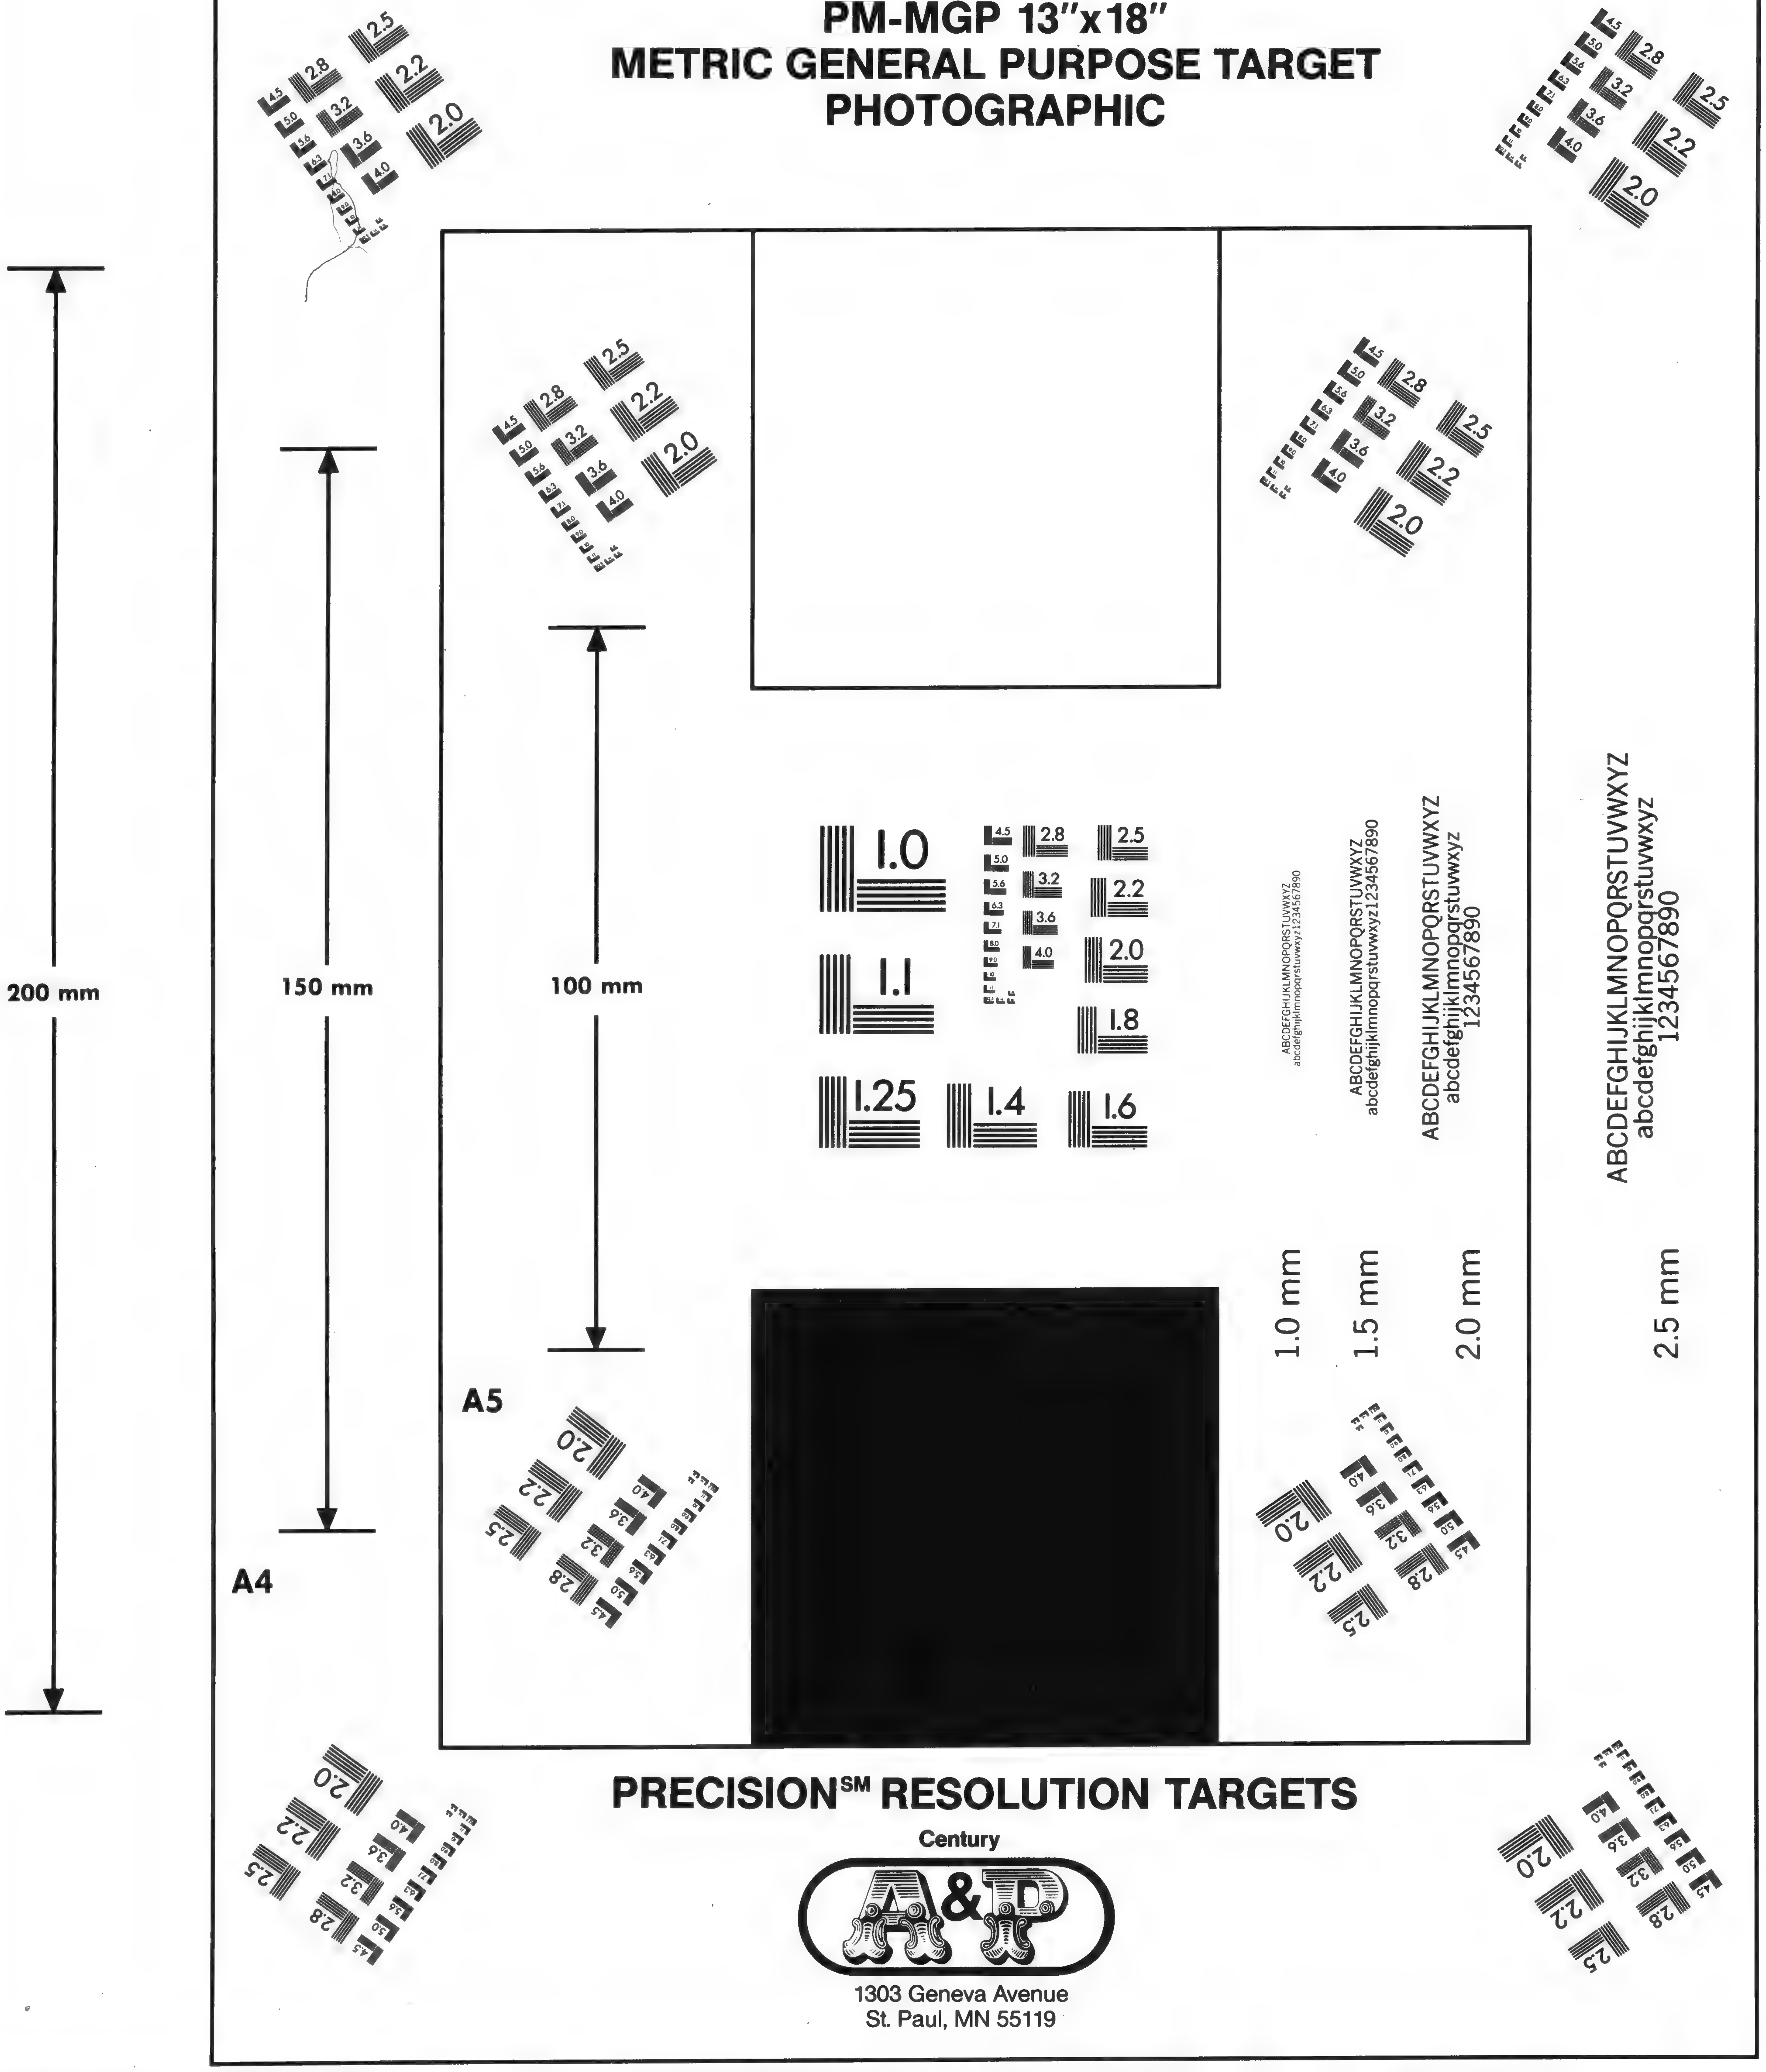
Although this instrument is not commonly heard in solo work it has great possibilities when so used in the hands of an artist. And Koussevitzky could be nothing else. His selections were melodious, not technically showy, and were given with finished style and expression. He owns a fine instrument, the tone of which rang pure and sweet in both numbers. The upper register of the doub bass naturally is more effective for s playing and the artist made these up tones as musical and expressive as t of a 'cello.

An interesting and enjoyable pe ance, it brought treemndous ap from the appreciative listeners.

For March Boston [illegible] are on Page 203

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

1 4 1926

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

187

MAR 9 1926

Boston Symphony at Smith College

Mellowness and Richness Noted in Program by Famous Orchestra.

By WILLARD M. CLARK.

NORTHAMPTON, March 9—Smith College has had a varied orchestral fare this season, thanks to those who aro in charge of the programs. The New York Symphony under Mendelberg, the Cleveland Symphony under Sokoloff and last night the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky, have given fine programs including some numbers not often heard.

Last night the program opened with he Vivaldi "Concerto in E Minor" for string orchestra. The string section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has regained in a great measure the pristine beauty of former days. There is a mellowness and richness today that has been absent for some years. Its onal color was admirably displayed n the three movements of the concero. Vivaldi is better known for his concertos for violin. He had an aptness for melody and the concerto played last night was rich in lovely naterial.

Mr. Koussevitzky chose to play the Beethoven "Symphony No. 8, in F. Major." This is one of what might be called his joyful symphonies. Its four movements are filled with life, hey move along at a lively pace and nish with the most brilliant of finales. Especially lovely is the second movement, an allegretto scherzando. The rchestra has seldom been heard to reater advantage than in this symhony. Mr. Koussevitzky brought out ach theme and melted his strings, vinds and brasses into one. There vas no overpowering by any choir toight, just an ensemble of unusual eauty.

Next came a distinct novelty, three lances from a ballet, "The Three Cornered Hat," by Manuel De Falla. What is there about this Spanish muic which is so intriguing? It must its strongly emphasized rhythms. is ballet was first performed by the ussian Ballet in London in 1919. The hree dances heard last night were "The Neighbors," the "Dance of the Miller," nd "Finale Dance." Each is a gem. There is a gaiety, and strong Andulaian flavor to "The Miller's Dance" hat make it quite the favorite of the hree as far as the audience was conerned. The finale is very abrupt alost angular in its outline and it loses as abruptly as it begins. These ances bear no relation to their names. hey might have been called anything at they are fine examples of this lented Spaniard.

The last number we heard, due to fact that trains must be caught,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

MAR 7 1926

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE

MAR 7 1926

Brooklyn Events

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will give a concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWARK, N. J.
CALL

John McCormack has accepted an invitation from Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to appear ~~as soloist with~~ him in a series of orchestral concerts Paris during May 1927. The programs, which have already been greed upon, will include the Thireenth Psalm of Liszt, arias by Moart and Beethoven and three Irish antasies by Charles Martin Loeffler.

Mr. McCormack is giving what L. E. Behymer, the California impesario, calls "A One May Festival of Song" in Los Angeles at present—four concerts in nine days (March 1 to 10).

He is booked to sail from Vancouver pril 3 for a concert tour of China nd Japan. He is due to return the rly part of July, and will break the rney across the continent to make ew concert appearances. One of se will be given at Winona Lake, on July 14; another at Ocean e on July 17. The concert at na Lake is being sponsored by Billy Sunday, who has been tryecc r at least ten years to get Mr. mack to appear at the famous Campmeeting Auditorium.

• • • •

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A visit by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always a notable feature in a season of things musical in New Haven. The appearance of this renowned organization next Wednesday evening at Woolsey Hall, numbering as it does 107 players, will be especially interesting in that the new conductor Serge Koussevitzky will make his initial appearance here. A year ago he was known to our public only by hearsay. Today he is recognized as among the great leaders both here and in Europe. M. Kossevitzky has arranged an exceptionally apt program, seasoning a presentation of several standard and widely known classics with novelty in the G Minor Sonata of Gailliard, and three of the exquisite "Jewish Poems" of Bloch. Ernest Bloch, it will be recalled, was quite unknown in America when in March, 1917, he conducted some of these "Jewish Poems" as a guest of the Boston Symphony at its home. His music is not easily explained but its charm may perhaps be appreciated from his own description:

"I am not an archeologist. I hold it of first importance to write good, genuine music, my music. It is the Jewish soul that interests me, the complex, glowing, agitated soul that I feel vibrating throughout the Bible; the freshness and naivete of the Patriarchs; the violence that is evident in the prophetic books; the Jew's savage love of justice; the despair of the Preacher in Jerusalem; the sorrow and the immensity of the Book of Job; the sensuality of the Songs of Songs. All this is in us; all this is in me, and it is the better part of me. It is all this that I endeavour to hear in myself and to transcribe in my music; the venerable emotion of the race that slumbers way down in our soul."

The full program follows:

Galliard—Sonata in G major (Arranged for Orchestra by Steinberg)

Maximilian Steinberg has lately arranged for small orchestra this little known sonata of Galliard, a composer of the early eighteenth century. The modern musician has preserved all of the elegant grace of the little piece.

Beethoven—Symphony No. 8 in F major, Op. 93

This symphony has no hint of the tremendous sweep of the seventn symphony, or the colossal grandeur of the ninth. It is a sort of interlude serene, light-hearted. It has the lyric of Mozart or Haydin—an earlier style which the mighty Beethoven was supposed, in those his last years, to have left behind.

Bloch—Three Jewish Poems

The three poems to be presented are "Dance," "Rite" and "Funeral Procession." This music is a delicate and penetrating interpretation of his people's spirit by a true artist.

Wagner—Prelude to "Lohengrin"

Liszt described the Prelude as "a sort of magic formula which, like a

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

MAR 7 1926

Boston Symphony Programs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitsky will visit New York

but one this season for

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAR 6 1926

RESPIGHI SCORE TO FEATURE SYMP S FINA CONCERT

Koussevitzky Will Offer "Pines of Rome" as Swan Song Here.

At the closing concert of the Boston Symphony series on Tuesday evening March 16, in Infantry Hall, Luge Koussevitzky will introduce what has been the most popular new score of the season, Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

The Italian composer has put forth frankly pictorial music in the vein of his fountains of Rome. The movements are entitled: the first, "The Pines of the Villa Borghese," which is rollicking and colorful, suggesting children at play; the second, "The Pines near a Catacomb," is music of sombre suggestion with a notable trumpet solo off stage; the third, "The Pines of the Janiculum," is in the mood of a nocturne, and introduces the singing of the nightingale by the unprecidented means of an actual phonographic record; the finale, "The Pines of the Appian Way," which depicts the triumphal return of the ancient Roman legions into the eternal city through this gate. It is a march which begins with muffled measures and increases gradually to an immense volume of sound.

The concert will open with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F Major, the lyrical and humorous symphony which introduces as a slow movement a delightful burlesque of the metronome, an instrument newly invented in the composer's time.

Koussevitzky will close with three excerpts from the music dramas of Wagner: the introduction to the third act of the "Mastersingers," the Prelude to the same drama, and the Overture to "Tannhauser."

---

6 19

RESPIGHI SCORE TO FEATURE SYMPHONY'S FINAL CONCERT

Koussevitzky Will Offer "Pines of Rome" as Swan Song Here.

At the closing concert of the Boston Symphony series on Tuesday evening March 16, in Infantry Hall, Luge Koussevitzky will introduce what has been the most popular new score of the season, Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

The Italian composer has put forth frankly pictorial music in the vein of his fountains of Rome. The movements are entitled: the first, "The Pines of the Villa Borghese," which is rollicking and colorful, suggesting children at play; the second, "The Pines near a Catacomb," is music of sombre suggestion with a notable trumpet solo off stage; the third, "The Pines of the Janiculum," is in the mood of a nocturne, and introduces the singing of the nightingale by the unprecidented means of an actual phonographic record; the finale, "The Pines of the Appian Way," which depicts the triumphal return of the ancient Roman legions into the eternal city through this gate. It is a march which begins with muffled measures and increases gradually to an immense volume of sound.

The concert will open with Beethoven's lyrical

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

MAR 6 1926

Last Symphony Concert

The closing concert of the Boston Symphony series on Tuesday evening, March 16, in Infantry Hall, will be the farewell appearance here of the famous orchestra under its great conductor. On this occasion, Koussevitzky will introduce what has been the most popular new score of the season—Respighi's "Pines of Rome." The Italian composer has put forth frankly pictorial music in the vein of his fountains of Rome. The movements are entitled: the first, "The Pines of the Villa Borghese," which is rollicking and colorful, suggesting children at play; the second, "The Pines Near a Catacomb," is music of sombre suggestion with a notable trumpet solo off stage; the third, "The Pines of the Janiculum," is in the mood of a nocturne, and introduces the singing of the nightingale by the unprecedented means of an actual photographic record; the finale, "The Pines of the Appian Way," depicts the triumphal return of the ancient Roman legions into the Eternal City through this gate. It is a march which begins with muf-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
~~UNION~~
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Republican

MAR 1 0 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY APPEARS AT HOLYOKE

Orchestra Gives Fine Concert to Enjoyment of Large Audience

Holyoke, March 9—The Boston Symphony orchestra, greeted by a large and enthusiastic audience, gave the second and last of the Holyoke course of concerts this evening. With the xception of the symphony and one her number, all the compositions o e program had been given at th oncert in Northampton the evenin efore. Haydn's "Surprise" symphony pened the program. Mr Koussewitzy's conducting of it revealed its grace nd sprightliness. The lively tempi, lear-cut rhythm, nice accentuation nd delicate shading made it charming listen to.

1?osGaupdvaoHb, m h t ht ht mhhmt

No greater contrast could have een found for this typical classic than he powerful Jewish poems by Ernest Bloch, which formed the second umber of the first half of the program.

Almost as much of a contrast was ound in the fascinating pieces from De Falla's "The Three-Cornered Hat" from

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

MAR 7 1926

John McCormack has accepted an invitation from Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to appear ~~as soloist with him~~ in a series of orchestral concerts in Paris during May, 1927. The programs, which have already been agreed upon, will include the Thirteenth Psalm of List, arias by Mozart and Beethoven and three Irish fantasies by Charles Martin Loeffler. Mr. McCormack is giving what L. E. Behymer, the California impresario, calls "one-man festival of song" in Los Angeles at present—four concerts in nine days (March 1 to 10).

Page 191 - M

Boston Orchestra To Present Novelties

New Manuscripts by Gilbert, Hindemith and Tailleferre on Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will visit New York for the last time but one this season for a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The Thursday evening program will include Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F major; a new manuscript score, "Symphonic Piece," by Henry F. Gilbert, the American composer; Ernest Bloch's "Three Jewish Poems," and the second suite from Ravel's ballet "Daphnis and Chloe."

The matinee program will include a concerto for string

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

MAR 6 1926

LAST SYMPHONY VISIT MARCH 16

Koussevitzky to Present Respighi's "Pines of Rome" as Main Number

The closing concert of the Boston Symphonk series on Tuesday evening, March 16, in Infantry hall, will be the farewell appearance here of the famous orchestra under its great conductor. On this occasion, Koussevitzky will introduce what has been the most popular new score of the season—Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

The Italian composer has put forth frankly pictorial music in the vein of his fountains of Rome. The movements are entitled: First, "The Pines of the Villa Borghese," rollicking and colorful, suggesting children at play; the second, "The Pines Near a Catacomb," is music of sombre suggestion with a notable trumpet solo off stage; the third, "The Pines of the Janiculum," n the mood of a nocturne, introduces he singing of a nightingale by the unprecedented means of an actual phonographic record. The finale, "The Pines of the Appian Way," depicts the triumphal return of the ancient Roman egion into the Eternal City through his gate. It is a march which begins with muffled measures and increases

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
~~TIMES-RECORDER~~
NEW HAVEN, CONN.

MAR 1 1 1926

Boston Symphony Gave Wonderful Concert Last Night

The Boston Symphony gave a wonderful concert at Woolsey hall last evening.

The audience enjoyed a treat that was thrilling because of the degree of perfection attained by the artists who appeared.

Woolsey hall was well filled and gave full expression to its appreciation of the great Conductor Kousevitzky, one of the most brilliant wielders of the baton the world has ever known.

This was his first appearance in New Haven and he won the hearts of all who had the good fortune to witness his artistic work.

A man of medium stature, of a rather powerful build, he controls the 107 members of the orchestra with a vigorous strength of will that is manifested in his large pale face, set off by an abundance of thick, black hair. He is a born leader of musical men and the Boston Symphony is a wonderful organization of real artists which he has developed with great success.

The program was well selected and all in all the concert was the best of the season.

The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program for March 19-20 will comprise these works: Bach, Concerto No. 2, F major, for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet (edited by Mottl); Beethoven, Violin Concerto (Joseph Szigeti, violinist), Roussel, Suite from his ballet, "Padmavati"; Respighi, "Pines of Rome."

FEB 2

THE performance by the Bosto Symphony Orchestra this wee in New York of a new "Symphonic Piece" by Henry F. Gilbert is an occasion of unusual interest, since Mr. Gilbert, while he ha done little in the direction of cultivating publicity, stands today as one o the most original and independent figures among contemporaneous American composers. He was born in Somerville, Mass. He was the first American pupil of Edward MacDowell. His compositions, which in most cases have aimed to affirm various phases of American life and spirit, have often drawn upon folk music current in this land for their thematic material. But Mr. Gilbert has not merely quoted folk themes; he has striven to express, through developments and transformations of certain melodies which have become part and parcel of national musical life, something of the energy and romantic vision that he believes to be latent in his people. He first emerged as a figure of significant individuality in his art when the Boston Symphony Orchestra produced his "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes" in 1911, which was immediately recognized by Philip Hale, H. T. Parker and others as a new and important work. In the words of Mr. Hale, the music "stirred the blood of the audience. All rejoiced in hearing a new voice, a voice with something to say and an original way of saying it. The overture," Mr. Hale concluded—and in this anticipated later comments from many quarters upon Gilbert's art—"is distinctively, but not bumptiously, not apologetically, American."

Mr. Parker found "here at last music of American folk tunes that meets every musical test, except, perhaps, that of adroit instrumental coloring, that keeps the matter, the voice and the spirit—the difficult item—of its origin; and that interests and stirs those who hear." This work of Gilbert's was followed by such orchestral compositions as his "Negro Rhapsody," first produced at the Norfolk Festival, Connecticut, in 1913; by "The Dance on Place Congo," played by the Boston Symphony and performed by the Metropolitan Opera Company as a ballet in 1918; by the orchestral prelude to Synge's "Riders to the Sea," based on Celtic melody and embodying with singular fidelity the spirit of the folk drama; the "Indian Suite," and other smaller works. The "Symphonic Piece" to be heard this week had its first performance in Boston Feb. 26 and 27 under Mr. Koussevitzky. The composer describes his musical intentions as follows:

"This piece of music has no 'program' in the sense in which that word is ordinarily used. It is not about any thing, or event, in particular; not suggested or inspired by any poem, or prose writing; just a piece of music, that's all. In fact, it aims to be a piece of absolute music; somewhat of a rarity in these days of the overworked 'program' idea—ornithological, botanical, or what not.

"Many of my friends have pressed me to tell them what it's all about—what I have tried to represent, &c. I can only say this: My constant aim ever since beginning composition has been to write some American music, i. e., some music which would not naturally have been written in any other country and which should reflect or express certain aspects of the American character or spirit as felt by myself. That spirit, as I see it, is energetic, optimistic, nervous, impatient of restraint and in its highest aspect a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit which is America is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration. Plenty of jingoism, vulgarity and 'Hurrah, boys!' attaches to it, but the spirit of the new birth underlies it all for him who can see it.

"Some of this American mood I have tried to reflect in my composition. So the first theme has in it (I hope) some of the 'Hurrah, boys!' character. The second theme, by contrast, has a slight Fosterian twang. It contains a remote suggestion of 'Old Folks at Home'—kind of a family resemblance—interspersed with a couple of measures from 'The Arkansaw Traveler.' Those bits are made use of and developed in the usual symphonic manner. But let it be said that, although I am a great believer in the songs of the people as possible bases for national art compositions, these two suggestions (neither used verbatim) are the only folk suggestions I have used in this composition.

"The score of this piece was finished in November, 1925. It was originally intended to be the first movement of a symphony, but certain friends of mine requested and advised that it be played as it stands. This is therefore done."

1926

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

187

MAR 9 1926

Boston Symphony at Smith College

Mellowness and Richness Noted in Program by Famous Orchestra.

By WILLARD M. CLARK.

NORTHAMPTON, March 9—Smith College has had a varied orchestral fare this season, thanks to those who aro in charge of the programs. The New York Symphony under Mendelberg, the Cleveland Symphony under Sokoloff and last night the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky, have given fine programs including some numbers not often heard.

Last night the program opened with he Vivaldi "Concerto in E Minor" for string orchestra. The string section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has regained in a great measure the pristine beauty of former days. There is a mellowness and richness today that has been absent for some years. Its onal color was admirably displayed n the three movements of the concerto. Vivaldi is better known for his concertos for violin. He had an aptness for melody and the concerto played last night was rich in lovely naterial.

Mr. Koussevitzky chose to play the Beethoven "Symphony No. 8, in F. Major." This is one of what might be called his joyful symphonies. Its four movements are filled with life, hey move along at a lively pace and nish with the most brilliant of finales. Especially lovely is the second movement, an allegretto scherzando. The rchestra has seldom been heard to reater advantage than in this symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky brought out ach theme and melted his strings, winds and brasses into one. There was no overpowering by any choir tonight, just an ensemble of unusual beauty.

Next came a distinct novelty, three dances from a ballet, "The Three Cornered Hat," by Manuel De Falla. What is there about this Spanish music which is so intriguing? It must its strongly emphasized rhythms. his ballet was first performed by the ussian Ballet in London in 1919. The hree dances heard last night were "The Neighbors," the "Dance of the Miller," nd "Finale Dance." Each is a gem. There is a gaiety, and strong Andulaian flavor to "The Miller's Dance" hat make it quite the favorite of the hree as far as the audience was concerned. The finale is very abrupt almost angular in its outline and it oses as abruptly as it begins. These ances bear no relation to their names. hey might have been called anything ut they are fine examples of this lented Spaniard.

The last number we heard, due to e fact that trains must be caught,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

7 1926

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE

7 1926

Brooklyn Events

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will give a concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening [illegible] no soloist,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWARK, N. J.
CALL

John McCormack has accepted an invitation from Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to appear ~~as soloist~~ with him in a series of orchestral concerts n Paris during May 1927. The programs, which have already been greed upon, will include the Thirteenth Psalm of Liszt, arias by Moart and Beethoven and three Irish antasies by Charles Martin Loeffler.

Mr. McCormack is giving what L. E. Behymer, the California impesario, calls "A One May Festival of Song" in Los Angeles at present—four concerts in nine days (March 1 to 10).

He is booked to sail from Vancouver pril 3 for a concert tour of China nd Japan. He is due to return the rly part of July, and will break the urney across the continent to make few concert appearances. One of se will be given at Winona Lake, on July 14; another at Ocean e on July 17. The concert at na Lake is being sponsored by Billy Sunday, who has been trying or at least ten years to get Mr. mack to appear at the famous Campmeeting Auditorium.

M

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A visit by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always a notable feature in a season of things musical in New Haven. The appearance of this renowned organization next Wednesday evening at Woolsey Hall, numbering as it does 107 players, will be especially interesting in that the new conductor Serge Koussevitzky will make his initial appearance here. A year ago he was known to our public only by hearsay. Today he is recognized as among the great leaders both here and in Europe. M. Kossevitzky has arranged an exceptionally apt program, seasoning a presentation of several standard and widely known classics with novelty in the G Minor Sonata of Gailliard, and three of the exquisite "Jewish Poems" of Bloch. Ernest Bloch, it will be recalled, was quite unknown in America when in March, 1917, he conducted some of these "Jewish Poems" as a guest of the Boston Symphony at its home. His music is not easily explained but its charm may perhaps be appreciated from his own description:

"I am not an archeologist. I hold it of first importance to write good, genuine music, my music. It is the Jewish soul that interests me, the complex, glowing, agitated soul that I feel vibrating throughout the Bible; the freshness and naivete of the Patriarchs; the violence that is evident in the prophetic books; the Jew's savage love of justice; the despair of the Preacher in Jerusalem; the sorrow and the immensity of the Book of Job; the sensuality of the Songs of Songs. All this is in us; all this is in me, and it is the better part of me. It is all this that I endeavour to hear in myself and to transcribe in my music; the venerable emotion of the race that slumbers way down in our soul."

The full program follows:

Galliard—Sonata in G major (Arranged for Orchestra by Steinberg)

Maximilian Steinberg has lately arranged for small orchestra this little known sonata of Galliard, a composer of the early eighteenth century. The modern musician has preserved all of the elegant grace of the little piece.

Beethoven—Symphony No. 8 in F major, Op. 93

This symphony has no hint of the tremendous sweep of the seventn symphony, or the colossal grandeur of the ninth. It is a sort of interlude serene, light-hearted. It has the lyric of Mozart or Haydin—an earlier style which the mighty Beethoven was supposed, in those his last years, to have left behind.

Bloch—Three Jewish Poems

The three poems to be presented are "Dance," "Rite" and "Funeral Procession." This music is a delicate and penetrating interpretation of his people's spirit by a true artist.

Wagner—Prelude to "Lohengrin"

Liszt described the Prelude as "a sort of magic formula which, like a mysteri

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAPH

MAR 7 1926

Boston Symphony Programs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitsky will visit New York [illegible] this season for

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

RESPIGHI SCORE TO FEATURE SYMPHONY'S FINAL CONCERT

Koussevitzky Will Offer "Pines of Rome" as Swan Song Here.

At the closing concert of the Boston Symphony series on Tuesday evening March 16, in Infantry Hall, Luge Koussevitzky will introduce what has been the most popular new score of the season, Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

The Italian composer has put forth frankly pictorial music in the vein of his fountains of Rome. The movements are entitled: the first, "The Pines of the Villa Borghese," which is rollicking and colorful, suggesting children at play; the second, "The Pines near a Catacomb," is music of sombre suggestion with a notable trumpet solo off stage; the third, "The Pines of the Janiculum," is in the mood of a nocturne, and introduces the singing of the nightingale by the unprecidented means of an actual phonographic record; the finale, "The Pines of the Appian Way," which depicts the triumphal return of the ancient Roman legions into the eternal city through this gate. It is a march which begins with muffled measures and increases gradually to an immense volume of sound.

The concert will open with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F Major, the lyrical and humorous symphony which introduces as a slow movement a delightful burlesque of the metronome, an instrument newly invented in the composer's time.

Koussevitzky will close with three excerpts from the music dramas of Wagner: the introduction to the third act of the "Mastersingers," the Prelude to the same drama, and the Overture to "Tannhauser."

RESPIGHI SCORE TO FEATURE SYMPHONY'S FINAL CONCERT

Koussevitzky Will Offer "Pines of Rome" as Swan Song Here.

At the closing concert of the Boston Symphony series on Tuesday evening March 16, in Infantry Hall, Luge Koussevitzky will introduce what has been the most popular new score of the season, Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

The Italian composer has put forth frankly pictorial music in the vein of his fountains of Rome. The movements are entitled: the first, "The Pines of the Villa Borghese," which is rollicking and colorful, suggesting children at play; the second, "The Pines near a Catacomb," is music of sombre suggestion with a notable trumpet solo off stage; the third, "The Pines of the Janiculum," is in the mood of a nocturne, and introduces the singing of the nightingale by the unprecidented means of an actual phonographic record; the finale, "The Pines of the Appian Way," which depicts the triumphal return of the ancient Roman legions into the eternal city through this gate. It is a march which begins with muffled measures and increases gradually to an immense volume of sound.

The concert will open with Beethoven's

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

Last Symphony Concert

The closing concert of the Boston Symphony series on Tuesday evening, ~~March 16~~, in Infantry Hall, will be the farewell appearance here of the famous orchestra under its great conductor. On this occasion, Koussevitzky will introduce what has been the most popular new score of the season—Respighi's "Pines of Rome." The Italian composer has put forth frankly pictorial music in the vein of his fountains of Rome. The movements are entitled: the first, "The Pines of the Villa Borghese," which is rollicking and colorful, suggesting children at play; the second, "The Pines Near a Catacomb," is music of sombre suggestion with a notable trumpet solo off stage; the third, "The Pines of the Janiculum," is in the mood of a nocturne, and introduces the singing of the nightingale by the unprecedented means of an actual photographic record: the finale, "The Pines of the Appian Way," depicts the triumphal return of the ancient Roman legions into the Eternal City through this gate. It is a march which begins with muf-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
~~UNION~~
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

MAR 10 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY APPEARS AT HOLYOKE

Orchestra Gives Fine Concert to Enjoyment of Large Audience

Holyoke, March 9—The Boston Symphony orchestra, greeted by a large and enthusiastic audience, gave the second and last of the Holyoke course of concerts this evening. With the xception of the symphony and one ther number, all the compositions on e program had been given at the oncert in Northampton the evening efore. Haydn's "Surprise" symphony pened the program. Mr Koussewitzy's conducting of it revealed its grace nd sprightliness. The lively tempi, lear-cut rhythm, nice accentuation nd delicate shading made it charming o listen to.

1?osGaupdvaoHb, m h t ht ht mhhmt

No greater contrast could have een found for this typical classic than he powerful Jewish poems by Ernest Bloch, which formed the second umber of the first half of the program.

Almost as much of a contrast was ound in the fascinating pieces from De Falla's "The Three-Cornered Hat" from

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAPH

MAR 7 1926

John McCormack has accepted an invitation from Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to appear as ~~soloist with him~~ in a series of orchestral concerts in Paris during May, 1927. The programs, which have already been agreed upon, will include the Thirteenth Psalm of List, arias by Mozart and Beethoven and three Irish fantasies by Charles Martin Loeffler. Mr. McCormack is giving what L. E. Behymer, the California impresario, calls "a one-man festival of song" in Los Angeles at present—four concerts in nine days (March 1 to 10).

Page 191 - M

Boston Orchestra To Present Novelties

New Manuscripts by Gilbert, Hindemith and Tailleferre on Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will visit New York for the last time but one this season for a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The Thursday evening program will include Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F major; a new manuscript score, "Symphonic Piece," by Henry F. Gilbert, the American composer; Ernest Bloch's "Three Jewish Poems," and the second suite from Ravel's ballet "Daphnis and Chloe."

The matinee program will include a concerto for string

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

MAR 6 1926

LAST SYMPHONY VISIT MARCH 16

Koussevitzky to Present Respighi's "Pines of Rome" as Main Number

The closing concert of the Boston Symphonk series on Tuesday evening, ~~March 16~~, in Infantry hall, will be the farewell appearance here of the famous orchestra under its great conductor. On this occasion, Koussevitzky will introduce what has been the most popular new score of the season—Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

The Italian composer has put forth frankly pictorial music in the vein of his fountains of Rome. The movements are entitled: First, "The Pines of the Villa Borghese," rollicking and colorful, suggesting children at play; the second, "The Pines Near a Catacomb," is music of sombre suggestion with a notable trumpet solo off stage; the third, "The Pines of the Janiculum," n the mood of a nocturne, introduces he singing of a nightingale by the unprecedented means of an actual phonographic record. The finale, "The Pines of the Appian Way," depicts the riumphal return of the ancient Roman egion into the Eternal City through his gate. It is a march which begins with muffled measures and increases gradual

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES-~~RECORDER~~
NEW HAVEN, CONN.

MAR 11 1926

Boston Symphony Gave Wonderful Concert Last Night

The Boston Symphony gave a wonderful concert at Woolsey hall last evening.

The audience enjoyed a treat that was thrilling because of the degree of perfection attained by the artists who appeared.

Woolsey hall was well filled and gave full expression to its appreciation of the great Conductor Koussevitzky, one of the most brilliant wielders of the baton the world has ever known.

This was his first appearance in New Haven and he won the hearts of all who had the good fortune to witness his artistic work.

A man of medium stature, of a rather powerful build, he controls the 107 members of the orchestra with a vigorous strength of will that is manifested in his large pale face, set off by an abundance of thick, black hair. He is a born leader of musical men and the Boston Symphony is a wonderful organization of real artists which he has developed with great success.

The program was well selected and all in all the concert was the best of the season.

The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program for March 19-20 will comprise these works: Bach, Concerto No. 2, F major, for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet (edited by Mottl); Beethoven, Violin Concerto (Joseph Szigeti, violinist), Roussel, Suite from his ballet, "Padmavati"; Respighi, "Pines of Rome."

THE performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week in New York of a new "Symphonic Piece" by Henry F. Gilbert is an occasion of unusual interest, since Mr. Gilbert, while he has done little in the direction of cultivating publicity, stands today as one of the most original and independent figures among contemporaneous American composers. He was born in Somerville, Mass. He was the first American pupil of Edward MacDowell. His compositions, which in most cases have aimed to affirm various phases of American life and spirit, have often drawn upon folk music current in this land for their thematic material. But Mr. Gilbert has not merely quoted folk themes; he has striven to express, through developments and transformations of certain melodies which have become part and parcel of national musical life, something of the energy and romantic vision that he believes to be latent in his people. He first emerged as a figure of significant individuality in his art when the Boston Symphony Orchestra produced his "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes" in 1911, which was immediately recognized by Philip Hale, H. T. Parker and others as a new and important work. In the words of Mr. Hale, the music "stirred the blood of the audience. All rejoiced in hearing a new voice, a voice with something to say and an original way of saying it. The overture," Mr. Hale concluded—and in this anticipated later comments from many quarters upon Gilbert's art—"is distinctively, but not bumptiously, not apologetically, American."

Mr. Parker found "here at last music of American folk tunes that meets every musical test, except, perhaps, that of adroit instrumental coloring, that keeps the matter, the voice and the spirit—the difficult item—of its origin; and that interests and stirs those who hear." This work of Gilbert's was followed by such orchestral compositions as his "Negro Rhapsody," first produced at the Norfolk Festival, Connecticut, in 1913; by "The Dance on Place Congo," played by the Boston Symphony and performed by the Metropolitan Opera Company as a ballet in 1918; by the orchestral prelude to Synge's "Riders to the Sea," based on Celtic melody and embodying with singular fidelity the spirit of the folk drama; the "Indian Suite," and other smaller works. The "Symphonic Piece" to be heard this week had its first performance in Boston Feb. 26 and 27 under Mr. Koussevitzky. The composer describes his musical intentions as follows:

"This piece of music has no 'program' in the sense in which that word is ordinarily used. It is not about any thing, or event, in particular; not suggested or inspired by any poem, or prose writing; just a piece of music, that's all. In fact, it aims to be a piece of absolute music; somewhat of a rarity in these days of the overworked 'program' idea—ornithological, botanical, or what not.

"Many of my friends have pressed me to tell them what it's all about—what I have tried to represent, &c. I can only say this: My constant aim ever since beginning composition has been to write some American music, i. e., some music which would not naturally have been written in any other country and which should reflect or express certain aspects of the American character or spirit as felt by myself. That spirit, as I see it, is energetic, optimistic, nervous, impatient of restraint and in its highest aspect a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit which is America is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration. Plenty of jingoism, vulgarity and 'Hurrah, boys!' attaches to it, but the spirit of the new birth underlies it all for him who can see it.

"Some of this American mood I have tried to reflect in my composition. So the first theme has in it (I hope) some of the 'Hurrah, boys!' character. The second theme, by contrast, has a slight Fosterian twang. It contains a remote suggestion of 'Old Folks at Home'—kind of a family resemblance—interspersed with a couple of measures from 'The Arkansaw Traveler.' Those bits are made use of and developed in the usual symphonic manner. But let it be said that, although I am a great believer in the songs of the people as possible bases for national art compositions, these two suggestions (neither used verbatim) are the only folk suggestions I have used in this composition.

"The score of this piece was finished in November, 1925. It was originally intended to be the first movement of a symphony, but certain friends of mine requested and advised that it be played as it stands. This is therefore done."

187

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

MAR 9 1926

Boston Symphony at Smith College

Mellowness and Richness Noted in Program by Famous Orchestra.

By WILLARD M. CLARK.

NORTHAMPTON, March 9—Smith College has had a varied orchestral fare this season, thanks to those who aro in charge of the programs. The New York Symphony under Mendelberg, the Cleveland Symphony under Sokoloff and last night the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky, have given fine programs including some numbers not often heard.

Last night the program opened with he Vivaldi "Concerto in E Minor" for string orchestra. The string section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has regained in a great measure the pristine beauty of former days. There is a mellowness and richness today that ias been absent for some years. Its onal color was admirably displayed n the three movements of the concero. Vivaldi is better known for his concertos for violin. He had an aptiess for melody and the concerto layed last night was rich in lovely naterial.

Mr. Koussevitzky chose to play the Beethoven "Symphony No. 8, in F. Major." This is one of what might e called his joyful symphonies. Its four movements are filled with life, hey move along at a lively pace and nish with the most brilliant of finales. Especially lovely is the second moveient, an allegretto scherzando. The rchestra has seldom been heard to reater advantage than in this symhony. Mr. Koussevitzky brought out ach theme and melted his strings, vinds and brasses into one. There vas no overpowering by any choir toight, just an ensemble of unusual eauty.

Next came a distinct novelty, three ances from a ballet, "The Three Cornered Hat," by Manuel De Falla. What is there about this Spanish mu-ic which is so intriguing? It must its strongly emphasized rhythms. his ballet was first performed by the ussian Ballet in London in 1919. The hree dances heard last night were "The Neighbors," the "Dance of the Miller," nd "Finale Dance." Each is a gem. There is a gaiety, and strong Andulalan flavor to "The Miller's Dance" hat make it quite the favorite of the hree as far as the audience was conerned. The finale is very abrupt alnost angular in its outline and it loses as abruptly as it begins. These ances bear no relation to their names. hey might have been called anything at they are fine examples of this lented Spaniard.

The last number we heard, due to e fact that trains must be caught,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

7 1926

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE

7 1926

Brooklyn Events

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will give a concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening of this week. There will be no soloist, Mr. Koussewitsky having arranged an interesting program for the orchestra. A Concerto in E minor for Strings, by Vivaldi, will open the evening, and will be followed by Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony. Three dances from Manuel de Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," will be played following the intermission, and the concert will close with the Prelude and Finale from "Tristan und Isolde," and the overture to "Die Meistersinger." This will be the last but one of the season's Academy of Music Boston Symphony concerts.

* * *

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A visit by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always a notable feature in a season of things musical in New Haven. The appearance of this renowned organization next Wednesday evening at Woolsey Hall, numbering as it does 107 players, will be especially interesting in that the new conductor Serge Koussevitzky will make his initial appearance here. A year ago he was known to our public only by hearsay. Today he is recognized as among the great leaders both here and in Europe. M. Kossevitzky has arranged an exceptionally apt program, seasoning a presentation of several standard and widely known classics with novelty in the G Minor Sonata of Gailliard, and three of the exquisite "Jewish Poems" of Bloch. Ernest Bloch, it will be recalled, was quite unknown in America when in March, 1917, he conducted some of these "Jewish Poems" as a guest of the Boston Symphony at its home. His music is not easily explained but its charm may perhaps be appreciated from his own description:

"I am not an archeologist. I hold it of first importance to write good, genuine music, my music. It is the Jewish soul that interests me, the complex, glowing, agitated soul that I feel vibrating throughout the Bible; the freshness and naivete of the Patriarchs; the violence that is evident in the prophetic books; the Jew's savage love of justice; the despair of the Preacher in Jerusalem; the sorrow and the immensity of the Book of Job; the sensuality of the Songs of Songs. All this is in us; all this is in me, and it is the better part of me. It is all this that I endeavour to hear in myself and to transcribe in my music; the venerable emotion of the race that slumbers way down in our soul."

The full program follows:

Galliard—Sonata in G major (Arranged for Orchestra by Steinberg)

Maximilian Steinberg has lately arranged for small orchestra this little known sonata of Galliard, a composer of the early eighteenth century. The modern musician has preserved all of the elegant grace of the little piece.

Beethoven—Symphony No. 8 in F major, Op. 93

This symphony has no hint of the tremendous sweep of the seventh symphony, or the colossal grandeur of the ninth. It is a sort of interlude serene, light-hearted. It has the lyric of Mozart or Haydin—an earlier style which the mighty Beethoven was supposed, in those his last years, to have left behind.

Bloch—Three Jewish Poems

The three poems to be presented are "Dance," "Rite" and "Funeral Procession." This music is a delicate and penetrating interpretation of his people's spirit by a true artist.

Wagner—Prelude to "Lohengrin"

Liszt described the Prelude as "a sort of magic formula which, like a

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAPH

7 1926

Boston Symphony Programs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitsky will visit New York for the season for

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

RESPIGHI SCORE TO FEATURE SYMP S FINA CONCERT

Koussevitzky Will Offer "Pines of Rome" as Swan Song Here.

At the closing concert of the Boston Symphony series on Tuesday evening March 16, in Infantry Hall, Luge Koussevitzky will introduce what has been the most popular new score of the season, Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

The Italian composer has put forth frankly pictorial music in the vein of his fountains of Rome. The movements are entitled: the first, "The Pines of the Villa Borghese," which is rollicking and colorful, suggesting children at play; the second, "The Pines near a Catacomb," is music of sombre suggestion with a notable trumpet solo off stage; the third, "The Pines of the Janiculum," is in the mood of a nocturne, and introduces the singing of the nightingale by the unprecidented means of an actual phonographic record; the finale, "The Pines of the Appian Way," which depicts the triumphal return of the ancient Roman legions into the eternal city through this gate. It is a march which begins with muffled measures and increases gradually to an immense volume of sound.

The concert will open with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F Major, the lyrical and humorous symphony which introduces as a slow movement a delightful burlesque of the metronome, an instrument newly invented in the composer's time.

Koussevitzky will close with three excerpts from the music dramas of Wagner: the introduction to the third act of the "Mastersingers," the Prelude to the same drama, and the Overture to "Tannhauser."

RESPIGHI SCORE TO FEATURE SYMPHONY'S FINAL CONCERT

Koussevitzky Will Offer "Pines of Rome" as Swan Song Here.

At the closing concert of the Boston Symphony series on Tuesday evening March 16, in Infantry Hall, Luge Koussevitzky will introduce what has been the most popular new score of the season, Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

The Italian composer has put forth frankly pictorial music in the vein of his fountains of Rome. The movements are entitled: the first, "The Pines of the Villa Borghese," which is rollicking and colorful, suggesting children at play; the second, "The Pines near a Catacomb," is music of sombre suggestion with a notable trumpet solo off stage; the third, "The Pines of the Janiculum," is in the mood of a nocturne, and introduces the singing of the nightingale by the unprecidented means of an actual phonographic record; the finale, "The Pines of the Appian Way," which depicts the triumphal return of the ancient Roman legions into the eternal city through this gate. It is a march which begins with muffled measures and increases gradually to an immense volume of sound.

The concert will open with Beethoven's

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

6

Last Symphony Concert

The closing concert of the Boston Symphony series on Tuesday evening, March 16, in Infantry Hall, will be the farewell appearance here of the famous orchestra under its great conductor. On this occasion, Koussevitzky will introduce what has been the most popular new score of the season—Respighi's "Pines of Rome." The Italian composer has put forth frankly pictorial music in the vein of his fountains of Rome. The movements are entitled: the first, "The Pines of the Villa Borghese," which is rollicking and colorful, suggesting children at play; the second, "The Pines Near a Catacomb," is music of sombre suggestion with a notable trumpet solo off stage; the third, "The Pines of the Janiculum," is in the mood of a nocturne, and introduces the singing of the nightingale by the unprecedented means of an actual photographic record; the finale, "The Pines of the Appian Way," depicts the triumphal return of the ancient Roman legions into the Eternal City through this gate. It is a march which begins with muf-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
~~UNION~~
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Republican

MAR 10 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY APPEARS AT HOLYOKE

Orchestra Gives Fine Concert to Enjoyment of Large Audience

Holyoke, March 9—The Boston Symphony orchestra, greeted by a large and enthusiastic audience, gave the second and last of the Holyoke course of concerts this evening. With the xception of the symphony and one her number, all the compositions of e program had been given at the oncert in Northampton the evening efore. Haydn's "Surprise" symphony pened the program. Mr Koussewitzy's conducting of it revealed its grace nd sprightliness. The lively tempi, lear-cut rhythm, nice accentuation nd delicate shading made it charming o listen to.

1?osGaupdvaoHb, m h t ht ht mhhmt

No greater contrast could have een found for this typical classic than he powerful Jewish poems by Ernest Bloch, which formed the second umber of the first half of the program.

Almost as much of a contrast was ound in the fascinating pieces from De Falla's "The Three-Cornered Hat" nd the Prelude and Liebestove from "Tristan and Isolde," magnificently played, with the solid Prelude to "The Meistersingers" to end with. In all these varied styles Mr Koussewitzky gave convincing interpretations, evidently gaining the interest and admiration of the orchestra. As to the orchestra itself, it is in fine condition, the orchestra of which not only Boston, but all New England, is proud. Holyoke is to be congratulated on hearing it, even without its much-needed auditorium.

---

eve

This in New Ha won the hearts of all who had the good fortune to witness his artistic work.

A man of medium stature, of a rather powerful build, he controls the 107 members of the orchestra with a vigorous strength of will that is manifested in his large pale face, set off by an abundance of thick, black hair. He is a born leader of musical men and the Boston Symphony is a wonderful organization of real artists which he has developed with great success.

The program was well selected and all in all the concert was the best of the season.

The orchestra will be out of town ext week. The program for March -20 will comprise these works: Bach, ncerto No. 2, F major, for violin, te, oboe and trumpet (edited by ttl); Beethoven, Violin Concerto (Joph Szigeti, violinist), Roussel, Suite from his ballet, "Padmavati"; Respighi, "Pines of Rome."

Boston Orchestra To Present Novelties

New Manuscripts by Gilbert, Hindemith and Tailleferre on Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will visit New York for the last time but one this season for a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The Thursday evening program will include Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F major; a new manuscript score, "Symphonic Piece," by Henry F. Gilbert, the American composer; Ernest Bloch's "Three Jewish Poems," and the second suite from Ravel's ballet "Daphnis and Chloe."

The matinee program will include a concerto for string

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

MAR 6 1926

LAST SYMPHONY VISIT MARCH 16

Koussevitzky to Present Respighi's "Pines of Rome" as Main Number

The closing concert of the Boston Symphonk series on Tuesday evening, March 16, in Infantry hall, will be the farewell appearance here of the famous orchestra under its great conductor. On this occasion, Koussevitzky will introduce what has been the most popular new score of the season—Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

The Italian composer has put forth frankly pictorial music in the vein of his fountains of Rome. The movements are entitled: First, "The Pines of the Villa Borghese," rollicking and colorful, suggesting children at play; the second, "The Pines Near a Catacomb," is music of sombre suggestion with a notable trumpet solo off stage; the third, "The Pines of the Janiculum," n the mood of a nocturne, introduces he singing of a nightingale by the unprecedented means of an actual phonographic record. The finale, "The Pines of the Appian Way," depicts the riumphal return of the ancient Roman egion into the Eternal City through his gate. It is a march which begins vith muffled measures and increases radually to an immense volume of ound.

The concert will open with Beethoven's eighth symphony in F-major, he lyrical and humorous symphony vhich introduces as a slow movement delightful burlesque of the metronome, n instrument newly invented in the omposer's time.

Koussevitzky will close this, his last Providence appearance, with three excerpts from the music drama of Wagner: the introduction to the third act of the "Meistersingers," the prelude to the same drama, and the overture to "Tannhauser."

FEB

THE performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this wee in New York of a new "Symphonic Piece" by Henry F. Gilbert is an occasion of unusual interest, since Mr. Gilbert, while he has done little in the direction of cultivating publicity, stands today as one of the most original and independent figures among contemporaneous American composers. He was born in Somerville, Mass. He was the first American pupil of Edward MacDowell. His compositions, which in most cases have aimed to affirm various phases of American life and spirit, have often drawn upon folk music current in this land for their thematic material. But Mr. Gilbert has not merely quoted folk themes; he has striven to express, through developments and transformations of certain melodies which have become part and parcel of national musical life, something of the energy and romantic vision that he believes to be latent in his people. He first emerged as a figure of significant individuality in his art when the Boston Symphony Orchestra produced his "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes" in 1911, which was immediately recognized by Philip Hale, H. T. Parker and others as a new and important work. In the words of Mr. Hale, the music "stirred the blood of the audience. All rejoiced in hearing a new voice, a voice with something to say and an original way of saying it. The overture," Mr. Hale concluded—and in this anticipated later comments from many quarters upon Gilbert's art—"is distinctively, but not bumptiously, not apologetically, American."

Mr. Parker found "here at last music of American folk tunes that meets every musical test, except, perhaps, that of adroit instrumental coloring, that keeps the matter, the voice and the spirit—the difficult item—of its origin; and that interests and stirs those who hear." This work of Gilbert's was followed by such orchestral compositions as his "Negro Rhapsody," first produced at the Norfolk Festival, Connecticut, in 1913; by "The Dance on Place Congo," played by the Boston Symphony and performed by the Metropolitan Opera Company as a ballet in 1918; by the orchestral prelude to Synge's "Riders to the Sea," based on Celtic melody and embodying with singular fidelity the spirit of the folk drama; the "Indian Suite," and other smaller works. The "Symphonic Piece" to be heard this week had its first performance in Boston Feb. 26 and 27 under Mr. Koussevitzky. The composer describes his musical intentions as follows:

"This piece of music has no 'program' in the sense in which that word is ordinarily used. It is not about any thing, or event, in particular; not suggested or inspired by any poem, or prose writing; just a piece of music, that's all. In fact, it aims to be a piece of absolute music; somewhat of a rarity in these days of the overworked 'program' idea—ornithological, botanical, or what not.

"Many of my friends have pressed me to tell them what it's all about—what I have tried to represent, &c. I can only say this: My constant aim ever since beginning composition has been to write some American music, i. e., some music which would not naturally have been written in any other country and which should reflect or express certain aspects of the American character or spirit as felt by myself. That spirit, as I see it, is energetic, optimistic, nervous, impatient of restraint and in its highest aspect a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit which is America is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration. Plenty of jingoism, vulgarity and 'Hurrah, boys!' attaches to it, but the spirit of the new birth underlies it all for him who can see it.

"Some of this American mood I have tried to reflect in my composition. So the first theme has in it (I hope) some of the 'Hurrah, boys!' character. The second theme, by contrast, has a slight Fosterian twang. It contains a remote suggestion of 'Old Folks at Home'—kind of a family resemblance—interspersed with a couple of measures from 'The Arkansaw Traveler.' Those bits are made use of and developed in the usual symphonic manner. But let it be said that, although I am a great believer in the songs of the people as possible bases for national art compositions, these two suggestions (neither used verbatim) are the only folk suggestions I have used in this composition.

"The score of this piece was finished in November, 1925. It was originally intended to be the first movement of a symphony, but certain friends of mine requested and advised that it be played as it stands. This is therefore done."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

187

MAR 9 1926

Boston Symphony at Smith College

Mellowness and Richness Noted in Program by Famous Orchestra.

By WILLARD M. CLARK.

NORTHAMPTON, March 9—Smith College has had a varied orchestral fare this season, thanks to those who are in charge of the programs. The New York Symphony under Mendelberg, the Cleveland Symphony under Sokoloff and last night the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky, have given fine programs including some numbers not often heard.

Last night the program opened with he Vivaldi "Concerto in E Minor" for string orchestra. The string section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has regained in a great measure the pristine beauty of former days. There is a mellowness and richness today that as been absent for some years. Its onal color was admirably displayed n the three movements of the concero. Vivaldi is better known for his concertos for violin. He had an aptess for melody and the concerto layed last night was rich in lovely aterial.

Mr. Koussevitzky chose to play the Beethoven "Symphony No. 8, in F. Major." This is one of what might be called his joyful symphonies. Its four movements are filled with life, hey move along at a lively pace and nish with the most brilliant of finales. Especially lovely is the second movement, an allegretto scherzando. The rchestra has seldom been heard to reater advantage than in this symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky brought out ach theme and melted his strings, winds and brasses into one. There was no overpowering by any choir tonight, just an ensemble of unusual eauty.

Next came a distinct novelty, three dances from a ballet, "The Three Cornered Hat," by Manuel De Falla. What is there about this Spanish music which is so intriguing? It must its strongly emphasized rhythms. his ballet was first performed by the ussian Ballet in London in 1919. The hree dances heard last night were "The Neighbors," the "Dance of the Miller," nd "Finale Dance." Each is a gem. There is a gaiety, and strong Andulalan flavor to "The Miller's Dance" hat make it quite the favorite of the hree as far as the audience was conerned. The finale is very abrupt almost angular in its outline and it loses as abruptly as it begins. These ances bear no relation to their names. hey might have been called anything at they are fine examples of this lented Spaniard.

The last number we heard, due to e fact that trains must be caught,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

MAR. 7 1926

John McCormack has accepted an invitation from Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to appear as soloist with him in a series of orchestral concerts in Paris during May, 1927. The programs, which have already been agreed upon, will include the Thirteenth Psalm of Lizst, arias by Mozart and Beethoven and three Irish fantasies by Charles Martin Loeffler.

Academy of Music [illegible] [illegible]ony concerts.

* * *

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A visit by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always a notable feature in a season of things musical in New Haven. The appearance of this renowned organization next Wednesday evening at Woolsey Hall, numbering as it does 107 players, will be especially interesting in that the new conductor Serge Koussevitzky will make his initial appearance here. A year ago he was known to our public only by hearsay. Today he is recognized as among the great leaders both here and in Europe. M. Kossevitzky has arranged an exceptionally apt program, seasoning a presentation of several standard and widely known classics with novelty in the G Minor Sonata of Gailliard, and three of the exquisite "Jewish Poems" of Bloch. Ernest Bloch, it will be recalled, was quite unknown in America when in March, 1917, he conducted some of these "Jewish Poems" as a guest of the Boston Symphony at its home. His music is not easily explained but its charm may perhaps be appreciated from his own description:

"I am not an archeologist. I hold it of first importance to write good, genuine music, my music. It is the Jewish soul that interests me, the complex, glowing, agitated soul that I feel vibrating throughout the Bible; the freshness and naivete of the Patriarchs; the violence that is evident in the prophetic books; the Jew's savage love of justice; the despair of the Preacher in Jerusalem; the sorrow and the immensity of the Book of Job; the sensuality of the Songs of Songs. All this is in us; all this is in me, and it is the better part of me. It is all this that I endeavour to hear in myself and to transcribe in my music; the venerable emotion of the race that slumbers way down in our soul."

The full program follows:

Galliard—Sonata in G major (Arranged for Orchestra by Steinberg)

Maximilian Steinberg has lately arranged for small orchestra this little known sonata of Galliard, a composer of the early eighteenth century. The modern musician has preserved all of the elegant grace of the little piece.

Beethoven—Symphony No. 8 in F major, Op. 93

This symphony has no hint of the tremendous sweep of the seventh symphony, or the colossal grandeur of the ninth. It is a sort of interlude serene, light-hearted. It has the lyric of Mozart or Haydin—an earlier style which the mighty Beethoven was supposed, in those his last years, to have left behind.

Bloch—Three Jewish Poems

The three poems to be presented are "Dance," "Rite" and "Funeral Procession." This music is a delicate and penetrating interpretation of his people's spirit by a true artist.

Wagner—Prelude to "Lohengrin"

Liszt described the Prelude as "a sort of magic formula which, like a mysteri[illegible] our

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAPH

MAR 7 1926

Boston Symphony Programs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitsky will visit New York for the last time but one this season for a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The Thursday evening program will include Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F major; a new manuscript score, "Symphonic Piece," by Henry F. Gilbert, the American composer; Ernest Bloch's "Three Jewish Poems," and the Second Suite from Ravel's Ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe."

The matinee program will include a concerto for string orchestra in E minor by Vivaldi, arranged by Mistovski; Haydn's Symphony in G major, "The Surprise"; a concerto for orchestra by Hindemith; three dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three Cornered Hat," and "Jeux de plein air," by Germaine Tailleferre ("out of door game"). The games are called "Tirelitentaine" and "Cache cache." The scores of Gilbert Hindemith and Tailleferre are having their first performance by Koussevitzky.

RESPIGHI SCORE TO FEATURE SYMPHONY'S FINAL CONCERT

Koussevitzky Will Offer "Pines of Rome" as Swan Song Here.

At the closing concert of the Boston Symphony series on Tuesday evening March 16, in Infantry Hall, Luge Koussevitzky will introduce what has been the most popular new score of the season, Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

The Italian composer has put forth frankly pictorial music in the vein of his fountains of Rome. The movements are entitled: the first, "The Pines of the Villa Borghese," which is rollicking and colorful, suggesting children at play; the second, "The Pines near a Catacomb," is music of sombre suggestion with a notable trumpet solo off stage; the third, "The Pines of the Janiculum," is in the mood of a nocturne, and introduces the singing of the nightingale by the unprecidented means of an actual phonographic record; the finale, "The Pines of the Appian Way," which depicts the triumphal return of the ancient Roman legions into the eternal city through this gate. It is a march which begins with muffled measures and increases gradually to an immense volume of sound.

The concert will open with Beethoven's [illegible]yrical

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

MAR 6 1926

Last Symphony Concert

The closing concert of the Boston Symphony series on Tuesday evening, March 16, in Infantry Hall, will be the farewell appearance here of the famous orchestra under its great conductor. On this occasion, Koussevitzky will introduce what has been the most popular new score of the season—Respighi's "Pines of Rome." The Italian composer has put forth frankly pictorial music in the vein of his fountains of Rome. The movements are entitled: the first, "The Pines of the Villa Borghese," which is rollicking and colorful, suggesting children at play; the second, "The Pines Near a Catacomb," is music of sombre suggestion with a notable trumpet solo off stage; the third, "The Pines of the Janiculum," is in the mood of a nocturne, and introduces the singing of the nightingale by the unprecedented means of an actual photographic record; the finale, "The Pines of the Appian Way," depicts the triumphal return of the ancient Roman legions into the Eternal City through this gate. It is a march which begins with muffled measures and increases gradually to an immense volume of sound.

The concert will open withm Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F-major, the lyrical and humorous symphony which introduces as a slow movement a delightful burlesque of the metronome, an instrument newly invented in the composer's time.

Koussevitzky will close this, his last Providence appearance with three excerpts from the music dramas of Wagner: the introduction to the third ict of the "Mastersingers," the prelude o the same drama, and the overture o "Tannhauser."

[illegible] sprightliness. The lively tempi, clear-cut rhythm, nice accentuation and delicate shading made it charming to listen to.

.d?osGaupdvaoHb, m h t ht ht mhhmt

No greater contrast could have been found for this typical classic than the powerful Jewish poems by Ernest Bloch, which formed the second number of the first half of the program.

Almost as much of a contrast was found in the fascinating pieces from De Falla's "The Three-Cornered Hat" and the Prelude and Liebestove from "Tristan and Isolde," magnificently played, with the solid Prelude to "The Meistersingers" to end with. In all these varied styles Mr Koussewitzky gave convincing interpretations, evidently gaining the interest and admiration of the orchestra. As to the orchestra itself, it is in fine condition, the orchestra of which not only Boston, but all New England, is proud. Holyoke is to be congratulated on hearing it, even without its much-needed auditorium.

Boston Orchestra To Present Novelties

New Manuscripts by Gilbert, Hindemith and Tailleferre on Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will visit New York for the last time but one this season for a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The Thursday evening program will include Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F major; a new manuscript score, "Symphonic Piece," by Henry F. Gilbert, the American composer; Ernest Bloch's "Three Jewish Poems," and the second suite from Ravel's ballet "Daphnis and Chloe."

The matinee program will include a concerto for string orchestra in E minor by Vivaldi, arranged by Mistovki; Haydn's Symphony in G major, "The Surprise;" a concerto for orhestra by Hindemith; three dances om De Falla's ballet, "The Threeornered Hat," and "Jeux de plein r" ("out of door game"), by Geraine Tailleferre. The games are lled "Tirelitentaine" and "Cache che." The scores of Gilbert, Hinemith and Tailleferre are having heir first performance by Koussetzky.

T[illegible] Italian composer has put forth frankly pictorial music in the vein of his fountains of Rome. The movements are entitled: First, "The Pines of the Villa Borghese," rollicking and colorful, suggesting children at play; the second, "The Pines Near a Catacomb," is music of sombre suggestion with a notable trumpet solo off stage; the third, "The Pines of the Janiculum," in the mood of a nocturne, introduces the singing of a nightingale by the unprecedented means of an actual phonographic record. The finale, "The Pines of the Appian Way," depicts the triumphal return of the ancient Roman legion into the Eternal City through this gate. It is a march which begins ith muffled measures and increases radually to an immense volume of ound.

The concert will open with Beeoven's eighth symphony in F-major, he lyrical and humorous symphony hich introduces as a slow movement delightful burlesque of the metronome, n instrument newly invented in the omposer's time.

Koussevitzky will close this, his last rovidence appearance, with three exerpts from the music drama of Wager: the introduction to the third act f the "Meistersingers," the prelude the same drama, and the overture to Tannhauser."

---

eve[illegible]

This [illegible] in New Ha[illegible] won the hearts of all who had the good fortune to witness his artistic work.

A man of medium stature, of a rather powerful build, he controls the 107 members of the orchestra with a vigorous strength of will that is manifested in his large pale face, set off by an abundance of thick, black hair. He is a born leader of musical men and the Boston Symphony is a wonderful organization of real artists which he has developed with great success.

The program was well selected and all in all the concert was the best of the season.

The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program for March [illegible]-20 will comprise these works: Bach, ncerto No. 2, F major, for violin, te, oboe and trumpet (edited by ttl); Beethoven, Violin Concerto (Joph Szigeti, violinist), Roussel, Suite from his ballet, "Padmavati"; Respighi, "Pines of Rome."

THE performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this wee in New York of a new "Symphonic Piece" by Henry F. Gilbert is an occasion of unusual interest, since Mr. Gilbert, while he has done little in the direction of cultivating publicity, stands today as one of the most original and independent figures among contemporaneous American composers. He was born in Somerville, Mass. He was the first American pupil of Edward MacDowell. His compositions, which in most cases have aimed to affirm various phases of American life and spirit, have often drawn upon folk music current in this land for their thematic material. But Mr. Gilbert has not merely quoted folk themes; he has striven to express, through developments and transformations of certain melodies which have become part and parcel of national musical life, something of the energy and romantic vision that he believes to be latent in his people. He first emerged as a figure of significant individuality in his art when the Boston Symphony Orchestra produced his "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes" in 1911, which was immediately recognized by Philip Hale, H. T. Parker and others as a new and important work. In the words of Mr. Hale, the music "stirred the blood of the audience. All rejoiced in hearing a new voice, a voice with something to say and an original way of saying it. The overture," Mr. Hale concluded—and in this anticipated later comments from many quarters upon Gilbert's art—"is distinctively, but not bumptiously, not apologetically, American."

Mr. Parker found "here at last music of American folk tunes that meets every musical test, except, perhaps, that of adroit instrumental coloring, that keeps the matter, the voice and the spirit—the difficult item—of its origin; and that interests and stirs those who hear." This work of Gilbert's was followed by such orchestral compositions as his "Negro Rhapsody," first produced at the Norfolk Festival, Connecticut, in 1913; by "The Dance on Place Congo," played by the Boston Symphony and performed by the Metropolitan Opera Company as a ballet in 1918; by the orchestral prelude to Synge's "Riders to the Sea," based on Celtic melody and embodying with singular fidelity the spirit of the folk drama; the "Indian Suite," and other smaller works. The "Symphonic Piece" to be heard this week had its first performance in Boston Feb. 26 and 27 under Mr. Koussevitzky. The composer describes his musical intentions as follows:

"This piece of music has no 'program' in the sense in which that word is ordinarily used. It is not about any thing, or event, in particular; not suggested or inspired by any poem, or prose writing; just a piece of music, that's all. In fact, it aims to be a piece of absolute music; somewhat of a rarity in these days of the overworked 'program' idea—ornithological, botanical, or what not.

"Many of my friends have pressed me to tell them what it's all about—what I have tried to represent, &c. I can only say this: My constant aim ever since beginning composition has been to write some American music, i. e., some music which would not naturally have been written in any other country and which should reflect or express certain aspects of the American character or spirit as felt by myself. That spirit, as I see it, is energetic, optimistic, nervous, impatient of restraint and in its highest aspect a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit which is America is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration. Plenty of jingoism, vulgarity and 'Hurrah, boys!' attaches to it, but the spirit of the new birth underlies it all for him who can see it.

"Some of this American mood I have tried to reflect in my composition. So the first theme has in it (I hope) some of the 'Hurrah, boys!' character. The second theme, by contrast, has a slight Fosterian twang. It contains a remote suggestion of 'Old Folks at Home'—kind of a family resemblance—interspersed with a couple of measures from 'The Arkansaw Traveler.' Those bits are made use of and developed in the usual symphonic manner. But let it be said that, although I am a great believer in the songs of the people as possible bases for national art compositions, these two suggestions (neither used verbatim) are the only folk suggestions I have used in this composition.

"The score of this piece was finished in November, 1925. It was originally intended to be the first movement of a symphony, but certain friends of mine requested and advised that it be played as it stands. This is therefore done."

1926

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

MAR 9 1926

187

Boston Symphony at Smith College

Mellowness and Richness Noted in Program by Famous Orchestra.

By WILLARD M. CLARK.

NORTHAMPTON, March 9—Smith College has had a varied orchestral fare this season, thanks to those who aro in charge of the programs. The New York Symphony under Mendelberg, the Cleveland Symphony under Sokoloff and last night the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky, have given fine programs including some numbers not often heard.

Last night the program opened with he Vivaldi "Concerto in E Minor" for string orchestra. The string section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has regained in a great measure the pristine beauty of former days. There is a mellowness and richness today that has been absent for some years. Its onal color was admirably displayed n the three movements of the concero. Vivaldi is better known for his concertos for violin. He had an aptness for melody and the concerto played last night was rich in lovely material.

Mr. Koussevitzky chose to play the Beethoven "Symphony No. 8, in F. Major." This is one of what might be called his joyful symphonies. Its four movements are filled with life, hey move along at a lively pace and nish with the most brilliant of finales. Especially lovely is the second movement, an allegretto scherzando. The rchestra has seldom been heard to reater advantage than in this symhony. Mr. Koussevitzky brought out ach theme and melted his strings, vinds and brasses into one. There vas no overpowering by any choir toight, just an ensemble of unusual eauty.

Next came a distinct novelty, three lances from a ballet, "The Three Cornered Hat," by Manuel De Falla. What is there about this Spanish muic which is so intriguing? It must its strongly emphasized rhythms. his ballet was first performed by the ussian Ballet in London in 1919. The hree dances heard last night were "The Neighbors," the "Dance of the Miller," nd "Finale Dance." Each is a gem. There is a gaiety, and strong Andulalan flavor to "The Miller's Dance" hat make it quite the favorite of the hree as far as the audience was conerned. The finale is very abrupt alnost angular in its outline and it loses as abruptly as it begins. These ances bear no relation to their names. hey might have been called anything ut they are fine examples of this lented Spaniard.

The last number we heard, due to e fact that trains must be caught, as the Prelude and "Liebestod" from Tristan and Isolde." It was given a agnificent reading by Mr. Koussetzky. He takes it at a slower tempo an some conductors but this only rves to bring out its wondrous lyric auty. The final number was prede to "Die Meistersingers."

• • • • • •

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A visit by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always a notable feature in a season of things musical in New Haven. The appearance of this renowned organization next Wednesday evening at Woolsey Hall, numbering as it does 107 players, will be especially interesting in that the new conductor Serge Koussevitzky will make his initial appearance here. A year ago he was known to our public only by hearsay. Today he is recognized as among the great leaders both here and in Europe. M. Kossevitzky has arranged an exceptionally apt program, seasoning a presentation of several standard and widely known classics with novelty in the G Minor Sonata of Gailliard, and three of the exquisite "Jewish Poems" of Bloch. Ernest Bloch, it will be recalled, was quite unknown in America when in March, 1917, he conducted some of these "Jewish Poems" as a guest of the Boston Symphony at its home. His music is not easily explained but its charm may perhaps be appreciated from his own description:

"I am not an archeologist. I hold it of first importance to write good, genuine music, my music. It is the Jewish soul that interests me, the complex, glowing, agitated soul that I feel vibrating throughout the Bible; the freshness and naivete of the Patriarchs; the violence that is evident in the prophetic books; the Jew's savage love of justice; the despair of the Preacher in Jerusalem; the sorrow and the immensity of the Book of Job; the sensuality of the Songs of Songs. All this is in us; all this is in me, and it is the better part of me. It is all this that I endeavour to hear in myself and to transcribe in my music; the venerable emotion of the race that slumbers way down in our soul."

The full program follows:

Galliard—Sonata in G major (Arranged for Orchestra by Steinberg)

Maximilian Steinberg has lately arranged for small orchestra this little known sonata of Galliard, a composer of the early eighteenth century. The modern musician has preserved all of the elegant grace of the little piece.

Beethoven—Symphony No. 8 in F major, Op. 93

This symphony has no hint of the tremendous sweep of the seventh symphony, or the colossal grandeur of the ninth. It is a sort of interlude serene, light-hearted. It has the lyric of Mozart or Haydin—an earlier style which the mighty Beethoven was supposed, in those his last years, to have left behind.

Bloch—Three Jewish Poems

The three poems to be presented are "Dance," "Rite" and "Funeral Procession." This music is a delicate and penetrating interpretation of his people's spirit by a true artist.

Wagner—Prelude to "Lohengrin"

Liszt described the Prelude as "a sort of magic formula which, like a mysterious initiation, prepares our souls for the sight of unaccustomed things, and of a higher signification than that of our terrestrial life."

Wagner—Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"

Using the principal themes of this music drama, and stating them in their proper order, Wagner made his prelude a sort of condensation of the entire work.

* * *

RESPIGHI SCORE TO FEATURE SYMPHONY'S FINAL CONCERT

Koussevitzky Will Offer "Pines of Rome" as Swan Song Here.

At the closing concert of the Boston Symphony series on Tuesday evening March 16, in Infantry Hall, Luge Koussevitzky will introduce what has been the most popular new score of the season, Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

The Italian composer has put forth frankly pictorial music in the vein of his fountains of Rome. The movements are entitled: the first, "The Pines of the Villa Borghese," which is rollicking and colorful, suggesting children at play; the second, "The Pines near a Catacomb," is music of sombre suggestion with a notable trumpet solo off stage; the third, "The Pines of the Janiculum," is in the mood of a nocturne, and introduces the singing of the nightingale by the unprecidented means of an actual phonographic record; the finale, "The Pines of the Appian Way," which depicts the triumphal return of the ancient Roman legions into the eternal city through this gate. It is a march which begins with muffled measures and increases gradually to an immense volume of sound.

The concert will open with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F Major, the lyrical and humorous symphony which introduces as a slow movement a delightful burlesque of the metronome, an instrument newly invented in the composer's time.

Koussevitzky will close with three excerpts from the music dramas of Wagner the introduction to the third act of th "Mastersingers," the Prelude to the sam drama, and the Overture to "Tannhau ser."

---

rec- e Ap- pian Way," depicts the triumphal return of the ancient Roman legions into the Eternal City through this gate. It is a march which begins with muffled measures and increases gradually to an immense volume of sound.

The concert will open withm Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F-major, the lyrical and humorous symphony which introduces as a slow movement a delightful burlesque of the metronome, an instrument newly invented in the composer's time.

Koussevitzky will close this, his last Providence appearance with three excerpts from the music dramas of Wagner: the introduction to the third act of the "Mastersingers," the prelude to the same drama, and the overture to "Tannhauser."

Boston Orchestra To Present Novelties

New Manuscripts by Gilbert, Hindemith and Tailleferre on Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will visit New York for the last time but one this season for a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The Thursday evening program will include Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F major; a new manuscript score, "Symphonic Piece," by Henry F. Gilbert, the American composer; Ernest Bloch's "Three Jewish Poems," and the second suite from Ravel's ballet "Daphnis and Chloe."

The matinee program will include a concerto for string orchestra in E minor by Vivaldi, arranged by Mistovski; Haydn's Symphony in G major, "The Surprise;" a concerto for orchestra by Hindemith; three dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," and "Jeux de plein air" ("out of door game"), by Germaine Tailleferre. The games are called "Tirelitentaine" and "Cache cache." The scores of Gilbert, Hinmith and Tailleferre are having eir first performance by Koussetzky.

Sy
Ma
fa or
On
tro nev
"Pi

T alian composer has put forth frankly pictorial music in the vein of his fountains of Rome. The movements are entitled: First, "The Pines of the Villa Borghese," rollicking and colorful, suggesting children at play; the second, "The Pines Near a Catacomb," is music of sombre suggestion with a notable trumpet solo off stage; the third, "The Pines of the Janiculum," in the mood of a nocturne, introduces the singing of a nightingale by the unprecedented means of an actual phonographic record. The finale, "The Pines of the Appian Way," depicts the triumphal return of the ancient Roman legion into the Eternal City through this gate. It is a march which begins vith muffled measures and increases radually to an immense volume of ound.

The concert will open with Beehoven's eighth symphony in F-major, he lyrical and humorous symphony hich introduces as a slow movement delightful burlesque of the metronome, n instrument newly invented in the omposer's time.

Koussevitzky will close this, his last rovidence appearance, with three exerpts from the music drama of Wager: the introduction to the third act f the "Meistersingers," the prelude the same drama, and the overture to Tannhauser."

FEB

THE performance by the Bosto Symphony Orchestra this wee in New York of a new "Symphonic Piece" by Henry F. Gilbert is an occasion of unusual interest, since Mr. Gilbert, while he has done little in the direction of cultivating publicity, stands today as one of the most original and independent figures among contemporaneous American composers. He was born in Somerville, Mass. He was the first American pupil of Edward MacDowell. His compositions, which in most cases have aimed to affirm various phases of American life and spirit, have often drawn upon folk music current in this land for their thematic material. But Mr. Gilbert has not merely quoted folk themes; he has striven to express, through developments and transformations of certain melodies which have become part and parcel of national musical life, something of the energy and romantic vision that he believes to be latent in his people. He first emerged as a figure of significant individuality in his art when the Boston Symphony Orchestra produced his "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes" in 1911, which was immediately recognized by Philip Hale, H. T. Parker and others as a new and important work. In the words of Mr. Hale, the music "stirred the blood of the audience. All rejoiced in hearing a new voice, a voice with something to say and an original way of saying it. The overture," Mr. Hale concluded—and in this anticipated later comments from many quarters upon Gilbert's art—"is distinctively, but not bumptiously, not apologetically, American."

Mr. Parker found "here at last music of American folk tunes that meets every musical test, except, perhaps, that of adroit instrumental coloring, that keeps the matter, the voice and the spirit—the difficult item—of its origin; and that interests and stirs those who hear." This work of Gilbert's was followed by such orchestral compositions as his "Negro Rhapsody," first produced at the Norfolk Festival, Connecticut, in 1913; by "The Dance on Place Congo," played by the Boston Symphony and performed by the Metropolitan Opera Company as a ballet in 1918; by the orchestral prelude to Synge's "Riders to the Sea," based on Celtic melody and embodying with singular fidelity the spirit of the folk drama; the "Indian Suite," and other smaller works. The "Symphonic Piece" to be heard this week had its first performance in Boston Feb. 26 and 27 under Mr. Koussevitzky. The composer describes his musical intentions as follows:

"This piece of music has no 'program' in the sense in which that word is ordinarily used. It is not about any thing, or event, in particular; not suggested or inspired by any poem, or prose writing; just a piece of music, that's all. In fact, it aims to be a piece of absolute music; somewhat of a rarity in these days of the overworked 'program' idea—ornithological, botanical, or what not.

"Many of my friends have pressed me to tell them what it's all about—what I have tried to represent, &c. I can only say this: My constant aim ever since beginning composition has been to write some American music, i. e., some music which would not naturally have been written in any other country and which should reflect or express certain aspects of the American character or spirit as felt by myself. That spirit, as I see it, is energetic, optimistic, nervous, impatient of restraint and in its highest aspect a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit which is America is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration. Plenty of jingoism, vulgarity and 'Hurrah, boys!' attaches to it, but the spirit of the new birth underlies it all for him who can see it.

"Some of this American mood I have tried to reflect in my composition. So the first theme has in it (I hope) some of the 'Hurrah, boys!' character. The second theme, by contrast, has a slight Fosterian twang. It contains a remote suggestion of 'Old Folks at Home'—kind of a family resemblance—interspersed with a couple of measures from 'The Arkansaw Traveler.' Those bits are made use of and developed in the usual symphonic manner. But let it be said that, although I am a great believer in the songs of the people as possible bases for national art compositions, these two suggestions (neither used verbatim) are the only folk suggestions I have used in this composition.

"The score of this piece was finished in November, 1925. It was originally intended to be the first movement of a symphony, but certain friends of mine requested and advised that it be played as it stands. This is therefore done."

Charles Martin Loeffler.

---

and the Second Suite from Ravel's Ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe."

The matinee program will include a concerto for string orchestra in E minor by Vivaldi, arranged by Mistovski; Haydn's Symphony in G major, "The Surprise"; a concerto for orchestra by Hindemith; three dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three Cornered Hat," and "Jeux de plein air," by Germaine Tailleferre ("out of door game"). The games are called "Tirelitentaine" and "Cache cache." The scores of Gilbert Hindemith and Tailleferre are having their first performance by Koussevitzky.

---

and sprightliness. The lively tempi, clear-cut rhythm, nice accentuation and delicate shading made it charming to listen to.

.d?osGaupdvaoHb, m h t ht ht mhhmt

No greater contrast could have been found for this typical classic than the powerful Jewish poems by Ernest Bloch, which formed the second number of the first half of the program.

Almost as much of a contrast was found in the fascinating pieces from De Falla's "The Three-Cornered Hat" and the Prelude and Liebestove from "Tristan and Isolde," magnificently played, with the solid Prelude to "The Meistersingers" to end with. In all these varied styles Mr Koussewitzky gave convincing interpretations, evidently gaining the interest and admiration of the orchestra. As to the orchestra itself, it is in fine condition, the orchestra of which not only Boston, but all New England, is proud. Holyoke is to be congratulated on hearing it, even without its much-needed auditorium.

---

eve

This in New Ha won the hearts of all who had the good fortune to witness his artistic work.

A man of medium stature, of a rather powerful build, he controls the 107 members of the orchestra with a vigorous strength of will that is manifested in his large pale face, set off by an abundance of thick, black hair. He is a born leader of musical men and the Boston Symphony is a wonderful organization of real artists which he has developed with great success.

The program was well selected and all in all the concert was the best of the season.

The orchestra will be out of town ext week. The program for March -20 will comprise these works: Bach, ncerto No. 2, F major, for violin, te, oboe and trumpet (edited by ttl); Beethoven, Violin Concerto (Joeph Szigeti, violinist), Roussel, Suite from his ballet, "Padmavati"; Respighi, "Pines of Rome."

Academy of Music ony concerts.

* * *

188

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

MA 2 1926

S TO HIS DEGREE IN THE U
ERGE KOUSSEVITSKY,
Orchestra, Who Played a Solo U
When He Received His Degree.
Andrews, the Explorer (Right),
of Science at the Same Time.

Boston Symphony in New Work

Henry F. Gilbert's Composition Is Given in Concert Program at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Carnegie Hall. The entertainment began with Beethoven's eighth symphony, which was followed by a new composition, the work of Henry F. Gilbert, bearing the simple title of "Symphonic Piece." Mr. Gilbert clearly intended that no program should be sought in his music, but his friends were not so easily satisfied. They wrote to him asking what it all meant.

It is a pity that music lovers should fall into a state of mind which prevents the enjoyment of music which does not represent something. Mr. Gilbert did have an idea in his mind, but it was a broad one not to be cabined, cribbed and confined within the limits of a cold definition. His answer to his friends was that he always tried to write American music which could not have been written in any other country and which should express certain traits of American character as he saw them.

To him the American spirit is energetic, optimistic, nervous and impatient of restraint. It revolts against the traditions of the past. It is full of jingoism and vulgarity and its battle cry is "Hurrah, boys." Under all is the spirit of a new birth. So the first theme is the "Hurrah, boys" theme and the contrast is made with recognition of Stephen Foster. There is a suggestion of the "Old Folks at Home" and a snatch of the "Arkansas Traveler." The rest of the melodic material originated in the mind of the composer.

Not many artists have been so happy in defining their purposes as Mr. Gilbert. His symphonic piece bore the explanation nobly. It breathes the agressiveness, the bumptiousness, if you will, of the American spirit and all of its optimism, its perfect confidence in itself and its occasional sympathetic tear for sob sister romance. It is a brave and honest piece of music and it is pleasant to hear. The Foster reminiscence is ingeniously and indeed originally treated, while the excerpt from the tune kit could not finish without the aid of Manuel Bond is thrown out in its undisguised form. The whole work is vivid and animated and it is orchestrated with a fine sense of musical values. It was most brilliantly played and Mr. Koussevitsky conducted it with evident enthusiasm. The audience received it with most cordial demonstrations of approval and the composer was called out several times.

Much might be written about the distinguished Russian's reading of the eighth symphony, but it is perhaps unnecessary. The tempi were close to those which New York conductors used before Hans von Buelow made us acquainted with his, which differed in several respects from theirs, especially in the allegretto scherzando. This he took considerably more slowly and with a much more marked accentuation. He also played the finale at a less rapid pace than it was performed last night.

In an interview with the writer Von Buelow gave his reasons and also quoted Bargheer, concert master of the Cassel orchestra, who approved the tempi as being the same as Spohr's when he conducted that organization. Spohr was concert master of the orchestra when Beethoven produced the symphony, and Dr. Von Buelow therefore believed that he had the original tempi. It must be said, however, that the work was thoroughly alive as Mr. Koussevitzky read it last evening, and that goes to show that sometimes a fine symphony will lend itself to more than one point of view.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier

[illegible]

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY AND BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT

A significant musical event will be presented to local music lovers this evening at Woolsey hall, the occasion being the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, one of the foremost orchestral organizations in the country today. The great body of 107 selected musicians will be under the personal leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, the brilliant Russian conductor, who has brought the Boston Symphony to the highest point of its artistic career in the short space of one year. Mr. Koussevitzky makes his first bow before a local audience tonight.

Following is the list of numbers and the order in which they will be rendered, the first commencing promptly at 8:15:

Vivaldi—Concerto in E minor for String Orchestra.
(Edited by A. Mistovski.)
I. Vigoroso.
II. Largo.
III. Allegro.
Beethoven—Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93.
I. Allegro vivace e con brio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN

MAR 1 2 1926

At Carnegie Hall, the evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky in command, featured an international programme, beginning with Beethoven's eighth symphony; and presenting also Henry F. Gilbert's "Symphonic Piece" (first time in New York); Bloch's "Three Jewish Poems"; and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" suite, No. 2. Mr. Koussevitzky and his Boston players now have found a lovely artistic understanding and are doing extraordinarily fine things at their visiting concerts in New York.

A routine that miscalculated, brought this hurrying reviewer to the hall too late to hear the Gilbert composition. The familiar Bloch Score, however, made up for a part of the disappointment. Its poignant utterance stands in marked contrast to some of the conventional and complacent recent output of Bloch. His newly acquired American citizenship has stilled his former accents of pessimism. Biting tragedy plays no role in the life of the American Jew.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 1 2 1926

Boston Symphony Interprets New American Music

'Symphonic Piece' by Gilbert Suggests Nervous Spirit and Enthusiasm of Life in These 'Hurrah Boys' Days

The feature of last night's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky conducting, was the performance, for the first time in New York, of a new composition by the American composer, Henry F. Gilbert.

Mr. Gilbert's work, which he calls by the simple but sufficient title "Symphonic Piece," was completed last autumn. It was originally intended as the first movement of a symphony, but Mr. Gilbert was advised to send it out into the world uncompanioned, and this he has done. The work was performed for the first time anywhere a fortnight ago in Boston, under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky.

Mr. Gilbert has stated that the work has no "program." It was not suggested by any poem, play or story; it is just music. Yet Mr. Gilbert confesses that he had at least an aim, if not a program: he wished, he says, "to reflect or express the American character, or spirit," as felt by himself. That spirit, as he sees it, is "energetic, optimistic, nervous, impatient of restraint; and, in its highest aspect, is a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit, which is America, is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration, with plenty of jingoism, vulgarity and 'Hurrah, boys!'"

Some of this American mood, says Mr. Gilbert, he has tried to reflect in his music. His first theme is designed to express the "Hurrah boys!" note. The second theme, for contrast, has a slight reminiscence of Stephan Foster—it contains a remote suggestion of "Old Folks at Home," interspersed with a couple of measures from "The Arkansas Traveler." These bits are made use of and developed in the usual symphonic manner.

Mr. Gilbert has employed familiar American materials. His music makes brave and often effective use of ragtime, and it is full of the influence of popular idioms, some of them frankly sentimental, others exuberantly gay. The opening section has an exhilarating swing and dash and pep, and there are some witty references to current styles in jazz. But the work is too long for its subject-matter, and it lacks contrast. One wearies of the monotony of the rhythmic formulas long before the end.

Mr. Koussevitzky played the new score with great spirit, and there was much applause at its close. Mr. Gilbert was persuaded to appear on the platform to acknowledge the enthusiasm

Mr. Koussevitzky began his program with the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, and closed it with Bloch's "Three Jewish Poems" (which have not been heard here often enough since Mr. Bloch first conducted them in New York nine years ago) and the familiar second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis capacity audience mani-

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY, N. Y.
~~TELEGRAM~~

MAR 9 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The greatest musical treat of the season will be the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 instrumentalists, under the eminent leadership of Serge Kousevitzky, at the Capitol theatre Wednesday night. Ben Franklin is presenting the orchestra. For the event Mr. Koussevitzky has arranged a program of rarest interest and enjoyment. Those interested should remember that the seating capacity of the Capitol theatre is not as large as auditoriums usually played in by this orchestra, hence it will be well to secure seats early. Seats are now on sale at the Capitol.

THURSDAY, MARCH 4, 1926

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the Symphony concerts this week is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8; Hindemith, concerto for orchestra; Germaine Tailleferre, "Outdoor Games"; Chausson, concerto for violin, piano and string quartet; De Falla, three dances from the ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat." Messrs. Enesco and Hutcheson will be respectively the solo violinist and pianist.

The music by Hindemith and Tailleferre will be performed for the first time. We find no record of Chausson's Concerto in Boston.

* * *

Mlle. Tailleferre, now living in New York, is not unknown here as a composer. Her piano concerto was played at a Symphony concert last season. The "Outdoor Games" were written originally for two pianos. Messrs. Maier and Pattison have played them here at least on two occasions. Mlle. Tailleferre orchestrated the little pieces last summer. The games, "Tirilitentaine" and "Cache cache," are among the many that Rabelais mentions.

* * *

Nor is Paul Hindemith wholly unknown here. Mme. Gauthier has sung songs by him. Only last November his "Little Chamber Music for Five Wind Instruments" was performed at a concert of the Boston Flute Players' Club. Hindemith, who was born in 1895, has been astonishingly productive for so young a man. He has written three or four operas and a mass of orchestral and chamber music. As the viola of the Amar String quartet, he has traveled much, and it is said that he has composed much of his music in railway cars.

Since 1905 he has been the chief conductor of the Frankfort Opera House orchestra. Opinions differ as to the worth of his music. Some put him at the head of the younger German composers by reason of his "fresh and full blooded" talent.

Chausson's Concerto was composed in 1890-91 with a view to a performance by Ysaye and his quartet. It has been described as really a duet for violin and piano with the strings merely supporting the latter instrument. The first performance was at Brussels in the season of 1892-3.

* * *

---

melodic fragments are developed in a symphonic manner. A large orchestra is used, and a more elaborate instrumental palette than in other of Mr. Gilbert's compositions. The score has unmistakable qualities associated with him and immediately distinguishable—a healthy virility and swing, a tinge of celticism in certain phrases and progressions. Contrasted qualities are the deliberate coarseness—perhaps unnecessarily deliberate—of some pages, but there is none of the tawdriness and theatricalism that some call "American" and that is merely inartistic. It is music of the open air; and one of its moods is the romantically beautiful.

So much for the import of the composition. The opening phrases have a fine line and swing. The main body of the movement follows established procedure, so far as symphonic form is concerned, with general faithfulness. There are lively rhythms, and a straight-forward harmonic style, interspersed now and again with a more peppery quality of modernism. But we prefer other scores of Mr. Gilbert to this one—scores which should be better known, as, for example, his "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes," the Prologue to Singe's "Riders to the Sea," the "Indian Suite" and ther symphonic works of unusual content and dimensions.

In these works, as in passages of the music heard last night, Mr. Gilbert is individual, like no other composer, and at the same time genuinely racial in his expression. Racial without the close melodic analogies to Foster that he himself remarks upon in describing his second themes. It would be preferable to have a second theme that was less weak Foster and more strong Gilbert—a theme such as the lyrical theme of the Comedy Overture before described, or the middle section of the "Dance in Place Congo" performed by the Metropolitan Opera Company in 1918. These themes were of negroid derivation, but they had a physiognomy wholly their own and of authentic inspiration. Mr. Gilbert's writing is direct and cogent and incorruptibly sincere. The logic of his workmanship is never in doubt, nor the rare vigor of his spirit, but this movement as a whole is less rich and distinctive than other compositions that have been mentioned.

The Symphonic Piece was enthusiastically received. Several times the composer was called to the platform. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with the utmost earnestness and attention to detail.

The music of Bloch made a very strong impression. The "Three Jewish Poems" have not been heard here of late. The modernism of their style brings into the stronger relief the emotional intensity of the music, its savage and gorgeous color, its rhapsodic accents. The dance is perhaps the least important movement, but the rite is magnificent in its ceremony and tonal imagery, and the conclusion is one of the most touching pages that Bloch has penned. More profound is the mood and more searching the expression of the "Cortege Funebre," inspired by the death of the composer's father. This is not a score of Mr. Bloch's latest period, but it has a wealth of feeling and a simplicity of manner, combined with a technical development, that place the "Jewish Poems" high in the literature of contemporaneous composition. Of the "Poems" Mr. Koussevitzky gave a very dramatic performance. They are works peculiarly fitted, as it appears, to his temperament and methods as a conductor. Bloch was fortunate in his interpreter. Not always is the message of a composer so ably conveyed to an audience.

MPHONY HAS ABLE LEADER

George. Koussevitzky's. Boston Orchestra Gives Superb Concent Here in Steinert Series

By E. A. LEOPOLD

The program was changed as follows:

Vivaldi.....Concerto in E minor for String Orchestra
(Edited by A. Mistovski)
I. Vigoroso.
II. Largo.
III. Allegro.
Beethoven..Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93
1. Allegro vivace e con brio
II. Allegretto scherzando.
III. Tempo di menuetto.
IV. Allegro vivace.
Bloch.....Three Jewish Poems
a. Dance.
b. Rite.
c. Funeral procession.
Wagner....Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde."
Wagner....Prelude to "The Maestersingers of Nuremberg."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky, presented an elaborate program of classic and modern works, rather out of the usual last evening, the appreciative audience nearly filling Woolsey hall and the huge orchestra crowding the capacity of the spacious stage.

Not since before the war has the orchestra played with such superb solidarity of tone, such unanimity of attack and with such obvious attention to the minutest detail. Ostensibly Serge Koussevitsky is the right man in the right place. Years have not weighed heavily on him; he is of medium build, does not resort to long bushy hair, and in appearance, resembles an American much more than a foreigner. His control over his men is little short of marvelous, seemingly uncanny.

There were two changes in the program, both adding lustic to it, if that were necessary. In place of the Galliard sonata, the Vivaldi E Minor concerto for string orchestra was substituted and in place of the Prelude to Lohengrin, the Prelude and "Liebestod" from Wagner's greatest operatic achievement.

Very temperamental was the conductor's reading of the Vivaldi concerto. He almost acted out his score. Daintily, indeed, was concieved the episode for three violins with muted strings in the movement termed "Vigoroso" and the Largo was beautiful in its tonal intensity and accuracy of attack.

Some may have the audacity to term the Beethoven No. 8 Symphony trivial—a sort of vacation between his seventh and matured ninth. In fact, it is most intricate. Mervelous was the control displayed in all of the four movements which are brightly melodic and admittedly a little reminiscent of Mozart. When have we heard such cleancut attacks? Did the famous master of Bown ever write anything trivial?

Interest was rife in the first presentation here of Ernest Bloch's "Three Jewish Poems." If he never wrote anything more he would go down in history as a composer possessing all the essentials of true greatness. All three subjects are intensely descriptive—but of what—we must use our own imagination. The first, "Dance," is wierdly

its

ALBANY
N. Y.
TELEGRAM

MAR 8 1925

Boston Symphony at Capitol Wednesday.

Wednesday night at 8:15 o'clock, Ben Franklin will present the Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 instrumentalists under the brilliant leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, in concert at the Capitol theatre. The event will be the chief musical function of the season in these parts, serving to introduce Mr. Koussevitzky to an Albany audience It is expected that a capacity audience will be present to greet him. Prominent musicians claim the program of the concert is the finest ever presented. in this city.

The arrangement follows:

I.
"Symphony in C major, Op. 16, No. 3..................... Boccherini
Allegro non molto.
Andante amoroso.
Tempo di menuetto.
Presto non tanto.
II.
"Pictures at an Exhibition"........................ Moussorgsky
Promenade — Gnome — Promenade—Tuilleries—Bydlo (Polish Oxcart)—Ballet of the Chicks in their Shells—Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle—Catacombs (Con Mortuis in lingua mortua)—The Hut on Fowl's Legs—The Great Gate at Kiev.
III.
Poeme Danse—"La Peri.........Dukas
IV.
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"............ Wagner

The seat sale for the concert is now in progress at the box office of the Capitol theatre, and mail and phone orders for seats will be given prompt attention.

MAR. 10 ON Page 18

S TO HIS DEGREE IN THE U
ERGE KOUSSEVITSKY,
Orchestra, Who Played a Solo U
When He Received His Degree.
Andrews, the Explorer (Right),
of Science at the Same Time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

Boston Symphony in New Work

Henry F. Gilbert's Composition Is Given in Concert Program at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Carnegie Hall. The entertainment began with Beethoven's eighth symphony, which was followed by a new composition, the work of Henry F. Gilbert, bearing the simple title of "Symphonic Piece." Mr. Gilbert clearly intended that no program should be sought in his music, but his friends were not so easily satisfied. They wrote to him asking what it all meant.

It is a pity that music lovers should fall into a state of mind which prevents the enjoyment of music which does not represent something. Mr. Gilbert did have an idea in his mind, but it was a broad one not to be cabined, cribbed and confined within the limits of a cold definition. His answer to his friends was that he always tried to write American music which could not have been written in any other country and which should express certain traits of American character as he saw them.

To him the American spirit is energetic, optimistic, nervous and impatient of restraint. It revolts against the traditions of the past. It is full of jingoism and vulgarity and its battle cry is "Hurrah, boys." Under all is the spirit of a new birth. So the first theme is the "Hurrah, boys" theme and the contrast is made with recognition of Stephen Foster. There is a suggestion of the "Old Folks at Home" and a snatch of the "Arkansas Traveler." The rest of the melodic material originated in the mind of the composer.

Not many artists have been so happy in defining their purposes as Mr. Gilbert. His symphonic piece bore the explanation nobly. It breathes the agressiveness, the bumptiousness, if you will, of the American spirit and all of its optimism, its perfect confidence in itself and its occasional sympathetic tear for sob sister romance. It is a brave and honest piece of music and it is pleasant to hear. The Foster reminiscence is ingeniously and indeed originally treated, while the excerpt from the tune kit could not finish without the aid of Manuel Bond is thrown out in its undisguised form. The whole work is vivid and animated and it is orchestrated with a fine sense of musical values. It was most brilliantly played and Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it with evident enthusiasm. The audience received it with most cordial demonstrations of approval and the composer was called out several times.

Much might be written about the distinguished Russian's reading of the eighth symphony, but it is perhaps unnecessary. The tempi were close to those which New York conductors used before Hans von Buelow made us acquainted with his, which differed in several respects from theirs, especially in the allegretto scherzando. This he took considerably more slowly and with a much more marked accentuation. He also played the finale at a less rapid pace than it was performed last night.

In an interview with the writer Von Buelow gave his reasons and also quoted Bargheer, concert master of the Cassel orchestra, who approved the tempi as being the same as Spohr's when he conducted that organization. Spohr was concert master of the orchestra when Beethoven produced the symphony, and Dr. Von Buelow therefore believed that he had the original tempi. It must be said, however, that the work was thoroughly alive as Mr. Koussevitzky read it last evening, and that goes to show that sometimes a fine symphony will lend itself to more than one point of view.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY AND BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT

A significant musical event will be presented to local music lovers this evening at Woolsey hall, the occasion being the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, one of the foremost orchestral organizations in the country today. The great body of 107 selected musicians will be under the personal leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, the brilliant Russian conductor, who has brought the Boston Symphony to the highest point of its artistic career in the short space of one year. Mr. Koussevitzky makes his first bow before a local audience tonight.

Following is the list of numbers and the order in which they will be rendered, the first commencing promptly at 8:15:

Vivaldi—Concerto in E minor for String Orchestra.
(Edited by A. Mistovski.)
I. Vigoroso.
II. Largo.
III. Allegro.
Beethoven—Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93.
I. Allegro vivace e con brio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN

* * *

AT Carnegie Hall, the evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky in command, featured an international programme, beginning with Beethoven's eighth symphony; and presenting also Henry F. Gilbert's "Symphonic Piece" (first time in New York); Bloch's "Three Jewish Poems"; and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" suite, No. 2. Mr. Koussevitzky and his Boston players now have found a lovely artistic understanding and are doing extraordinarily fine things at their visiting concerts in New York.

A routine that miscalculated, brought this hurrying reviewer to the hall too late to hear the Gilbert composition. The familiar Bloch Score, however, made up for a part of the disappointment. Its poignant utterance stands in marked contrast to some of the conventional and complacent recent output of Bloch. His newly acquired American citizenship has stilled his former accents of pessimism. Biting tragedy plays no role in the life of the American Jew.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

Boston Symphony Interprets New American Music

'Symphonic Piece' by Gilbert Suggests Nervous Spirit and Enthusiasm of Life in These 'Hurrah Boys' Days

The feature of last night's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky conducting, was the performance, for the first time in New York, of a new composition by the American composer, Henry F. Gilbert.

Mr. Gilbert's work, which he calls by the simple but sufficient title "Symphonic Piece," was completed last autumn. It was originally intended as the first movement of a symphony, but Mr. Gilbert was advised to send it out into the world uncompanioned, and this he has done. The work was performed for the first time anywhere a fortnight ago in Boston, under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky.

Mr. Gilbert has stated that the work has no "program." It was not suggested by any poem, play or story; it is just music. Yet Mr. Gilbert confesses that he had at least an aim, if not a program: he wished, he says, "to reflect or express the American character, or spirit," as felt by himself. That spirit, as he sees it, is "energetic, optimistic, nervous, impatient of restraint; and, in its highest aspect, is a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit, which is America, is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration, with plenty of jingoism, vulgarity and 'Hurrah, boys!'"

Some of this American mood, says Mr. Gilbert, he has tried to reflect in his music. His first theme is designed to express the "Hurrah boys!" note. The second theme, for contrast, has a slight reminiscence of Stephan Foster—it contains a remote suggestion of "Old Folks at Home," interspersed with a couple of measures from "The Arkansas Traveler." These bits are made use of and developed in the usual symphonic manner.

Mr. Gilbert has employed familiar American materials. His music makes brave and often effective use of ragtime, and it is full of the influence of popular idioms, some of them frankly sentimental, others exuberantly gay. The opening section has an exhilarating swing and dash and pep, and there are some witty references to current styles in jazz. But the work is too long for its subject-matter, and it lacks contrast. One wearies of the monotony of the rhythmic formulas long before the end.

Mr. Koussevitzky played the new score with great spirit, and there was much applause at its close. Mr. Gilbert was persuaded to appear on the platform to acknowledge the enthusiasm

Mr. Koussevitzky began his program with the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, and closed it with Bloch's "Three Jewish Poems" (which have not been heard here often enough since Mr. Bloch first conducted them in New York nine years ago) and the familiar second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis

capacity audience mani-

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY,
N. Y.
TELEGRAM

MAR 9 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The greatest musical treat of the season will be the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 instrumentalists, under the eminent leadership of Serge Kousevitzky, at the Capitol theatre Wednesday night. Ben Franklin is presenting the orchestra. For the event Mr. Koussevitzky has arranged a program of rarest interest and enjoyment. Those interested should remember that the seating capacity of the Capitol theatre is not as large as auditoriums usually played in by this orchestra, hence it will be well to secure seats early. Seats are now on sale at the Capitol.

THURSDAY, MARCH 4, 1926

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the Symphony concerts this week is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8; Hindemith, concerto for orchestra; Germaine Tailleferre, "Outdoor Games"; Chausson, concerto for violin, piano and string quartet; De Falla, three dances from the ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat." Messrs. Enesco and Hutcheson will be respectively the solo violinist and pianist.

The music by Hindemith and Tailleferre will be performed for the first time. We find no record of Chausson's Concerto in Boston.

◆

Mlle. Tailleferre, now living in New York, is not unknown here as a composer. Her piano concerto was played at a Symphony concert last season. The "Outdoor Games" were written originally for two pianos. Messrs. Maier and Pattison have played them here at least on two occasions. Mlle. Tailleferre orchestrated the little pieces last summer. The games, "Tirilitentaine" and "Cache cache," are among the many that Rabelais mentions.

◆

Nor is Paul Hindemith wholly unknown here. Mme. Gauthier has sung songs by him. Only last November his "Little Chamber Music for Five Wind Instruments" was performed at a concert of the Boston Flute Players' Club. Hindemith, who was born in 1895, has been astonishingly productive for so young a man. He has written three or four operas and a mass of orchestral and chamber music. As the viola of the Amar String quartet, he has traveled much, and it is said that he has composed much of his music in railway cars.

Since 1905 he has been the chief conductor of the Frankfort Opera House orchestra. Opinions differ as to the worth of his music. Some put him at the head of the younger German composers by reason of his "fresh and full blooded" talent.

Chausson's Concerto was composed in 1890-91 with a view to a performance by Ysaye and his quartet. It has been described as really a duet for violin and piano with the strings merely supporting the latter instrument. The first performance was at Brussels in the season of 1892-3.

◆

---

melodic fragments are developed in a symphonic manner. A large orchestra is used, and a more elaborate instrumental palette than in other of Mr. Gilbert's compositions. The score has unmistakable qualities associated with him and immediately distinguishable—a healthy virility and swing, a tinge of celticism in certain phrases and progressions. Contrasted qualities are the deliberate coarseness—perhaps unnecessarily deliberate—of some pages, but there is none of the tawdriness and theatricalism that some call "American" and that is merely inartistic. It is music of the open air; and one of its moods is the romantically beautiful.

So much for the import of the composition. The opening phrases have a fine line and swing. The main body of the movement follows established procedure, so far as symphonic form is concerned, with general faithfulness. There are lively rhythms, and a straight-forward harmonic style, interspersed now and again with a more peppery quality of modernism. But we prefer other scores of Mr. Gilbert to this one—scores which should be better known, as, for example, his "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes," the Prologue to Singe's "Riders to the Sea," the "Indian Suite" and ther symphonic works of unusual content and dimensions.

In these works, as in passages of the music heard last night, Mr. Gilbert is individual, like no other composer, and at the same time genuinely racial in his expression. Racial without the close melodic analogies to Foster that he himself remarks upon in describing his second themes. It would be preferable to have a second theme that was less weak Foster and more strong Gilbert—a theme such as the lyrical theme of the Comedy Overture before described, or the middle section of the "Dance in Place Congo" performed by the Metropolitan Opera Company in 1918. These themes were of negroid derivation, but they had a physiognomy wholly their own and of authentic inspiration. Mr. Gilbert's writing is direct and cogent and incorruptibly sincere. The logic of his workmanship is never in doubt, nor the rare vigor of his spirit, but this movement as a whole is less rich and distinctive than other compositions that have been mentioned.

The Symphonic Piece was enthusiastically received. Several times the composer was called to the platform. Mr. Koussevitsky conducted with the utmost earnestness and attention to detail.

The music of Bloch made a very strong impression. The "Three Jewish Poems" have not been heard here of late. The modernism of their style brings into the stronger relief the emotional intensity of the music, its savage and gorgeous color, its rhapsodic accents. The dance is perhaps the least important movement, but the rite is magnificent in its ceremony and tonal imagery, and the conclusion is one of the most touching pages that Bloch has penned. More profound is the mood and more searching the expression of the "Cortege Funebre," inspired by the death of the composer's father. This is not a score of Mr. Bloch's latest period, but it has a wealth of feeling and a simplicity of manner, combined with a technical development, that place the "Jewish Poems" high in the literature of contemporaneous composition. Of the "Poems" Mr. Koussevitsky gave a very dramatic performance. They are works peculiarly fitted, as it appears, to his temperament and methods as a conductor. Bloch was fortunate in his interpreter. Not always is the message of a composer so ably conveyed to an audience.

YMPHONY HAS ABLE LEADER

George. Koussevitsky's. Boston Orchestra Gives Superb Concent Here in Steinert Series

By E. A. LEOPOLD

The program was changed as follows:

Vivaldi.....Concerto in E minor for String Orchestra
(Edited by A. Mistovski)
I. Vigoroso.
II. Largo.
III. Allegro.
Beethoven..Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93
I. Allegro vivace e con brio
II. Allegretto scherzando.
III. Tempo di menuetto.
IV. Allegro vivace.
Bloch......Three Jewish Poems
a. Dance.
b. Rite.
c. Funeral procession.
Wagner....Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde."
Wagner....Prelude to "The Maestersingers of Nuremberg."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky, presented an elaborate program of classic and modern works, rather out of the usual last evening, the appreciative audience nearly filling Woolsey hall and the huge orchestra crowding the capacity of the spacious stage.

Not since before the war has the orchestra played with such superb solidarity of tone, such unanimity of attack and with such obvious attention to the minutest detail. Ostensibly Serge Koussevitsky is the right man in the right place. Years have not weighed heavily on him; he is of medium build, does not resort to long bushy hair, and in appearance, resembles an American much more than a foreigner. His control over his men is little short of marvelous, seemingly uncanny.

There were two changes in the program, both adding lustic to it, if that were necessary. In place of the Galliard sonata, the Vivaldi E Minor concerto for string orchestra was substituted and in place of the Prelude to Lohengrin, the Prelude and "Liebestod" from Wagner's greatest operatic achievement.

Very temperamental was the conductor's reading of the Vivaldi concerto. He almost acted out his score. Daintily, indeed, was concieved the episode for three violins with muted strings in the movement termed "Vigoroso" and the Largo was beautiful in its tonal intensity and accuracy of attack.

Some may have the audacity to term the Beethoven No. 8 Symphony trivial—a sort of vacation between his seventh and matured ninth. In fact, it is most intricate. Mervelous was the control displayed in all of the four movements which are brightly melodic and admittedly a little reminiscent of Mozart. When have we heard such cleancut attacks? Did the famous master of Bown ever write anything trivial?

Interest was rife in the first presentation here of Ernest Bloch's "Three Jewish Poems." If he never wrote anything more he would go down in history as a composer possessing all the essentials of true greatness. All three subjects are intensely descriptive—but of what—we must use our own imagination. The first, "Dance," is wierdly

---

ALBANY
N. Y.
TELEGRAM

MAR 8 1925

Boston Symphony at Capitol Wednesday.

Wednesday night at 8:15 o'clock, Ben Franklin will present the Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 instrumentalists under the brilliant leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, in concert at the Capitol theatre. The event will be the chief musical function of the season in these parts, serving to introduce Mr. Koussevitzky to an Albany audience It is expected that a capacity audience will be present to greet him. Prominent musicians claim the program of the concert is the finest ever presented. in this city.

The arrangement follows:

I.
"Symphony in C major, Op. 16, No. 3........................ Boccherini
Allegro non molto.
Andante amoroso.
Tempo di menuetto.
Presto non tanto.
II.
"Pictures at an Exhibition".......... .... Moussorgsky
Promenade — Gnome — Promenade—Tuileries—Bydlo (Polish Oxcart)—Ballet of the Chicks in their Shells—Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle—Catacombs (Con Mortuis in lingua mortua)—The Hut on Fowl's Legs—The Great Gate at Kiev.
III.
Poeme Danse—"La Peri..........Dukas
IV.
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"...... .... Wagner

The seat sale for the concert is now in progress at the box office of the Capitol theatre, and mail and phone orders for seats will be given prompt attention.

MAR.10 ON Page 19

A DOCTOR OF MUSIC RESPONDS TO HIS DEGREE IN THE UNIVERSAL LANGUAGE: SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY,

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Who Played a Solo Upon a Bass Violin at the Ceremonies at Brown University When He Received His Degree. With Him Are President Faunce (Centre) and Roy Chapman Andrews, the Explorer (Right), Who Received a Degree of Doctor of Science at the Same Time. (Times Wide World Photos.)

---

in New Work

position Is Given in Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Carnegie Hall. The entertainment began with Beethoven's eighth symphony, which was followed by a new composition, the work of Henry F. Gilbert, bearing the simple title of "Symphonic Piece." Mr. Gilbert clearly intended that no program should be sought in his music, but his friends were not so easily satisfied. They wrote to him asking what it all meant.

It is a pity that music lovers should fall into a state of mind which prevents the enjoyment of music which does not represent something. Mr. Gilbert did have an idea in his mind, but it was a broad one not to be cabined, cribbed and confined within the limits of a cold definition. His answer to his friends was that he always tried to write American music which could not have been written in any other country and which should express certain traits of American character as he saw them.

To him the American spirit is energetic, optimistic, nervous and impatient of restraint. It revolts against the traditions of the past. It is full of jingoism and vulgarity and its battle cry is "Hurrah, boys." Under all is the spirit of a new birth. So the first theme is the "Hurrah, boys" theme and the contrast is made with recognition of Stephen Foster. There is a suggestion of the "Old Folks at Home" and a snatch of the "Arkansas Traveler." The rest of the melodic material originated in the mind of the composer.

Not many artists have been so happy in defining their purposes as Mr. Gilbert. His symphonic piece bore the explanation nobly. It breathes the agressiveness, the bumptiousness, if you will, of the American spirit and all of its optimism, its perfect confidence in itself and its occasional sympathetic tear for sob sister romance. It is a brave and honest piece of music and it is pleasant to hear. The Foster reminiscence is ingeniously and indeed originally treated, while the excerpt from the tune kit could not finish without the aid of Manuel Bond is thrown out in its undisguised form. The whole work is vivid and animated and it is orchestrated with a fine sense of musical values. It was most brilliantly played and Mr. Koussevitsky conducted it with evident enthusiasm. The audience received it with most cordial demonstrations of approval and the composer was called out several times.

Much might be written about the distinguished Russian's reading of the eighth symphony, but it is perhaps unnecessary. The tempi were close to those which New York conductors used before Hans von Buelow made us acquainted with his, which differed in several respects from theirs, especially in the allegretto scherzando. This he took considerably more slowly and with a much more marked accentuation. He also played the finale at a less rapid pace than it was performed last night.

In an interview with the writer Von Buelow gave his reasons and also quoted Bargheer, concert master of the Cassel orchestra, who approved the tempi as being the same as Spohr's when he conducted that organization. Spohr was concert master of the orchestra when Beethoven produced the symphony, and Dr. Von Buelow therefore believed that he had the original tempi. It must be said, however, that the work was thoroughly alive as Mr. Koussevitzky read it last evening, and that goes to show that sometimes a fine symphony will lend itself to more than one point of view.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Journal - Courier

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY AND BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT

A significant musical event will be presented to local music lovers this evening at Woolsey hall, the occasion being the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, one of the foremost orchestral organizations in the country today. The great body of 107 selected musicians will be under the personal leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, the brilliant Russian conductor, who has brought the Boston Symphony to the highest point of its artistic career in the short space of one year. Mr. Koussevitzky makes his first bow before a local audience tonight.

Following is the list of numbers and the order in which they will be rendered, the first commencing promptly at 8:15:

Vivaldi—Concerto in E minor for String Orchestra.
(Edited by A. Mistovski.)
I. Vigoroso.
II. Largo.
III. Allegro.
Beethoven—Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93.
I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
II. Allegretto scherzando.
III. Tempo di menuetto.
IV. Allegro vivace.
Bloch—Three Jewish Poems.
a. Dance.
b. Rite.
c. Funeral procession.
Wagner—Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde."
Wagner—Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

"Three Jewish Poems," and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" suite, No. 2. Mr. Koussevitzky and his Boston players now have found a lovely artistic understanding and are doing extraordinarily fine things at their visiting concerts in New York.

A routine that miscalculated, brought this hurrying reviewer to the hall too late to hear the Gilbert composition. The familiar Bloch Score, however, made up for a part of the disappointment. Its poignant utterance stands in marked contrast to some of the conventional and complacent recent output of Bloch. His newly acquired American citizenship has stilled his former accents of pessimism. Biting tragedy plays no role in the life of the American Jew.

'Symphonic Piece' by Gilbert Suggests Nervous Spirit and Enthusiasm of Life in These 'Hurrah Boys' Days

The feature of last night's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky conducting, was the performance, for the first time in New York, of a new composition by the American composer, Henry F. Gilbert.

Mr. Gilbert's work, which he calls by the simple but sufficient title "Symphonic Piece," was completed last autumn. It was originally intended as the first movement of a symphony, but Mr. Gilbert was advised to send it out into the world uncompanioned, and this he has done. The work was performed for the first time anywhere a fortnight ago in Boston, under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky.

Mr. Gilbert has stated that the work has no "program." It was not suggested by any poem, play or story; it is just music. Yet Mr. Gilbert confesses that he had at least an aim, if not a program: he wished, he says, "to reflect or express the American character, or spirit," as felt by himself. That spirit, as he sees it, is "energetic, optimistic, nervous, impatient of restraint; and, in its highest aspect, is a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit, which is America, is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration, with plenty of jingoism, vulgarity and 'Hurrah, boys!'"

Some of this American mood, says Mr. Gilbert, he has tried to reflect in his music. His first theme is designed to express the "Hurrah boys!" note. The second theme, for contrast, has a slight reminiscence of Stephan Foster—it contains a remote suggestion of "Old Folks at Home," interspersed with a couple of measures from "The Arkansas Traveler." These bits are made use of and developed in the usual symphonic manner.

Mr. Gilbert has employed familiar American materials. His music makes brave and often effective use of ragtime, and it is full of the influence of popular idioms, some of them frankly sentimental, others exuberantly gay. The opening section has an exhilarating swing and dash and pep, and there are some witty references to current styles in jazz. But the work is too long for its subject-matter, and it lacks contrast. One wearies of the monotony of the rhythmic formulas long before the end.

Mr. Koussevitzky played the new score with great spirit, and there was much applause at its close. Mr. Gilbert was persuaded to appear on the platform to acknowledge the enthusiasm

Mr. Koussevitzky began his program with the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, and closed it with Bloch's "Three Jewish Poems" (which have not been heard here often enough since Mr. Bloch first conducted them in New York nine years ago) and the familiar second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Cholé." A capacity audience manifested unmistakable pleasure in the proceedings and Mr. Koussevitzky was frequently recalled.

188

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

The Boston Symphony.

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, given last night in Carnegie Hall, included the first performance in New York of Henry F. Gilbert's "Symphonic Piece," Beethoven's "Eighth Symphony," Ernest Bloch's "Three Jewish Poems," and excerpts from the ballet, "Daphnis and Cloe," of Maurice Ravel.

The performance of Beethoven's symphony, somewhat brassy in tone, had the requisite vigor and humor, the sly jest, the unbuttoned laughter of the composer. The tempi of the two middle movements were a shade fast. In the last movement the cloven hoof of the modern conductor showed for an instant in a sudden fluctuation of pace, but one that did not belie the character of the music. The performance just missed the Beethoven concentration and control of power.

Mr. Gilbert's "Symphonic Piece" was originally intended as the first movement of a symphony, but it stands as an entity in itself, and as such was presented yesterday evening. The purpose back of the music has been explained by its author in a characteristic manner. The piece has no "program." "Many of my young friends have pressed me to tell them what it's all about. I can only say this: My constant aim ever since beginning composition has been to write some American music—i. e., some music that would not naturally have been written in any other country, and which would reflect or express certain aspects of the American character or spirit as felt by myself. That spirit, as I see it, is energetic, optimistic, nervous, impatient of restraint, and, in its highest respect, a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit, which is America, is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration. Plenty of jingoism, vulgarity and 'Hurrah, boys!' attaches to it, but the spirit of the new birth underlies all for him who can see it. Some of this American mood I have tried to reflect in my composition."

There is the use of "ragtime" rhythm, but not with the cheapness of spirit that often accompanies it. The second theme, as the composer remarks, carries "a remote suggestion of 'Old Folks at Home'—kind of a family resemblance—interspersed with a couple of measures from the 'Arkansas Traveller.'" These are suggestions, not employed verbatim, and the melodic fragments are developed in a symphonic manner. A large orchestra is used, and a more elaborate instrumental palette than in other of Mr. Gilbert's compositions. The score has unmistakable qualities associated with him and immediately distinguishable—a healthy virility and swing, a tinge of celticism in certain phrases and progressions. Contrasted qualities are the deliberate coarseness—perhaps unnecessarily deliberate—of some pages, but there is none of the tawdriness and theatricalism that some call "American" and that is merely inartistic. It is music of the open air; and one of its moods is the romantically beautiful.

So much for the import of the composition. The opening phrases have a fine line and swing. The main body of the movement follows established procedure, so far as symphonic form is concerned, with general faithfulness. There are lively rhythms, and a straight-forward harmonic style, interspersed now and again with a more peppery quality of modernism. But we prefer other scores of Mr. Gilbert to this one—scores which should be better known, as, for example, his "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes," the Prologue to Singe's "Riders to the Sea," the "Indian Suite" and ther symphonic works of unusual content and dimensions.

In these works, as in passages of the music heard last night, Mr. Gilbert is individual, like no other composer, and at the same time genuinely racial in his expression. Racial without the close melodic analogies to Foster that he himself remarks upon in describing his second themes. It would be preferable to have a second theme that was less weak Foster and more strong Gilbert—a theme such as the lyrical theme of the Comedy Overture before described, or the middle section of the "Dance in Place Congo" performed by the Metropolitan Opera Company in 1918. These themes were of negroid derivation, but they had a physiognomy wholly their own and of authentic inspiration. Mr. Gilbert's writing is direct and cogent and incorruptibly sincere. The logic of his workmanship is never in doubt, nor the rare vigor of his spirit, but this movement as a whole is less rich and distinctive than other compositions that have been mentioned.

The Symphonic Piece was enthusiastically received. Several times the composer was called to the platform. Mr. Koussevitsky conducted with the utmost earnestness and attention to detail.

The music of Bloch made a very strong impression. The "Three Jewish Poems" have not been heard here of late. The modernism of their style brings into the stronger relief the emotional intensity of the music, its savage and gorgeous color, its rhapsodic accents. The dance is perhaps the least important movement, but the rite is magnificent in its ceremony and tonal imagery, and the conclusion is one of the most touching pages that Bloch has penned. More profound is the mood and more searching the expression of the "Cortege Funebre," inspired by the death of the composer's father. This is not a score of Mr. Bloch's latest period, but it has a wealth of feeling and a simplicity of manner, combined with a technical development, that place the "Jewish Poems" high in the literature of contemporaneous composition. Of the "Poems" Mr. Koussevitsky gave a very dramatic performance. They are works peculiarly fitted, as it appears, to his temperament and methods as a conductor. Bloch was fortunate in his interpreter. Not always is the message of a composer so ably conveyed to an audience.

SYMPHONY HAS ABLE LEADER

George. Koussevitsky's. Boston Orchestra Gives Superb Concent Here in Steinert Series

By E. A. LEOPOLD

The program was changed as follows:

Vivaldi.....Concerto in E minor for String Orchestra
(Edited by A. Mistovski)
I. Vigoroso.
II. Largo.
III. Allegro.
Beethoven..Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93
1. Allegro vivace e con brio
II. Allegretto scherzando.
III. Tempo di menuetto.
IV. Allegro vivace.
Bloch......Three Jewish Poems
a. Dance.
b. Rite.
c. Funeral procession.
Wagner....Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde."
Wagner....Prelude to "The Maestersingers of Nuremberg."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky, presented an elaborate program of classic and modern works, rather out of the usual last evening, the appreciative audience nearly filling Woolsey hall and the huge orchestra crowding the capacity of the spacious stage.

Not since before the war has the orchestra played with such superb solidarity of tone, such unanimity of attack and with such obvious attention to the minutest detail. Ostensibly Serge Koussevitsky is the right man in the right place. Years have not weighed heavily on him; he is of medium build, does not resort to long bushy hair, and in appearance, resembles an American much more than a foreigner. His control over his men is little short of marvelous, seemingly uncanny.

There were two changes in the program, both adding lustic to it, if that were necessary. In place of the Galliard sonata, the Vivaldi E Minor concerto for string orchestra was substituted and in place of the Prelude to Lohengrin, the Prelude and "Liebestod" from Wagner's greatest operatic achievement.

Very temperamental was the conductor's reading of the Vivaldi concerto. He almost acted out his score. Daintily, indeed, was concieved the episode for three violins with muted strings in the movement termed "Vigoroso" and the Largo was beautiful in its tonal intensity and accuracy of attack.

Some may have the audacity to term the Beethoven No. 8 Symphony trivial—a sort of vacation between his seventh and matured ninth. In fact, it is most intricate. Mervelous was the control displayed in all of the four movements which are brightly melodic and admittedly a little reminiscent of Mozart. When have we heard such cleancut attacks? Did the famous master of Bown ever write anything trivial?

Interest was rife in the first presentation here of Ernest Bloch's "Three Jewish Poems." If he never wrote anything more he would go down in history as a composer possessing all the essentials of true greatness. All three subjects are intensely descriptive—but of what—we must use our own imagination. The first, "Dance," is wierdly mailing in its conception with the most unusual and original of instrumation. Some of his strange effects are secured by combining the harp, piccolo, flute, clarinets over murmering strings and pizzicati celli coupled with snare drums and clashing cymbals. Much of this effect is found also in "Rite" and the "Funeral Procession."

Throughout there is a feeling of great passion, depicting engrossing sorrow. It was received rather mildly but when the band rose, there was pronounced applause.

We frequently hear the "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" but when so gorgeously colored and given with such precision?

This comes to an end the fifth and last of the Steinert series of concerts —a series, the excellence of which has yet to be excelled.

IV.
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"...... Wagner

The seat sale for the concert is now in progress at the box office of the Capitol theatre, and mail and phone orders for seats will be given prompt attention.

MAR. 10 on Page 19

188

A DOCTOR OF MUSIC RESPONDS TO HIS DEGREE IN THE UNIVERSAL LANGUAGE: SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY,

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Who Played a Solo Upon a Bass Violin at the Ceremonies at Brown University When He Received His Degree. With Him Are President Faunce (Centre) and Roy Chapman Andrews, the Explorer (Right), Who Received a Degree of Doctor of Science at the Same Time. (Times Wide World Photos.)

---

in New Work

position Is Given in Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Carnegie Hall. The entertainment began with Beethoven's eighth symphony, which was followed by a new composition, the work of Henry F. Gilbert, bearing the simple title of "Symphonic Piece." Mr. Gilbert clearly intended that no program should be sought in his music, but his friends were not so easily satisfied. They wrote to him asking what it all meant.

It is a pity that music lovers should fall into a state of mind which prevents the enjoyment of music which does not represent something. Mr. Gilbert did have an idea in his mind, but it was a broad one not to be cabined, cribbed and confined within the limits of a cold definition. His answer to his friends was that he always tried to write American music which could not have been written in any other country and which should express certain traits of American character as he saw them.

To him the American spirit is energetic, optimistic, nervous and impatient of restraint. It revolts against the traditions of the past. It is full of jingoism and vulgarity and its battle cry is "Hurrah, boys." Under all is the spirit of a new birth. So the first theme is the "Hurrah, boys" theme and the contrast is made with recognition of Stephen Foster. There is a suggestion of the "Old Folks at Home" and a snatch of the "Arkansas Traveler." The rest of the melodic material originated in the mind of the composer.

Not many artists have been so happy in defining their purposes as Mr. Gilbert. His symphonic piece bore the explanation nobly. It breathes the agressiveness, the bumptiousness, if you will, of the American spirit and all of its optimism, its perfect confidence in itself and its occasional sympathetic tear for sob sister romance. It is a brave and honest piece of music and it is pleasant to hear. The Foster reminiscence is ingeniously and indeed originally treated, while the excerpt from the tune kit could not finish without the aid of Manuel Bond is thrown out in its undisguised form. The whole work is vivid and animated and it is orchestrated with a fine sense of musical values. It was most brilliantly played and Mr. Koussevitsky conducted it with evident enthusiasm. The audience received it with most cordial demonstrations of approval and the composer was called out several times.

Much might be written about the distinguished Russian's reading of the eighth symphony, but it is perhaps unnecessary. The tempi were close to those which New York conductors used before Hans von Buelow made us acquainted with his, which differed in several respects from theirs, especially in the allegretto scherzando. This he took considerably more slowly and with a much more marked accentuation. He also played the finale at a less rapid pace than it was performed last night.

In an interview with the writer Von Buelow gave his reasons and also quoted Bargheer, concert master of the Cassel orchestra, who approved the tempi as being the same as Spohr's when he conducted that organization. Spohr was concert master of the orchestra when Beethoven produced the symphony, and Dr. Von Buelow therefore believed that he had the original tempi. It must be said, however, that the work was thoroughly alive as Mr. Koussevitzky read it last evening, and that goes to show that sometimes a fine symphony will lend itself to more than one point of view.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY AND BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT

A significant musical event will be presented to local music lovers this evening at Woolsey hall, the occasion being the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, one of the foremost orchestral organizations in the country today. The great body of 107 selected musicians will be under the personal leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, the brilliant Russian conductor, who has brought the Boston Symphony to the highest point of its artistic career in the short space of one year. Mr. Koussevitzky makes his first bow before a local audience tonight.

Following is the list of numbers and the order in which they will be rendered, the first commencing promptly at 8:15:

Vivaldi—Concerto in E minor for String Orchestra.
(Edited by A. Mistovski.)
- I. Vigoroso.
- II. Largo.
- III. Allegro.

Beethoven—Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93.
- I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
- II. Allegretto scherzando.
- III. Tempo di menuetto.
- IV. Allegro vivace.

Bloch—Three Jewish Poems.
- a. Dance.
- b. Rite.
- c. Funeral procession.

Wagner—Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde."
Wagner—Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

"Three Jewish Poems," and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" suite, No. 2. Mr. Koussevitzky and his Boston players now have found a lovely artistic understanding and are doing extraordinarily fine things at their visiting concerts in New York.

A routine that miscalculated, brought this hurrying reviewer to the hall too late to hear the Gilbert composition. The familiar Bloch Score, however, made up for a part of the disappointment. Its poignant utterance stands in marked contrast to some of the conventional and complacent recent output of Bloch. His newly acquired American citizenship has stilled his former accents of pessimism. Biting tragedy plays no role in the life of the American Jew.

'Symphonic Piece' by Gilbert Suggests Nervous Spirit and Enthusiasm of Life in These 'Hurrah Boys' Days

The feature of last night's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky conducting, was the performance, for the first time in New York, of a new composition by the American composer, Henry F. Gilbert.

Mr. Gilbert's work, which he calls by the simple but sufficient title "Symphonic Piece," was completed last autumn. It was originally intended as the first movement of a symphony, but Mr. Gilbert was advised to send it out into the world uncompanioned, and this he has done. The work was performed for the first time anywhere a fortnight ago in Boston, under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky.

Mr. Gilbert has stated that the work has no "program." It was not suggested by any poem, play or story; it is just music. Yet Mr. Gilbert confesses that he had at least an aim, if not a program: he wished, he says, "to reflect or express the American character, or spirit," as felt by himself. That spirit, as he sees it, is "energetic, optimistic, nervous, impatient of restraint; and, in its highest aspect, is a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit, which is America, is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration, with plenty of jingoism, vulgarity and 'Hurrah, boys!'"

Some of this American mood, says Mr. Gilbert, he has tried to reflect in his music. His first theme is designed to express the "Hurrah boys!" note. The second theme, for contrast, has a slight reminiscence of Stephan Foster—it contains a remote suggestion of "Old Folks at Home," interspersed with a couple of measures from "The Arkansas Traveler." These bits are made use of and developed in the usual symphonic manner.

Mr. Gilbert has employed familiar American materials. His music makes brave and often effective use of ragtime, and it is full of the influence of popular idioms, some of them frankly sentimental, others exuberantly gay. The opening section has an exhilarating swing and dash and pep, and there are some witty references to current styles in jazz. But the work is too long for its subject-matter, and it lacks contrast. One wearies of the monotony of the rhythmic formulas long before the end.

Mr. Koussevitzky played the new score with great spirit, and there was much applause at its close. Mr. Gilbert was persuaded to appear on the platform to acknowledge the enthusiasm.

Mr. Koussevitzky began his program with the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, and closed it with Bloch's "Three Jewish Poems" (which have not been heard here often enough since Mr. Bloch first conducted them in New York nine years ago) and the familiar second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Cholé." A capacity audience manifested unmistakable pleasure in the proceedings and Mr. Koussevitzky was frequently recalled.

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

The Boston Symphony.

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, given last night in Carnegie Hall, included the first performance in New York of Henry F. Gilbert's "Symphonic Piece," Beethoven's "Eighth Symphony," Ernest Bloch's "Three Jewish Poems," and excerpts from the ballet, "Daphnis and Cloe," of Maurice Ravel.

The performance of Beethoven's symphony, somewhat brassy in tone, had the requisite vigor and humor, the sly jest, the unbuttoned laughter of the composer. The tempi of the two middle movements were a shade fast. In the last movement the cloven hoof of the modern conductor showed for an instant in a sudden fluctuation of pace, but one that did not belie the character of the music. The performance just missed the Beethoven concentration and control of power.

Mr. Gilbert's "Symphonic Piece" was originally intended as the first movement of a symphony, but it stands as an entity in itself, and as such was presented yesterday evening. The purpose back of the music has been explained by its author in a characteristic manner. The piece has no "program." "Many of my young friends have pressed me to tell them what it's all about. I can only say this: My constant aim ever since beginning composition has been to write some American music—i. e., some music that would not naturally have been written in any other country, and which would reflect or express certain aspects of the American character or spirit as felt by myself. That spirit, as I see it, is energetic, optimistic, nervous, impatient of restraint, and, in its highest respect, a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit, which is America, is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration. Plenty of jingoism, vulgarity and 'Hurrah, boys!' attaches to it, but the spirit of the new birth underlies all for him who can see it. Some of this American mood I have tried to reflect in my composition."

There is the use of "ragtime" rhythm, but not with the cheapness of spirit that often accompanies it. The second theme, as the composer remarks, carries "a remote suggestion of 'Old Folks at Home'—kind of a family resemblance—interspersed with a couple of measures from the 'Arkansas Traveller.'" These are suggestions, not employed verbatim, and the melodic fragments are developed in a symphonic manner. A large orchestra is used, and a more elaborate instrumental palette than in other of Mr. Gilbert's compositions. The score has unmistakable qualities associated with him and immediately distinguishable—a healthy virility and swing, a tinge of celticism in certain phrases and progressions. Contrasted qualities are the deliberate coarseness—perhaps unnecessarily deliberate—of some pages, but there is none of the tawdriness and theatricalism that some call "American" and that is merely inartistic. It is music of the open air; and one of its moods is the romantically beautiful.

So much for the import of the composition. The opening phrases have a fine line and swing. The main body of the movement follows established procedure, so far as symphonic form is concerned, with general faithfulness. There are lively rhythms, and a straight-forward harmonic style, interspersed now and again with a more peppery quality of modernism. But we prefer other scores of Mr. Gilbert to this one—scores which should be better known, as, for example, his "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes," the Prologue to Singe's "Riders to the Sea," the "Indian Suite" and ther symphonic works of unusual content and dimensions.

In these works, as in passages of the music heard last night, Mr. Gilbert is individual, like no other composer, and at the same time genuinely racial in his expression. Racial without the close melodic analogies to Foster that he himself remarks upon in describing his second themes. It would be preferable to have a second theme that was less weak Foster and more strong Gilbert—a theme such as the lyrical theme of the Comedy Overture before described, or the middle section of the "Dance in Place Congo" performed by the Metropolitan Opera Company in 1918. These themes were of negroid derivation, but they had a physiognomy wholly their own and of authentic inspiration. Mr. Gilbert's writing is direct and cogent and incorruptibly sincere. The logic of his workmanship is never in doubt, nor the rare vigor of his spirit, but this movement as a whole is less rich and distinctive than other compositions that have been mentioned.

The Symphonic Piece was enthusiastically received. Several times the composer was called to the platform. Mr. Koussevitsky conducted with the utmost earnestness and attention to detail.

The music of Bloch made a very strong impression. The "Three Jewish Poems" have not been heard here of late. The modernism of their style brings into the stronger relief the emotional intensity of the music, its savage and gorgeous color, its rhapsodic accents. The dance is perhaps the least important movement, but the rite is magnificent in its ceremony and tonal imagery, and the conclusion is one of the most touching pages that Bloch has penned. More profound is the mood and more searching the expression of the "Cortege Funebre," inspired by the death of the composer's father. This is not a score of Mr. Bloch's latest period, but it has a wealth of feeling and a simplicity of manner, combined with a technical development, that place the "Jewish Poems" high in the literature of contemporaneous composition. Of the "Poems" Mr. Koussevitsky gave a very dramatic performance. They are works peculiarly fitted, as it appears, to his temperament and methods as a conductor. Bloch was fortunate in his interpreter. Not always is the message of a composer so ably conveyed to an audience.

SYMPHONY HAS ABLE LEADER

George. Koussevitsky's. Boston Orchestra Gives Superb Concent Here in Steinert Series

By E. A. LEOPOLD

The program was changed as follows:

Vivaldi.....Concerto in E minor for String Orchestra
(Edited by A. Mistovski)
- I. Vigoroso.
- II. Largo.
- III. Allegro.

Beethoven..Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93
- I. Allegro vivace e con brio
- II. Allegretto scherzando.
- III. Tempo di menuetto.
- IV. Allegro vivace.

Bloch......Three Jewish Poems
- a. Dance.
- b. Rite.
- c. Funeral procession.

Wagner....Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde."
Wagner....Prelude to "The Maestersingers of Nuremberg."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky, presented an elaborate program of classic and modern works, rather out of the usual last evening, the appreciative audience nearly filling Woolsey hall and the huge orchestra crowding the capacity of the spacious stage.

Not since before the war has the orchestra played with such superb solidarity of tone, such unanimity of attack and with such obvious attention to the minutest detail. Ostensibly Serge Koussevitsky is the right man in the right place. Years have not weighed heavily on him; he is of medium build, does not resort to long bushy hair, and in appearance, resembles an American much more than a foreigner. His control over his men is little short of marvelous, seemingly uncanny.

There were two changes in the program, both adding lustic to it, if that were necessary. In place of the Galliard sonata, the Vivaldi E Minor concerto for string orchestra was substituted and in place of the Prelude to Lohengrin, the Prelude and "Liebestod" from Wagner's greatest operatic achievement.

Very temperamental was the conductor's reading of the Vivaldi concerto. He almost acted out his score. Daintily, indeed, was concieved the episode for three violins with muted strings in the movement termed "Vigoroso" and the Largo was beautiful in its tonal intensity and accuracy of attack.

Some may have the audacity to term the Beethoven No. 8 Symphony trivial—a sort of vacation between his seventh and matured ninth. In fact, it is most intricate. Mervelous was the control displayed in all of the four movements which are brightly melodic and admittedly a little reminiscent of Mozart. When have we heard such cleancut attacks? Did the famous master of Bown ever write anything trivial?

Interest was rife in the first presentation here of Ernest Bloch's "Three Jewish Poems." If he never wrote anything more he would go down in history as a composer possessing all the essentials of true greatness. All three subjects are intensely descriptive—but of what—we must use our own imagination. The first, "Dance," is wierdly mailing in its conception with the most unusual and original of instrumation. Some of his strange effects are secured by combining the harp, piccolo, flute, clarinets over murmering strings and pizzicati celli coupled with snare drums and clashing cymbals. Much of this effect is found also in "Ritc" and the "Funeral Procession."

Throughout there is a feeling of great passion, depicting engrossing sorrow. It was received rather mildly but when the band rose, there was pronounced applause.

We frequently hear the "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" but when so gorgeously colored and given with such precision?

This comes to an end the fifth and last of the Steinert series of concerts—a series, the excellence of which has yet to be excelled.

Poeme ......

IV.

Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"......
.... Wagner

The seat sale for the concert is now in progress at the box office of the Capitol theatre, and mail and phone orders for seats will be given prompt attention.

MAR. 10 ON Page 19

MISSING
PAGE(S)

REDUCTION

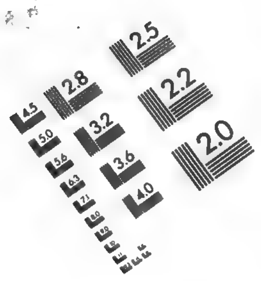
RATIO

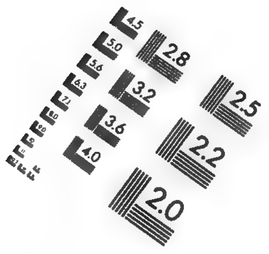
18x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

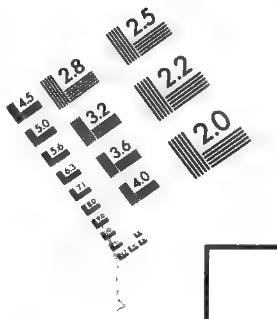
2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

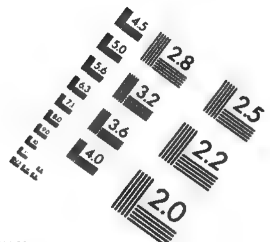
1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

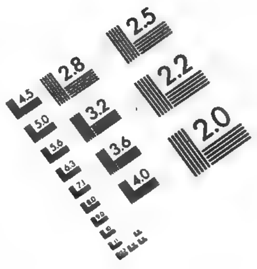


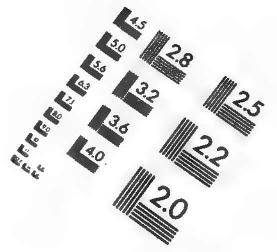


PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET PHOTOGRAPHIC





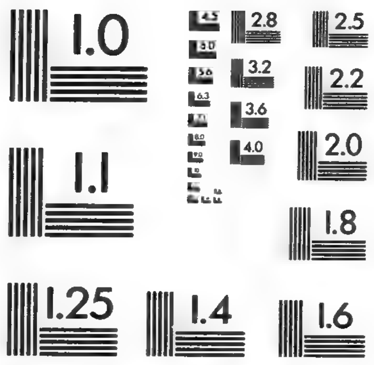




200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

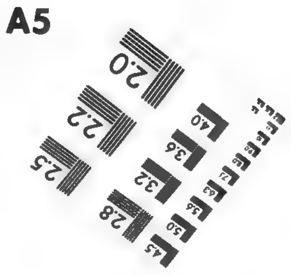
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

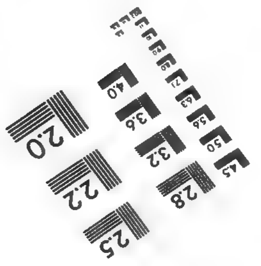
2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

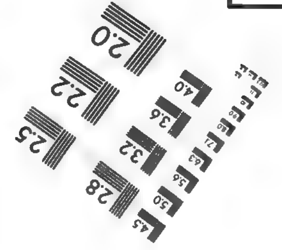
A5

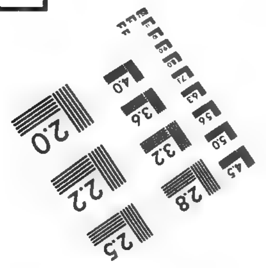




A4

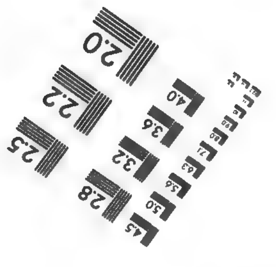
A3





PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119



4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

190

Boston Symphony Concert

Audience Cheers Kussevitzsky and Great Orchestra Following Thrilling Program at Woolsey Hall. Wide Contrast In Numbers Displays Excellence of Organizations

Vivaldi, concerto in E minor for string orchestra; Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, F major; Bloch, Three Jewish Poems; Wagner, Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde;" Wagner, prelude to "Meistersinger."

For the closing concert of the Steinert series, the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Woolsey Hall last evening and New Haven had its first opportunity to hear it perform under the baton of Serge Koussewitzy a program of novel and familiar music ranging from Beethoven to Bloch. The evening was one of rare excellence in performance so as an extra period in a hockey game. The best of the three was the "Funeral Cortege." The minor cadencis in the brass and wood wind creating a perfect tone picture. The composition must demand super human endeavor at rehearsal and the applause last night was for masterly conquest of numberless techincal and total difficulties by the orchestra and superb direction and control by the conductor.

After the bizarre effects of the Block suite the sonorous progressions of, Wagner came as a tonic. Here the orchestrda attained its height for the evening. The magnificent appeal of the tremendous, C major theme in initial period of the Meistusangers, after the tragic tenderness of the love death, led through that marvel of Counterpoint which culminates in the tremendous finale. Some time ago this chronicler had something to say about omission of Wagner from programs. After hearing the manner in which the two compositions were played last night, he takes it all back The way M. Korissevitzky conducted the two was electrifying in the effects gained from his orchestra. There was sonority, there was sardonic irony.

There was interplay of theme against theme ever apparent and never clouded or neglected so that the reviewd, soothr by Beethoven and stirred by Bloch, is apt to use all the superlatives he has. But when audience at symphony concert in New Haven mingles shouts of praises with the patter of hands, somebody besides the reviewer must be stirred out of himself. That

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

1926

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky brought his players from Boston to Carnegie Hall last night with the following program:

Eighth symphony................ Beethoven
Symphonic piece (new).........H. F. Gilbert
Three Jewish poems............Ernest Bloch
Suite 2, "Daphnis and Chloe"........Ravel

Just Music

Fashions in music are apt nowadays to change as rapidly as Parisian models. Yesterday people wrote only program music and took the greatest pains to let the audience in on the program. To-day there is a rush for absolute music, and the composers, instead of writing long perorations on what the music is supposed to represent, write equally long perorations telling the audience that their music represents nothing.

Mr. Harry F. Gilbert, whose new "Symphonic Piece" had its first performance in New York at the Boston Orchestra's concert last night at Carnegie Hall, assures us in a note in the program that he didn't want his new piece to mean one thing or another. His only desire, he pleads, was to write American music, which he takes to be music that will contain some of the national ingredients—vulgarity, vitality and an immense optimism These Mr. Gilbert poked about with an ordinary symphonic stick. But the hearer is to take the result on its merits as music just as he would listen to, let us say, "Quartet in B flat" by Tom Jones.

Nevertheless, Mr. Gilbert's "Symphonic Piece," for all its creator's denials, does sound like program music. The themes, if not actually Negro in origin, are unmistakable imitations of Negro tunes and rhythms, not of the blues and jazzy variety, but of the older, more leisurely syncopated kind. There is plenty of what Mr. Gilbert calls the "Hurrah" quality, but the vitality and optimism must be taken on faith.

But the thing that struck me most was the presence of a program in Mr. Gilbert's musical story; and the fact that the composer disclaimed the idea made one more determined to discover it. For surely the crashing beginning must have meant something, and the various alarums and excursions were put there for a purpose. Listened to as just music—symphonic music—Mr. Gilbert's piece seems diffuse and disjointed, with no particular raison d'etre. But if it is all about something definite it is cruel of Mr. Gilbert to hold us in suspense.

Mr. Bloch, whose three Jewish poems were also played last night, is equally reticent about the contents of his music. There is more behind the Dance, the Rites and the Funeral Procession than he wants us to know. But in Mr. Bloch's case it is not so important to know, because the Jewish composer writes with a flaming passion that needs no elucidation. What he writes is often vague and groping and too esoteric for a general comprehension, but he is always intense and sometimes, as in parts of the Funeral Procession, heart-rendingly poignant. Even so there is always the suspicion that the musical texture is considerably diluted with non-musical thought and idea—in short, that it too is in a sense program music.

The orchestra began with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and finished with excerpts from Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe.

Mr. Gilbert's piece was received by the large audience with many evidences of appreciation and the composer came on the stage repeatedly bow. Mr. Bloch's three pieces were reverentially—not, I am afraid, he detachment the composer e liked.

Telling the World

By NEAL O'HARA

Copyright, 1926, by Press Publishing Co.

The latest novelty of the season is Serge Koussevitzky. Serge Koussevitzky is not a suit. He is conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last week Brown University conferred on him an honorary degree. M. Koussevitzky did not want to make a speech of appreciation, so he gave them a recital on his bass viol. The concert went over big.

Roy Chapman Andrews, the archaeologist-explorer, received a degree at the same time. We do not know if he made a speech. But we presume he promised the Brown Museum a dozen dinosaur eggs.

This innovation gives our colleges something to think about. Commencement exercises need not be boresome hereafter. Not if the faculty uses its bean in distributing honorary degrees.

We cannot think of anything nicer than John McCormack, Litt. D., saying it with music, Fritz Kreisler, Ph. D., acknowledging it on his violin or Paderewski, Litt. D., uttering his thanks on the ivory keys.

It is understood Paul Whiteman has been offered an LL. D. by more than a dozen universities. But he is holding out for thirty-six additional Ph. D. for his men.

M. Koussevitzky, who is responsible for this innovation is handicapped by playing on the base viol. Several other colleges want to give him honorary degrees next June. But on account of freight and haulage charges he has asked them to wait till he has mastered the piccolo.

The idea is too good to be dropped, however. For years guys like Borah, Hughes and Hoover have been picking off the honorary titles and all they gave back was a line of talk. Now it looks as if the colleges will get a little entertainment besides looking at whiskers and some speec these co ts, give Will Rogers the honorary degrees.

Here is also a chance for some enterprising college to give Mellie Dunham a degree of LL. D. or Fiddle-Dee-Dee or something like that.

This honorary title business need not be exclusively for men. Think of the possibilities among the opera warblers. It would be lovely to bestow one on

en. And give her the choice or taking a sun bath.

The possibilities are enormous for honoring drawing cards. Imagine Houdini getting an honorary Litt. D. at Harvard. could wear a straightjacket instead flowing academic robes. And guarantee to wiggle out of it in three minutes or forfeit his degree to some local rity.

For an encore Houdini could take the of all nations and half a dozen rabbits out of his mortarboard cap.

Then Peggy Joyce is certainly entitled to a degree of B. S.—Some Blonde.

In bestowing academic honors, don't overlook Ben Turpin, either Ben has contributed to the field of education. He discovered the language of crossing his eyes and dotting his T's.

Yes, commencements will be worth going to if they follow Koussevitzky's example, In fact the college campus will be in the hands of the ticket speculators.

Symphony Orchestra, one of the foremost orchestral organizations in the country today. The great body of one hundred and seven selected musicians will be under the personal leadership of Serge Koussevitszky, the brilliant Russian conductor who has brought the Boston Symphony to the highest point of its artistic career in the short space o fone year. Mr. Koussevitzky makes his first bow before a local audience tonight, thus the event is of little importance in musical circles throughout this vicinity.

Tonights concert will mark the fifth of the Steinert Concert Series for the season of 1925-6, under the auspices of the Yale School of Music. A brilliant program has been arranged especially for the occassion, in fact it is doubtful if a symphony program has ever been heard in this city of such all around cellence and appeal. Following is the list of numbers and the order in which they will be rendered, the first commencing

Vivaldi

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROGRAM

A notable progrem will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra when this world-famous assemblage of 108 musicians visits New Haven for a concert in Woolsey Hall, Wednesday evening at 8:15. This will be an event of the first musical importance since Serge Koussevitzky, the great Russian conductor who is regarded as one of the very finest living, will make his first bow in this city. The symphony of the program will be Beethoven's Eight in F major, one of the most delightfully melodious and humorous of this composer's works. This will be introduced by a Concerto in E minor for string orchestra by Vivaldi, the 17th century composer, which has been arranged by Mistovski; a modern score of much musical importance will be the Three Jewish Poems of Ernest Bloch. They are entitled Dance, Rite, and Funeral Procession. The closing numbers will be two excerpts from the Wagnerian music dramas—the Prelude and Love-death from "Tristan and Isolde," and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of

---

Boston Symphony Makes Its Third Visit Here

Music lovers of Brooklyn turned out in goodly numbers last night to greet the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its fourth and next to last visit of the season. Serge Koussevitsky wielded the baton in his customary able manner. The program was exceptionally varied and there was something that every hearer could appreciate.

Classic music was heard when Vivaldi's Concerto in E minor for string orchestra was presented as the opening number. It was ably given. The most thoroughly enjoyable piece of the evening, Hahdn's Symphony in G major, followed. It was superbly played and its dainty, delightful, tripping measures started the applause of the evening.

Strangely enough there was even more enthusiasm for the three dances from the ballet, "The Three-Cornered

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

Unusual importance was attached in New York this week to the first performance of a new "Symphonic" piece by Henry F. Gilbert at the hands of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Sergey Koussevitsky. Mr. Gilbert stands to-day as one of the most original and independent figures among contemporaneous American composers. He was born in Somerville, Mass., and was the first American pupil of Edward MacDowell. He first became a national figure in musical circles in 1911 when the Boston orchestra played his "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes." His Negro Rhapsody" was given at the Norfolk festival in 1913, when he was present in person and directed the work. Others of his compositions have also received much favorable comment.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE

MAR 13 1926

MR. KOUSSEWITSKY and his Boston Symphony Orchestra have only a single visit to pay the Academy of Music this season (following their concert in Brooklyn last evening) and another orchestral year will have come to an end. But I feel that it would not be a difficult assignment to prophesy about what Mr. Koussewitsky's program will be on that not distant date. Boston Symphony programs since the eminent and well-tailored Russian took over the baton have run on formula—or, rather, on formulae. The first is the program with the popular symphony as its major point, the classic overture and the pseudo-modern suite as its fillers. The second is the classic concerto, the classic symphony, the pseudo-modern (or on occasion, the bona-fide modern) work and the Wagnerian excerpt.

Last evening Mr. Koussewitsky promulgated the latter variety. During the early part of the evening he revealed his talents as a conductor of Vivaldi and Haydn (both composers seem specially marked for Mr. Koussewitsky's favor), and after the intermission he became the apologetic modernist and the Perfect Wagnerite: he played the popular suite from De Falla's "Three Cornered Hat" and the most familiar of excerpts from "Tristan" and "Meistersinger."

It is not easy to explain the popularity of the De Falla suite. Here is music lacking in all the elements that are supposed to make music popular. The dances of the "Three Cornered Hat" are not melodically interesting, harmonically daring or rhythmically salient. They are merely Spanish music of indifferent charm, well but not brilliantly orchestrated. Yet conductors—and audiences, too it would seem—have smiled upon them the smile os lasting favor. Mr. Koussewitsky made much of them.

The Wagnerian excerpts were also meritoriously done. Of the first pages of the "Tristan" Prelude Mr. Koussewitsky gave a really inspired reading. But he became less interesting as the piece advanced and under his hands the great climax lacked propulsive force. The "Meistersinger" Overture was admirably projected except for occasional and uncalled for retardandos in the two climaxes of the work.

There are signs that the Boston Orchestra is itself deteriorating. The playing is frequently ragged, the instrumental tone neither secure nor of especially good quality. Mr. Koussewitsky might look up from his scores for a moment and listen to what his men are doing.

FROM CITIZEN

Koussevitsky Plays a Piece Written in Real American

After all, it was probably to be expected that a New Englander would be the first to write some real American music. Only no one did expect it, including this particular horizon-gazer. But Henry F. Gilbert's modesty titled "Symphonic Piece," played here last night for the first time by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, is the only distinctively American music for the symphonic band that we know anything about.

It isn't jazz, either straight or the softdrink concoction the jazzologists have been serving when goaded into one of their mild symphonic sprees; it isn't the music of the negro or of the Indian doctored up by the white man; and it isn't the German small beer that some other New Englanders have been brewing like so many Brahmsianer, the flavorless dilutions boot from Paris by the gentlemen hicago and points southeast. music that is American be t consciously (but not self usly) reflects the American or some part of it, in a zably American fashion. It ne of the urge and flamboyancy of the go-getter in it, something of vulgarity, something of sentimentality. Mr. Gilbert quite joyously acknowledges that. It is rushy, hell-bent-for-election stuff, with a touch of nervous jazziness here and there and a large dash of the vulgarly tearful which is excellent Broadway.

But the thing is put together by a musician who knows what he is doing all the way. He handles his instrumentation so that it fits his expressive needs. His development of his thematic material is adroit and deep-breathed. The only weakness of the piece is that it is too long-winded. But even so, it is worth a couple of dozen Carpenter "Skyscrapers" and a bushel of Chadwickian Loefflerisms.

The great length of the piece is the only un-American aspect it has. Poe—an American—long ago said there was no such thing as a long poem (and Whitman, the professional American, hasn't disproved it). Equally, there can be on such thing as a long American symphony. But Mr. Gilbert can easily delete. His "Symphonic Piece" is intended as the first movement of a complete symphonic work and is therefore probably not yet in its final form. He should feel tremendously encouraged to create the rest of what he has in mind.

Mr. Koussevitsky, for a Russian, and an alien, gave a splendidly virile and comprehending performance of this music. We could imagine Paul Whiteman, perhaps, doing it better, even though it isn't in the language of his band. But Mr. Koussevitsky got well under its skin and the orchestra gave a virtuoso account of it.

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, which preceded the Gilbert piece on last night's programme, was Mr. Koussevitzky in one of his one-track interpretations. This is Beethoven in his lightest and most scherzando of symphonic moods, but it is not the same mood from beginning to end, as Mr. Koussevitsky would have had us believe. Moreover, there is no necessity for converting the first movement into a concerto for kettle drum. And, altogether, noise is not joyousness.

The remainder of the even wa en up

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS BRILLIANT CONDUCTOR

While a perfect torrent of music poured forth upon them, now checked, now released, by the magic baton of Serge Koussevitzky, an audience which practically filled Woolsey hall sat enthralled by the performance of the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening. There was more than the usual excitement in the coming here of the orchestra because last evening Koussevitzky, the brilliant Russian conductor, made his first appearance in New Haven. A man of medium stature, of a rather powerful build, he controls the 107 members of the orchestra with a vigorous strength of will that is manifested in his large pale face, set off by an abundance of thick, black hair. He extracts the last tiny drop of tonal beauty from the instruments as only a master can—the result being a perfect work, of such beauty that only those who are truly musicianly may understand it. A slight change in the program made the orchestra render three movements from Vivaldi's "Concerto in E Minor" for string orchestra, edited by A. Mistovski, instead of Gaillliard's "Sonata in G Major". The symphony of the program was Beethoven's Eighth, in F major, one of the few works of lighter vein of this master of the tone poem. Its vivacious beauty, entwined with a whimsical vein, was marvelously brought out under the skilful guidance of Koussevitzky's n and the four movements were much too soon for those who sat enrapt through their rendition. While one concedes that the works of the masters on the program stand out as rich embroidery on a rare old tapestry, an unusual thread in this tapestry of tone and harmony was the introduction of a modern, Ernest Bloch, who, born in Switzerland, now resides in San Francisco.

Bloch's group, Danse, Rite and Cortege Funebre, injected a most singular note into the program and one went from the hall, it was not so much of Bethooven and Wagner that one heard, but of the exotic harmony and mystical beauty that Bloch has woven into his symbolic poems. The "Danse" was a languorous dance of the Orient, weird harmonies blending with unusual string effects. Something almost forboding, hinting of the sorrows and the humiliation of the Jewish race, was poignant in "The Rite" and in the final poem, "Cortege Funebre," one felt the throb of pain of losing a beloved one, of the utter hopelessness at the thought of parting forever, and finally the quiet peace that comes with faith and time. So wonderfully living did these poems become under the magic touch of Koussevitzky that at their conclusion there was a deep hush—for a moment—broken then by a storm of applause. And Koussevitzky turned his back on the people and walked among his musicians, vigorously mopping his brow, but in a minute he was back in his place, making still little bows and smiling

Dignified, majestic Wagnerian

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

MAR 11 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

There will be no dull moments at the Boston Symphony concert in this City March 25. Serge Koussevitzky, the new Boston Symphony conductor, does not permit dull moments. Koussevitzky, in the words of Olin Downes, the distinguished critic of the New York Times, "is endowed with a temperament that can on occasion sweep everything before it. There is an authority, a quenchless enthusiasm and a big sweep in all that he does which if he were less sincere and individual as a musician than he is would be a compelling force for public success."—Advertisement.

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

MAR 11 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

By birth Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whom Portland will see for the first time March 25, is a Russian.

Mr. Koussevitzky is Russian, however, only by birth, by residence in his younger years, and by early practice of his profession. As soon as he rose in this profession he became cosmopolitan and an individualis He has traversed the concert hal of Europe from Moscow to Madri When Russia became a troubl dwelling place he transferred hi self to Paris. Thence and from Lo don in equal measure his renown spread through the western wo As a cosmopolitan conductor Kous vitzky takes first rank in these d And not only is he a cosmopoli but he has the traits which be expected from a cosmopo training. He is a classicist, roma cist and modernist justly and cerningly fused.—Adv.

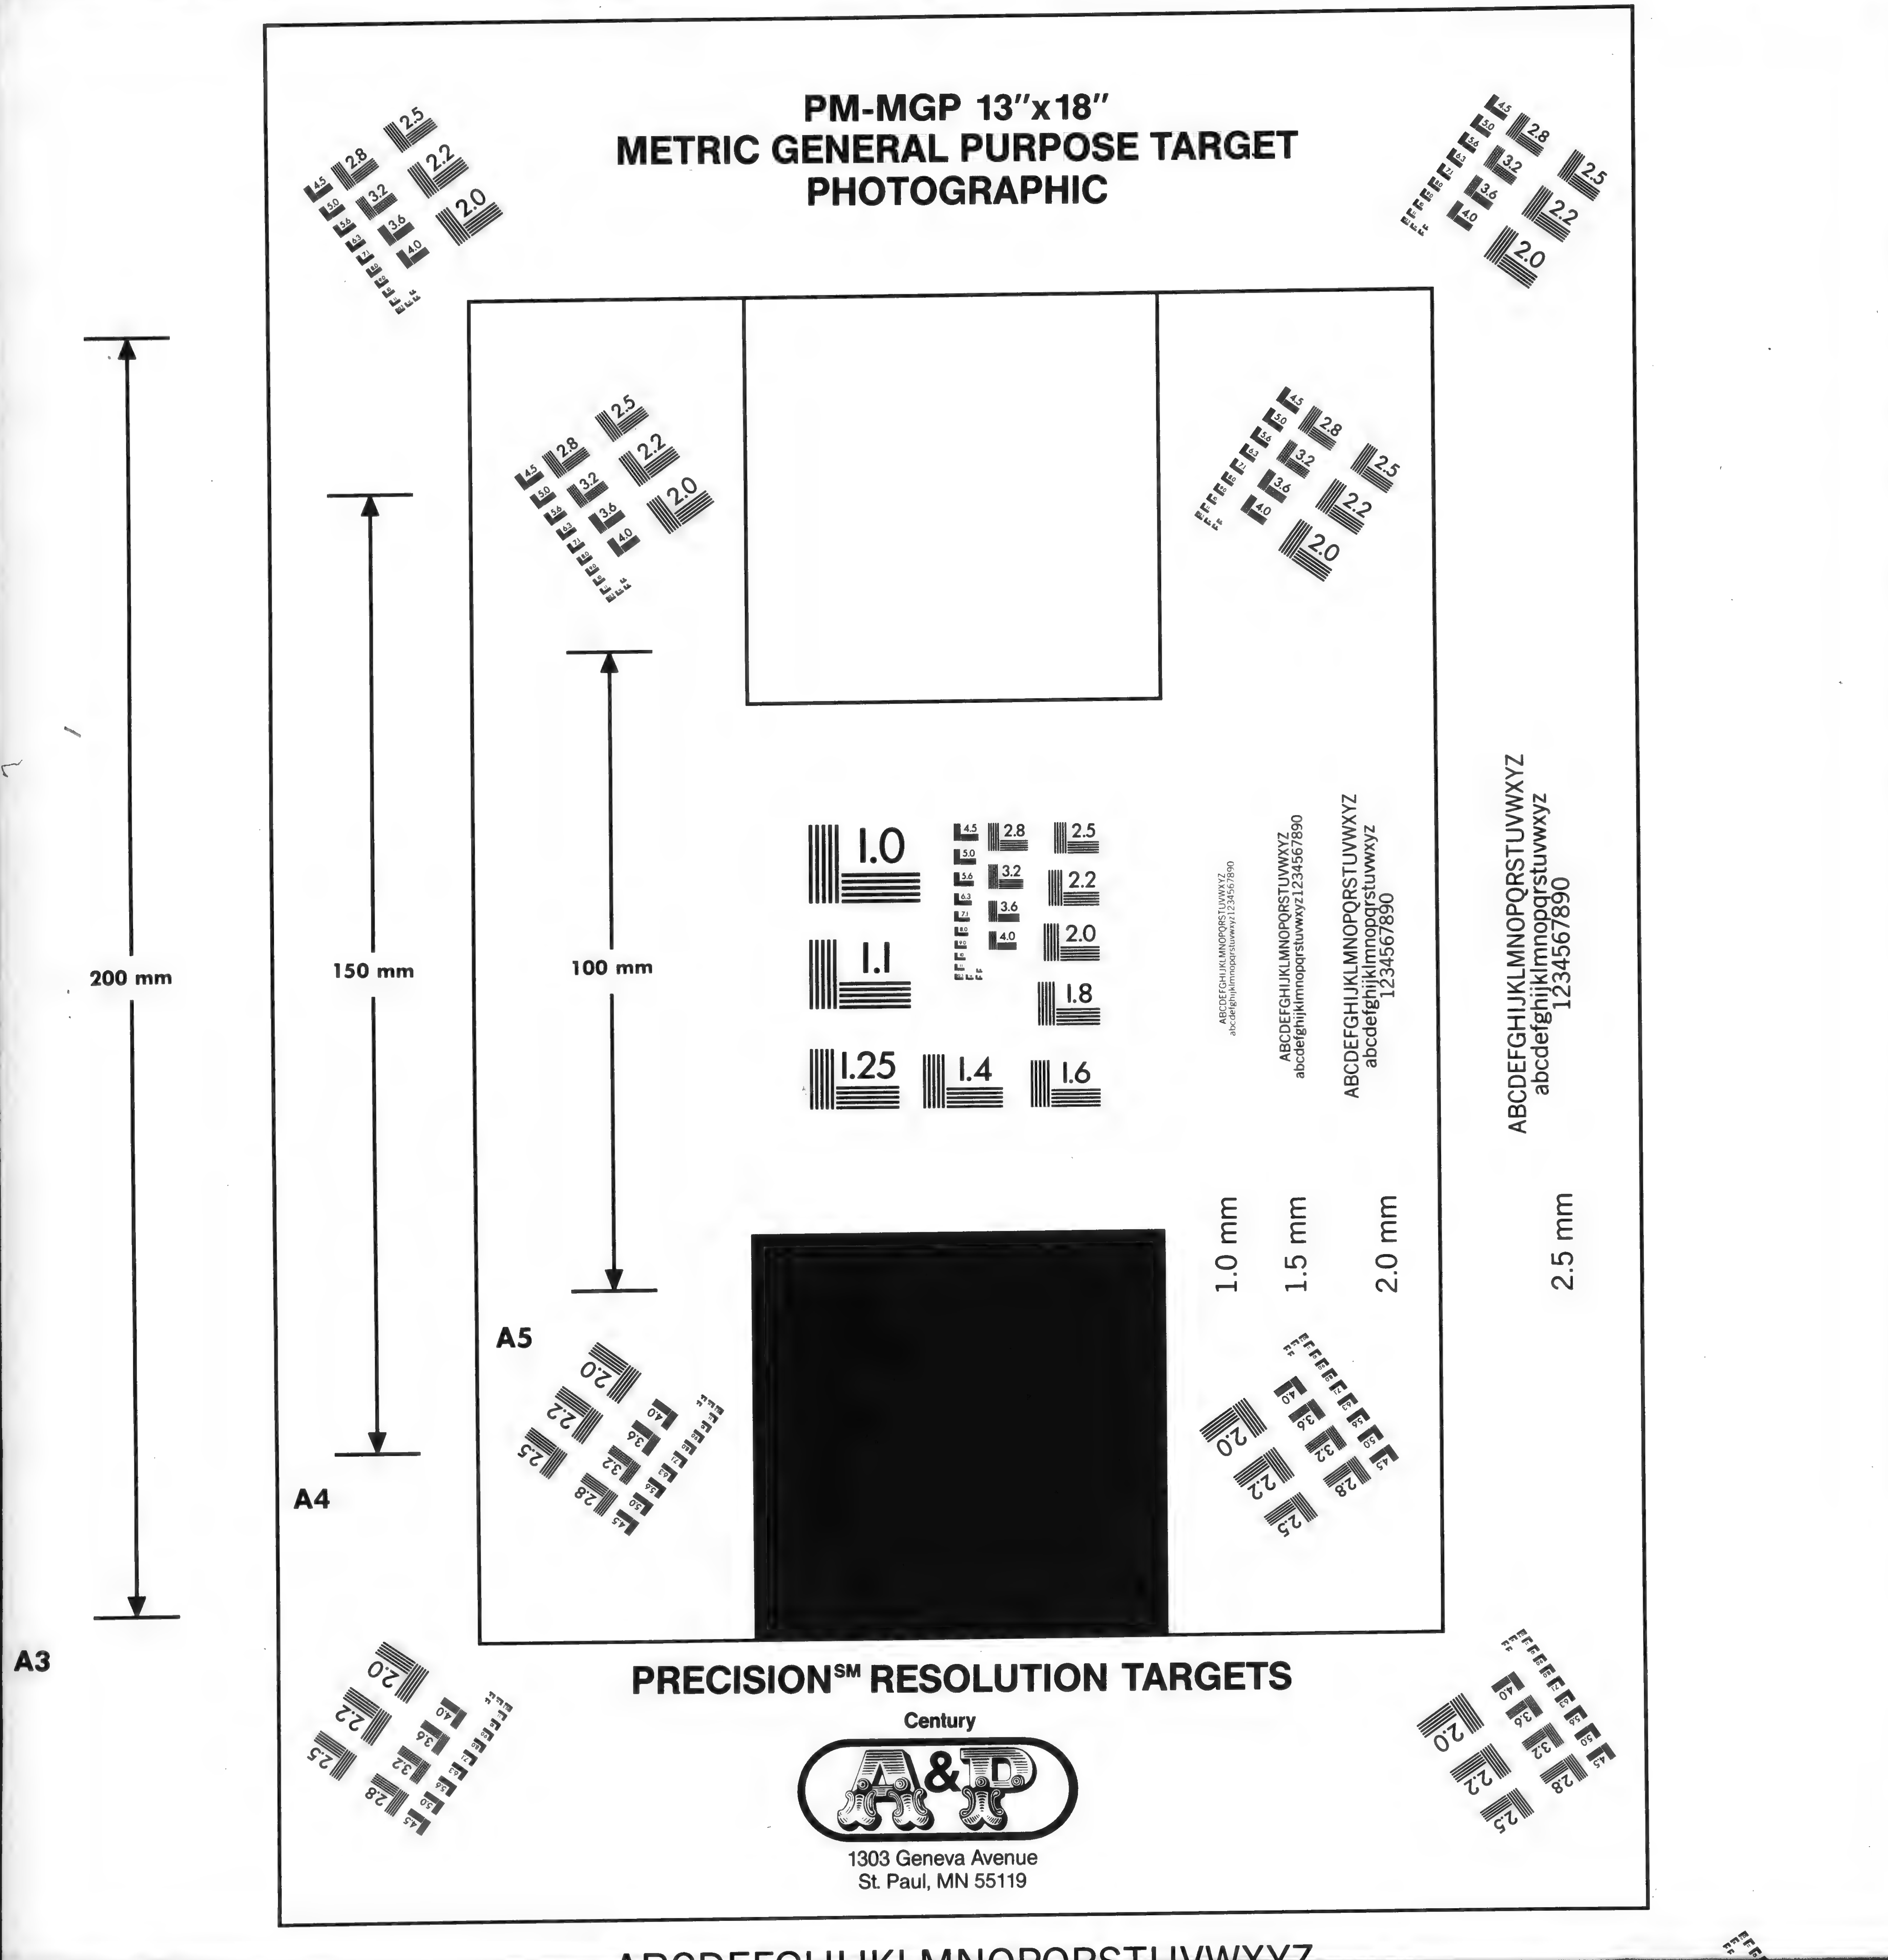
ELM THEATER

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

190

Boston Symphony Concert

Audience Cheers Kussevitzsky and Great Orchestra Following Thrilling Program at Woolsey Hall. Wide Contrast In Numbers Displays Excellence of Organizations

Vivaldi, concerto in E minor for string orchestra; Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, F major; Bloch, Three Jewish Poems; Wagner, Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde;' Wagner, prelude to "Meistersinger."

For the closing concert of the Steinert series, the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Woolsey Hall last evening and New Haven had its first opportunity to hear it perform under the baton of Serge Koussewitzy a program of novel and familiar music ranging from Beethoven to Bloch. The evening was one of rare excellence in performance

so as an extra period in a hockey game. The best of the three was the "Funeral Cortege." The minor cadencis in the brass and wood wind creating a perfect tone picture. The composition must demand super human endeavor at rehearsal and the applause last night was for masterly conquest of numberless techincal and total difficulties by the orchestra and superb direction and control by the conductor.

After the bizarre effects of the Block suite the sonorous progressions of, Wagner came as a tonic. Here the orchestrda attained its height for the evening. The magnificent appeal of the tremendous, C major theme in initial period of the Meistusangers, after the tragic tenderness of the love death, led through that marvel of Counterpoint which culminates in the tremendous finale. Some time ago this chronicler had something to say about omission of Wagner from programs. After hearing the manner in which the two compositions were played last night, he takes it all back. The way M. Korissevitzky conducted the two was electrifying in the effects gained from his orchestra. There was sonority, there was sardonic irony.

There was interplay of theme against theme ever apparent and never clouded or neglected so that the reviewd, soothr by Beethoven and stirred by Bloeh, is apt to use all the superlatives he has. But when audience at symphony concert in New Haven mingles shouts of praises with the patter of hands, somebody besides the reviewer must be stirred out of himself. That

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

MAR 12 1926

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky brought his players from Boston to Carnegie Hall last night with the following program:

Eighth symphony	Beethoven
Symphonic piece (new)	H. F. Gilbert
Three Jewish poems	Ernest Bloch
Suite 2, "Daphnis et Chloe"	Ravel

Just Music

Fashions in music are apt nowadays to change as rapidly as Parisian models. Yesterday people wrote only program music and took the greatest pains to let the audience in on the program. To-day there is a rush for absolute music, and the composers, instead of writing long perorations on what the music is supposed to represent, write equally long perorations telling the audience that their music represents nothing.

Mr. Harry F. Gilbert, whose new "Symphonic Piece" had its first performance in New York at the Boston Orchestra's concert last night at Carnegie Hall, assures us in a note in the program that he didn't want his new piece to mean one thing or another. His only desire, he pleads, was to write American music, which he takes to be music that will contain some of the national ingredients—vulgarity, vitality and an immense optimism. These Mr. Gilbert poked about with an ordinary symphonic stick. But the hearer is to take the result on its merits as music just as he would listen to, let us say, "Quartet in B flat" by Tom Jones.

Nevertheless, Mr. Gilbert's "Symphonic Piece," for all its creator's denials, does sound like program music. The themes, if not actually Negro in origin, are unmistakable imitations of Negro tunes and rhythms, not of the blues and jazzy variety, but of the older, more leisurely syncopated kind. There is plenty of what Mr. Gilbert calls the "Hurrah" quality, but the vitality and optimism must be taken on faith.

But the thing that struck me most was the presence of a program in Mr. Gilbert's musical story; and the fact that the composer disclaimed the idea made one more determined to discover it. For surely the crashing beginning must have meant something, and the various alarums and excursions were put there for a purpose. Listened to as just music—symphonic music—Mr. Gilbert's piece seems diffuse and disjointed, with no particular raison d'etre. But if it is all about something definite it is cruel of Mr. Gilbert to hold us in suspense.

Mr. Bloch, whose three Jewish poems were also played last night, is equally reticent about the contents of his music. There is more behind the Dance, the Rites and the Funeral Procession than he wants us to know. But in Mr. Bloch's case it is not so important to know, because the Jewish composer writes with a flaming passion that needs no elucidation. What he writes is often vague and groping and too esoteric for a general comprehension, but he is always intense and sometimes, as in parts of the Funeral Procession, heart-rendingly poignant. Even so there is always the suspicion that the musical texture is considerably diluted with non-musical thought and idea—in short, that it too is in a sense program music.

The orchestra began with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and finished with excerpts from Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe.

Mr. Gilbert's piece was received by the large audience with many evidences of appreciation and the composer came on the stage repeatedly to bow. Mr. Bloch's three pieces were received reverentially—not, I am afraid, with the detachment the composer would have liked.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROGRAM

A notable program will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra when this world-famous assemblage of 108 musicians visits New Haven for a concert in Woolsey Hall, Wednesday evening at 8:15. This will be an event of the first musical importance since Serge Koussevitzky, the great Russian conductor who is regarded as one of the very finest living, will make his first bow in this city. The symphony of the program will be Beethoven's Eight in F major, one of the most delightfully melodious and humorous of this composer's works. This will be introduced by a Concerto in E minor for string orchestra by Vivaldi, the 17th century composer, which has been arranged by Mistovski; a modern score of much musical importance will be the Three Jewish Poems of Ernest Bloch. They are entitled Dance, Rite, and Funeral Procession. The closing numbers will be two excerpts from the Wagnerian music dramas—the Prelude and Love-death from "Tristan and Isolde," and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of

---

Boston Symphony Makes Its Third Visit Here

Music lovers of Brooklyn turned out in goodly numbers last night to greet the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its fourth and next to last visit of the season. Serge Koussevitsky wielded the baton in his customary able manner. The program was exceptionally varied and there was something that every hearer could appreciate.

Classic music was heard when Vivaldi's Concerto in E minor for string orchestra was presented as the opening number. It was ably given. The most thoroughly enjoyable piece of the evening, Hahdn's Symphony in G major, followed. It was superbly played and its dainty, delightful, tripping measures started the applause of the evening.

Strangely enough there was even more enthusiasm for the three dances from the ballet, "The Three-Cornered

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

* * *

Unusual importance was attached in New York this week to the first performance of a new "Symphonic" piece by Henry F. Gilbert at the hands of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Sergey Koussevitsky. Mr. Gilbert stands to-day as one of the most original and independent figures among contemporaneous American composers. He was born in Somerville, Mass., and was the first American pupil of Edward MacDowell. He first became a national figure in musical circles in 1911 when the Boston orchestra played his "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes." His Negro Rhapsody" was given at the Norfolk festival in 1913, when he was present in person and directed the work. Others of his compositions have also received much favorable comment.

* * *

Telling the World

By NEAL O'HARA

Copyright, 1926, by Press Publishing Co.

The latest novelty of the season is Serge Koussevitzky. Serge Koussevitzky is not a suit. He is conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last week Brown University conferred on him an honorary degree. M. Koussevitzky did not want to make a speech of appreciation, so he gave them a recital on his bass viol. The concert went over big.

Roy Chapman Andrews, the archaeologist-explorer, received a degree at the same time. We do not know if he made a speech. But we presume he promised the Brown Museum a dozen dinosaur eggs.

This innovation gives our colleges something to think about. Commencement exercises need not be boresome hereafter. Not if the faculty uses its bean in distributing honorary degrees.

We cannot think of anything nicer than John McCormack, LL. D., saying it with music, Fritz Kreisler, Ph. D., acknowledging it on his violin or Paderewski, Litt. D., uttering his thanks on the ivory keys.

It is understood Paul Whiteman has been offered an LL. D. by more than a dozen universities. But he is holding out for thirty-six additional Ph. D. for his men.

M. Koussevitzky, who is responsible for this innovation is handicapped by playing only on the bass viol. colleges want to give him degrees next June. But on freight and haulage charges asked them to wait till he the piccolo.

The idea is too good however. For years guys Hughes and Hoover have off the honorary titles and back was a line of talk. as the colleges will tainment besides looking

---

Symphony Orchestra, one of the foremost orchestral organizations in the country today. The great body of one hundred and seven selected musicians will be under the personal leadership of Serge Koussevitszky, the brilliant Russian conductor who has brought the Boston Symphony to the highest point of its artistic career in the short space o fone year. Mr. Koussevitzky makes his first bow before a local audience tonight, thus the event is of little importance in musical circles throughout this vicinity.

Tonights concert will mark the fifth of the Steinert Concert Series for the season of 1925-6, under the auspices of the Yale School of Music. A brilliant program has been arranged especially for the occassion, in fact it is doubtful if a symphony program has ever been heard in this city of such all around cellence and appeal. Following is the list of numbers and the order in which they will be rendered, the first commencing promptly at 8:15:

Vivaldi

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE

MAR 9 1926

MR. KOUSSEWITSKY and his Boston Symphony Orchestra have only a single visit to pay the Academy of Music this season (following their concert in Brooklyn last evening) and another orchestral year will have come to an end. But I feel that it would not be a difficult assignment to prophesy about what Mr. Koussewitsky's program will be on that not distant date. Boston Symphony programs since the eminent and well-tailored Russian took over the baton have run on formula—or, rather, on formulae. The first is the program with the popular symphony as its major point, the classic overture and the pseudo-modern suite as its fillers. The second is the classic concerto, the classic symphony, the pseudo-modern (or on occasion, the bona-fide modern) work and the Wagnerian excerpt.

Last evening Mr. Koussewitsky promulgated the latter variety. During the early part of the evening he revealed his talents as a conductor of Vivaldi and Haydn (both composers seem specially marked for Mr. Koussewitsky's favor), and after the intermission he became the apologetic modernist and the Perfect Wagnerite: he played the popular suite from De Falla's "Three Cornered Hat" and the most familiar of excerpts from "Tristan" and "Meistersinger."

It is not easy to explain the popularity of the De Falla suite. Here is music lacking in all the elements that are supposed to make music popular. The dances of the "Three Cornered Hat" are not melodically interesting, harmonically daring or rhythmically salient. They are merely Spanish music of indifferent charm, well but not brilliantly orchestrated. Yet conductors—and audiences, too it would seem—have smiled upon them the smile os lasting favor. Mr. Koussewitsky made much of them.

The Wagnerian excerpts were also meritoriously done. Of the first pages of the "Tristan" Prelude Mr. Koussewitsky gave a really inspired reading. But he became less interesting as the piece advanced and under his hands the great climax lacked propulsive force. The "Meistersinger" Overture was admirably projected except for occasional and uncalled for retardandos in the two climaxes of the work.

There are signs that the Boston Orchestra is itself deteriorating. The playing is frequently ragged, the instrumental tone neither secure nor of especially good quality. Mr. Koussewitsky might look up from his scores for a moment and listen to what his men are doing.

FROM
TIZEN

would be the first to write some real American music. Only no one did expect it, including this particular horizon-gazer. But Henry F. Gilbert's modesty titled "Symphonic Piece," played here last night for the first time by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, is the only distinctively American music for the symphonic band that we know anything about.

It isn't jazz, either straight or the softdrink concoction the jazzologists have been serving when goaded into one of their mild symphonic sprees; it isn't the music of the negro or of the Indian doctored up by the white man; and it isn't the German small beer that some other New Englanders have been brewing like so many Brahmsianer, the flavorless dilutions booted from Paris by the gentlemen Chicago and points southeast. music that is American because it consciously (but not self-consciously) reflects the American or some part of it, in a zably American fashion. It ne of the urge and flamboyancy of the go-getter in it, something of vulgarity, something of sentimentality. Mr. Gilbert quite joyously acknowledges that. It is rushy, hell-bent-for-election stuff, with a touch of nervous jazziness here and there and a large dash of the vulgarity tearful which is excellent Broadway.

But the thing is put together by a musician who knows what he is doing all the way. He handles his instrumentation so that it fits his expressive needs. His development of his thematic material is adroit and deep-breathed. The only weakness of the piece is that it is too long-winded. But even so, it is worth a couple of dozen Carpenter "Skyscrapers" and a bushel of Chadwickian Loefflerisms.

The great length of the piece is the only un-American aspect it has. Poe—an American—long ago said there was no such thing as a long poem (and Whitman, the professional American, hasn't disproved it). Equally, there can be on such thing as a long American symphony. But Mr. Gilbert can easily delete. His "Symphonic Piece" is intended as the first movement of a complete symphonic work and is therefore probably not yet in its final form. He should feel tremendously encouraged to create the rest of what he has in mind.

Mr. Koussevitsky, for a Russian, and an alien, gave a splendidly virile and comprehending performance of this music. We could imagine Paul Whiteman, perhaps, doing it better, even though it isn't in the language of his band. But Mr. Koussevitsky got well under its skin and the orchestra gave a virtuoso account of it.

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, which preceded the Gilbert piece on last night's programme, was Mr. Koussevitzky in one of his one-track interpretations. This is Beethoven in his lightest and most scherzando of symphonic moods, but it is not the same mood from beginning to end, as Mr. Koussevitsky would have had us believe. Moreover, there is no necessity for converting the first movement into a concerto for kettle drum. And, altogether, noise is not joyousness.

The remainder of the evening was taken up with

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

MAR 11 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

There will be no dull moments at the Boston Symphony concert in this City March 25. Serge Koussevitzky, the new Boston Symphony conductor, does not permit dull moments. Koussevitzky, in the words of Olin Downes, the distinguished critic of the New York Times, "is endowed with a temperament that can on occasion sweep everything before it. There is an authority, a quenchless enthusiasm and a big sweep in all that he does which if he were less sincere and individual as a musician than he is would be a compelling force for public success."—Advertisement.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN
Journal - Courier

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS BRILLIANT CONDUCTOR

While a perfect torrent of music poured forth upon them, now checked, now released, by the magic baton of Serge Koussevitzky, an audience which practically filled Woolsey hall sat enthralled by the performance of the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening. There was more than the usual excitement in the coming here of the orchestra because last evening Koussevitzky, the brilliant Russian conductor, made his first appearance in New Haven. A man of medium stature, of a rather powerful build, he controls the 107 members of the orchestra with a vigorous strength of will that is manifested in his large pale face, set off by an abundance of thick, black hair. He extracts the last tiny drop of tonal beauty from the instruments as only a master can—the result being a perfect work, of such beauty that only those who are truly musicianly may understand it. A slight change in the program made the orchestra render three movements from Vivaldi's "Concerto in E Minor" for string orchestra, edited by A. Mistovski, instead of Gailliard's "Sonata in G Major". The symphony of the program was Beethoven's Eighth, in F major, one of the few works of lighter vein of this master of the tone poem. Its vivacious beauty, entwined with a whimsical vein, was marvelously brought out under the skilful guidance of Koussevitzky's baton and the four movements were over much too soon for those who had sat enrapt through their rendition. While one concedes that the works of the masters on the program stand out as rich embroidery on a rare old tapestry, an unusual thread in this tapestry of tone and harmony was the introduction of a modern, Ernest Bloch, who, born in Switzerland, now resides in San Francisco.

Bloch's group, Danse, Rite and Cortege Funebre, injected a most singular note into the program and one went from the hall, it was not so much of Bethooven and Wagner that one heard, but of the exotic harmony and mystical beauty that Bloch has woven into his symbolic poems. The "Danse" was a languorous dance of the Orient, weird harmonies blending with unusual string effects. Something almost forboding, hinting of the sorrows and the humiliation of the Jewish race, was poignant in "The Rite" and in the final poem, "Cortege Funebre," one felt the throb of pain of losing a beloved one, of the utter hopelessness at the thought of parting forever, and finally the quiet peace that comes with faith and time. So wonderfully living did these poems become under the magic touch of Koussevitzky that at their conclusion there was a deep hush—for a moment—broken then by a storm of applause. And Koussevitzky turned his back on the people and walked among his musicians, vigorously mopping his brow, but in a minute he was back in his place, making stiff little bows and smiling.

Dignified, majestic Wagnerian

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

MAR 11 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

By birth Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whom Portland will see for the first time March 25, is a Russian.

Mr. Koussevitzky is Russian, however, only by birth, by residence in his younger years, and by early practice of his profession. As soon as he rose in this profession he became a cosmopolitan and an individualist. He has traversed the concert halls of Europe from Moscow to Madrid. When Russia became a troubled dwelling place he transferred himself to Paris. Thence and from London in equal measure his renown spread through the western world. As a cosmopolitan conductor Koussevitzky takes first rank in these days. And not only is he a cosmopolitan but he has the traits which may be expected from a cosmopolitan training. He is a classicist, romanticist and modernist justly and discerningly fused.—Adv.

ELM THEATER

cert went over big.
Andrews, the arch-
received a degree at Ve do not know if he t we presume he prom-
Museum a dozen dino-gives our colleges

k about. Commence-need not be boresome
the faculty uses its
g honorary degrees.

nk of anything nicer

than John McCormack, LL. D., saying it with music, Fritz Kreisler, Ph. D., acknowledging it on his violin or Paderewski, Litt. D., uttering his thanks on the ivory keys.

It is understood Paul Whiteman has been offered an LL. D. by more than a dozen universities. But he is holding out for thirty-six additional Ph. D. for his men.

M. Koussevitzky, who is responsible for this innovation is handicapped by playing on college grees freigh asked the p

The
howev
Hugh off th back as if tainn

y on the bass viol. Several other want to give him honorary de-next June. But on account of and haulage charges he has them to wait till he has mastered ccolo.

idea is too good to be dropped,
er. For years guys like Borah, es and Hoover have been picking e honorary titles and all they gave was a line of talk. Now it looks the colleges will get a little enter-ent besides looking at whiskers and must be mencemen

orary deg

Here is prising c a degree something

This ho be exclu possibiliti
It would

some speec at these co ts, give Will Rogers the honrees.

also a chance for some enterollege to give Mellie Dunham of LL. D. or Fiddle-Dee-Dee or like that.

norary title business need not ively for men. Think of the s among the opera warblers.
be lovely to bestow one on

T ori get
He
of ant utes cha

F flag

n. And give her the choice or taking a sun bath.

he possibilities are enormous for hon-ng drawing cards. Imagine Houdini ting an honorary Litt. D, at Harvard.
could wear a straightjacket instead flowing academic robes. And guaree to wiggle out of it in three mins or forfeit his degree to some local rity.

or an encore Houdini could take the s of all nations and half a dozen rabbits out of his mortarboard cap.

Then Peggy Joyce is certainly entitled to a degree of S. B.—Some Blonde.

In bestowing academic honors, don't overlook Ben Turpin, either Ben has contributed to the field of education. He discovered the language of crossing his eyes and dotting his T's.

Yes, commencements will be worth going to if they follow Koussevitzky's example, In fact the college campus will be in the hands of the ticket speculators.

---

be er first to write some music. Only no one including this par-
-ga.er. But Henry odesty titled "Sym-
' played here last
first time by Serge
and the Boston Or-rnegie Hall, is the ely American music
ionic band that we
g about.
, either straight or concoction the jazz-been serving when
e of their mild sym-it isn't the music of the Indian doctored te man; and it isn't mall beer that some glanders have been many Brahmsianer, less dilutions boot-
ris by the gentlemen
and points southeast.
hat is American be-iously (but not self-eflects the American e part of it, in a merican fashion. It
e urge and flamboyo-getter in it, somearity, something of
Mr. Gilbert quite wledges that. It is nt-for-election stuff,
of nervous jazziness
and a large dash of earful which is ex-
ay.
g is put together by o knows what he is
way. He handles his n so that it fits his
ds. His development
ic material is adroit
hed. The only weakiece is that it is too
But even so, it is e of dozen Carpenter and a bushel of oefflerisms.
ength of the piece is merican aspect it has,
rican—long ago said
such thing as a long Whitman, the profes-can, hasn't disproved
there can be on such American symphony.
rt can easily delete.
ic Piece" is intended movement of a comic work and is there-not yet in its final uld feel tremendously
o create the rest of n mind.
vitsky, for a Russian,
, gave a splendidly
mprehending perform-music. We could imhiteman, perhaps, do-even though it isn't ge of his band. But sky got well under its e orchestra gave a unt of it.
Eighth Symphony,
ed the Gilbert piece
programme, was Mr.
in one of his onetations. This is Beets lightest and most of symphonic moods,
the same mood from end, as Mr. Kousse-
have had us believe.
ere is no necessity for e first movement into or kettle drum. And,
oise is not joyousness.
der of the eve[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS BRILLIANT CONDUCTOR

While a perfect torrent of music poured forth upon them, now checked, now released, by the magic baton of Serge Koussevitzky, an audience which practically filled Woolsey hall sat enthralled by the performance of the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening. There was more than the usual excitement in the coming here of the orchestra because last evening Koussevitzky, the brilliant Russian conductor, made his first appearance in New Haven. A man of medium stature, of a rather powerful build, he controls the 107 members of the orchestra with a vigorous strength of will that is manifested in his large pale face, set off by an abundance of thick, black hair. He extracts the last tiny drop of tonal beauty from the instruments as only a master can—the result being a perfect work, of such beauty that only those who are truly musicianly may understand it. A slight change in the program made the orchestra render three movements from Vivaldi's "Concerto in E Minor" for string orchestra, edited by A. Mistovski, instead of Gailliard's "Sonata in G Major". The symphony of the program was Beethoven's Eighth, in F major, one of the few works of lighter vein of this master of the tone poem. Its vivacious beauty, entwined with a whimsical vein, was marvelously brought out under the skilful guidance of Koussevitzky's baton and the four movements were over much too soon for those who had sat enrapt through their rendition. While one concedes that the works of the masters on the program stand out as rich embroidery on a rare old tapestry, an unusual thread in this tapestry of tone and harmony was the introduction of a modern, Ernest Bloch, who, born in Switzerland, now resides in San Francisco.

Bloch's group, Danse, Rite and Cortege Funebre, injected a most singular note into the program and one went from the hall, it was not so much of Bethooven and Wagner that one heard, but of the exotic harmony and mystical beauty that Bloch has woven into his symbolic poems. The "Danse" was a languorous dance of the Orient, weird harmonies blending with unusual string effects. Something almost forboding, hinting of the sorrows and the humiliation of the Jewish race, was poignant in "The Rite" and in the final poem, "Cortege Funebre," one felt the throb of pain of losing a beloved one, of the utter hopelessness at the thought of parting forever, and finally the quiet peace that comes with faith and time. So wonderfully living did these poems become under the magic touch of Koussevitzky that at their conclusion there was a deep hush—for a moment—broken then by a storm of applause. And Koussevitzky turned his back on the people and walked among his musicians, vigorously mopping his brow, but in a minute he was back in his place, making stiff little bows and smiling.

Dignified, majestic Wagnerian

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

[illegible] 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

be no dull moments at Symphony concert in this
25. Serge Koussevitzky, ston Symphony conduct permit dull moments.
y, in the words of Olin
e distinguished critic of ork Times, "is endowed perament that can on oc-
p everything before it.
authority, a quenchless and a big sweep in all s which if he were less individual as a musician would be a compelling public success."—Adver-

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

MAR 11 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

By birth Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whom Portland will see for the first time March 25, is a Russian.

Mr. Koussevitzky is Russian, however, only by birth, by residence in his younger years, and by early practice of his profession. As soon as he rose in this profession he became a cosmopolitan and an individualist. He has traversed the concert halls of Europe from Moscow to Madrid. When Russia became a troubled dwelling place he transferred himself to Paris. Thence and from London in equal measure his renown has spread through the western world. As a cosmopolitan conductor Koussevitzky takes first rank in these days. And not only is he a cosmopolitan but he has the traits which might be expected from a cosmopolitan training. He is a classicist, roma cist and modernist justly and discerningly fused.—Adv.

ELM THEATER

190

MAR 1 1 1926

Boston Symphony Concert

Audience Cheers Kussevitzsky and Great Orchestra Following Thrilling Program at Woolsey Hall. Wide Contrast In Numbers Displays Excellence of Organizations

Vivaldi, concerto in E minor for string orchestra; Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, F major; Bloch, Three Jewish Poems; Wagner, Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde;' Wagner, prelude to "Meistersinger."

For the closing concert of the Steinert series, the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Woolsey Hall last evening and New Haven had its first opportunity to hear it perform under the baton of Serge Koussewitzy a program of novel and familiar music ranging from Beethoven to Bloch. The evening was one of rare excellence in performance

so as an extra period in a hockey game. The best of the three was the "Funeral Cortege." The minor cadencis in the brass and wood wind creating a perfect tone picture. The composition must demand super human endeavor at rehearsal and the applause last night was for masterly conquest of numberless techincal and total difficulties by the orchestra and superb direction and control by the conductor.

After the bizarre effects of the Block suite the sonorous progressions of, Wagner came as a tonic. Here the orchestrda attained its height for the evening. The magnificent appeal of the tremendous, C major theme in initial period of the Meistusangers, after the tragic tenderness of the love death, led through that marvel of Counterpoint which culminates in the tremendous finale. Some time ago this chronicler had something to say about omission of Wagner from programs. After hearing the manner in which the two compositions were played last night, he takes it all back. The way M. Korissevitzky conducted the two was electrifying in the effects gained from his orchestra. There was sonority, there was sardonic irony.

There was interplay of theme against theme ever apparent and never clouded or neglected so that the reviewd, soothr by Beethoven and stirred by Bloeh, is apt to use all the superlatives he has. But when audience at symphony concert in New Haven mingles shouts of praises with the patter of hands, somebody besides the reviewer must be stirred out of himself. That

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

MAR 1 2 1926

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky brought his players from Boston to Carnegie Hall last night with the following program:

Eighth symphony	Beethoven
Symphonic piece (new)	H. F. Gilbert
Three Jewish poems	Ernest Bloch
Suite 2, "Daphnis and Chloe"	Ravel

Just Music

Fashions in music are apt nowadays to change as rapidly as Parisian models. Yesterday people wrote only program music and took the greatest pains to let the audience in on the program. To-day there is a rush for absolute music, and the composers, instead of writing long perorations on what the music is supposed to represent, write equally long perorations telling the audience that their music represents nothing.

Mr. Harry F. Gilbert, whose new "Symphonic Piece" had its first performance in New York at the Boston Orchestra's concert last night at Carnegie Hall, assures us in a note in the program that he didn't want his new piece to mean one thing or another. His only desire, he pleads, was to write American music, which he takes to be music that will contain some of the national ingredients—vulgarity, vitality and an immense optimism. These Mr. Gilbert poked about with an ordinary symphonic stick. But the hearer is to take the result on its merits as music just as he would listen to, let us say, "Quartet in B flat" by Tom Jones.

Nevertheless, Mr. Gilbert's "Symphonic Piece," for all its creator's denials, does sound like program music. The themes, if not actually Negro in origin, are unmistakable imitations of Negro tunes and rhythms, not of the blues and jazzy variety, but of the older, more leisurely syncopated kind. There is plenty of what Mr. Gilbert calls the "Hurrah" quality, but the vitality and optimism must be taken on faith.

But the thing that struck me most was the presence of a program in Mr. Gilbert's musical story; and the fact that the composer disclaimed the idea made one more determined to discover it. For surely the crashing beginning must have meant something, and the various alarums and excursions were put there for a purpose. Listened to as just music—symphonic music—Mr. Gilbert's piece seems diffuse and disjointed, with no particular raison d'etre. But if it is all about something definite it is cruel of Mr. Gilbert to hold us in suspense.

Mr. Bloch, whose three Jewish poems were also played last night, is equally reticent about the contents of his music. There is more behind the Dance, the Rites and the Funeral Procession than he wants us to know. But in Mr. Bloch's case it is not so important to know, because the Jewish composer writes with a flaming passion that needs no elucidation. What he writes is often vague and groping and too esoteric for a general comprehension, but he is always intense and sometimes, as in parts of the Funeral Procession, heart-rendingly poignant. Even so there is always the suspicion that the musical texture is considerably diluted with non-musical thought and idea—in short, that it is in a sense program music.

The orchestra began with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and finished with excerpts from Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe.

Mr. Gilbert's piece was received by the large audience with many evidences of appreciation and the composer came on the stage repeatedly to bow. Mr. Bloch's three pieces were reverentially—not, I am afraid, he detachment the composer e liked.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MAR 8

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROGRAM

A notable progrem will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra when this world-famous assemblage of 108 musicians visits New Haven for a concert in Woolsey Hall, Wednesday evening at 8:15. This will be an event of the first musical importance since Serge Koussevitzky, the great Russian conductor who is regarded as one of the very finest living, will make his first bow in this city. The symphony of the program will be Beethoven's Eight in F major, one of the most delightfully melodious and humorous of this composer's works. This will be introduced by a Concerto in E minor for string orchestra by Vivaldi, the 17th century composer, which has been arranged by Mistovski; a modern score of much musical importance will be the Three Jewish Poems of Ernest Bloch. They are entitled Dance, Rite, and Funeral Procession. The closing numbers will be two excerpts from the Wagnerian music dramas—the Prelude and Love-death from "Tristan and Isolde," and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of

---

Boston Symphony Makes Its Third Visit Here

Music lovers of Brooklyn turned out in goodly numbers last night to greet the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its fourth and next to last visit of the season. Serge Koussevitsky wielded the baton in his customary able manner. The program was exceptionally varied and there was something that every hearer could appreciate.

Classic music was heard when Vivaldi's Concerto in E minor for string orchestra was presented as the opening number. It was ably given. The most thoroughly enjoyable piece of the evening, Hahdn's Symphony in G major, followed. It was superbly played and its dainty, delightful, tripping measures started the applause of the evening.

Strangely enough there was even more enthusiasm for the three dances from the ballet, "The Three-Cornered

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

1 3 1926

Unusual importance was attached in New York this week to the first performance of a new "Symphonic" piece by Henry F. Gilbert at the hands of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Sergey Koussevitsky. Mr. Gilbert stands to-day as one of the most original and independent figures among contemporaneous American composers. He was born in Somerville, Mass., and was the first American pupil of Edward MacDowell. He first became a national figure in musical circles in 1911 when the Boston orchestra played his "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes." His Negro Rhapsody" was given at the Norfolk festival in 1913, when he was present in person and directed the work. Others of his compositions have also received much favorable comment.

Telling the World

By NEAL O'HARA

Copyright, 1926, by Press Publishing Co.

The latest novelty of the season is bass viol. The concert went over big.

Roy Chapman Andrews, the archaeologist-explorer, received a degree at the same time. We do not know if he made a speech. But we presume he promised the than John McCormack, LL. D., saying it with music, Fritz Kreisler, Ph. D., acknowledging it on his violin or Paderewski, Litt. D., uttering his thanks on the ivory keys.

It is understood Paul Whiteman has been offered an LL. D. by more than a dozen universities. But he is holding out for thirty-six additional Ph. D. for his men.

M. Koussevitzky, who is responsible for this innovation is handicapped by play-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MAR 1 0 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA APPEARS AT WOOLSEY HALL TONIGHT

A significant musical event will be presented to local music lovers this evening at Woolsey Hall, the occasion being the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the foremost orchestral organizations in the country today. The great body of one hundred and seven selected musicians will be under the personal leadership of Serge Koussevitszky, the brilliant Russian conductor who has brought the Boston Symphony to the highest point of its artistic career in the short space o fone year. Mr. Koussevitzky makes his first bow before a local audience tonight, thus the event is of little importance in musical circles throughout this vicinity.

Tonights concert will mark the fifth of the Steinert Concert Series for the season of 1925-6, under the auspices of the Yale School of Music. A brilliant program has been arranged especially for the occassion, in fact it is doubtful if a symphony program has ever been heard in this city of such all around cellence and appeal. Following is the list of numbers and the order in which they will be rendered, the first commencing promptly at 8:15:

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE

MAR 1 3 1926

MR. KOUSSEWITSKY and his Boston Symphony Orchestra have only a single visit to pay the Academy of Music this season (following their concert in Brooklyn last evening) and another orchestral year will have come to an end. But I feel that it would not be a difficult assignment to prophesy about what Mr. Koussewitsky's program will be on that not distant date. Boston Symphony programs since the eminent and well-tailored Russian took over the baton have run on formula—or, rather, on formulae. The first is the program with the popular symphony as its major point, the classic overture and the pseudo-modern suite as its fillers. The second is the classic concerto, the classic symphony, the pseudo-modern (or on occasion, the bona-fide modern) work and the Wagnerian excerpt.

Last evening Mr. Koussewitsky promulgated the latter variety. During the early part of the evening he revealed his talents as a conductor of Vivaldi and Haydn (both composers seem specially marked for Mr. Koussewitsky's favor), and after the intermission he became the apologetic modernist and the Perfect Wagnerite: he played the popular suite from De Falla's "Three Cornered Hat" and the most familiar of excerpts from "Tristan" and "Meistersinger."

It is not easy to explain the popularity of the De Falla suite. Here is music lacking in all the elements that are supposed to make music popular. The dances of the "Three Cornered Hat" are not melodically interesting, harmonically daring or rhythmically salient. They are merely Spanish music of indifferent charm, well but not brilliantly orchestrated. Yet conductors—and audiences, too it would seem—have smiled upon them the smile os lasting favor. Mr. Koussewitsky made much of them.

The Wagnerian excerpts were also meritoriously done. Of the first pages of the "Tristan" Prelude Mr. Koussewitsky gave a really inspired reading. But he became less interesting as the piece advanced and under his hands the great climax lacked propulsive force. The "Meistersinger" Overture was admirably projected except for occasional and uncalled for retardandos in the two climaxes of the work.

There are signs that the Boston Orchestra is itself deteriorating. The playing is frequently ragged, the instrumental tone neither secure nor of especially good quality. Mr. Koussewitsky might look up from his scores for a moment and listen to what his men are doing.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL

MAR 1 2 1926

Koussevitsky Plays a Piece Written in Real American

After all, it was probably to be expected that a New Englander would be the first to write some real American music. Only no one did expect it, including this particular horizon-gazer. But Henry F. Gilbert's modesty titled "Symphonic Piece," played here last night for the first time by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, is the only distinctively American music for the symphonic band that we know anything about.

It isn't jazz, either straight or the softdrink concoction the jazzologists have been serving when goaded into one of their mild symphonic sprees; it isn't the music of the negro or of the Indian doctored up by the white man; and it isn't the German small beer that some other New Englanders have been brewing like so many Brahmsianer, or the flavorless dilutions bootlegged from Paris by the gentlemen from Chicago and points southeast.

It is music that is American because it consciously (but not self-consciously) reflects the American spirit, or some part of it, in a recognizably American fashion. It has some of the urge and flamboyancy of the go-getter in it, something of vulgarity, something of sentimentality. Mr. Gilbert quite joyously acknowledges that. It is rushy, hell-bent-for-election stuff, with a touch of nervous jazziness here and there and a large dash of the vulgarity tearful which is excellent Broadway.

But the thing is put together by a musician who knows what he is doing all the way. He handles his instrumentation so that it fits his expressive needs. His development of his thematic material is adroit and deep-breathed. The only weakness of the piece is that it is too long-winded. But even so, it is worth a couple of dozen Carpenter "Skyscrapers" and a bushel of Chadwickian Loefflerisms.

The great length of the piece is the only un-American aspect it has. Poe—an American—long ago said there was no such thing as a long poem (and Whitman, the professional American, hasn't disproved it). Equally, there can be on such thing as a long American symphony. But Mr. Gilbert can easily delete. His "Symphonic Piece" is intended as the first movement of a complete symphonic work and is therefore probably not yet in its final form. He should feel tremendously encouraged to create the rest of what he has in mind.

Mr. Koussevitsky, for a Russian, and an alien, gave a splendidly virile and comprehending performance of this music. We could imagine Paul Whiteman, perhaps, doing it better, even though it isn't in the language of his band. But Mr. Koussevitsky got well under its skin and the orchestra gave a virtuoso account of it.

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, which preceded the Gilbert piece on last night's programme, was Mr. Koussevitzky in one of his one-track interpretations. This is Beethoven in his lightest and most scherzando of symphonic moods, but it is not the same mood from beginning to end, as Mr. Koussevitsky would have had us believe. Moreover, there is no necessity for converting the first movement into a concerto for kettle drum. And, altogether, noise is not joyousness.

The remainder of the

PORTLAND,
ME.
EXPRESS

MAR 1 1 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

There will be no dull moments at the Boston Symphony concert in this City March 25. Serge Koussevitzky, the new Boston Symphony conductor, does not permit dull moments. Koussevitzky, in the words of Olin Downes, the distinguished critic of the New York Times, "is endowed with a temperament that can on occasion sweep everything before it. There is an authority, a quenchless enthusiasm and a big sweep in all that he does which if he were less sincere and individual as a musician than he is would be a compelling force for public success."—Advertisement.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier

MAR 1 1 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS BRILLIANT CONDUCTOR

While a perfect torrent of music poured forth upon them, now checked, now released, by the magic baton of Serge Koussevitzky, an audience which practically filled Woolsey hall sat enthralled by the performance of the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening. There was more than the usual excitement in the coming here of the orchestra because last evening Koussevitzky, the brilliant Russian conductor, made his first appearance in New Haven. A man of medium stature, of a rather powerful build, he controls the 107 members of the orchestra with a vigorous strength of will that is manifested in his large pale face, set off by an abundance of thick, black hair. He extracts the last tiny drop of tonal beauty from the instruments as only a master can—the result being a perfect work, of such beauty that only those who are truly musicianly may understand it. A slight change in the program made the orchestra render three movements from Vivaldi's "Concerto in E Minor" for string orchestra, edited by A. Mistovski, instead of Gailliard's "Sonata in G Major". The symphony of the program was Beethoven's Eighth, in F major, one of the few works of lighter vein of this master of the tone poem. Its vivacious beauty, entwined with a whimsical vein, was marvelously brought out under the skilful guidance of Koussevitzky's baton and the four movements were over much too soon for those who had sat enrapt through their rendition. While one concedes that the works of the masters on the program stand out as rich embroidery on a rare old tapestry, an unusual thread in this tapestry of tone and harmony was the introduction of a modern, Ernest Bloch, who, born in Switzerland, now resides in San Francisco.

Bloch's group, Danse, Rite and Cortege Funebre, injected a most singular note into the program and one went from the hall, it was not so much of Bethooven and Wagner that one heard, but of the exotic harmony and mystical beauty that Bloch has woven into his symbolic poems. The "Danse" was a languorous dance of the Orient, weird harmonies blending with unusual string effects. Something almost forboding, hinting of the sorrows and the humiliation of the Jewish race, was poignant in "The Rite" and in the final poem, "Cortege Funebre," one felt the throb of pain of losing a beloved one, of the utter hopelessness at the thought of parting forever, and finally the quiet peace that comes with faith and time. So wonderfully living did these poems become under the magic touch of Koussevitzky that at their conclusion there was a deep hush—for a moment—broken then by a storm of applause. And Koussevitzky turned his back on the people and walked among his musicians, vigorously mopping his brow; but in a minute he was back in his place, making stiff little bows and smiling

Dignified, majestic Wagnerian

PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

MAR 1 1 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

By birth Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whom Portland will see for the first time March 25, is a Russian.

Mr. Koussevitzky is Russian, however, only by birth, by residence in his younger years, and by early practice of his profession. As soon as he rose in this profession he became a cosmopolitan and an individualist. He has traversed the concert halls of Europe from Moscow to Madrid. When Russia became a troubled dwelling place he transferred himself to Paris. Thence and from London in equal measure his renown has spread through the western world. As a cosmopolitan conductor Koussevitzky takes first rank in these days. And not only is he a cosmopolitan, but he has the traits which might be expected from a cosmopolitan training. He is a classicist, romanticist and modernist justly and discerningly fused.—Adv.

ELM THEATER

Boston Symphony Concert

Audience Cheers Kussevitzsky and Great Orchestra Following Thrilling Program at Woolsey Hall. Wide Contrast In Numbers Displays Excellence of Organizations

Vivaldi, concerto in E minor for string orchestra: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, F major; Bloch, Three Jewish Poems; Wagner, Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde;" Wagner, prelude to "Meistersinger."

For the closing concert of the Steinert series, the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Woolsey Hall last evening and New Haven had its first opportunity to hear it perform under the baton of Serge Koussewitzy a program of novel and familiar music ranging from Beethoven to Bloch. The evening was one of rare excellence in performance

so as an extra period in a hockey game. The best of the three was the "Funeral Cortege." The minor cadencis in the brass and wood wind creating a perfect tone picture. The composition must demand super human endeavor at rehearsal and the applause last night was for masterly conquest of numberless techincal and total difficulties by the orchestra and superb direction and control by the conductor.

After the bizarre effects of the Block suite the sonorous progressions of, Wagner came as a tonic. Here the orchestrda attained its height for the evening. The magnificent appeal of the tremendous, C major theme in initial period of the Meistusangers. after the tragic tenderness of the love death, led through that marvel of Counterpoint which culminates in the tremendous finale. Some time ago this chronicler had something to say about omission of Wagner from programs. After hearing the manner in which the two compositions were played last night, he takes it all back The way M. Korissevitzky conducted the two was electrifying in the effects gained from his orchestra. There was sonority, there was sardonic irony.

There was interplay of theme against theme ever apparent and never clouded or neglected so that the reviewd, soothr by Beethoven and stirred by Bloch, is apt to use all the superlatives he has. But when audience at symphony concert in New Haven mingles shouts of praises with the patter of hands, somebody besides the reviewer must be stirred out of himself. That

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK WORLD

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky brought his players from Boston to Carnegie Hall last night with the following program:

Eighth symphony	Beethoven
Symphonic piece (new)	H. F. Gilbert
Three Jewish poems	Ernest Bloch
Suite 2, "Da[illegible] the [illegible]loe"	Ravel

Just Music

Fashions in music are apt nowadays to change as rapidly as Parisian models. Yesterday people wrote only program music and took the greatest pains to let the audience in on the program. To-day there is a rush for absolute music, and the composers, instead of writing long perorations on what the music is supposed to represent, write equally long perorations telling the audience that their music represents nothing.

Mr. Harry F. Gilbert, whose new "Symphonic Piece" had its first performance in New York at the Boston Orchestra's concert last night at Carnegie Hall, assures us in a note in the program that he didn't want his new piece to mean one thing or another. His only desire, he pleads, was to write American music, which he takes to be music that will contain some of the national ingredients—vulgarity, vitality and an immense optimism. These Mr. Gilbert poked about with an ordinary symphonic stick. But the hearer is to take the result on its merits as music just as he would listen to, let us say, "Quartet in B flat" by Tom Jones.

Nevertheless, Mr. Gilbert's "Symphonic Piece," for all its creator's denials, does sound like program music. The themes, if not actually Negro in origin, are unmistakable imitations of Negro tunes and rhythms, not of the blues and jazzy variety, but of the older, more leisurely syncopated kind. There is plenty of what Mr. Gilbert calls the "Hurrah" quality, but the vitality and optimism must be taken on faith.

But the thing that struck me most was the presence of a program in Mr. Gilbert's musical story; and the fact that the composer disclaimed the idea made one more determined to discover it. For surely the crashing beginning must have meant something, and the various alarums and excursions were put there for a purpose. Listened to as just music—symphonic music—Mr. Gilbert's piece seems diffuse and disjointed, with no particular raison d'etre. But if it is all about something definite it is cruel of Mr. Gilbert to hold us in suspense.

Mr. Bloch, whose three Jewish poems were also played last night, is equally reticent about the contents of his music. There is more behind the Dance, the Rites and the Funeral Procession than he wants us to know. But in Mr. Bloch's case it is not so important to know, because the Jewish composer writes with a flaming passion that needs no elucidation. What he writes is often vague and groping and too esoteric for a general comprehension, but he is always intense and sometimes, as in parts of the Funeral Procession, heart-rendingly poignant. Even so there is always the suspicion that the musical texture is considerably diluted with non-musical thought and idea—in short, that it too is in a sense program music.

The orchestra began with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and finished with excerpts from Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe.

Mr. Gilbert's piece was received by the large audience with many evidences of appreciation and the composer came on the stage repeatedly bow. Mr. Bloch's three pieces were reverentially—not, I am afraid, he detachment the composer e liked.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

REGISTER

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROGRAM

A notable progrem will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra when this world-famous assemblage of 108 musicians visits New Haven for a concert in Woolsey Hall, Wednesday evening at 8:15. This will be an event of the first musical importance since Serge Koussevitzky, the great Russian conductor who is regarded as one of the very finest living, will make his first bow in this city. The symphony of the program will be Beethoven's Eight in F major, one of the most delightfully melodious and humorous of this composer's works. This will be introduced by a Concerto in E minor for string orchestra by Vivaldi, the 17th century composer, which has been arranged by Mistovski; a modern score of much musical importance will be the Three Jewish Poems of Ernest Bloch. They are entitled Dance, Rite, and Funeral Procession. The closing numbers will be two excerpts from the Wagnerian music dramas—the Prelude and Love-death from "Tristan and Isolde," and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of

---

Boston Symphony Makes Its Third Visit Here

Music lovers of Brooklyn turned out in goodly numbers last night to greet the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its fourth and next to last visit of the season. Serge Kousseritsky wielded the baton in his customary able manner. The program was exceptionally varied and there was something that every hearer could appreciate.

Classic music was heard when Vivaldi's Concerto in E minor for string orchestra was presented as the opening number. It was ably given. The most thoroughly enjoyable piece of the evening, Hahdn's Symphony in G major followed. It was superbly played and its dainty, delightful, tripping measures started the applause of the evening.

Strangely enough there was even more enthusiasm for the three dances from the ballet, "The Three-Cornered

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

* * *

Unusual importance was attached in New York this week to the first performance of a new "Symphonic" piece by Henry F. Gilbert at the hands of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Sergey Koussevitzky. Mr. Gilbert stands to-day as one of the most original and independent figures among contemporaneous American composers. He was born in Somerville, Mass., and was the first American pupil of Edward MacDowell. He first became a national figure in musical circles in 1911 when the Boston orchestra played his "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes." His Negro Rhapsody" was given at the Norfolk festival in 1913, when he was present in person and directed the work. Others of his compositions have also received much favorable comment.

* * * *

Telling the World

By NEAL O'HARA

Copyright, 1926, by Press Publishing Co.

The latest novelty of the season is

bass viol. The concert went over big.

Roy Chapman Andrews, the archaeologist-explorer, received a degree at the same time. We do not know if he made a speech. But we presume he promised the than John McCormack, LL. D., saying it with music, Fritz Kreisler, Ph. D., acknowledging it on his violin or Paderewski, Litt. D., uttering his thanks on the ivory keys.

It is understood Paul Whiteman has been offered an LL. D. by more than a dozen universities. But he is holding out for thirty-six additional Ph. D. for his men.

M. Koussevitzky, who is responsible for this innovation is handicapped by play-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

REGISTER

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA APPEARS AT WOOLSEY HALL TONIGHT

A significant musical event will be presented to local music lovers this evening at Woolsey Hall, the occasion being the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the foremost orchestral organizations in the country today. The great body of one hundred and seven selected musicians will be under the personal leadership of Serge Koussevitszky, the brilliant Russian conductor who has brought the Boston Symphony to the highest point of its artistic career in the short space o fone year. Mr. Koussevitzky makes his first bow before a local audience tonight, thus the event is of little importance in musical circles throughout this vicinity.

Tonights concert will mark the fifth of the Steinert Concert Series for the season of 1925-6, under the auspices of the Yale School of Music. A brilliant program has been arranged especially for the occassion, in fact it is doubtful if a symphony program has ever been heard in this city of such all around cellence and appeal. Following is the list of numbers and the order in which they will be rendered, the first commencing promptly at 8:15:

Vivaldi— Concerto

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK JOURNAL

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN EAGLE

MA[illegible]

Mr. KOUSSEWITSKY and his Boston Symphony Orchestra have only a single visit to pay the Academy of Music this season (following their concert in Brooklyn last evening) and another orchestral year will have come to an end. But I feel that it would not be a difficult assignment to prophesy about what Mr. Koussewitsky's program will be on that not distant date. Boston Symphony programs since the eminent and well-tailored Russian took over the baton havo run on formula—or, rather, on formulae. The first is the program with the popular symphony as its major point, the classic overture and the pseudo-modern suite as its fillers. The second is the classic concerto, the classic symphony, the pseudo-modern (or on occasion, the bona-fide modern) work and the Wagnerian excerpt.

Last evening Mr. Koussewitsky promulgated the latter variety. During the early part of the evening he revealed his talents as a conductor of Vivaldi and Haydn (both composers seem specially marked for Mr. Koussewitsky's favor), and after the intermission he became the apologetic modernist and the Perfect Wagnerite: he played the popular suite from De Falla's "Three Cornered Hat" and the most familiar of excerpts from "Tristan" and "Meistersinger."

It is not easy to explain the popularity of the De Falla suite. Here is music lacking in all the elements that are supposed to make music popular. The dances of the "Three Cornered Hat" are not melodically interesting, harmonically daring or rhythmically salient. They are merely Spanish music of indifferent charm, well but not brilliantly orchestrated. Yet conductors—and audiences, too it would seem—have smiled upon them the smile os lasting favor. Mr. Koussewitsky made much of them.

The Wagnerian excerpts were also meritoriously done. Of the first pages of the "Tristan" Prelude Mr. Koussewitsky gave a really inspired reading. But he became less interesting as the piece advanced and under his hands the great climax lacked propulsive force. The "Meistersinger" Overture was admirably projected except for occasional and uncalled for retardandos in the two climaxes of the work.

There are signs that the Boston Orchestra is itself deteriorating. The playing is frequently ragged, the instrumental tone neither secure nor of especially good quality. Mr. Koussewitsky might look up from his scores for a moment and listen to what his men are doing.

Koussevitsky Plays a Piece Written in Real American

After all, it was probably to be expected that a New Englander would be the first to write some real American music. Only no one did expect it, including this particular horizon-gazer. But Henry F. Gilbert's modesty titled "Symphonic Piece," played here last night for the first time by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, ~~is the~~ only distinctively American music for the symphonic band that we know anything about.

It isn't jazz, either straight or the softdrink concoction the jazzologists have been serving when goaded into one of their mild symphonic sprees; it isn't the music of the negro or of the Indian doctored up by the white man; and it isn't the German small beer that some other New Englanders have been brewing like so many Brahmsianer, or the flavorless dilutions bootlegged from Paris by the gentlemen from Chicago and points southeast.

It is music that is American because it consciously (but not self-consciously) reflects the American spirit, or some part of it, in a recognizably American fashion. It has some of the urge and flamboyancy of the go-getter in it, something of vulgarity, something of sentimentality. Mr. Gilbert quite joyously acknowledges that. It is rushy, hell-bent-for-election stuff, with a touch of nervous jazziness here and there and a large dash of the vulgarly tearful which is excellent Broadway.

But the thing is put together by a musician who knows what he is doing all the way. He handles his instrumentation so that it fits his expressive needs. His development of his thematic material is adroit and deep-breathed. The only weakness of the piece is that it is too long-winded. But even so, it is worth a couple of dozen Carpenter "Skyscrapers" and a bushel of Chadwickian Loefflerisms.

The great length of the piece is the only un-American aspect it has. Poe—an American—long ago said there was no such thing as a long poem (and Whitman, the professional American, hasn't disproved it). Equally, there can be on such thing as a long American symphony. But Mr. Gilbert can easily delete. His "Symphonic Piece" is intended as the first movement of a complete symphonic work and is therefore probably not yet in its final form. He should feel tremendously encouraged to create the rest of what he has in mind.

Mr. Koussevitsky, for a Russian, and an alien, gave a splendidly virile and comprehending performance of this music. We could imagine Paul Whiteman, perhaps, doing it better, even though it isn't in the language of his band. But Mr. Koussevitsky got well under its skin and the orchestra gave a virtuoso account of it.

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, which preceded the Gilbert piece on last night's programme, was Mr. Koussevitzky in one of his one-track interpretations. This is Beethoven in his lightest and most scherzando of symphonic moods, but it is not the same mood from beginning to end, as Mr. Koussevitsky would have had us believe. Moreover, there is no necessity for converting the first movement into a concerto for kettle drum. And, altogether, noise is not joyousness.

The remainder of the eve

PORTLAND,

ME.

EXPRESS

1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

There will be no dull moments at the Boston Symphony concert in this City March 25. Serge Koussevitzky, the new Boston Symphony conductor, does not permit dull moments. Koussevitzky, in the words of Olin Downes, the distinguished critic of the New York Times, "is endowed with a temperament that can on occasion sweep everything before it. There is an authority, a quenchless enthusiasm and a big sweep in all that he does which if he were less sincere and individual as a musician than he is would be a compelling force for public success."—Advertisement.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Journal - Courier

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS BRILLIANT CONDUCTOR

While a perfect torrent of music poured forth upon them, now checked, now released, by the magic baton of Serge Koussevitzky, an audience which practically filled Woolsey hall sat enthralled by the performance of the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening. There was more than the usual excitement in the coming here of the orchestra because last evening Koussevitzky, the brilliant Russian conductor, made his first appearance in New Haven. A man of medium stature, of a rather powerful build, he controls the 107 members of the orchestra with a vigorous strength of will that is manifested in his large pale face, set off by an abundance of thick, black hair. He extracts the last tiny drop of tonal beauty from the instruments as only a master can—the result being a perfect work, of such beauty that only those who are truly musicianly may understand it. A slight change in the program made the orchestra render three movements from Vivaldi's "Concerto in E Minor" for string orchestra, edited by A. Mistovski, instead of Gailliard's "Sonata in G Major". The symphony of the program was Beethoven's Eighth, in F major, one of the few works of lighter vein of this master of the tone poem. Its vivacious beauty, entwined with a whimsical vein, was marvelously brought out under the skilful guidance of Koussevitzky's baton and the four movements were over much too soon for those who had sat enrapt through their rendition. While one concedes that the works of the masters on the program stand out as rich embroidery on a rare old tapestry, an unusual thread in this tapestry of tone and harmony was the introduction of a modern, Ernest Bloch, who, born in Switzerland, now resides in San Francisco.

Bloch's group, Danse, Rite and Cortege Funebre, injected a most singular note into the program and one went from the hall, it was not so much of Bethooven and Wagner that one heard, but of the exotic harmony and mystical beauty that Bloch has woven into his symbolic poems. The "Danse" was a languorous dance of the Orient, weird harmonies blending with unusual string effects. Something almost forboding, hinting of the sorrows and the humiliation of the Jewish race, was poignant in "The Rite" and in the final poem, "Cortege Funebre," one felt the throb of pain of losing a beloved one, of the utter hopelessness at the thought of parting forever, and finally the quiet peace that comes with faith and time. So wonderfully living did these poems become under the magic touch of Koussevitzky that at their conclusion there was a deep hush—for a moment—broken then by a storm of applause. And Koussevitzky turned his back on the people and walked among his musicians, vigorously mopping his brow, but in a minute he was back in his place, making stiff little bows and smiling

Dignified, majestic Wagnerian

PORTLAND

ME.

PRESS-HERALD

BOSTON SYMPHONY

By birth Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whom Portland will see for the first time March 25, is a Russian.

Mr. Koussevitzky is Russian, however, only by birth, by residence in his younger years, and by early practice of his profession. As soon as he rose in this profession he became a cosmopolitan and an individualist. He has traversed the concert halls of Europe from Moscow to Madrid. When Russia became a troubled dwelling place he transferred himself to Paris. Thence and from London in equal measure his renown has spread through the western world. As a cosmopolitan conductor Koussevitzky takes first rank in these days. And not only is he a cosmopolitan, but he has the traits which might be expected from a cosmopolitan training. He is a classicist, romanticist and modernist justly and discerningly fused.—Adv.

ELM THEATER

190 1 1 192

Boston Symphony Concert

Audience Cheers Kussevitzsky and Great Orchestra Following Thrilling Program at Woolsey Hall. Wide Contrast In Numbers Displays Excellence of Organizations

Vivaldi, concerto in E minor for string orchestra; Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, F major; Bloch, Three Jewish Poems; Wagner, Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde;' Wagner, prelude to "Meistersinger."

For the closing concert of the Steinert series, the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Woolsey Hall last evening and New Haven had its first opportunity to hear it perform under the baton of Serge Koussewitzy a program of novel and familiar music ranging from Beethoven to Bloch. The evening was one of rare excellence in performance by a band whose attack, phrasing and control of dynamics was well nigh faultless. It was small wonder that shouts of approval mingled with the applause at the closing number.

The Vivaldi concert has been edited and condensed for the orchestra and the rare quality of the strin gchoir was easil yapparent. Flawless was the statement of the melodic line and the first movement glowed with intensity. The phrasing by th efirst violin, the vigor of their attack, the delicate indication of the theme over the bassos in the third movement movement made the ancient concerto live and breathe—possibly aided by editing, but certainly by the players.

The novelty on the program was the Block suite ,written in characteristic idom, of the pleasing thirds and fifths of the Buthoven, giving way to dissonances, to chords that grated in their resolution, with harsh metallic cymb added by the brass and mordant Three Jewisorn. It was all as eciting Suite 2. "Dan... as the writings of Mr. ... bronze ... so as an extra period in a hockey game. The best of the three was the "Funeral Cortege." The minor cadencis in the brass and wood wind creating a perfect tone picture. The composition must demand super human endeavor at rehearsal and the applause last night was for masterly conquest of numberless techincal and total difficulties by the orchestra and superb direction and control by the conductor.

After the bizarre effects of the Block suite the sonorous progressions of, Wagner came as a tonic. Here the orchestrda attained its height for the evening. The magnificent appeal of the tremendous, C major theme in initial period of the Meistusangers, after the tragic tenderness of the love death, led through that marvel of Counterpoint which culminates in the tremendous finale. Some time ago this chronicler had something to say about omission of Wagner from programs. After hearing the manner in which the two compositions were played last night, he takes it all back. The way M. Korissevitzky conducted the two was electrifying in the effects gained from his orchestra. There was sonority, there was sardonic irony.

There was interplay of theme against theme ever apparent and never clouded or neglected so that the reviewd, soothr by Beethoven and stirred by Bloeh, is apt to use all the superlatives he has. But when audience at symphony concert in New Haven mingles shouts of praises with the patter of hands, somebody besides the reviewer must be stirred out of himself. That occurred last night at the conclusion of the program at Woolsey Hall. Had anyone been so rash as to prediot such a thing ten years ago, he would have been laughed out of court. Yet there is the fact.

Saturday, March 13, Yosian nature group will meet at 2.30 P. M., northwest corner, Broadway and 181st Street, to walk to Fort
Washington and ...toric sites.
Everybody w...
Just M... ...nis and ...

---

be music that ... some of the national ingredients—vulgarity, vitality and an immense optimism. These Mr. Gilbert poked about with an ordinary symphonic stick. But the hearer is to take the result on its merits as music just as he would listen to, let us say, "Quartet in B flat" by Tom Jones.

Nevertheless, Mr. Gilbert's "Symphonic Piece," for all its creator's denials, does sound like program music. The themes, if not actually Negro in origin, are unmistakable imitations of Negro tunes and rhythms, not of the blues and jazzy variety, but of the older, more leisurely syncopated kind. There is plenty of what Mr. Gilbert calls the "Hurrah" quality, but the vitality and optimism must be taken on faith.

But the thing that struck me most was the presence of a program in Mr. Gilbert's musical story; and the fact that the composer disclaimed the idea made one more determined to discover it. For surely the crashing beginning must have meant something, and the various alarums and excursions were put there for a purpose. Listened to as just music—symphonic music—Mr. Gilbert's piece seems diffuse and disjointed, with no particular raison d'etre. But if it is all about something definite it is cruel of Mr. Gilbert to hold us in suspense.

Mr. Bloch, whose three Jewish poems were also played last night, is equally reticent about the contents of his music. There is more behind the Dance, the Rites and the Funeral Procession than he wants us to know. But in Mr. Bloch's case it is not so important to know, because the Jewish composer writes with a flaming passion that needs no elucidation. What he writes is often vague and groping and too esoteric for a general comprehension, but he is always intense and sometimes, as in parts of the Funeral Procession, heart-rendingly poignant. Even so there is always the suspicion that the musical texture is considerably diluted with non-musical thought and idea—in short, that it too is in a sense program music.

The orchestra began with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and finished with excerpts from Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe.

Mr. Gilbert's piece was received by the large audience with many evidences of appreciation and the composer came on the stage repeatedly ...bow. Mr. Bloch's three pieces were ... reverentially—not, I am afraid, ... he detachment the composer ... e liked.

...semblage of 100 musicians ... New Haven for a concert in Woolsey Hall, Wednesday evening at 8:15. This will be an event of the first musical importance since Serge Koussevitzky, the great Russian conductor who is regarded as one of the very finest living, will make his first bow in this city. The symphony of the program will be Beethoven's Eight in F major, one of the most delightfully melodious and humorous of this composer's works. This will be introduced by a Concerto in E minor for string orchestra by Vivaldi, the 17th century composer, which has been arranged by Mistovski; a modern score of much musical importance will be the Three Jewish Poems of Ernest Bloch. They are entitled Dance, Rite, and Funeral Procession. The closing numbers will be two excerpts from the Wagnerian music dramas—the Prelude and Love-death from "Tristan and Isolde," and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of

---

Boston Symphony Makes Its Third Visit Here

Music lovers of Brooklyn turned out in goodly numbers last night to greet the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its fourth and next to last visit of the season. Serge Koussevitsky wielded the baton in his customary able manner. The program was exceptionally varied and there was something that every hearer could appreciate.

Classic music was heard when Vivaldi's Concerto in E minor for string orchestra was presented as the opening number. It was ably given. The most thoroughly enjoyable piece of the evening, Hahdn's Symphony in G major, followed. It was superbly played and its dainty, delightful, tripping measures started the applause of the evening.

Strangely enough there was even more enthusiasm for the three dances from the ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," by De Falla. Their oddities and whimsicalities seemed to have the same effect upon the conservative Brooklyn audiences that unique dances have on a typical first night audience on Broadway. The applause was so great that conductor Koussevitsky had to call on the members of the orchestra to stand and receive the homage with him before he could take up the Wagner music.

The closing numbers were the Prelude and Lovedeath from "Tristan and Isolde," and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Telling the World

By NEAL O'HARA

Copyright, 1926, by Press Publishing Co.

The latest novelty of the season is ...

bass viol. The concert went over big.

Roy Chapman Andrews, the archaeologist-explorer, received a degree at the same time. We do not know if he made a speech. But we presume he promised the Brown Museum a dozen dino-...

than John McCormack, LL. D., saying it with music, Fritz Kreisler, Ph. D., acknowledging it on his violin or Paderewski, Litt. D., uttering his thanks on the ivory keys.

It is understood Paul Whiteman has been offered an LL. D. by more than a dozen universities. But he is holding out for thirty-six additional Ph. D. for his men.

M. Koussevitzky, who is responsible for this innovation is handicapped by playing on college

grees freight asked the p

The
howe
Hugh
off th back as if tainm

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA APPEARS AT WOOLSEY HALL TONIGHT

A significant musical event will be presented to local music lovers this evening at Woolsey Hall, the occasion being the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the foremost orchestral organizations in the country today. The great body of one hundred and seven selected musicians will be under the personal leadership of Serge Koussevitszky, the brilliant Russian conductor who has brought the Boston Symphony to the highest point of its artistic career in the short space o fone year. Mr. Koussevitzky makes his first bow before a local audience tonight, thus the event is of little importance in musical circles throughout this vicinity.

Tonights concert will mark the fifth of the Steinert Concert Series for the season of 1925-6, under the auspices of the Yale School of Music. A brilliant program has been arranged especially for the occassion, in fact it is doubtful if a symphony program has ever been heard in this city of such all around cellence and appeal. Following is the list of numbers and the order in which they will be rendered, the first commencing promptly at 8:15:

Vivaldi,— Concerto in E minor for String Orchestra (Edited by A. Mistovski)— 1. Vigoroso; 2.Largo, 3Allegro.

Beethoven,— Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93.—1. Allegro vivace e con brio; 2 Allegretto scherzando; 3 Tempo di menuetto; 4 Allegro vivace.

Bloch,—Three Jewish Poems—a. Dance; b. Rite; c. Funeral Procession.

Wagner,—Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde".

Wagner,—Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

---

to prophesy ... sewitsky's program will be on that not distant date. Boston Symphony programs since the eminent and well-tailored Russian took over the baton have run on formula—or, rather, on formulae. The first is the program with the popular symphony as its major point, the classic overture and the pseudo-modern suite as its fillers. The second is the classic concerto, the classic symphony, the pseudo-modern (or on occasion, the bona-fide modern) work and the Wagnerian excerpt.

Last evening Mr. Koussewitsky promulgated the latter variety. During the early part of the evening he revealed his talents as a conductor of Vivaldi and Haydn (both composers seem specially marked for Mr. Koussewitsky's favor), and after the intermission he became the apologetic modernist and the Perfect Wagnerite: he played the popular suite from De Falla's "Three Cornered Hat" and the most familiar of excerpts from "Tristan" and "Meistersinger."

It is not easy to explain the popularity of the De Falla suite. Here is music lacking in all the elements that are supposed to make music popular. The dances of the "Three Cornered Hat" are not melodically interesting, harmonically daring or rhythmically salient. They are merely Spanish music of indifferent charm, well but not brilliantly orchestrated. Yet conductors—and audiences, too it would seem—have smiled upon them the smile os lasting favor. Mr. Koussewitsky made much of them.

The Wagnerian excerpts were also meritoriously done. Of the first pages of the "Tristan" Prelude Mr. Koussewitsky gave a really inspired reading. But he became less interesting as the piece advanced and under his hands the great climax lacked propulsive force. The "Meistersinger" Overture was admirably projected except for occasional and uncalled for retardandos in the two climaxes of the work.

There are signs that the Boston Orchestra is itself deteriorating. The playing is frequently ragged, the instrumental tone neither secure nor of especially good quality. Mr. Koussewitsky might look up from his scores for a moment and listen to what his men are doing.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL

MAR 1 2 1926

Koussevitsky Plays a Piece Written in Real American

After all, it was probably to be expected that a New Englander would be the first to write some real American music. Only no one did expect it, including this particular horizon-gazer. But Henry F. Gilbert's modestly titled "Symphonic Piece," played here last night for the first time by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, ~~is the~~ only distinctively American music for the symphonic band that we know anything about.

It isn't jazz, either straight or the softdrink concoction the jazzologists have been serving when goaded into one of their mild symphonic sprees; it isn't the music of the negro or of the Indian doctored up by the white man; and it isn't the German small beer that some other New Englanders have been brewing like so many Brahmsianer, or the flavorless dilutions bootlegged from Paris by the gentlemen from Chicago and points southeast.

It is music that is American because it consciously (but not self-consciously) reflects the American spirit, or some part of it, in a recognizably American fashion. It has some of the urge and flamboyancy of the go-getter in it, something of vulgarity, something of sentimentality. Mr. Gilbert quite joyously acknowledges that. It is rushy, hell-bent-for-election stuff, with a touch of nervous jazziness here and there and a large dash of the vulgarly tearful which is excellent Broadway.

But the thing is put together by a musician who knows what he is doing all the way. He handles his instrumentation so that it fits his expressive needs. His development of his thematic material is adroit and deep-breathed. The only weakness of the piece is that it is too long-winded. But even so, it is worth a couple of dozen Carpenter "Skyscrapers" and a bushel of Chadwickian Loefflerisms.

The great length of the piece is the only un-American aspect it has. Poe—an American—long ago said there was no such thing as a long poem (and Whitman, the professional American, hasn't disproved it). Equally, there can be on such thing as a long American symphony. But Mr. Gilbert can easily delete. His "Symphonic Piece" is intended as the first movement of a complete symphonic work and is therefore probably not yet in its final form. He should feel tremendously encouraged to create the rest of what he has in mind.

Mr. Koussevitsky, for a Russian, and an alien, gave a splendidly virile and comprehending performance of this music. We could imagine Paul Whiteman, perhaps, doing it better, even though it isn't in the language of his band. But Mr. Koussevitsky got well under its skin and the orchestra gave a virtuoso account of it.

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, which preceded the Gilbert piece on last night's programme, was Mr. Koussevitzky in one of his one-track interpretations. This is Beethoven in his lightest and most scherzando of symphonic moods, but it is not the same mood from beginning to end, as Mr. Koussevitsky would have had us believe. Moreover, there is no necessity for converting the first movement into a concerto for kettle drum. And, altogether, noise is not joyousness.

The remainder of the evening was taken up with Ernest Bloch's "Three Jewish Poems," and the second of Maurice Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" suites. Mr. Bloch takes himself, not seriously, but elaborately, and the outcome is a wearisome gesture of superficial gravity and imitative profundity. The professional nationalist is as tiresome in music as anywhere else.

IRVING WEIL.

The Congregational Church was hostilities of the whites.
which never after engaged in the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS BRILLIANT CONDUCTOR

While a perfect torrent of music poured forth upon them, now checked, now released, by the magic baton of Serge Koussevitzky, an audience which practically filled Woolsey hall sat enthralled by the performance of the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening. There was more than the usual excitement in the coming here of the orchestra because last evening Koussevitzky, the brilliant Russian conductor, made his first appearance in New Haven. A man of medium stature, of a rather powerful build, he controls the 107 members of the orchestra with a vigorous strength of will that is manifested in his large pale face, set off by an abundance of thick, black hair. He extracts the last tiny drop of tonal beauty from the instruments as only a master can—the result being a perfect work, of such beauty that only those who are truly musicianly may understand it. A slight change in the program made the orchestra render three movements from Vivaldi's "Concerto in E Minor" for string orchestra, edited by A. Mistovski, instead of Gailliard's "Sonata in G Major". The symphony of the program was Beethoven's Eighth, in F major, one of the few works of lighter vein of this master of the tone poem. Its vivacious beauty, entwined with a whimsical vein, was marvelously brought out under the skilful guidance of Koussevitzky's baton and the four movements were over much too soon for those who had sat enrapt through their rendition. While one concedes that the works of the masters on the program stand out as rich embroidery on a rare old tapestry, an unusual thread in this tapestry of tone and harmony was the introduction of a modern, Ernest Bloch, who, born in Switzerland, now resides in San Francisco.

Bloch's group, Danse, Rite and Cortege Funebre, injected a most singular note into the program and one went from the hall, it was not so much of Bethooven and Wagner that one heard, but of the exotic harmony and mystical beauty that Bloch has woven into his symbolic poems. The "Danse" was a languorous dance of the Orient, weird harmonies blending with unusual string effects. Something almost forboding, hinting of the sorrows and the humiliation of the Jewish race, was poignant in "The Rite" and in the final poem, "Cortege Funebre," one felt the throb of pain of losing a beloved one, of the utter hopelessness at the thought of parting forever, and finally the quiet peace that comes with faith and time. So wonderfully living did these poems become under the magic touch of Koussevitzky that at their conclusion there was a deep hush—for a moment—broken then by a storm of applause. And Koussevitzky turned his back on the people and walked among his musicians, vigorously mopping his brow, but in a minute he was back in his place, making stiff little bows and smiling.

Dignified, majestic Wagnerian music ruled the last part of the program in the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The 107 musicians gave great depth of feeling to the passionate hate and love that is the essence of "Tristan and Isolde" with its flood of wonderful harmony and the precise, martial music of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" with its blare and fanfare, and its underlying lyric theme, served as a perfect memory for one to carry from Woolsey—w... ...gnetic figure of Koussev... ...eground.

F. C. R.

---

cist and modernist justly and discerningly fused.—Adv.
ELM THEATER

191

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK EVE. POST

MAR 1 2 1925

Music : Olga Bost

Mme. Olga Samaroff

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the following program at Carnegie Hall last night: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8; Gilbert, Symphonic Piece (first time in New York); Bloch, Three Jewish Poems; and Ravel, Orchestral Fragments from "Daphnis et Chloe." Ballet in one act (second suite).

The orchestra, admirable as it is under its present regime, exhibited beauty of tone and fine ensemble in Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. There were many things in Mr. Koussewitzky's conception of the work which I liked and some I did not. The first movement seemed to me somewhat too fast and the last allegro vivace so much so that the triplets of eighth notes which begin the principal subject were at times blurred by the various recurrences of this figure.

However, questions of tempo are the most personal in all music and seldom do musicians agree about them. I wish I might reclaim all the hours I have spent in life arguing about tempo with fellow musicians without an atom of change in anybody's conviction!

The enchanting second movement of the symphony had great charm as Mr. Koussewitzky conducted it and the third movement was full of character and rhythmic virility.

MR. GILBERT is a Boston composer whose works have elicited high praise from Philip Hale, Olin Downes and other prominent critics. The symphonic piece played last night is the first of Mr. Gilbert's that I have heard because of his being an American composer I regret particularly that I could not find any musical importance in it.

My attitude toward music makes it always a matter of regret if I listen to a work without enjoyment. When the composer is an American the regret is doubled, but patriotism cannot create artistic impressions. The audience accorded considerable applause to the symphonic piece, in response to which the composer appeared three times on the stage.

The three Jewish poems of Bloch were superbly played. Mr. Koussewitzky stirred me deeply in this performance.

These poems, in my opinion, contain wonderful music, colorful, imaginative, eloquent and marvelously orchestrated. Mr. Koussewitzky brought to the interpretation of this music an insight, a fire and an expressiveness which could scarcely have been surpassed. From all Boston accounts Mr. Koussewitzky continues to grow in popularity in that city and if he gives them many such performances as that he gave of the Bloch poems, it is no wonder. His New York audience was en-

---

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD

MAR 1 0 1925

Boston Symphohy at Utica.

Many Syracusans are planning to attend the Boston Symphony orchestra concert at Avon theater, Utica, tonight. Excellent connections can be made by leaving Syracuse on the 5.30 o'clock trolley and returning on the New York Central train leaving Utica at 10.13 o'clock.

11

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TELEGRAM

Syracuse N.Y.

MAR 1 0 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT UTICA TONIGHT

Many Syracusans are expected to attend the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Avon Theatre, Utica, tonight. Connections can be made by leaving Syracuse on the 5:30 o'clock trolley and returning on the New York Central train leaving Utica at 10:13 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAM

MAR 1 2 1925

For the fourth Thursday evening concert of the visiting Boston Symphonists in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky turned to his beloved moderns. But first the Russian leader offered sacrifice to the ancients with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony—that "little symphony in F" which has turned out merely one of the greatest ever written. Alas! Sacrifice is the word. Mr. Koussevitzky was moved to indulge in one of his eminently personal "readings" of a classic. There is no need of going into harrowing details further than to say that things happened in the trio of the minuet which were positively blood-curdling. But the whole thing was one of those nightmares that are best speedily forgotten. And yet the audience rewarded this deplorable affair with much indiscriminate applause, so much, indeed, that the tiresome business of summoning the orchestra to stand up was solemnly gone through.

In the rest of the program, however, both the orchestra and its conductor were at their excellent best. The composers represented were H. F. B. Gilbert, of Cambridge; Ernest Bloch, now of San Francisco, and Maurice Ravel, of Paris. Mr. Gilbert contributed a new "Symphonic Piece." which had had its first performance anywhere a few days previously in Boston. Let us quote from Mr. Gilbert's own explanation of the work:—"This piece of music has no 'program,' in the sense in which that word is ordinarily used. It is....just a piece of music, that's all....

"Many of my young friends have pressed me to tell them what it's all about—what I have tried to represent, &c. I can only say this:—My constant aim, ever since beginning composition, has been to write some American music—i. e., some music which would not naturally have been written in any other country, and which should reflect, or express, certain aspects of the American character, or spirit, as felt by myself. That spirit, as I see it, is energetic—optimistic—nervous—impatient of restraint—and, in its highest aspect, a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit, which is America, is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration. Plenty of jingoism, vulgarity, and 'Hurrah boys!' attaches to it, but the spirit of the new-birth underlies all, for him who can see it."

Such being America according to the gospel of Mr. Gilbert, one may without hesitation pronounce his "Symphonic Piece" largely successful, even though the vulgarity of which the composer speaks so amiably does not enter disturbingly into his music. Nor would his music be regarded anywhere as more than fair-to-middling modern. Indeed, not a little of the orchestration would now be old-fashioned, if ever it had

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN CITIZEN

MAR 1 3 1925

been in fashion. Nevertheless, the piece, though too long, has substance, character, coherence, spirit, impetus. There is effective use of rag-time (hardly of jazz). The allusion to "Old Folks at Home" has real charm. The conclusion is properly vigorous and sonorous. After the admirable performance Mr. Gilbert himself proceeded to the stage and bowed repeatedly.

Following the intermission came Ernest Bloch's "Three Jewish Poems"—"Dance," "Rite," "Funeral Procession." These have a distinct place in Mr. Bloch's best work. The skill with which they are written, the individuality and richness of their coloring, and in the last the splendor of the lamentation give them a particular distinction. Nor should one forget in the "Dance" the ravishing subcutaneous quotation, so to say, from the inexhaustible treasury of "Scheherazade.' Mr. Koussevitzky conducted these "Poems" with seemingly a complete sympathy, and the orchestra played them superbly.

Three orchestral fragments from th

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

MAR 1 0 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Some indication of the pleasure in store for Portland people when they hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra March 25 under Koussevitzky's superb directing may be gathered from criticisms of his most recent concert in Boston when he played Brahms' Third Symphony, a work which has often been dubbed dull, and to which Koussevitzky gave much life, romance and color.

Speaking of this rendition Warren Storey Smith of the Boston Post says:

"Yesterday the Third Symphony was heard not only as music of plastic beauty but as tonal drama, although there was in Mr. Koussevitzky's reading no hint of theatricality. To unusual degree had the [illegible] pelling vigor, with the conflict between the opposing motives vividly brought out. The Andante, that has so often seemed perfunctory, was imbued with romantic warmth; the charm of the Poco Allegretto, though never to be doubted, was none the less heightened; and the finale had for once a significane that made it, not anti-climax, but fitting conclusion. Nor was the audience unaware of these marvels. The applause was of heartiness that this or other symphonies of Brahms have seldom enough provoked hereabouts."—Adv.

JEFFERSON THEATER

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

MAR 1 0 1925

Northampton

Northampton Hears Boston Symphony

Koussevitsky Makes First Appearance in City; Concert Pleases.

By WILLARD M. CLARK.

NORTHAMPTON, March 10—The Boston Symphony Orchestra with its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, was heard in John M. Greene Hall last night by an audience that filled the auditorium to capacity. This was Mr. Koussevitzky's first appearance in Northampton and he was cordially received from the first, the cordiality growing in warmth as the splendid program progressed.

This dynamic conductor has at his command an orchestra which, due to the labors of Pierre Monteux, may now be ranked as fine as it was before the war. The combination of this splendid machine and Mr. Koussevitzky provides music so beautifully interpreted that it is indescribable. The new conductor is a true master of the art of poetic motion. Every move expresses a desire and not a movement is ungraceful. By sheer personality he kept that great audience quiet through a complete symphony, a feat which few conductors who visit these parts can accomplish.

The program was varied and refreshingly free from the hackneyed numbers which visiting orchestras are prone to play. It opened with the lovely Boccherini symphony in C major. It is a melodious work of exquisite proportion and grace requiring in its interpretation a deftness of touch. Especially charming was the minuet with its solo for first and second violins.

Following the symphony came a dance poem by Dukas, "La Peri." This is one of those compositions which need action to make them interesting. They do not stand well alone; they are too intangible, and demand the support of figures and scenery.

To many in the audience, one of the loveliest numbers of the evening was the prelude to "Khovantchina" by Moussorgsky. The prelude illustrates the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin. Seldom have we heard the string section play more beautifully or with such luscious tone. The swiftly changing moods as dawn appears were clearly evident to the listener. Following this came the only number that was repeated, a scherzo The Flight of a Bumblebee, from "Tsar Saltan" by Rimsky-Korsakoff. It was a short movement that depicted a bee flying in front of a swan and the air was filled with its buzzing and it sounded as if a whole hive had taken wing.

Quite the most monumental achievement of the evening was the playing of Beethoven's "Symphony No. 5 in C Major." Mr. Koussevitzky put into it all the fears, longings, joys, triumphs and sorrow of Beethoven. The lovely andante movement was magnificently played. The delicious theme for 'cellos and violas was as beautiful as one could imagine. The passage for the double basses was ferocious in its intensity and here it might be said that having a double bass virtuoso as a conductor has made that section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra one of the finest in the country. Mr. Koussevitzky rose to stupendous climaxes, reaching them by degrees and keeping his audience almost breathless at times. It was not always easy to listen and one gasped a little at the end of a climax. It was a reading such as few men could give and such as no orchestra but the Boston orchestra could express.

MUSIC OF THE WEEK.

London Observer Mail

KOUSSEVITSKY.

Mr. Koussevitsky on Monday demanded a goose-step-like precision from his forces. The L.S.O. has throughout the present season been in a slack way. It has played under Coates, Furtwängler (twice), Walter, Beecham, Shavitch, Weingartner (twice), and Schneivoigt, and I think I am right in saying that none of them got out of it any real rhythm (at all events throughout a whole programme), though Beecham almost did. The orchestra's habit of playing practically nothing but works it has played hundreds of times before and could play in its sleep, combined with its plan of employing a constant change of conductor, is proving fatal to the high aims it is always announcing. A conductor like Koussevitsky, who habitually spends himself on a single concert as though it were to be his last, and he were to appear before his Maker next day to give an account of his musical ste ship, can temporarily pull the orchestra into something like its old best standard, even he finds it an exhausting business.
ideal arrangement would surely be the gagement of a permanent conductor, one pared, however, to step down for a proport of the concerts in favour of eminent visito
And the ideal arrangement of program would be one which provided for a consta repetition of the old classics, with in every p gramme something stimulating to the natu curiosity of people who want to know wh has gone on in the world of music sinc
Wagner died. The orchestra announces for it "Anniversary Concert" in June, a repetitio of the first programme it ever gave (unde Richter in 1904)—"Mastersingers" Overtur
Bach Suite in D, "Magic Flute" Overtur
Elgar Variations, Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsod in F, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. It is not worthy that after the passage of twenty-or years this remains still the type—the "L.S.C Perfect Programme," so to speak. For th
L.S.O. has trained its audiences to resemb the picture-buyers who will look at nothi but old masters.

De Falla and d'Erlanger.

It may seem a little inappropriate to expre these sentiments after a concert during whic two works of living composers were performe but a moment of transient repentance ma prove the best one for a sermon. The tw works were de Falla's suite from the Balle
"Love the Sorcerer" and F. d'Erlanger'
"Symphonic Concerto." The de Falla music like most that comes from Spain, has little o the nature of consecutive thought; it con stantly introduces some little motif, and the repeats it into a wall-paper design, using, o course, some very vivid and attractive orches tral colouring. The method is more satisfyin where the attention of the eye, as well a the ear, is engaged, and it is no reflection o de Falla's ballet music as ballet music t say that, as an orchestral piece, it seems t go on much too long. As for the Concert (capitally played by Iturbi), we have heard i before (November, 1921). It is not an in spiring or an original work. Most of it is series of heartfelt yearns, one after the other leaving the listener no emotional repose; th general spirit is that of the more passionat parts of Wagner, but the musical material and craftsmanship fall far below the model, and besides Wagner, the music has many ancestors
There is one movement, the Scherzo, that i light and pleasant and adroitly managed; re moved from its context, it would be worth performance as a separate concert piece.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

I have spoken of Koussevitsky's precision. It was in itself an inspiring thing, but it produced a machine-cut rhythm, with a big emphasis on the first of the bar—rudely expressed, rather the rhythm of a stick dragged along railings than that of a flowing river. In Beethoven's Seventh Symphony the conductor hypnotised or galvanised players and audience by his forceful insistence. There were some remarkable tempi. The last movement, which Beethoven has marked minim = 72, he took it at about minim = 88. On the other hand, the middle section of the Scherzo, which Beethoven has marked dotted minim = 84 (which admittedly seems very quick; Weingartner takes it at about dotted minim = 60), Koussevitsky took at about dotted minim = 48! The visit of a virtuoso conductor is, for once in a way, very stimulating, but I should not like to sit under one (and especially under the same one) every week. Is music a tonic or a food?

ALBANY,
N. Y.
NEWS

MAR 1 0 1925

Boston Symphony at Capitol Wednesday.

It is only natural that there should be interest in the first appearance in this city of Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony, for he is without doubt the most discussed, musician of the present time. That he has been an immense success we all know, but the fact remains that he has taken the Boston Symphony, throught to be a perfect orchestral body, and has made it so exceptionally interesting that it is now recognized as the leader in orchestral music. There is nothing flamboyant about Koussevitzky, he does not rave nor tear his hair, but he gets results seemingly with the least trouble. It may be that his attitude towards his orchestra is helpful, for he never misses an opportunity to give his players recognition.

Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony at the Capitol theatre tomorrow night, and it will be the treat of the season, musically speaking. The seats are selling at the theatre box office where mail and phone orders will receive careful attention, and the tickets held until called for. The concert is given under the management of Ben Franklin.

ALBANY,
N. Y.
TELEGRAM

MAR 1 2 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TAKE ALBANY BY STOR

Koussevitzky Is Hailed a Great Leader by Music Lovers at Capitol.

IS MASTER OF HIS ME

Moussorgsky Masterpiece Adopted by Ravel Peak Performance.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, forty-three years preeminent as musical institution, has become, in forty-fourth year an instrument for expression of a great leader, Se Koussevitzky. It has not lost its e nence; it has gained a leader who gi it greater eminence than ever but Albany heard the orchestra w
Koussevitzky for the first time night at the Capitol theatre. It he a program that was in itself a trib to another side of the musician; program maker. It gave him and men enthusiastic applause after each the four numbers, and a deluge of plause at the end, remaining seated til the leader had returned to bow thanks half a dozen times. Perh some misguided souls expected an core, but we prefer to think the plause was sincere appreciation o of a great concert.

Three numbers were new to Alba and we doubt if anyone who he Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exh tion," arranged for orchestra by t music radical, Ravel, soon will find memory dimming to its impress bizarre, tonally unorthodox fanc Moussorgsky called it a "drawing" music;" Ravel orchestrated it Koussevitzky (who alone can direct in concert), and the leader does wh brilliant "drawing" of his own cla intrigues from his men such i sions in music as a gnome dra himself along on twisted legs; ch playing in the Tuileries garden; a ba of chickens in their shells; a Po wagon rumbling along a road, and construction of a massive Russian g

Ravel is a great musical protean tist in this orchestration, for you the impress of majesty, of pathos, dustry, sheer quaintness of humor
the very trundle of wheels. You anything you can read into this ov imaginative score. It is the very racle of fascination: read so clearly glowingly, so inspiringly that y mind reels in appreciation of all agencies that went to create it.
you ultimately feel the credit is Koussevitzky.

The Boccherini symphony in C m has a lovely opening for strings, pol ed to the last degree of smoothn and a beautiful strain for two first lins, with cello overtones. In its short movements (the pauses of w an Albany audience for once judicio refrained from applauding) the le gives you the impression of some n ter worker in a plastic art. He re moulds his men with his understan hands and arms. But in the Ravel n ber he often shot his arms out as face writhed, like some fierce fury creation.

Dukas', "La Peri" is a luscious poem of neutral tints. If you can agine some Oriental jewel of n colors, perfectly blended, translated to sound, it might suggest the e
Koussevitzky gives in "La Peri."

The prelude to Wagner's "Die M tersingers" had a fine musicianly r ing, but after the pioneering the director gave in his other the comparative convention
Wagner were just a bit an although most beautifully canini, Stokowski and K have led orchestras in A greatest, if quick reactio judgement, is Kousse
Franklin presented the crowded house.—W. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK EVE. POST

MAR 1 2

Music : Olga Bost

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the following program at Carnegie Hall last night: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8; Gilbert, Symphonic Piece (first time in New York); Bloch, Three Jewish Poems; and Ravel, Orchestral Fragments from "Daphnis et Chloe." Ballet in one act (second suite).

Mme. Olga Samaroff

The orchestra, admirable as it is under its present regime, exhibited beauty of tone and fine ensemble in Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. There were many things in Mr. Koussewitzky's conception of the work which I liked and some I did not. The first movement seemed to me somewhat too fast and the last allegro vivace so much so that the triplets of eighth notes which begin the principal subject were at times blurred by the various recurrences of this figure.

However, questions of tempo are the most personal in all music and seldom do musicians agree about them. I wish I might reclaim all the hours I have spent in life arguing about tempo with fellow musicians without an atom of change in anybody's conviction!

The enchanting second movement of the symphony had great charm as Mr. Koussewitzky conducted it and the third movement was full of character and rhythmic virility.

MR. GILBERT is a Boston composer whose works have elicited high praise from Philip Hale, Olin Downes and other prominent critics. The symphonic piece played last night is the first of Mr. Gilbert's that I have heard because of his being an American composer I regret particularly that I could not find any musical importance in it.

My attitude toward music makes it always a matter of regret if I listen to a work without enjoyment. When the composer is an American the regret is doubled, but patriotism cannot create artistic impressions. The audience accorded considerable applause to the symphonic piece, in response to which the composer appeared three times on the stage.

The three Jewish poems of Bloch were superbly played. Mr. Koussewitzky stirred me deeply in this performance.

These poems, in my opinion, contain wonderful music, colorful, imaginative, eloquent and marvelously orchestrated. Mr. Koussewitzky brought to the interpretation of this music an insight, a fire and an expressiveness which could scarcely have been surpassed. From all Boston accounts Mr. Koussewitzky continues to grow in popularity in that city and if he gives them many such performances as that he gave of the Bloch poems, it is no wonder. His New York audience was enthusiastic.

I don't suppose a surgeon ever performs an appendicitis operation just for the joy of doing it, but one critic last night actually went to the opera without being obliged to. Samuel Pepys ought to record the event in his diary!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAM

MAR 1 2

For the fourth Thursday evening concert of the visiting Boston Symphonists in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky turned to his beloved moderns. But first the Russian leader offered sacrifice to the ancients with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony—that "little symphony in F" which has turned out merely one of the greatest ever written. Alas! Sacrifice is the word. Mr. Koussevitzky was moved to indulge in one of his eminently personal "readings" of a classic. There is no need of going into harrowing details further than to say that things happened in the trio of the minuet which were positively blood-curdling. But the whole thing was one of those nightmares that are best speedily forgotten. And yet the audience rewarded this deplorable affair with much indiscriminate applause, so much, indeed, that the tiresome business of summoning the orchestra to stand up was solemnly gone through.

In the rest of the program, however, both the orchestra and its conductor were at their excellent best. The composers represented were H. F. B. Gilbert, of Cambridge; Ernest Bloch, now of San Francisco, and Maurice Ravel, of Paris. Mr. Gilbert contributed a new "Symphonic Piece." which had had its first performance anywhere a few days previously in Boston. Let us quote from Mr. Gilbert's own explanation of the work:—"This piece of music has no 'program,' in the sense in which that word is ordinarily used. It is....just a piece of music, that's all.!..

"Many of my young friends have pressed me to tell them what it's all about—what I have tried to represent, &c. I can only say this:—My constant aim, ever since beginning composition, has been to write some American music—i. e., some music which would not naturally have been written in any other country, and which should reflect, or express, certain aspects of the American character, or spirit, as felt by myself. That spirit, as I see it, is energetic—optimistic—nervous—impatient of restraint—and, in its highest aspect, a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit, which is America, is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration. Plenty of jingoism, vulgarity, and 'Hurrah boys!' attaches to it, but the spirit of the new-birth underlies all, for him who can see it."

Such being America according to the gospel of Mr. Gilbert, one may without hesitation pronounce his "Symphonic Piece" largely successful, even though the vulgarity of which the composer speaks so amiably does not enter disturbingly into his music. Nor would his music be regarded anywhere as more than fair-to-middling modern. Indeed, not a little of the orchestration would now be old-fashioned, if ever it had been in fashion. Nevertheless, the piece, though too long, has substance, character, coherence, spirit, impetus. There is effective use of rag-time (hardly of jazz). The allusion to "Old Folks at Home" has real charm. The conclusion is properly vigorous and sonorous. After the admirable performance Mr. Gilbert himself proceeded to the stage and bowed repeatedly.

Following the intermission came Ernest Bloch's "Three Jewish Poems"—"Dance," "Rite," "Funeral Procession." These have a distinct place in Mr. Bloch's best work. The skill with which they are written, the individuality and richness of their coloring, and in the last the splendor of the lamentation give them a particular distinction. Nor should one forget in the "Dance" the ravishing subcutaneous quotation, so to say, from the inexhaustible treasury of "Scheherazade.' Mr. Koussevitzky conducted these "Poems" with seemingly a complete sympathy, and the orchestra played them superbly.

Three orchestral fragments from the beautiful "Daphnis et Chloe" suite of Ravel made the finale of the concert.

But why drag in Beethoven?

PITTS SANBORN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN CITIZEN

MAR 1 3 1925

MUSIC OF THE WEEK.

LONDON OBSERVER Mar

KOUSSEVITSKY.

Mr. Koussevitsky on Monday demanded a goose-step-like precision from his forces. The L.S.O. has throughout the present season been in a slack way. It has played under Coates, Furtwängler (twice), Walter, Beecham, Shavitch, Weingartner (twice), and Schneivoigt, and I think I am right in saying that none of them got out of it any real rhythm (at all events throughout a whole programme), though Beecham almost did. The orchestra's habit of playing practically nothing but works it has played hundreds of times before and could play in its sleep, combined with its plan of employing a constant change of conductor, is proving fatal to the high aims it is always announcing. A conductor like Koussevitsky, who habitually spends himself on a single concert as though it were to be his last, and he were to appear before his Maker next day to give an account of his musical stewardship, can temporarily pull the orchestra back into something like its old best standard, but even he finds it an exhausting business. The ideal arrangement would surely be the engagement of a permanent conductor, one prepared, however, to step down for a proportion of the concerts in favour of eminent visitors. And the ideal arrangement of programme would be one which provided for a constant repetition of the old classics, with in every programme something stimulating to the natural curiosity of people who want to know what has gone on in the world of music since Wagner died. The orchestra announces for its "Anniversary Concert" in June, a repetition of the first programme it ever gave (under Richter in 1904)—"Mastersingers" Overture, Bach Suite in D, "Magic Flute" Overture, Elgar Variations, Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody in F, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. It is noteworthy that after the passage of twenty-one years this remains still the type—the "L.S.O. Perfect Programme," so to speak. For the L.S.O. has trained its audiences to resemble the picture-buyers who will look at nothing but old masters.

De Falla and d'Erlanger.

It may seem a little inappropriate to express these sentiments after a concert during which two works of living composers were performed, but a moment of transient repentance may prove the best one for a sermon. The two works were de Falla's suite from the Ballet "Love the Sorcerer" and F. d'Erlanger's "Symphonic Concerto." The de Falla music, like most that comes from Spain, has little of the nature of consecutive thought; it constantly introduces some little motif, and then repeats it into a wall-paper design, using, of course, some very vivid and attractive orchestral colouring. The method is more satisfying where the attention of the eye, as well as the ear, is engaged, and it is no reflection on de Falla's ballet music as ballet music to say that, as an orchestral piece, it seems to go on much too long. As for the Concerto (capitally played by Iturbi), we have heard it before (November, 1921). It is not an inspiring or an original work. Most of it is a series of heartfelt yearns, one after the other, leaving the listener no emotional repose; the general spirit is that of the more passionate parts of Wagner, but the musical material and craftsmanship fall far below the model, and, besides Wagner, the music has many ancestors. There is one movement, the Scherzo, that is light and pleasant and adroitly managed; removed from its context, it would be worth performance as a separate concert piece.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

I have spoken of Koussevitsky's precision. It was in itself an inspiring thing, but it produced a machine-cut rhythm, with a big emphasis on the first of the bar—rudely expressed, rather the rhythm of a stick dragged along railings than that of a flowing river. In Beethoven's Seventh Symphony the conductor hypnotised or galvanised players and audience by his forceful insistence. There were some remarkable tempi. The last movement, which Beethoven has marked minim = 72, he took it about minim = 88. On the other hand, the middle section of the Scherzo, which Beethoven has marked dotted minim = 84 (which admittedly seems very quick; Weingartner takes it at about dotted minim = 60), Koussevitsky took at about dotted minim = 48! The visit of a virtuoso conductor is, for once in a way, very stimulating, but I should not like to sit under one (and especially under the same one) every week. Is music a tonic or a food?

The Scriabin Memorial Concert.

It was a pity that at the concert organised to commemorate the tenth anniversary of Scriabin's death the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra should have been so heavy in spirit. Koussevitsky had the greatest difficulty in whipping up his forces. There was too much of the less distinguished early work—the first symphony, and the piano concerto, with Miss Lilias Mackinnon as the able if not very thrilling soloist—before we reached the music of outstanding freshness and power. The "Poem of Ecstasy," by dint of the conductor's extraordinarily good generalship, came to a triumphant end, making something like its old appeal.

Boston Symp

Koussevitsky Makes First Appearance in City; Concert Pleases.

By WILLARD M. CLARK.

NORTHAMPTON, March 10—The Boston Symphony Orchestra with its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, was heard in John M. Greene Hall last night by an audience that filled the auditorium to capacity. This was Mr. Koussevitzky's first appearance in Northampton and he was cordially received from the first, the cordiality growing in warmth as the splendid program progressed.

This dynamic conductor has at his command an orchestra which, due to the labors of Pierre Monteux, may now be ranked as fine as it was before the war. The combination of this splendid machine and Mr. Koussevitzky provides music so beautifully interpreted that it is indescribable. The new conductor is a true master of the art of poetic motion. Every move expresses a desire and not a movement is ungraceful. By sheer personality he kept that great audience quiet through a complete symphony, a feat which few conductors who visit these parts can accomplish.

The program was varied and refreshingly free from the hackneyed numbers which visiting orchestras are prone to play. It opened with the lovely Boccherini symphony in C major. It is a melodious work of exquisite proportion and grace requiring in its interpretation a deftness of touch. Especially charming was the minuet with its solo for first and second violins.

Following the symphony came a dance poem by Dukas, "La Peri." This is one of those compositions which need action to make them interesting. They do not stand well alone; they are too intangible, and demand the support of figures and scenery.

To many in the audience, one of the loveliest numbers of the evening was the prelude to "Khovantchina" by Moussorgsky. The prelude illustrates the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin. Seldom have we heard the string section play more beautifully or with such luscious tone. The swiftly changing moods as dawn appears were clearly evident to the listener. Following this came the only number that was repeated, a scherzo "The Flight of a Bumblebee, from "Tsar Saltan" by Rimsky-Korsakoff. It was a short movement that depicted a bee flying in front of a swan and the air was filled with its buzzing and it sounded as if a whole hive had taken wing.

Quite the most monumental achievement of the evening was the playing of Beethoven's "Symphony No. 5 in C Major." Mr. Koussevitzky put into it all the fears, longings, joys, triumphs and sorrow of Beethoven. The lovely andante movement was magnificently played. The delicious theme for 'cellos and violas was as beautiful as one could imagine. The passage for the double basses was ferocious in its intensity and here it might be said that having a double bass virtuoso as a conductor has made that section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra one of the finest in the country. Mr. Koussevitzky rose to stupendous climaxes, reaching them by degrees and keeping his audience almost breathless at times. It was not always easy to listen and one gasped a little at the end of a climax. It was a reading such as few men could give and such as no orchestra but the Boston orchestra could express.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PORTLAND ME. PRESS-HERALD

MAR 1 0 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Some indication of the pleasure in store for Portland people when they hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra March 25 under Koussevitzky's superb directing may be gathered from criticisms of his most recent concert in Boston when he played Brahms' Third Symphony, a work which has often been dubbed dull, and to which Koussevitzky gave much life, romance and color.

Speaking of this rendition Warren Storey Smith of the Boston Post says:

"Yesterday the Third Symphony was heard not only as music of plastic beauty but as tonal drama, although there was in Mr. Koussevitzky's reading no hint of theatricality. To unusual degree had the [illegible] pelling vigor, with the conflict between the opposing motives vividly brought out. The Andante, that has so often seemed perfunctory, was imbued with romantic warmth; the charm of the Poco Allegretto, though never to be doubted, was none the less heightened; and the finale had for once a significane that made it, not anti-climax, but fitting conclusion. Nor was the audience unaware of these marvels. The applause was of heartiness that this or other symphonies of Brahms have seldom enough provoked hereabouts."—Adv.

JEFFERSON THEATER

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TELEGRAM

Syracuse

MAR 1 0 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT UTICA TONIGHT

Many Syracusans are expected to attend the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Avon Theatre, Utica, tonight. Connections can be made by leaving Syracuse on the 5:30 o'clock trolley and returning on the New York Central train leaving Utica at 10:13 o'clock.

ORKERS' WOLL

STORI

s Hailed of L. on er by Music at Capitol.

ERS

ER OF HIS ME

ves ill

gsky Masterpiece ted by Ravel Peak Performance.

ith oston Symphony orchestra, of ree years preeminent as as institution, has become, in ith ourth year an instrument for les sion of a great leader, Se he evitzky. It has not lost its e an it has gained a leader who gi or ater eminence than ever befo

y heard the orchestra w ns sevitzky for the first time at at the Capitol theatre. It he at ogram that was in itself a trib e nother side of the musician; ram maker. It gave him and enthusiastic applause after each four numbers, and a deluge of s use at the end, remaining seated the leader had returned to bow nks half a dozen times. Perh me misguided souls expected an re, but we prefer to think the plause was sincere appreciation of a great concert.

Three numbers were new to Alba and we doubt if anyone who he Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exh tion," arranged for orchestra by t music radical, Ravel, soon will find memory dimming to its impress bizarre, tonally unorthodox fanc Moussorgsky called it a "drawing music;" Ravel orchestrated it Koussevitzky (who alone can direct in concert), and the leader does wh brilliant "drawing" of his own cla intrigues from his men such it sions in music as a gnome dra himself along on twisted legs; chi playing in the Tuileries garden; a ba of chickens in their shells; a Po wagon rumbling along a road, and construction of a massive Russian g

Ravel is a great musical protean ist in this orchestration, for you the impress of majesty, of pathos, dustry, sheer quaintness of humor the very trundle of wheels. You anything you can read into this ov imaginative score. It is the very racle of fascination; read so clearly glowingly, so inspiringly that y mind reels in appreciation of all agencies that went to create it. you ultimately feel the credit is Koussevitsky.

The Boccherini symphony in C ma has a lovely opening for strings, pol ed to the last degree of smoothn and a beautiful strain for two first lins, with cello overtones. In its short movements (the pauses of wh an Albany audience for once judicio refrained from applauding) the lea gives you the impression of some m ter worker in a plastic art. He re moulds his men with his understan hands and arms. But in the Ravel n ber he often shot his arms out as face writhed, like some fierce fury creation.

Dukas', "La Peri" is a luscious poem of neutral tints. If you can agine some Oriental jewel of m colors, perfectly blended, translated to sound, it might suggest the e Koussevitzky gives in "La Peri."

The prelude to Wagner's "Die M tersingers" had a fine musicianly r ing, but after the pioneering the director gave in his other the comparative convention Wagner were just a bit an although most beautifully canini, Stokowski and K have led orchestras in A greatest, if quick reactio judgement, is Kousse Franklin presented the crowded house.—W. H.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

192

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MERCURY
NEW BEDFORD, MASS

MAR 1 3 1926

The "Symphonic Piece" by Henry Gilbert, who designed the musical accompaniment for "Down to the Sea in Ships," was presented in New York Thursday night by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The New York Herald-Tribune says:

The feature of last night's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie hall, Mr. Koussevitzky conducting, was the performance, for the first time in New York, of a new composition by the American composer, Henry F. Gilbert.

Mr. Gilbert's work, which he calls by the simple but sufficient title, "Symphonic Piece," was completed last autumn. It was originally intended as the first movement of a symphony, but Mr. Gilbert was advised to send it out into the world uncompanioned, and this he has done. The work was performed for the first time anywhere a fortnight ago in Boston, under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky.

Mr. Gilbert has stated that the work has no "programme." It was not suggested by any poem, play or story; it is just music. Yet Mr. Gilbert confesses that he had at least an aim, if not a programme: he wished, he says, "to reflect or express the American character, or spirit," as felt by himself. That spirit, as he sees it, is "energetic, optimistic, nervous, impatient of restraint; and, in its highest aspect, is a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit, which is America, is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration, with plenty of jingoism, vulgarity and 'Hurrah, boys!'"

Some of this American mood, says Mr. Gilbert, he has tried to reflect in his music. His first theme is designed to express the "Hurrah boys!" note. The second theme, for contrast, has a light suggestion of Stephen Foster—it contains a remote suggestion of "Old Folks at Home," interspersed with a couple of measures from "The Arkansas Traveler." These bits are made use of and developed in the usual symphonic manner.

Mr. Gilbert has employed familiar American materials. His music makes our often effective use of rag-, and it is full of the influence of ar idioms, some of them frankly sentimental, others exuberantly y. The opening section has an exhilarating swing and dash and pep, and there are some witty references to current styles in d platform to acknowledge the enthusiasm.

The Boston Herald says of Lambert Murphy, who used to sing at the Unitarian Memorial church in Fairhaven:

At Jordan hall last evening, Lambert Murphy, tenor, gave a song recital, at which he sang the following songs, as well as several encores. Charles Albert Baker was his accompanist:

Recitative and aria, "Waft her angels, through the skies," Handel; Fussreise, Anacreon's Grab, Wenn Du zu den Blumen gehst, Er ist's, Hugo Wolf; D'une Prison, Hector Panizza; Mandoline, Gabriel Dupont; Avril, Gaston Paulin; La Chanson des Cloches, Felix Fourdrain; Chevauchee Cosque, Felix Fourdrain; On Eribeg Island, H. O. Osgood; Awake, it is the Day, Cecil Burleigh; Cherry-Flowers, Mabel W. Daniels; Bab-Loch-Hythe, Martin Shaw; St. Valentine's Day, Edward Ballantine; A Spirit Flower, Campbell-Tipton; Murmuring Zephyr, Jensen; Kathleen Mavourneen, Crouch; Sylvia, Oley-Speaks; The Sorrows of Death (from "Hymn of Praise") with organ accompaniment, Mendelssohn.

Among that long suffering fraternity to which some one so gently flung the epithet of "disease" there are still some who do not "tenorize," who sing not only with fluency, but with nuance as well, and who show signs of an active imagination and intelligence.

And Mr. Lambert Murphy belongs quite decidedly in this category, despite the fact that he did include two groups of a somewhat nondescript miscellany last evening, and that at times his singing was marred with a little vibrato. For he has a very subtle sense of musical style and penetration of mood, an admirable diction, and a voice of a warm, vibrant quality.

He sang the Handel very dramatically, yet without breaking the dignity and the continuousness of the musical line. Some of the songs of the Hugo Wolf group were marred by the obstreperousness of Mr. Baker's accompaniments, which at times quite obliterated Mr. Murphy's voice.

But it was in the first of these, and in the French group that Mr. Murphy was at his best, especially in the lovely and impressionistic "Avril," which he sang with such fervor, and such exquisite nuancing that it was demanded again of him. Again, in the quite different lyrics of Fourdrain, in his "chanson des cloches"—almost every French composer seems to have written one of these—and in the strident, challenging song of the Cossacks, he proved himself equally happy, both as a vocalist and as an interpreter.

It was in the first of the Hugo Wolf songs, and again in one of the French group, that he achieved some unusually beautiful, firm head tones, and an irreproachable falsetto. The coloratura flourishes of the Handel did not go so well and at times, his high notes did not quite hit the mark. There was a very large audience which showed evident signs of its approval.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

MAR 1 4 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Much modern music was heard yesterday. Much of it was of dubious value. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, gave its second concert of the week and the fourth matinee of its New York series in the afternoon in Carnegie Hall. On that occasion it presented two new compositions by living composers, with other music by Vivaldi, Haydn and de Falla. The new works were Germaine Taillefere's "Jeux de plein air" and Paul Hindemith's concerto for orchestra, Op. 38. The "Jeux de plein air" was originally for two pianos. It was orchestrated last Summer. The two "outdoor games" tonally pictured by Miss Taillefere are respectively "La Tirelitentatine" and "Cache-cache mitoula." These games are described by one Mr. Rabelais in Book I, Chapter 22, of the "Life of Gargantua and Pantagruel," but Miss Taillefere says they are simple outdoor games. The pieces are short, inoffensive and about as far as could be from Rabelais. The young lady who composed them bowed from the platform to cordial and sustained applause.

The concerto of Hindemith is ugly and dull music. It is astonishing that a composer could have spent the time that the mere writing down of the notes requires—notes without significance of a musical or emotional kind, here and there employed with a fluency deserving of better things. There are four movements. But one pause separates the beginning of the score from the end. All kinds of dissonant effects are there. Where is music?

De Falla is in a different case, but the dances taken from his ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," are anything but convincing. They are patches of melody and rhythm strung together, with orchestration intended to be effective in the Spanish manner. But is good in the music is principally its instrumentation, while the he atmosphere, the personality es of de Falla which came in this one are conspicuous by

If Mr. Koussevitsky were asked his own opinion of such works it might be as "adverse" to them as this article, but he would probably retort to a questioner that modern music is not the fault of a nductor, but of the composer, and that an important part of a conductor's duty is keeping his audience in close touch with what contemporaneous musicians are doing. Certainly he could not be accused of any form of nationalistic favoritism yesterday.

The opening works were the concerto for string orchestra of Antonio Vivaldi and the Haydn "Surprise" symphony. Thereafter Mr. Koussevitsky presented music by a young Frenchwoman, a young German and a prominent Spaniard. He chose no favorites and unquestionably did all that lay in his power for the artists he represented. Such curiosity and catholicity of choice is commendable, while, on the her hand, it may be remarked that there is much modern music that is interesting, and that only a few programs are given each Winter in this city by the Boston Symphony.

The performances that gave the most pleasure were those of substantial works of other days. Substantial at least, in comparison with what followed. The thinness of Vivaldi, as contrasted with what we know of Bach, for example, who transcribed some of Vivaldi's works, is obvious, but the concerto is animated, sp ling, melodic; if it lack certain it has glow, melody and brill ing of a sort for the strings. The slow movement goes deeper. The performance was a lively one, though the string tone has had a finer texture than it did yesterday. There was also a musicianly and straightforward reading of Haydn's symphony ence heartily applauded ances.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 1 3 192

GOOD FORM prevailed at the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall last evening. If the band in two or three instances kicked up its pretty heels and defied its eminent conductor, the latter, in the person of Serge Koussewitsky, never for a moment lapsed from the pinnacle of poise and rhythmic dignity whereon he was placed. The program, which ranged from Boccherini to Moussorgsky, and took in midway both Dukas and Respighi, proved to be another of those three-ringed orchestral circuses in which Mr. Koussewitsky specializes. Albert Spalding, violinist, was the soloist.

But the evening as a whole was singularly unsatisfactory. None of the music played was more than moderately interesting. Boccherini's C-major Symphony (a performance of which in New York we have been unable to trace) is a gracefully formal and uninspired trifle. Its idiom is archaic, but in no way a prophecy. The Dukas "Le Peri" is familiar—it was an old pet of Mr. Monteux, whose affinity for the more modern Frenchmen is now a matter of legend. Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the Ravel orchestration was first presented here earlier in the season at one of the Boston Saturday matinees.

In all this music Mr. Koussewitsky felt himself very much at home. The virtuosity that is his dominant trait was admirably placed in the two modern scores, where pictorial effectiveness is about all that counts. One does not find in "Le Peri" the Dukas of "Ariane et Barbe Bleu" any more than one finds in the "Pictures" the Moussorgsky of "Boris." Both scores are long-winded and monotonous.

Mr. Spalding played the Respighi Concerto with all the beauty of tone, of phrase and excellence of technique of which he is capable. But we rather feel that his efforts were in part wasted on unworthy material. The Concerto Gregoriano is a sturdy score, strongly built up and at times breathing forth a sort of grave ecstasy. But it is far too long; the ideas, lovely as they are, have not the strength to wararnt so exhaustive a treatment as Respighi has given them. The first movement in itself would be sufficient—in it the composer reaches his highest level, and what follows in the finale is anti-climacteric.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

MAR 1 4 1926

"GUESTS" AND WHAT THE BRING.

Announcement that the three cond tors of the Philharmonic Society w have officiated this season are to retu under presumably the same conditi will be a gratification to the audien that have been filling Carnegie H The men who direct the fortunes of institution intend to provide the best can be obtained. So do those who di the fortunes of the New York Sy phony Orchestra. Messrs. MENGELBER TOSCANINI and FURTWAENGLER of t one, Messrs. DAMROSCH, GOOSSENS an KLEMPERER of the other, stand at th head of their profession. They all have such an opportunity to exercise their art here as is surpassed nowhere else in the world. Not only are the quality and discipline of the men over whom they are put as good as any, but the possibilities of rehearsal—which means the full realization of their ideals—are much greater than are now to be afforded in any other country. The results they obtain are correspondingly fine. The Friends of Music, under Mr. BODANZKY, not wholly devoted to orchestral performances, give many things that are not otherwise to be supplied to the community.

The State Symphony Orchestra, which had an unfortunate start and never got over it, showed a regrettable resemblance to the storied horse that died just as he had mastered the art of living on sawdust. It had to disband for lack of support just as it had attained a real skill and efficiency and was doing admirable work under ERNST VON DOHNANYI. It might have done interesting things under ALFREDO CASELLA. We have with us perennially also the Philadelphia Orchestra, over which Mr. STOKOWSKI exercises skill of a kind that has its exact counterpart perhaps nowhere else; and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, with Mr. KOUSSEVITZKY, has regained in popularity all it lost through unfortunate incidents now receding into history. There are occasional visits from other orchestras straying from their usual orbits, as the Cleveland Orchestra, which showed its excellent quality under Mr. SOKOLOFF and the Cincinnati Orchestra under M REINER.

The audiences at orchestra performances have been larger than ever before. This raises the question whether there might not have been room for three symphony orchestras in New York if the State Orchestra could only have lived long enough to demonstrate its merits to a larger clientèle. Interest is not well enough or fairly enough divided; for even among our highly intelligent and well informed audiences there is a good deal of fashion and "crowd psychology." There are, for instance, long waiting lists of would-be patrons of some orchestral series who do not think of transferring their patronage, even temporarily, to an enterprise from which, though unfashionable, their spiritual nourishment would be very good, though perhaps not so fine as that for which they are waiting.

The ever changing list of conductors creates great talk and discussion; and discussion is all to the good of any art, if accompanied by thought and a certain amount of knowledge. But it would be better if the talk and discussion were more of music than of men. The conductor is perhaps not quite so all-important and all-absorbing a personage as he would seem to be at the present time. Not that we could get along without him. In Leningrad, where all men are equal if they are of the proletariat, and none can command, they give orchestral concerts without a conductor. But somebody, whether he is a conductor or not, directs some twenty or twenty-five rehearsals for each concert beforehand. Whether or not he is shot at sunrise the next morning if the concert does not go well we are not told.

There is no need of such drastic measures in New York under present conditions. AUGUST MANNS, who was an orchestral autocrat in London some fifty years ago or so, used to say that any orchestra would play as badly as the conductor would let it. That is distinctly not true in these days of our orchestras. There is more good-will, more artistic

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNATTI, OHIO
Commercial - Tribune

COMMER

fluence

Showing principal ol Chiefs are
The Head
dle of each
P. Prince, L

INFORMATION OBSCURED

192

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MERCURY
NEW BEDFORD, MASS

MAR 1 3 1926

The "Symphonic Piece" by Henry Gilbert, who designed the musical accompaniment for "Down to the Sea in Ships," was presented in New York Thursday night by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The ~~New~~ York Herald-Tribune says:

The feature of last night's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie hall, Mr. Koussevitzky conducting, was the performance, for the first time in New York, of a new composition by the American composer, Henry F. Gilbert.

Mr. Gilbert's work, which he calls by the simple but sufficient title, "Symphonic Piece," was completed last autumn. It was originally intended as the first movement of a symphony, but Mr. Gilbert was advised to send it out into the world uncompanioned, and this he has done. The work was performed for the first time anywhere a fortnight ago in Boston, under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky.

Mr. Gilbert has stated that the work has no "programme." It was not suggested by any poem, play o story; it is just music. Yet Mr. Gilbert confesses that he had at least an aim, if not a programme: he wished, he says, "to reflect or express the American character, or spirit," as felt by himself. That spirit, as he sees it, is "energetic, optimistic, nervous, impatient of restraint; and, in its highest aspect, is a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit, which is America, is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration, with plenty of jingoism, vulgarity and 'Hurrah, boys!'"

Some of this American mood, says Mr. Gilbert, he has tried to reflect in his music. His first theme is designed to express the "Hurrah boys!" note. The second theme, for contrast, has a ight suggestion of Stephen Foster—t contains a remote suggestion of "Old Folks at Home," interspersed ith a couple of measures from "The kansas Traveler." These bits are ade use of and developed in the ual symphonic manner.

r. Gilbert has employed familiar rican materials. His music makes our often effective use of rag- nd it is full of the influence of ar idioms, some of them frank- sentimental, others exuberantly y. The opening section has an exlarating swing and dash and pep, d there are some witty references current styles platform to acknowledge the enthusiasm.

The Boston Herald says of Lambert Murphy, who used to sing at the Unitarian Memorial church in Fairhaven:

At Jordan hall last evening, Lambert Murphy, tenor, gave a song recital, at which he sang the following songs, as well as several encores. Charles Albert Baker was his accompanist:

Recitative and aria, "Waft her angels, through the skies," Handel; Fussreise, Anacreon's Grab, Wenn Du zu den Blumen gehst, Er ist's, Hugo Wolf; D'une Prison, Hector Panizza; Mandoline, Gabriel Dupont; Avril Gaston Paulin; La Chanson des Cloches, Felix Fourdrain; Chevauchee Cosque, Felix Fourdrain; On Eribeg Island, H. O. Osgood; Awake, it is the Day, Cecil Burleigh; Cherry-Flowers, Mabel W. Daniels; Bab-Loch-Hythe, Martin Shaw; St. Valentine's Day Edward Ballantine; A Spirit Flower, Campbell-Tipton; Murmuring Zephyr, Jensen; Kathleen Mavourneen, Crouch; Sylvia, Oley-Speaks; The Sorrows of Death (from "Hymn of Praise") with organ accompaniment, Mendelssohn.

Among that long suffering fraternity to which some one so gently flung the epithet of "disease" there are stil. some who do not "tenorize," who sing not only with fluency, but with nuance as well, and who show signs of an active imagination and intelligence.

And Mr. Lambert Murphy belongs quite decidedly in this category, despite the fact that he did include two groups of a somewhat nondescript miscellany last evening, and that at times his singing was marred with a little vibrato. For he has a very subtle sense of musical style and penetration of mood, an admirable diction, and a voice of a warm, vibrant quality.

He sang the Handel very dramatically, yet without breaking the dignity and the continuousness of the musical line. Some of the songs of the Hugo Wolf group were marred by the obstreperousness of Mr. Baker's accompaniments, which at times quite obliterated Mr. Murphy's voice.

But it was in the first of these, and in the French group that Mr. Murphy was at his best, especially in the lovely and impressionistic "Avril," which he sang with such fervor, and such exquisite nuancing that it was demanded again of him. Again, in the quite different lyrics of Fourdrain, in his "chanson des cloches"—almost every French composer seems to have written one of these—and in the strident, challenging song of the Cossacks, he proved himself equally happy, both as a vocalist and as an interpreter.

It was in the first of the Hugo Wolf songs, and again in one of the French group, that he achieved some unusually beautiful, firm head tones, and an irreproachable falsetto. The coloratura flourishes of the Handel did not go so well and at times, his high notes did not quite hit the mark. There was a very large audience which showed evident signs of its approval.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Much modern music was heard yesterday. Much of it was of dubious value. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, gave its second concert of the week and the fourth matinee of its New York series in the afternoon in Carnegie Hall. On that occasion it presented two new compositions by living composers, with other music by Vivaldi, Haydn and de Falla. The new works were Germaine Taillefere's "Jeux de plein air" and Paul Hindemith's concerto for orchestra, Op. 38. The "Jeux de plein air" was originally for two pianos. It was orchestrated last Summer. The two "outdoor games" tonally pictured by Miss Taillefere are respectively "La Tirelitentatine" and "Cache-cache mitoula." These games are described by one Mr. Rabelais in Book I, Chapter 22, of the "Life of Gargantua and Pantagruel," but Miss Taillefere says they are simple outdoor games. The pieces are short, inoffensive and about as far as could be from Rabelais. The young lady who composed them bowed from the platform to cordial and sustained applause.

The concerto of Hindemith is ugly and dull music. It is astonishing that a composer could have spent the time that the mere writing down of the notes requires—notes without significance of a musical or emotional kind, here and there employed with a fluency deserving of better things. There are four movements. But one pause separates the beginning of the score from the end. All kinds of dissonant effects are there. Where is music?

De Falla is in a different case, but the dances taken from his ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," are anything but convincing. They are patches of melody and rhythm strung together, th orchestration intended to be ef- tive in the Spanish manner. But is good in the music is princi- its instrumentation, while the he atmosphere, the personality es of de Falla which came n this one are conspicuous by

If Mr. Koussevitsky were asked his own opinion of such works it might be as "adverse" to them as this article, but he would probably retort to a questioner that modern music is not the fault of a nductor, but of the composer, and that an important part of a conductor's duty is keeping his audience in close touch with what contemporaneous musicians are doing. Certainly he could not be accused of any form of nationalistic favoritism yesterday.

The opening works were the concerto for string orchestra of Antonio Vivaldi and the Haydn "Surprise" symphony. Thereafter Mr. Koussevitsky presented music by a young Frenchwoman, a young German and a prominent Spaniard. He chose no favorites and unquestionably did all that lay in his power for the artists he represented. Such curiosity and catholicity of choice is commendable, while, on the her hand, it may be remarked that there is much modern music that is interesting, and that only a few programs are given each Winter in this city by the Boston Symphony.

The performances that gave the most pleasure were those of substantial works of other days. Substantial at least, in comparison with what followed. The thinness of Vivaldi, as contrasted with what we know of Bach, for example, who transcribed some of Vivaldi's works, is obvious, but the concerto is animated, sp ling, melodic; if it lack certain it has glow, melody and brill ing of a sort for the strings. The slow movement goes deeper. The performance was a lively one, though the string tone has had a finer texture than it did yesterday. There was also a musicianly and straightforward reading of Haydn's symphony ence heartily applauded ances.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 1 6 192

GOOD FORM prevailed at the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall last evening. If the band in two or three instances kicked up its pretty heels and defied its eminent conductor, the latter, in the person of Serge Koussewitsky, never for a moment lapsed from the pinnacle of poise and rhythmic dignity whereon he was placed. The program, which ranged from Boccherini to Moussorgsky, and took in midway both Dukas and Respighi, proved to be another of those three-ringed orchestral circuses in which Mr. Koussewitsky specializes. Albert Spalding, violinist, was the soloist.

But the evening as a whole was singularly unsatisfactory. None of the music played was more than moderately interesting. Boccherini's C-major Symphony (a performance of which in New York we have been unable to trace) is a gracefully formal and uninspired trifle. Its idiom is archaic, but in no way a prophecy. The Dukas "Le Peri" is familiar—it was an old pet of Mr. Monteux, whose affinity for the more modern Frenchmen is now a matter of legend. Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the Ravel orchestration was first presented here earlier in the season at one of the Boston Saturday matinees.

In all this music Mr. Koussewitsky felt himself very much at home. The virtuosity that is his dominant trait was admirably placed in the two modern scores, where pictorial effectiveness is about all that counts. One does not find in "Le Peri" the Dukas of "Ariane et Barbe Bleu" any more than one finds in the "Pictures" the Moussorgsky of "Boris." Both scores are long-winded and monotonous.

Mr. Spalding played the Respighi Concerto with all the beauty of tone, of phrase and excellence of technique of which he is capable. But we rather feel that his efforts were in part wasted on unworthy material. The Concerto Gregoriano is a sturdy score, strongly built up and at times breathing forth a sort of grave ecstasy. But it is far too long; the ideas, lovely as they are, have not the strength to wararnt so exhaustive a treatment as Respighi has given them. The first movement in itself would be sufficient—in it the composer reaches his highest level, and what follows in the finale is anti-climacteric.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

MAR 1 4 1926

"GUESTS" AND WHAT THE BRING.

Announcement that the three cond tors of the Philharmonic Society w have officiated this seas are to retu under presumably the same conditi will be a gratification to the audien that have been filling Carnegie H The men who direct the fortunes of t institution intend to provide the best can be obtained. So do those who di the fortunes of the New York Sy phony Orchestra. Messrs. MENGELBER TOSCANINI and FURTWAENGLER of t one, Messrs. DAMROSCH, GOOSSENS an KLEMPERER of the other, stand at th head of their profession. They all have such an opportunity to exercise their art here as is surpassed nowhere else in the world. Not only are the quality and discipline of the men over whom they are put as good as any, but the possibilities of rehearsal—which means the full realization of their ideals—are much greater than are now to be afforded in any other country. The results they obtain are correspondingly fine. The Friends of Music, under Mr. BODANZKY, not wholly devoted to orchestral performances, give many things that are not otherwise to be supplied to the community.

The State Symphony Orchestra, which had an unfortunate start and never got over it, showed a regrettable resemblance to the storied horse that died just as he had mastered the art of living on sawdust. It had to disband for lack of support just as it had attained a real skill and efficiency and was doing admirable work under ERNST VON DOHNANYI. It might have done interesting things under ALFREDO CASELLA. We have with us perennially also the Philadelphia Orchestra, over which Mr. STOKOWSKI exercises skill of a kind that has its exact counterpart perhaps nowhere else; and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, with Mr. KOUSSEVITZKY, has regained in popularity all it lost through unfortunate incidents now receding into history. There are occasional visits from other orchestras straying from their usual orbits, as the Cleveland Orchestra, which showed its excellent quality under Mr. SOKOLOFF and the Cincinnati Orchestra under M REINER.

The audiences at orchestra performances have been larger than ever before. This raises the question whether there might not have been room for three symphony orchestras in New York if the State Orchestra could only have lived long enough to demonstrate its merits to a larger clientèle. Interest is not well enough or fairly enough divided; for even among our highly intelligent and well informed audiences there is a good deal of fashion and "crowd psychology." There are, for instance, long waiting lists of would-be patrons of some orchestral series who do not think of transferring their patronage, even temporarily, to an enterprise from which, though unfashionable, their spiritual nourishment would be very good, though perhaps not so fine as that for which they are waiting.

The ever changing list of conductors creates great talk and discussion; and discussion is all to the good of any art, if accompanied by thought and a certain amount of knowledge. But it would be better if the talk and discussion were more of music than of men. The conductor is perhaps not quite so all-important and all-absorbing a personage as he would seem to be at the present time. Not that we could get along without him. In Leningrad, where all men are equal if they are of the proletariat, and none can command, they give orchestral concerts without a conductor. But somebody, whether he is a conductor or not, directs some twenty or twenty-five rehearsals for each concert beforehand. Whether or not he is shot at sunrise the next morning if the concert does not go well we are not told.

There is no need of such drastic measures in New York under present conditions. AUGUST MANNS, who was an orchestral autocrat in London some fifty years ago or so, used to say that any orchestra would play as badly as the conductor would let it. That is distinctly not true in these days of our orchestras. There is more good-will, more artistic

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNATI, OHIO
Commercial - Tribune

COMMER

fluence

Showing principal ol Chiefs are
The Head
dle of each
P. Prince, L

INFORMATION OBSCURED

1926

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MERCURY
NEW BEDFORD, MASS

MAR 1 3 1926

The "Symphonic Piece" by Henry Gilbert, who designed the musical accompaniment for "Down to the Sea in Ships," was presented in New York Thursday night by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The ~~New~~ York Herald-Tribune says:

The feature of last night's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie hall, Mr. Koussevitzky conducting, was the performance, for the first time in New York, of a new composition by the American composer, Henry F. Gilbert.

Mr. Gilbert's work, which he calls by the simple but sufficient title, "Symphonic Piece," was completed last autumn. It was originally intended as the first movement of a symphony, but Mr. Gilbert was advised to send it out into the world uncompanioned, and this he has done. The work was performed for the first time anywhere a fortnight ago in Boston, under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky.

Mr. Gilbert has stated that the work has no "programme." It was not suggested by any poem, play or story; it is just music. Yet Mr. Gilbert confesses that he had at least an aim, if not a programme: he wished, he says, "to reflect or express the American character, or spirit," as felt by himself. That spirit, as he sees it, is "energetic, optimistic, nervous, impatient of restraint; and, in its highest aspect, is a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit, which is America, is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration, with plenty of jingoism, vulgarity and 'Hurrah, boys!'"

Some of this American mood, says Mr. Gilbert, he has tried to reflect in his music. His first theme is designed to express the "Hurrah boys!" note. The second theme, for contrast, has a light suggestion of Stephen Foster—'t contains a remote suggestion of "Old Folks at Home," interspersed ith a couple of measures from "The kansas Traveler." These bits are ade use of and developed in the ual symphonic manner.

r. Gilbert has employed familiar rican materials. His music makes our often effective use of rag- nd it is full of the influence of ar idioms, some of them frankly sentimental, others exuberantly y. The opening section has an exhilarating swing and dash and pep, and there are some witty references to current styles in jazz. But the work is too long for its subject-matter, and it lacks contrast. One wearies of the monotony of the rhythmic formulas long before the end.

Mr. Koussevitzky played the new score with great spirit, and there was much applause at its close. Mr. Gilbert was persuaded to appear on the platform to acknowledge the enthusiasm.

The Boston Herald says of Lambert Murphy, who used to sing at the Unitarian Memorial church in Fairhaven:

At Jordan hall last evening, Lambert Murphy, tenor, gave a song recital, at which he sang the following songs, as well as several encores. Charles Albert Baker was his accompanist:

Recitative and aria, "Waft her angels, through the skies," Handel; Fussreise, Anacreon's Grab, Wenn Du zu den Blumen gehst, Er ist's, Hugo Wolf; D'une Prison, Hector Panizza; Mandoline, Gabriel Dupont; Avril Gaston Paulin; La Chanson des Cloches, Felix Fourdrain; Chevauchee Cosque, Felix Fourdrain; On Eribeg Island, H. O. Osgood; Awake, it is the Day, Cecil Burleigh; Cherry-Flowers, Mabel W. Daniels; Bab-Loch-Hythe, Martin Shaw; St. Valentine's Day, Edward Ballantine; A Spirit Flower, Campbell-Tipton; Murmuring Zephyr, Jensen; Kathleen Mavourneen, Crouch; Sylvia, Oley-Speaks; The Sorrows of Death (from "Hymn of Praise") with organ accompaniment, Mendelssohn.

Among that long suffering fraternity to which some one so gently flung the epithet of "disease" there are still some who do not "tenorize," who sing not only with fluency, but with nuance as well, and who show signs of an active imagination and intelligence.

And Mr. Lambert Murphy belongs quite decidedly in this category, despite the fact that he did include two groups of a somewhat nondescript miscellany last evening, and that at times his singing was marred with a little vibrato. For he has a very subtle sense of musical style and penetration of mood, an admirable diction, and a voice of a warm, vibrant quality.

He sang the Handel very dramatically, yet without breaking the dignity and the continuousness of the musical line. Some of the songs of the Hugo Wolf group were marred by the obstreperousness of Mr. Baker's accompaniments, which at times quite obliterated Mr. Murphy's voice.

But it was in the first of these, and in the French group that Mr. Murphy was at his best, especially in the lovely and impressionistic "Avril," which he sang with such fervor, and such exquisite nuancing that it was demanded again of him. Again, in the quite different lyrics of Fourdrain, in his "chanson des cloches"—almost every French composer seems to have written one of these—and in the strident, challenging song of the Cossacks, he proved himself equally happy, both as a vocalist and as an interpreter.

It was in the first of the Hugo Wolf songs, and again in one of the French group, that he achieved some unusually beautiful, firm head tones, and an irreproachable falsetto. The coloratura flourishes of the Handel did not go so well and at times, his high notes did not quite hit the mark. There was a very large audience which showed evident signs of its approval.

---

p[illegible] by living composers, with other music by Vivaldi, Haydn and de Falla. The new works were Germaine Taillefere's "Jeux de plein air" and Paul Hindemith's concerto for orchestra, Op. 38. The "Jeux de plein air" was originally for two pianos. It was orchestrated last Summer. The two "outdoor games" tonally pictured by Miss Taillefere are respectively "La Tirelitentatine" and "Cache-cache mitoula." These games are described by one Mr. Rabelais in Book I, Chapter 22, of the "Life of Gargantua and Pantagruel," but Miss Taillefere says they are simple outdoor games. The pieces are short, inoffensive and about as far as could be from Rabelais. The young lady who composed them bowed from the platform to cordial and sustained applause.

The concerto of Hindemith is ugly and dull music. It is astonishing that a composer could have spent the time that the mere writing down of the notes requires—notes without significance of a musical or emotional kind, here and there employed with a fluency deserving of better things. There are four movements. But one pause separates the beginning of the score from the end. All kinds of dissonant effects are there. Where is music?

De Falla is in a different case, but the dances taken from his ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," are anything but convincing. They are patches of melody and rhythm strung together, th orchestration intended to be ef- tive in the Spanish manner. But [illegible] is good in the music is principally its instrumentation, while the [illegible] he atmosphere, the personality [illegible] es of de Falla which came [illegible] n this one are conspicuous by

If Mr. Koussevitsky were asked his own opinion of such works it might be as "adverse" to them as this article, but he would probably retort to a questioner that modern music is not the fault of a conductor, but of the composer, and that an important part of a conductor's duty is keeping his audience in close touch with what contemporaneous musicians are doing. Certainly he could not be accused of any form of nationalistic favoritism yesterday.

The opening works were the concerto for string orchestra of Antonio Vivaldi and the Haydn "Surprise" symphony. Thereafter Mr. Koussevitsky presented music by a young Frenchwoman, a young German and a prominent Spaniard. He chose no favorites and unquestionably did all that lay in his power for the artists he represented. Such curiosity and catholicity of choice is commendable, while, on the other hand, it may be remarked that there is much modern music that is interesting, and that only a few programs are given each Winter in this city by the Boston Symphony.

The performances that gave the most pleasure were those of substantial works of other days. Substantial at least, in comparison with what followed. The thinness of Vivaldi, as contrasted with what we know of Bach, for example, who transcribed some of Vivaldi's works, is obvious, but the concerto is animated, sp[illegible] ling, melodic; if it lack[illegible] certain [illegible] it has glow, melody and brill[illegible] ing of a sort for the strings. The slow movement goes deeper. The performance was a lively one, though the string tone has had a finer texture than it did yesterday. There was also a musicianly and straightforward reading of Haydn's symphony [illegible] ence heartily applauded [illegible] ances.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 13 1926

GOOD FORM prevailed at the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall last evening. If the band in two or three instances kicked up its pretty heels and defied its eminent conductor, the latter, in the person of Serge Koussewitsky, never for a moment lapsed from the pinnacle of poise and rhythmic dignity whereon he was placed. The program, which ranged from Boccherini to Moussorgsky, and took in midway both Dukas and Respighi, proved to be another of those three-ringed orchestral circuses in which Mr. Koussewitsky specializes. Albert Spalding, violinist, was the soloist.

But the evening as a whole was singularly unsatisfactory. None of the music played was more than moderately interesting. Boccherini's C-major Symphony (a performance of which in New York we have been unable to trace) is a gracefully formal and uninspired trifle. Its idiom is archaic, but in no way a prophecy. The Dukas "Le Peri" is familiar—it was an old pet of Mr. Monteux, whose affinity for the more modern Frenchmen is now a matter of legend. Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the Ravel orchestration was first presented here earlier in the season at one of the Boston Saturday matinees.

In all this music Mr. Koussewitsky felt himself very much at home. The virtuosity that is his dominant trait was admirably placed in the two modern scores, where pictorial effectiveness is about all that counts. One does not find in "Le Peri" the Dukas of "Ariane et Barbe Bleu" any more than one finds in the "Pictures" the Moussorgsky of "Boris." Both scores are long-winded and monotonous.

Mr. Spalding played the Respighi Concerto with all the beauty of tone, of phrase and excellence of technique of which he is capable. But we rather feel that his efforts were in part wasted on unworthy material. The Concerto Gregoriano is a sturdy score, strongly built up and at times breathing forth a sort of grave ecstasy. But it is far too long; the ideas, lovely as they are, have not the strength to wararnt so exhaustive a treatment as Respighi has given them. The first movement in itself would be sufficient—in it the composer reaches his highest level, and what follows in the finale is anti-climacteric.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

MAR 1 4 1926

"GUESTS" AND WHAT THE BRING.

Announcement that the three cond tors of the Philharmonic Society w have officiated this season are to retu under presumably the same conditi will be a gratification to the audien that have been filling Carnegie H The men who direct the fortunes of t institution intend to provide the best t can be obtained. So do those who di the fortunes of the New York Sy phony Orchestra. Messrs. MENGELBER TOSCANINI and FURTWAENGLER of t one, Messrs. DAMROSCH, GOOSSENS an KLEMPERER of the other, stand at th head of their profession. They all have such an opportunity to exercise their art here as is surpassed nowhere else in the world. Not only are the quality and discipline of the men over whom they are put as good as any, but the possibilities of rehearsal—which means the full realization of their ideals—are much greater than are now to be afforded in any other country. The results they obtain are correspondingly fine. The Friends of Music, under Mr. BODANZKY, not wholly devoted to orchestral performances, give many things that are not otherwise to be supplied to the community.

The State Symphony Orchestra, which had an unfortunate start and never got over it, showed a regrettable resemblance to the storied horse that died just as he had mastered the art of living on sawdust. It had to disband for lack of support just as it had attained a real skill and efficiency and was doing admirable work under ERNST VON DOHNANYI. It might have done interesting things under ALFREDO CASELLA. We have with us perennially also the Philadelphia Orchestra, over which Mr. STOKOWSKI exercises skill of a kind that has its exact counterpart perhaps nowhere else; and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, with Mr. KOUSSEVITZKY, has regained in popularity all it lost through unfortunate incidents now receding into history. There are occasional visits from other orchestras straying from their usual orbits, as the Cleveland Orchestra, which showed its excellent quality under Mr. SOKOLOFF and the Cincinnati Orchestra under M REINER.

The audiences at orchestra performances have been larger than ever before. This raises the question whether there might not have been room for three symphony orchestras in New York if the State Orchestra could only have lived long enough to demonstrate its merits to a larger clientèle. Interest is not well enough or fairly enough divided; for even among our highly intelligent and well informed audiences there is a good deal of fashion and "crowd psychology." There are, for instance, long waiting lists of would-be patrons of some orchestral series who do not think of transferring their patronage, even temporarily, to an enterprise from which, though unfashionable, their spiritual nourishment would be very good, though perhaps not so fine as that for which they are waiting.

The ever changing list of conductors creates great talk and discussion; and discussion is all to the good of any art, if accompanied by thought and a certain amount of knowledge. But it would be better if the talk and discussion were more of music than of men. The conductor is perhaps not quite so all-important and all-absorbing a personage as he would seem to be at the present time. Not that we could get along without him. In Leningrad, where all men are equal if they are of the proletariat, and none can command, they give orchestral concerts without a conductor. But somebody, whether he is a conductor or not, directs some twenty or twenty-five rehearsals for each concert beforehand. Whether or not he is shot at sunrise the next morning if the concert does not go well we are not told.

There is no need of such drastic measures in New York under present conditions. AUGUST MANNS, who was an orchestral autocrat in London some fifty years ago or so, used to say that any orchestra would play as badly as the conductor would let it. That is distinctly not true in these days of our orchestras. There is more good-will, more artistic

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNATI, OHIO
Commercial - Tribune

COMMER

fluence

Showing principal old Chiefs are
The Head
dle of each
P. Prince, L

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 1 6 192

wledge the en-
.
d says of Lam
ed to sing at the hurch in Fair-

r evening. Lamgave a song reg the following several encores.
was his accom-

ia. "Waft her skies," Handel:
Grab. Wenn Du
Er ist's. Hugo
lector Panizza:
Dupont: Avril
Chanson des ain; Chevauchee
ain; On Eribeg
Awake, it is the Cherry-Flowers,
ab-Loch-Hythe,
lentine's Day Spirit Flower,
muring Zephyr,
Mavourneen,
eaks; The Sor-
m "Hymn of ccompaniment.

ring fraternity
ently flung the here are still norize," who ncy, but with o show signs
n and intelli-

rphy belongs category, ded include two nondescript and that at marred with a has a very l style and n admirable
a warm, vi-

ry dramatic-ng the dig-ness of the he songs of ere marred ss of Mr.
which at
Mr. Murphy's

f these, and
Mr. Murphy
in the lovevril," which r, and such it was de-ain, in the ourdrain, in es"—almost ms to have nd in the g of the elf equally and as an

Hugo Wolf
the French
e unusual-es, and an coloratura not go so notes did ere was a showed al.

e asked his it might be
this article, retort to a music is not but of the portant part keeping his h what con-
are doing.
accused of favoritism

re the con-of Antonio
"Surprise"
Mr. Kousseby a young erman and a e chose no ably did all r the artists uriosity and commendable,
d, it may be much modern and that only each Winter
Symphony.
t gave the
of substan-Substantial
with what fol-Vivaldi, as we know of transcribed
s, is obvious,
nated, sp certain brill strings. The per. The per-ne, though the finer texture here was also forward read-

GOOD FORM prevailed at the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall last evening. If the band in two or three instances kicked up its pretty heels and defied its eminent conductor, the latter, in the person of Serge Koussewitsky, never for a moment lapsed from the pinnacle of poise and rhythmic dignity whereon he was placed. The program, which ranged from Boccherini to Moussorgsky, and took in midway both Dukas and Respighi, proved to be another of those three-ringed orchestral circuses in which Mr. Koussewitsky specializes. Albert Spalding, violinist, was the soloist.

But the evening as a whole was singularly unsatisfactory. None of the music played was more than moderately interesting. Boccherini's C-major Symphony (a performance of which in New York we have been unable to trace) is a gracefully formal and uninspired trifle. Its idiom is archaic, but in no way a prophecy. The Dukas "Le Peri" is familiar—it was an old pet of Mr. Monteux, whose affinity for the more modern Frenchmen is now a matter of legend. Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the Ravel orchestration was first presented here earlier in the season at one of the Boston Saturday matinees.

In all this music Mr. Koussewitsky felt himself very much at home. The virtuosity that is his dominant trait was admirably placed in the two modern scores, where pictorial effectiveness is about all that counts. One does not find in "Le Peri" the Dukas of "Ariane et Barbe Bleu" any more than one finds in the "Pictures" the Moussorgsky of "Boris." Both scores are long-winded and monotonous.

Mr. Spalding played the Respighi Concerto with all the beauty of tone, of phrase and excellence of technique of which he is capable. But we rather feel that his efforts were in part wasted on unworthy material. The Concerto Gregoriano is a sturdy score, strongly built up and at times breathing forth a sort of grave ecstasy. But it is far too long; the ideas, lovely as they are, have not the strength to wararnt so exhaustive a treatment as Respighi has given them. The first movement in itself would be sufficient—in it the composer reaches his highest level, and what follows in the finale is anti-climacteric.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

MAR 1 4 1926

"GUESTS" AND WHAT THI BRING.

Announcement that the three cond tors of the Philharmonic Society w have officiated this season are to re under presumably the same condi will be a gratification to the audie that have been filling Carnegie
The men who direct the fortunes of institution intend to provide the best can be obtained. So do those who di the fortunes of the New York S phony Orchestra. Messrs. Mengelb Toscanini and Furtwaengler of one, Messrs. Damrosch, Goossens Klemperer of the other, stand at head of their profession. They all h such an opportunity to exercise their here as is surpassed nowhere else in world. Not only are the quality and cipline of the men over whom they put as good as any, but the possibili of rehearsal—which means the full re zation of their ideals—are much grea than are now to be afforded in any o country. The results they obtain correspondingly fine. The Friends Music, under Mr. Bodanzky, not wh devoted to orchestral performances, g many things that are not otherwise to supplied to the community.

The State Symphony Orchestra, wh had an unfortunate start and never over it, showed a regrettable resembla to the storied horse that died just as had mastered the art of living on sa dust. It had to disband for lack of su port just as it had attained a real sk and efficiency and was doing admiral work under Ernst von Dohnanyi.
might have done interesting things und Alfredo Casella. We have with us pe ennially also the Philadelphia Orchestr over which Mr. Stokowski exercis skill of a kind that has its exact counte part perhaps nowhere else; and the Bo ton Symphony Orchestra, which, with M Koussevitzky, has regained in popula ity all it lost through unfortunate inc dents now receding into history. Ther are occasional visits from other or chestras straying from their usual orbits as the Cleveland Orchestra, which showe its excellent quality under Mr. Sokoloff and the Cincinnati Orchestra under Mr.
Reiner.

The audiences at orchestra performances have been larger than ever before. This raises the question whether there might not have been room for three symphony orchestras in New York if the State Orchestra could only have lived long enough to demonstrate its merits to a larger clientèle. Interest is not well enough or fairly enough divided; for even among our highly intelligent and well informed audiences there is a good deal of fashion and "crowd psychology." There are, for instance, long waiting lists of would-be patrons of some orchestral series who do not think of transferring their patronage, even temporarily, to an enterprise from which, though unfashionable, their spiritual nourishment would be very good, though perhaps not so fine as that for which they are waiting.

The ever changing list of conductors creates great talk and discussion; and discussion is all to the good of any art, if accompanied by thought and a certain amount of knowledge. But it would be better if the talk and discussion were more of music than of men. The conductor is perhaps not quite so all-important and all-absorbing a personage as he would seem to be at the present time. Not that we could get along without him. In Leningrad, where all men are equal if they are of the proletariat, and none can command, they give orchestral concerts without a conductor. But somebody, whether he is a conductor or not, directs some twenty or twenty-five rehearsals for each concert beforehand. Whether or not he is shot at sunrise the next morning if the concert does not go well we are not told.

There is no need of such drastic measures in New York under present conditions. August Manns, who was an orchestral autocrat in London some fifty years ago or so, used to say that any orchestra would play as badly as the conductor would let it. That is distinctly not true in these days of our orchestras. There is more good-will, more artistic

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNATTI, OHIO
Commercial - Tribune

Checking Up on the Facts

By NEAL O'HARA.

(Copyright, 1926, by The Press Publishing Company.)

BIRTHS OF THE NATION BECOME FIFTH OR SIXTH INDUSTRY

AUTO OUTPUT
BABY OUTPUT

TODAY'S best batch of statistics show America is producing more automobiles than babies every year. There is plenty of parking space for the stork, but the old bird doesn't seem to make as many landings as he used to make. Something ought to be done about this condition. It is more serious than halitosis.

Think of it! Motor car production exceeding that of babies! There is something wrong with a nation that has more body squeaks and rattles than cooings and teething rings. Babies are only our fifth or sixth leading industry now.

"Yes, I know all about it," said Prof. J. K. Gronkle, the famous economist, "but there is nothing to worry about. Two years ago mah jongg sets outnumbered babies, but the whole thing righted itself. Today there are five sets of triplets to every mah jongg set in use.

"The fact is," continued the professor, "the automobile makers are constantly improving their product, whereas the same old line of babies is being produced. That is why the stork assembling plants have suffered a loss of orders. For instance, look at what you buy in the motor market now—limousines, sport cars, snappy roadsters, sedans, phaetons and broughams. Then look at the line of babies—they are all runabouts.

"The style in kiddies' bodies hasn't changed a single bit. They also have the same old colors—white, yellow and brown. They have no yearly models, either. They all weigh from five to ten pounds. And you can't get a baby for $5 down. No, sir! Ask the man who owns one.

"Furthermore," Prof. Gronkle continued, "no improvements have been made in infants. Motor experts have cut down the consumption of gasoline so you can get from twenty to thirty miles a gallon. But a baby can go quietly on a bottle of milk for only ten minutes.

"More and more conveniences have been added to the automobile's standard equipment. But for a baby look at all the accessories you have to purchase. It is true that auto tire prices have jumped considerably in the past year, but so has rubber sheeting. Yes, the advantage is all with the motor car.

"It is true there are no freight and tax extras when the stork delivers a baby, but they demand a lot of service to offset that. In fact," concluded the professor, "there is only one advantage an infant has over an automobile. It is sixteen years before a feminine baby has to be painted."

Additional light was thrown on the subject when statistics proved the Smith College alumnae only produced one and one-half baby each. The second baby never seems to be complete.

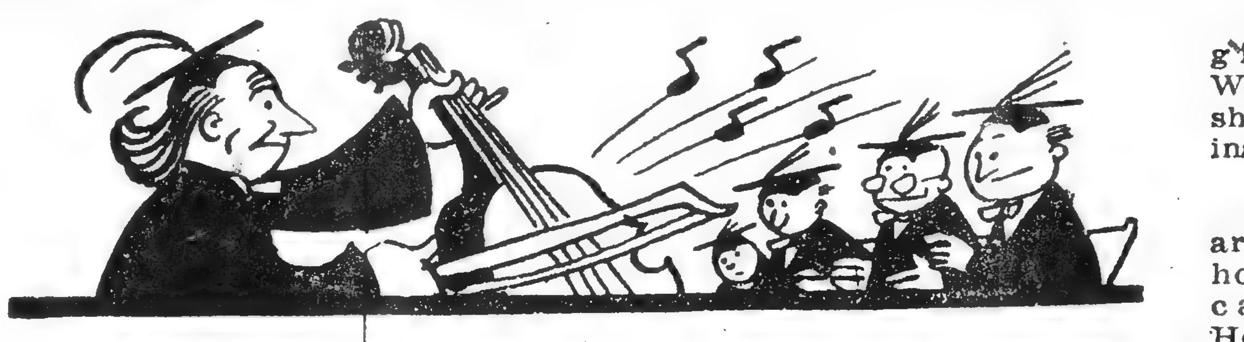
Imagine that! Smith College girls are mammas of only one and one-half baby each. When a Smith alumna's husband is waiting for returns from the maternity ward he doesn't ask the doctor if it's twins. He inquires if the baby is a whole one or a half one.

Harvard graduates are almost as bad. Their average is one and two-thirds baby. When the two-thirds babies grow up and go to Cambridge they become coxswains of the crews.

Yale beats Harvard by having almost two babies per capita. There seems to be more desire for children under the elms.

When a Smith girl, with potentialities for one and one-half baby, marries a Harvard man, with potentialities for one and two-thirds, we do not know exactly what happens, but some very complex fractions must be produced.

Commencements Will Be Worth While If This Practice Continues.



THE latest novelty of the season is Serge Koussevitzky. Serge Koussevitzky is not a suit. He is conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Brown University conferred on him an honorary degree. M. Koussevitzky did not want to make a speech of appreciation, so he gave them a recital on his bass viol. The concert went over big.

Roy Chapman Andrews, the archaeologist-explorer, received a degree at the same time. We do not know if he made a speech. But we presume he promised the Brown Museum a dozen dinosaur eggs.

This innovation gives our colleges something to think about. Commencement exercises need not to be boresome hereafter, Not if the faculty uses its bean in distributing honorary degrees.

We can not think of anything nicer than John McCormack, LL.D., saying it with music; Fritz Kreisler, Ph.D., acknowledging it on his violin, or Paderewski, Litt.D., uttering his thanks on the ivory keys.

It it understood Paul Whiteman has been offered an LL.D. by more than a dozen universities. But he is holding out for the thirty-six additional Ph.D.s for his men.

M. Koussevitzky, who is responsible for this innovation, is handicapped by playing only on the bass viol. Several other colleges want to give him honorary degrees next June. But on account of freight and haulage charges he has asked them to wait till he has mastered the piccolo.

The idea is too good to be dropped, however. For years guys like Borah, Hughes and Hoover have been picking off the honorary titles and all they gave back was a line of talk. Now it looks as if the colleges will get a little entertainment besides looking at whiskers and listening to manuscripts. But if there must be some speeches at these commencements, give Will Rogers the honorary degrees.

Here is also a chance for some enterprising college to give Mellie Dunham a degree of LL.D., or Fiddle-Dee-Dee, or something like that.

This honorary title business need not be exclusively for men. Think of the possibilities among the opera warblers. It would be lovely to bestow one on Mary Garden. And give her the choice of singing or taking a sun bath.

Then how about giving Ganna Walska a Ph.D.? If she offers to sing, insist on a speech.

The possibilities are enormous for honoring drawing cards. Imagine Houdini getting an honorary Litt.D. at Harvard. He could wear a straightjacket instead of flowing academic robes. And guarantee to wiggle out of it in three minutes or forfeit his degree to some local charity.

For an encore Houdini could take the flags of all nations and half a dozen rabbits out of his mortarboard cap.

Then Peggy Joyce is certainly entitled to a degree of S.B.—Some Blonde.

An appropriate commencement feature would be to nail an honorary degree to the top of the campus pole. And let Harold Lloyd get it if he can.

In bestowing academic honors, don't overlook Ben Turpin, either. Ben has contributed to the field of education. He discovered the language of crossing his eyes and dotting his Ts.

Yes, commencements will be worth going to if they follow Koussevitzky's example. In fact the college campus will be in the hands of the ticket speculators.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

MAR 1 5 192

[illegible]emonstrate New Musical Scale

[illegible]ayers for League of Composers Go as Far as Sixteenth Tones in Carillo Sonata.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

[illegible]he third concert of the League of Composers, which took [illegible]e Saturday evening in the Town Hall, was something to [illegible]k about. The feast consisted of Schoenberg's quintet, [illegible] 26, for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon; Emerson [illegible]horne's "Saturday's Child," a cycle of love songs to [illegible]s by Coutee Cullen, the lately discovered negro poet; a [illegible]ce Suite" by Ernest Toch, and Julian Carillo's "Sonata [illegible]antasia" for a new and improved musical scale going as far as sixteenth tones.

The [illegible]ruments employed in this creatio[illegible] [illegible] a harp-zither, which has ninety-sev[illegible] [illegible] tones in an octave; [illegible] horn playing [illegible] quarter, eighth and sixteenth tones, [illegible] guitar and violin going only as far as quarter tones, and a cello performing quarter and eighth tones. Mr. Carillo is (or lately was) director of the conservatory in the city of Mexico, but is not unknown in New York. The players of his work, who deserve mention for their labors, were Lucino Nava, Bernard Ocko, Genaro Nava, Lajos Shuk Emil Mix and Margaret Kane. Alexander Smallens, conductor of the Philadelphia Civic Opera, came over to direct the compositions of Toch and Whithorne. The singers in "Saturday's Child" were Mina Hager and Colin O'More.

Before the performance of the sonata Mr. Carillo caused some of his players to let the audience hear what quarter, eighth and sixteenth tones sounded like. This enabled them to identify the interesting scale passages which formed such an important part of the work. No doubt every one knew just when he was listening to quarters and when to eighths, and if sometimes he thought it all sounded like half tones, he knew it did not because the program notes said there were not any.

An Exhibition of Chromaticism.

The sonata was worth hearing chiefly as a demonstration of the present state of music in which composers are busying themselves with the development of a new technic of composition but have not yet found out what to do with it. As a piece of music Mr. Carillo's sonata had by no means as much value as it had as an exhibition of combinations of new intervals. Perhaps some day musicians will do great things with the new scales borrowed from Oriental art. Also it may be that violinists will learn how to play quarter tones. There was no evidence Saturday evening that they had yet done so. But in the end one felt that he had attended an exhibition of chromaticism and nothing more.

About the quintet of Arnold Schoenberg much might be said if it seemed worth while. Many thousands of words have been written about this man's art. Dr. Egon Wellesz, a learned and absorbing writer, has published a book on it. But the present writer, who has had no difficulty in perceiving the purposes of some other moderns, remains entirely befogged by most of the creations of Schoenberg. In the quintet he was able to discover nothing except apparently deliberate efforts to distort musical [illegible] peaceful instruing was of the kind that searches out the responsive chords in the heart. Mr. Smallens conducted admirably.

Concert by the Boston Symphony.

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra matinee in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon was liberal, but not entirely satisfying. There were five numbers, Vivaldi's E minor concerto for strings, Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Mlle. Germaine Taillefer's "Jeux de Plein Air," Paul Hindemith's concerto for orchestra, opus 38, and three dances from De Falla's ballet "El Sombrero de Tres Picos." Of these the second and third were new to local music lovers. Both were heard for the first time anywhere at the home concert of the Bostonians on March 5.

Mlle. Taillefer, who was one of the faded "Group of Six" in Paris and who is now quite charmingly present in these United States, gracefully bowed her acknowledgment of the courteous applause which followed her two short pieces portraying outdoor sport. The applause greatly increased when the audience saw the young woman and so she had three recalls. Her music represents two games, "La Tirelitentaine" and "Cache-Cache Mitoula," which M. Rabelais tells us were played by Gargantua .According to his biographer it required 17,913 cows to keep him supplied with milk, and later he ate lettuces as big as walnut trees and rode a mare as large as six elephants. He hung the bells of Notre Dame around her neck for a jingle and did other interesting things which suggested the possibility of much more prodigious doings than those pretty and harmonious ones depicted by Mlle. Taillefer's perfectly respectable music,

Mr. Hindemith continues to disappoint one who placed faith in his beginnings. The concerto heard Saturday is in four movements played in connected pairs. The titles are of no significance. Of the four the finale, described as a basso ostinato, is quite the best. It has vigor of movement and sonority of orchestration. But one seeks in vain for any definite idea in the work. When the composer wrote it he had little to say and not even a good way of saying it except for a few moments. The composition had the benefit of the commanding direction of Mr. Koussevitzky and the sonorous playing of the Boston artists. A retrospect of the concert deepens the suspicion that the strongest music of the afternoon was that of the immortal Vivaldi, whose ideas sounded as fresh and vivid as if they had just been struck from the hot iron of the composer's imagination.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

MAR 1 7 1926

-:- MUSIC -:-

Hail and Farewell !

Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra played their last concert in Infantry Hall last night. Next year that chamber of horrors will no longer be available for Mr. Koussevizky's intermittently civilizing visits.

The main attraction which brought all Providence and its wife last night may have been the fact that the Bostonian band may find no local habitation here next year. But we like to believe that it really was Respighi's "Pini da Roma," for the opportunity to hear which we hereby grovel at Mr. Koussevitzky's feet.

For it was magnificent, this tonal revelation of the stories that the pines of Rome have heard. Whispering pines is a phrase we often hear in minor and, perhaps, even in major poetry. Respighi's pines are not sentimental; they are dastardly at times in the truths they tell as when they shout above the clangor of the chariots to expose the hollow hypocrisy of the Roman conqueror's "triumph." Here comes the conqueror, they seem to say, the arrogant, pugnacious, unimaginative man who has trampled on a civilization he does not understand. And look at the people who share his glory—the sweat under those heavy ornaments! And the blatant populace—shoo', shoo'. Let us get somewhere, anywhere out of this, back to Greece and the limpid waters of the Aegean, back where this blasphemous imitation of greatness does not exist.

* * *

Those were the cruel pines that talked in the last movement, not the aspiring ones of the first. There were, happily, other pines that showed souls in the majesty of spiritual strife. But did the pines bow before these when they were writhing or were they merely recollecting something that they ought to have honored but did not? Anyhow, here Respighi, as played by Koussevitzky, gives as noble an interpretation of the great sorrow of the Catacombs, a sorrow shot through with spiritual confidence, as we have ever heard.

And then there is the famous nightingale—the nightingale whose song comes from a gramaphone, a cracked record last night. But may not nightingales squeak sometimes? Said a lady behind us: "If that's a nightingale, I think they're a fizzle." She had come, it seems, to hear canned nightingale rather than Respighi or Koussevitzky. And the nightingale, at least, was as well canned as the soul of man might have been!

The nightingale, if she should sing
by day
When every goose is cackling,
would be thought
No better a musician than the wren.

Let the nightingale be. We heard enough to know that Respighi was justified in getting something nearer its song through a gramaphone than through the average wood-wind player. Better luck next time, we wish him.

Altogether, a spiritual experience this "Pini da Roma," and we hope to hear it soon in Boston, for it is, by all odds, the most audaciously successful attempt to make us see reality we have ever known in a tone-poem. And with truth, of course, goes beauty, divinely inseparable when Mr. Koussevitzky beckons to them.

There were lots of other fine things last night, not including the dull Eighth Symphony of Beethoven which was played with as much interest as any intelligent conductor could have had in that lapse from genial grace of a great master. The Wagner selections, two from the Meistersingers, and the perennial overture to Tannhauser were well played, but not excitingly. There is something in that critical Slav, Koussevitzky, which makes him do less than justice to the Teuton master of sentimental mysticism.

R. de A. J.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BIDS CITY FAREWELL

Organization Forced to Discontinue Visits to Providence.

In a brilliantly played programme, especially arranged for the occasion by Dr. Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening bade farewell to Infantry Hall.

For 45 years the Boston orchestra has been the mainstay of our musical seasons, and now, with the passing of its Providence home comes the announcement that the organization will be forced to discontinue visits here for lack of a suitable auditorium. Tse management's decision came as a shock to a host of music lovers and resulted in a record attendance at last evening's concert.

Every seat was filled, standees, swelling the throng eager to hear Koussevitzky's players for the last time amid the old familiar surroundings. And they were not disappointed, either in content of programme or excellence of its presentation. Enthusiasm ran high. Many recalls for the distinguished conductor followed the playing of the featured symphonic tone poem by Respigsi, and again at the concert's close leader and players were accorded a tremendous tribute of appreciation.

This was the programme:

Beethoven. . Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93
  Allegro vivace e con brio.
  Allegretto scherzando.
  Tempo di menuetto.
  Allegro vivace.
Respighi ....
  Symphonic Poem , "Pini di Roma" ("Pines of Rome")
    The Pines of the Villa Borghese.
    The Pines near a Catacomb.
    The Pines of the Janiculum.
    The Pines of the Appian Way.
Wagner ....
  Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"
Wagner ....
  Introduction to Act III, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"
Wagner............Overture to "Tannhauser"

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, presenting him in his lighter mood, is a work of pure classic style. It is not descriptive music. It is rather a simple outpouring of melody fashioned in beautiful design. It is restful, and throughout the four movements there is no hint of inspiration save that which comes of the joy of singing.

In complete contrast to such a work is the Respighi tone poem. This is an attempt by a modernist to picture realities by means of musical sounds. How well he has succeeded must be left to the individual listener. In creating impressions he does not hesitate to use means which can be accurately described by no other word than noise. By the terrific din of clashing, discordant sound he imitates the marching of soldiers, battles, the cries of birds and other things that one may hear more perfectly by actual presence at such events. But there is a thrill in this cacophony. The four scenes of the "Pines of Rome" are produced with a cleverness that brings astonishment if not musical enjoyment.

Respighi has gone so far in realism that a gramophone is used as an orchestral instrument to represent the song of a bird.

Last evening the machine worked perfectly except that with the twitter of the nightingale was heard certain clicks and scratches due to mechanical operation. The final picture of an advancing army is made realistic by gradual crecendo until with throb of powerful drumbeat the full orchestra reaches a great climax. Mr. Koussevitzky gave the work a remarkable reading and appeared nearly exhausted by his efforts.

Wagnerian excerpts, which formed the latter half of the programme, again brought the audience to the realm of real music. Here Mr. Koussevitzky unloosed his temperament and achieved fine results. The familiar "Tannhauser" overture proved a fitting climax to the concert. Time does not fade its beauty, its dignity, its grandeur, and no finer, uplifting work could have been selected for the final word of leavetaking of the orchestra's Providence home—Infantry Hall.

A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

MAR 17 1926

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN CLOSING CONCERT

Work of Italian Compose Startling Contrast to Classic Masterpieces.

From the towering Beethoven to the modernist Respighi, the noble and classical Eighth Symphony of the greatest of symphonic masters to the novelty produced by the newest Italian invader of classical strongholds—this was the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening in Infantry Hall. It was an event of extraordinary interest, for possibly it wa the last Boston Symphony programm to be heard in Providence for years t come.

Closing the season of 1925-26, it als closed the career of Infantry Hall a the home of classic music. The ol building is to pass away in a few weeks and Providence has nothing t replace it.

Be that as it may, the orchestra, th audience and the director made the most of last night's opportunities. Opening with the Beethoven symphony, the rather slow and uninspiring first movement led along to the allegretto, with its theme of a more popular character, and then to the beautiful minuet, one of the sweetest movements in all symphonic writing.

Gloriously played, and played without pause, as is the way of Director Koussevitzky, this monumental work swept to a majestic close, and was received with a thunder of applause.

Tingling and Jazzy.

Then came the Respighi number with a tingling, ringing jazzical opening that made the audience gasp. Surely M. Koussevitzky is a master of contrast. Played in a park by a military band, Respighi's "Pines of Rome" may not be termed particularly jazzy, but crashing on the ears of a symphony audience right on the heels of a Beethoven symphony it was breath-taking.

And the audience like dit, there i no doubt of that. The first movement, (described in the programme as the "first section") is about the most interesting thing of the kind that has been heard in Providence in years. It was described by one hearer as glorified jazz, the epitome of all that h been done up to date in the realm the musically refined by the most d ing modernists. It must be confes that it seemed to justify Paul Whitem but it also recalls and bears the i fluence of Rimsky-Korsakov, one of Respighi's teachers. The lilt of a nightingale, produced by a phonograph record, is one of the incidental innovations.

The remaining numbers of the programme were Wagner's "Prelude to the Meistersingers," the introduction to Act Three of the same work, and the "Tannhauser" overture. All were magnificently played, of course, the great overture thundering to a tremendous and overpowering climax.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

THE SYMPHONY MUST RETURN

It is regrettable that the Boston Symphony's forty-fifth season in Providence should close with the apprehension that there may be no satisfactory place i which it may give a series of concert here next fall and winter. The Sym phony has become a prime feature o our musical life and we cannot afford t let even a single season go by with out its appearance in this city. I some way means must be devised t provide it with a temporary home, nothing better is available.

As we are only forty-five miles fro Boston / is practicable to get the o chestra here at least five times ever year. There were nearly two thousan persons present at the fine performanc in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenin a striking tribute to the organizatio popularity here, and proof of the fa that, although we are treated to mo of its concerts than any other city e cept Boston—or possibly New York there is a genuine demand in Provide that a fewer number would not supp

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

emonstrate New Musical Scale

ayers for League of Composers Go as Far as Sixteenth Tones in Carillo Sonata.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

he third concert of the League of Composers, which took e Saturday evening in the Town Hall, was something to k about. The feast consisted of Schoenberg's quintet, 26, for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon; Emerson horne's "Saturday's Child," a cycle of love songs to s by Coutee Cullen, the lately discovered negro poet; a e Suite" by Ernest Toch, and Julian Carillo's "Sonata antasia" for a new and improved musical scale going as far as sixteenth tones.

The [illegible] ruments employed in this [illegible] e a harp-zither, which has ninety-seve[illegible] tones in an octave; a horn playing quarter, eighth and sixteenth tones, a guitar and violin going only as far as quarter tones, and a cello performing quarter and eighth tones. Mr. Carillo is (or lately was) director of the conservatory in the city of Mexico, but is not unknown in New York. The players of his work, who deserve mention for their labors, were Lucino Nava, Bernard Ocko, Genaro Nava, Lajos Shuk Emil Mix and Margaret Kane. Alexander Smallens, conductor of the Philadelphia Civic Opera, came over to direct the compositions of Toch and Whithorne. The singers in "Saturday's Child" were Mina Hager and Colin O'More.

Before the performance of the sonata Mr. Carillo caused some of his players to let the audience hear what quarter, eighth and sixteenth tones sounded like. This enabled them to identify the interesting scale passages which formed such an important part of the work. No doubt every one knew just when he was listening to quarters and when to eighths, and if sometimes he thought it all sounded like half tones, he knew it did not because the program notes said there were not any.

An Exhibition of Chromaticism.

The sonata was worth hearing chiefly as a demonstration of the present state of music in which composers are busying themselves with the development of a new technic of composition but have not yet found out what to do with it. As a piece of music Mr. Carillo's sonata had by no means as much value as it had as an exhibition of combinations of new intervals. Perhaps some day musicians will do great things with the new scales borrowed from Oriental art. Also it may be that violinists will learn how to play quarter tones. There was no evidence Saturday evening that they had yet done so. But in the end one felt that he had attended an exhibition of chromaticism and nothing more.

About the quintet of Arnold Schoenberg much might be said if it seemed worth while. Many thousands of words have been written about this man's art. Dr. Egon Wellesz, a learned and absorbing writer, has published a book on it. But the present writer, who has had no difficulty in perceiving the purposes of some other moderns, remains entirely befogged by most of the creations of Schoenberg. In the quintet he was able to discover nothing except apparently deliberate efforts to distort musical [illegible] peaceful instru-

ing was of the kind that searches out the responsive chords in the heart. Mr. Smallens conducted admirably.

Concert by the Boston Symphony.

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra matinee in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon was liberal, but not entirely satisfying. There were five numbers, Vivaldi's E minor concerto for strings, Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Mlle. Germaine Taillefer's "Jeux de Plein Air," Paul Hindemith's concerto for orchestra, opus 38, and three dances from De Falla's ballet "El Sombrero de Tres Picos." Of these the second and third were new to local music lovers. Both were heard for the first time anywhere at the home concert of the Bostonians on March 5.

Mlle. Taillefer, who was one of the faded "Group of Six" in Paris and who is now quite charmingly present in these United States, gracefully bowed her acknowledgment of the courteous applause which followed her two short pieces portraying outdoor sport. The applause greatly increased when the audience saw the young woman and so she had three recalls. Her music represents two games, "La Tirelitentaine" and "Cache-Cache Mitoula," which M. Rabelais tells us were played by Gargantua .According to his biographer it required 17,913 cows to keep him supplied with milk, and later he ate lettuces as big as walnut trees and rode a mare as large as six elephants. He hung the bells of Notre Dame around her neck for a jingle and did other interesting things which suggested the possibility of much more prodigious doings than those pretty and harmonious ones depicted by Mlle. Taillefer's perfectly respectable music.

Mr. Hindemith continues to disappoint one who placed faith in his beginnings. The concerto heard Saturday is in four movements played in connected pairs. The titles are of no significance. Of the four the finale, described as a basso ostinato, is quité the best. It has vigor of movement and sonority of orchestration. But one seeks in vain for any definite idea in the work. When the composer wrote it he had little to say and not even a good way of saying it except for a few moments. The composition had the benefit of the commanding direction of Mr. Koussevitzky and the sonorous playing of the Boston artists. A retrospect of the concert deepens the suspicion that the strongest music of the afternoon was that of the immortal Vivaldi, whose ideas sounded as fresh and vivid as if they had just been struck from the hot iron of the composer's imagination.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

-:- MUSIC -:-

Hail and Farewell !

Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra played their last concert in Infantry Hall last night. Next year that chamber of horrors will no longer be available for Mr. Koussevizky's intermittently civilizing visits.

The main attraction which brought all Providence and its wife last night may have been the fact that the Bostonian band may find no local habitation here next year. But we like to believe that it really was Respighi's "Pini da Roma," for the opportunity to hear which we hereby grovel at Mr. Koussevitzky's feet.

For it was magnificent, this tonal revelation of the stories that the pines of Rome have heard. Whispering pines is a phrase we often hear in minor and, perhaps, even in major poetry. Respighi's pines are not sentimental; they are dastardly at times in the truths they tell as when they shout above the clangor of the chariots to expose the hollow hypocrisy of the Roman conqueror's "triumph." Here comes the conqueror, they seem to say, the arrogant, pugnacious, unimaginative man who has trampled on a civilization he does not understand. And look at the people who share his glory—the sweat under those heavy ornaments! And the blatant populace—shoo', shoo'. Let us get somewhere, anywhere out of this, back to Greece and the limpid waters of the Aegean, back where this blasphemous imitation of greatness does not exist.

* * *

Those were the cruel pines that talked in the last movement, not the aspiring ones of the first. There were, happily, other pines that showed souls in the majesty of spiritual strife. But did the pines bow before these when they were writhing or were they merely recollecting something that they ought to have honored but did not? Anyhow, here Respighi, as played by Koussevitzky, gives as noble an interpretation of the great sorrow of the Catacombs, a sorrow shot through with spiritual confidence, as we have ever heard.

And then there is the famous nightingale—the nightingale whose song comes from a gramaphone, a cracked record last night. But may not nightingales squeak sometimes? Said a lady behind us: "If that's a nightingale, I think they're a fizzle." She had come, it seems, to hear canned nightingale rather than Respighi or Koussevitzky. And the nightingale, at least, was as well canned as the soul of man might have been!

> The nightingale, if she should sing
>   by day
> When every goose is cackling,
>   would be thought
> No better a musician than the wren.

Let the nightingale be. We heard enough to know that Respighi was justified in getting something nearer its song through a gramaphone than through the average wood-wind player. Better luck next time, we wish him.

Altogether, a spiritual experience this "Pini da Roma," and we hope to hear it soon in Boston, for it is, by all odds, the most audaciously successful attempt to make us see reality we have ever known in a tone-poem. And with truth, of course, goes beauty, divinely inseparable when Mr. Koussevitzky beckons to them.

There were lots of other fine things last night, not including the dull Eighth Symphony of Beethoven which was played with as much interest as any intelligent conductor could have had in that lapse from genial grace of a great master. The Wagner selections, two from the Meistersingers, and the perennial overture to Tannhauser were well played, but not excitingly. There is something in that critical Slav, Koussevitzky, which makes him do less than justice to the Teuton master of sentimental mysticism.

R. de A. J.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BIDS CITY FAREWELL

Organization Forced to Discontinue Visits to Providence.

In a brilliantly played programme, especially arranged for the occasion by Dr. Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening bade farewell to Infantry Hall.

For 45 years the Boston orchestra has been the mainstay of our musical seasons, and now, with the passing of its Providence home comes the announcement that the organization will be forced to discontinue visits here for lack of a suitable auditorium. Tse management's decision came as a shock to a host of music lovers and resulted in a record attendance at last evening's concert.

Every seat was filled, standees, swelling the throng eager to hear Koussevitzky's players for the last time amid the old familiar surroundings. And they were not disappointed, either in content of programme or excellence of its presentation. Enthusiasm ran high. Many recalls for the distinguished conductor followed the playing of the featured symphonic tone poem by Respigsi, and again at the concert's close leader and players were accorded a tremendous tribute of appreciation.

This was the programme:

Beethoven. . Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93
  Allegro vivace e con brio.
  Allegretto scherzando.
  Tempo di menuetto.
  Allegro vivace.
Respighi ....
  Symphonic Poem , "Pini di Roma" ("Pines of Rome")
    The Pines of the Villa Borghese.
    The Pines near a Catacomb.
    The Pines of the Janiculum.
    The Pines of the Appian Way.
Wagner ....
  Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"
Wagner ....
  Introduction to Act III, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"
Wagner............Overture to "Tannhauser"

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, presenting him in his lighter mood, is a work of pure classic style. It is not descriptive music. It is rather a simple outpouring of melody fashioned in beautiful design. It is restful, and throughout the four movements there is no hint of inspiration save that which comes of the joy of singing.

In complete contrast to such a work is the Respighi tone poem. This is an attempt by a modernist to picture realities by means of musical sounds. How well he has succeeded must be left to the individual listener. In creating impressions he does not hesitate to use means which can be accurately described by no other word than noise. By the terrific din of clashing, discordant sound he imitates the marching of soldiers, battles, the cries of birds and other things that one may hear more perfectly by actual presence at such events. But there is a thrill in this cacophony. The four scenes of the "Pines of Rome" are produced with a cleverness that brings astonishment if not musical enjoyment.

Respighi has gone so far in realism that a gramophone is used as an orchestral instrument to represent the song of a bird.

Last evening the machine worked perfectly except that with the twitter of the nightingale was heard certain clicks and scratches due to mechanical operation. The final picture of an advancing army is made realistic by gradual crecendo until with throb of powerful drumbeat the full orchestra reaches a great climax. Mr. Koussevitzky gave the work a remarkable reading and appeared nearly exhausted by his efforts.

Wagnerian excerpts, which formed the latter half of the programme, again brought the audience to the realm of real music. Here Mr. Koussevitzky unloosed his temperament and achieved fine results. The familiar "Tannhauser" overture proved a fitting climax to the concert. Time does not fade its beauty, its dignity, its grandeur, and no finer, uplifting work could have been selected for the final word of leavetaking of the orchestra's Providence home—Infantry Hall.

A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

MAR 17 1926

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN CLOSING CONCERT

Work of Italian Compose Startling Contrast to Classic Masterpieces.

From the towering Beethoven to the modernist Respighi, the noble and classical Eighth Symphony of the greatest of symphonic masters to the novelty produced by the newest Italian invader of classical strongholds—this was the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening in Infantry Hall. It was an event of extraordinary interest, for possibly it was the last Boston Symphony programme to be heard in Providence for years to come.

Closing the season of 1925-26, it als closed the career of Infantry Hall a the home of classic music. The ol building is to pass away in a few weeks and Providence has nothing t replace it.

Be that as it may, the orchestra, th audience and the director made the most of last night's opportunities. Opening with the Beethoven symphony, the rather slow and uninspiring first movement led along to the allegretto, with its theme of a more popular character, and then to the beautiful minuet, one of the sweetest movements in all symphonic writing.

Gloriously played, and played without pause, as is the way of Director Koussevitzky, this monumental work swept to a majestic close, and was received with a thunder of applause.

Tingling and Jazzy.

Then came the Respighi number with a tingling, ringing jazzical opening that made the audience gasp. Surely M. Koussevitzky is a master of contrast. Played in a park by a military band, Respighi's "Pines of Rome" may not be termed particularly jazzy, but crashing on the ears of a symphony audience right on the heels of a Beethoven symphony it was breath-taking.

And the audience like dit, there is no doubt of that. The first movement, (described in the programme as the "first section") is about the most interesting thing of the kind that has been heard in Providence in years. It was described by one hearer as glorified jazz, the epitome of all that h been done up to date in the realm the musically refined by the most d ing modernists. It must be confes that it seemed to justify Paul Whitema but it also recalls and bears the in fluence of Rimsky-Korsakov, one of Respighi's teachers. The lilt of a nightingale, produced by a phonograph record, is one of the incidental innovations.

The remaining numbers of the programme were Wagner's "Prelude to the Meistersingers," the introduction to Act Three of the same work, and the "Tannhauser" overture. All were magnificently played, of course, the great overture thundering to a tremendous and overpowering climax.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

THE SYMPHONY MUST RETURN

It is regrettable that the Boston Symphony's forty-fifth season in Providence should close with the apprehension that there may be no satisfactory place ir which it may give a series of concert here next fall and winter. The Sym phony has become a prime feature o our musical life and we cannot afford t let even a single season go by with out its appearance in this city. I some way means must be devised t provide it with a temporary home, nothing better is available.

As we are only forty-five miles fro Boston . is practicable to get the o chestra here at least five times ever year. There were nearly two thousan persons present at the fine performanc in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenin a striking tribute to the organizatior popularity here, and proof of the fa that, although we are treated to mo of its concerts than any other city e cept Boston—or possibly New York there is a genuine demand in Provider that a fewer number would not supp

194

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Boston Symphony

In a brilliantly played programme, especially arranged for the occasion by Dr. Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening bade farewell to Infantry Hall.

For 45 years the Boston orchestra has been the mainstay of our musical seasons, and now, with the passing of its Providence home comes the announcement that the organization will be forced to discontinue visits here for lack of a suitable auditorium. Tse management's decision came as a shock to a host of music lovers and resulted in a record attendance at last evening's concert.

Every seat was filled, standees, swelling the throng eager to hear Koussevitzky's players for the last time amid the old familiar surroundings. And they were not disappointed, either in content of programme or excellence of its presentation. Enthusiasm ran high. Many recalls for the distinguished conductor followed the playing of the featured symphonic tone poem by Respigsi, and again at the concert's close leader and players were accorded a tremendous tribute of appreciation.

This was the programme:

Beethoven..Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93
Allegro vivace e con brio.
Allegretto scherzando.
Tempo di menuetto.
Allegro vivace.
Respighi ....
Symphonic Poem, "Pini di Roma" ("Pines of Rome")
The Pines of the Villa Borghese.
The Pines near a Catacomb.
The Pines of the Janiculum.
The Pines of the Appian Way.
Wagner ....
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"
Wagner ....
Introduction to Act III, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg".
Wagner............Overture to "Tannhauser"

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, presenting him in his lighter mood, is a work of pure classic style. It is not descriptive music. It is rather a simple outpouring of melody fashioned in beautiful design. It is restful, and throughout the four movements there is no hint of inspiration save that which comes of the joy of singing.

In complete contrast to such a work is the Respighi tone poem. This is an attempt by a modernist to picture realities by means of musical sounds. How well he has succeeded must be left to the individual listener. In creating impressions he does not hesitate to use means which can be accurately described by no other word than noise. By the terrific din of clashing, discordant sound he imitates the marching of soldiers, battles, the cries of birds and other things that one may hear more perfectly by actual presence at such events. But there is a thrill in this cacophony. The four scenes of the "Pines of Rome" are produced with a cleverness that brings astonishment if not musical enjoyment.

Respighi has gone so far in realism that a gramophone is used as an orchestral instrument to represent the song of a bird.

Last evening the machine worked perfectly except that with the twitter of the nightingale was heard certain clicks and scratches due to mechanical operation. The final picture of an advancing army is made realistic by gradual crecendo until with throb of powerful drumbeat the full orchestra reaches a great climax. Mr. Koussevitzky gave the work a remarkable reading and appeared nearly exhausted by his efforts.

Wagnerian excerpts, which formed the latter half of the programme, again brought the audience to the realm of real music. Here Mr. Koussevitzky unloosed his temperament and achieved fine results. The familiar "Tannhauser" overture proved a fitting climax to the concert. Time does not fade its beauty, its dignity, its grandeur, and no finer, uplifting work could have been selected for the final word of leavetaking of the orchestra's Providence home—Infantry Hall.

A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

AR 1 7 1926

Miss
Symp m Life -

Symphony Program Will Be Broadcast

Miss Irma Seydel, Violinist, to Be Assisting Soloist Tomorrow.

The final concert of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra will take place tomorrow night in the Auditorium. Miss Irma Seydel, violinist, will be the assisting artist. Arthur H. Turner will conduct.

Miss Seydel is the first violinist that the orchestra has had as an assisting artist. She received the greater part of her training in this country, but went to Europe for the finishing touches. In Europe she played with the leading German orchestras, and in this country she has been heard with many orchestras, notably the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Symphony. She carries the reputation of being one of the finest of the younger women violinists.

COURIER

MAR 1 9 1925

GEORGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Noted Boston Symphony Conductor To Be In Portland Concert.

George Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is credited with having introduced to the western world the compositions of Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakov, two of the most noted of Russian composers.

The two were little known outside Russia until Koussevitsky began to feature their music at his concerts in the various European capitals. Excerpts from the music of these two composers will make up a part of the program for his Portland concert at City Hall, March 25.

The principal monuments of the genius of Moussorgsky are the operas Boris Codunov and Khovantchina.

The prelude to the latter will be played in Portland. This depicts the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow, and has its distinct color and mood suggestive of the subject. It is an interesting sample of Russian music. As a native Russian Koussevitsky is perhaps at his best in the interpretation of Russian music, and there will be much interest in his interpretation of this prelude and The Flight of the Bumble Bee, a scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera Tsar Saltan, which is quite as different in mood from the other selection as may be imagined, and shows the Russian composer in lighter mood.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WOR

MAR 2 0 192

The Conning Tower

THE DIARY OF OUR OWN SAMUEL PEPYS

Saturday, March 13

LAY LONG, and read in the publick prints how newspaper readers of many papers in many parts of the land have testified that they are desirous of having a change in the laws governing Prohibition, and the vote so overwhelmingly in favour of a change that there can be no doubt about the way people feel in such matters. And I read in the Diary of Samuel Pepys about drinking, and how often he would go to wine taverns. And how he resolved once to drink no more wine, and said, "Drinking some hypocras which did not break my vow, it being to the best of my present judgment only a mixed compound drink and not any wine. If I am mistaken God forgive me." Which reminds M. Lucas Dubreton of Fielding's chaplain who preferred punch to wine, forasmuch as the Scriptures have nought to say against punch. So to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra play, with stirring beauty, and I was enchanted with the Haydn "Surprise" Symphony, very melodick and simple, which is more to my taste than the modern dissonances and amorphousnesses.

Sunday, March 14

[illegible] times, and to the office, and laboured

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.

MAR 2 1 1926

By HENRIETTA STRAUS.

Special Correspondence.
NEW YORK.

IT has been a week distinguished by much modern music and not unmarked by suffering for the Cause Moderne. Beginning with an exceptionally unhackneyed program by Charles Hubbard, of songs by Honegger, Milhaud, Poulenc, Auric, Ravel, Stravinsky, De Falla and others of today, it wound up with the prize ugly work of the season, a new Quintet for Wind Instruments, by Arnold Schoenberg, which the League of Composers presented at their last concert of the year.

In between came a new choral work, a "Hungarian Rhapsody," which the Schola Cantorum gave; another Respighi novelty, "Belfagor," presented by the New York Symphony, and other novelties by Hindemith, Germaine Taillefer and others which the Boston Symphony presented but which I did not hear.

The last fact I record without regrets or apologies. Mr. Koussevitsky, it seems to me, is seldom at ease in the modern works he affects. Usually, with him, I feel as though I were just hearing the notes—a proceeding highly irritating, as nothing renders a composition more meaningless. This time I felt more than justified in staying away, as the Hindemith concerto seems to have gone on record as the next ugliest work given this season.

[illegible] coming back to Charles Hub- [illegible] who did present compositions [illegible]ing, one finds that here, too, [illegible] for complaint. Mr. Hub- [illegible] native of charming British folk songs, sung by Merle Alcock, and finally to the real novelty of the program, a choral "Rhapsody" on Magyar folk songs by the Hungarian composer and organist, Dessö von Antaffy. This idea for this work, we are told, was given to the composer by Mr. Schindler himself, a[illegible] there is apparently nothing of this kin[illegible] in Hungarian choral literature, suc[illegible] as can be found in countless number[illegible] in that of the Russians.

It proved to be a well-contrasted a[illegible] skillfully knit work, with rich but n[illegible] over-elaborate harmonies. It was [illegible] fitting close to a very beautiful pr[illegible]gram and the program itself to M[illegible] Schindler's association with the Schol[illegible] Cantorum. Next season he leaves fo[illegible] a more lucrative position in Brooklyn[illegible]

Although Mr. Schindler lacks tha[illegible] nameless power that makes as well as marks the conductor as a leader, there is no doubt that he has left his successor an organization of fine, fresh, unspoiled voices with an unusually [illegible]fined quality of tone and one well [illegible]quainted with only the finest in choral literature.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

3 0 1926

* * *

The Boston Symphony orchestra was heard in concert in New York last Saturday afternoon. The principal number of the program was the well known "Surprise Symphony" by Haydn.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

MAR 1 9 1926

A TIME FOR ACTION

And so the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to pass out of the musical history of Providence! After the honorable record of almost 200 concerts over a period of many years, Tuesday's magnificent and memorable performance marks, we are told, the end of the series.

Shall it be the end? Providence music-lovers are squarely faced with the question of providing a suitable auditorium for future concerts of the orchestra. Many a smaller community, presented the opportunity of hearing one of the world's leading musical organizations, would rally promptly to the financial support of any building project that might be necessary to insure the success of the plan. Providence is sometimes, fairly or unfairly, condemned for an inability to pull together on civic enterprises. Here is a chance to prove that the slur is undeserved.

If private citizens, motivated by public spirit, will undertake the building of a modern concert hall or theatre, we believe they will have the backing of the whole community. Providence has waited too long for such an edifice. The time is ripe. We must have action, not talk—before next fall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
WASH. D. C.

MAR 2 1 1926

Boston Orchestra

Following the concert of Mme. Sigrid Onegin there will remain only one Wilson-Greene concert this season, the final 1925-26 appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, at Poli's on Tuesday afternoon, April 13.

Mrs. Wilson-Greene plans a particularly strong group of attractions for next season, including four appearances of the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, and concerts by Fritz Kreisler, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Mme. Jeritza, Amelita Galli-Curci, Claudio Muzio, Chicago Civic Opera Company, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Lawrence Tibbett, Chaliapin, with his own opera company; Marion Talley, remarkable 19-year-old Metropolitan soprano; John McCormack, Dussolina Giannini, Mme. Onegin, and others.

Tentative reservations may now be made at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

194

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Boston Symphony

In a brilliantly played programme, especially arranged for the occasion by Dr. Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening bade farewell to Infantry Hall.

For 45 years the Boston orchestra has been the mainstay of our musical seasons, and now, with the passing of its Providence home comes the announcement that the organization will be forced to discontinue visits here for lack of a suitable auditorium. Tse management's decision came as a shock to a host of music lovers and resulted in a record attendance at last evening's concert.

Every seat was filled, standees, swelling the throng eager to hear Koussevitzky's players for the last time amid the old familiar surroundings. And they were not disappointed, either in content of programme or excellence of its presentation. Enthusiasm ran high. Many recalls for the distinguished conductor followed the playing of the featured symphonic tone poem by Respigsi, and again at the concert's close leader and players were accorded a tremendous tribute of appreciation.

This was the programme:

Beethoven..Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93
  Allegro vivace e con brio.
  Allegretto scherzando.
  Tempo di menuetto.
  Allegro vivace.
Respighi ....
  Symphonic Poem, "Pini di Roma" ("Pines of Rome")
    The Pines of the Villa Borghese.
    The Pines near a Catacomb.
    The Pines of the Janiculum.
    The Pines of the Appian Way.
Wagner ....
  Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"
Wagner ....
  Introduction to Act III, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg".
Wagner.............Overture to "Tannhauser"

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, presenting him in his lighter mood, is a work of pure classic style. It is not descriptive music. It is rather a simple outpouring of melody fashioned in beautiful design. It is restful, and throughout the four movements there is no hint of inspiration save that which comes of the joy of singing.

In complete contrast to such a work is the Respighi tone poem. This is an attempt by a modernist to picture realities by means of musical sounds. How well he has succeeded must be left to the individual listener. In creating impressions he does not hesitate to use means which can be accurately described by no other word than noise. By the terrific din of clashing, discordant sound he imitates the marching of soldiers, battles, the cries of birds and other things that one may hear more perfectly by actual presence at such events. But there is a thrill in this cacophony. The four scenes of the "Pines of Rome" are produced with a cleverness that brings astonishment if not musical enjoyment.

Respighi has gone so far in realism that a gramophone is used as an orchestral instrument to represent the song of a bird.

Last evening the machine worked perfectly except that with the twitter of the nightingale was heard certain clicks and scratches due to mechanical operation. The final picture of an advancing army is made realistic by gradual crecendo until with throb of powerful drumbeat the full orchestra reaches a great climax. Mr. Koussevitzky gave the work a remarkable reading and appeared nearly exhausted by his efforts.

Wagnerian excerpts, which formed the latter half of the programme, again brought the audience to the realm of real music. Here Mr. Koussevitzky unloosed his temperament and achieved fine results. The familiar "Tannhauser" overture proved a fitting climax to the concert. Time does not fade its beauty, its dignity, its grandeur, and no finer, uplifting work could have been selected for the final word of leavetaking of the orchestra's Providence home—Infantry Hall.

A. F. P.

A TIME FOR ACTION

And so the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to pass out of the musical history of Providence! After the honorable record of almost 200 concerts over a period of many years, Tuesday's magnificent and memorable performance marks, we are told, the end of the series.

Shall it be the end? Providence music-lovers are squarely faced with the question of providing a suitable auditorium for future concerts of the orchestra. Many a smaller community, presented the opportunity of hearing one of the world's leading musical organizations, would rally promptly to the financial support of any building project that might be necessary to insure the success of the plan. Providence is sometimes, fairly or unfairly, condemned for an inability to pull together on civic enterprises. Here is a chance to prove that the slur is undeserved.

If private citizens, motivated by public spirit, will undertake the building of a modern concert hall or theatre, we believe they will have the backing of the whole community. Providence has waited too long for such an edifice. The time is ripe. We must have action, not talk—before next fall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Miss
Symp

m Life -

Symphony Program Will Be Broadcast

Miss Irma Seydel, Violinist, to Be Assisting Soloist Tomorrow.

The final concert of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra will take place tomorrow night in the Auditorium. Miss Irma Seydel, violinist, will be the assisting artist. Arthur H. Turner will conduct.

Miss Seydel is the first violinist that the orchestra has had as an assisting artist. She received the greater part of her training in this country, but went to Europe for the finishing touches. In Europe she played with the leading German orchestras, and in this country she has been heard with many orchestras, notably the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Symphony. She carries the reputation of being one of the finest of the younger women violinists.

Miss Seydel will be heard in a group of solos with piano accompaniment and in the andante mo[illegible] the Bruch concerto will be

---

COURIER

MAR 1 9 1925

GEORGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Noted Boston Symphony Conductor To Be In Portland Concert.

George Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is credited with having introduced to the western world the compositions of Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakov, two of the most noted of Russian composers.

The two were little known outside Russia until Koussevitsky began to feature their music at his concerts in the various European capitals. Excerpts from the music of these two composers will make up a part of the program for his Portland concert at City Hall, March 25.

The principal monuments of the genius of Moussorgsky are the operas Boris Godunov and Khovantchina.

The prelude to the latter will be played in Portland. This depicts the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow, and has its distinct color and mood suggestive of the subject. It is an interesting sample of Russian music. As a native Russian Koussevitsky is perhaps at his best in the interpretation of Russian music, and there will be much interest in his interpretation of this prelude and The Flight of the Bumble Bee, a scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera Tsar Saltan, which is quite as different in mood from the other selection as may be imagined, and shows the Russian composer in lighter mood.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

* * *

The Boston Symphony orchestra was heard in concert in New York last Saturday afternoon. The principal number of the program was the well known "Surprise Symphony" by Haydn.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
WASH. D. C.

1 1926

Boston Orchestra

Following the concert of Mme. Sigrid Onegin there will remain only one Wilson-Greene concert this season, the final 1925-26 appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, at Poli's on Tuesday afternoon, April 13.

Mrs. Wilson-Greene plans a particularly strong group of attractions for next season, including four appearances of the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, and concerts by Fritz Kreisler, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Mme. Jeritza, Amelita Galli-Curci, Claudio Muzio, Chicago Civic Opera Company, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Lawrence Tibbett, Chaliapin, with his own opera company; Marion Talley, remarkable 19-year-old Metropolitan soprano; John McCormack, Dussolina Giannini, Mme. Onegin, and others.

Tentative reservations may now be made at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WOR

The Conning Tower

THE DIARY OF OUR OWN SAMUEL PEPYS

Saturday, March 13

LAY LONG, and read in the publick prints how newspaper readers of many papers in many parts of the land have testified that they are desirous of having a change in the laws governing Prohibition, and the vote so overwhelmingly in favour of a change that there can be no doubt about the way people feel in such matters. And I read in the Diary of Samuel Pepys about drinking, and how often he would go to wine taverns. And how he resolved once to drink no more wine, and said, "Drinking some hypocras which did not break my vow, it being to the best of [illegible] present judgment only a mixed compound drink and not any wine. If I am mistaken God forgive me." Which reminds M. Lucas Dubreton of Fielding's chaplain who preferred punch to wine, forasmuch as the Scriptures have nought to say against punch.

So to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra play, with stirring beauty, and I was enchanted with the Haydn "Surprise" Symphony, very melodick and simple, which is more to my taste than the modern dissonances and amorphousnesses.

Sunday, March 14

[illegible] times, and to the office, and laboured

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.

By HENRIETTA STRAUS.

Special Correspondence.
NEW YORK.

IT has been a week distinguished by much modern music and not unmarked by suffering for the Cause Moderne. Beginning with an exceptionally unhackneyed program by Charles Hubbard, of songs by Honegger, Milhaud, Poulenc, Auric, Ravel, Stravinsky, De Falla and others of today, it wound up with the prize ugly work of the season, a new Quintet for Wind Instruments, by Arnold Schoenberg, which the League of Composers presented at their last concert of the year.

In between came a new choral work, a "Hungarian Rhapsody," which the Schola Cantorum gave; another Respighi novelty, "Belfagor," presented by the New York Symphony, and other novelties by Hindemith, Germaine Taillefer and others which the Boston Symphony presented but which I did not hear.

The last fact I record without regrets or apologies. Mr. Koussevitzky, it seems to me, is seldom at ease in the modern works he affects. Usually, with him, I feel as though I were just hearing the notes—a proceeding highly irritating, as nothing renders a composition more meaningless. This time I felt more than justified in staying away, as the Hindemith concerto seems to have gone on record as the next ugliest work given this season.

BUT coming back to Charles Hub[illegible] who did present compositions [illegible]ing, one finds that here, too, [illegible] for complaint. Mr. Hub[illegible] native of charming British folk songs, sung by Merle Alcock, and finally to the real novelty of the program, a choral "Rhapsody" on Magyar folk songs by the Hungarian composer and organist, Deszö von Antaffy. This idea for this work, we are told, was given to the composer by Mr. Schindler himself, as there is apparently nothing of this kind in Hungarian choral literature, such as can be found in countless numbers in that of the Russians.

It proved to be a well-contrasted and skillfully knit work, with rich but not over-elaborate harmonies. It was a fitting close to a very beautiful program and the program itself to Mr. Schindler's association with the Schola Cantorum. Next season he leaves for a more lucrative position in Brooklyn.

Although Mr. Schindler lacks that nameless power that makes as well as marks the conductor as a leader, there is no doubt that he has left his successor an organization of fine, fresh, unspoiled voices with an unusually refined quality of tone and one well acquainted with only the finest in choral literature.

194

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Boston Symphony

In a brilliantly played programme, especially arranged for the occasion by Dr. Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening bade farewell to Infantry Hall.

For 45 years the Boston orchestra has been the mainstay of our musical seasons, and now, with the passing of its Providence home comes the announcement that the organization will be forced to discontinue visits here for lack of a suitable auditorium. Tse management's decision came as a shock to a host of music lovers and resulted in a record attendance at last evening's concert.

Every seat was filled, standees, swelling the throng eager to hear Koussevitzky's players for the last time amid the old familiar surroundings. And they were not disappointed, either in content of programme or excellence of its presentation. Enthusiasm ran high. Many recalls for the distinguished conductor followed the playing of the featured symphonic tone poem by Respigsi, and again at the concert's close leader and players were accorded a tremendous tribute of appreciation.

This was the programme:

Beethoven..Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93
  Allegro vivace e con brio.
  Allegretto scherzando.
  Tempo di menuetto.
  Allegro vivace.
Respighi ....
  Symphonic Poem, "Pini di Roma" ("Pines of Rome")
    The Pines of the Villa Borghese.
    The Pines near a Catacomb.
    The Pines of the Janiculum.
    The Pines of the Appian Way.
Wagner ....
  Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"
Wagner ....
  Introduction to Act III, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"
Wagner............Overture to "Tannhauser"

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, presenting him in his lighter mood, is a work of pure classic style. It is not descriptive music. It is rather a simple outpouring of melody fashioned in beautiful design. It is restful, and throughout the four movements there is no hint of inspiration save that which comes of the joy of singing.

In complete contrast to such a work is the Respighi tone poem. This is an attempt by a modernist to picture realities by means of musical sounds. How well he has succeeded must be left to the individual listener. In creating impressions he does not hesitate to use means which can be accurately described by no other word than noise. By the terrific din of clashing, discordant sound he imitates the marching of soldiers, battles, the cries of birds and other things that one may hear more perfectly by actual presence at such events. But there is a thrill in this cacophony. The four scenes of the "Pines of Rome" are produced with a cleverness that brings astonishment if not musical enjoyment.

Respighi has gone so far in realism that a gramophone is used as an orchestral instrument to represent the song of a bird. Last evening the machine worked perfectly except that with the twitter of the nightingale was heard certain clicks and scratches due to mechanical operation. The final picture of an advancing army is made realistic by gradual crecendo until with throb of powerful drumbeat the full orchestra reaches a great climax. Mr. Koussevitzky gave the work a remarkable reading and appeared nearly exhausted by his efforts.

Wagnerian excerpts, which formed the latter half of the programme, again brought the audience to the realm of real music. Here Mr. Koussevitzky unloosed his temperament and achieved fine results. The familiar "Tannhauser" overture proved a fitting climax to the concert. Time does not fade its beauty, its dignity, its grandeur, and no finer, uplifting work could have been selected for the final word of leavetaking of the orchestra's Providence home—Infantry Hall.

A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

1 7 1926

Miss Irma Seydel, Soloist with Symphony Orchestra Tomorrow Night

Symphony Program Will Be Broadcast

Miss Irma Seydel, Violinist, to Be Assisting Soloist Tomorrow.

The final concert of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra will take place tomorrow night in the Auditorium. Miss Irma Seydel, violinist, will be the assisting artist. Arthur H. Turner will conduct.

Miss Seydel is the first violinist that the orchestra has had as an assisting artist. She received the greater part of her training in this country, but went to Europe for the finishing touches. In Europe she played with the leading German orchestras, and in this country she has been heard with many orchestras, notably the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Symphony. She carries the reputation of being one of the finest of the younger women violinists.

COURIER

MAR 1 9 1925

Y luctor

tor of ra, is ed to itions
Korsa-
Rus-

utside an to ncerts
pitals.
these a part d con-

of the e opantch-will be ts the Square

d has gges-inter-
. As
a native Russian Koussevitzky is perhaps at his best in the interpretation of Russian music, and there will be much interest in his interpretation of this prelude and The Flight of the Bumble Bee, a scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera Tsar Saltan, which is quite as different in mood from the other selection as may be imagined, and shows the Russian composer in lighter mood.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

0 1926

* * *

The Boston Symphony orchestra was heard in concert in New York last Saturday afternoon. The principal number of the program was the well known "Surprise Symphony" by Haydn.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WOR

MAR 2 0 192

The Conning Tower

THE DIARY OF OUR OWN SAMUEL PEPYS

Saturday, March 13

LAY LONG, and read in the publick prints how newspaper readers of many papers in many parts of the land have testified that they are desirous of having a change in the laws governing Prohibition, and the vote so overwhelmingly in favour of a change that there can be no doubt about the way people feel in such matters. And I read in the Diary of Samuel Pepys about drinking, and how often he would go to wine taverns. And how he resolved once to drink no more wine, and said, "Drinking some hypocras which did not break my vow, it being to the best of my present judgment only a mixed compound drink and not any wine. If I am mistaken God forgive me." Which reminds M. Lucas Dubreton of Fielding's chaplain who preferred punch to wine, forasmuch as the Scriptures have nought to say against punch. So to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra play, with stirring beauty, and I was enchanted with the Haydn "Surprise" Symphony, very melodick and simple, which is more to my taste than the modern dissonances and amorphousnesses.

Sunday, March 14

I[illegible] times, and to the office, and laboured

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.

MA 2 1 1926

By HENRIETTA STRAUS.

Special Correspondence.
NEW YORK.

IT has been a week distinguished by much modern music and not unmarked by suffering for the Cause Moderne. Beginning with an exceptionally unhackneyed program by Charles Hubbard, of songs by Honegger, Milhaud, Poulenc, Auric, Ravel, Stravinsky, De Falla and others of today, it wound up with the prize ugly work of the season, a new Quintet for Wind Instruments, by Arnold Schoenberg, which the League of Composers presented at their last concert of the year.

In between came a new choral work, a "Hungarian Rhapsody," which the Schola Cantorum gave; another Respighi novelty, "Belfagor," presented by the New York Symphony, and other novelties by Hindemith, Germaine Taillefer and others which the Boston Symphony presented but which I did not hear.

The last fact I record without regrets or apologies. Mr. Koussevitsky, it seems to me, is seldom at ease in the modern works he affects. Usually, with him, I feel as though I were just hearing the notes—a proceeding highly irritating, as nothing renders a composition more meaningless. This time I felt more than justified in staying away, as the Hindemith concerto seems to have gone on record as the next ugliest work given this season.

coming back to Charles Hub- who did present compositions ing, one finds that here, too, for complaint. Mr. Hub-charming British folk songs, sung by Merle Alcock, and finally to the real novelty of the program, a choral "Rhapsody" on Magyar folk songs by the Hungarian composer and organist, Deszö von Antaffy. This idea for this work, we are told, was given to the composer by Mr. Schindler himself, as there is apparently nothing of this kin in Hungarian choral literature, suc as can be found in countless number in that of the Russians.

It proved to be a well-contrasted a skillfully knit work, with rich but over-elaborate harmonies. It was fitting close to a very beautiful p gram and the program itself to M Schindler's association with the Scho Cantorum. Next season he leaves f a more lucrative position in Brookly

Although Mr. Schindler lacks th nameless power that makes as well a marks the conductor as a leader, ther is no doubt that he has left his suc cessor an organization of fine, fres unspoiled voices with an unusually fined quality of tone and one well quainted with only the finest in chora literature.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

MAR 1 9 1926

A TIME FOR ACTION

And so the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to pass out of the musical history of Providence! After the honorable record of almost 200 concerts over a period of many years, Tuesday's magnificent and memorable performance marks, we are told, the end of the series.

Shall it be the end? Providence music-lovers are squarely faced with the question of providing a suitable auditorium for future concerts of the orchestra. Many a smaller community, presented the opportunity of hearing one of the world's leading musical organizations, would rally promptly to the financial support of any building project that might be necessary to insure the success of the plan. Providence is sometimes, fairly or unfairly, condemned for an inability to pull together on civic enterprises. Here is a chance to prove that the slur is undeserved.

If private citizens, motivated by public spirit, will undertake the building of a modern concert hall or theatre, we believe they will have the backing of the whole community. Providence has waited too long for such an edifice. The time is ripe. We must have action, not talk—before next fall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
WASH. D. C.

MAR 2 1 1926

Boston Orchestra

Following the concert of Mme. Sigrid Onegin there will remain only one Wilson-Greene concert this season, the final 1925-26 appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, at Poli's on Tuesday afternoon, April 13.

Mrs. Wilson-Greene plans a particularly strong group of attractions for next season, including four appearances of the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, and concerts by Fritz Kreisler, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Mme. Jeritza, Amelita Galli-Curci, Claudio Muzio, Chicago Civic Opera Company, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Lawrence Tibbett, Chaliapin, with his own opera company; Marion Talley, remarkable 19-year-old Metropolitan soprano; John McCormack, Dussolina Giannini, Mme. Onegin, and others.

Tentative reservations may now be made at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

195

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES
MAR 2 1 [illegible]

Facing the Music

The Reviewer Turns an Appraising Eye Upon the Season's Series of Orchestra Concerts and Comments Upon the Orchestras and the Conductors—Laurels Are Handed to Willem Mengelberg.

There has been no other feature in the passing concert season so important nor so engrossing as the eries of orchestra concerts just osed. With Vick O'Brien at Car- gie Tech doing too little recognized bor towards training symphonic ayers, and another ardent group of sicians in weekly rehearsal wards the concert which they hop ll resuscitate the Pittsburgh Or- ra, our interest nowadays natur- centers in orchestral activities.

ond two years ago, and then for al years, we were wont to think rms of the Philadelphia Orches- and Leopold Stokowski. Made ble by a very generous guaran- enabling the manager to buy the available talent, and by years of ous drilling, Stokowski's men at the peak of artistic ensem- playing and unequaled enthu sm. Personally, the conductor has ith and a vast imagination; his ssic interpretations can stand ngside the best accepted traditions which he is very loyal; his read- of modern works has all the nor, daring and fire so essential their performance. He is a good gram builder, ever mindful of the and a generous listener to new es.

Stokowski Has Rivals.

e great strain of the long Philadelphia season and preferred New York visits forced the Quakers to cancel western engagements, and forced us to our new program of assorted orchestras, a very lucky event for Pittsburgh. That Stokowski now has important rivals for first place has become too obvious. When he played his single concert here, our old enthusiasm revived for the moment, ut during long consideration, an un- ortunate suspicion of stokowski's elf-exploitation began to creep into y consciousness that was none too to wait for another hearing to judge the Russian thoroughly. The big impression now is the fine improvement he was able to make in the fundamental playing of his band during but one year of drilling. The great essentials he seems to possess.

To the Cleveland Orchestra we shall have to leave the task of instructing our students and jogging up our memories of greater playing. I have not found any inspiration in Eokoloff's conducting. He says many things well, but nothing new.

Philharmonic the Finest.

On the contrary there is Fritz Reiner and his Cincinnati Orchestra who leave such a feeling of well-being They make comfortable music; no sensational, no abstract, no highly intellectual effects; music for romantic youth and lovable grandparents.

No one will doubt that the New York Philharmonic has brought us the finest music of the year. I have written recently enough of Wilhelm Furtwaengler's vitality and his wide range of insight. From the classic charm of Haydn to the glowing passion of Wagner he gave us two programs of unexpected depth. I am still evhilarated by the memory of his "Meistersinger" Prelude.

To his predecessor, Willem Mengelberg, however, I want to hand the laurels. Without that display of nervous force, and yet possessing it, with his keen and inflexible will upon every sublety of phrase, and with a detached and philosophic attitude toward the very germ of expression in every work, he pours out from his orchestra undiscovered and unsuspected wealth of beauty and nuance in the simple thoughts as well as the tragic emotions of Tschaikowsky, in the Weltschmerz of Beethoven, or in the mathematical designs of Brahms. A Negro melody becomes a jewel in his hands, a trite phrase of Schubert a [illegible] morsel, and when he plays Strauss' Death and Trans- [illegible]," the heavens open indeed.

J. FRED LISSFELT.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAR [illegible]

MASONIC TEMPLE TO BE STARTED IN SPRING

Sweet Urges Boston Symphony Not to Abandon Providence.

William L. Sweet, President of the Masonic Temple Trust, announced yesterday that work on the auditorium, which will be a part of the new Masonic Temple, will be started this spring.

At the same time he announced that a letter has been sent to the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, urging that organization to "hold in abeyance any plans that will not include your regular visits to Providence."

Architectural plans for the auditorium are completed, and immdeiately after the campaign to raise $1,500,000, to be conducted May 3 to 14, the actual work of erecting the building will start. The auditorium will be dedicated to the service of the community, and will be available for concerts, opera, theatrical productions, conventions of all types of gatherings 365 days in the year.

Captains of the 30 teams that will canvass the Masons received their initial instructions last night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
[illegible] 2 5 192[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS ASSURED

Orchestra Manager Enthused by Temple Project.

William H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, expressed his pleasure last evening at the news that the Masonic Temple Trust of this city probably would have an auditorium, capable of seating 3000 persons, constructed in time to accommodate the orchestra for concerts here next season.

Called by telephone at his Boston residence, Mr. Brennan said the description of the proposed auditorium had filled him with enthusiasm and that he could guarantee that the symphony would make no engagements that would conflict with its appearance here.

"We are sure to come to your city when the auditorium is ready," said Mr. Brennan, "and present plans indicate to me that you will furnish us a splendid place in which to appear there."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

A Place for the Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a place in which to give its usual Providence series of concerts after next season if the plans of the Masonic Temple Trust do not go awry. The intention of the promoters of this organization is to begin actual construction work this spring on an auditorium which will have a seating capacity for 2500 or 3000 persons and one of the largest stages in the country. With proper attention given to the matter of acoustics, this should provide the community with an assembly hall far superior to Infantry Hall, in which the Symphony's concerts have been given for so many years, but which will not be available after the present year.

The location, on a plat of land enclosed by Francis, Brownell and Park streets and opposite the State Capitol, will be conveniently near the centre of the city. May the necessary funds for the building be promptly pledged and the chances are that Providence will not lose a single concert in spite of the difficulties incident to the passing of Infantry Hall.

NORTHAMPTON
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE
MAR 10 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN CONCERT HERE

Koussevitzky Proves Rare Interpreter for Orchestra in Annual Performance

PROGRAM FINE IN QUALITY

There was an atmosphere of unusual expectancy in John M. Greene hall last night as the audience waited for the annual concert by the Boston Symphony to begin. The hall was completely filled and there were many standing. As the orchestra tuned up eyes were cast anxiously at the stage door from which the conductor enters. Came a sudden hush as the members of the orchestra ceased their fiddling. More eyes glued on the door, and then—Koussevitzky!

For those who were fortunate enough to be present last night that name will stand for an experience unique, intense and unforgettable. Reviewing the concert becomes a task not of criticism but of adequate appreciation. To begin with Koussevitzky's personality is the real thing. He is the kind of man who needs only to walk forward and bow rather reservedly in order to make his audience feel that he has paid them a compliment. By the time he has mounted the conductor's stand and raised his baton the audience has practically succumbed and the rest is easy. This complete faith in the interpreter is a most important factor in the full enjoyment of great music, and rare indeed is the interpreter who can call it forth, especially from a large audience. From this visual tandpoint Koussevitzky's conducting is not only a joy to watch but a key o the rhythmic and dynamic strucure of the music. He never beats me, but draws (and, if necessary, rags) rhythm from his men. His movements are vivid translations of the ideal motion of music. It is easy o understand why the orchestra reponds so splendidly as it did last ight. The man is irresistible. Espeially notable was his handling of he climax in Dukas' "La Peri." Having prepared the hearers for a heavn-storming orgasm of sound he sudenly thrust his finger viciously at he brass—the heavens opened and romise of the long crescendo was loriously fulfilled.

His complete understanding of the dynamic resources of the orchestra illumined many a passage in Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the performance of which usually leaves something to be desired. We have never heard a more stirring or more perfectly apportioned perrormance of this greatest of symphonies. The famous transition passage between the scherzo and the finale was handled with consummate skill, and the close of the whole work with its reiterated C major chords for once in our experience did not seem of tiresome length.

It is natural and, we think, justifiable that a concert such as this should make us talk of the performance rather than the music. It brings to mind the fact that the interpreter is no less a creator than the composer. And it makes us look to the day when the interpreter will be exalted above the virtuoso. When musical gifts like Koussevitzky's are coveted as greatly as the laurels that now go to exploiters of virtuosity and eccentric personality, there will probably be more Koussevitzky's. But today there is only one, for whom we should be truly grateful.

The program of last night, which was as fine in quality as it was unusual in arrangement, included the following works: Symphony in C major, Boccherini; "La Peri," Poeme Danse, Dukas; Prelude to to "Kho- The ky- n C ber, to con- pus- and again the conductor was recalled and the noise increased as the audience rose and the galleries began to stamp. Surely Mr. Koussevitzky cannot complain of his reception in Northampton. May he be with us soon again.

J. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
MAR 2 5 192[illegible]

SYMPHONY SERIES MAY NOT BE BROKEN

Hall Sought for Use Next Year While Masonic Building is Under Construction.

STRONG EFFORT TO BE MADE

Manager of Boston Orchestra Says Providence is Sure of Continuation of Concerts When New Auditorium is Ready

Providence may not lose even one of its seasonal visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra if the music lovers of this city, now actively at work to avert such a loss, bring their plans to fruition.

William H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, hailed with gratification last night the news that the Masonic Temple Trust of this city will build an auditorium which will seat nearly 3000 persons and be an ideal place for the orchestra's appearances here.

Talking from his Boston home by telephone, Mr. Brennan said that the description of the proposed auditorium had filled him with enthusiasm and that he could guarantee that the Boston Orchestra would make no engagements that would prevent its coming to Providence after the hall is ready for use.

"We are sure to come to your city when the auditorium is ready," he said, "and present plans indicate to me that you will furnish us a splendid place in which to appear there."

Leaders of the Masonic Temple Trust, stirred by the threatened loss of the concerts and expressing their accord with the editorial sentiment expressed by the Providence Journal last week to the effect that this city cannot afford to lose the cultural benefits which accrue from the visits of one of the greatest organizations of its kind in the world, are planning to go still further to keep for Providence its time-honored privileges with regard to the orchestra.

William L. Sweet, president of the trust, pointed out last night that it will be almost a year before the auditorium to be built at Brownell, Francis and Park streets, opposite the State Capitol, can be finished, despite the fact that no time will be lost in starting the work of construction immediately after the campaign to raise $1,500,000 in May.

Plans and specifications for the structure are completed, Mr. Sweet said, but, in the meantime, before construction can be completed, one season which ordinarily would bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra here five times will have come and gone.

Therefore, he said, an effort will be made to find a temporary hall in which the orchestra will consent to appear during the fall and winter season which starts next November. No details of this effort which is in its inception, he said, can yet be given, but success is hoped for by those who will put forth mighty efforts in order that Providence may not lose even one concert offered by Serge Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET
MAR 25 1926

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO USE MASONIC HALL

PROVIDENCE, March 25 — The auditorium of the new Masonic Temple, now in the course of construction opposite the State House, is likely to be the scene of future concerts in this city by the Boston Symphony orchestra. William H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, hailed with delight last evening the announcement that the auditorium will seat about 3000 persons.

Inasmuch as the new building will not be completed until one season of the symphony orchestra has gone, efforts are being made, according to William L. Sweet, president of the Masonic Temple trust, to find a temporary hall in which the orchestra will consent to appear during the fall and winter season which opens in November.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES

Facing the Music

The Reviewer Turns an Appraising Eye Upon the Season's Series of Orchestra Concerts and Comments Upon the Orchestras and the Conductors—Laurels Are Handed to Willem Mengelberg.

There has been no other feature in the passing concert season so important nor so engrossing as the series of orchestra concerts just closed. With Vick O'Brien at Carnegie Tech doing too little recognized bor towards training symphonic layers, and another ardent group of isicians in weekly rehearsal vards the concert which they hop ll resuscitate the Pittsburgh Or- tra, our interest nowadays natur- centers in orchestral activities. ond two years ago, and then for al years, we were wont to think terms of the Philadelphia Orches- and Leopold Stokowski. Made ble by a very generous guaran- enabling the manager to buy the available talent, and by years of ous drilling, Stokowski's men d at the peak of artistic ensem- playing and unequaled enthu- sm. Personally, the conductor has ith and a vast imagination; his ssic interpretations can stand ngside the best accepted traditions which he is very loyal; his read- of modern works has all the nor, daring and fire so essential their performance. He is a good gram builder, ever mindful of the and a generous listener to new es.

Stokowski Has Rivals.

e great strain of the long Philadelphia season and preferred New York visits forced the Quakers to cancel western engagements, and forced us to our new program of assorted orchestras, a very lucky event for Pittsburgh. That Stokowski now has important rivals for first place has become too obvious. When he layed his single concert here, our old nthusiasm revived for the moment, ut during long consideration, an unfortunate suspicion of stokowski's elf-exploitation began to creep into ny consciousness that was none too reeable.

e first usurper for first place with the Boston Symphony, oussevitsky. We shall have to wait for another hearing to judge the Russian thoroughly. The big impression now is the fine improvement he was able to make in the fundamental playing of his band during but one year of drilling. The great essentials he seems to possess.

To the Cleveland Orchestra we shall have to leave the task of instructing our students and jogging up our memories of greater playing. I have not found any inspiration in Eokoloff's conducting. He says many things well, but nothing new.

Philharmonic the Finest.

On the contrary there is Fritz Reiner and his Cincinnati Orchestra who leave such a feeling of well-being They make comfortable music; no sensational, no abstract, no highly intellectual effects; music for romantic youth and lovable grandparents.

No one will doubt that the New York Philharmonic has brought us the finest music of the year. I have written recently enough of Wilhelm Furtwaengler's vitality and his wide range of insight. From the classic charm of Haydn to the glowing passion of Wagner he gave us two programs of unexpected depth. I am still evhilarated by the memory of his "Meistersinger" Prelude.

To his predecessor, Willem Mengelberg, however, I want to hand the laurels. Without that display of nervous force, and yet possessing it, with his keen and inflexible will upon every sublety of phrase, and with a detached and philosophic attitude toward the very germ of expression in every work, he pours out from his orchestra undiscovered and unsuspected wealth of beauty and nuance in the simple thoughts as well as the tragic emotions of Tschaikowsky, in the Weltschmerz of Beethoven, or in the mathematical designs of Brahms. A Negro melody becomes a jewel in his hands, a trite phrase of Schubert a delicious morsel, and when he plays Richard Strauss' Death and Transfiguration," the heavens open indeed.

J. FRED LISSFELT.

NORTHAMPTON
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE
MA 10 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN CONCERT HERE

Koussevitzky Proves Rare Interpreter for Orchestra in Annual Performance

PROGRAM FINE IN QUALITY

There was an atmosphere of unusual expectancy in John M. Greene hall last night as the audience waited for the annual concert by the Boston Symphony to begin. The hall was completely filled and there were many standing. As the orchestra tuned up eyes were cast anxiously at the stage door from which the conductor enters. Came a sudden hush as the members of the orchestra ceased their fiddling. More eyes glued on the door, and then—Koussevitzky!

For those who were fortunate enough to be present last night that name will stand for an experience unique, intense and unforgettable. Reviewing the concert becomes a task not of criticism but of adequate appreciation. To begin with Koussevitzky's personality is the real thing. He is the kind of man who needs only to walk forward and bow rather reservedly in order to make his audience feel that he has paid them a compliment. By the time he has mounted the conductor's stand and raised his baton the audience has practically succumbed and the rest s easy. This complete faith in the in- erpreter is a most important factor n the full enjoyment of great music, nd rare indeed is the interpreter who can call it forth, especially from a large audience. From this visual tandpoint Koussevitzky's conducting s not only a joy to watch but a key o the rhythmic and dynamic struc- ure of the music. He never beats me, but draws (and, if necessary, rags) rhythm from his men. His novements are vivid translations of e ideal motion of music. It is easy o understand why the orchestra re- ponds so splendidly as it did last ight. The man is irresistible. Espe- ially notable was his handling of e climax in Dukas' "La Peri." Hav- g prepared the hearers for a heav- n-storming orgasm of sound he sud- enly thrust his finger viciously at he brass—the heavens opened and romise of the long crescendo was loriously fulfilled.

His complete understanding of the lynamic resources of the orchestra llumined many a passage in Beetho- ven's Fifth Symphony, the perform- ance of which usually leaves some- hing to be desired. We have never heard a more stirring or more per- fectly apportioned performance of this greatest of symphonies. The famous transition passage between the scherzo and the finale was handled with consummate skill, and the close of the whole work with its reiterated C major chords for once in our experience did not seem of tiresome length.

It is natural and, we think, justifiable that a concert such as this should make us talk of the performance rather than the music. It brings to mind the fact that the interpreter is no less a creator than the composer. And it makes us look to the day when the interpreter will be exalted above the virtuoso. When musical gifts like Koussevitzky's are coveted as greatly as the laurels that now go to exploiters of virtuosity and eccentric personality, there will probably be more Koussevitzky's. But today there is only one, for whom we should be truly grateful.

The program of last night, which was as fine in quality as it was unusual in arrangement, included the following works: Symphony in C major, Boccherini; "La Peri," Poeme Dance, Dukas; Prelude to to "Khovantchina," Moussorgsky; "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Rimsky-Korsakoff; and the Symphony in C minor of Beethoven.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff number, an orchestral tour de force, had to be repeated. At the end of the concert came a real ovation for Kousevitsky and his men. Again and again the conductor was recalled and the noise increased as the audience rose and the galleries began to stamp. Surely Mr. Koussevitzky cannot complain of his reception in Northampton. May he be with us soon again.

J. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

SYMPHONY SERIES MAY NOT BE BROKEN

Hall Sought for Use Next Year While Masonic Building is Under Construction.

STRONG EFFORT TO BE MADE

Manager of Boston Orchestra Says Providence is Sure of Continuation of Concerts When New Auditorium is Ready

Providence may not lose even one of its seasonal visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra if the music lovers of this city, now actively at work to avert such a loss, bring their plans to fruition.

William H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, hailed with gratification last night the news that the Masonic Temple Trust of this city will build an auditorium which will seat nearly 3000 persons and be an ideal place for the orchestra's appearances here.

Talking from his Boston home by telephone, Mr. Brennan said that the description of the proposed auditorium had filled him with enthusiasm and that he could guarantee that the Boston Orchestra would make no engagements that would prevent its coming to Providence after the hall is ready for use.

"We are sure to come to your city when the auditorium is ready," he said, "and present plans indicate to me that you will furnish us a splendid place in which to appear there."

Leaders of the Masonic Temple Trust, stirred by the threatened loss of the concerts and expressing their accord with the editorial sentiment expressed by the Providence Journal last week to the effect that this city cannot afford to lose the cultural benefits which accrue from the visits of one of the greatest organizations of its kind in the world, are planning to go still further to keep for Providence its time-honored privileges with regard to the orchestra.

William L. Sweet, president of the trust, pointed out last night that it will be almost a year before the auditorium to be built at Brownell, Francis and Park streets, opposite the State Capitol, can be finished, despite the fact that no time will be lost in starting the work of construction immediately after the campaign to raise $1,500,000 in May.

Plans and specifications for the structure are completed, Mr. Sweet said, but, in the meantime, before construction can be completed, one season which ordinarily would bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra here five times will have come and gone.

Therefore, he said, an effort will be made to find a temporary hall in which the orchestra will consent to appear during the fall and winter season which starts next November. No details of this effort which is in its inception, he said, can yet be given, but success is hoped for by those who will put forth mighty efforts in order that Providence may not lose even one concert offered by Serge Koussevitzky.

DL

Sweet Urges Boston Symphony Not to Abandon Providence.

William L. Sweet, President of the Masonic Temple Trust, announced yesterday that work on the auditorium, which will be a part of the new Masonic Temple, will be started this spring.

At the same time he announced that a letter has been sent to the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, urging that organization to "hold in abeyance any plans that will not include your regular visits to Providence."

Architectural plans for the auditorium are completed, and immediately after the campaign to raise $1,500,000, to be conducted May 3 to 14, the actual work of erecting the building will start. The auditorium will be dedicated to the service of the community, and will be available for concerts, opera, theatrical productions, conventions of all types of gatherings 365 days in the year.

Captains of the 30 teams that will canvass the Masons received their initial instructions last night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

BOSTON S

& S.. 51 51 50⅜ 51 51
42½ 42½ 43⅜
89¾
22
98½ 109¾
56
43½
69
54⅞

that the symphony would make no gements that would conflict with its rance here.

e are sure to come to your city the auditorium is ready," said Mr. an, "and present plans indicate to at you will furnish us a splendid in which to appear there."

expressed news that the Masonic Temple Trust of this city

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

A Place for the Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a place in which to give its usual Providence series of concerts after next season if the plans of the Masonic Temple Trust do not go awry. The intention of the promoters of this organization is to begin actual construction work this spring on an auditorium which will have a seating capacity for 2500 or 3000 persons and one of the largest stages in the country. With proper attention given to the matter of acoustics, this should provide the community with an assembly hall far superior to Infantry Hall, in which the Symphony's concerts have been given for so many years, but which will not be available after the present year.

The location, on a plat of land enclosed by Francis, Brownell and Park streets and opposite the State Capitol, will be conveniently near the centre of the city. May the necessary funds for the building be promptly pledged and the city have an auditorium equal to its needs and its deserts.

As for next season's concerts, it has been announced that a search is being made for a temporary hall by those in command of the Masonic Temple campaign. If their efforts are successful, the chances are that Providence will not lose a single concert in spite of the difficulties incident to the passing of Infantry Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET
MAR 25 1926

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO USE MASONIC HALL

PROVIDENCE, March 25 — The auditorium of the new Masonic Temple, now in the course of construction opposite the State House, is likely to be the scene of future concerts in this city by the Boston Symphony orchestra. William H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, hailed with delight last evening the announcement that the auditorium will seat about 3000 persons.

Inasmuch as the new building will not be completed until one season of the symphony orchestra has gone, efforts are being made, according to William L. Sweet, president of the Masonic Temple trust, to find a temporary hall in which the orchestra will consent to appear during the fall and winter season which opens in November.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

MAR 2 6 1926

A NEW AUDITORIUM

Providence concertgoers breathe more freely since the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced its willingness to hold in abeyance plans for the discontinuance of its visits to Providence until provision can be made to bridge over the period between the abandonment of Infantry Hall and the erection of the new Masonic Temple on Francis street. The purpose of the Masons to construct first the auditorium unit of their building promises that the emergency will not be of long duration and that, if the orchestra can put up with a temporary makeshift, the eventual concert hall provision should be highly satisfactory.

The promised auditorium will, we are told, be available to the public for concerts, conventions, and all other types of gatherings at all times, will seat 2500 to 3000, and have an exceptionally large stage.

It is fortunate that this solution of a civic problem should be so promptly presented, and we congratulate the directors of the new enterprise. In providing Providence with the modern auditorium facilities it has long needed, they will perform a service of far reaching benefit to the artistic, educational, and communal life of our city, a service none the less praiseworthy because it may prove financially profitable.

Of course the final availability of the Masons' offer depends on the acoustic properties which the finished auditorium may possess. But the prospect is at least considerably brighter for a continuance of the Boston Symphony's notable concerts here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON,
ME.
JOURNAL

MAR 26 1926

An instrumental quartet of delightful combination will feature the opening concerto number of the Boston Symphony Orchestra program to ~~be played at~~ Symphony Hall, Boston, on Saturday evening this week and which will be broadcast thru WEEI, Boston; WCSH, Portland; and WEAN, Providence. Last Saturday the Symphony did not appear, having been on tour, so the concert of this week will be the 19th of the season and the seventh to be broadcast. It is sponsored in Boston by the W. S. Quinby Co., and in Portlandn by the Rines Brothers Company.

The quartet to be heard consists of violin, flute, oboe and trumpet. Beethoven's concerto for violin is also an outstanding treat of the program. Respighi's symphonic poem, "The Pines of Rome," which has previously been done this season by the orchestra, will again be heard. Joseph Szigeti is to be the soloist and assisting artist.

The intermission program from the studio of WCSH will be by William V. Bradley, tenor, of Portland, accompanied by Fred Lincoln Hill of Portland at the piano.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

MAR 2 7 1926

KNEISEL DEATH RECALL FAMOUS STRING QUARTET

BOSTON, March 27 (AP).—The death in New York of Franz Kneisel, Roumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here the famous Kneisel string quartet, organized less than a year after Kneisel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1885. Kneisel died last night.

His quartet came into being primarily through the wish of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston symphony that chamber music be given more prominent notice. The quartet gave an annual series of concerts which from the first attracted wide attention. It performed the standard works of the classic composers, but more often introduced for the first time many important chamber music productions by famous American and European composers. In these productions the quartet often was augmented by the composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

MAR 2 7 1926

FRANZ KNEISEL DIES IN BOSTON

Rumanian Violinist Formed Famous String Quartet.

Boston, Mar. 27.—(AP)—The death in New York of Franz Kneisel, Roumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here the famous Kneisel string quartet, organized less than a year after Kneisel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1885. Kneisel died last night.

His quartet came into being primarily through the wish of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony that chamber music be given more prominent notice. The quartet gave an annual series of concerts which from the first attracted wide attention. It performed the standard works of the classic composers, but more often introduced for the first time many important chamber music productions by famous American and European composers. In these productions the quartet often was augmented by the composer.

Besides Kneisel, as first violinist, the quartet included Julius von Theodorowicz, his fellow student at the Vienna conservatory, Louis Svencenski, violist, and Alvin Schroeder, violincellist. Schroeder was considered one of the most accomplished cellists of the time and was one of the few to receive the honor of an invitation to become soloist of the Hof opera in Berlin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM

MAR 2 7 1926

Franz Kneisel, Founder Of Famous Musical Ensemble, Dies at 61

NEW YORK, March 26.—(AP) Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartette and a former concert master of Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital tonight. He was sixty-one years old.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WORCESTER, MASS.

MAR 2 7 1926

MUSICIANS MOURN DEATH OF KNEISEL

Famous Violinist Was Creator of Famous String Quartet

BOSTON, March 27 (AP)—The death in New York of Frank Gneisel, Roumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here the famous Kneisel string quartet, organized less than a year after Kneisel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1885. Kneisel died last night in Roosevelt Hospital, aged 61 years.

His quartet came into being primarily through the wish of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony that chamber music be given more prominent notice. The quartet gave an annual series of concerts which from the first attracted wide attention. It performed the standard works of the classic composers, but more often introduced for the first time many important chamber music productions by famous American and European composers. In these productions the quartet often was augmented by the composer.

Besides Kneisel, as first violinist, the quartet included Julius Von Theodorowicz, his fellow student at the Vienna Conservatory, Louis Svencenski, violinist, and Alvin Schroeder, violincellist. Schroeder was considered one of the most accomplished cellists of the time and was one of the few to receive the honor of an invitation to become soloist of the Hof Opera in Berlin.

Mr. Kneisel played at the Worcester Music Festival of '88, '89, '90, '92, '94, '95 and '97 and appeared in concerts on other occasions.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TROY
NEW YORK
OBSERVER

MAR 2 7 1926

Franz Kneisel, Violinist and Composer, Dead

New York, March 27.—Franz Kneisel, violinist and composer, died last night in Roosevelt Hospital after a weeks' illness. Stricken with a heart attack last week while on his way to Portland, Me., he was brought back to his home and later transferred to the hospital, where an operation was performed.

Born in Rumania.

Mr. Kneisel, who was sixtyone, was born in Rumania. He was graduated from the Vienna Conservatory in 1882. He received a degree at Yale University in 1911 and at Princeton in 1915.

Came to America in 1885.

He was concert master of the Hofburg Theatre Orchestra, Vienna, coming to America in 1885 to become concert master and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he remained until 1903. He was director of the Kneisel Quartet which went out of existence in 1917. Then he became conductor of the Worcester musical festivals, head of the violin and stringed instrument department of the Institute of Musical Art, New York, and also head of the violin and stringed instrument department of Kneisel Hall, Blue Hill, Me.

He is the compiler of the Kneisel Collection, for violin and piano, and composed of "Advanced Studies for the Violin."

The Kneisel Quartet.

Boston, March 27 (AP).—The death in New York of Franz Kneisel, Rumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here how the famous Kneisel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1885. His quartet came into being primarily through the wish of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony, that chamber music be given more prominent notice. The quartet gave an annual series of concerts, which from the first attracted wide attention. It performed the standard works of the classic composers, but more often introduced for the first time many important chamber music productions by famous American and European composers. In these productions the quartet was often augmented by the composer.

Besides Kneisel, as first violinist, the quartet included Julius Von Theodorwicz, his fellow student at the Vienna Conservatory; Louis Svencenski, violinist, and Alvin Schroeder, violoncellist. Schroeder was considered one of the most accomplished 'cellists of the time and was one of the few to receive the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

MAR 2 7 1926

FRANZ KNEISEL IS DEAD; WORLD-FAMED VIOLINIST

Former Boston Symphony Concertmaster Led Stringed Quartet

New York, March 27.—Franz Kneisel, violinist and director of the Kneisel Quartet until it was disbanded in 1917, died last night in Roosevelt Hospital. He was 61 years old.

Mr. Kneisel was born in Bucharest. He was trained at the Bucharest and Vienna Conservatories, making his debut in Vienna in 1882. He then became leader at the Hofburg Theatre and in 1884 became concertmaster of the Bilse Orchestra in Berlin.

From 1885 to 1903 he was concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His famous quartet was organized a year after joining the Boston Symphony, its first members being Kneisel, Roth Svecenski and Giese.

In 1905 he became a professor at the Institute of Musical Art here and remained with that school until his death. The disbanding of the quartet was met by regret of all critics and music lovers. It had earned a place second to none in all countries where music has its lovers.

He received the degree of music from Yale University in 1911 because of his undisputed position in the music world. Princeton honored him similarly in 1915. He published a collection of violin pieces and advanced etudes.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

MAR 2 7 1926

Franz Kneisel of Famous Quartet Dies

Franz Kneisel, violin virtuoso, organizer of the famous Kneisel quartet, and for many years a prominent figure in New York's musical world, died suddenly last night in Roosevelt Hospital. Death was caused by an operation for perforated ulcer of the intestines on Wednesday.

Early in the week Mr. Kneisel, accompanying his young son who was in ill health, started for his summer home at Blue Hill, Me., intending to enjoy a brief Easter vacation there. When the Kneisels reached Portland Mr. Kneisel complained of illness and at once returned to New York. He was rushed to Roosevelt Hospital and operated on for appendicitis Wednesday night.

His condition caused no alarm until late Thursday, when he developed symptoms of peritonitis and complications set in. Friday afternoon he suffered a relapse and the end came suddenly early last night.

Mr. Kneisel enjoyed a varied and distinguished career in the world of music. Of German parentage, he was born in Bucharest, January 26, 1865. He was a precocious violinist, as a boy assuming the duties of concertmeister in the Hofburg Theater orchestra in Vienna, and later in Bilse's orchestra at Berlin.

In 1885, on Conductor Gericke's invitation, Mr. Kneisel, then 20 years old, came to Boston as leader and soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The young violinist made his American debut, playing the Beethoven concerto on October 31, 1885.

In the following year he founded the Kneisel Quartet, a chamber music organization which soon won renown in the world of music and remained in the front rank of similar musical organizations until its disbandment a few seasons ago.

In recognition of his musical services Mr. Kneisel received the degree of Mus. Doc. (hon. c.) from Yale University in 1911, and from Princeton University in 1915. Prior to this his musical activities won him man honors here and abroad. In 1907 served as a member of a jury of pr inent musicians, a signal honor, a violin "Concours" of the Paris C servatory. He conducted the Bo Symphony concerts at the Chic World Fair in 1893, and in 190 signed as concertmaster of tha chestra.

He had been professor of violin

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.

MAR 2 7 1926

FRANZ KNEISEL DIES IN NEW YORK

Noted Violinist Famed for Chamber Music Quartet Organization

NEW YORK, March 27.—(AP)—Franz Kneisel, violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital tonight. He was 61 years old.

He was born in Rumania, of German parentage, in 1865.

BOSTON, March 27.—(AP)—The death in New Ycrk of Franz Kneisel, Rumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here the famous Kneisel string quartet, organized less than a year after Kneizel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1885. Kneisel died last night.

His quartet came into being primarily through the wish of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony that chamber music be given more prominent notice. The quartet gave an annual series of concerts which from the first attracted wide attention. It performed the standard works of the classic composers, but more often introduced for the first time many important chamber music productions by famous Amerian and European composers. In these productions the quartet often was augmented by the composer.

Besides Kneisel, as first violinist, the quartet included Julius von Theodorowicz, his fellow student at the Vienna conservatory, Louis Svencenski, violinist, and Alvan Schroeder, violincellist. Schroeder was considered one of the most acomplished cellists of the time and was one of the few to receive the honor of an invitation to become soloist of the Hof Opera in Berlin.

Mr. Kneisel as associate conductor of the Worcester Music Festival from 1892 to 1908.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

6 1926

A NEW AUDITORIUM

Providence concertgoers breathe more freely since the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced its willingness to hold in abeyance plans for the discontinuance of its visits to Providence until provision can be made to bridge over the period between the abandonment of Infantry Hall and the erection of the new Masonic Temple on Francis street. The purpose of the Masons to construct first the auditorium unit of their building promises that the emergency will not be of long duration and that, if the orchestra can put up with a temporary makeshift, the eventual concert hall provision should be highly satisfactory.

The promised auditorium will, we are told, be available to the public for concerts, conventions, and all other types of gatherings at all times, will seat 2500 to 3000, and have an exceptionally large stage.

It is fortunate that this solution of a civic problem should be so promptly presented, and we congratulate the directors of the new enterprise. In providing Providence with the modern auditorium facilities it has long needed, they will perform a service of far reaching benefit to the artistic, educational, and communal life of our city, a service none the less praiseworthy because it may prove financially profitable.

Of course the final availability of the Masons' offer depends on the acoustic properties which the finished auditorium may possess. But the prospect is at least considerably brighter for a continuance of the Boston Symphony's notable concerts here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON,
ME.
JOURNAL

926

An instrumental quartet of delightful combination will feature the opening concerto number of the Boston Symphony Orchestra program to ~~be played~~ at Symphony Hall, Boston, on Saturday evening this week and which will be broadcast thru WEEI, Boston; WCSH, Portland; and WEAN, Providence. Last Saturday the Symphony did not appear, having been on tour, so the concert of this week will be the 19th of the season and the seventh to be broadcast. It is sponsored in Boston by the W. S. Quinby Co., and in Portlandn by the Rines Brothers Company.

The quartet to be heard consists of violin, flute, oboe and trumpet. Beethoven's concerto for violin is also an outstanding treat of the program. Respighi's symphonic poem, "The Pines of Rome," which has previously been done this season by the orchestra, will again be heard. Joseph Szigeti is to be the soloist and assisting artist.

The intermission program from the studio of WCSH will be by William V. Bradley, tenor, of Portland, accompanied by Fred Lincoln Hill of Portland at the piano.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

MAR 2 7 1926

KNEISEL DEATH RECALL FAMOUS STRING QUARTET

BOSTON, March 27 (AP).—The death in New York of Franz Kneisel, Roumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here the famous Kneisel string quartet, organized less than a year after Kneisel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1885. Kneisel died last night.

His quartet came into being primarily through the wish of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston symphony that chamber music be given more prominent notice. The quartet gave an annual series of concerts which from the first attracted wide attention. It performed the standard works of the classic composers, but more often introduced for the first time many important chamber music productions by famous American and European composers. In these productions the quartet often was augmented by the composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

7

FRANZ KNEISEL DIES IN BOSTON

Rumanian Violinist Formed Famous String Quartet.

Boston, Mar. 27.—(AP)—The death in New York of Franz Kneisel, Roumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here the famous Kneisel string quartet, organized less than a year after Kneisel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1885. Kneisel died last night.

His quartet came into being primarily through the wish of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony that chamber music be given more prominent notice. The quartet gave an annual series of concerts which from the first attracted wide attention. It performed the standard works of the classic composers, but more often introduced for the first time many important chamber music productions by famous American and European composers. In these productions the quartet often was augmented by the composer.

Besides Kneisel, as first violinist, the quartet included Julius von Theodorowicz, his fellow student at the Vienna conservatory, Louis Svencenski, violist, and Alvin Schroeder, violincellist. Schroeder was considered one of the most accomplished cellists of the time and was one of the few to receive the honor of an invitation to become soloist of the Hof opera in Berlin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM

Franz Kneisel, Founder Of Famous Musical Ensemble, Dies at 61

NEW YORK, March 26.—(AP) Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartette and a former concert master of Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital tonight. He was sixty-one years old.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WORCESTER, MASS.

MAR 2 7 1926

MUSICIANS MOURN DEATH OF KNEISEL

Famous Violinist Was Creator of Famous String Quartet

BOSTON, March 27 (AP)—The death in New York of Frank Gneisel, Roumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here the famous Kneisel string quartet, organized less than a year after Kneisel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1885. Kneisel died last night in Roosevelt Hospital, aged 61 years.

His quartet came into being primarily through the wish of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony that chamber music be given more prominent notice. The quartet gave an annual series of concerts which from the first attracted wide attention. It performed the standard works of the classic composers, but more often introduced for the first time many important chamber music productions by famous American and European composers. In these productions the quartet often was augmented by the composer.

Besides Kneisel, as first violinist, the quartet included Julius Von Theodorowicz, his fellow student at the Vienna Conservatory, Louis Svencenski, violinist, and Alvin Schroeder, violincellist. Schroeder was considered one of the most accomplished cellists of the time and was one of the few to receive the honor of an invitation to become soloist of the Hof Opera in Berlin.

Mr. Kneisel played at the Worcester Music Festival of '88, '89, '90, '92, '94, '95 and '97 and appeared in concerts on other occasions.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TROY
NEW YORK
OBSERVER

1926

Franz Kneisel, Violinist and Composer, Dead

New York, March 27.—Franz Kneisel, violinist and composer, died last night in Roosevelt Hospital after a weeks' illness. Stricken with a heart attack last week while on his way to Portland, Me., he was brought back to his home and later transferred to the hospital, where an operation was performed.

Born in Rumania.

Mr. Kneisel, who was sixtyone, was born in Rumania. He was graduated from the Vienna Conservatory in 1882. He received a degree at Yale University in 1911 and at Princeton in 1915.

Came to America in 1885.

He was concert master of the Hofburg Theatre Orchestra, Vienna, coming to America in 1885 to become concert master and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he remained until 1903. He was director of the Kneisel Quartet which went out of existence in 1917. Then he became conductor of the Worcester musical festivals, head of the violin and stringed instrument department of the Institute of Musical Art, New York, and also head of the violin and stringed instrument department of Kneisel Hall, Blue Hill, Me.

He is the compiler of the Kneisel Collection, for violin and piano, and composed of "Advanced Studies for the Violin."

The Kneisel Quartet.

Boston, March 27 (AP).—The death in New York of Franz Kneisel, Rumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here how the famous Kneisel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1885. His quartet came into being primarily through the wish of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony, that chamber music be given more prominent notice. The quartet gave an annual series of concerts, which from the first attracted wide attention. It performed the standard works of the classic composers, but more often introduced for the first time many important chamber music productions by famous American and European composers. In these productions the quartet was often augmented by the composer.

Besides Kneisel, as first violinist, the quartet included Julius Von Theodorwicz, his fellow student at the Vienna Conservatory; Louis Svencenski, violinist, and Alvin Schroeder, violoncellist. Schroeder was considered one of the most accomplished 'cellists of the time and was one of the few to receive the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

MAR 2 7 1926

FRANZ KNEISEL IS DEAD; WORLD-FAMED VIOLINIST

Former Boston Symphony Concertmaster Led Stringed Quartet

New York, March 27.—Franz Kneisel, violinist and director of the Kneisel Quartet until it was disbanded in 1917, died last night in Roosevelt Hospital. He was 61 years old.

Mr. Kneisel was born in Bucharest. He was trained at the Bucharest and Vienna Conservatories, making his debut in Vienna in 1882. He then became leader at the Hofburg Theatre and in 1884 became concertmaster of the Bilse Orchestra in Berlin.

From 1885 to 1903 he was concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His famous quartet was organized a year after joining the Boston Symphony, its first members being Kneisel, Roth Svecenski and Giese.

In 1905 he became a professor at the Institute of Musical Art here and remained with that school until his death. The disbanding of the quartet was met by regret of all critics and music lovers. It had earned a place second to none in all countries where music has its lovers.

He received the degree of music from Yale University in 1911 because of his undisputed position in the music world. Princeton honored him similarly in 1915. He published a collection of violin pieces and advanced etudes.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

MAR 2 7 1926

Franz Kneisel of Famous Quartet Dies

Franz Kneisel, violin virtuoso, organizer of the famous Kneisel quartet, and for many years a prominent figure in New York's musical world, died suddenly last night in Roosevelt Hospital. Death was caused by an operation for perforated ulcer of the intestines on Wednesday.

Early in the week Mr. Kneisel, accompanying his young son who was in ill health, started for his summer home at Blue Hill, Me., intending to enjoy a brief Easter vacation there. When the Kneisels reached Portland Mr. Kneisel complained of illness and at once returned to New York. He was rushed to Roosevelt Hospital and operated on for appendicitis Wednesday night.

His condition caused no alarm until late Thursday, when he developed symptoms of peritonitis and complications set in. Friday afternoon he suffered a relapse and the end came suddenly early last night.

Mr. Kneisel enjoyed a varied and distinguished career in the world of music. Of German parentage, he was born in Bucharest, January 26, 1865. He was a precocious violinist, as a boy assuming the duties of concertmeister in the Hofburg Theatre orchestra in Vienna, and later in Bilse's orchestra at Berlin.

In 1885, on Conductor Gericke's invitation, Mr. Kneisel, then 20 years old, came to Boston as leader and soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The young violinist made his American debut, playing the Beethoven concerto on October 31, 1885.

In the following year he founded the Kneisel Quartet, a chamber music organization which soon won renown in the world of music and remained in the front rank of similar musical organizations until its disbandment a few seasons ago.

In recognition of his musical services Mr. Kneisel received the degree of Mus. Doc. (hon. c.) from Ya University in 1911, and from Pri ton University in 1915. Prior to his musical activities won him honors here and abroad. In 19 served as a member of a jury of inent musicians, a signal honor, violin "Concours" of the Par servatory. He conducted the Symphony concerts at the World Fair in 1893, and in signed as concertmaster of chestra.

He had been professor of viol

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.

FRANZ KNEISEL DIES IN NEW YORK

Noted Violinist Famed for Chamber Music Quartet Organization

NEW YORK, March 27.—(AP)—Franz Kneisel, violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital tonight. He was 61 years old.

He was born in Rumania, of German parentage, in 1865.

BOSTON, March 27.—(AP)—The death in New York of Franz Kneisel, Rumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here the famous Kneisel string quartet, organized less than a year after Knelzel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1885. Kneisel died last night.

His quartet came into being primarily through the wish of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony that chamber music be given more prominent notice. The quartet gave an annual series of concerts which from the first attracted wide attention. It performed the standard works of the classic composers, but more often introduced for the first time many important chamber music productions by famous American and European composers. In these productions the quartet often was augmented by the composer.

Besides Kneisel, as first violinist, the quartet included Julius von Theodorowicz, his fellow student at the Vienna conservatory, Louis Svencenski, violinist, and Alvan Schroeder, violincellist. Schroeder was considered one of the most accomplished cellists of the time and was one of the few to receive the honor of an invitation to become soloist of the Hof Opera in Berlin.

Mr. Kneisel as associate conductor of the Worcester Music Festival from 1892 to 1908.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

MAR 2 6 1926

A NEW AUDITORIUM

Providence concertgoers breathe more freely since the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced its willingness to hold in abeyance plans for the discontinuance of its visits to Providence until provision can be made to bridge over the period between the abandonment of Infantry Hall and the erection of the new Masonic Temple on Francis street. The purpose of the Masons to construct first the auditorium unit of their building promises that the emergency will not be of long duration and that, if the orchestra can put up with a temporary makeshift, the eventual concert hall provision should be highly satisfactory.

The promised auditorium will, we are told, be available to the public for concerts, conventions, and all other types of gatherings at all times, will seat 2500 to 3000, and have an exceptionally large stage.

It is fortunate that this solution of a civic problem should be so promptly presented, and we congratulate the directors of the new enterprise. In providing Providence with the modern auditorium facilities it has long needed, they will perform a service of far reaching benefit to the artistic, educational, and communal life of our city, a service none the less praiseworthy because it may prove financially profitable.

Of course the final availability of the Masons' offer depends on the acoustic properties which the finished auditorium may possess. But the prospect is at least considerably brighter for a continuance of the Boston Symphony's notable concerts here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON,
ME.
JOURNAL

1926

An instrumental quartet of delightful combination will feature the opening concerto number of the Boston Symphony Orchestra program to be played at Symphony Hall, Boston, on Saturday evening this week and which will be broadcast thru WEEI, Boston; WCSH, Portland; and WEAN, Providence. Last Saturday the Symphony did not appear, having been on tour, so the concert of this week will be the 19th of the season and the seventh to be broadcast. It is sponsored in Boston by the W. S. Quinby Co., and in Portlandn by the Rines Brothers Company.

The quartet to be heard consists of violin, flute, oboe and trumpet. Beethoven's concerto for violin is also an outstanding treat of the program. Respighi's symphonic poem, "The Pines of Rome," which has previously been done this season by the orchestra, will again be heard. Joseph Szigeti is to be the soloist and assisting artist.

The intermission program from the studio of WCSH will be by William V. Bradley, tenor, of Portland, accompanied by Fred Lincoln Hill of Portland at the piano.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

MAR 2 7 1926

KNEISEL DEATH RECALL FAMOUS STRING QUARTET

BOSTON, March 27 (AP).—The death in New York of Franz Kneisel, Roumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here the famous Kneisel string quartet, organized less than a year after Kneisel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1885. Kneisel died last night.

His quartet came into being primarily through the wish of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston symphony that chamber music be given more prominent notice. The quartet gave an annual series of concerts which from the first attracted wide attention. It performed the standard works of the classic composers, but more often introduced for the first time many important chamber music productions by famous American and European composers. In these productions the quartet often was augmented by the composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

2 7 1926

FRANZ KNEISEL DIES IN BOSTON

Rumanian Violinist Formed Famous String Quartet.

Boston, Mar. 27.—(AP)—The death in New York of Franz Kneisel, Roumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here the famous Kneisel string quartet, organized less than a year after Kneisel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1885. Kneisel died last night.

His quartet came into being primarily through the wish of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony that chamber music be given more prominent notice. The quartet gave an annual series of concerts which from the first attracted wide attention. It performed the standard works of the classic composers, but more often introduced for the first time many important chamber music productions by famous American and European composers. In these productions the quartet often was augmented by the composer.

Besides Kneisel, as first violinist, the quartet included Julius von Theodorowicz, his fellow student at the Vienna conservatory, Louis Svencenski, violist, and Alvin Schroeder, violincellist. Schroeder was considered one of the most accomplished cellists of the time and was one of the few to receive the honor of an invitation to become soloist of the Hof opera in Berlin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM

7 1926

Franz Kneisel, Founder Of Famous Musical Ensemble, Dies at 61

NEW YORK, March 26.—(AP) Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartette and a former concert master of Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital tonight. He was sixty-one years old.

Mr Kneisel from 1885 to 1903 was concert master of the Boston Symphony and organized his famous quartette a year after joining the Boston organization. In 1905 he became professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York and remained with that school until his death.

Famous Violinist Was Creator of Famous String Quartet

BOSTON, March 27 (AP)—The death in New York of Frank Gneisel, Roumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here the famous Kneisel string quartet, organized less than a year after Kneisel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1885. Kneisel died last night in Roosevelt Hospital, aged 61 years.

His quartet came into being primarily through the wish of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony that chamber music be given more prominent notice. The quartet gave an annual series of concerts which from the first attracted wide attention. It performed the standard works of the classic composers, but more often introduced for the first time many important chamber music productions by famous American and European composers. In these productions the quartet often was augmented by the composer.

Besides Kneisel, as first violinist, the quartet included Julius Von Theodorowicz, his fellow student at the Vienna Conservatory, Louis Svencenski, violinist, and Alvin Schroeder, violincellist. Schroeder was considered one of the most accomplished cellists of the time and was one of the few to receive the honor of an invitation to become soloist of the Hof Opera in Berlin.

Mr. Kneisel played at the Worcester Music Festival of '88, '89, '90, '92, '94, '95 and '97 and appeared in concerts on other occasions.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TROY
NEW YORK
OBSERVER

MAR 2 7 1926

Franz Kneisel, Violinist and Composer, Dead

New York, March 27.—Franz Kneisel, violinist and composer, died last night in Roosevelt Hospital after a weeks' illness. Stricken with a heart attack last week while on his way to Portland, Me., he was brought back to his home and later transferred to the hospital, where an operation was performed.

Born in Rumania.

Mr. Kneisel, who was sixtyone, was born in Rumania. He was graduated from the Vienna Conservatory in 1882. He received a degree at Yale University in 1911 and at Princeton in 1915.

Came to America in 1885.

He was concert master of the Hofburg Theatre Orchestra, Vienna, coming to America in 1885 to become concert master and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he remained until 1903. He was director of the Kneisel Quartet which went out of existence in 1917. Then he became conductor of the Worcester musical festivals, head of the violin and stringed instrument department of the Institute of Musical Art, New York, and also head of the violin and stringed instrument department of Kneisel Hall, Blue Hill, Me.

He is the compiler of the Kneisel Collection, for violin and piano, and composed of "Advanced Studies for the Violin."

The Kneisel Quartet.

Boston, March 27 (AP).—The death in New York of Franz Kneisel, Rumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here how the famous Kneisel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1885. His quartet came into being primarily through the wish of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony, that chamber music be given more prominent notice. The quartet gave an annual series of concerts, which from the first attracted wide attention. It performed the standard works of the classic composers, but more often introduced for the first time many important chamber music productions by famous American and European composers. In these productions the quartet was often augmented by the composer.

Besides Kneisel, as first violinist, the quartet included Julius Von Theodorwicz, his fellow student at the Vienna Conservatory: Louis Svencenski, violinist, and Alvin Schroeder, violoncellist. Schroeder was considered one of the most accomplished 'cellists of the time and was one of the few to receive the honor of an invitation to become soloist of the Hof Opera in Berlin.

---

master Lea

New York, March 27.—Franz Kneisel, violinist and director of the Kneisel Quartet until it was disbanded in 1917, died last night in Roosevelt Hospital. He was 61 years old.

Mr. Kneisel was born in Bucharest. He was trained at the Bucharest and Vienna Conservatories, making his debut in Vienna in 1882. He then became leader at the Hofburg Theatre and in 1884 became concertmaster of the Bilse Orchestra in Berlin.

From 1885 to 1903 he was concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His famous quartet was organized a year after joining the Boston Symphony, its first members being Kneisel, Roth Svecenski and Giese.

In 1905 he became a professor at the Institute of Musical Art here and remained with that school until his death. The disbanding of the quartet was met by regret of all critics and music lovers. It had earned a place second to none in all countries where music has its lovers.

He received the degree of music from Yale University in 1911 because of his undisputed position in the music world. Princeton honored him similarly in 1915. He published a collection of violin pieces and advanced etudes.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

MAR 2 7 1926

Franz Kneisel of Famous Quartet Dies

Franz Kneisel, violin virtuoso, organizer of the famous Kneisel quartet, and for many years a prominent figure in New York's musical world, died suddenly last night in Roosevelt Hospital. Death was caused by an operation for perforated ulcer of the intestines on Wednesday.

Early in the week Mr. Kneisel, accompanying his young son who was in ill health, started for his summer home at Blue Hill, Me., intending to enjoy a brief Easter vacation there. When the Kneisels reached Portland Mr. Kneisel complained of illness and at once returned to New York. He was rushed to Roosevelt Hospital and operated on for appendicitis Wednesday night.

His condition caused no alarm until late Thursday, when he developed symptoms of peritonitis and complications set in. Friday afternoon he suffered a relapse and the end came suddenly early last night.

Mr. Kneisel enjoyed a varied and distinguished career in the world of music. Of German parentage, he was born in Bucharest, January 26, 1865. He was a precocious violinist, as a boy assuming the duties of concertmeister in the Hofburg Theater orchestra in Vienna, and later in Bilse's orchestra at Berlin.

In 1885, on Conductor Gericke's invitation, Mr. Kneisel, then 20 years old, came to Boston as leader and soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The young violinist made his American debut, playing the Beethoven concerto on October 31, 1885.

In the following year he founded the Kneisel Quartet, a chamber music organization which soon won renown in the world of music and remained in the front rank of similar musical organizations until its disbandment a few seasons ago.

In recognition of his musical services Mr. Kneisel received the degree of Mus. Doc. (hon. c.) from Yal University in 1911, and from Princeton University in 1915. Prior to th his musical activities won him ma honors here and abroad. In 1907 served as a member of a jury of p inent musicians, a signal honor, a violin "Concours" of the Paris C servatory. He conducted the Bo Symphony concerts at the Chi World Fair in 1893, and in 190 signed as concertmaster of th chestra.

He had been professor of violi struction at the Institute of Mu Art in New York city since 1905. the time of his death he was presid of the Bohemians, New York's exclusive club of distinguished musicians.

---

ania, of German parentage, in 1865.

BOSTON, March 27.—(AP)—The death in New York of Franz Kneisel, Rumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here the famous Kneisel string quartet, organized less than a year after Kneizel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1885. Kneisel died last night.

His quartet came into being primarily through the wish of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony that chamber music be given more prominent notice. The quartet gave an annual series of concerts which from the first attracted wide attention. It performed the standard works of the classic composers, but more often introduced for the first time many important chamber music productions by famous Amerian and European composers. In these productions the quartet often was augmented by the composer.

Besides Kneisel, as first violinist, the quartet included Julius von Theodorowicz, his fellow student at the Vienna conservatory, Louis Svencenski, violinist, and Alvan Schroeder, violincellist. Schroeder was considered one of the most acomplished cellists of the time and was one of the few to receive the honor of an invitation to become soloist of the Hof Opera in Berliin.

Mr. Kneisel as associate conductor of the Worcester Music Festival from 1892 to 1908.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

7 1926

Franz Kneisel, Violinist, Is Dead

Noted Musician Was Formerly Concertmaster of Boston Symphony.

NEW YORK, March 26—(AP) Franz Kneisel, violinist, director of the Kneisel Quartet and a former concert master of Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in Roosevelt Hospital last night. He was 61 years old.

* * *

Franz Kneisel was born in Rumania, of German parentage, in 1865. A pupil of Gruen and Hellmesberger of Vienna he became concert master of the Hofburg Theater Orchestra in that city, and he was soon called to Berlin to be the concert master of Bilse's famous orchestra, to be the successor of such men as Ysaye and Cesar Thomson.

In 1885 Wilhelm Gericke invited him to Boston to succeed Bernhard Listemann as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This created an indignant outcry at the time from musicians, lovers of music and the press. One critic voiced the popular feeling when he wrote: "To drop Mr. Listemann from the position of concert master seems almost as terrific as it would be to discharge Mr. Zerrahn from the directorship of the Handel and Haydn."

Mr. Kneisel began his duties as concert master in this city Oct. 17, 1885, and on Oct. 31 of the same year he made his first appearance in Boston as a soloist by playing Beethoven's concerto. He did not at first escape criticism, or some even severe attacks, but it was not long before he was recognized as a high rank concert master and a high rank soloist.

Mr. Kneisel was a member of the Harvard Musical Association and the St. Botolph Club of Boston and many foreign musical organizations. He remained with the Boston Symphony Orchestra until 1903, when he resigned to devote his whole time with the Kneisel quartet, which he had established and which had become famous in the musical world.

While a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he conducted the orchestra in place of Mr. Nikisch while on a tour of the West and at the World's Fair in Chicago. He also conducted the orchestra in Boston on various occasions, and each year at the festival in Worcester. He played a Stradivarius (1714) which once belonged to his teacher, Grun of Vienna.

It was in 1905, when the school of music, endowed by James Loeb, was established in New York, that Mr. Kneisel was called to be head of the stringed instrument department of the school, with Frank Damrosch as director of the school. And Boston was reluctant to lose this artist at that time as it was hesitant to receive him in 1885. In recent years he established a summer home at Blue Hill, Me., where each year he has maintained a summer school for his pupils.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

26

KNEISEL, VIOLINIST COMPOSER, IS DEA

Stricken With Heart Attac Week Ago

Franz Kneisel, violinist and con poser, died last night in Rooseve Hospital after a week's illnes Stricken with a heart attack last wee while on his way to Portland, Me., h was brought back to his home, No 329 West 84th Street, and later trans ferred to the hospital, where an op eration was performed.

Mr. Kneisel, who was sixty-one, was born in Roumania. He was graduated from the Vienna Conservatory in 1882. He received a degree at Yale University in 1911 and at Princeton in 1915.

He was concert master of the Hofburg Theatre Orchestra, Vienna, coming to America in 1885 to become concert master and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he remained until 1903. He was director of the Kneisel Quartet which went out of existence in 1917. Then he became conductor of the Worcester musical festivals, head of the violin and stringed instrument department of the Institute of Musical Art, New York, and also head of the violin and stringed instrument department of Kneisel Hall, Blue Hill, Me.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
Times - Picayune

MAR 2 7 1926

F. KNEISEL, VIOLINIST, DIES

(By The Associated Press)

New York, March 26.—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital tonight. He was born in Bucharest sixty-one years ago. He had been a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BULLETIN
PHILA. PA.

MAR 2 7

received a degree at Yale University in 1911 and at Princeton in 1915.

He was concert master of the Hofburg Theatre Orchestra, Vienna, coming to America in 1885 to become concert master and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he remained until 1903. He was director of the Kneisel Quartet which went out of existence in 1917. Then he became conductor of the Worcester musical festivals, head of the violin and stringed instrument department of the Institute of Musical Art, New York, and also head of the violin and stringed instrument department of Kneisel Hall, Blue Hill, Me.

He was the compiler of the Kneisel Collection, for violin and piano, and composer of "Advanced Studies for the Violin."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.

MAR 2 7 1926

FRANZ KNEISEL, VIOLINIST, DEAD

Former Master of Boston Symphony Orchestra Dies in New York

NEW YORK, March 26 (A. P.)—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital tonight. He was 61 years old.

Mr. Kneisel was born in Bucharest in 1865. He was trained at the Bucharest and Vienna conservatories making his debut in Vienna in 1882. From 1885 to 1903 he was concert master of the Boston Symphony and organized his famous quartet a year after joining the Boston organization. In 1905 he became a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York and remained with that school until his death.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEWS LEADER
RICHMOND, VA.

MAR 2 7 1926

Boston Symphony Will Play Here Night Of April 12

What Richmond music lovers have been looking forward to for many months will take place at the city auditorium the night of April 12, when the Boston Symphony orchestra will be here under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

A Toronto newspaper describes the appearance of the orchestra in that city as "one of the greatest events of any season in any music center the world over," and all who have heard this body of 104 musicians feel sure that this city will have the same opinion.

The seat sale will open at the Corley Company next Thursday morning, April 1, and it is thought that Richmond will prove as appreciative as any of the other cities in this country and Canada. The orchestra will not be heard south of this city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO

MAR 2 7 1926

NEW YORK (AP) — FRANZ Kneisel, 61, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital Friday night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

OGDEN, UTAH
STANDARD EXAMINER

MAR 2 7 1926

NOTED VIOLINIST DIES IN NEW YORK

NEW York March 27.—(By The Associated Press.) — Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital last night. He was born in Bucharest 61 years ago. He had been a professor at the institute of musical art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

POST
CHICAGO, ILL.

MAR 2 7 1926

Frank Kneisel, Noted Violinist, Dies in Gotham

NEW YORK, March 27.—(AP)—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concertmaster of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital last night. He was born in Bucharest sixty-one years ago and had been a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
Deseret News

MAR 2 7 1926

FAMED VIOLINIST DIES.

NEW YORK, March 27.—(AP)—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet, and a former concert master of Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital last night. He was born in Bucharest 61 years ago He had been a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

STAR-EAGLE
NEWARK, N. J.

Kneisel Dies; Once Led Famous Quartet

NEW YORK, March 27.—Franz Kneisel, 61, violinist and composer, died last night in Roosevelt Hospital after a week's illness.

Hhe was born in Rumania and graduated from the Vienna Conservatory in 1882.

He was concert-master of the Hofburg Theater Orchestra, Vienna, coming to America in 1885 to become concert-master and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with which he remained until 1903. He was first violinist of the famous Kneisel Quartet which went out of existence in 1917. Then he became conductor of the Worcester musical festivals, head of the violin and stringed instrument department of the Institute of Musical Art, New York, and of the like department of Kneisel Hall, Blue Hill, Me.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

KANSAS CITY, MO.
TIMES

1926

Franz Kneisel, Violinist, Dead.

NEW YORK, March 26.—(A. P.)—Franz Kneisel, 61, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet, and a former concert master of the Boston symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital tonight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

STATES
NEW ORLEANS, LA.

MAR 2 7 1926

not come up.

FRANZ KNEISEL DEAD

NEW YORK, March 27.—(By A. P.)—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in Roosevelt Hospital last night. He was born in Bucharest 61 years ago. He had been a professor at the Institute of musical art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

POST DISPATCH
ST. LOUIS, MO.

MAR 2 7 1926

musical treat.

FRANZ KNEISEL, VIOLINIST, DIES

Director of Quartet Was Born in Bucharest.

By the Associated Press.

NEW YORK, March 27.—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in Roosevelt Hospital last night.

He was born in Bucharest 61 years ago. He had been a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.

1926

ling will live.

Violinist Is Dead

NEW YORK — Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, died in Roosevelt Hospital last night. He was former concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TIMES
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.

7

CONCERT VIOLINIST DIES IN NEW YORK

[BY A. P. NIGHT WIRE]

NEW YORK, March 26.—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concertmaster of Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in Roosevelt Hospital tonight. He was born in Bucharest sixty-one years ago. He had been a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York since 1905.

AGED MAN GOES ABROAD

197

THIS CLIPPING FROM

EVE. UNION

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

sociation will expose an
ance.

Commission

v Jersey has signed the
g a commission to study
nt Sunday blue laws of cation in mind. Its re-
he next session of the month the Joint Com-
Massachusetts Legisla-
a motion establishing study our obsol state

Rhod Isl
a heahy
eral sur

Secreta
20,000,000 down the circu insta facto ry s

the Kn cert master of chestra, died in Roosev night. He was 61 years old.

* * *

Franz Kneisel was born in Rumania, of German parentage, in 1865. A pupil of Gruen and Hellmesberger of Vienna he became concert master of the Hofburg Theater Orchestra in that city, and he was soon called to Berlin to be the concert master of Bilse's famous orchestra, to be the successor of such men as Ysaye and Cesar Thomson.

In 1885 Wilhelm Gericke invited him to Boston to succeed Bernhard Listemann as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This created an indignant outcry at the time from musicians, lovers of music and the press. One critic voiced the popular feeling when he wrote: "To drop Mr. Listemann from the position of concert master seems almost as terrific a it would be to discharge Mr. Zerrah from the directorship of the Hande and Haydn."

Mr. Kneisel began his duties a concert master in this city Oct. 1 1885, and on Oct. 31 of the same yea he made his first appearance in Bosto as a soloist by playing Beethoven concerto. He did not at first escap criticism, or some even severe attack but it was not long before he was re ognized as a high rank concert master and a high rank soloist.

Mr. Kneisel was a member of the Harvard Musical Association and the St. Botolph Club of Boston and many foreign musical organizations. He remained with the Boston Symphony Orchestra until 1903, when he resigned to devote his whole time with the Kneisel quartet, which he had established and which had become famous in the musical world.

While a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he conducted the orchestra in place of Mr. Nikisch whil on a tour of the West and at th World's Fair in Chicago. He also con

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK

EVE. WORLD

7 1926

KNEISEL, VIOLINIST COMPOSER, IS DEA

Stricken With Heart Atta Week Ago

Franz Kneisel, violinist and con poser, died last night in Rooseve Hospital after a week's illnes Stricken with a heart attack last wee while on his way to Portland, Me., h was brought back to his home, N 329 West 84th Street, and later trans ferred to the hospital, where an op eration was performed.

Mr. Kneisel, who was sixty-one, was born in Roumania. He was graduated from the Vienna Conservatory in 1882. He received a degree at Yale University in 1911 and at Princeton in 1915.

He was concert master of the Hofburg Theatre Orchestra, Vienna, coming to America in 1885 to become concert master and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he remained until 1903. He was director of the Kneisel Quartet which went out of existence in 1917. Then he became conductor of the Worcester musical festivals, head of the violin and stringed instrument department of the Institute of Musical Art, New York, and also head of the violin and stringed instrument department of Kneisel Hall, Blue Hill, Me.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW ORLEANS, LA.

Times - Picayune

MAR 2 7 1926

F. KNEISEL, VIOLINIST, DIES

(By The Associated Press)

New York, March 26.—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital tonight. He was born in Bucharest sixty-one years ago. He had been a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BULLETIN

PHILA. PA.

MAR 2 7 1926

KNEISEL, VIOLINIST, DIES

Composer Stricken With Heart Attack—Held Princeton Degree

New York, March 27.—Franz Kneisel, violinist and composer, died last night in Roosevelt Hospital after a week's illness. Stricken with a heart attack last week while on his way to Portland, Me., he was brought back to his home and later transferred to the hospital, where an operation was performed.

Mr. Kneisel, who was sixty-one, was born in Rumania. He was graduated from the Vienna Conservatory in 1882. He received a degree at Yale University in 1911 and at Princeton in 1915.

He was concert master of the Hofburg Theatre Orchestra, Vienna, coming to America in 1885 to become concert master and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he remained until 1903. He was director of the Kneisel Quartet which went out of existence in 1917. Then he became conductor of the Worcester musical festivals, head of the violin and stringed instrument department of the Institute of Musical Art, New York, and also head of the violin and stringed instrument department of Kneisel Hall, Blue Hill, Me.

He was the compiler of the Kneisel Collection, for violin and piano, and composer of "Advanced Studies for the Violin."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TELEGRAM

WORCESTER, MASS.

MAR 2 7 1926

FRANZ KNEISEL, VIOLINIST, DEAD

Former Master of Boston Symphony Orchestra Dies in New York

NEW YORK, March 26 (A. P.)—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital tonight. He was 61 years old.

Mr. Kneisel was born in Bucharest in 1865. He was trained at the Bucharest and Vienna conservatories making his debut in Vienna in 1882. From 1885 to 1903 he was concert master of the Boston Symphony and organized his famous quartet a year after joining the Boston organization. In 1905 he became a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York and remained with that school until his death.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEWS LEADER

RICHMOND, VA.

MAR 2 7 1926

Boston Symphony Will Play Here Night Of April 12

What Richmond music lovers have been looking forward to for many months will take place at the city auditorium the night of April 12, when the Boston Symphony orchestra will be here under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

A Toronto newspaper describes the appearance of the orchestra in that city as "one of the greatest events of any season in any music center the world over," and all who have heard this body of 104 musicians feel sure that this city will have the same opinion.

The seat sale will open at the Corley Company next Thursday morning, April 1, and it is thought that Richmond will prove as appreciative as any of the other cities in this country and Canada. The orchestra will not be heard south of this city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BLADE

TOLEDO, OHIO

MAR 2 7 1926

NEW YORK (AP) — FRANZ Kneisel, 61, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital Friday night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

OGDEN, UTAH

STANDARD EXAMINER

MAR 2 7 1926

NOTED VIOLINIST DIES IN NEW YORK

NEW York March 27.—(By The Associated Press.) — Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital last night. He was born in Bucharest 61 years ago. He had been a professor at the institute of musical art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

POST

CHICAGO, ILL.

MAR 2 7 1926

Frank Kneisel, Noted Violinist, Dies in Gotham

NEW YORK, March 27.—(AP)—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concertmaster of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital last night. He was born in Bucharest sixty-one years ago and had been a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH

Deseret News

MAR 2 7 1926

FAMED VIOLINIST DIES.

NEW YORK, March 27.—(AP)—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet, and a former concert master of Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital last night. He was born in Bucharest 61 years ago He had been a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

STAR-EAGLE

NEWARK, N. J.

MAR 2 7

Kneisel Dies; Once Led Famous Quartet

NEW YORK, March 27.—Franz Kneisel, 61, violinist and composer, died last night in Roosevelt Hospital after a week's illness.

Hhe was born in Rumania and graduated from the Vienna Conservatory in 1882.

He was concert-master of the Hofburg Theater Orchestra, Vienna, coming to America in 1885 to become concert-master and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he remained until 1903. He was first violinist of the famous Kneisel Quartet which went out of existence in 1917. Then he became conductor of the Worcester musical festivals, head of the violin and stringed instrument department of the Institute of Musical Art, New York, and of the like department of Kneisel Hall, Blue Hill, Me.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

KANSAS CITY, MO.

TIMES

7 1926

Franz Kneisel, Violinist, Dead.

NEW YORK, March 26.—(A. P.)—Franz Kneisel, 61, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet, and a former concert master of the Boston symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital tonight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

STATES

NEW ORLEANS, LA.

MAR 2 7 1926

not come up.

FRANZ KNEISEL DEAD

NEW YORK, March 27.—(By A. P.)—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in Roosevelt Hospital last night. He was born in Bucharest 61 years ago. He had been a professor at the Institute of musical art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

POST DISPATCH

ST. LOUIS, MO.

MAR 2 7 1926

musical treat.

FRANZ KNEISEL, VIOLINIST, DIES

Director of Quartet Was Born in Bucharest.

By the Associated Press.

NEW YORK, March 27.—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in Roosevelt Hospital last night.

He was born in Bucharest 61 years ago. He had been a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEWS

WASHINGTON, D. C.

MAR 2 7 1926

ling will live.

Violinist Is Dead

NEW YORK — Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, died in Roosevelt Hospital last night. He was former concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TIMES

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.

2 7 1926

CONCERT VIOLINIST DIES IN NEW YORK

[BY A. P. NIGHT WIRE]

NEW YORK, March 26.—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concertmaster of Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in Roosevelt Hospital tonight. He was born in Bucharest sixty-one years ago. He had been a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York since 1905.

AGED MAN GOES ABROAD

---

adelphia
ge place in Sunday eve-
Sym-

197

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

sociation will expose an
ance.

F Commission

v Jersey has signed the
ig a commission to study
nt Sunday blue laws of
cation in mind. Its re-
he next session of the
t month the Joint Com-
Massachusetts Legisla-
d a motion establishing study our obsolete state

RhodIsl
a heahy
eral sur

Secret
20,000 ,000
down the circu instax facto ry s

—(A Dctor
ner
Thony he Ci
that the Kne... cert master of ... chestra, died in Roosev... night. He was 61 years old.

* * *

Franz Kneisel was born in Rumania, of German parentage, in 1865. A pupil of Gruen and Hellmesberger of Vienna he became concert master of the Hofburg Theater Orchestra in that city, and he was soon called to Berlin to be the concert master of Bilse's famous orchestra, to be the successor of such men as Ysaye and Cesar Thomson.

In 1885 Wilhelm Gericke invited him to Boston to succeed Bernhard Listemann as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This created an indignant outcry at the time from musicians, lovers of music and the press. One critic voiced the popular feeling when he wrote: "To drop Mr. Listemann from the position of concert master seems almost as terrific as it would be to discharge Mr. Zerrahn from the directorship of the Handel and Haydn."

Mr. Kneisel began his duties as concert master in this city Oct. 17 1885, and on Oct. 31 of the same year he made his first appearance in Boston as a soloist by playing Beethoven's concerto. He did not at first escape criticism, or some even severe attacks but it was not long before he was recognized as a high rank concert master and a high rank soloist.

Mr. Kneisel was a member of the Harvard Musical Association and the St. Botolph Club of Boston and many foreign musical organizations. He remained with the Boston Symphony Orchestra until 1903, when he resigned to devote his whole time with the Kneisel quartet, which he had established and which had become famous in the musical world.

While a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he conducted the orchestra in place of Mr. Nikisch while on a tour of the West and at the World's Fair in Chicago. He also con-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

26

KNEISEL, VIOLINIST COMPOSER, IS DEA

Stricken With Heart Attac Week Ago

Franz Kneisel, violinist and composer, died last night in Rooseve Hospital after a week's illnes Stricken with a heart attack last wee while on his way to Portland, Me., h was brought back to his home, No 329 West 84th Street, and later transferred to the hospital, where an operation was performed.

Mr. Kneisel, who was sixty-one, was born in Roumania. He was graduated from the Vienna Conservatory in 1882. He received a degree at Yale University in 1911 and at Princeton in 1915.

He was concert master of the Hofburg Theatre Orchestra, Vienna, coming to America in 1885 to become concert master and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he remained until 1903. He was director of the Kneisel Quartet which went out of existence in 1917. Then he became conductor of the Worcester musical festivals, head of the violin and stringed instrument department of the Institute of Musical Art, New York, and also head of the violin and stringed instrument department of Kneisel Hall, Blue Hill, Me.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
Times - Picayune

MAR 2 7 1926

F. KNEISEL, VIOLINIST, DIES
(By The Associated Press)

New York, March 26.—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital tonight. He was born in Bucharest sixty-one years ago. He had been a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BULLETIN
PHILA. PA.

KNEISEL, VIOLINIST, DIES

Composer Stricken With Heart Attack—Held Princeton Degree

New York, March 27.—Franz Kneisel, violinist and composer, died last night in Roosevelt Hospital after a week's illness. Stricken with a heart attack last week while on his way to Portland, Me., he was brought back to his home and later transferred to the hospital, where an operation was performed.

Mr. Kneisel, who was sixty-one, was born in Rumania. He was graduated from the Vienna Conservatory in 1882. He received a degree at Yale University in 1911 and at Princeton in 1915.

He was concert master of the Hofburg Theatre Orchestra, Vienna, coming to America in 1885 to become concert master and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he remained until 1903. He was director of the Kneisel Quartet which went out of existence in 1917. Then he became conductor of the Worcester musical festivals, head of the violin and stringed instrument department of the Institute of Musical Art, New York, and also head of the violin and stringed instrument department of Kneisel Hall, Blue Hill, Me.

He was the compiler of the Kneisel Collection, for violin and piano, and composer of "Advanced Studies for the Violin."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.

MAR 2 7 1926

FRANZ KNEISEL, VIOLINIST, DEAD

Former Master of Boston Symphony Orchestra Dies in New York

NEW YORK, March 26 (A. P.)—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital tonight. He was 61 years old.

Mr. Kneisel was born in Bucharest in 1865. He was trained at the Bucharest and Vienna conservatories making his debut in Vienna in 1882. From 1885 to 1903 he was concert master of the Boston Symphony and organized his famous quartet a year after joining the Boston organization. In 1905 he became a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York and remained with that school until his death.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS LEADER
RICHMOND, VA.

MAR 2 7 1926

Boston Symphony Will Play Here Night Of April 12

What Richmond music lovers have been looking forward to for many months will take place at the city auditorium the night of April 12, when the Boston Symphony orchestra will be here under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

A Toronto newspaper describes the appearance of the orchestra in that city as "one of the greatest events of any season in any music center the world over," and all who have heard this body of 104 musicians feel sure that this city will have the same opinion.

The seat sale will open at the Corley Company next Thursday morning, April 1, and it is thought that Richmond will prove as appreciative as any of the other cities in this country and Canada. The orchestra will not be heard south of this city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO

MAR 2 7 1926

NEW YORK (AP) — FRANZ Kneisel, 61, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital Friday night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OGDEN, UTAH
STANDARD EXAMINER

MAR 2 7 1926

NOTED VIOLINIST DIES IN NEW YORK

NEW York March 27.—(By The Associated Press.) — Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital last night. He was born in Bucharest 61 years ago. He had been a professor at the institute of musical art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
CHICAGO, ILL.

MAR 2 7 1926

Frank Kneisel, Noted Violinist, Dies in Gotham

NEW YORK, March 27.—(AP)—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concertmaster of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital last night. He was born in Bucharest sixty-one years ago and had been a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
Deseret News

MAR 2 7 1926

FAMED VIOLINIST DIES.

NEW YORK, March 27.—(AP)—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet, and a former concert master of Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital last night. He was born in Bucharest 61 years ago He had been a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
STAR-EAGLE
NEWARK, N. J.

Kneisel Dies; Once Led Famous Quartet

NEW YORK, March 27.—Franz Kneisel, 61, violinist and composer, died last night in Roosevelt Hospital after a week's illness.

Hhe was born in Rumania and graduated from the Vienna Conservatory in 1882.

He was concert-master of the Hofburg Theater Orchestra, Vienna, coming to America in 1885 to become concert-master and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with which he remained until 1903. He was first violinist of the famous Kneisel Quartet which went out of existence in 1917. Then he became conductor of the Worcester musical festivals, head of the violin and stringed instrument department of the Institute of Musical Art, New York, and of the like department of Kneisel Hall, Blue Hill, Me.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
KANSAS CITY, MO.
TIMES

1926

Franz Kneisel, Violinist, Dead.

NEW YORK, March 26.—(A. P.)—Franz Kneisel, 61, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet, and a former concert master of the Boston symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital tonight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
STATES
NEW ORLEANS, LA.

MAR 2 7 1926

not come up.

FRANZ KNEISEL DEAD

NEW YORK, March 27.—(By A. P.)—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in Roosevelt Hospital last night. He was born in Bucharest 61 years ago. He had been a professor at the Institute of musical art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST DISPATCH
ST. LOUIS, MO.

MAR 2 7 1926

musical treat.

FRANZ KNEISEL. VIOLINIST, DIES

Director of Quartet Was Born in Bucharest.

By the Associated Press.

NEW YORK, March 27.—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in Roosevelt Hospital last night.

He was born in Bucharest 61 years ago. He had been a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.

1926

ling will live.

Violinist Is Dead

NEW YORK — Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, died in Roosevelt Hospital last night. He was former concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.

CONCERT VIOLINIST DIES IN NEW YORK

[BY A. P. NIGHT WIRE]

NEW YORK, March 26.—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concertmaster of Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in Roosevelt Hospital tonight. He was born in Bucharest sixty-one years ago. He had been a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York since 1905.

AGED MAN GOES ABROAD

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

sociation will expose an
ance.

F Commission

v Jersey has signed the
ng a commission to study
nt Sunday blue laws of
cation in mind. Its rethe next session of the
t month the Joint Com-
Massachusetts Legisla-
d a motion establishing study our obsol state

Rhod Isl
a heahy
eral surj

Secret
20,000 ,000
down the circur nsta
facto ry s

Deto
ner
Thony he Ci
that

the Kne
cert master of tion spital
chestra, died in Roosev night. He was 61 years old.

* * *

Franz Kneisel was born in Rumania, of German parentage, in 1865. A pupil of Gruen and Hellmesberger of Vienna he became concert master of the Hofburg Theater Orchestra in that city, and he was soon called to Berlin to be the concert master of Bilse's famous orchestra, to be the successor of such men as Ysaye and Cesar Thomson.

In 1885 Wilhelm Gericke invited him to Boston to succeed Bernhard Listemann as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This created an indignant outcry at the time from musicians, lovers of music and the press. One critic voiced the popular feeling when he wrote: "To drop Mr. Listemann from the position of concert master seems almost as terrific a it would be to discharge Mr. Zerrah from the directorship of the Hande and Haydn."

Mr. Kneisel began his duties a concert master in this city Oct. 1 1885, and on Oct. 31 of the same yea he made his first appearance in Bosto as a soloist by playing Beethoven concerto. He did not at first escap criticism, or some even severe attack but it was not long before he was re ognized as a high rank concert master and a high rank soloist.

Mr. Kneisel was a member of the Harvard Musical Association and the St. Botolph Club of Boston and many foreign musical organizations. He remained with the Boston Symphony Orchestra until 1903, when he resigned to devote his whole time with the Kneisel quartet, which he had established and which had become famous in the musical world.

While a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he conducted the orchestra in place of Mr. Nikisch whil on a tour of the West and at th World's Fair in Chicago. He also con

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

7 1926

KNEISEL, VIOLINIST COMPOSER, IS DEA

Stricken With Heart Attac Week Ago

Franz Kneisel, violinist and com poser, died last night in Rooseve Hospital after a week's illnes Stricken with a heart attack last wee while on his way to Portland, Me., h was brought back to his home, No 329 West 84th Street, and later trans ferred to the hospital, where an op eration was performed.

Mr. Kneisel, who was sixty-one, was born in Roumania. He was graduated from the Vienna Conservatory in 1882. He received a degree at Yale University in 1911 and at Princeton in 1915.

He was concert master of the Hofburg Theatre Orchestra, Vienna, coming to America in 1885 to become concert master and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he remained until 1903. He was director of the Kneisel Quartet which went out of existence in 1917. Then he became conductor of the Worcester musical festivals, head of the violin and stringed instrument department of the Institute of Musical Art, New York, and also head of the violin and stringed instrument department of Kneisel Hall, Blue Hill, Me.

MAR 2 7 1926

F. KNEISEL, VIOLINIST, DIES

(By The Associated Press)

New York, March 26.—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital tonight. He was born in Bucharest sixty-one years ago. He had been a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BULLETIN
PHILA. PA.

MAR 2 7 1926

KNEISEL, VIOLINIST, DIES

Composer Stricken With Heart Attack—Held Princeton Degree

New York, March 27.—Franz Kneisel, violinist and composer, died last night in Roosevelt Hospital after a week's illness. Stricken with a heart attack last week while on his way to Portland, Me., he was brought back to his home and later transferred to the hospital, where an operation was performed.

Mr. Kneisel, who was sixty-one, was born in Rumania. He was graduated from the Vienna Conservatory in 1882. He received a degree at Yale University in 1911 and at Princeton in 1915.

He was concert master of the Hofburg Theatre Orchestra, Vienna, coming to America in 1885 to become concert master and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he remained until 1903. He was director of the Kneisel Quartet which went out of existence in 1917. Then he became conductor of the Worcester musical festivals, head of the violin and stringed instrument department of the Institute of Musical Art, New York, and also head of the violin and stringed instrument department of Kneisel Hall, Blue Hill, Me.

He was the compiler of the Kneisel Collection, for violin and piano, and composer of "Advanced Studies for the Violin."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.

MAR 2 7 1926

FRANZ KNEISEL, VIOLINIST, DEAD

Former Master of Boston Symphony Orchestra Dies in New York

NEW YORK, March 26 (A. P.)—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital tonight. He was 61 years old.

Mr. Kneisel was born in Bucharest in 1865. He was trained at the Bucharest and Vienna conservatories making his debut in Vienna in 1882. From 1885 to 1903 he was concert master of the Boston Symphony and organized his famous quartet a year after joining the Boston organization. In 1905 he became a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York and remained with that school until his death.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS LEADER
RICHMOND, VA.

MAR 2 7 1926

Boston Symphony Will Play Here Night Of April 12

What Richmond music lovers have been looking forward to for many months will take place at the city auditorium the night of April 12, when the Boston Symphony orchestra will be here under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

A Toronto newspaper describes the appearance of the orchestra in that city as "one of the greatest events of any season in any music center the world over," and all who have heard this body of 104 musicians feel sure that this city will have the same opinion.

The seat sale will open at the Corley Company next Thursday morning, April 1, and it is thought that Richmond will prove as appreciative as any of the other cities in this country and Canada. The orchestra will not be heard south of this city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO

MAR 2 7 1926

NEW YORK (AP) — FRANZ Kneisel, 61, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital Friday night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OGDEN, UTAH
STANDARD EXAMINER

MAR 2 7 1926

NOTED VIOLINIST DIES IN NEW YORK

NEW York March 27.—(By The Associated Press.) — Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital last night. He was born in Bucharest 61 years ago. He had been a professor at the institute of musical art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
CHICAGO, ILL.

MAR 2 7 1926

Frank Kneisel, Noted Violinist, Dies in Gotham

NEW YORK, March 27.—(AP)—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concertmaster of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital last night. He was born in Bucharest sixty-one years ago and had been a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
Deseret News

MAR 2 7 1926

FAMED VIOLINIST DIES.

NEW YORK, March 27.—(AP)—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet, and a former concert master of Boston Symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital last night. He was born in Bucharest 61 years ago He had been a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
STAR-EAGLE
NEWARK, N. J.

MAR 2 7

Kneisel Dies; Once Led Famous Quartet

NEW YORK, March 27.—Franz Kneisel, 61, violinist and composer, died last night in Roosevelt Hospital after a week's illness.

Hhe was born in Rumania and graduated from the Vienna Conservatory in 1882.

He was concert-master of the Hofburg Theater Orchestra, Vienna, coming to America in 1885 to become concert-master and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he remained until 1903. He was first violinist of the famous Kneisel Quartet which went out of existence in 1917. Then he became conductor of the Worcester musical festivals, head of the violin and stringed instrument department of the Institute of Musical Art, New York, and of the like department of Kneisel Hall, Blue Hill, Me.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
KANSAS CITY, MO.
TIMES

7 1926

Franz Kneisel, Violinist, Dead.

NEW YORK, March 26.—(A. P.)—Franz Kneisel, 61, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet, and a former concert master of the Boston symphony orchestra, died in Roosevelt hospital tonight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
STATES
NEW ORLEANS, LA.

MAR 2 7 1926

not come up.

FRANZ KNEISEL DEAD

NEW YORK, March 27.—(By A. P.)—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in Roosevelt Hospital last night. He was born in Bucharest 61 years ago. He had been a professor at the Institute of musical art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST DISPATCH
ST. LOUIS, MO.

MAR 2 7 1926

musical treat.

FRANZ KNEISEL, VIOLINIST, DIES

Director of Quartet Was Born in Bucharest.

By the Associated Press.

NEW YORK, March 27.—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in Roosevelt Hospital last night.

He was born in Bucharest 61 years ago. He had been a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York since 1905.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.

MAR 2 7 1926

ling will live.

Violinist Is Dead

NEW YORK — Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, died in Roosevelt Hospital last night. He was former concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.

2 7 1926

CONCERT VIOLINIST DIES IN NEW YORK

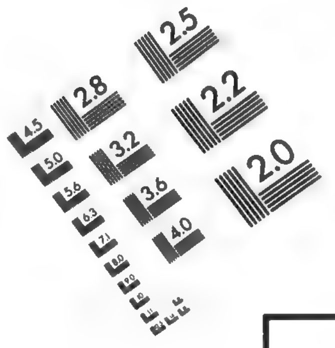
[BY A. P. NIGHT WIRE]

NEW YORK, March 26.—Franz Kneisel, Hungarian violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet and a former concertmaster of Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in Roosevelt Hospital tonight. He was born in Bucharest sixty-one years ago. He had been a professor at the Institute of Musical Art in New York since 1905.

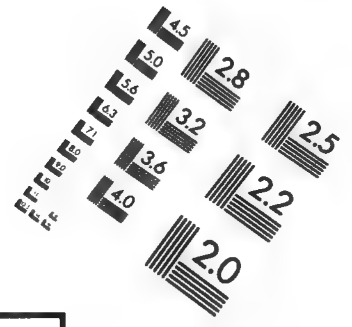
AGED MAN GOES ABROAD

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

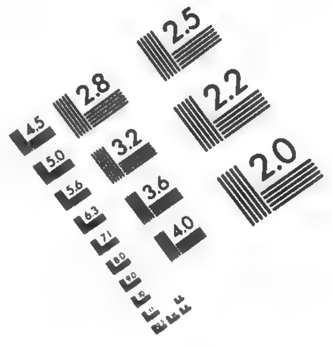
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



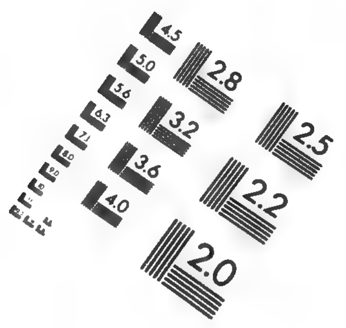
2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0



4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0

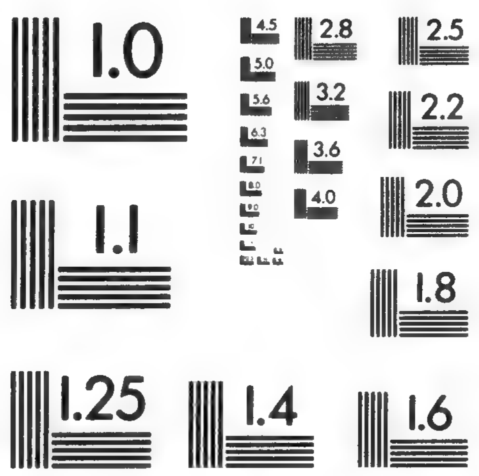


4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
2.8
2.5
5.0
5.6
3.2
2.2
6.3
3.6
7.1
8.0
4.0
2.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

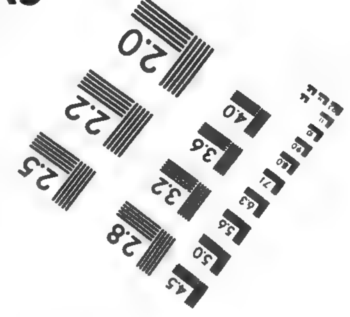
1.0 mm

1.5 mm

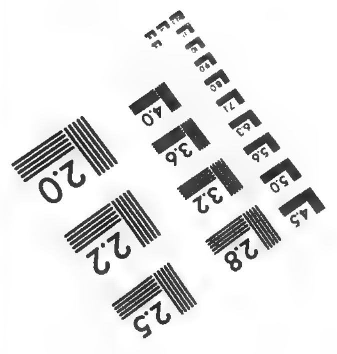
2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5



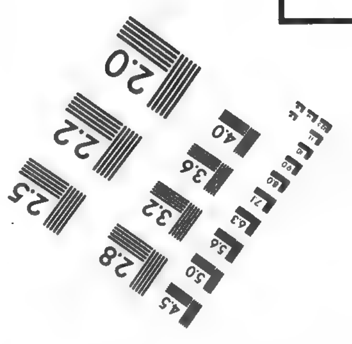
2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5



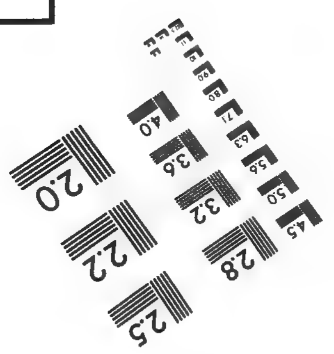
4.0
2.0
3.6
3.2
2.2
5.0
2.8
4.5
2.5

A4

A3



2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5



4.0
2.0
3.6
3.2
2.2
5.0
2.8
4.5
2.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

198

N Y Times Mar 28

BEGINNING OF THE

The System of Guest Conducting— Its Advantages and Consequences

By OLIN DOWNES.

DURING the season nearing its end seven different conductors have appeared with New York's two permanent symphony orchestras. The Philharmonic Society provided Messrs. Mengelberg, Hadley, Toscanini and Furtwaengler. The Symphony Society presented Messrs. Damrosch, Goossens and Klemperer. The State Symphony engaged two conductors—Ernst von Dohnanyi and Alfredo Casella. Mr. Casella did not function as its leader, for the orchestra was forced to disband midway in its season, but Mr. Dohnanyi was enabled to fulfill his engagement. Eight conductors, then, appeared with the local orchestral organizations. The Philharmonic and the Symphony Societies by themselves furnished more conductors than all the major orchestras of Philadelphia, Boston, Cleveland, Cincinnati which visited the city.

The policies of the visiting orchestras in the matter of conductors are directly opposite to those pursued by the resident bodies. The visiting orchestras have conductors engaged for at least an entire season and usually longer. Mr. Stokowski has conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra for thirteen years. Mr. Koussevitzky is in his second year as conductor of the Boston Symphony. Mr. Sokoloff has been conductor of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra since it was founded. Mr. Reiner is leading the Cincinnati Orchestra for his fourth season. The Chicago Symphony Orchestra has not been heard for some years in this city, which is regrettable, for it is an admirable body, one of the very best in the country. Mr. Stock has conducted this orchestra since the death of its founder, Theodore Thomas, which was in 1905. It is in New York that the system of guest conductors has been most popular and pursued with the greatest persistency and rivalry, with the result of much public excitement, the appearances of many celebrated musicians, many brilliant performances and other results of a less valuable kind. For the system of guest conducting has on artistic grounds its unfortunate side.

It is probably impossible for an orchestra to attain the highest standards when it is put in the hands of two or three different conductors in the course of a single season. If these guest conductors appeared for a pair of concerts at long intervals they would not interfere with the orchestra's routine or with the intimate understanding which only time can establish between a leader and his men. Particularly would this be the case if the whilom policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were pursued, when, on very exceptional occasions, great composers were invited to direct performances of their own compositions. Instances such as the visit of Vincent d'Indy, especially engaged by the Boston Symphony for a small number of concerts of his own music, and the appearance of Richard Strauss as conductor of his own works at a concert given for the Pension Fund come to mind. There was then, of course, keen public interest in the appearances of distinguished composers; but the emphasis was upon the music rather than the man and his idiosyncrasies of dress or manner. The composers appeared under the most impressive circumstances —as Mr. Stravinsky, who is no conductor, appeared last season with the Philharmonic Society—and they made legitimate propaganda for their works. The occasional visitor did not rep[illegible] deviation from the accustomed [illegible] and the consistently high quality of the work of the orchestra. The principle of a single conductor made individually responsible for the character of the concerts held, and certainly the instances of the Boston and Philadelphia Orchestras testify to its merits.

[illegible] orchestral policies are affected by many and complicated circumstances. There has been keen and growing rivalry between the resident organizations. There is a public, restless and spoiled by sensational advertising and an oversupply of famous artists from abroad. Evidently it has been felt necessary, in view of the enormous expenses and the resultant financial deficits of every orchestral season, to attract the public to the box office by whatever means proved most efficacious. The means today are those of employing celebrated conductors. This is at least a marked improvement over the old conditions when it was necessary to engage famous soloists, singers as well as instrumentalists, whose performances usually constituted interruptions and distractions that should not have appertained to concerts of a symphonic nature. Nevertheless, the emphasis of the engagement of a conductor instead of emphasis upon good programs and worth-while music is a continuation of a principle destructive to the development of genuine appreciation and taste.

In the season past, all of the conductors who have appeared with New York orchestras have been men of reputation but by no means of equal abilities. At one end of the scale appeared a European conductor of little more than fluent and routine qualities. At the other end was Arturo Toscanini, whose performances on the whole surpassed any others in their finish, their beauty, and their qualities of genius. But let us take the case of Mr. Toscanini, who probably has no peer today among conductors, from the point of view of his effect upon Philharmonic audiences. He comes here loudly and justly heralded. He gives a series of fourteen or fifteen remarkable concerts. There is intense enthusiasm of public and press. The concerts are oversold and hundreds turned from the doors. Then Mr. Toscanini departs. His successor has been here before, and has given great performances in this city. It is not necessary here to discuss the relative merits of Mr. Toscanini and Mr. Furtwaengler, except to say that after a sensational success in his first season Mr. Furtwaengler returns, as the repetition of a familiar tale, and there is a lapse of wide public interest in his appearances, not caused by the essential differences between the two conductors. (Mr. Mengelberg has had the same fate.) If Mr. Furtwaengler had come here for the first instead of the second time, or after an interval of years since his last visit, he would have received a greater share of public curiosity, attention and acclaim than he did this season. It is questionable, if Mr. Toscanini were the greatest conductor who had ever lived, whether a public sated and spoiled with sensations would continue to regard him as it now does if he appeared with regularity season after season. We would that he might do that. We can imagine no better fortune for the public of orchestral concerts in this city. But the public appreciation of music is not developed as soundly by the lure of a great artistic personality as it would be if the same public could be made to think more of music instead of interpreters.

Mr. Stokowski is wise. He steadily refuses to give more than ten concerts a season in New York City.

In advocating an end of the guest-conductor system it must be admitted that a great deal hinges on the quality of the conductor engaged for a long term. Henri Rabaud, who succeeded Karl Muck, might have conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for decades and never have interested the public. Pierre Monteux took years to bring the same orchestra to the technical standards he required and to gain recognition for his real and admirable qualities as an interpreter. Mr. Koussevitzky, as unreckonable a musician as we know in the orchestral field, but certainly a conductor of exceptional qualities, has also the appeal of personality which assures big audiences. Mr. Stokowski's brilliancy as a musician is only one of his claims to popularity, for he knows very well the value of the personal impression and makes the most of this asset. There will always be the public appetite, particularly in this country, for the man behind the musician and the individuality which projects itself personally as well as artistically over the footlights. This factor must be taken into consideration by every orchestral management. But that is not inconsistent with the curtailing of the wholesale trading in the reputations of guest conductors and the use by symphony orchestras of fewer conductors engaged for substantial terms and entrusted with entire responsibility for the standards of their orchestras.

It is not necessary to emphasize the effect of constantly changing leadership upon the technical quality of orchestral performances. Each conductor has his technical methods and his particular qualities. Some conductors impress themselves upon an orchestra more quickly than others, but no conductors immediately obtain their wishes and no orchestra goes from the hands of one conductor into the hands of another and remains the same in its characteristics. Even Mr. Toscanini, a man of extraordinary quickness of mind, musical knowledge and dominating qualities, took a number of concerts to make the excellent Philharmonic Orchestra completely responsive to his wishes. Before him the orchestra reflected the patient and admirable drilling of Mr. Mengelberg. After being a Mengelberg and Toscanini orchestra the Philharmonic has become a Furtwaengler orchestra. Next Fall it will be a Mengelberg orchestra again, and in the long run this is not for the best.

It is good neither for the quality of the performances nor the public attitude toward them—and there is another point: the necessary education to American needs of European conductors. The European musician who visits America for the first time or even for some months in successive years is not in a position to become thoroughly aware of and sensitive to the needs and reactions of his audiences. This is particularly true as regards repertory. The American public is desirous of the broadest and best balanced repertory of any country in the world. It wants to be acquainted with what all schools of music are producing, regardless of nationality. It has no predispositions. It has learned to love the indispensable classic masterpieces which must be the basis and body of every orchestra's repertory, but it is also and unfailingly curious as to what living men of all nationalities are doing. The European conductor who has spent most of his life and activities in his own and neighboring communities usually takes some seasons to become aware of this. Sometimes he never becomes aware of it, or awakens to the fact that provincialisms accepted in his own land will not forever be tolerated here. But when a conductor visits us for two or three months or less, receiving a handsome contract and a dazzling preliminary burst of publicity which may deceive him as to his permanent standing, he can hardly be expected to gain a just perspective of his environment. There cannot be complete understanding between him and his audiences. He is partly in the dark and likely to remain so. The public and the conductor fail to find in each other what they might if there were longer and closer contacts.

These are some of the defects of the guest-conductor system. It is probable that the near future will see no immediate remedy. Those who direct the destinies of the orchestras that now dominate the field in this city might remark that in their actions they are confronted by conditions, not theories, and that the nearest ways to meet these conditions involve the engagement of famous and highly expensive guest conductors. But are these conditions as imperative as believed? Is it impossible for New York to follow the example of other cities, whose orchestras in the long average of their performances surpass ours, and who have found substantial support from a public appealed to on a less sensational basis?

Musical Happenings Afield

A SCHOOL of music, featuring forty-seven courses specially planned for public school teachers, will be conducted in the Summer session of Columbia University, directed by John J. Coss. The total number of Summer courses in music will exceed seventy, the largest in the history of the university. Development of descant singing, now said to be spreading rapidly in England, will be undertaken with the aim of stimulating its general use in the United States as an aid to religion.

A big Summer session chorus will be organized, and for six weeks, beginning July 6, choral music will be stressed under the direction of Professor Walter Henry Hall, who recently returned from England, where he has been studying developments in English choral practice.

A music festival consisting of five concerts will be held. The choral music for the festival will be prepared by the Summer session chorus, which will meet on Tuesdays and Thursdays at 8 P. M. in the McMillin Academic Theatre, 116th Street and Broadway.

Community singing will be fostered throughout the Summer session. On every Monday evening, from 7:30 to 8:30, beginning July 5, there will be an informal musical gathering in the auditorium of Horace Mann School, 120th Street and Broadway, under the direction of Peter W. Dykema, Professor of Musical Education at Columbia, and Edgar B. Gordon, Professor of Music in the University of Wisconsin.

The first festival concert will be given in the university gymnasium at 8:15 P. M. on July 21, when a symphony orchestra will be heard, with Professor John Erskine at the piano. The program of this concert follows:

"Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Symphony No. 6, Tchaikovsky; concerto for piano and orchestra, Mozart; overture to "Flying Dutchman," Wagner.

The second concert will be held in St. Paul's Chapel on the evening of Aug. 3. It will be a recital of church music, Tudor and modern; hymns will be sung with descant by fifty selected voices.

A choral concert, with symphony orchestra and soloists, will be given in the university gymnasium Aug. 5. Part I of this concert will be the Baal scene from "Elijah," Mendelssohn. Part II will embrace Alma Mater, Stanford and Songs of the Fleet.

Vocal and instrumental concerts will be given in the McMillin Academic Theatre. Thirty students will be chosen for a Summer chapel choir. Chapel services will be held daily at 8 A. M. and on Sundays at 4 P. M. Addresses will be delivered by distinguished teachers from many colleges and universities.

Vladimir Shavitch, conductor of the Syracuse Symphony, sails March 31 on the Berengaria to fulfill his engagement with the London Symphony Orchestra and the Pasdeloup Orchestra of Paris. Among the guest conductors who have already led the London organization this season were Weingartner, Bruno Walter and Albert Coates, the remaining concerts to be conducted by Shavitch and Sir Edward Elgar.

The Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra closed its season with the first Rochester performance of Eugene Goossens's "Eternal Rhythm."

The Rochester Opera Company will present its third week of intimate opera in English, Easter week. It has already given performances this season of "Martha" and "Madama Butterfly." The Easter Festival will present "The Marriage of Figaro," "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci." The productions are under the direction of Vladimir Rosing. Eugene Goossens and Emmanuel Balaban will conduct.

The Oregonian calls the present season of the Portland Symphony Orchestra under the direction of William van Hoogstraten "the most phénomenal in the history of that organization. Great progress has been made by the orchestra in the five months of Mr. van Hoogstraten's tenure of office." At its concert, March 8, Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan" was given for the first time in Portland, and the pianist, Ignaz Friedman, made his Portland début.

"Elijah" will be given at the Halifax, N. S., Festival, which is scheduled for April 12, 13 and 14. Frederic Baer will sing the title rôle, while Lewis James and Grace Leslie will be the tenor and contralto soloists. "The Creation" and "The Messiah" will be given at the Pittsburgh, Kansas, Festival, April 27, 29 and 30. Richard Crooks will be the tenor soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK EVE. POST

2 8 1926

Music: Olga Samaroff's Daily Column— Ida Deck's Piano Recital

IDA DECK, an interesting young pupil of Josef Lhevinne, gave a piano recital at Steinway Hall last night with the following program: Organ Concerto in D minor, Wilhelm Friedemann Bach-Stradal; Rondo in G major, Beethoven; Variations on the name ABEGG, Schumann; Impromptu in F sharp major and Andante Spianato and Polonaise, Chopin; Liebesleid, Kreisler-Rachmaninoff; Silhouette, Daniel Gregory Mason; Etude, Stravinsky; Au bord d'une Source, Liszt; Rhapsody in C major, Dohnanyi.

Olga Samaroff

Miss Deck, who studied with Mr. Lhevinne privately for two years, won a scholarship for a final year [illegible] the Juilliard Foundation and made her debut last season at Aeolian Hall. She does great credit to her master, and she showed many good natural qualities as well as developed musicianship and pianism. Her program did not contain any big work of a nature to make important demands upon her powers as an interpreter.

Perhaps this accounts in a measure for the fact that I did not get an impression of a powerful or outstanding artistic personality. I did get the impression of a musical, talented and excellently taught young player. Her technique is clean, sure and at times brilliant.

Her tone has variety and good quality. At times last night her fortissimo was somewhat overpowering, but I think that was largely due to the size of the hall, and her lack of experience in public playing. It takes a seasoned artist to adjust the sonority of a concert grand to an intimate auditorium.

Miss Deck's best playing, in my opinion, was done in the Bach-Stradal Concerto and the Schumann Variations. As they were the most important works on the program this fact is significant. Miss Deck seems well on the way to a full development of her powers and while I am conservative in the matter of predictions I feel sure that those who warmly applauded her last night will watch her future with real interest.

IN CARRYING on the discussion of the three questions addressed to my readers in the EVENING POST in these columns, I am purposely quoting letters which disagree with my own expressed convictions concerning musical criticism. A publication of laudatory letters agreeing with me in principle would not only constitute a column of self-glorification which is far from my desire and intention, but would eliminate discussion. I quote a letter from a gentleman who wishes his name withheld. He writes after disagreeing with me about having silence replace the old-fashioned "roast":

"Should not a critic have in mind an 'ideal interpretation' of each selection of the standard repertoire based upon years of intelligent listening and thought and record largely the divergencies of the performance under review from this ideal? By this method the status of music in this country can, I believe, be greatly improved."

Undoubtedly a critic can within certain limits often record impressions of performances from such a point of view, and he can give many reactions and opinions produced more or less in this manner. But I quote from a book entitled, "A Musical Motley," by that experienced critic and brilliant writer, Ernest Newman: "A pianist is not expected to know anything but a few pianoforte pieces, or a singer more than a few songs.

"But a critic is expected to know all the songs, piano music, violin music, organ music, cello music, orchestral music, operas and oratorios ever written. Even under the present charitable system of telling him the composer's name he makes a bad blunder now and then. A very good English critic once heard Cesar Franck's violin and piano sonata at a concert and wrote excellently about it. A week later he heard Franck's cello and piano sonata and wrote equally excellently about that, though he appraised it quite differently from the violin sonata. There would have been no harm in that but for the fact that the two sonatas are one, the violin part being simply transposed for the cello compass. My friend did not know this and 'gave himself away' shockingly to people who did."

And yet if my correspondent's idea held good, the supposed "ideal interpretation" of this writer just because he was a critic would have been taken to represent (for the improvement of the status of music) one that was superior to the interpretation of artists who devote a lifetime to the intensive study of the particular branch of music in which they are active. The public has no way of knowing whether a critic has a profound knowledge of a particular work or not. He can easily write a "judgment" as though he had, without giving any real proofs.

IN MY opinion it is an absolute impossibility for any one human being to know and have an "ideal interpretation" of every work of music a critic is supposed to review. This fact could scarcely be denied by any one who has the least conception of what a real interpretation of a piece of music—the kind that makes even a decent public performance possible—actually means.

The higher the general caliber of the performer is the more absurd does an assumption of superior value in the supposed interpretation of the critic become. For this reason it seems to me whether the critic writes in the infallible third person and states his opinions as facts or not, an intelligent public should regard his writing as the expression of opinion, which can have a real and not a fictitious value if it is put on a basis free from such an empty pretense.

How easily mistakes can occur even when a critic does know the work in hand I learned this winter through personal experience, when after a Boston Symphony concert at which the "Poeme Divin" of Scriabine was played, through the bungling of a secretary a whole phrase comparing the "Poeme Divin" with the "Poeme de l'Extase" was omitted, making my article read as though the "Poeme de l'Extase" had been played. Fortunately for me there was no change in the program to put upon the critic the burden of recognizing the work.

I suppose, therefore, if my readers noticed the matter at all, they gave me the benefit of the doubt of having enough intelligence to look at the printed list and that some mistake in copy could account for the occurrence. But if I had on that occasion been impelled to "roast" either the work or the performance I should have been greatly distressed to have my printed dictum accepted as a final verdict. Too many such things have occurred in musical criticism for infallibility to be taken as a basis of the whole institution.

IT SEEMS to me a critic's function is the important one of reaction and impression. A composer creates the work, an interpreter performs it and a critic should represent the most intelligent type of listener who receives the message. It does not seem to me necessary for him to be armed with an "ideal interpretation" of every work by which the performer stands or falls.

The performer can scarcely be expected to interpret on the basis of the critic's ideas, especially as he only learns about them the day after his performance. Nor does it seem to me logical that the public should on principle accept a critic's interpretation put into words as necessarily better or more authoritative than that of the artist who puts his into music. Having tried both, I affirm most positively that it is vastly easier to put an "ideal interpretation" into words than it is to realize one in music.

I suppose one reason why the public, as a rule, is so willing to accept the critic's word interpretation as better is because words are easily understood and music is not. A critic's real and vital function of reaction and his resulting opinions are, of course, enormously influenced by the amount of his knowledge and experience, but I think it is a very shallow and unreal thing to imagine him equipped with an "ideal interpretation" of every work in every department of music.

It is one of those superficial ideas we might well begin to outgrow and which I believe the most thoughtful among music lovers do not accept.

OLGA SAMAROFF.

Copyright, 1926, by N. Y. Evening Post, Inc.

198

N Y Times Mar 28

BEGINNING OF THE

The System of Guest Conducting— Its Advantages and Consequences

By OLIN DOWNES.

DURING the season nearing its end seven different conductors have appeared with New York's two permanent symphony orchestras. The Philharmonic Society provided Messrs. Mengelberg, Hadley, Toscanini and Furtwaengler. The Symphony Society presented Messrs. Damrosch, Goossens and Klemperer. The State Symphony engaged two conductors—Ernst von Dohnanyi and Alfredo Casella. Mr. Casella did not function as its leader, for the orchestra was forced to disband midway in its season, but Mr. Dohnanyi was enabled to fulfill his engagement. Eight conductors, then, appeared with the local orchestral organizations. The Philharmonic and the Symphony Societies by themselves furnished more conductors than all the major orchestras of Philadelphia, Boston, Cleveland, Cincinnati which visited the city.

The policies of the visiting orchestras in the matter of conductors are directly opposite to those pursued by the resident bodies. The visiting orchestras have conductors engaged for at least an entire season and usually longer. Mr. Stokowski has conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra for thirteen years. Mr. Koussevitzky is in his second year as conductor of the Boston Symphony. Mr. Sokoloff has been conductor of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra since it was founded. Mr. Reiner is leading the Cincinnati Orchestra for his fourth season. The Chicago Symphony Orchestra has not been heard for some years in this city, which is regrettable, for it is an admirable body, one of the very best in the country. Mr. Stock has conducted this orchestra since the death of its founder, Theodore Thomas, which was in 1905. It is in New York that the system of guest conductors has been most popular and pursued with the greatest persistency and rivalry, with the result of much public excitement, the appearances of many celebrated musicians, many brilliant performances and other results of a less valuable kind. For the system of guest conducting has on artistic grounds its unfortunate side.

It is probably impossible for an orchestra to attain the highest standards when it is put in the hands of two or three different conductors in the course of a single season. If these guest conductors appeared for a pair of concerts at long intervals they would not interfere with the orchestra's routine or with the intimate understanding which only time can establish between a leader and his men. Particularly would this be the case if the whilom policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were pursued, when, on very exceptional occasions, great composers were invited to direct performances of their own compositions. Instances such as the visit of Vincent d'Indy, especially engaged by the Boston Symphony for a small number of concerts of his own music, and the appearance of Richard Strauss as conductor of his own works at a concert given for the Pension Fund come to mind. There was then, of course, keen public interest in the appearances of distinguished composers; but the emphasis was upon the music rather than the man and his idiosyncrasies of dress or manner. The composers appeared under the most impressive circumstances —as Mr. Stravinsky, who is no conductor, appeared last season with the Philharmonic Society—and they made legitimate propaganda for their works.

sic prou
and Euro
productio

he occasional visitor did not rep- deviation from the accustomed ing and the consistently high quality of the work of the orchestra. The principle of a single conductor made individually responsible for the character of the concerts held, and certainly the instances of the Boston and Philadelphia Orchestras testify to its merits.

hestral policies are affected by many and complicated circumstances. There has been keen and growing rivalry between the resident organizations. There is a public, restless and spoiled by sensational advertising and an oversupply of famous artists from abroad. Evidently it has been felt necessary, in view of the enormous expenses and the resultant financial deficits of every orchestral season, to attract the public to the box office by whatever means proved most efficacious. The means today are those of employing celebrated conductors. This is at least a marked improvement over the old conditions when it was necessary to engage famous soloists, singers as well as instrumentalists, whose performances usually constituted interruptions and distractions that should not have appertained to concerts of a symphonic nature. Nevertheless, the emphasis of the engagement of a conductor instead of emphasis upon good programs and worth-while music is a continuation of a principle destructive to the development of genuine appreciation and taste.

In the season past, all of the conductors who have appeared with New York orchestras have been men of reputation but by no means of equal abilities. At one end of the scale appeared a European conductor of little more than fluent and routine qualities. At the other end was Arturo Toscanini, whose performances on the whole surpassed any others in their finish, their beauty, and their qualities of genius. But let us take the case of Mr. Toscanini, who probably has no peer today among conductors, from the point of view of his effect upon Philharmonic audiences. He comes here loudly and justly heralded. He gives a series of fourteen or fifteen remarkable concerts. There is intense enthusiasm of public and press. The concerts are oversold and hundreds turned from the doors. Then Mr. Toscanini departs. His successor has been here before, and has given great performances in this city. It is not necessary here to discuss the relative merits of Mr. Toscanini and Mr. Furtwaengler, except to say that after a sensational success in his first season Mr. Furtwaengler returns, as the repetition of a familiar tale, and there is a lapse of wide public interest in his appearances, not caused by the essential differences between the two conductors. (Mr. Mengelberg has had the same fate.) If Mr. Furtwaengler had come here for the first instead of the second time, or after an interval of years since his last visit, he would have received a greater share of public curiosity, attention and acclaim than he did this season. It is questionable, if Mr. Toscanini were the greatest conductor who had ever lived, whether a public sated and spoiled with sensations would continue to regard him as it now does if he appeared with regularity season after season. We would that he might do that. We can imagine no better fortune for the public of orchestral concerts in this city. But the public appreciation of music is not developed as soundly by the lure of a great artistic personality as it would be if the same public could be made to think more of music instead of interpreters.

Mr. Stokowski is wise. He steadily refuses to give more than ten concerts a season in New York City.

In advocating an end of the guest-conductor system it must be admitted that a great deal hinges on the quality of the conductor engaged for a long term. Henri Rabaud, who succeeded Karl Muck, might have conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for decades and never have interested the public. Pierre Monteux took years to bring the same orchestra to the technical standards he required and to gain recognition for his real and admirable qualities as an interpreter. Mr. Koussevitzky, as unreckonable a musician as we know in the orchestral field, but certainly a conductor of exceptional qualities, has also the appeal of personality which assures big audiences. Mr. Stokowski's brilliancy as a musician is only one of his claims to popularity, for he knows very well the value of the personal impression and makes the most of this asset. There will always be the public appetite, particularly in this country, for the man behind the musician and the individuality which projects itself personally as well as artistically over the footlights. This factor must be taken into consideration by every orchestral management. But that is not inconsistent with the curtailing of the wholesale trading in the reputations of guest conductors and the use by symphony orchestras of fewer conductors engaged for substantial terms and entrusted with entire responsibility for the standards of their orchestras.

It is not necessary to emphasize the effect of constantly changing leadership upon the technical quality of orchestral performances. Each conductor has his technical methods and his particular qualities. Some conductors impress themselves upon an orchestra more quickly than others, but no conductors immediately obtain their wishes and no orchestra goes from the hands of one conductor into the hands of another and remains the same in its characteristics. Even Mr. Toscanini, a man of extraordinary quickness of mind, musical knowledge and dominating qualities, took a number of concerts to make the excellent Philharmonic Orchestra completely responsive to his wishes. Before him the orchestra reflected the patient and admirable drilling of Mr. Mengelberg. After being a Mengelberg and Toscanini orchestra the Philharmonic has become a Furtwaengler orchestra. Next Fall it will be a Mengelberg orchestra again, and in the long run this is not for the best.

It is good neither for the quality of the performances nor the public attitude toward them—and there is another point: the necessary education to American needs of European conductors. The European musician who visits America for the first time or even for some months in successive years is not in a position to become thoroughly aware of and sensitive to the needs and reactions of his audiences. This is particularly true as regards repertory. The American public is desirous of the broadest and best balanced repertory of any country in the world. It wants to be acquainted with what all schools of music are producing, regardless of nationality. It has no predispositions. It has learned to love the indispensable classic masterpieces which must be the basis and body of every orchestra's repertory, but it is also and unfailingly curious as to what living men of all nationalities are doing. The European conductor who has spent most of his life and activities in his own and neighboring communities usually takes some seasons to become aware of this. Sometimes he never becomes aware of it, or awakens to the fact that provincialisms accepted in his own land will not forever be tolerated here. But when a conductor visits us for two or three months or less, receiving a handsome contract and a dazzling preliminary burst of publicity which may deceive him as to his permanent standing, he can hardly be expected to gain a just perspective of his environment. There cannot be complete understanding between him and his audiences. He is partly in the dark and likely to remain so. The public and the conductor fail to find in each other what they might if there were longer and closer contacts.

These are some of the defects of the guest-conductor system. It is probable that the near future will see no immediate remedy. Those who direct the destinies of the orchestras that now dominate the field in this city might remark that in their actions they are confronted by conditions, not theories, and that the nearest ways to meet these conditions involve the engagement of famous and highly expensive guest conductors. But are these conditions as imperative as believed? Is it impossible for New York to follow the example of other cities, whose orchestras in the long average of their performances surpass ours, and who have found substantial support from a public appealed to on a less sensational basis?

Musical Happenings Afield

A SCHOOL of music, featuring forty-seven courses specially planned for public school teachers, will be conducted in the Summer session of Columbia University, directed by John J. Coss. The total number of Summer courses in music will exceed seventy, the largest in the history of the university. Development of descant singing, now said to be spreading rapidly in England, will be undertaken with the aim of stimulating its general use in the United States as an aid to religion.

A big Summer session chorus will be organized, and for six weeks, beginning July 6, choral music will be stressed under the direction of Professor Walter Henry Hall, who recently returned from England, where he has been studying developments in English choral practice.

A music festival consisting of five concerts will be held. The choral music for the festival will be prepared by the Summer session chorus, which will meet on Tuesdays and Thursdays at 8 P. M. in the McMillin Academic Theatre, 116th Street and Broadway.

Community singing will be fostered throughout the Summer session. On every Monday evening, from 7:30 to 8:30, beginning July 5, there will be an informal musical gathering in the auditorium of Horace Mann School, 120th Street and Broadway, under the direction of Peter W. Dykema, Professor of Musical Education at Columbia, and Edgar B. Gordon, Professor of Music in the University of Wisconsin.

The first festival concert will be given in the university gymnasium at 8:15 P. M. on July 21, when a symphony orchestra will be heard, with Professor John Erskine at the piano. The program of this concert follows:

"Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Symphony No. 6, Tchaikovsky; concerto for piano and orchestra, Mozart; overture to "Flying Dutchman," Wagner.

The second concert will be held in St. Paul's Chapel on the evening of Aug. 3. It will be a recital of church music, Tudor and modern; hymns will be sung with descant by fifty selected voices.

A choral concert, with symphony orchestra and soloists, will be given in the university gymnasium Aug. 5. Part I of this concert will be the Baal scene from "Elijah," Mendelssohn. Part II will embrace Alma Mater, Stanford and Songs of the Fleet.

Vocal and instrumental concerts will be given in the McMillin Academic Theatre. Thirty students will be chosen for a Summer chapel choir. Chapel services will be held daily at 8 A. M. and on Sundays at 4 P. M. Addresses will be delivered by distinguished teachers from many colleges and universities.

Vladimir Shavitch, conductor of the Syracuse Symphony, sails March 31 on the Berengaria to fulfill his engagement with the London Symphony Orchestra and the Pasdeloup Orchestra of Paris. Among the guest conductors who have already led the London organization this season were Weingartner, Bruno Walter and Albert Coates, the remaining concerts to be conducted by Shavitch and Sir Edward Elgar.

The Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra closed its season with the first Rochester performance of Eugene Goossens's "Eternal Rhythm."

The Rochester Opera Company will present its third week of intimate opera in English, Easter week. It has already given performances this season of "Martha" and "Madama Butterfly." The Easter Festival will present "The Marriage of Figaro," "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci." The productions are under the direction of Vladimir Rosing. Eugene Goossens and Emmanuel Balaban will conduct.

The Oregonian calls the present season of the Portland Symphony Orchestra under the direction of William van Hoogstraten "the most phenomenal in the history of that organization. Great progress has been made by the orchestra in the five months of Mr. van Hoogstraten's tenure of office." At its concert, March 8, Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan" was given for the first time in Portland, and the pianist, Ignaz Friedman, made his Portland début.

"Elijah" will be given at the Halifax, N. S., Festival, which is scheduled for April 12, 13 and 14. Frederic Baer will sing the title rôle, while Lewis James and Grace Leslie will be the tenor and contralto soloists. "The Creation" and "The Messiah" will be given at the Pittsburgh, Kansas, Festival, April 27, 29 and 30. Richard Crooks will be the tenor soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK EVE. POST

Music : Olga Samaroff's Daily Column— Ida Deck's Piano Recital

IDA DECK, an interesting young pupil of Josef Lhevinne, gave a piano recital at Steinway Hall last night with the following program: Organ Concerto in D minor, Wilhelm Friedemann Bach-Stradal; Rondo in G major, Beethoven; Variations on the name A B E G G, Schumann; Impromptu in F sharp major and Andante Spianato and Polonaise, Chopin; Liebesleid, Kreisler-Rachmaninoff; Silhouette, Daniel Gregory Mason; Etude, Stravinsky; Au bord d'une Source, Liszt; Rhapsody in C major, Dohnanyi.

Olga Samaroff

Miss Deck, who studied with Mr. Lhevinne privately for two years, won a scholarship for a final year at the Juilliard Foundation and made her debut last season at Aeolian Hall. She does great credit to her master, and she showed many good natural qualities as well as developed musicianship and pianism. Her program did not contain any big work of a nature to make important demands upon her powers as an interpreter.

Perhaps this accounts in a measure for the fact that I did not get an impression of a powerful or outstanding artistic personality. I did get the impression of a musical, talented and excellently taught young player. Her technique is clean, sure and at times brilliant.

Her tone has variety and good quality. At times last night her fortissimo was somewhat overpowering, but I think that was largely due to the size of the hall, and her lack of experience in public playing. It takes a seasoned artist to adjust the sonority of a concert grand to an intimate auditorium.

Miss Deck's best playing, in my opinion, was done in the Bach-Stradal Concerto and the Schumann Variations. As they were the most important works on the program this fact is significant. Miss Deck seems well on the way to a full development of her powers and while I am conservative in the matter of predictions I feel sure that those who warmly applauded her last night will watch her future with real interest.

IN CARRYING on the discussion of the three questions addressed to my readers in the EVENING POST in these columns, I am purposely quoting letters which disagree with my own expressed convictions concerning musical criticism. A publication of laudatory letters agreeing with me in principle would not only constitute a column of self-glorification which is far from my desire and intention, but would eliminate discussion. I quote a letter from a gentleman who wishes his name withheld. He writes after disagreeing with me about having silence replace the old-fashioned "roast":

"Should not a critic have in mind an 'ideal interpretation' of each selection of the standard repertoire based upon years of intelligent listening and thought and record largely the divergencies of the performance under review from this ideal? By this method the status of music in this country can, I believe, be greatly improved."

Undoubtedly a critic can within certain limits often record impressions of performances from such a point of view, and he can give many reactions and opinions produced more or less in this manner. But I quote from a book entitled, "A Musical Motley," by that experienced critic and brilliant writer, Ernest Newman: "A pianist is not expected to know anything but a few pianoforte pieces, or a singer more than a few songs.

"But a critic is expected to know all the songs, piano music, violin music, organ music, cello music, orchestral music, operas and oratorios ever written. Even under the present charitable system of telling him the composer's name he makes a bad blunder now and then. A very good English critic once heard Cesar Franck's violin and piano sonata at a concert and wrote excellently about it. A week later he heard Franck's cello and piano sonata and wrote equally excellently about that, though he appraised it quite differently from the violin sonata. There would have been no harm in th[illegible] but for the f[illegible] that the two sonatas are one, the violin part being simply transposed for the cello compass. My friend did not know this and 'gave himself away' shockingly to people who did."

And yet if my correspondent's idea held good, the supposed "ideal interpretation" of this writer just because he was a critic would have been taken to represent (for the improvement of the status of music) one that was superior to the interpretation of artists who devote a lifetime to the intensive study of the particular branch of music in which they are active. The public has no way of knowing whether a critic has a profound knowledge of a particular work or not. He can easily write a "judgment" as though he had, without giving any real proofs.

IN MY opinion it is an absolute impossibility for any one human being to know and have an "ideal interpretation" of every work of music a critic is supposed to review. This fact could scarcely be denied by any one who has the least conception of what a real interpretation of a piece of music—the kind that makes even a decent public performance possible—actually means.

The higher the general caliber of the performer is the more absurd does an assumption of superior value in the supposed interpretation of the critic become. For this reason it seems to me whether the critic writes in the infallible third person and states his opinions as facts or not, an intelligent public should regard his writing as the expression of opinion which can have a real and not a fictitious value if it is put on a basis free from such an empty pretense.

How easily mistakes can occur even when a critic does know the work in hand I learned this winter through personal experience, when after a Boston Symphony concert at which the "Poeme Divin" of Scriabine was played, through the bungling of a secretary a whole phrase comparing the "Poeme Divin" with the "Poeme de l'Extase" was omitted, making my article read as though the "Poeme de l'Extase" had been played. Fortunately for me there was no change in the program to put upon the critic the burden of recognizing the work.

I suppose, therefore, if my readers noticed the matter at all, they gave me the benefit of the doubt of having enough intelligence to look at the printed list and that some mistake in copy could account for the occurrence. But if I had on that occasion been impelled to "roast" either the work or the performance I should have been greatly distressed to have my printed dictum accepted as a final verdict. Too many such things have occurred in musical criticism for infallibility to be taken as a basis of the whole institution.

IT SEEMS to me a critic's function is the important one of reaction and impression. A composer creates the work, an interpreter performs it and a critic should represent the most intelligent type of listener who receives the message. It does not seem to me necessary for him to be armed with an "ideal interpretation" of every work by which the performer stands or falls.

The performer can scarcely be expected to interpret on the basis of the critic's ideas, especially as he only learns about them the day after his performance. Nor does it seem to me logical that the public should on principle accept a critic's interpretation put into words as necessarily better or more authoritative than that of the artist who puts his into music. Having tried both, I affirm most positively that it is vastly easier to put an "ideal interpretation" into words than it is to realize one in music.

I suppose one reason why the public as a rule, is so willing to accept the critic's word interpretation as better is because words are easily understood and music is not. A critic's real and vital function of reaction and his resulting opinions are, of course, enormously influenced by the amount of his knowledge and experience, but I think it is a very shallow and unreal thing to imagine him equipped with an "ideal interpretation" of every work in every department of music.

It is one of those superficial ideas we might well begin to outgrow and which I believe the most thoughtful among music lovers do not accept.

OLGA SAMAROFF.

Copyright, 1926, by N. Y. Evening Post, Inc.

N

Bost
Orc
Not

Henr
Co

The Symph York C
by Hen of unus
while h tion of today and ind tempora
He was
He was fir
Edward MacD
tions, which aimed Americ drawn this land for
But Mr. quoted to expres
and transf dies which parcel of thing of vision tha in his pe a figure in his a phony orc edy Overt 1911, whic nized by and others work.

In the music "stir dience. All voice, a voi
and an orl
The overtu
—and in th
ments from bert's art—bumptiously American."

Fol

Mr. Parke music of Am meets every haps, that coloring, that voice and th
item—of its ests and stirs work of Gilb
such orchestra
"Negro Rhapso
the Norfolk Fe
1913; by "Th Congo," played phony and perf
politan Opera c
1918; by the Synge's "Rider
on Celtic melo with singular
the folk drama;

THIS C
PUBLI
PHILAD

A REAL LOSS recorded wit
Kneisel. Year a Philadelphia the his name and up able standard in chamber music.
the flamboyant v
ture the gallery
and technical cum as soloist with o
He was concert
Symphony for ei sons. But he ensemble, and in effectually reveal scholar of sincer
revered the class
mind was open fresh impression make a place on ing composers o
had cold comf pupils were not ture display of tion of parental example of uns ards was neede artists are ten material gains
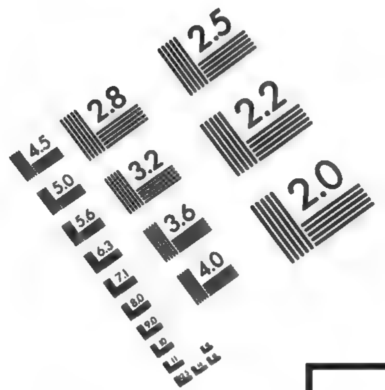
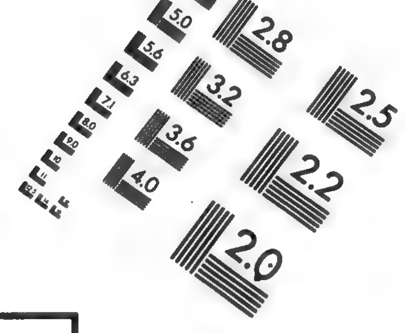
that shall avoi
crest of Parna

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

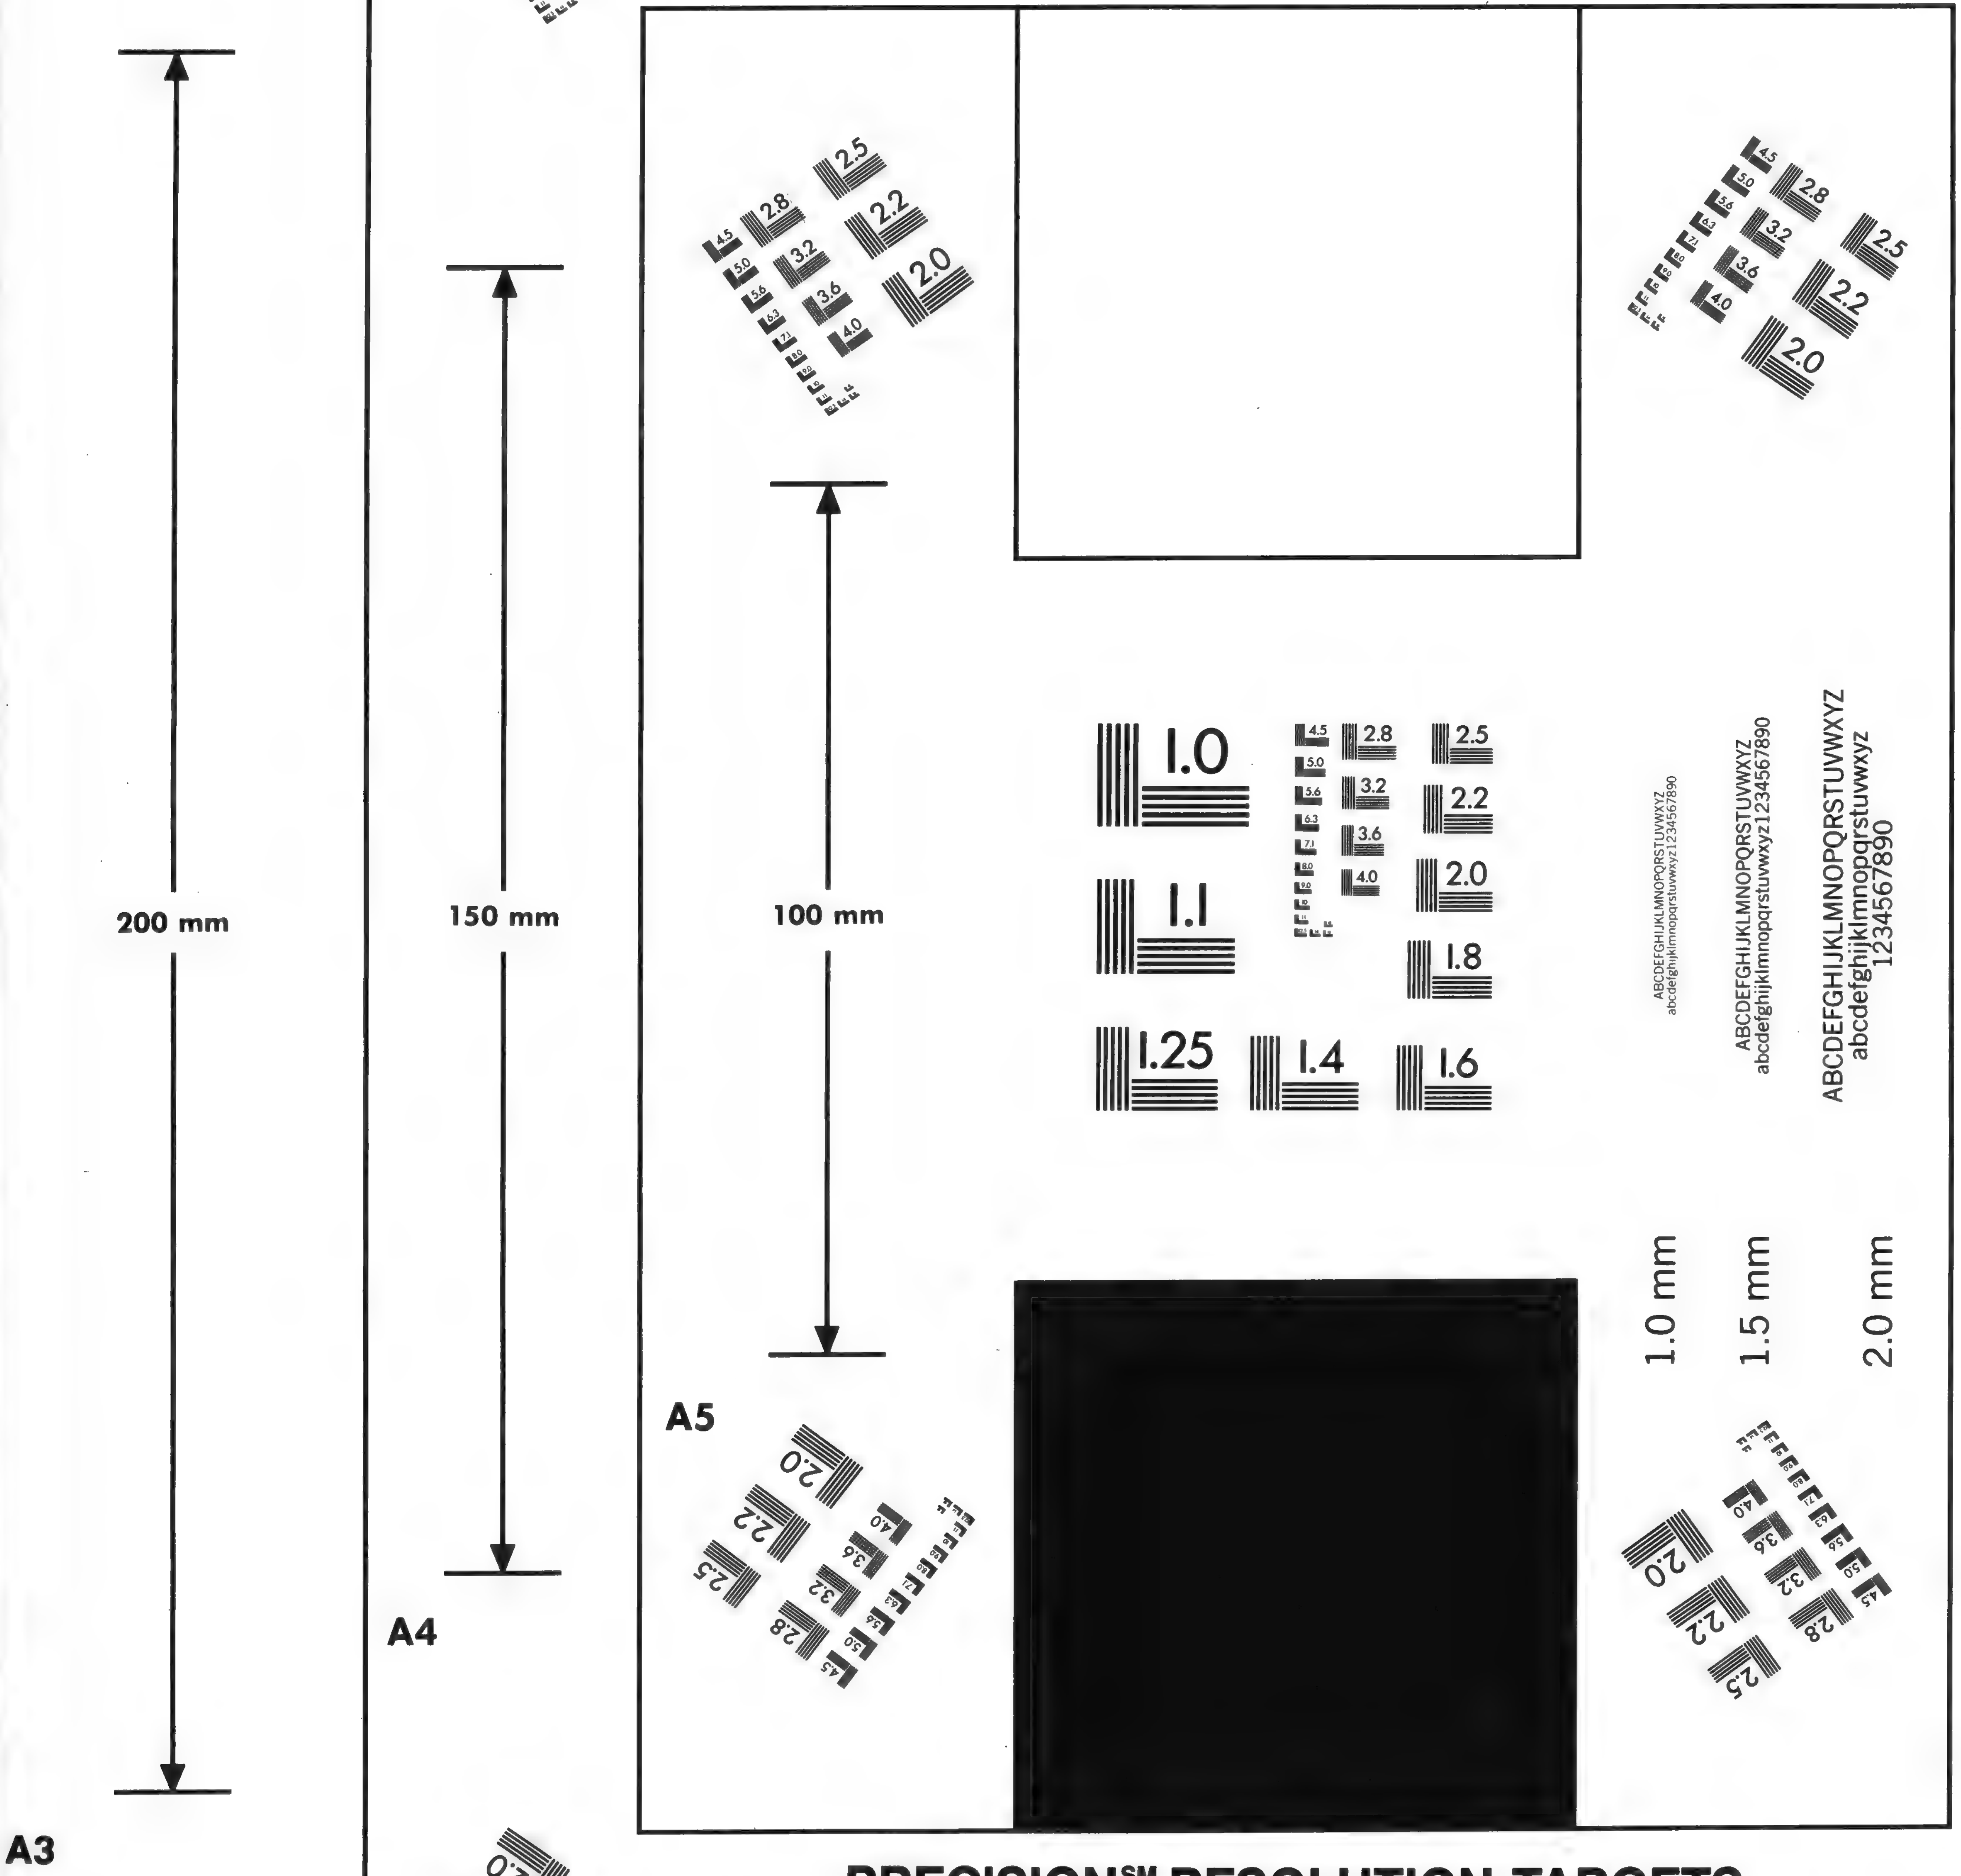
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



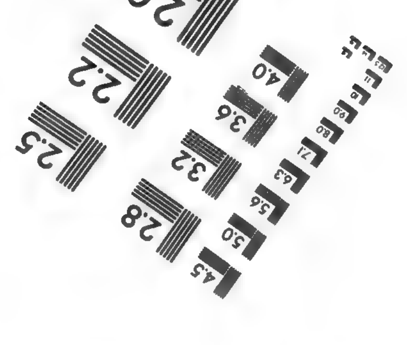
2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
3.2
2.0
5.0
3.6
4.0



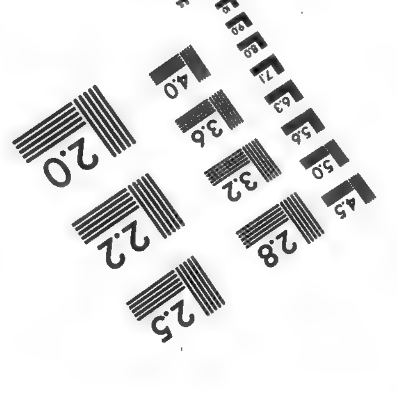
4.5
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3



2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5



2.0
4.0
3.6
2.2
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5
2.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

199

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS-TRIBUNE
DULUTH, MINN.

MAR 2 8 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Notable Group

Henry Gilbert's New Composition Well Received.

The performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra recently in New York of a new "Symphonic Piece" by Henry F. Gilbert, was an occasion of unusual interest, since Mr. Gilbert while he has done little in the direction of cultivating publicity, stands today as one of the most original and independent figures among contemporaneous American composers. He was born in Somerville, Mass. He was the first American pupil of Edward MacDowell. His compositions, which in most cases have aimed to affirm various phases of American life and spirit, have often drawn upon folk music current in this land for their thematic material. But Mr. Gilbert has not merely quoted folk themes; he has striven to express, through developments and transformations of certain melodies which have become part and parcel of national musical life, something of the energy and romantic vision that he believes to be latent in his people. He first emerged as a figure of significant individuality in his art when the Boston Symphony orchestra produced his "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes" in 1911, which was immediately recognized by Philip Hale, H. T. Parker and others as a new and important work.

In the words of Mr. Hale, the music "stirred the blood of the audience. All rejoiced in hearing a new voice, a voice with something to say and an original way of saying it. The overture," Mr. Hale concluded —and in this anticipated later comments from many quarters upon Gilbert's art—"is distinctively, but not bumptiously, not apologetically, American."

Folk Drama Spirit.

Mr. Parker found "here at last music of American folk tunes that meets every musical test, except, perhaps, that of adroit instrumental coloring, that keeps the matter, the voice and the spirit—the difficult item—of its origin; and that interests and stirs those who hear." This work of Gilbert's was followed by such orchestral compositions as his "Negro Rhapsody," first produced at the Norfolk Festival, Connecticut, in 1913; by "The Dance on Place Congo," played by the Boston Symphony and performed by the Metropolitan Opera company as a ballet in 1918; by the orchestral prelude to Synge's "Riders to the Sea," based on Celtic melody and embodying with singular fidelity the spirit of the folk drama; the "Indian Suite," and other smaller works. The "Symphonic Piece" had its first performance in Boston Feb. 26 and 27 under Mr. Koussevitzky. The composer describes his musical intentions as follows:

"This piece of music has no 'program' in the sense in which that word is ordinarily used. It is not about any thing, or event, in particular; not suggested or inspired by any poem, or prose writing; just a piece of music, that's all. In fact, it aims to be a piece of absolute music; somewhat of a rarity in these days of the overworked 'program' idea—ornithological, botanical, or what not.

"Many of my friends have pressed me to tell them what it's all about—what I have tried to represent, etc. I can only say this: My constant aim ever since beginning composition has been to write some American music, i. e., some music which would not naturally have been written in any other country and which should reflect or express certain aspects of the American character or spirit as felt by myself. That spirit, as I see it, is energetic, optimistic, nervous, impatient of restraint and in its highest aspect a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit which is America is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration. Plenty of jingoism, vulgarity and 'Hurrah, boys!' attaches to it, but the spirit of the new birth underlies it all for him who can see it.

American Mood Reflected.

"Some of this American mood I have tried to reflect in my composition. So the first theme has in it (I hope) some of the 'Hurrah, boys!' character. The second theme, by contrast, has a slight Fosterian twang. It contains a remote suggestion of 'Old Folks at Home'—kind of a family resemblance—interspersed with a couple of measures from 'The Arkansaw Traveler.' Those bits are made use of and developed in the usual symphonic manner. But let it be said that, although I am a great believer in the songs of the people as possible bases for national art compositions, these two suggestions (neither used verbatim) are the only folk suggestions I have used in this composition.

"The score of this piece was finished in November, 1925. It was originally intended to be the first movement of a symphony, but certain friends of mine requested and advised that it be played as it stands. This is therefore done."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

MAR 2 8 1926

A REAL LOSS TO MUSICAL ART IS recorded with the passing of Franz Kneisel. Year after year he brought to Philadelphia the string quartet that bore his name and upheld the loftiest attainable standard in the exigent fine art of chamber music. Mr. Kneisel was not the flamboyant virtuoso aiming to capture the gallery with feats of bravura and technical cunning. He had appeared as soloist with orchestra and in recital. He was concertmaster of the Boston Symphony for eighteen memorable seasons. But he preferred the small ensemble, and in it his genius was most effectually revealed. For he was a scholar of sincerity and authority. He revered the classical patriarchs, yet his mind was open to new influences and fresh impressions. Always ready to make a place on his programs for aspiring composers of merit, the charlatans had cold comfort from him, and his pupils were not encouraged to a premature display of talent for the satisfaction of parental or personal vanity. His example of unswerving fidelity to standards was needed in an era when young artists are tempted by the prospect of material gains to seek the short cut that shall avoid the toilsome road to the crest of Parnassus.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

MAR 2 8 1926

FRANZ KNEISEL.

There have been few men who have done as much for the musical culture of this country as FRANZ KNEISEL, who died yesterday a young man of 61. He spent eighteen years in the influential and responsible post of concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For thirty years he maintained the Kneisel Quartet and made it not only the finest organization of its kind in this country, but also one that could bear comparison with the best and most famous in the world. He was for many years a teacher of the finest fibre, who bestowed upon his pupils the inestimable gift of musicianship rather than virtuosoship.

KNEISEL'S greatest service was in the new standards he set, the new revelations he made to his adopted country, in the art of chamber music. Here his genius found his fullest scope; his peculiar qualities of musicianship fitted him for this task pre-eminently. He may almost be said to have been the first to show in this country what could be achieved in chamber music by high technical mastery, unlimited work in rehearsal, the ripening of sometimes years of thought and reflection, joined to deep musical insight, unquestioned authority, an unerring taste and intuitive musical feeling.

Genius is by no means to be summed up as the taking of infinite pains; but genius such as KNEISEL'S reached its highest manifestations along that road. No labor, no effort, was ever too great for him; and the results are writ large in the record he has left. For what he did the country owes him a debt of gratitude, and it will not soon be forgotten.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN

MAR 2 8 1926

Services to Be Held Here and in Boston for Franz Kneisel

Funeral services for Franz Kneisel, noted violinist and conductor, will be held tomorrow morning at the Institute of Musical Art, No. 120 Claremont avenue. The services will be conducted at 11 o'clock by the Rev. Canon Douglas.

Later in the day the body will be sent to Boston, where another service will be held at 10 o'clock Tuesday morning. Interment will follow in a cemetery near Forest Hills, Mass.

Mr. Kneisel, who was a leading figure in musical life in America, died unexpectedly Friday night in the Roosevelt Hospital, following an operation. He was stricken last week on his way to Portland, Me., and was forced to retur nto his home, No. 329 West Eighty-fourth street, and later to enter the hospital. He was in his sixty-second year.

Born in Rumania, Mr. Kneisel was graduated from the Viena Conservatory in 1882 and became concert master of the Hofburg Theatre Orchestra in that city. In 1885 he came to America, becoming concert master and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and remaining with that organization until 1903.

Mr. Kneisel was the director of the famous Kneisel String Quartette, which was disbanded in 1917.

In recent years he headed the violin department of the Institute of Musical Art and also of Kneisel Hall, Blue Hill, Me.

Mr. Kneisel wa sthe composer of "Advanced Studies for the Violin" and the composer of the Kneisel collection for violin and piano.

BOSTON, March 27 (AP).—The death in New York of Franz Kneisel, Roumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here the famous Kneisel string quartet, organized less than a year after Kneisel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1885. Kneisel died last night.

Telegrams of condolence were sent to Mme. Kneisel today by Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, by the orchestra as a body, and by Frederick T. Cabot, president of the board of trustees. These messages carried the information that the orchestra in its concert tonight would play Beethoven's Funeral March in memory of Kneisel.

---

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW Y
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT
CHRONICLE
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

MAR 2 8 1926

Kneisel, Rumanian Violinist, Lover of Chamber Music, Dies

Boston, March 27.—(By the Associated Press)—The death in New York of Franz Kneisel, Rumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here the famous Kneisel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1885. Kneisel died last night.

His quartet came into being primarily through the wish of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony, that chamber music be given more prominent notice. The quartet gave an annual series of concerts which from the first attracted wide attention. It performed the standard works of the classic composers, but more often introduced for the first time many important chamber music productions by famous American and European composers. In these productions the quartet often was augmented by the composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

MAR 2 8 1926

FRANZ KNEISEL IS DEAD; WORLD-FAMED VIOLINIST

Former Boston Symphony Concertmaster Led Stringed Quartet

New York, March 27.—Franz Kneisel, violinist and director of the Kneisel Quartet until it was disbanded in 1917, died last night in Roosevelt Hospital. He was 61 years old.

Mr. Kneisel was born in Bucharest. He was trained at the Bucharest and Vienna Conservatories, making his debut in Vienna in 1882. He then became leader at the Hofburg Theatre and in 1884 became concertmaster of the Bilse Orchestra in Berlin.

From 1885 to 1903 he was concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His famous quartet was organized a year after joining the Boston Symphony, its first members being Kneisel, Roth Svecenski and Giese.

In 1905 he became a professor at the Institute of Musical Art here and remained with that school until his death. The disbanding of the quartet was met by regret of all critics and music lovers. It had earned a place second to none in all countries where music has its lovers.

He received the degree of Doctor of Music from Yale University in 1911 because of his undisputed position in the music world. Princeton honored him similarly in 1915. He published a collection of violin pieces and advanced etudes.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES DISPATCH
RICHMOND, VA.

MAR 2 8 1926

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY IS FAMOUS CONDUCTOR

Will Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra Here on April 12.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its famous leader, Serge Koussevitsky, which will appear here at the City Auditorium at 8:30 o'clock the night of April 12, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, recently made a week's tour in Canada, New York State and Pennsylvania, which is regarded as the most remarkable in the life of the great organization of 105 musicians. Crowded houses and prolonged demonstrations greeted the illustrious orchestra and conductor at each city visited.

At Montreal 6,500 people filled the great hall and the Montreal Herald commented on the event as follows: "The great walls of the Forum rang with deafening applause from the many thousands of enthusiastic and fortunate music lovers on the fulfillment of the many brilliant soulful and expressive combinations offered by the great conductor. The city's musical fraternity supported the program en masses and the huge building was filled to capacity. The biggest Montreal concert audience in many years."

So tremendous is the power and popularity of this orchestra, which has not been heard in Richmond under its present conductor, that in some cities where it has appeared this season, the house has been sold out long in advance. It is now generally looked on as the outstanding orchestral body in the world. When Richmond has the opportunity of hearing this peerless assembly it is thought that there will scarcely be a vacant seat in the auditorium. The seat sale will open at the Corley Company next Thursday morning.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

MAR 2 8 1926

FRANZ KNEISEL DEATH RECALLS OLD QUARTET

Violinist Was Member of Famous Boston Symphony Group.

Boston, March 27.—(AP)—The death in New York of Franz Kneisel, Roumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here the famous Kneisel String Quartet, organized less than a year after Kneisel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1885. Kneisel died last night.

His quartet came into being primarily through the wish of Maj. Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony, that chamber music be given more prominent notice. The quartet gave an annual series of concerts which from the first attracted wide attention. It performed the standard works of the classic composers, but more often introduced for the first time many important chamber music productions by famous American and European composers. In these productions the quartet often was augmented by the composer.

Besides Kneisel, as first violinist, the quartet included Julius Von Theodorowicz, his fellow student at the Vienna Conservatory; Louis Svencenski, violist, and Alvin Schroeder, violoncellist. Schroeder was considered one of the most accomplished 'cellists of the time and was one of the few to receive the honor of an invitation to become soloist of the Hof Opera in Berlin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 2 8 1926

Brooklyn Concerts

Institute Announces Five Events for April

Five April concerts under its auspices are announced by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, including the season's last Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, at the Academy of Music Friday evening, April 9.

Mischa Levitzki will give a piano recital at the Academy Tuesday evening, April 13, with a program, including numbers by Mozart, Beethoven, Chopin, Tchaikovsky and himself.

Baldwin Allan-Allen, barytone, with Robert MacGregor at the piano, will sing Scotch, Celtic and English songs at the Academy Wednesday evening, April 14. Charles Stratton, tenor, will be heard in recital at the Jamaica Branch of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences Tuesday evening, April 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

be at Boston on Tuesday. Mr. Kneisel died in Roosevelt Hospital Friday night at the age of sixty-one. His death was due to peritonitis following an operation to relieve an intestinal condition.

Mrs. Kneisel received yesterday many messages of condolence, among them telegrams from Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; from the orchestra as a body, and from Frederick T. Cabot, President of the orchestra's Board of Trustees. In memory of Mr. Kneisel the Boston Symphony Orchestra placed on its program last night the Beethoven Funeral March.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.

MAR 2 8 1926

DEAD MUSICIAN WAS KNOWN HERE

Franz Kneisel, violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet during its 32 years of existence and a former concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who died in Roosevelt hospital, New York, Friday night, was widely known in Worcester. He had frequently conducted the orchestra at the annual Worcester music festival during the time he was affiliated with the Boston Symphony from 1885 to 1903.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INQUIRER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

2 8 1926

Koussevitsky and Philharmonic

The next concert of the Philadelphia Philharmonic Society will take place in the Academy of Music on Sunday evening, April 11, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will play. This will be the third of the guest orchestras to be presented this season by the Philharmonic Society, the others having been the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by Willem Mengleberg, and the Cincinnati Orchestra, under the direction of Fritz Reiner. The programme to be given by Mr. Koussevitsky will be announced later.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS-TRIBUNE
DULUTH, MINN.

MAR 28 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Notable Group

Henry Gilbert's New Composition Well Received.

The performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra recently in New York of a new "Symphonic Piece" by Henry F. Gilbert, was an occasion of unusual interest, since Mr. Gilbert while he has done little in the direction of cultivating publicity, stands today as one of the most original and independent figures among contemporaneous American composers. He was born in Somerville, Mass. He was the first American pupil of Edward MacDowell. His compositions, which in most cases have aimed to affirm various phases of American life and spirit, have often drawn upon folk music current in this land for their thematic material. But Mr. Gilbert has not merely quoted folk themes; he has striven to express, through developments and transformations of certain melodies which have become part and parcel of national musical life, something of the energy and romantic vision that he believes to be latent in his people. He first emerged as a figure of significant individuality in his art when the Boston Symphony orchestra produced his "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes" in 1911, which was immediately recognized by Philip Hale, H. T. Parker and others as a new and important work.

In the words of Mr. Hale, the music "stirred the blood of the audience. All rejoiced in hearing a new voice, a voice with something to say and an original way of saying it. The overture," Mr. Hale concluded —and in this anticipated later comments from many quarters upon Gilbert's art—"is distinctively, but not bumptiously, not apologetically, American."

Folk Drama Spirit.

Mr. Parker found "here at last music of American folk tunes that meets every musical test, except, perhaps, that of adroit instrumental coloring, that keeps the matter, the voice and the spirit—the difficult item—of its origin; and that interests and stirs those who hear." This work of Gilbert's was followed by such orchestral compositions as his "Negro Rhapsody," first produced at the Norfolk Festival, Connecticut, in 1913; by "The Dance on Place Congo," played by the Boston Symphony and performed by the Metropolitan Opera company as a ballet in 1918; by the orchestral prelude to Synge's "Riders to the Sea," based on Celtic melody and embodying with singular fidelity the spirit of the folk drama; the Indian Suite," and other smaller works. The "Symphonic Piece" had its first performance in Boston Feb. 26 and 27 under Mr. Koussevitzky. The composer describes his musical intentions as follows:

"This piece of music has no 'program' in the sense in which that word is ordinarily used. It is not about any thing, or event, in particular; not suggested or inspired by any poem, or prose writing; just a piece of music, that's all. In fact, it aims to be a piece of absolute music; somewhat of a rarity in these days of the overworked 'program' idea—ornithological, botanical, or what not.

"Many of my friends have pressed me to tell them what it's all about—what I have tried to represent, etc. I can only say this: My constant aim ever since beginning composition has been to write some American music, i. e., some music which would not naturally have been written in any other country and which should reflect or express certain aspects of the American character or spirit as felt by myself. That spirit, as I see it, is energetic, optimistic, nervous, impatient of restraint and in its highest aspect a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit which is America is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration. Plenty of jingoism, vulgarity and 'Hurrah, boys!' attaches to it, but the spirit of the new birth underlies it all for him who can see it.

American Mood Reflected.

"Some of this American mood I have tried to reflect in my composition. So the first theme has in it (I hope) some of the 'Hurrah, boys!' character. The second theme, by contrast, has a slight Fosterian twang. It contains a remote suggestion of 'Old Folks at Home'—kind of a family resemblance—interspersed with a couple of measures from 'The Arkansaw Traveler.' Those bits are made use of and developed in the usual symphonic manner. But let it be said that, although I am a great believer in the songs of the people as possible bases for national art compositions, these two suggestions (neither used verbatim) are the only folk suggestions I have used in this composition.

"The score of this piece was finished in November, 1925. It was originally intended to be the first movement of a symphony, but certain friends of mine requested and advised that it be played as it stands. This is therefore done."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

A REAL LOSS TO MUSICAL ART IS recorded with the passing of Franz Kneisel. Year after year he brought to Philadelphia the string quartet that bore his name and upheld the loftiest attainable standard in the exigent fine art of chamber music. Mr. Kneisel was not the flamboyant virtuoso aiming to capture the gallery with feats of bravura and technical cunning. He had appeared as soloist with orchestra and in recital. He was concertmaster of the Boston Symphony for eighteen memorable seasons. But he preferred the small ensemble, and in it his genius was most effectually revealed. For he was a scholar of sincerity and authority. He revered the classical patriarchs, yet his mind was open to new influences and fresh impressions. Always ready to make a place on his programs for aspiring composers of merit, the charlatans had cold comfort from him, and his pupils were not encouraged to a premature display of talent for the satisfaction of parental or personal vanity. His example of unswerving fidelity to standards was needed in an era when young artists are tempted by the prospect of material gains to seek the short cut that shall avoid the toilsome road to the crest of Parnassus.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

MAR 28 1926

FRANZ KNEISEL.

There have been few men who have done as much for the musical culture of this country as FRANZ KNEISEL, who died yesterday a young man of 61. He spent eighteen years in the influential and responsible post of concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For thirty years he maintained the Kneisel Quartet and made it not only the finest organization of its kind in this country, but also one that could bear comparison with the best and most famous in the world. He was for many years a teacher of the finest fibre, who bestowed upon his pupils the inestimable gift of musicianship rather than virtuosoship.

KNEISEL'S greatest service was in the new standards he set, the new revelations he made to his adopted country, in the art of chamber music. Here his genius found his fullest scope; his peculiar qualities of musicianship fitted him for this task pre-eminently. He may almost be said to have been the first to show in this country what could be achieved in chamber music by high technical mastery, unlimited work in rehearsal, the ripening of sometimes years of thought and reflection, joined to deep musical insight, unquestioned authority, an unerring taste and intuitive musical feeling.

Genius is by no means to be summed up as the taking of infinite pains; but genius such as KNEISEL'S reached its highest manifestations along that road. No labor, no effort, was ever too great for him; and the results are writ large in the record he has left. For what he did the country owes him a debt of gratitude, and it will not soon be forgotten.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN

MAR 28

Services to Be Held Here and in Boston for Franz Kneisel

Funeral services for Franz Kneisel, noted violinist and conductor, will be held tomorrow morning at the Institute of Musical Art, No. 120 Claremont avenue. The services will be conducted at 11 o'clock by the Rev. Canon Douglas.

Later in the day the body will be sent to Boston, where another service will be held at 10 o'clock Tuesday morning. Interment will follow in a cemetery near Forest Hills, Mass.

Mr. Kneisel, who was a leading figure in musical life in America, died unexpectedly Friday night in the Roosevelt Hospital, following an operation. He was stricken last week on his way to Portland, Me., and was forced to retur nto his home, No. 329 West Eighty-fourth street, and later to enter the hospital. He was in his sixty-second year.

Born in Rumania, Mr. Kneisel was graduated from the Viena Conservatory in 1882 and became concert master of the Hofburg Theatre Orchestra in that city. In 1885 he came to America, becoming concert master and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and remaining with that organization until 1903.

Mr. Kneisel was the director of the famous Kneisel String Quartette, which was disbanded in 1917.

In recent years he headed the violin department of the Institute of Musical Art and also of Kneisel Hall, Blue Hill, Me.

Mr. Kneisel wa sthe composer of "Advanced Studies for the Violin" and the composer of the Kneisel collection for violin and piano.

BOSTON, March 27 (AP).—The death in New York of Franz Kneisel, Roumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here the famous Kneisel string quartet, organized less than a year after Kneisel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1885. Kneisel died last night.

Telegrams of condolence were sent to Mme. Kneisel today by Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, by the orchestra as a body, and by Frederick T. Cabot, president of the board of trustees. These messages carried the information that the orchestra in its concert tonight would play Beethoven's Funeral March in memory of Kneisel.

---

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW Y
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT CHRONICLE
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Kneisel, Rumanian Violinist, Lover of Chamber Music, Dies

Boston, March 27. (By the Associated Press) The death in New York of Franz Kneisel, Rumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here the famous Kneisel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1885. Kneisel died last night.

His quartet came into being primarily through the wish of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony, that chamber music be given more prominent notice. The quartet gave an annual series of concerts which from the first attracted wide attention. It performed the standard works of the classic composers, but more often introduced for the first time many important chamber music productions by famous American and European composers. In these productions the quartet often was augmented by the composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

MAR 28 1926

FRANZ KNEISEL IS DEAD; WORLD-FAMED VIOLINIST

Former Boston Symphony Concertmaster Led Stringed Quartet

New York, March 27.—Franz Kneisel, violinist and director of the Kneisel Quartet until it was disbanded in 1917, died last night in Roosevelt Hospital. He was 61 years old.

Mr. Kneisel was born in Bucharest. He was trained at the Bucharest and Vienna Conservatories, making his debut in Vienna in 1882. He then became leader at the Hofburg Theatre and in 1884 became concertmaster of the Bilse Orchestra in Berlin.

From 1885 to 1903 he was concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His famous quartet was organized a year after joining the Boston Symphony, its first members being Kneisel, Roth Svecenski and Giese.

In 1905 he became a professor at the Institute of Musical Art here and remained with that school until his death. The disbanding of the quartet was met by regret of all critics and music lovers. It had earned a place second to none in all countries where music has its lovers.

He received the degree of Doctor of Music from Yale University in 1911 because of his undisputed position in the music world. Princeton honored him similarly in 1915. He published a collection of violin pieces and advanced etudes.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES DISPATCH
RICHMOND, VA.

MAR 28 1926

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY IS FAMOUS CONDUCTOR

Will Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra Here on April 12.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its famous leader, Serge Koussevitsky, which will appear here at the City Auditorium at 8:30 o'clock the night of April 12, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, recently made a week's tour in Canada, New York State and Pennsylvania, which is regarded as the most remarkable in the life of the great organization of 105 musicians. Crowded houses and prolonged demonstrations greeted the illustrious orchestra and conductor at each city visited.

At Montreal 6,500 people filled the great hall and the Montreal Herald commented on the event as follows: "The great walls of the Forum rang with deafening applause from the many thousands of enthusiastic and fortunate music lovers on the fulfillment of the many brilliant soulful and expressive combinations offered by the great conductor. The city's musical fraternity supported the program en masses and the huge building was filled to capacity. The biggest Montreal concert audience in many years."

So tremendous is the power and popularity of this orchestra, which has not been heard in Richmond under its present conductor, that in some cities where it has appeared this season, the house has been sold out long in advance. It is now generally looked on as the outstanding orchestral body in the world. When Richmond has the opportunity of hearing this peerless assembly it is thought that there will scarcely be a vacant seat in the auditorium. The seat sale will open at the Corley Company next Thursday morning.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

FRANZ KNEISEL DEATH RECALLS OLD QUARTET

Violinist Was Member of Famous Boston Symphony Group.

Boston, March 27.—(AP)—The death in New York of Franz Kneisel, Roumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here the famous Kneisel String Quartet, organized less than a year after Kneisel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1885. Kneisel died last night.

His quartet came into being primarily through the wish of Maj. Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony, that chamber music be given more prominent notice. The quartet gave an annual series of concerts which from the first attracted wide attention. It performed the standard works of the classic composers, but more often introduced for the first time many important chamber music productions by famous American and European composers. In these productions the quartet often was augmented by the composer.

Besides Kneisel, as first violinist, the quartet included Julius Von Theodorowicz, his fellow student at the Vienna Conservatory; Louis Svencenski, violist, and Alvin Schroeder, violoncellist. Schroeder was considered one of the most accomplished 'cellists of the time and was one of the few to receive the honor of an invitation to become soloist of the Hof Opera in Berlin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 28 1926

Brooklyn Concerts

Institute Announces Five Events for April

Five April concerts under its auspices are announced by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, including the season's last Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, at the Academy of Music Friday evening, April 9.

Mischa Levitzki will give a piano recital at the Academy Tuesday evening, April 13, with a program, including numbers by Mozart, Beethoven, Chopin, Tchaikovsky and himself.

Baldwin Allan-Allen, barytone, with Robert MacGregor at the piano, will sing Scotch, Celtic and English songs at the Academy Wednesday evening, April 14. Charles Stratton, tenor, will be heard in recital at the Jamaica Branch of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences Tuesday evening, April 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

... be at Boston on Tuesday. Mr. Kneisel died in Roosevelt Hospital Friday night at the age of sixty-one. His death was due to peritonitis following an operation to relieve an intestinal condition.

Mrs. Kneisel received yesterday many messages of condolence, among them telegrams from Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; from the orchestra as a body, and from Frederick T. Cabot, President of the orchestra's Board of Trustees. In memory of Mr. Kneisel the Boston Symphony Orchestra placed on its program last night the Beethoven Funeral March.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.

DEAD MUSICIAN WAS KNOWN HERE

Franz Kneisel, violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet during its 32 years of existence and a former concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who died in Roosevelt hospital, New York, Friday night, was widely known in Worcester. He had frequently conducted the orchestra at the annual Worcester music festival during the time he was affiliated with the Boston Symphony from 1885 to 1903.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INQUIRER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Koussevitsky and Philharmonic

The next concert of the Philadelphia Philharmonic Society will take place in the Academy of Music on Sunday evening, April 11, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will play. This will be the third of the guest orchestras to be presented this season by the Philharmonic Society, the others having been the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by Willem Mengleberg, and the Cincinnati Orchestra, under the direction of Fritz Reiner. The programme to be given by Mr. Koussevitsky will be announced later.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS-TRIBUNE
DULUTH, MINN.

MAR 2 8 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Notable Group

Henry Gilbert's New Composition Well Received.

The performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra recently in New York of a new "Symphonic Piece" by Henry F. Gilbert, was an occasion of unusual interest, since Mr. Gilbert while he has done little in the direction of cultivating publicity, stands today as one of the most original and independent figures among contemporaneous American composers. He was born in Somerville, Mass. He was the first American pupil of Edward MacDowell. His compositions, which in most cases have aimed to affirm various phases of American life and spirit, have often drawn upon folk music current in this land for their thematic material. But Mr. Gilbert has not merely quoted folk themes; he has striven to express, through developments and transformations of certain melodies which have become part and parcel of national musical life, something of the energy and romantic vision that he believes to be latent in his people. He first emerged as a figure of significant individuality in his art when the Boston Symphony orchestra produced his "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes" in 1911, which was immediately recognized by Philip Hale, H. T. Parker and others as a new and important work.

In the words of Mr. Hale, the music "stirred the blood of the audience. All rejoiced in hearing a new voice, a voice with something to say and an original way of saying it. The overture," Mr. Hale concluded —and in this anticipated later comments from many quarters upon Gilbert's art—"is distinctively, but not bumptiously, not apologetically, American."

Folk Drama Spirit.

Mr. Parker found "here at last music of American folk tunes that meets every musical test, except, perhaps, that of adroit instrumental coloring, that keeps the matter, the voice and the spirit—the difficult item—of its origin; and that interests and stirs those who hear." This work of Gilbert's was followed by such orchestral compositions as his "Negro Rhapsody," first produced at the Norfolk Festival, Connecticut, in 1913; by "The Dance on Place Congo," played by the Boston Symphony and performed by the Metropolitan Opera company as a ballet in 1918; by the orchestral prelude to Synge's "Riders to the Sea," based on Celtic melody and embodying with singular fidelity the spirit of the folk drama; the "Indian Suite," and other smaller works. The "Symphonic Piece" had its first performance in Boston Feb. 26 and 27 under Mr. Koussevitzky. The composer describes his musical intentions as follows:

"This piece of music has no 'program' in the sense in which that word is ordinarily used. It is not about any thing, or event, in particular; not suggested or inspired by any poem, or prose writing; just a piece of music, that's all. In fact, it aims to be a piece of absolute music; somewhat of a rarity in these days of the overworked 'program' idea—ornithological, botanical, or what not.

"Many of my friends have pressed me to tell them what it's all about—what I have tried to represent, etc. I can only say this: My constant aim ever since beginning composition has been to write some American music, i. e., some music which would not naturally have been written in any other country and which should reflect or express certain aspects of the American character or spirit as felt by myself. That spirit, as I see it, is energetic, optimistic, nervous, impatient of restraint and in its highest aspect a mighty protest against the benumbing traditions of the past. This new birth—renaissance—of the human spirit which is America is a joyous, wildly shouting demonstration. Plenty of jingoism, vulgarity and 'Hurrah, boys!' attaches to it, but the spirit of the new birth underlies it all for him who can see it.

American Mood Reflected.

"Some of this American mood I have tried to reflect in my composition. So the first theme has in it (I hope) some of the 'Hurrah, boys!' character. The second theme, by contrast, has a slight Fosterian twang. It contains a remote suggestion of 'Old Folks at Home'—kind of a family resemblance—interspersed with a couple of measures from 'The Arkansaw Traveler.' Those bits are made use of and developed in the usual symphonic manner. But let it be said that, although I am a great believer in the songs of the people as possible bases for national art compositions, these two suggestions (neither used verbatim) are the only folk suggestions I have used in this composition.

"The score of this piece was finished in November, 1925. It was originally intended to be the first movement of a symphony, but certain friends of mine requested and advised that it be played as it stands. This is therefore done."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN

MAR 2 8

Services to Be Held Here and in Boston for Franz Kneisel

Funeral services for Franz Kneisel, noted violinist and conductor, will be held tomorrow morning at the Institute of Musical Art, No. 120 Claremont avenue. The services will be conducted at 11 o'clock by the Rev. Canon Douglas.

Later in the day the body will be sent to Boston, where another service will be held at 10 o'clock Tuesday morning. Interment will follow in a cemetery near Forest Hills, Mass.

Mr. Kneisel, who was a leading figure in musical life in America, died unexpectedly Friday night in the Roosevelt Hospital, following an operation. He was stricken last week on his way to Portland, Me., and was forced to retur nto his home, No. 329 West Eighty-fourth street, and later to enter the hospital. He was in his sixty-second year.

Born in Rumania, Mr. Kneisel was graduated from the Viena Conservatory in 1882 and became concert master of the Hofburg Theatre Orchestra in that city. In 1885 he came to America, becoming concert master and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and remaining with that organization until 1903.

Mr. Kneisel was the director of the famous Kneisel String Quartette, which was disbanded in 1917.

In recent years he headed the violin department of the Institute of Musical Art and also of Kneisel Hall, Blue Hill, Me.

Mr. Kneisel wa sthe composer of "Advanced Studies for the Violin" and the composer of the Kneisel collection for violin and piano.

BOSTON, March 27 (AP).—The death in New York of Franz Kneisel, Roumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here the famous Kneisel string quartet, organized less than a year after Kneisel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1885. Kneisel died last night.

Telegrams of condolence were sent to Mme. Kneisel today by Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, by the orchestra as a body, and by Frederick T. Cabot, president of the board of trustees. These messages carried the information that the orchestra in its concert tonight would play Beethoven's Funeral March in memory of Kneisel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

8 1926

FRANZ KNEISEL IS DEAD; WORLD-FAMED VIOLINIST

Former Boston Symphony Concertmaster Led Stringed Quartet

New York, March 27.—Franz Kneisel, violinist and director of the Kneisel Quartet until it was disbanded in 1917, died last night in Roosevelt Hospital. He was 61 years old.

Mr. Kneisel was born in Bucharest. He was trained at the Bucharest and Vienna Conservatories, making his debut in Vienna in 1882. He then became leader at the Hofburg Theatre and in 1884 became concertmaster of the Bilse Orchestra in Berlin.

From 1885 to 1903 he was concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His famous quartet was organized a year after joining the Boston Symphony, its first members being Kneisel, Roth Svecenski and Giese.

In 1905 he became a professor at the Institute of Musical Art here and remained with that school until his death. The disbanding of the quartet was met by regret of all critics and music lovers. It had earned a place second to none in all countries where music has its lovers.

He received the degree of Doctor of Music from Yale University in 1911 because of his undisputed position in the music world. Princeton honored him similarly in 1915. He published a collection of violin pieces and advanced etudes.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

2 8 1926

Brooklyn Concerts

Institute Announces Five Events for April

Five April concerts under its auspices are announced by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, including the season's last Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, at the Academy of Music Friday evening, April 9.

Mischa Levitzki will give a piano recital at the Academy Tuesday evening, April 13, with a program, including numbers by Mozart, Beethoven, Chopin, Tchaikovsky and himself.

Baldwin Allan-Allen, barytone, with Robert MacGregor at the piano, will sing Scotch, Celtic and English songs at the Academy Wednesday evening, April 14. Charles Stratton, tenor, will be heard in recital at the Jamaica Branch of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences Tuesday evening, April 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES DISPATCH
RICHMOND, VA.

MAR 8 1926

Dog, Stars in Thrillin Picture.

"The greatest dog picture made," that is the claim mad the latest Gotham production, Master's Voice," which, with T der, the Marvel Dog as its comes to the Victor Theater Monday and Tuesday.

In addition to this wond canine actor there is a stellar of human actors, with Mary Marjorie Daw and George Ha thorne at head of a long lis favorites.

The story tells of a young whose upbringing has resulte his being a physical coward thr no fault of his own. He is sud ly taken from the comfort of own home, and put in the f line trenches in France during tour in Canada, New York State and Pennsylvania, which is regarded as the most remarkable in the life of the great organization of 105 musicians. Crowded houses and prolonged demonstrations greeted the illustrious orchestra and conductor at each city visited.

Greene, recently

At Montreal 6,500 people filled the great hall and the Montreal Herald commented on the event as follows: "The great walls of the Forum rang with deafening applause from the many thousands of enthusiastic and fortunate music lovers on the fulfillment of the many brilliant soulful and expressive combinations offered by the great conductor. The city's musical fraternity supported the pro-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

MAR 2 8 1926

FRANZ KNEISEL'S FUNERAL TOMORROW

Services at the Institute of Musical Art—Boston Symphony Mourns.

Services for Franz Kneisel, violinst and conductor, will be held at the Institute of Musical Art, 120 Fairmont Avenue, at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning. Burial will be at Boston on Tuesday. Mr. Kneisel died in Roosevelt Hospital Friday night at the age of sixty-one. His death was due to peritonitis following an operation to relieve an intestinal condition.

Mrs. Kneisel received yesterday many messages of condolence, among them telegrams from Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; from the orchestra as a body, and from Frederick T. Cabot, President of the orchestra's Board of Trustees. In memory of Mr. Kneisel the Boston Symphony Orchestra placed on its program last night the Beethoven Funeral March.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

A REAL LOSS TO MUSICAL ART IS recorded with the passing of Franz Kneisel. Year after year he brought to Philadelphia the string quartet that bore his name and upheld the loftiest attainable standard in the exigent fine art of chamber music. Mr. Kneisel was not the flamboyant virtuoso aiming to capture the gallery with feats of bravura and technical cunning. He had appeared as soloist with orchestra and in recital. He was concertmaster of the Boston Symphony for eighteen memorable seasons. But he preferred the small ensemble, and in it his genius was most effectually revealed. For he was a scholar of sincerity and authority. He revered the classical patriarchs, yet his mind was open to new influences and fresh impressions. Always ready to make a place on his programs for aspiring composers of merit, the charlatans had cold comfort from him, and his pupils were not encouraged to a premature display of talent for the satisfaction of parental or personal vanity. His example of unswerving fidelity to standards was needed in an era when young artists are tempted by the prospect of material gains to seek the short cut that shall avoid the toilsome road to the crest of Parnassus.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

MAR 2 8 1926

FRANZ KNEISEL.

There have been few men who have done as much for the musical culture of this country as FRANZ KNEISEL, who died yesterday a young man of 61. He spent eighteen years in the influential and responsible post of concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For thirty years he maintained the Kneisel Quartet and made it not only the finest organization of its kind in this country, but also one that could bear comparison with the best and most famous in the world. He was for many years a teacher of the finest fibre, who bestowed upon his pupils the inestimable gift of musicianship rather than virtuosoship.

KNEISEL'S greatest service was in the new standards he set, the new revelations he made to his adopted country, in the art of chamber music. Here his genius found his fullest scope; his peculiar qualities of musicianship fitted him for this task pre-eminently. He may almost be said to have been the first to show in this country what could be achieved in chamber music by high technical mastery, unlimited work in rehearsal, the ripening of sometimes years of thought and reflection, joined to deep musical insight, unquestioned authority, an unerring taste and intuitive musical feeling.

Genius is by no means to be summed up as the taking of infinite pains; but genius such as KNEISEL'S reached its highest manifestations along that road. No labor, no effort, was ever too great for him; and the results are writ large in the record he has left. For what he did the country owes him a debt of gratitude, and it will not soon be forgotten.

---

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW Y
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT
CHRONICLE
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Kneisel, Rumanian Violinist, Lover of Chamber Music, Dies

Boston, March 27.—(By the Associated Press)—The death in New York of Franz Kneisel, Rumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here the famous Kneisel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1885. Kneisel died last night.

His quartet came into being primarily through the wish of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony, that chamber music be given more prominent notice. The quartet gave an annual series of concerts which from the first attracted wide attention. It performed the standard works of the classic composers, but more often introduced for the first time many important chamber music productions by famous American and European composers. In these productions the quartet often was augmented by the composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

FRANZ KNEISEL DEATH RECALLS OLD QUARTET

Violinist Was Member of Famous Boston Symphony Group.

Boston, March 27.—(AP)—The death in New York of Franz Kneisel, Roumanian violinist, has recalled to music lovers here the famous Kneisel String Quartet, organized less than a year after Kneisel began his American career as concert master and soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1885. Kneisel died last night.

His quartet came into being primarily through the wish of Maj. Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony, that chamber music be given more prominent notice. The quartet gave an annual series of concerts which from the first attracted wide attention. It performed the standard works of the classic composers, but more often introduced for the first time many important chamber music productions by famous American and European composers. In these productions the quartet often was augmented by the composer.

Besides Kneisel, as first violinist, the quartet included Julius Von Theodorowicz, his fellow student at the Vienna Conservatory; Louis Svencenski, violist, and Alvin Schroeder, violoncellist. Schroeder was considered one of the most accomplished 'cellists of the time and was one of the few to receive the honor of an invitation to become soloist of the Hof Opera in Berlin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.

DEAD MUSICIAN WAS KNOWN HERE

Franz Kneisel, violinist, director of the Kneisel quartet during its 32 years of existence and a former concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who died in Roosevelt hospital, New York, Friday night, was widely known in Worcester. He had frequently conducted the orchestra at the annual Worcester music festival during the time he was affiliated with the Boston Symphony from 1885 to 1903.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INQUIRER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Koussevitsky and Philharmonic

The next concert of the Philadelphia Philharmonic Society will take place in the Academy of Music on Sunday evening, April 11, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will play. This will be the third of the guest orchestras to be presented this season by the Philharmonic Society, the others having been the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by Willem Mengleberg, and the Cincinnati Orchestra, under the direction of Fritz Reiner. The programme to be given by Mr. Koussevitsky will be announced later.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

Closing Boston Symphony Programme in Brooklyn.

For the final appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn this season, which will be at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, April 9, Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony and Sebastian Bach's Concerto in F major. Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, will be the soloist in Mendelssohn's E minor violin concerto.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

MAR 2 8 1926

—The next concert of the Philharmonic Society of Philadelphia will take place in the Academy of Music, on Sunday evening, April 11, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will play.

—The Civic Opera Company, which has just closed its third season, is making plans for the forthcoming season. The repertoire of the company now amounts to 15 operas. Contemplated revivals are "Lohengrin," "Secret of Suzanne," "Romeo and Juliet" and "Otello."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

MAR 2 9 1926

FRANZ KNEISEL

"The only way people wanted chamber music," Franz Kneisel once said of his early years in America, "was with an upholstered sofa and a cigar to help him enjoy it." To him above every one else is due the fact that there are eagerly appreciative audiences for chamber-music organizations and that we have a creditable list of American composers of such music. In the career that death has ended much too early, Mr. Kneisel laid a many-sided impress upon American music. He was long the solo violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and conducted the concerts of that body at the Chicago World's Fair. He was a teacher of distinction. But it was as the organizer and for thirty years the head of the Kneisel Quartet, which he made one of the finest string quartets in the world, that he will be chiefly remembered. In this field he was an artist of genius, and his contribution to American culture should long be recalled with gratitude.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION STAR

glad to [illegible] 2 9 1926

A Music Master

THE DEATH of Franz Kneisel will bring sorrow to music-lovers of America among whom for forty years he had stood for the highest there is in that elusive art.

In the realm of chamber music no body of players stood higher than the Kneisel String Quartet in which he was leader and first violinist. As concertmaster and some time conductor of the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra he put into the reading of the score the same high regard for the technicalities of compositions and the same sympathetic understanding of the composers' whims that he demonstrated at the first violinist's desk.

Two-score years of playing before American audiences have not been without their recompense. Franz Kneisel lived to see American musical taste advance amazingly between the late eighties when he first came hither from Vienna and the day when his name and skill became commonly known. Whole companies of skilled musicians have found the taste for good music developed in all parts of this country by reason of the work of this music master which has been heard by two generations of Americans.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

MAR 2 9 1926

Franz Kneisel

In the sudden death of Franz Kneisel music suffers a heavy loss. Although he had retired from active work as violinist and conductor, he was continuing as a teacher the great services which for 40 years he rendered to music in America. To those who remember his early work it may seem surprising that he was but 61 at the time of his death, but he was exceptionally mature for his years when as a youth he came from Vienna to take the post of concert master in the Boston Symphony orchestra, and from the first he played an important part in the musical life of the country. The string quartet which he founded won fame while its members still kept their connection with the orchestra, but its missionary value greatly increased after the bold decision to cut loose and devote the undivided energies of the quartet to chamber music. For this field of music Kneisel and his associates did what the Boston Symphony orchestra with Maj Higginson's support did in its own sphere. Before that the United States had had no "permanent" orchestra of players who gave their full time to the work, and the founding of the first permanent string quartet was in line with that departure.

For 30 years "the Kneisels" maintained their beneficent mission, carrying the best music to all parts of the country and setting new standards in its interpretation. The personnel changed more or less, only the leader and the admirable viola player, Louis Svecenski, being constant factors. There were several second violinists, some of whom fitted in less well than others, while after the first years the 'cello part was ideally taken by Alwyn Schroeder until his temporary removal to Europe, and after that by Willem Willeke, who became Kneisel's son-in-law. But through all these changes the organization remained to a singular degree unchanged, reflecting always the qualities that marked its leader—classical tastes, extreme precision and refinement of style, and a sedulous regard for perfection.

To the American public its playing was a revelation, and its pioneer work may be compared with that done a little earlier in the orchestral field by Theodore Thomas. The orchestra is a plant of slower growth and only in recent years has it got a start outside of the greatest cities, but chamber music can be practiced wherever a few fairly competent musicians get together, and under the spell of "the Kneisels" innumerable little groups of this kind were formed in different parts of the country, some venturing to give concerts while others met purely for their own pleasure, one of the most hopeful symptoms of a growing taste for music, which ought not to be a selfish or a solitary art. Wherever Franz Kneisel and his associates traveled they fell in with eager enthusiasts and exerted an immense influence on the budding music life of America, the fruits of which are already clearly visible.

As a teacher Kneisel continued the same influence in another form, and impressed upon his many pupils the same unwavering standards of excellence. Technic for him was not an end in itself but a means of more adequate interpretation, but his insistence on perfect clarity and precision made him a strict teacher; for sloppiness in any form he had no toleration. In music his tastes were strongly on the classical side, but included Schumann, for whose symphonies and quartets he had a special affection. Toward the modern music he kept an open mind, and conscientiously included it in his programs. But America will remember Franz Kneisel and his associates as the ideal interpreters of the old masters such as Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, the full beauty of whose music had waited for this revelation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

MAR 3 0 [illegible]

Franz Kneisel.

So closely was the later renown of FRANZ KNEISEL, who died the other day, associated with the history of chamber music concerts in New York that his skill as a violinist has sometimes been obscured. When WILHELM GERICKE was brought here by Major HENRY L. HIGGINSON to perfect the resources of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the conductor selected KNEISEL as his concert master, on whom fell much of the responsibility the conductor did not have to bear. The youthful musician had already made a reputation in Europe when, in 1885, he ended his career there to come to the United States. A Rumanian by birth, he had studied the violin as a precocious virtuoso at the Conservatory of Vienna and received as the reward of his talent the post of concert master of Bilse's Orchestra in Berlin.

One of the ambitions of Major HIGGINSON, the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the formation of a quartet of the leading players of the string instruments in the orchestra. Naturally KNEISEL went to its head, and from 1885, when the first concert was given, became the foremost figure in the history of chamber music in this country. The Kneisel Quartet found the first seasons of its history anything but easy going. The first three years kept the quartet chiefly in Boston, although in 1888 it played here in a single concert in Steinway Hall. In the year 1891 began the long series of concerts which continued until 1917.

There was no lack of critical enthusiasm from the first hearing of the organization, which had immediately been placed by competent judges on a level with the Joachim and other noted European chamber music quartets. But anybody who remembers the slim attendance at the earlier concerts in the chamber music room of Carnegie Hall will be more than ever impressed by the growth of the popularity of the players. Only musical audiences attend such concerts. They are not for the ordinary opera or concert goers, and at one point in the early days of the Kneisel Quartet its devoted players were on the point of abandoning the effort to obtain popularity here. But the organization persisted, to become at last one of the features of musical life in New York which was most appreciated.

Its concerts here and in other cities of the country came to be attended by large audiences and FRANZ KNEISEL took the quartet to Europe, where it was equally welcome. In the days of the Kneisels, as they were called, there was little quartet music in New York. The number of such organizations has greatly increased, and the famous Flonzaley Quartet stands to-day in a position of eminence similar to that of the Kneisel organization in the past. The existence of a number of these chamber music organizations here and in other cities resulted from the popularity and appreciation of the Kneisel Quartet.

So impressive were his achievements as a chamber music conductor and leader that his fame as a violinist and as a concert master was overlooked by all but those who had frequent evidences of his musical equipment. Since the public appearances of the quartet ceased KNEISEL had been at the Institute of Musical Art and had transmitted to others as much as could be imparted of his skill and musicianship.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK EVE. POST

MAR 2 9 1926

KNEISEL IS EULOGIZED TO 1000 AT SERVICES

Frank Damrosch Calls Famous Teacher's Devotion to Art an Inspiration—Kreisler Plays

WIFE COLLAPSES IN HALL

Nearly 1000 men and women, prominent in the world of music paid tribute to the memory of a distinguished colleague at the Institute of Musical Art today when funeral services were held for Franz Kneisel, violinist, concert master and the country's leading exponent of chamber music.

Mr. Kneisel, whose quartet was for thirty-two years the recognized leading organization of chamber musicians in the United States, died last Friday in Roosevelt Hospital of peritonitis, which followed an operation for an intestinal disorder.

The service today preceded transportation of the body to Boston, where interment will take place tomorrow in the Kneisel family lot in Forest Hills Cemetery. Although a resident of New York for about twenty years, the musician had chosen Boston as his burial place, for it was there, in 1885, that he made his American debut at the age of twenty-one as concert master in the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Wilhelm Gericke.

Dethier Plays Organ Tribute

The small hall of the Institute of Musical Art, in which Mr. Kneisel had been a teacher for many years, was thronged when the funeral service was opened with an organ number by Gaston Dethier.

There were thousands of flowers, tributes of personal friends and musical organizations, and the bier was covered with red and white roses.

Overcome by emotion, Mrs. Kneisel, who was present with her two sons and a daughter, collapsed during the ceremony and was revived by the family physician, Dr. James I. Russell.

Canon Douglas Reads Service

Canon Winfred Douglas of the Convent of St. Mary's at Peekskill, an intimate friend of Mr. Kneisel's and himself an amateur musician, read the Episcopal service, after which Fritz Kreisler played the slow movement from the E. Major Concerto of Bach. Dr. Frank Damrosch's eulogy, which was brief, followed.

"It is given to few people to pass out of this world and leave behind them the knowledge that they cannot be replaced," Dr. Damrosch said. "Gentle, friendly, honored as he was socially, Franz Kneisel was uncomprmising in his adherence to the high art ideal which he had set for himself, which he lived up to and with which he inculcated his pupils. As long as there are people who love the art to which he gave his life the memory of Franz Kneisel can never die."

The honorary pallbearers included Mr. Kreisler, Felix and Paul Warburg, Felix E. Kahn, Richard Aldrich, Harold Bauer, Rubin Goldmark, Sigmund Herzog, Maurice Sternberger, Charles J. Rosebault, Dr. Fritz Bierhoff, Edwin T. Rice, August Fraemke, Dr. Charles G. Taylor and Artur Bodanzky. Among those at the service were: Eugene Noble, Lily Bliss, Olive Green, Mrs. Polly Norton. Mischa Elman, Dr. Henry Dakin, Mrs. Richard Hoe, Jacques Thibault, Mrs. Henry H. Krehbiel, Mrs. Horatio Parker, Mrs. George W. Chadwick and Frederick Steinway.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

MAR [illegible] 26

Frank Kneisel, who died on Friday in New York, may be said to have introduced the string quartet to American audiences. The year after he became the concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Conductor Gericke he organized the famous Kneisel quartet, which for many years was the leader among chamber music organizations in the United States. During the last twenty years, when Kneisel devoted most of his time to teaching, string quartets have become both numerous and popular. Few, however, have outshone the Kneisel quartet, which not only inaugurated a custom in America but established a sound standard.

200

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

Closing Boston Symphony Programme in Brooklyn.

For the final appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn this season, which will be at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, April 9, Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony and Sebastian Bach's Concerto in F major. Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, will be the soloist in Mendelssohn's E minor violin concerto.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

2 9 1926

—The next concert of the Philharmonic Society of Philadelphia will take place in the Academy of Music, on Sunday evening, April 11, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will play.

—The Civic Opera Company, which has just closed its third season, is making plans for the forthcoming season. The repertoire of the company now amounts to 15 operas. Contemplated revivals are "Lohengrin," "Secret of Suzanne," "Romeo and Juliet" and "Otello."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

FRANZ KNEISEL

"The only way people wanted chamber music," Franz Kneisel once said of his early years in America, "was with an upholstered sofa and a cigar to help him enjoy it," To him above every one else is due the fact that there are eagerly appreciative audiences for chamber-music organizations and that we have a creditable list of American composers of such music. In the career that death has ended much too early, Mr. Kneisel laid a many-sided impress upon American music. He was long the solo violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and conducted the concerts of that body at the Chicago World's Fair. He was a teacher of distinction. But it was as the organizer and for thirty years the head of the Kneisel Quartet, which he made one of the finest string quartets in the world, that he will be chiefly remembered. In this field he was an artist of genius, and his contribution to American culture should long be recalled with gratitude.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION STAR
glad to [illegible] 2 9 1926

A Music Master

THE DEATH of Franz Kneisel will bring sorrow to music-lovers of America among whom for forty years he had stood for the highest there is in that elusive art.

In the realm of chamber music no body of players stood higher than the Kneisel String Quartet in which he was leader and first violinist. As concertmaster and some time conductor of the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra he put into the reading of the score the same high regard for the technicalities of compositions and the same sympathetic understanding of the composers' whims that he demonstrated at the first violinist's desk.

Two-score years of playing before American audiences have not been without their recompense. Franz Kneisel lived to see American musical taste advance amazingly between the late eighties when he first came hither from Vienna and the day when his name and skill became commonly known. Whole companies of skilled musicians have found the taste for good music developed in all parts of this country by reason of the work of this music master which has been heard by two generations of Americans.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

MAR 2 9 1926

Franz Kneisel

In the sudden death of Franz Kneisel music suffers a heavy loss. Although he had retired from active work as violinist and conductor, he was continuing as a teacher the great services which for 40 years he rendered to music in America. To those who remember his early work it may seem surprising that he was but 61 at the time of his death, but he was exceptionally mature for his years when as a youth he came from Vienna to take the post of concert master in the Boston Symphony orchestra, and from the first he played an important part in the musical life of the country. The string quartet which he founded won fame while its members still kept their connection with the orchestra, but its missionary value greatly increased after the bold decision to cut loose and devote the undivided energies of the quartet to chamber music. For this field of music Kneisel and his associates did what the Boston Symphony orchestra with Maj Higginson's support did in its own sphere. Before that the United States had had no "permanent" orchestra of players who gave their full time to the work, and the founding of the first permanent string quartet was in line with that departure.

For 30 years "the Kneisels" maintained their beneficent mission, carrying the best music to all parts of the country and setting new standards in its interpretation. The personnel changed more or less, only the leader and the admirable viola player, Louis Svecenski, being constant factors. There were several second violinists, some of whom fitted in less well than others, while after the first years the 'cello part was ideally taken by Alwyn Schroeder until his temporary removal to Europe, and after that by Willem Willeke, who became Kneisel's son-in-law. But through all these changes the organization remained to a singular degree unchanged, reflecting always the qualities that marked its leader—classical tastes, extreme precision and refinement of style, and a sedulous regard for perfection.

To the American public its playing was a revelation, and its pioneer work may be compared with that done a little earlier in the orchestral field by Theodore Thomas. The orchestra is a plant of slower growth and only in recent years has it got a start outside of the greatest cities, but chamber music can be practiced wherever a few fairly competent musicians get together, and under the spell of "the Kneisels" innumerable little groups of this kind were formed in different parts of the country, some venturing to give concerts while others met purely for their own pleasure, one of the most hopeful symptoms of a growing taste for music, which ought not to be a selfish or a solitary art. Wherever Franz Kneisel and his associates traveled they fell in with eager enthusiasts and exerted an immense influence on the budding music life of America, the fruits of which are already clearly visible.

As a teacher Kneisel continued the same influence in another form, and impressed upon his many pupils the same unwavering standards of excellence. Technic for him was not an end in itself but a means of more adequate interpretation, but his insistence on perfect clarity and precision made him a strict teacher; for sloppiness in any form he had no toleration. In music his tastes were strongly on the classical side, but included Schumann, for whose symphonies and quartets he had a special affection. Toward the modern music he kept an open mind, and conscientiously included it in his programs. But America will remember Franz Kneisel and his associates as the ideal interpreters of the old masters such as Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, the full beauty of whose music had waited for this revelation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

Franz Kneisel.

So closely was the later renown of FRANZ KNEISEL, who died the other day, associated with the history of chamber music concerts in New York that his skill as a violinist has sometimes been obscured. When WILHELM GERICKE was brought here by Major HENRY L. HIGGINSON to perfect the resources of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the conductor selected KNEISEL as his concert master, on whom fell much of the responsibility the conductor did not have to bear. The youthful musician had already made a reputation in Europe when, in 1885, he ended his career there to come to the United States. A Rumanian by birth, he had studied the violin as a precocious virtuoso at the Conservatory of Vienna and received as the reward of his talent the post of concert master of Bilse's Orchestra in Berlin.

One of the ambitions of Major HIGGINSON, the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the formation of a quartet of the leading players of the string instruments in the orchestra. Naturally KNEISEL went to its head, and from 1885, when the first concert was given, became the foremost figure in the history of chamber music in this country. The Kneisel Quartet found the first seasons of its history anything but easy going. The first three years kept the quartet chiefly in Boston, although in 1888 it played here in a single concert in Steinway Hall. In the year 1891 began the long series of concerts which continued until 1917.

There was no lack of critical enthusiasm from the first hearing of the organization, which had immediately been placed by competent judges on a level with the Joachim and other noted European chamber music quartets. But anybody who remembers the slim attendance at the earlier concerts in the chamber music room of Carnegie Hall will be more than ever impressed by the growth of the popularity of the players. Only musical audiences attend such concerts. They are not for the ordinary opera or concert goers, and at one point in the early days of the Kneisel Quartet its devoted players were on the point of abandoning the effort to obtain popularity here. But the organization persisted, to become at last one of the features of musical life in New York which was most appreciated.

Its concerts here and in other cities of the country came to be attended by large audiences and FRANZ KNEISEL took the quartet to Europe, where it was equally welcome. In the days of the Kneisels, as they were called, there was little quartet music in New York. The number of such organizations has greatly increased, and the famous Flonzaley Quartet stands to-day in a position of eminence similar to that of the Kneisel organization in the past. The existence of a number of these chamber music organizations here and in other cities resulted from the popularity and appreciation of the Kneisel Quartet.

So impressive were his achievements as a chamber music conductor and leader that his fame as a violinist and as a concert master was overlooked by all but those who had frequent evidences of his musical equipment. Since the public appearances of the quartet ceased KNEISEL had been at the Institute of Musical Art and had transmitted to others as much as could be imparted of his skill and musicianship.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK EVE. POST

MAR 2 9 192

KNEISEL IS EULOGIZED TO 1000 AT SERVICES

Frank Damrosch Calls Famous Teacher's Devotion to Art an Inspiration—Kreisler Plays

WIFE COLLAPSES IN HALL

Nearly 1000 men and women, prominent in the world of music paid tribute to the memory of a distinguished colleague at the Institute of Musical Art today when funeral services were held for Franz Kneisel, violinist, concert master and the country's leading exponent of chamber music.

Mr. Kneisel, whose quartet was for thirty-two years the recognized leading organization of chamber musicians in the United States, died last Friday in Roosevelt Hospital of peritonitis, which followed an operation for an intestinal disorder.

The service today preceded transportation of the body to Boston, where interment will take place tomorrow in the Kneisel family lot in Forest Hills Cemetery. Although a resident of New York for about twenty years, the musician had chosen Boston as his burial place, for it was there, in 1885, that he made his American debut at the age of twenty-one as concert master in the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Wilhelm Gericke.

Dethier Plays Organ Tribute

The small hall of the Institute of Musical Art, in which Mr. Kneisel had been a teacher for many years, was thronged when the funeral service was opened with an organ number by Gaston Dethier.

There were thousands of flowers, tributes of personal friends and musical organizations, and the bier was covered with red and white roses.

Overcome by emotion, Mrs. Kneisel, who was present with her two sons and a daughter, collapsed during the ceremony and was revived by the family physician, Dr. James I. Russell.

Canon Douglas Reads Service

Canon Winfred Douglas of the Convent of St. Mary's at Peekskill, an intimate friend of Mr. Kneisel's and himself an amateur musician, read the Episcopal service, after which Fritz Kreisler played the slow movement from the E. Major Concerto of Bach. Dr. Frank Damrosch's eulogy, which was brief, followed.

"It is given to few people to pass out of this world and leave behind them the knowledge that they cannot be replaced," Dr. Damrosch said. "Gentle, friendly, honored as he was socially, Franz Kneisel was uncomprmising in his adherence to the high art ideal which he had set for himself, which he lived up to and with which he inculcated his pupils. As long as there are people who love the art to which he gave his life the memory of Franz Kneisel can never die."

The honorary pallbearers included Mr. Kreisler, Felix and Paul Warburg, Felix E. Kahn, Richard Aldrich, Harold Bauer, Rubin Goldmark, Sigmund Herzog, Maurice Sternberger, Charles J. Rosebault, Dr. Fritz Bierhoff, Edwin T. Rice, August Fraemke, Dr. Charles G. Taylor and Artur Bodanzky. Among those at the service were: Eugene Noble, Lily Bliss, Olive Green, Mrs. Polly Norton, Mischa Elman, Dr. Henry Dakin, Mrs. Richard Hoe, Jacques Thibault, Mrs. Henry H. Krehbiel, Mrs. Horatio Parker, Mrs. George W. Chadwick and Frederick Steinway.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Frank Kneisel, who died on Friday in New York, may be said to have introduced the string quartet to American audiences. The year after he became the concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Conductor Gericke he organized the famous Kneisel quartet, which for many years was the leader among chamber music organizations in the United States. During the last twenty years, when Kneisel devoted most of his time to teaching, string quartets have become both numerous and popular. Few, however, have outshone the Kneisel quartet, which not only inaugurated a custom in America but established a sound standard.

BOSTON POST, SAT

LHEVINNE RESTORES CONCERTO

Symphony's Soloist Puts New Life Into Faded Work

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Now and again a composition of fading vitality in exceptional performance fully recaptures its onetime effectiveness. At the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto in B-flat minor underwent at the hands of Josef Lhevinne such revitalizing and restoration, and Mr. Lhevinne received as his due reward applause more than usually fervent and long-continued.

ARRESTS ATTENTION

Hear this overworked Concerto from a pianist merely competent, and once the breadth and elation of the introduction are past the listener's interest frequently lags. Not so yesterday. From first bar to last, the hearer's attention was riveted. Not only was there superb vigor and strength in Mr. Lhevinne's performance; it abounded likewise in subtle contrasts and gradations of tone. In the emotional passages it had warmth without sentimentality.

Often around an orchestral melodic voice the piano wove lace-like arabesques of the utmost delicacy. There was Cossack fury and an amazing show of virtuosity in the Finale. Indeed, in one bravura octave-passage Mr. Koussevitzky himself might be seen to gaze down upon the pianist's flying hands with a look half-quizzical, half-admiring, while none clapped more heartily than did the conductor when the piece was done.

Glazunov's Prelude

Nor would this performance have made so extraordinary an impression had not the orchestral playing continuously kept to the standard of the soloist. As though conductor and pianist breathed as well as thought together, as though a single mind had ordered every detail of the ensemble and worked its will equally upon every instrument concerned, went this Concerto yesterday.

As preface to a concert that proved in the hearing more engrossing than it had promised, came for the first time in Boston Glazunov's Prelude to his Suite, "The Middle Ages," composed in 1902. Romantic music that would suggest the happiness and obliviousness of lovers sheltered in a storm-assailed castle, it discloses its composer's familiar skill in the handling of the orchestra.

Even when Glazunov has nothing of great consequence to impart, he says his say with disarming effectiveness. In this Prelude the tempest is suggested vividly enough, and if there is little hint of amorousness in the music of the lovers, these measures fill the ear with a rich and, for the moment, satisfying sound.

Bloch's Poems

In any event, the piece seemed greatly to please yesterday's audience. It received in fact more applause than did the vastly more important Three Jewish Poems of Ernest Bloch, unheard here since 1917, when the composer conducted them at a pair of Symphony Concerts. The first part of his Jewish Cycle, these Poems, like the later Psalms and "Schelomo," seem to voice the very soul of ancient Jewry—sombre, passionate, half-barbaric, now and again sensuously Oriental. Thrice this year has Bloch's name appeared upon the programmes of the Symphony Concerts, with the Suite for Viola and Orchestra, the new Concerto, and now with these Poems. And each time there has been reason to be impressed with the forcefulness of this composer's utterance. In a day when few makers of music seem to write from inner compulsion Bloch stands forth as a composer of burning convictions, aesthetic as well as racial.

Berlioz for Wind Up

More familiar at the Pops than at the Symphony Concerts, the three orchestral fragments from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," the Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps, the Dance of the Sylphs and the Rakoczy March, in a performance of singular effectiveness, brought the concert to a lightsome and inspiriting conclusion.

The D

BOSTON POST, SAT

LHEVINNE RESTORES CONCERTO

Symphony's Soloist Puts New Life Into Faded Work

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Now and again a composition of fading vitality in exceptional performance fully recaptures its one-time effectiveness. At the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto in B-flat minor underwent at the hands of Josef Lhevinne such revitalizing and restoration, and Mr. Lhevinne received as his due reward applause more than usually fervent and long-continued.

ARRESTS ATTENTION

Hear this overworked Concerto from a pianist merely competent, and once the breadth and elation of the introduction are past the listener's interest frequently lags. Not so yesterday. From first bar to last, the hearer's attention was riveted. Not only was there superb vigor and strength in Mr. Lhevinne's performance; it abounded likewise in subtle contrasts and gradations of tone. In the emotional passages it had warmth without sentimentality.

Often around an orchestral melodic voice the piano wove lace-like arabesques of the utmost delicacy. There was Cossack fury and an amazing show of virtuosity in the Finale. Indeed, in one bravura octave-passage Mr. Koussevitzky himself might be seen to gaze down upon the pianist's flying hands with a look half-quizzical, half-admiring, while none clapped more heartily than did the conductor when the piece was done.

Glazunov's Prelude

Nor would this performance have made so extraordinary an impression had not the orchestral playing continuously kept to the standard of the soloist. As though conductor and pianist breathed as well as thought together, as though a single mind had ordered every detail of the ensemble and worked its will equally upon every instrument concerned, went this Concerto yesterday.

As preface to a concert that proved in the hearing more engrossing than it had promised, came for the first time in Boston Glazunov's Prelude to his Suite, "The Middle Ages," composed in 1902. Romantic music that would suggest the happiness and obliviousness of lovers sheltered in a storm-assailed castle, it discloses its composer's familiar skill in the handling of the orchestra.

Even when Glazunov has nothing of great consequence to impart, he says his say with disarming effectiveness. In this Prelude the tempest is suggested vividly enough, and if there is little hint of amorousness in the music of the lovers, these measures fill the ear with a rich and, for the moment, satisfying sound.

Bloch's Poems

In any event, the piece seemed greatly to please yesterday's audience. It received in fact more applause than did the vastly more important Three Jewish Poems of Ernest Bloch, unheard here since 1917, when the composer conducted them at a pair of Symphony Concerts. The first part of his Jewish Cycle, these Poems, like the later Psalms and "Schelomo," seem to voice the very soul of ancient Jewry—sombre, passionate, half-barbaric, now and again sensuously Oriental. Thrice this year has Bloch's name appeared upon the programmes of the Symphony Concerts, with the Suite for Viola and Orchestra, the new Concerto, and now with these Poems. And each time there has been reason to be impressed with the forcefulness of this composer's utterance. In a day when few makers of music seem to write from inner compulsion Bloch stands forth as a composer of burning convictions, aesthetic as well as racial.

Berlioz for Wind Up

More familiar at the Pops than at the Symphony Concerts, the three orchestral fragments from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," the Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps, the Dance of the Sylphs and the Rakoczy March, in a performance of singular effectiveness, brought the concert to a lightsome and inspi[illegible] conclusion.

The D

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAM

MAR 2 9 1926

FRANZ KNEISEL.

The death of Franz Kneisel removes from the musical life of America a man who influenced it profoundly for many years. Brought to this country in 1885 by the late Wilhelm Gericke to act as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Kneisel served in that capacity for eighteen years under the conductorships of Nikisch and Paur, as well as of Gericke. Every season he was soloist at the concerts of the orchestra, making his debut as such October 31, 1885, in the Beethoven concerto .

But an even more urgent claim to fame than this important service is Mr. Kneisel's association with the Kneisel Quartet. That organization, which he founded shortly after his arrival in Boston, persisted with one personnel or another until finally it was disbanded in 1917. Its four members had always belonged to the Boston Symphony Orchestra until Mr. Kneisel and his then associates in the quartet resigned from the orchestra in 1903 to devote their entire artistic energy to the former, whereupon they transferred their headquarters from Boston to New York and engaged in more extensive tours of the country.

Thus far and wide they carried their missionary endeavors in the cause of chamber music, justly esteemed not only for the seriousness of their ideals but for the perfection of ensemble exhibited in their playing. The name of Franz Kneisel, therefore, will be linked permanently with chamber music in this country, and innumerable Americans are sure to remember him with gratitude as their first and reverent guide into its delectable domain.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

MAR 3 0 192

Symphony May Open Masonic Auditorium

Assurance that Pawtucket and Central Falls will figure prominently in the campaign to raise $1,500,000 for the new Providence Masonic Temple and auditorium came to-day when Herbert H. Brooks of Pawtucket accepted the general chairmanship of the campaign for those two communities. There are approximately 600 Masons in that section who hold membership in the Providence Masonic bodies, and they will be given an oportunity, during the campaign period, May 3 to 14, to match their Providence brethren in loyalty to their respective Masonic organizations.

Mr. Brooks is a member of all Providence Masonic branches, from the Blue Lodge to the Shrine.

Approximately 150 are expected at the dinner-meeting of line officers of the Providence Masonic bodies to be held this evening in Freemasons' Hall.

Mr. Sweet yesterday received the following letter from W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra: "I wish to express sincere appreciation for your letter of March 28 and for the very encouraging news regarding the prospect of an excellent hall in Providence, which will be available for concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We shall follow with great interest the progress of your new building.

"It may interest you to know that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been invited to open several new auditoriums in this country, and should this suggestion interest you, it might be kept in mind for future consideration."

Mr. Sweet indicated that the suggestion appealed to him greatly.

Dwight W. Coultas will be captain of Team 6, in Zone B, and George A. B. Ingleby of Team 23, in Zone H, according to an announcement by Mr. Rogers. The personnel of three additional teams has been completed and was also announced, as follows:

Team 5, Zone B—John Biltcliffe, captain; Edwin C. Fricker, lieutenant; Percy Hodgson, Randall J. Stacy, Alfred B. Carr, John Cox, Lloyd A. Oden, Howard W. Perry, John F. Harlow and R. C. Northcott.

Team 10, Zone D—William B. North, captain; D. A. Howland, lieutenant; Henry B. Fletcher, Lyton W. Sweet, David L. Dick, Charles A. Morse, Henry H. Gurland, Glenn D. Jackson, Charles W. Battey and Alfred L. Cote.

Team 25, Zone J—O. E. Loveland, captain; Arthur E. Browning, lieutenant; Rev. G. E. Hathaway, Frederick B. Goodwin, Daniel G. Aldrich, George W. Watson, F. W. Wyman, Roy Hartman, John Cheshire, Jr., and Alfred Arnold.

giv

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAR 3 0 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAY OPEN HALL AT MASONIC TEMPLE

Manager Brennan Indicates Musicians Would Like to Dedicate New Auditorium.—Campaign Meeting for $1,500,000 Drive To-night.

W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, indicates in a letter written to William L. Sweet, President of the Masonic Temple Trust and chairman of the $1,500,000 building fund campaign, that if it is practical the orchestra would like to dedicate the new auditorium.

Mr. Brennan writes:

"I wish to express sincere appreciation for your letter of March 23 and for the very encouraging news regarding the prospect of an excellent hall in Providence, which will be available for concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We shall follow with great interest the progress of your new building.

"It may interest you to know that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been invited to open several new auditoriums in this country, and should this suggestion interest you, it might be kept in mind for future consideration."

One of the important meetings preliminary to the campaign to raise $1,500,000 for the new Masonic Temple and auditorium, May 3 to 14, will be held to-night at Freemasons Hall. The line officers of all Masonic bodies in Providence, Palestine Shrine, the Eastern Star, De Molay and Rainbow Girls have been invited to attend. The members of the trust, the campaign executive committee, zone chairmen and team captains also will be present. The purpose is to place the entire plan of campaign before the officers of the various bodies that will occupy the new temple so that they will be in a position to pass the word on to their members. Approximately 150 acceptances have been received. Mr. Sweet will preside and will make a brief address.

Two additional team captains and two new teams were announced last night by Mr. Rogers, as chairman of the organization committee. Dwight W. Coultas will head Team 6, in Zone B, and George A. B. Ingleby will be captain of Team 23 in Zone H.

The two additional teams reported last night are:

Team 5, Zone B—John Biltcliffe, captain; Edwin C. Fricker, lieutenant; Percy Hodgson, Randall J. Stacy, Alfred B. Carr, Joseph Cox, Lloyd A. Oden, Howard W. Perry, John F. Harlow and R. C. Northcott.

Team 25, Zone J—O. E. Loveland, captain; Arthur E. Browning, Rev. G. E. Hathaway, Frederick B. Goodwin, Daniel G. Aldrich, George W. Watson, F. W. Wyman, Roy Hartman, John Cheshire, Jr., and Alfred Arnold.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 3 1 1926

Boston Funeral Services Held for Franz Kneisel

Old Friends and Musicians Are Pallbearers at Rites

BOSTON, March 30 (AP).—Funeral services for Franz Kneisel, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1885 to 1903, and director of the Kneisel String Quartet during the thirty-two years of its existence, were held to-day at the Forest Hills Cemetery. The ceremonies followed similar services for the violinist in New York yesterday. The Rev. Dr. Paul Revere Frothingham officiated at the services in the chapel.

Honorary pallbearers included Joseph Adamowsky, a former first violin in the Boston Symphony Orchestra; G. W. Chadwick, president of the New England Conservatory of Music; Frederick P. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra board of trustees, and Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when Kneisel was concert master.

A chorale by Bach and a part of a chorus from Brahms Requiem, on the organ, and the Largo from Haydn's quartet in D Major by a string quartet composed of members and former members of the Boston Symphony, comprised the music at the services.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN

MAR 3 0

Noted Musicians Pay Fitting Tribute to Franz Kneisel

With ceremonies befitting one of the country's leading exponents of chamber music, more than one thousand persons prominent in the musical world paid tribute yesterday to Franz Kneisel, violinist and former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He died last Friday night following an operation in the Roosevelt Hospital. He was long the director of the famous Kneisel String Quartet.

Distinguished musicians and music lovers from many cities filled the auditorium of the Institute of Musical Art, No. 120 Claremont avenue, of which Mr. KKneisel was director of the violin department. The services were simple and were conducted by the Rev. Dr. Winfred Douglas, of Peekskill, N. Y.

Fritz Kreisler, the noted violinist, played the slow movement from the Bach Concerto in E Major, accompanied on the organ by Gaston Dethier, who also rendered several selections. Dr. Frank Damrosch, director of the institute, delivered a brief eulogy.

Mrs. Kneisel, who was present with her two sons and a daughter, collapsed during the ceremony and was revived by the family physician, Dr. James I. Russell.

Following the services the body was taken to Boston, where another service will be held this morning and interment will be made in the family plot at Forest Hills Cemetery.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAM

MAR 3 0 1926

Spelman's "Assisi."

Mr. Koussevitzky, of all the European conductors who have lately been with us in America, shows the most nurturing interest in the music of American composers. At the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston last week he accorded a "world premiere" to the "Assisi" of Timothy Mather Spelman. One hopes that he will see fit to repeat the work in New York next month. From Mr. H. T. Parker, reviewing the Friday concert in the Boston Evening Transcript, we quote the following:—

"With his second number Mr. Koussevitzky, as the lawyers say, shifted the venue. The composer was now American, Mr. Timothy Spelman, not unknown in these parts during his days in Harvard College; while the background to his piece was pietistic and Italian. Mr. Spelman, it appears, has composed four tone-poems which he names collectively 'Saints' Days,' and which he would have played together. One pictures the festival of Little St. Anthony at Sorrento; another, the Redentore at Venice; the third, the racing Palio at Siena; the last (for which only the conductor found room) the 'Great Pardon of St. Francis' at Assisi, where, through his holiness, thousands of pilgrims gain remission for their sins, and in procession sing his praises and the praises of Mary, the Mother of God. Seemingly, Mr. Spelman would evoke the time, the place, the movement. A solemn rite engages him—no bustling, motley, half-pagan festival of the sun-kissed and earth-bound south.

"A march-rhythm, gradually accentuated and broadened, carries the pilgrim train along its monotonous way. The earlier shape and substance of the music are spare and grave; designedly dun is the coloring. The day is gray; the road dusty; the penitents oppressed. The flute sings a mounting, ecstatic melody. The orchestra unfolds and ripens it. Above the march-like music it hovers as in blessing. Together they rise into a hymn of glory, laud and honor. The tone-poem maintains itself as a musical structure; as it proceeds it summons the atmosphere and the illusion that Mr. Spelman would compass. The melody for the flute touches the imagination. The march-rhythm works its spell upon the ear."

The audiences, both on Friday and on Saturday, received the work with approval, summoning Mr. Spelman, who was present, to bow repeatedly.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FREE PRESS
BURLINGTON, VT.

MAR 3 1 1926

BOSTON, March 30. (AP)—Funeral services for Franz Kneisel, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1885 to 1903, and director of the Kneisel string quartet during the 32 years of its existence, were held today at the Forest Hills cemetery. The Rev. Paul Revere Frothingham, D. D., officiated at the services in the chapel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

MAR 3 926

The death of Franz Kneisel last week in New York will be regretted by none more keenly than those in this vicinity who knew him as concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra and more especially as leader and founder of the string quartet which bore his name. Here in Lowell he has heard on occasion with the quartet, which, if memory is correct, was featured more than once on the musical calendar of the Middlesex Women's Club. The Kneisel quartet was founded in 1885, the same year in which Mr. Kneisel came from Vienna to be concert master in the Boston Symphony orchestra. The original members, besides Mr. Kneisel, were Emmanuel Fiedler, second violin; Louis Svecenski, viola and Fritz Giese. 'cello. In the first program given in Boston Daniel Kuntz, now leader of the orchestra at the Repertory Theatre in Boston, joined the quartet in the performance of the Beethoven Quintet in C, Op. 29. How Mr. Kneisel brought the quartet to a perfection which matched that of the most famous quartets abroad is a matter of musical history. To his development of it through so many years is to be attributed the increasing interest in chamber music in this country. Franz Kneisel strove for perfection that comes only from the constant practice and the constant association. Time brought changes in the personnel of the quartet. There were several second violinists. Schroeder and Willeke succeeded Giese as 'cellists. When the quartet was finally abandoned a few years ago only the leader and Mr. Svecenski remained of the original four. Appropriately at the Boston Symphony concert of last Saturday evening the orchestra played the Funeral March from the Eroica Symphony of Beethoven as a tribute to the memory of the former concert master. It is as founder of the quartet and as a teacher who inspired many young American musicians that Franz Kneisel will be best remembered.

For the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra this week the conductor has set on the program the second Symphony of Brahms a Gigue by Debussy, Stravinsky's tone poem "The Song of the Nightingale" and Piernie's Franciscan Landscape, tone pictures of Assisi.

For the last of the Tuesday afternoon series of symphony concerts next week Mr. Koussevitzky has chosen to play Respighi's "The Pines of Rome," which twice met undoubted favor at the regular concerts. He has also put on the program Honnegger's much-discussed locomotive piece "Pacific, 231" and for lighter moods Ravel's Miniatures from Mother Goose and a suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Petrushka."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN

MAR 3 1 1926

Boston Musicians Honor F. Kneisel

BOSTON, March 30 (AP).—Funeral services for Franz Kneisel, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1885 to 1903, and director of the Kneisel String

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

3 1 1926

SERVICE FOR KNEISEL HELD AT BOSTON

Boston, March 30—(AP)—Services for Franz Kneisel, concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra from 1885 to 1903 and director of the Kneisel string quartet during the 32 years of its existence, were held today at the Forest Hills cemetery. The ceremonies followed similar services for the noted violinist held in New York yesterday. Rev Dr Paul Revere Frothingham officiated at the services in the chapel.

Honorary bearers included Joseph Adamowsky, a former first violin in the Boston Symphony orchestra; G. W. Chadwick, president of the New England Conservatory of Music; Frederick P. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony orchestra board of trustees, and Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra when Kneisel was concert master.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAM

MAR 2 9 1926

FRANZ KNEISEL.

The death of Franz Kneisel removes from the musical life of America a man who influenced it profoundly for many years. Brought to this country in 1885 by the late Wilhelm Gericke to act as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Kneisel served in that capacity for eighteen years under the conductorships of Nikisch and Paur, as well as of Gericke. Every season he was soloist at the concerts of the orchestra, making his debut as such October 31, 1885, in the Beethoven concerto .

But an even more urgent claim to fame than this important service is Mr. Kneisel's association with the Kneisel Quartet. That organization, which he founded shortly after his arrival in Boston, persisted with one personnel or another until finally it was disbanded in 1917. Its four members had always belonged to the Boston Symphony Orchestra until Mr. Kneisel and his then associates in the quartet resigned from the orchestra in 1903 to devote their entire artistic energy to the former, whereupon they transferred their headquarters from Boston to New York and engaged in more extensive tours of the country.

Thus far and wide they carried their missionary endeavors in the cause of chamber music, justly esteemed not only for the seriousness of their ideals but for the perfection of ensemble exhibited in their playing. The name of Franz Kneisel, therefore, will be linked permanently with chamber music in this country, and innumerable Americans are sure to remember him with gratitude as their first and reverent guide into its delectable domain.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

MAR 3 0 1926

Symphony May Open Masonic Auditorium

Assurance that Pawtucket and Central Falls will figure prominently in the campaign to raise $1,500,000 for the new Providence Masonic Temple and auditorium came to-day when Herbert H. Brooks of Pawtucket accepted the general chairmanship of the campaign for those two communities. There are approximately 600 Masons in that section who hold membership in the Providence Masonic bodies, and they will be given an oportunity, during the campaign period, May 3 to 14, to match their Providence brethren in loyalty to their respective Masonic organizations.

Mr. Brooks is a member of all Providence Masonic branches, from the Blue Lodge to the Shrine.

Approximately 150 are expected at the dinner-meeting of line officers of the Providence Masonic bodies to be held this evening in Freemasons' Hall.

Mr. Sweet yesterday received the following letter from W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra: "I wish to express sincere appreciation for your letter of March 23 and for the very encouraging news regarding the prospect of an excellent hall in Providence, which will be available for concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We shall follow with great interest the progress of your new building.

"It may interest you to know that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been invited to open several new auditoriums in this country, and should this suggestion interest you, it might be kept in mind for future consideration."

Mr. Sweet indicated that the suggestion appealed to him greatly.

Dwight W. Coultas will be captain of Team 6, in Zone B, and George A. B. Ingleby of Team 23, in Zone H, according to an announcement by Mr. Rogers. The personnel of three additional teams has been completed and was also announced, as follows:

Team 5, Zone B—John Biltcliffe, captain; Edwin C. Fricker, lieutenant; Percy Hodgson, Randall J. Stacy, Alfred B. Carr, John Cox, Lloyd A. Oden, Howard W. Perry, John F. Harlow and R. C. Northcott.

Team 10, Zone D—William B. North, captain; D. A. Howland, lieutenant; Henry B. Fletcher, Lyton W. Sweet, David L. Dick, Charles A. Morse, Henry H. Gurland, Glenn D. Jackson, Charles W. Battey and Alfred L. Cote.

Team 25, Zone J—O. E. Loveland, captain; Arthur E. Browning, lieutenant; Rev. G. E. Hathaway, Frederick B. Goodwin, Daniel G. Aldrich, George W. Watson, F. W. Wyman, Roy Hartman, John Cheshire, Jr., and Alfred Arnold.

giv

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAR 3 0 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAY OPEN HALL AT MASONIC TEMPLE

Manager Brennan Indicates Musicians Would Like to Dedicate New Auditorium.—Campaign Meeting for $1,500,000 Drive To-night.

W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, indicates in a letter written to William L. Sweet, President of the Masonic Temple Trust and chairman of the $1,500,000 building fund campaign, that if it is practical the orchestra would like to dedicate the new auditorium.

Mr. Brennan writes:

"I wish to express sincere appreciation for your letter of March 23 and for the very encouraging news regarding the prospect of an excellent hall in Providence, which will be available for concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We shall follow with great interest the progress of your new building.

"It may interest you to know that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been invited to open several new auditoriums in this country, and should this suggestion interest you, it might be kept in mind for future consideration."

One of the important meetings preliminary to the campaign to raise $1,500,000 for the new Masonic Temple and auditorium, May 3 to 14, will be held to-night at Freemasons Hall. The line officers of all Masonic bodies in Providence, Palestine Shrine, the Eastern Star, De Molay and Rainbow Girls have been invited to attend. The members of the trust, the campaign executive committee, zone chairmen and team captains also will be present. The purpose is to place the entire plan of campaign before the officers of the various bodies that will occupy the new temple so that they will be in a position to pass the word on to their members. Approximately 150 acceptances have been received. Mr. Sweet will preside and will make a brief address.

Two additional team captains and two new teams were announced last night by Mr. Rogers, as chairman of the organization committee. Dwight W. Coultas will head Team 6, in Zone B, and George A. B. Ingleby will be captain of Team 23 in Zone H.

The two additional teams reported last night are:

Team 5, Zone B—John Biitcliffe, captain; Edwin C. Fricker, lieutenant; Percy Hodgson, Randall J. Stacy, Alfred B. Carr, Joseph Cox, Lloyd A. Oden, Howard W. Perry, John F. Harlow and R. C. Northcott.

Team 25, Zone J—O. E. Loveland, captain; Arthur E. Browning, Rev. G. E. Hathaway, Frederick B. Goodwin, Daniel G. Aldrich, George W. Watson, F. W. Wyman, Roy Hartman, John Cheshire, Jr., and Alfred Arnold.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 3 1 1926

Boston Funeral Services Held for Franz Kneisel

Old Friends and Musicians Are Pallbearers at Rites

BOSTON, March 30 (AP).—Funeral services for Franz Kneisel, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1885 to 1903, and director of the Kneisel String Quartet during the thirty-two years of its existence, were held to-day at the Forest Hills Cemetery. The ceremonies followed similar services for the violinist in New York yesterday. The Rev. Dr. Paul Revere Frothingham officiated at the services in the chapel.

Honorary pallbearers included Joseph Adamowsky, a former first violin in the Boston Symphony Orchestra; G. W. Chadwick, president of the New England Conservatory of Music; Frederick P. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra board of trustees, and Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when Kneisel was concert master.

A chorale by Bach and a part of a chorus from Brahms Requiem, on the organ, and the Largo from Haydn's quartet in D Major by a string quartet composed of members and former members of the Boston Symphony, comprised the music at the services.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN

MAR 3 0

Noted Musicians Pay Fitting Tribute to Franz Kneisel

With ceremonies befitting one of the country's leading exponents of chamber music, more than one thousand persons prominent in the musical world paid tribute yesterday to Franz Kneisel, violinist and former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He died last Friday night following an operation in the Roosevelt Hospital. He was long the director of the famous Kneisel String Quartet.

Distinguished musicians and music lovers from many cities filled the auditorium of the Institute of Musical Art, No. 120 Claremont avenue, of which Mr. KKneisel was director of the violin department. The services were simple and were conducted by the Rev. Dr. Winfred Douglas, of Peekskill, N. Y.

Fritz Kreisler, the noted violinist, played the slow movement from the Bach Concerto in E Major, accompanied on the organ by Gaston Dethier, who also rendered several selections. Dr. Frank Damrosch, director of the institute, delivered a brief eulogy.

Mrs. Kneisel, who was present with her two sons and a daughter, collapsed during the ceremony and was revived by the family physician, Dr. James I. Russell.

Following the services the body was taken to Boston, where another service will be held this morning and interment will be made in the family plot at Forest Hills Cemetery.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAM

MAR 3 0 1926

Spelman's "Assisi."

Mr. Koussevitzky, of all the European conductors who have lately been with us in America, shows the most nurturing interest in the music of American composers. At the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston last week he accorded a "world premiere" to the "Assisi" of Timothy Mather Spelman. One hopes that he will see fit to repeat the work in New York next month. From Mr. H. T. Parker, reviewing the Friday concert in the Boston Evening Transcript, we quote the following:—

"With his second number Mr. Koussevitzky, as the lawyers say, shifted the venue. The composer was now American, Mr. Timothy Spelman, not unknown in these parts during his days in Harvard College; while the background to his piece was pietistic and Italian. Mr. Spelman, it appears, has composed four tone-poems which he names collectively 'Saints' Days,' and which he would have played together. One pictures the festival of Little St. Anthony at Sorrento; another, the Redentore at Venice; the third, the racing Palio at Siena; the last (for which only the conductor found room) the 'Great Pardon of St. Francis' at Assisi, where, through his holiness, thousands of pilgrims gain remission for their sins, and in procession sing his praises and the praises of Mary, the Mother of God. Seemingly, Mr. Spelman would evoke the time, the place, the movement. A solemn rite engages him—no bustling, motley, half-pagan festival of the sun-kissed and earth-bound south.

"A march-rhythm, gradually accentuated and broadened, carries the pilgrim train along its monotonous way. The earlier shape and substance of the music are spare and grave; designedly dun is the coloring. The day is gray; the road dusty; the penitents oppressed. The flute sings a mounting, ecstatic melody. The orchestra unfolds and ripens it. Above the march-like music it hovers as in blessing. Together they rise into a hymn of glory, laud and honor. The tone-poem maintains itself as a musical structure; as it proceeds it summons the atmosphere and the illusion that Mr. Spelman would compass. The melody for the flute touches the imagination. The march-rhythm works its spell upon the ear."

The audiences, both on Friday and on Saturday, received the work with approval, summoning Mr. Spelman, who was present, to bow repeatedly.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FREE PRESS
BURLINGTON, VT.

MAR 3 1 1926

BOSTON, March 30. (AP)—Funeral services for Franz Kneisel, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1885 to 1903, and director of the Kneisel string quartet during the 32 years of its existence, were held today at the Forest Hills cemetery. The Rev. Paul Revere Frothingham, D. D., officiated at the services in the chapel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

MAR 3 926

The death of Franz Kneisel last week in New York will be regretted by none more keenly than those in this vicinity who knew him as concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra and more especially as leader and founder of the string quartet which bore his name. Here in Lowell he has heard on occasion with the quartet, which, if memory is correct, was featured more than once on the musical calendar of the Middlesex Women's Club. The Kneisel quartet was founded in 1885, the same year in which Mr. Kneisel came from Vienna to be concert master in the Boston Symphony orchestra. The original members, besides Mr. Kneisel, were Emmanuel Fiedler, second violin; Louis Svecenski, viola and Fritz Giese. 'cello. In the first program given in Boston Daniel Kuntz, now leader of the orchestra at the Repertory Theatre in Boston, joined the quartet in the performance of the Beethoven Quintet in C, Op. 29. How Mr. Kneisel brought the quartet to a perfection which matched that of the most famous quartets abroad is a matter of musical history. To his development of it through so many years is to be attributed the increasing interest in chamber music in this country. Franz Kneisel strove for perfection that comes only from the constant practice and the constant association. Time brought changes in the personnel of the quartet. There were several second violinists. Schroeder and Willeke succeeded Giese as 'cellists. When the quartet was finally abandoned a few years ago only the leader and Mr. Svecenski remained of the original four. Appropriately at the Boston Symphony concert of last Saturday evening the orchestra played the Funeral March from the Eroica Symphony of Beethoven as a tribute to the memory of the former concert master. It is as founder of the quartet and as a teacher who inspired many young American musicians that Franz Kneisel will be best remembered.

For the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra this week the conductor has set on the program the second Symphony of Brahms a Gigue by Debussy, Stravinsky's tone poem "The Song of the Nightingale" and Piernie's Franciscan Landscape, tone pictures of Assisi.

For the last of the Tuesday afternoon series of symphony concerts next week Mr. Koussevitzky has chosen to play Respighi's "The Pines of Rome," which twice met undoubted favor at the regular concerts. He has also put on the program Honnegger's much-discussed locomotive piece "Pacific, 231" and for lighter moods Ravel's Miniatures from Mother Goose and a suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Petrushka."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN

MAR 3 1 1926

Boston Musicians Honor F. Kneisel

BOSTON, March 30 (AP).—Funeral services for Franz Kneisel, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1885 to 1903, and director of the Kneisel String Quartet during the thirty-two years of it sexistence, were held today at the Forest Hills Cemetery. The Rev. Paul Revere Frothingham, D. D., officiated at the services in the chapel.

Honorary pallbearers included Joseph Adamowsky, a former first violin in the Boston Symphony Orchestra; G. W. Chadwick, president of the New England Conservatory of Music; Frederick P. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra board of trustees, and Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when Kneisel was concert master.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAM

MAR 2 9 1926

FRANZ KNEISEL.

The death of Franz Kneisel removes from the musical life of America a man who influenced it profoundly for many years. Brought to this country in 1885 by the late Wilhelm Gericke to act as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Kneisel served in that capacity for eighteen years under the conductorships of Nikisch and Paur, as well as of Gericke. Every season he was soloist at the concerts of the orchestra, making his debut as such October 31, 1885, in the Beethoven concerto .

But an even more urgent claim to fame than this important service is Mr. Kneisel's association with the Kneisel Quartet. That organization, which he founded shortly after his arrival in Boston, persisted with one personnel or another until finally it was disbanded in 1917. Its four members had always belonged to the Boston Symphony Orchestra until Mr. Kneisel and his then associates in the quartet resigned from the orchestra in 1903 to devote their entire artistic energy to the former, whereupon they transferred their headquarters from Boston to New York and engaged in more extensive tours of the country.

Thus far and wide they carried their missionary endeavors in the cause of chamber music, justly esteemed not only for the seriousness of their ideals but for the perfection of ensemble exhibited in their playing. The name of Franz Kneisel, therefore, will be linked permanently with chamber music in this country, and innumerable Americans are sure to remember him with gratitude as their first and reverent guide into its delectable domain.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

MAR 3 0 192

Symphony May Open Masonic Auditorium

Assurance that Pawtucket and Central Falls will figure prominently in the campaign to raise $1,500,000 for the new Providence Masonic Temple and auditorium came to-day when Herbert H. Brooks of Pawtucket accepted the general chairmanship of the campaign for those two communities. There are approximately 600 Masons in that section who hold membership in the Providence Masonic bodies, and they will be given an opportunity, during the campaign period, May 3 to 14, to match their Providence brethren in loyalty to their respective Masonic organizations.

Mr. Brooks is a member of all Providence Masonic branches, from the Blue Lodge to the Shrine.

Approximately 150 are expected at the dinner-meeting of line officers of the Providence Masonic bodies to be held this evening in Freemasons' Hall.

Mr. Sweet yesterday received the following letter from W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra: "I wish to express sincere appreciation for your letter of March 23 and for the very encouraging news regarding the prospect of an excellent hall in Providence, which will be available for concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We shall follow with great interest the progress of your new building.

"It may interest you to know that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been invited to open several new auditoriums in this country, and should this suggestion interest you, it might be kept in mind for future consideration."

Mr. Sweet indicated that the suggestion appealed to him greatly.

Dwight W. Coultas will be captain of Team 6, in Zone B, and George A. B. Ingleby of Team 23, in Zone H, according to an announcement by Mr. Rogers. The personnel of three additional teams has been completed and was also announced, as follows:

Team 5, Zone B—John Biltcliffe, captain; Edwin C. Fricker, lieutenant; Percy Hodgson, Randall J. Stacy, Alfred B. Carr, John Cox, Lloyd A. Oden, Howard W. Perry, John F. Harlow and R. C. Northcott.

Team 10, Zone D—William B. North, captain; D. A. Howland, lieutenant; Henry B. Fletcher, Lyton W. Sweet, David L. Dick, Charles A. Morse, Henry H. Gurland, Glenn D. Jackson, Charles W. Battey and Alfred L. Cote.

Team 25, Zone J—O. E. Loveland, captain; Arthur E. Browning, lieutenant; Rev. G. E. Hathaway, Frederick B. Goodwin, Daniel G. Aldrich, George W. Watson, F. W. Wyman, Roy Hartman, John Cheshire, Jr., and Alfred Arnold.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAR 3 0 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAY OPEN HALL AT MASONIC TEMPLE

Manager Brennan Indicates Musicians Would Like to Dedicate New Auditorium.—Campaign Meeting for $1,500,000 Drive To-night.

W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, indicates in a letter written to William L. Sweet, President of the Masonic Temple Trust and chairman of the $1,500,000 building fund campaign, that if it is practical the orchestra would like to dedicate the new auditorium.

Mr. Brennan writes:

"I wish to express sincere appreciation for your letter of March 23 and for the very encouraging news regarding the prospect of an excellent hall in Providence, which will be available for concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We shall follow with great interest the progress of your new building.

"It may interest you to know that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been invited to open several new auditoriums in this country, and should this suggestion interest you, it might be kept in mind for future consideration."

One of the important meetings preliminary to the campaign to raise $1,500,000 for the new Masonic Temple and auditorium, May 3 to 14, will be held to-night at Freemasons Hall. The line officers of all Masonic bodies in Providence, Palestine Shrine, the Eastern Star, De Molay and Rainbow Girls have been invited to attend. The members of the trust, the campaign executive committee, zone chairmen and team captains also will be present. The purpose is to place the entire plan of campaign before the officers of the various bodies that will occupy the new temple so that they will be in a position to pass the word on to their members. Approximately 150 acceptances have been received. Mr. Sweet will preside and will make a brief address.

Two additional team captains and two new teams were announced last night by Mr. Rogers, as chairman of the organization committee. Dwight W. Coultas will head Team 6, in Zone B, and George A. B. Ingleby will be captain of Team 23 in Zone H.

The two additional teams reported last night are:

Team 5, Zone B—John Biltcliffe, captain; Edwin C. Fricker, lieutenant; Percy Hodgson, Randall J. Stacy, Alfred B. Carr, Joseph Cox, Lloyd A. Oden, Howard W. Perry, John F. Harlow and R. C. Northcott.

Team 25, Zone J—O. E. Loveland, captain; Arthur E. Browning, Rev. G. E. Hathaway, Frederick B. Goodwin, Daniel G. Aldrich, George W. Watson, F. W. Wyman, Roy Hartman, John Cheshire, Jr., and Alfred Arnold.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 3 1 1926

Boston Funeral Services Held for Franz Kneisel

Old Friends and Musicians Are Pallbearers at Rites

BOSTON, March 30 (AP).—Funeral services for Franz Kneisel, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1885 to 1903, and director of the Kneisel String Quartet during the thirty-two years of its existence, were held to-day at the Forest Hills Cemetery. The ceremonies followed similar services for the violinist in New York yesterday. The Rev. Dr. Paul Revere Frothingham officiated at the services in the chapel.

Honorary pallbearers included Joseph Adamowsky, a former first violin in the Boston Symphony Orchestra; G. W. Chadwick, president of the New England Conservatory of Music; Frederick P. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra board of trustees, and Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when Kneisel was concert master.

A chorale by Bach and a part of a chorus from Brahms Requiem, on the organ, and the Largo from Haydn's quartet in D Major by a string quartet composed of members and former members of the Boston Symphony, comprised the music at the services.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN

Noted Musicians Pay Fitting Tribute to Franz Kneisel

With ceremonies befitting one of the country's leading exponents of chamber music, more than one thousand persons prominent in the musical world paid tribute yesterday to Franz Kneisel, violinist and former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He died last Friday night following an operation in the Roosevelt Hospital. He was long the director of the famous Kneisel String Quartet.

Distinguished musicians and music lovers from many cities filled the auditorium of the Institute of Musical Art, No. 120 Claremont avenue, of which Mr. KKneisel was director of the violin department. The services were simple and were conducted by the Rev. Dr. Winfred Douglas, of Peekskill, N. Y.

Fritz Kreisler, the noted violinist, played the slow movement from the Bach Concerto in E Major, accompanied on the organ by Gaston Dethier, who also rendered several selections. Dr. Frank Damrosch, director of the institute, delivered a brief eulogy.

Mrs. Kneisel, who was present with her two sons and a daughter, collapsed during the ceremony and was revived by the family physician, Dr. James I. Russell.

Following the services the body was taken to Boston, where another service will be held this morning and interment will be made in the family plot at Forest Hills Cemetery.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAM

MAR 3 0 1926

Spelman's "Assisi."

Mr. Koussevitzky, of all the European conductors who have lately been with us in America, shows the most nurturing interest in the music of American composers. At the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston last week he accorded a "world premiere" to the "Assisi" of Timothy Mather Spelman. One hopes that he will see fit to repeat the work in New York next month. From Mr. H. T. Parker, reviewing the Friday concert in the Boston Evening Transcript, we quote the following:—

"With his second number Mr. Koussevitzky, as the lawyers say, shifted the venue. The composer was now American, Mr. Timothy Spelman, not unknown in these parts during his days in Harvard College; while the background to his piece was pietistic and Italian. Mr. Spelman, it appears, has composed four tone-poems which he names collectively 'Saints' Days,' and which he would have played together. One pictures the festival of Little St. Anthony at Sorrento; another, the Redentore at Venice; the third, the racing Palio at Siena; the last (for which only the conductor found room) the 'Great Pardon of St. Francis' at Assisi, where, through his holiness, thousands of pilgrims gain remission for their sins, and in procession sing his praises and the praises of Mary, the Mother of God. Seemingly, Mr. Spelman would evoke the time, the place, the movement. A solemn rite engages him—no bustling, motley, half-pagan festival of the sun-kissed and earth-bound south.

"A march-rhythm, gradually accentuated and broadened, carries the pilgrim train along its monotonous way. The earlier shape and substance of the music are spare and grave; designedly dun is the coloring. The day is gray; the road dusty; the penitents oppressed. The flute sings a mounting, ecstatic melody. The orchestra unfolds and ripens it. Above the march-like music it hovers as in blessing. Together they rise into a hymn of glory, laud and honor. The tone-poem maintains itself as a musical structure; as it proceeds it summons the atmosphere and the illusion that Mr. Spelman would compass. The melody for the flute touches the imagination. The march-rhythm works its spell upon the ear."

The audiences, both on Friday and on Saturday, received the work with approval, summoning Mr. Spelman, who was present, to bow repeatedly.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FREE PRESS
BURLINGTON, VT.

MAR 3 1 1926

BOSTON, March 30. (AP)—Funeral services for Franz Kneisel, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1885 to 1903, and director of the Kneisel string quartet during the 32 years of its existence, were held today at the Forest Hills cemetery. The Rev. Paul Revere Frothingham, D. D., officiated at the services in the chapel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

MAR 3 [illegible]926

The death of Franz Kneisel last week in New York will be regretted by none more keenly than those in this vicinity who knew him as concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra and more especially as leader and founder of the string quartet which bore his name. Here in Lowell he has heard on occasion with the quartet, which, if memory is correct, was featured more than once on the musical calendar of the Middlesex Women's Club. The Kneisel quartet was founded in 1885, the same year in which Mr. Kneisel came from Vienna to be concert master in the Boston Symphony orchestra. The original members, besides Mr. Kneisel, were Emmanuel Fiedler, second violin; Louis Svecenski, viola and Fritz Giese, 'cello. In the first program given in Boston Daniel Kuntz, now leader of the orchestra at the Repertory Theatre in Boston, joined the quartet in the performance of the Beethoven Quintet in C, Op. 29. How Mr. Kneisel brought the quartet to a perfection which matched that of the most famous quartets abroad is a matter of musical history. To his development of it through so many years is to be attributed the increasing interest in chamber music in this country. Franz Kneisel strove for perfection that comes only from the constant practice and the constant association. Time brought changes in the personnel of the quartet. There were several second violinists. Schroeder and Willeke succeeded Giese as 'cellists. When the quartet was finally abandoned a few years ago only the leader and Mr. Svecenski remained of the original four. Appropriately at the Boston Symphony concert of last Saturday evening the orchestra played the Funeral March from the Eroica Symphony of Beethoven as a tribute to the memory of the former concert master. It is as founder of the quartet and as a teacher who inspired many young American musicians that Franz Kneisel will be best remembered.

For the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra this week the conductor has set on the program the second Symphony of Brahms a Gigue by Debussy, Stravinsky's tone poem "The Song of the Nightingale" and Piernie's Franciscan Landscape, tone pictures of Assisi.

For the last of the Tuesday afternoon series of symphony concerts next week Mr. Koussevitzky has chosen to play Respighi's "The Pines of Rome," which twice met undoubted favor at the regular concerts. He has also put on the program Honnegger's much-discussed locomotive piece "Pacific, 231" and for lighter moods Ravel's Miniatures from Mother Goose and a suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Petrushka."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN

Boston Musicians Honor F. Kneisel

BOSTON, March 30 (AP).—Funeral services for Franz Kneisel, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1885 to 1903, and director of the Kneisel String Quartet during the thirty-two years of it sexistence, were held today at the Forest Hills Cemetery. The Rev. Paul Revere Frothingham, D. D., officiated at the services in the chapel.

Honorary pallbearers included Joseph Adamowsky, a former first violin in the Boston Symphony Orchestra; G. W. Chadwick, president of the New England Conservatory of Music; Frederick P. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra board of trustees, and Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when Kneisel was concert master.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

202

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM

LEADERS IN MUSIC SERVE AT FUNERAL OF FRANZ KNEISEL

Members and Former Members of Boston Symphony Play Requiem Selections.

BOSTON, March 30.—(AP) Fu
eral services for Franz Kneisel, co
cert master of the Boston Sympho orchestra from 1885 to 1903, a director of the Kneisel string qua
tet during the 32 years of its exi ence, were held today at the For Hills cemetery. The ceremonies f
lowed similar services for the no
violinist held in New York yest
day. Rev. Paul Revere Frothi
ham, D. D., officiated at the se
ices in the chapel.

Honorary pallbearers inclu
Joseph Adamowsky, a former f
violin in the Boston Symphony
chestra; G. W. Chadwick, presi
of the New England Conserva
of Music; Frederick P. Cabot, p
ident of the Boston Symphony
chestra Board of Trustees,
Charles A. Ellis, manager of
Boston Symphony orchestra.
Kneisel was concert master.

A chorale by Bach and a
of a chorus from Brahm's Requ
on the organ, and the Largo
Haydn's quartet in D major, by string quartet composed of membe
and former members of the Bost
Symphony, comprised music at th
services.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

MAR 31 1926

FRANZ KNEISEL BURIED.

Second Funeral Service Held in the Chapel of a Boston Cemetery.

BOSTON, March 30 (AP).—Funeral ser-

26

ANOTHER YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT

HERALD 3-18 26

Symphony Hall Audience Is Enthusiastic

At Symphony hall, yesterday afternoon, the orchestra gave another of the Young People's concerts, with Michael Press again the conductor. The program, which will be repeated this afternoon, included Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," two movements from Mozart's smyphony in E flat major, Saint-Saens's prelude to "The Deluge," Beethoven's Turkish March from "The Ruins of Athens," three of the pieces of Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker Suite," and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody in F major. To close there was the singing of "The Star Spangled Banner," in honor of the day—Evaquation

Although it was the first concert that the orchestra has given since its recent trip, it was in admirable trim. Mr. Press, who is apparently to become the regular conductor of this series, again led with the robustness, and rhythmic energy that have marked each of his previous performances, especially in the overture to "The Flying Dutchman." As before, at the regular concerts, he made it magnificently alive, and this time he made Senta's theme much lovelier.

The Saint-Saens prelude, now seldom seen on a concert program, or heard in the hall, is merely a sensuous French concoction, and although the above is suggested in the violin solo, which Mr. Theodorowicz played yesterday, there is little of the deluge. Again the Liszt rhapsody, with its dance variants, sounded fresh and eloquent, although at times slow footed, and repetitious.

But the Wagner Overture, the two movements of the Mozart, the minuet and the finale, and the Turkish march, which Mr. Press was obliged to repeat, stood out head and shoulders above the rest. The audience was very large, and very enthusiastic. Mr. Surette wrote the program notes but he did not address the audience.

E. G.

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Globe 3/18/26

Children Like Especially the Nutcracker Suite

Symphony Hall was nearly filled yesterday afternoon for the first of two young people's symphony concerts by excited young people, restless young people, some of them so young that their appreciation of the music had to be expressed by conducting orchestras of their own between the seats, imitating Mr Press behind his back

Fortissimi and the strongly-marked rhythms naturally held their attention most easily; little feet tramped out the beat, annoying hugely some of their elders—and for a young people's concert there were many oldsters present.

The children were politely appreciative of Wagner, but they forced a repetition of Beethoven's Turkish March—and did their applausive best to get some of the Nutcracker Suite played over for them.

The program was immensely well chosen, for there was good solid classicism for young teeth to set into; there was the exciting overture to the "Flying Dutchman" to stir young blood, and as a final number there was perhaps the jazziest of all Liszt's rhapsodies—No. 14, in F major.

The Mozart number was composed of the best known of all his minuets, and the allegro and ticklesome finale from the same symphony. Then came the beautiful, melodic violin song of Noah's dove, wheeling about on the face of the troubled waters—the prelude to "The Deluge" of Saint-Saens. It was beautifully played, and its lovely melody held the children as if breathless; one little girl clung to the sleeve of her grown-up companion, and at the end turned a solemn face up and sighed. It had obviously been almost too much for her.

The "Nutcracker Suite" seemed written for children; they loved the little overture, and they broke into the most furious applause of the afternoon at the ending of the rich waltz number.

After the concert, it being Evacuation Day, the audience sang "The Star Spangled Banner." The program will be repeated this afternoon at 4.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND BEETHOVEN

Post 3/18/26

Compel Symphony to Repeat His 'Turkish March'

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Although he bears no such title, Michael Press seems virtually to have become the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, so often this season has this Russian violinist and conductor fitted into Mr. Koussevitzky's shoes. Already, Mr. Press has led the orchestra through a pair of regular subscription concerts, a concert in Cambridge and a brace of Young People's concerts, and this week he is again conducting two concerts for listeners of tender years, of which one befell at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and the other takes place there today.

Always, at these Young People's concerts, it is interesting to note which pieces seem especially to please. Yesterday, the hit of the afternoon was plainly the Turkish March from Beethoven's music for "The Ruins of Athens," now-a-days more frequently heard in Rubinstein's brilliant piano-transcription than in its original form. Listening to it yesterday, one wondered why this march does not more often find its way to a "Pop" programme, for it makes a most cheerful din. So much did it please on this occasion that Mr. Press repeated it—even though [illegible] who had come to the stage [illegible] bassoon [illegible] ink-

14 Mills st., W. Natick.

Advertiser Mar 20

SYMPHONY PLAYS VARIED PROGRAM AT FINE CONCERT

Barbaric music and Bach, Beethoven's sonorous grace, and the vivid glamour of Respighi's "Pines of Rome," went side by side at the Symphony concert yesterday. For the first part of the program Mr. Koussevitzky chose Bach's "Concerto No. 2 in F Major" for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet. This was followed by Beethoven's "Concerto in D Major" for the violin, in which Joseph Szigeti made his appearance as soloist. Mr. Szigeti's smooth and brilliant performance thoroughly pleased an enthusiastic audience.

Modern music had its due in the second half of the concert, when Roussel's colorful suite from the opera-ballet of "Padmavati" was presented for the first time in Boston. Very Oriental indeed proved Mr. Roussel's ballet, with weird rhythms, and slow, sensuous dance music, at times overladen with the still more barbaric theme of Mongol invaders sweeping down the plains of India.

"The Pines of Rome," given for the second time this season, once more found Mr. Koussevitzky on his mettle. Its first movement again set forth children playing in the Italian sun, its second descended to more sombre measures, its third introduced the far-famed phonographic nightingale, and the last came to a crashing close with the vision of Caesar and his legions marching through the mist, bugles

---

Herald Mar
MAR. 20

SYMPHONY IN 19TH CONCERT

Bach, Beethoven, Roussel and Respighi Works Presented

By PHILIP HALE

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Bach, Concerto No. 2, F major for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet (edited by Felix Mottl.) Beethoven, violin concerto, Roussel, First Suite from the opera-ballet "Padmavati," Respighi, "Pines of Rome" (repeated by request). The performance of Roussel's Suite was probably the first in this country. Joseph Szigeti, the solo violinist, played for the first time in Boston.

Roussel, sailing to the east as an officer in the French navy, re-visiting eastern countries, has been inspired, if "inspired" can be said of his music, by oriental memories. The subject of his opera-ballet, "Padmavati" is a Hindu romance, which admits of wild, tragic action and gorgeous color. The chief motif of the opera is the willingness of a Hindu King to hand over his beautiful and virtuous wife to a Mongolian besieger, in order to save his city from loot and massacre. She stabs her husband that in accordance with the old suttle custom the two may ascend triumphantly to the heaven of India. The librettist, M. Laloy, a well equipped writer about music, has shown a passionate interest in eastern countries and written a treatise on Chinese music. Concerning the merits of the opera, whether Roussel was successful in the carrying out of his theories of dramatic works with music, we can naturally say nothing. Is it fair to judge of stage music played in the concert hall? Is it reasonable to expect from any concert-goer an enlightened judgment?

In nine cases out of ten such music suffers injury when it is taken from the theatre, no matter how excellent the performance may be. Is this Suite an exception?

The Suite consists of the Prelude to Act I; a Dance of Warriors; a Dance of Female Slaves. The Prelude might pass as absolute music, yet in the theatre it must be more effective as suggesting the drama to come. In the concert hall the music is rather mysterious, having a foreboding chief theme with repetitions in the manner dear to Orientals. Knowing the story of the opera, one might find in this Prelude the tragic note, but one misses the sensuousness, the sensuality of the eastern drama. Goldmark was more successful in his prelude to "The Queen of Sheba," and even in his well-worn "Sakuntala." There is orientalism in music; there is pseudo-orientalism, which to westerners is often more convincing than the genuine article. Johannes Weber, in his sour way, denied the genuineness of national or local color in music. He went too far, but a hearer gladly finds in music what he expects, what he wishes, to find when he is told that the inspiring, the suggesting subject is exotic.

appropriate barbaric wildness, but these warriors might as well be Scythians, Assyrians, as Mongolians or Hindus. In the Dance of the Female Slaves one misses the languor, the voluptuousness of the East; one misses even the intoxicating monotony that one is accustomed to associate with Oriental dancing.

We write without knowledge of the scenes in which these dances occur. It may be that Laloy's female slaves are not voluptuous and enticing; that they disdain fleshly allurements. It may be that these warriors are not terrible fellows after all.

The idiom of Roussel's music in general is still a puzzle to us. It has a certain dry austerity, a forbidding aloofness. He works patiently in his tower, but the tower is of iron or brass, not of silver, not of ivory. A musician to be respected; a man of high ideals. What would one not give for a moment of coarseness, even of lush sentiment to persuade the hearer that the composer was emotional as well as brainy!

Violinists visiting Boston for the first time feel compelled to play the concerto by Beethoven or the one by Brahms to show that they are serious minded; that they are orthodox, and in good and regular standing. Mr. Szigeti is known in Europe as a man deeply interested in modern and ultra-modern compositions for the violin, yet he chose Beethoven's concerto for his first appearance here. This concerto, containing noble and beautiful thoughts, also contains much that is tiresome. The first movement is long winded, interminable. The finale, with its hiccupy chief theme narrowly escapes vulgarity. Some day a violinist will have the courage to play "Gems from Beethoven's Violin Concerto."

Mr. Szigeti is an accomplished technician blessed with impeccably pure intonation and fine musical taste, yet violists, inferior to him in certain respects, have made a deeper impression. It was yesterday as if the performance was in miniature; as if it took place behind half-closed doors of glass. The beautiful accompaniment should not be passed over silently. At times one forgot the violinist in listening to the orchestra led with such pronounced feeling and virtuose skill by Mr. Koussevitzky.

Highly enjoyable was the performance of old Bach's concerto in spite of his inability to stop in the Andante when he had said what he had spontaneously to say. The playing of Messrs. Burgin, Laurent, Gillet and Mager was as brilliant as it was musical. The repetition of "Pines of Rome" dismissed the audience in the best of humors. The nightingale was this time in fairly good voice; the march on the Appian Way was again exciting; the most imaginative music, the most poetical is in "The Pines near a Catacomb." The work as a whole is conspicuous for its inciting rhythms and daring orchestral coloring rather than for its strictly musical thoughts.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week is as follows: Delmas, overture to "Penthesilee"; Pierne, "Franciscan Landscapes"; Spelman, "Assis: The Great Pardon of St. Francis," Tchaikovsky, symphony No. 4, F minor.

Globe Mar 20

SZIGETI HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Hungarian Violinist in Boston Debut

Joseph Szigeti, noted Hungarian violinist, made his Boston debut at yesterday's Symphony concert in the Beethoven concerto. An artist in the best sense of the term, he played with the utmost skill and taste. It would be hard to find a better violinist than he.

Mr Koussevitzky's program included a repetition of Respighi's "Pines of Rome," some inconsequential ballet music from Roussel's "Padmavati," and an arrangement of Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto" in F major. The four solo parts in the last named number were taken by Richard Burgin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe, and Georges Mager, trumpet.

Mr Szigeti's artistic and unobtrusive violin playing is an agreeable change from that of many of his contemporaries trained in the Russian manner recently in vogue. Szigeti's tone is not big; but then, it is not coarse either. Szigeti does not make verve and elan supplant subtlety.

Szigeti does not pose as a "personality" with a unique platform manner. He has apparently not succumbed to the wiles of the American press agent, who for a consideration will land you on the front page of our newspapers if he can invent a new trick, by which to evade the editorial censor.

But it is still possible for a really great artist to win a public in America without a publicity campaign. Szigeti, if he goes on playing here as well as he did yesterday will before long have an assured personal following in Boston.

The best praise one can give his version of the Beethoven concerto is that it did not rouse regretful comparisons with any of the other great violinists heard here in this music. Nobody has ever played the slow movement more beautifully than Szigeti did, that is unless dead and gone violinists notably excelled Kreisler and Heifetz in it, with whose performances Szigeti's was fairly comparable. And finally Szigeti made of the cadenzas interesting music which seemed an integral part of the concerto, something no mere virtuoso fiddler could ever achieve.

Mr Koussevitzky did not give a satisfactory reading of the first movement of the concerto, to which the clew is in the repeated notes for kettle drum, which some say indicate the belated wayfarer knocking at a door and making a racket out of which Beethoven's imagination evolved this music. There should be more energy than he and the players put into the music, though it should not make any more noise. One thing Mr Koussevitzky needs at times to recall is that volume of sound and intensity of emotional energy are quite different things. He knows this in slow movements, but forgets it in allegros and finales. The beautiful playing of the orchestral part of the slow movement in this concerto must, however, be in large part credited to Mr Koussevitzky's perception of this truth.

The fragments from Roussel's ballet-opera, a unique hybrid entertainment called "Padmavati," and still in the repertory of the Paris Opera three seasons after its first production, were new to Boston. A prelude, a warrior dance, a dance of slave women, all brief and all workaday routine music in present-day style, Paris mode, left no vivid impression.

One questions the wisdom of brief operatic excerpts at these concerts. Dr Muck never gave any operatic fragment at the regular concerts, and the example seems a good one. Little bits of an opera or a ballet cannot make their effect in the concert hall, torn from their musical context and deprived of their scenic adjuncts.

The Bach concerto, in a modern arrangement which the program did not identify, afforded four of the leading solo players in the orchestra ample opportunities to display notable talents. Mr Mager's impossibly high notes on the trumpet, which cannot have been written for the trumpets in our orchestras, were a triumph of virtuosity, but not especially agreeable to the ear, though true in pitch and quality. But the beautiful flowing and interweaving strands of polyphony eluded Mr Koussevitzky's or the arranger's imaginative grasp.

Respighi's "Pines of Rome" was more brilliantly and more accurately played than on the occasion of its first performance. Again the audience liked it very much. Again one felt it to be nothing but facile, well written, theatrical music, not likely to last more than a few years, but immensely effective in its best selling way. The final triumphal march is almost as good as Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever." This is to pay it a very high compliment, by the way, since only musical snobs fail to perceive the true greatness of Sousa's talent.

The radio audience will probably hear the Beethoven fairly well, and may make something of the Respighi. Bach and Roussel, for different reasons, do not seem well ad[illegible] to broadc[illegible] Mr Szigeti's [illegible]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

202

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM

LEADERS IN MUSIC SERVE AT FUNERAL OF FRANZ KNEISEL

Members and Former Members of Boston Symphony Play Requiem Selections.

BOSTON, March 30.—(AP) Fu
eral services for Franz Kneisel, co
cert master of the Boston Sympho
orchestra from 1885 to 1903, a director of the Kneisel string qua tet during the 32 years of its exis ence, were held today at the Fore
Hills cemetery. The ceremonies f
lowed similar services for the no
violinist held in New York yest
day. Rev. Paul Revere Frothi
ham, D. D., officiated at the se
ices in the chapel.

Honorary pallbearers inclu
Joseph Adamowsky, a former f
violin in the Boston Symphony
chestra; G. W. Chadwick, presi
of the New England Conserva
of Music; Frederick P. Cabot, I
ident of the Boston Symphony
chestra Board of Trustees,
Charles A. Ellis, manager of
Boston Symphony orchestra
Kneisel was concert master.

A chorale by Bach and a
of a chorus from Brahm's Req
on the organ, and the Largo
Haydn's quartet in D major, by string quartet composed of membe
and former members of the Bost Symphony, comprised music at t
services.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

FRANZ KNEISEL BURIED.

Second Funeral Service Held in the Chapel of a Boston Cemetery.

BOSTON, March 30 (AP).—Funeral services for Franz Kneisel, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1885 to 1903 and director of the Kneisel String Quartet during the thirty-two years of its existence, were held today in the chapel of Forest Hills Cemetery. Burial in the family plot followed. The ceremonies followed similar services for the noted violinist held in New York yesterday. The Rev. Dr. Paul Revere Frothingham officiated.

Honorary pallbearers included Joseph Adamowsky, a former first violin in the Boston Symphony Orchestra; G. W. Chadwick, President of the New England Conservatory of Music; Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Board of Trustees, and Charles A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra when Kneisel was concert master.

A chorale by Bach and part of a chorus from Brahms's "Requiem" on the organ and the "Largo" from Haydn's quartet in D-major by a string quartet composed of members and former members of the Boston Symphony comprised the music.

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Globe 3/18/26

Children Like Especially the Nutcracker Suite

Symphony Hall was nearly filled yesterday afternoon for the first of two young people's symphony concerts by excited young people, restless young people, some of them so young that their appreciation of the music had to be expressed by conducting orchestras of their own between the seats, imitating Mr Press behind his back

Fortissimi and the strongly-marked rhythms naturally held their attention most easily; little feet tramped out the beat, annoying hugely some of their elders—and for a young people's concert there were many oldsters present.

The children were politely appreciative of Wagner, but they forced a repetition of Beethoven's Turkish March—and did their applausive best to get some of the Nutcracker Suite played over for them.

The program was immensely well chosen, for there was good solid classicism for young teeth to set into; there was the exciting overture to the "Flying Dutchman" to stir young blood, and as a final number there was perhaps the jazziest of all Liszt's rhapsodies—No. 14, in F major.

The Mozart number was composed of the best known of all his minuets, and the allegro and ticklesome finale from the same symphony. Then came the beautiful, melodic violin song of Noah's dove, wheeling about on the face of the troubled waters—the prelude to "The Deluge" of Saint-Saens. It was beautifully played, and its lovely melody held the children as if breathless; one little girl clung to the sleeve of her grown-up companion, and at the end turned a solemn face up and sighed. It had obviously been almost too much for her.

The "Nutcracker Suite" seemed written for children; they loved the little overture, and they broke into the most furious applause of the afternoon at the ending of the rich waltz number.

After the concert, it being Evacuation Day, the audience sang "The Star Spangled Banner." The program will be repeated this afternoon at 4.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND BEETHOVEN

Post 3/18/26

Compel Symphony to Repeat His 'Turkish March'

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Although he bears no such title, Michael Press seems virtually to have become the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, so often this season has this Russian violinist and conductor fitted into Mr. Koussevitzky's shoes. Already, Mr. Press has led the orchestra through a pair of regular subscription concerts, a concert in Cambridge and a brace of Young People's concerts, and this week he is again conducting two concerts for listeners of tender years, of which one befell at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and the other takes place there today.

Always, at these Young People's concerts, it is interesting to note which pieces seem especially to please. Yesterday, the hit of the afternoon was plainly the Turkish March from Beethoven's music for "The Ruins of Athens," now-a-days more frequently heard in Rubinstein's brilliant piano-transcription than in its original form. Listening to it yesterday, one wondered why this march does not more often find its way to a "Pop" programme, for it makes a most cheerful din. So much did it please on this occasion that Mr. Press repeated it—even though Mr. Piller, who had come to the stage especially to play the contra-bassoon part, had taken his departure, thinking that his particular task.

---

sensuous dance music, at times overladen with the still more barbaric theme of Mongol invaders sweeping down the plains of India.

"The Pines of Rome," given for the second time this season, once more found Mr. Koussevitzky on his mettle. Its first movement again set forth children playing in the Italian sun, its second descended to more sombre measures, its third introduced the far-famed phonographic nightingale, and the last came to a crashing close with the vision of Caesar and his legions marching through the mist, bugles

---

Herald Mar
MAR. 20

SYMPHONY IN 19TH CONCERT

Bach, Beethoven, Roussel and Respighi Works Presented

By PHILIP HALE

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Bach, Concerto No. 2, F major for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet (edited by Felix Mottl.) Beethoven, violin concerto, Roussel, First Suite from the opera-ballet "Padmavati," Respighi, "Pines of Rome" (repeated by request). The performance of Roussel's Suite was probably the first in this country. Joseph Szigeti, the solo violinist, played for the first time in Boston.

Roussel, sailing to the east as an officer in the French navy, re-visiting eastern countries, has been inspired, if "inspired" can be said of his music, by oriental memories. The subject of his opera-ballet, "Padmavati" is a Hindu romance, which admits of wild, tragic action and gorgeous color. The chief motif of the opera is the willingness of a Hindu King to hand over his beautiful and virtuous wife to a Mongolian besieger, in order to save his city from loot and massacre. She stabs her husband that in accordance with the old suttle custom the two may ascend triumphantly to the heaven of India. The librettist, M. Laloy, a well equipped writer about music, has shown a passionate interest in eastern countries and written a treatise on Chinese music. Concerning the merits of the opera, whether Roussel was successful in the carrying out of his theories of dramatic works with music, we can naturally say nothing. Is it fair to judge of stage music played in the concert hall? Is it reasonable to expect from any concert-goer an enlightened judgment?

In nine cases out of ten such music suffers injury when it is taken from the theatre, no matter how excellent the performance may be. Is this Suite an exception?

The Suite consists of the Prelude to Act I; a Dance of Warriors; a Dance of Female Slaves. The Prelude might pass as absolute music, yet in the theatre it must be more effective as suggesting the drama to come. In the concert hall the music is rather mysterious, having a foreboding Chiet theme with repetitions in the manner dear to Orientals. Knowing the story of the opera, one might find in this Prelude the tragic note, but one misses the sensuousness, the sensuality of the eastern drama. Goldmark was more successful in his prelude to "The Queen of Sheba," and even in his well-worn "Sakuntala." There is orientalism in music; there is pseudo-orientalism, which to westerners is often more convincing than the genuine article. Johannes Weber, in his sour way, denied the genuineness of national or local color in music. He went too far, but a hearer gladly finds in music what he expects, what he wishes, to find when he is told that the inspiring, the suggesting subject is exotic.
appropriate barbaric wildness, but these warriors might as well be Scythians, Assyrians, as Mongolians or Hindus. In the Dance of the Female Slaves one misses the languor, the voluptuousness of the East; one misses even the intoxicating monotony that one is accustomed to associate with Oriental dancing.

We write without knowledge of the scenes in which these dances occur. It may be that Laloy's female slaves are not voluptuous and enticing; that they disdain fleshly allurements. It may be that these warriors are not terrible fellows after all.

The idiom of Roussel's music in general is still a puzzle to us. It has a certain dry austerity, a forbidding aloofness. He works patiently in his tower, but the tower is of iron or brass, not of silver, not of ivory. A musician to be respected; a man of high ideals. What would one not give for a moment of coarseness, even of lush sentiment to persuade the hearer that the composer was emotional as well as brainy!

Violinists visiting Boston for the first time feel compelled to play the concerto by Beethoven or the one by Brahms to show that they are serious minded; that they are orthodox, and in good and regular standing. Mr. Szigeti is known in Europe as a man deeply interested in modern and ultra-modern compositions for the violin, yet he chose Beethoven's concerto for his first appearance here. This concerto, containing noble and beautiful thoughts, also contains much that is tiresome. The first movement is long winded, interminable. The finale, with its hiccupy chief theme narrowly escapes vulgarity. Some day a violinist will have the courage to play "Gems from Beethoven's Violin Concerto."

Mr. Szigeti is an accomplished technician blessed with impeccably pure intonation and fine musical taste, yet violists, inferior to him in certain respects, have made a deeper impression. It was yesterday as if the performance was in miniature; as if it took place behind half-closed doors of glass. The beautiful accompaniment should not be passed over silently. At times one forgot the violinist in listening to the orchestra led with such pronounced feeling and virtuose skill by Mr. Koussevitzky.

Highly enjoyable was the performance of old Bach's concerto in spite of his inability to stop in the Andante when he had said what he had spontaneously to say. The playing of Messrs. Burgin, Laurent, Gillet and Mager was as brilliant as it was musical. The repetition of "Pines of Rome" dismissed the audience in the best of humors. The nightingale was this time in fairly good voice; the march on the Appian Way was again exciting; the most imaginative music, the most poetical is in "The Pines near a Catacomb." The work as a whole is conspicuous for its inciting rhythms and daring orchestral coloring rather than for its strictly musical thoughts.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week is as follows: Delmas, overture to "Penthesilee"; Pierne, "Franciscan Landscapes"; Spelman, "Assis: The Great Pardon of St. Francis," Tchaikovsky, symphony No. 4, F minor.

Globe Mar 20

SZIGETI HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Hungarian Violinist in Boston Debut

Joseph Szigeti, noted Hungarian violinist, made his Boston debut at yesterday's Symphony concert in the Beethoven concerto. An artist in the best sense of the term, he played with the utmost skill and taste. It would be hard to find a better violinist than he.

Mr Koussevitzky's program included a repetition of Respighi's "Pines of Rome," some inconsequential ballet music from Roussel's "Padmavati," and an arrangement of Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto" in F major. The four solo parts in the last named number were taken by Richard Burgin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe, and Georges Mager, trumpet.

Mr Szigeti's artistic and unobtrusive violin playing is an agreeable change from that of many of his contemporaries trained in the Russian manner recently in vogue. Szigeti's tone is not big; but then, it is not coarse either. Szigeti does not make verve and elan supplant subtlety.

Szigeti does not pose as a "personality" with a unique platform manner. He has apparently not succumbed to the wiles of the American press agent, who for a consideration will land you on the front page of our newspapers if he can invent a new trick, by which to evade the editorial censor.

But it is still possible for a really great artist to win a public in America without a publicity campaign. Szigeti, if he goes on playing here as well as he did yesterday will before long have an assured personal following in Boston.

The best praise one can give his version of the Beethoven concerto is that it did not rouse regretful comparisons with any of the other great violinists heard here in this music. Nobody has ever played the slow movement more beautifully than Szigeti did, that is unless dead and gone violinists notably excelled Kreisler and Heifetz in it, with whose performances Szigeti's was fairly comparable. And finally Szigeti made of the cadenzas interesting music which seemed an integral part of the concerto, something no mere virtuoso fiddler could ever achieve.

Mr Koussevitzky did not give a satisfactory reading of the first movement of the concerto, to which the clew is in the repeated notes for kettle drum, which some say indicate the belated wayfarer knocking at a door and making a racket out of which Beethoven's imagination evolved this music. There should be more energy than he and the players put into the music, though it should not make any more noise. One thing Mr Koussevitzky needs at times to recall is that volume of sound and intensity of emotional energy are quite different things. He knows this in slow movements, but forgets it in allegros and finales. The beautiful playing of the orchestral part of the slow movement in this concerto must, however, be in large part credited to Mr Koussevitzky's perception of this truth.

The fragments from Roussel's ballet-opera, a unique hybrid entertainment called "Padmavati," and still in the repertory of the Paris Opera three seasons after its first production, were new to Boston. A prelude, a warrior dance, a dance of slave women, all brief and all workaday routine music in present-day style, Paris mode, left no vivid impression.

One questions the wisdom of brief operatic excerpts at these concerts. Dr Muck never gave any operatic fragment at the regular concerts, and the example seems a good one. Little bits of an opera or a ballet cannot make their effect in the concert hall, torn from their musical context and deprived of their scenic adjuncts.

The Bach concerto, in a modern arrangement which the program did not identify, afforded four of the leading solo players in the orchestra ample opportunities to display notable talents. Mr Mager's impossibly high notes on the trumpet, which cannot have been written for the trumpets in our orchestras, were a triumph of virtuosity, but not especially agreeable to the ear, though true in pitch and quality. But the beautiful flowing and interweaving strands of polyphony eluded Mr Koussevitzky's or the arranger's imaginative grasp.

Respighi's "Pines of Rome" was more brilliantly and more accurately played than on the occasion of its first performance. Again the audience liked it very much. Again one felt it to be nothing but facile, well written, theatrical music, not likely to last more than a few years, but immensely effective in its best selling way. The final triumphal march is almost as good as Sousa' "Stars and Stripes Forever." This is to pay it a very high compliment, by the way, since only musical snobs fail to perceive the true greatness of Sousa's talent.

The radio audience will probably hear the Beethoven fairly well, and may make something of the Respighi. Bach and Roussel, for different reasons, do not seem well ad[illegible] to broadca[illegible] Mr Szigeti's [illegible]

Suppose you're twenty rs old. Start putting $5 a k in the bank right now. You do it. If you can't do it on ur present salary you can get job paying you more. Those s exist. If you want one of m badly enough, you'll try so rd to get it that you'll succeed.
ving $5 a week, you'll have $13,- when you're seventy—exclu-e of interest. Now if you want eal surprise, figure up the in-est.

How to Keep Well

By Dr. W. A. EVANS

BRONCHITIS

Mrs. E. J. writes:

1. Is there such a thing as bronchitis?

2. If so, what are the symptoms and is there danger of its going into tuberculosis?

REPLY

1. Of course there is.

Bronchitis is an inflammation of the bronchial tubes. This infection is generally due to air borne bacteria. The bronchi are the air tubes. They are warm and moist and they communicate directly with the outside air. The lining of these tubes is epithelium of an easily affected variety. Why should there not be frequent infections? The wonder is that infection does not occur more frequently. Pneumococci, streptococci and other inflammation producers are widely spread. When the air starts for the bronchial tubes it often contains some of these germs. The nose takes some of them out; the throat removes others. The lining cells of the larger tubes remove others. But enough get to the medium sized tubes to cause infection unless cells there have learned

Boston Post

SYMPHONY RESPONDS TO APPEAL

'Pines of Rome' Holds Own on Being Repeated

Post Mar 20

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In deference to many requests Mr. Koussevitzky is repeating at the Symphony concerts of this week Respighi's "Pines of Rome," the outstanding orchestral novelty of the present season. And yesterday the mighty march of Roman legions, yet more brilliant and sonorous than before, again swept all before it, and in response to the applause Mr. Koussevitzky once more brought the deserving players to their feet.

DICKEY BIRD SHIFTED

Heard already on a Monday evening as well as at a previous pair of regular subscription concerts, Respighi's music wears well. Not only is the Italian here a consummate master of orchestral effects, the very substance of his music is likewise persuasive and arresting. Although he knows and employs with discreet effectiveness the latest harmonic devices, Respighi does not wholly disdain musical beauty in the generally accepted sense of that term. There is ravishing loveliness in the Nocturnal third division of his tone-poem mayhap, and at some later day a conductor will happily see fit to strike out that superfluous and intrusive dickey-bird, recte nightingale.

Yesterday, by the way, the phonograph that is voice to these twitterings was transferred to the left side of the stage and the manipulation of it assigned to one of the double-bass players.

New Soloist and Music

For the rest this concert offered the first Boston appearance of the distinguished Hungarian violinist, Josef

---

SYMPHONY GIVES NOTABLE PROGRAM

Herald

Beethoven, Franck and Wagner Finely Interpreted

Mar 23

For the fourth Symphony concert of the Monday series Mr. Koussevitzky put forward a program most ingenious. At a Symphony concert, a symphony is always in place. A little gay music never fails to please. Many people still like a classic. So what more suitable than Beethoven's eighth symphony, to serve, and in short space of time, three purposes at once? It was pleasant, too, to let it lead the way; the few latecomers did it no damage. This music, indeed, is not easily damaged. What modern composer has made lovelier play with color than Beethoven in the minuet? And the allegretto last night, as Mr. Koussevitzky played it, is not likely to fade soon from the memory.

After this lively symphony, since custom—praise be—decrees a soloist at the Monday concerts, Mr. Koussevitzky placed Cesar Franck's symphonic variations, with Ferdinand Motte-Lacroix to play the piano part. He must be partial to them; they were performed at a Monday concert less than a year ago, or it may be he wished us to hear how they really should sound. In any case, Mr. Motte-Lacroix, notwithstanding a frequent hardness of tone, not only brought forward all the charm in which they abounded last year, but also he felt their curious Franckian quality so deeply that he raised these variations almost to the level of the sonata and the quintet. The brilliant measures of the close he played with relish. In the quieter episodes Mr. Koussevitzky showed a sympathy with Franck's individual turn of mind, quite equal to Mr. Motte-Lacroix's. The balance of tone between piano and orchestra was exquisite.

After Beethoven's high spirits and Cesar Franck's lofty spirituality—not to forget the latter's amazing plunge into riotous rhythm!—it was time for music of compelling emotion. Nothing could have answered better than the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde." And to close the concert Mr. Koussevitzky made an admirable choice in the second suite from Ravel's ballet "Daphnis et Chloe," music easy to listen to late in the evening, or music one could afford to lose without too much sadness if one felt it time to go home. The program surely could not have been bettered. Applause was very hearty.

The last Monday concert will be given April 19. R. R. G.

SYMPHONY IN FOURTH OF EXTRAS

Post Mar. 23

Beethoven, Wagner, Ravel and Franck on List

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Surely the subscribers to the Monday evening Symphony concerts have no reason nowadays to complain of their lot. In the matter of pieces they are apt to receive the pick of the season, and they are likely, too, to hear performances more finished and more eloquent than those of the regular subscription concerts.

BEETHOVEN'S EIGHTH

Last evening in the fourth concer of this supplementary series, Mr. Koussevitzky led the orchestra througl Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, th Prelude and "Love-Death" from Wagner's Tristan and the brilliant an sonorous Second Suite from Ravel' "Daphnis and Chloe," while for semi novelty Ferdinand Motte-Lacroix o the New England Conservatory playe the piano-part in a performance o Franck's Symphonic Variations. Tw weeks ago last Friday, Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the Eighth Symphon for the first time here. Since the there have been performances in othe cities, with the result that his remarkably persuasive version of the music is now more definitely shaped more sharply defined than before.

The Eighth is a jolly symphony, an Mr. Koussevitzky stresses its jollity In the first movement and in the las he gives us Homeric laughter, and i the other two lurk many a whimsica smile. Never does Mr. Koussevitzk let the symphony lapse into easy-g ing routine, and if he lays unlooke for emphasis upon certain details generally slighted or ignored, even to disturbing here and there the rhythm progress of the music, he does thereby enhance and increase the symphony's power to arrest and hold th hearer's interest.

Last evening, both in the symphon and in the fragments from "Tristan, Mr. Koussevitzky led an orchestr wholly subservient to his will, responsive to his emotion. Prelude and "Love Death" rose and fell in molten beauty And if Mr. Koussevitzky's pace at th beginning of the former piece seeme over-slow, the reason for this holding back was made apparent in the unleashed passion of the climax, becom doubly exciting through this very contrast.

Making his first appearance at Symphony Concert here, Mr. Mott Lacroix gave last evening a sympathetic and discerning performance a piano-part not displayful in the manner of the average concerted piec but rather a strand in the symphon web. And conductor and pianist, seemingly working in complete accord accomplished a plastic and beautiful ensemble.

ONDAY CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Globe Mar 23

otte-Lacroix Pleases in Music by Cesar Franck

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr oussevitzky conducting, gave the urth concert of the current Monday vening series last evening in Sym- hony Hall. The program was a curious elange containing Beethoven's Eighth ymphony, the Cesar Franck Sympho- ic variations played by the capable erdinand Motte-Lacroix, the Prelude d "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" and Ravel's Second Suite from "Daphnis et Chloe."

Of these pieces the only one not played this season in the regular series was the "Symphonic Variations." This music, written in 1885 has a peculiarly modern feeling, largely due to its syncopation in the brilliant finale, a syncopation closely akin to that of modern jazz, which has now become so respectable.

It still sounds fresh and interesting. While not perhaps of the very best of Franck, it is far better than many concertos that are played. Mr Motte-Lacroix played it intelligently, with carefully shaded embroidery at the proper places, with considerable sonority in the more stormy passages. The orchestra lagged not a bit behind.

But it remained for the second half of the program for Mr Koussevitzky to strike gold. His Wagner is not always remarkable for its felicity. In recent memory he made no great thing of the Prelude and the "Love-Death." But last evening was another story. Superb is the one satisfactory adjective to apply to his reading.

This music, which at any time is highly emotional, may once and again when conductor, orchestra and audience are in tune run so high in the emotional scale as to become almost oppressive. With the greatest art Mr Koussevitzky stayed just the right side of that unpleasantness and yet gave pent up feelings full course. Not in his recent performance in New York did the great Toscanini so attain. The wiser took their departure after this music.

Others there were who remained, once again to marvel at the dexterity, to admire the exquisitely designed mechanism of Ravel. Prior to this there had been Beethoven with Mr Koussevitzky's faults to the fore. There was a first movement over-dramatized, flung forth in deafening sonority, and a last movement that at the conductor's behest demanded more even than the virtuosity of this orchestra could render. But all this is forgotten in the glory of last evening's Wagner.

TURDAY, MARCH 27, 192

SYMPHONY GIVES 20TH CONCERT

Conductor Koussevitzky and Orchestra Equally Inspired

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Sym- hony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, onductor, took place yesterday af- rnoon in Symphony hall. The pro- ram was as follows: Delmas, over- ure to "Penthesilee" (first time in the United States); Spelman, "Assisi: the Great Pardon of St. Francis" (first performance); Ravel, "Mother Goose", Tchaikovsky, Symphony No 4, F minor.

Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra followed an exquisitely poetic performance of Ravel's suite by playing Tchaikovsky's Symphony as it never has been played here; a reading that was indescribably emotional, dramatic, overpowering; but let us first speak of the two unfamiliar compositions.

Marc Delmas, born in 1885, was awarded at the Paris Conservatory the prix de Rome in 1919. He has written several orchestral pieces and much for the stage. It has been said of him: "He is the typical musician-laureate." Is this a compliment or a sneer?

For Alfred Mortier's tragedy "Penthesilee," produced at the Odeon, Paris, in 1922, he wrote the overture and incidental music. We are concerned now with the overture, not with the dramatist's version of the old legend, yet this overture may be supposed to pre-figure the salient events of the play—the prowess of the Amazon in battle, her love for Achilles whom she overthrew, and her tragic end; as Massenet succeeded in his overture to Racine's "Phedre."

Delmas's overture is frankly theatrical, theatre music, rather than of an imaginatively symphonic nature. He mistook bombast for wild passion, noise for impressive sonority. The section based on the "love theme" has superficial sentiment rather than amorous intensity. His orchestration is for the most part thick, not varied in color. This is surprising, for the French composers of the later years seem to be born with a modern treatise on instrumentation in their hand; in fact their skill in orchestration is more conspicuous than their musical ideas.

Mr. Spelman's "Assisi" is the last movement of a suite entitled "Saints's Days." It is preceded by "Sorrento: the Feast of St. Anthony"; "Venice, the Festival of the Redeemer"; "Siena, the Palio." It is possible that "Assisi" would gain in effect if it were heard in conjunction with the other movements, yet it is not difficult to understand the composer's intentions: music suggested, as he says in his modest note, by the religious festival, without the following of a detailed program. Hence the solemn march-like tempo; the ecclesiastical flavor of many passages; above all a certain mysticism that is not vague, not too insistent, but is contemplative and uplifting.fl Now that Mr. Spelman has heard "Assisi" he may find that some ntrapuntal pages are so or- that the walk of the differ- is not clearly defined; that involved measures which, show technical ingenunity, by greater instrumental When all is said, "Assisi" to his scholarship and to rpose. We are far from the essional music of the theat- led, of which, that for the n "The Jewels of the Ma- probably the most shocking Mr. Koussevitzky had pre- two unfamiliar pieces with ry care; in the performance his customary enthusiasm. was called to the plat- he audience evidently liked ways Tchaikovsky's fourth more characteristic, more his fifth or his sixth. He rpraised; it is the fashion in quarters to undervalue ll remains one of the few in the musical world of lf of the 19th century. Let isms" be granted. What m Handel down the years mannerisms? Certainly not thoven, Schubert, Weber, hms, Franck, Debussy. iven to every conductor to aikovsky's music with un- and sympathy. His music e rigidly academic; not for us crossers of "t's" and 's." The conductor must lf-torturing Russian more y. He must not soften his ions, his stormy cries. He nificance in the repetitions priggish objectors; in the rases from one group of to another. A conductor kid gloves for the conduct- ikovsky's music is lost. the ideal conductor with mphony on the desk must stra like the Boston Sym-

---

NEW MUSIC HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Delmas and Spelman Pieces for First Time Here

Globe Mar 27

The program of yesterday's Symphony concert began with the first performance in America of the overture to "Penthesilee," by Marc Delmas. The second number was "Assisi: The Great Pardon of St Francis," by Timothy Mather Spelman, played yesterday for the first time in public. Ravel's "Mother Goose," and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony were the other numbers.

Mr Koussevitzky has made several changes since the original announcement, as has often been his way with programs, to the inconvenience of the not inconsiderable portion of his audience which makes an effort to study the music to be heard in advance of each concert.

Delmas, born in 1885 and resident in Paris, has a number of orchestral and other works to his credit, none of which have been performed in Boston or apparently in America. He was awarded the Prix de Rome in 1919 and has won several other French prizes. "Penthesilee," the overture to which was played yesterday, is described in the program books as an "heroic drama in verse" by Alfred Mortier, produced at the Odeon in Paris in 1922. There is incidental music by Delmas.

This overture, in a monotonously loud and seemingly rather muddled performance, left one with the general impression that here was a minor Massenet trying to write like a 20th century Wagner. There is a sonorous and dissonant preamble, mostly brass, followed by several episodes intended to be lyric and heroic by turns. In the theatre such music may be effective. But it seemed dull and tasteless yesterday, conventionally written and muddily scored by a man fulfilling a commission rather than writing from the heart.

Composer Present

Timothy Mather Spelman, Harvard 1913, now living in New York, was present and very warmly applauded at the close of the first public performance of his "Assisi," which is the fourth of a set of four tone poems called "Saints' Days," written at Florence in 1923-25, and lately published in London.

Mr Spelman cannot be accused of musical radicalism. His tone poem was suggested by the "Great Pardon of St Francis," but, as he says, "is in no sense strictly programmistic."

The structure is as simple as the old-fashioned minuet and trio. The first and chief theme is a rather conventional rhythmic figure in 5-4 time repeated rather than developed. The second theme is an inconsequential series of notes for flute with celesta accompaniment, gradually reinforced by other instruments and leading up to "the main theme played fortissimo by the violins, and all the horns, forissimo, accompanied by the full orchestra." The work as will be obvious ends in what the composer's analysis calls "a mood of glorification."

One felt that Mr Spelman's carefully and correctly written and capably scored tone poem was creditable to his technical skill. But the utmost one can honestly say in its favor is that if he would chop it in half and rewrite it for piano solo it would be a not ineffective salon piece.

It is possible of course that Mr Koussevitzky, who was yesterday not in the vein until Tschaikowsky's symphony was reached, did not do full justice to Mr Spelman's music. And it is obviously true that such comment as this represents only the casual impression of one listener. But the reviewer can in common honesty do no more and no less than to record exactly what his impression of a new piece was.

Familiar Symphony

Tschaikowsky's familiar symphony stirred Mr Koussevitzky's emotions and through him the orchestra and the audience. Much of it is now outmoded. Much of it was never the honest expression of an honest emotion, but an attack of hysteria set to music. But its emotional power in a vivid, free reading like Mr Koussevitzky's is not inconsiderable. The andantino and the famous pizzicato scherzo again seemed the most artistic portions of the work.

There is in the whole not a little of the Russian local color of which the Russian Nationalists are popularly supposed to have the monopoly. Let those who despise Tschaikowsky only to exalt Rimsky, compare the motto theme of this symphony and the theme in "Coq d'or" when the golden cockerel gives its warning, consider the Russian folk songs in the andantino and finale and then point out wherein the superior "originality" and "nationalism" of Rimsky consists. Note also in Tschaikowsky's favor the quasi-Oriental passage work in minor keys for wind instruments in the first movement.

The radio audience will almost certainly find the pizzicato scherzo in Tschaikowsky's symphony the most enjoyable number on this week's program. The rest of the symphony will probably come through well. Ravel's "Mother Goose," in a curiously dull and colorless performance, did not make its effect yesterday, and as the above comment on them sufficiently shows, not much is to be expected from the new pieces. P. R.

SYMPHONY REVELS IN VIRTUOSITY

Plays Tchaikovsky's Fourth as Never Before in Boston

Mar 27

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To recall the Symphony concerts since the coming of Mr. Koussevitzky is, for many, to think first of his conducting of the music of his fellow countrymen, and this is no disparagement of his remarkable achievements with the music of other lands. And to the list of notable performances of Russian music may now be added that of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony at the concert of yesterday afternoon.

ITS VITALITY RESTORED

For sustained musical interest and as a well-rounded, evenly proportioned work of art, Tchaikovsky's Fourth may not compare favorably with the two that came after it. Yet it is unquestionably more typically Russian and perhaps also more truly personal. Certainly it is far less polished and polite. In it there speaks the Tchaikovsky who was emotionally a child of nature, a man whose feelings were of primitive intensity and strength.

To soften and refine this Symphony, as some conductors have done, to subdue it to a decorum seemly for the concert-room, is to devitalize it, to rob it of its most characteristic quality. From such error, needless to say, Mr. Koussevitzky refrained. On the contrary, he laid on and spared not. In the first movement the music sobbed and shrieked, alternately flamed or languished.

The pervading theme of Fate, so different from the corresponding motive in Tchaikovsky's succeeding symphony, sounded the note, not only of awe, but of terror. In headlong rush went the Finale, Mr. Koussevitzky's baton flashing in air like a sword of battle, the orchestra accomplishing marvels of virtuosity, tossing off Tchaikovsky's sixteenths as though they were child's play, outwardly in a very delirium of emotion yet actually in hair-trigger response to the conductor's will.

Contrasted more than ever sharply to the passion of the first movement and the excitements of the last, the melancholy Andantino and the Scherzo of plucked strings and isolated wind-choir each came and went yesterday in beautifully finished performance, while throughout the Symphony there was an elasticity remarkable even for this orchestra's present prowess. Hardly had the last chord ceased to sound before the audience sought release in frantic applause that continued unabated until Mr. Koussevitzky, on his third return to the stage, brought the players to their feet.

New Record for Applause

Already, for the matter of that, at the close of Ravel's charming "Mother Goose" had such acknowledgment been made. And the applause that greeted the first performance anywhere of Timothy Mather Spelman's tone-poem, "Assisi: the Great Pardon of St. Francis," and that lasted while the composer bowed twice from his seat and then came thrice to the front of the platform, helped to make this a record concert in the matter of clapping of hands.

Mr. Spelman, an American making his chief residence in Florence, has written in this, the fourth of a series of "Saints' Days," music of worth and interest in which the mood of religious festival is well sustained, and that prompts curiosity as to the nature and content of its three companions.

By way of introduction to a more than usually enjoyable concert Mr. Koussevitzky led the first American performance of Marc Delmas' Overture to Alfred Mortier's "Penthesilea," a well-made, well-sounding composition with an appropriate theatrical flavor and suggesting in its warlike introduction that this Parisian had not forgotten the "Gwendolyn" of Chabrier.

IEN

Play

t,

Bos

gave

Infan

attend

the pr

be co

Doub

his wa

ay tha

Rimsky

Boston Po

SYMPHONY RESPONDS TO APPEAL

'Pines of Rome' Holds Own on Being Repeated

Post Mar 20

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In deference to many requests Mr. Koussevitzky is repeating at the Symphony concerts of this week Respighi's "Pines of Rome," the outstanding orchestral novelty of the present season. And yesterday the mighty march of Roman legions, yet more brilliant and sonorous than before, again swept all before it, and in response to the applause Mr. Koussevitzky once more brought the deserving players to their feet.

DICKEY BIRD SHIFTED

Heard already on a Monday evening as well as at a previous pair of regular subscription concerts, Respighi's music wears well. Not only is the Italian here a consummate master of orchestral effects, the very substance of his music is likewise persuasive and arresting. Although he knows and employs with discreet effectiveness the latest harmonic devices, Respighi does not wholly disdain musical beauty in the generally accepted sense of that term. There is ravishing loveliness in the Nocturnal third division of his tone-poem mayhap, and at some later day a conductor will happily see fit to strike out that superfluous and intrusive dickey-bird, recte nightingale.

Yesterday, by the way, the phonograph that is voice to these twitterings was transferred to the left side of the stage and the manipulation of it assigned to one of the double-bass players.

New Soloist and Music

For the rest this concert offered the first Boston appearance of the distinguished Hungarian violinist, Josef Szigeti; the first performance here of the Suite from Roussel's opera-ballet, "Padmavati," music none too convincing when thus removed from its rightful environment; and by way of agreeable introduction Bach's Concerto in F major for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet.

A violinist closely identified with contemporary music, Mr. Szigeti, would have better pleased some of his hearers, had he chosen for his vehicle a fresher piece than the over-long and over-worked Concerto of Beethoven. But there was the compensation of his sensitive, fine-grained playing, his excellent rhythmic sense. And thanks alike to him and to Mr Koussevitsky, the beautiful Larghetto offered 10 minutes of rare delight.

Bach, Served Nobly

As for the other two movements, it would be a mercy to subject them to judicious curtailment—or better still, for a few seasons to omit the Concerto altogether from the repertory.

Bach, as well as Beethoven, in the instance of the Concerto played yesterday, was most successful in his middle movement. By the soloists, Messrs. Burgin, Laurent, Gillet and Mager, this Andante, and for that matter the rest of the Concerto, was nobly played, and at the end they were warmly applauded.

SYMPHONY IN FOURTH OF EXTRAS

Post Mar. 23

Beethoven, Wagner, Ravel and Franck on List

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Surely the subscribers to the Monday evening Symphony concerts have no reason nowadays to complain of their lot. In the matter of pieces they are apt to receive the pick of the season, and they are likely, too, to hear performances more finished and more eloquent than those of the regular subscription concerts.

BEETHOVEN'S EIGHTH

Last evening in the fourth concer of this supplementary series, Mr. Koussevitzky led the orchestra throug Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, th Prelude and "Love-Death" from Wagner's Tristan and the brilliant an sonorous Second Suite from Ravel' "Daphnis and Chloe," while for semi novelty Ferdinand Motte-Lacroix o the New England Conservatory playe the piano-part in a performance o Franck's Symphonic Variations. Tw weeks ago last Friday, Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the Eighth Symphon for the first time here. Since the there have been performances in othe cities, with the result that his remarkably persuasive version of the music is now more definitely shape more sharply defined than before.

The Eighth is a jolly symphony, an Mr. Koussevitzky stresses its jollity in the first movement and in the las he gives us Homeric laughter, and i the other two lurk many a whimsica smile. Never does Mr. Koussevitzk let the symphony lapse into easy-g ing routine, and if he lays unlooke for emphasis upon certain details ge erally slighted or ignored, even to di turbing here and there the rhythm progress of the music, he does ther by enhance and increase the symphony's power to arrest and hold th hearer's interest.

Last evening, both in the symphon and in the fragments from "Tristan, Mr. Koussevitzky led an orchestr wholly subservient to his will, responsive to his emotion. Prelude and "Love Death" rose and fell in molten beauty And if Mr. Koussevitzky's pace at th beginning of the former piece seeme over-slow, the reason for this holding back was made apparent in the un leashed passion of the climax, becom doubly exciting through this very contrast.

Making his first appearance at Symphony Concert here, Mr. Mott Lacroix gave last evening a sympathetic and discerning performance a piano-part not displayful in the manner of the average concerted piec but rather a strand in the symphon web. And conductor and pianist, seemingly working in complete accord a complished a plastic and beautiful ensemble.

TURDAY, MARCH 27, 192

SYMPHONY GIVES 20TH CONCERT

Conductor Koussevitzky and Orchestra Equally Inspired

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Sym- hony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, onductor, took place yesterday aft- rnoon in Symphony hall. The pro- am was as follows: Delmas, over- ure to "Penthesilee" (first time in the United States); Spelman, "Assisi: the Great Pardon of St. Francis" (first performance); Ravel, "Mother Goose", Tchaikovsky, Symphony No 4, F minor.

Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra followed an exquisitely poetic performance of Ravel's suite by playing Tchaikovsky's Symphony as it never has been played here; a reading that was indescribably emotional, dramatic, overpowering; but let us first speak of the two unfamiliar compositions.

Marc Delmas, born in 1885, was awarded at the Paris Conservatory the prix de Rome in 1919. He has written several orchestral pieces and much for the stage. It has been said of him: "He is the typical musician-laureate." Is this a compliment or a sneer?

For Alfred Mortier's tragedy "Penthesilee," produced at the Odeon, Paris, in 1922, he wrote the overture and incidental music. We are concerned now with the overture, not with the dramatist's version of the old legend, yet this overture may be supposed to pre-figure the salient events of the play—the prowess of the Amazon in battle, her love for Achilles whom she overthrew, and her tragic end; as Massenet succeeded in his overture to Racine's "Phedre."

Delmas's overture is frankly theatrical, theatre music, rather than of an imaginatively symphonic nature. He mistook bombast for wild passion, noise for impressive sonority. The section based on the "love theme" has superficial sentiment rather than amorous intensity. His orchestration is for the most part thick, not varied in color. This is surprising, for the French composers of the later years seem to be born with a modern treatise on instrumentation in their hand; in fact their skill in orchestration is more conspicuous than their musical ideas.

Mr. Spelman's "Assist" is the last movement of a suite entitled "Saints's Days." It is preceded by "Sorrento: the Feast of St. Anthony"; "Venice, the Festival of the Redeemer"; "Siena, the Palio." It is possible that "Assisi" would gain in effect if it were heard in conjunction with the other movements, yet it is not difficult to understand the composer's intentions: music suggested, as he says in his modest note, by the religious festival, without the following of a detailed program. Hence the solemn march-like tempo; the ecclesiastical flavor of many passages; above all a certain mysticism that is not vague, not too insistent, but is contemplative and uplifting. Now that Mr. Spelman has heard "Assisi" he may find that some of the contrapuntal pages are so orchestrated that the walk of the different parts is not clearly defined; that there are involved measures which, while they show technical ingenuity, might gain by greater instrumental simplicity. When all is said, "Assisi" is creditable to his scholarship and to his lofty purpose. We are far from the sacred processional music of the theatrically minded, of which, that for the procession in "The Jewels of the Madonna" is probably the most shocking example. Mr. Koussevitzky had prepared the two unfamiliar pieces with his customary care; in the performance he led with his customary enthusiasm. Mr. Spelman was called to the platform, for the audience evidently liked "Assisi."

In many ways Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony is more characteristic, more racial than his fifth or his sixth. He has been overpraised; it is the fashion now in certain quarters to undervalue him. He still remains one of the few great figures in the musical world of the latter half of the 19th century. Let his "mannerisms" be granted. What composer from Handel down the years is free from mannerisms? Certainly not Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Weber, Wagner, Brahms, Franck, Debussy.

It is not given to every conductor to conduct Tchaikovsky's music with understanding and sympathy. His music is not for the rigidly academic; not for the scrupulous crossers of "t's" and dotters of "i's." The conductor must meet this self-torturing Russian more than half-way. He must not soften his wild lamentations, his stormy cries. He must find significance in the repetitions that disturb priggish objectors; in the tossing of phrases from one group of instruments to another. A conductor that puts on kid gloves for the conducting of Tchaikovsky's music is lost. Furthermore, the ideal conductor with this fourth symphony on the desk must have an orchestra like the Boston Sym-

---

NEW MUSIC HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Delmas and Spelman Pieces for First Time Here

Globe Mar 27

The program of yesterday's Symphony concert began with the first performance in America of the overture to "Penthesilee," by Marc Delmas. The second number was "Assisi: The Great Pardon of St Francis," by Timothy Mather Spelman, played yesterday for the first time in public. Ravel's "Mother Goose," and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony were the other numbers.

Mr Koussevitzky has made several changes since the original announcement, as has often been his way with programs, to the inconvenience of the not inconsiderable portion of his audience which makes an effort to study the music to be heard in advance of each concert.

Delmas, born in 1885 and resident in Paris, has a number of orchestral and other works to his credit, none of which have been performed in Boston or apparently in America. He was awarded the Prix de Rome in 1919 and has won several other French prizes. "Penthesilee," the overture to which was played yesterday, is described in the program books as an "heroic drama in verse" by Alfred Mortier, produced at the Odeon in Paris in 1922. There is incidental music by Delmas.

This overture, in a monotonously loud and seemingly rather muddled performance, left one with the general impression that here was a minor Massenet trying to write like a 20th century Wagner. There is a sonorous and dissonant preamble, mostly brass, followed by several episodes intended to be lyric and heroic by turns. In the theatre such music may be effective. But it seemed dull and tasteless yesterday, conventionally written and muddily scored by a man fulfilling a commission rather than writing from the heart.

Composer Present

Timothy Mather Spelman, Harvard 1913, now living in New York, was present and very warmly applauded at the close of the first public performance of his "Assisi," which is the fourth of a set of four tone poems called "Saints' Days," written at Florence in 1923-25, and lately published in London.

Mr Spelman cannot be accused of musical radicalism. His tone poem was suggested by the "Great Pardon of St Francis," but, as he says, "is in no sense strictly programmistic."

The structure is as simple as the old-fashioned minuet and trio. The first and chief theme is a rather conventional rhythmic figure in 5-4 time repeated rather than developed. The second theme is an inconsequential series of notes for flute with celesta accompaniment, gradually reinforced by other instruments and leading up to "the main theme played fortissimo by the violins, and all the horns, forissimo, accompanied by the full orchestra." The work as will be obvious ends in what the composer's analysis calls "a mood of glorification."

One felt that Mr Spelman's carefully and correctly written and capably scored tone poem was creditable to his technical skill. But the utmost one can honestly say in its favor is that if he would chop it in half and rewrite it for piano solo it would be a not ineffective salon piece.

It is possible of course that Mr Koussevitzky, who was yesterday not in the vein until Tschaikowsky's symphony was reached, did not do full justice to Mr Spelman's music. And it is obviously true that such comment as this represents only the casual impression of one listener. But the reviewer can in common honesty do no more and no less than to record exactly what his impression of a new piece was.

Familiar Symphony

Tschaikowsky's familiar symphony stirred Mr Koussevitzky's emotions and through him the orchestra and the audience. Much of it is now outmoded. Much of it was never the honest expression of an honest emotion, but an attack of hysteria set to music. But its emotional power in a vivid, free reading like Mr Koussevitzky's is not inconsiderable. The andantino and the famous pizzicato scherzo again seemed the most artistic portions of the work.

There is in the whole not a little of the Russian local color of which the Russian Nationalists are popularly supposed to have the monopoly. Let those who despise Tschaikowsky only to exalt Rimsky, compare the motto theme of this symphony and the theme in "Coq d'or" when the golden cockerel gives its warning, consider the Russian folk songs in the andantino and finale and then point out wherein the superior "originality" and "nationalism" of Rimsky consists. Note also in Tschaikowsky's favor the quasi-Oriental passage work in minor keys for wind instruments in the first movement.

The radio audience will almost certainly find the pizzicato scherzo in Tschaikowsky's symphony the most enjoyable number on this week's program. The rest of the symphony will probably come through well. Ravel's "Mother Goose," in a curiously dull and colorless performance, did not make its effect yesterday, and as the above comment on them sufficiently shows, not much is to be expected from the new pieces.

P. R.

SYMPHONY REVELS IN VIRTUOSITY

Plays Tchaikovsky's Fourth as Never Before in Boston

Mar 27

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To recall the Symphony concerts since the coming of Mr. Koussevitzky is, for many, to think first of his conducting of the music of his fellow countrymen, and this is no disparagement of his remarkable achievements with the music of other lands. And to the list of notable performances of Russian music may now be added that of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony at the concert of yesterday afternoon.

ITS VITALITY RESTORED

For sustained musical interest and as a well-rounded, evenly proportioned work of art, Tchaikovsky's Fourth may not compare favorably with the two that came after it. Yet it is unquestionably more typically Russian and perhaps also more truly personal. Certainly it is far less polished and polite. In it there speaks the Tchaikovsky who was emotionally a child of nature, a man whose feelings were of primitive intensity and strength.

To soften and refine this Symphony, as some conductors have done, to subdue it to a decorum seemly for the concert-room, is to devitalize it, to rob it of its most characteristic quality. From such error, needless to say, Mr. Koussevitzky refrained. On the contrary, he laid on and spared not. In the first movement the music sobbed and shrieked, alternately flamed or languished.

The pervading theme of Fate, so different from the corresponding motive in Tchaikovsky's succeeding symphony, sounded the note, not only of awe, but of terror. In headlong rush went the Finale, Mr. Koussevitzky's baton flashing in air like a sword of battle, the orchestra accomplishing marvels of virtuosity, tossing off Tchaikovsky's sixteenths as though they were child's play, outwardly in a very delirium of emotion yet actually in hair-trigger response to the conductor's will.

Contrasted more than ever sharply to the passion of the first movement and the excitements of the last, the melancholy Andantino and the Scherzo of plucked strings and isolated wind-choir each came and went yesterday in beautifully finished performance, while throughout the Symphony there was an elasticity remarkable even for this orchestra's present prowess. Hardly had the last chord ceased to sound before the audience sought release in frantic applause that continued unabated until Mr. Koussevitzky, on his third return to the stage, brought the players to their feet.

New Record for Applause

Already, for the matter of that, at the close of Ravel's charming "Mother Goose" had such acknowledgment been made. And the applause that greeted the first performance anywhere of Timothy Mather Spelman's tone-poem, "Assisi: the Great Pardon of St. Francis," and that lasted while the composer bowed twice from his seat and then came thrice to the front of the platform, helped to make this a record concert in the matter of clapping of hands.

Mr. Spelman, an American making his chief residence in Florence, has written in this, the fourth of a series of "Saints' Days," music of worth and interest in which the mood of religious festival is well sustained, and that prompts curiosity as to the nature and content of its three companions.

By way of introduction to a more than usually enjoyable concert Mr. Koussevitzky led the first American performance of Marc Delmas' Overture to Alfred Mortier's "Penthesilea," a well-made, well-sounding composition with an appropriate theatrical flavor and suggesting in its warlike introduction that this Parisian had not forgotten the "Gwendolyn" of Chabrier.

MONDAY CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Globe Mar 23

Motte-Lacroix Pleases in Music by Cesar Franck

Isolde" and Ravel's Second Suite from "Daphnis et Chloe."

Of these pieces the only one not played this season in the regular series was the "Symphonic Variations." This music, written in 1885 has a peculiarly modern feeling, largely due to its syncopation in the brilliant finale, a syncopation closely akin to that of modern jazz, which has now become so respectable.

last evening was another story. Superb is the one satisfactory adjective to apply to his reading.

This music, which at any time is highly emotional, may once and again when conductor, orchestra and audience are in tune run so high in the emotional scale as to become almost oppressive. With the greatest art Mr Koussevitzky stayed just the right side of that unpleasantness and yet gave pent up feelings full course. Not in his recent

---

2-23 © by Public Ledger 1926

St Paul	54	50	Clear
St Louis	54	50	Cloudy
Chicago	44	44	Rain
Nantucket	50	34	Clear
Portland, Me	50	36	Clear
Eastport	48	36	Clear
New York	56	46	Pt Cloudy
Washington	60	52	Cloudy
Jacksonville	68	60	Cloudy

DR. HILTON'S NO. 3
Best Cold Preventive Known

---

street today carried a single passenger and did not mean much business, whereas two of them occupied as much room as a street car that carried 100 passengers.

Mr. Warren, representing financial interests in the State street district, said he was authorized in a general way to approve [illegible], though the interests he represented had not studied routes.

"Our interest is in the pedestrians, oddly enough," he said. "Thousands of them daily are in the financial district, going from one office building to another, to the postoffice, city hall, the banks, the custom house and the courts. The lines of traffic in Washington street, Devonshire, Federal and Congress streets cut the district in two like a Chinese wall.

"Clients of mine have been compelled to discontinue the use of safety vaults in one institution and patronize another because of these almost impassable barriers. The commonwealth has spent millions for improving the highways for motor cars, but not a cent, so far as I can learn, for the safety of the pedestrians. I believe if you report a bill on this loop that you should make certain mandatory provisions for wider sidewalks and for safety islands in the financial district, and also in the shopping district."

Daniel A. Holland, head of the Holland System, said his concern has several parcels of land in the loop section that would be assessed for betterments, and that they were willing to pay them.

It is hard

Boston Po

SYMPHONY RESPONDS TO APPEAL

'Pines of Rome' Holds Own on Being Repeated

Post MAR 20

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In deference to many requests Mr. Koussevitzky is repeating at the Symphony concerts of this week Respighi's "Pines of Rome," the outstanding orchestral novelty of the present season. And yesterday the mighty march of Roman legions, yet more brilliant and sonorous than before, again swept all before it, and in response to the applause Mr. Koussevitzky once more brought the deserving players to their feet.

DICKEY BIRD SHIFTED

Heard already on a Monday evening as well as at a previous pair of regular subscription concerts, Respighi's music wears well. Not only is the Italian here a consummate master of orchestral effects, the very substance of his music is likewise persuasive and arresting. Although he knows and employs with discreet effectiveness the latest harmonic devices, Respighi does not wholly disdain musical beauty in the generally accepted sense of that term. There is ravishing loveliness in the Nocturnal third division of his tone-poem mayhap, and at some later day a conductor will happily see fit to strike out that superfluous and intrusive dickey-bird, recte nightingale.

Yesterday, by the way, the phonograph that is voice to these twitterings was transferred to the left side of the stage and the manipulation of it assigned to one of the double-bass players.

New Soloist and Music

For the rest this concert offered the first Boston appearance of the distinguished Hungarian violinist, Josef Szigeti; the first performance here of the Suite from Roussel's opera-ballet, "Padmavati," music none too convincing when thus removed from its rightful environment; and by way of agreeable introduction Bach's Concerto in F major for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet.

A violinist closely identified with contemporary music, Mr. Szigeti, would have better pleased some of his hearers, had he chosen for his vehicle a fresher piece than the over-long and over-worked Concerto of Beethoven. But there was the compensation of his sensitive, fine-grained playing, his excellent rhythmic sense. And thanks alike to him and to Mr Koussevitsky, the beautiful Larghetto offered 10 minutes of rare delight.

Bach, Served Nobly

As for the other two movements, it would be a mercy to subject them to judicious curtailment—or better still, for a few seasons to omit the Concerto altogether from the repertory.

Bach, as well as Beethoven, in the instance of the Concerto played yesterday, was most successful in his middle movement. By the soloists, Messrs. Burgin, Laurent, Gillet and Mager, this Andante, and for that matter the rest of the Concerto, was nobly played, and at the end they were warmly applauded.

SYMPHONY IN FOURTH OF EXTRAS

Post MAR. 23

Beethoven, Wagner, Ravel and Franck on List

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Surely the subscribers to the Monday evening Symphony concerts have no reason nowadays to complain of their lot. In the matter of pieces they are apt to receive the pick of the season, and they are likely, too, to hear performances more finished and more eloquent than those of the regular subscription concerts.

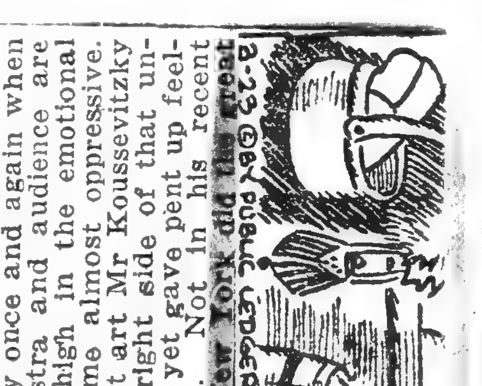
BEETHOVEN'S EIGHTH

Last evening in the fourth concert of this supplementary series, Mr. Koussevitzky led the orchestra through Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, the Prelude and "Love-Death" from Wagner's Tristan and the brilliant and sonorous Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," while for semi-novelty Ferdinand Motte-Lacroix of the New England Conservatory played the piano-part in a performance of Franck's Symphonic Variations. Two weeks ago last Friday, Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the Eighth Symphony for the first time here. Since then there have been performances in other cities, with the result that his remarkably persuasive version of the music is now more definitely shaped, more sharply defined than before.

The Eighth is a jolly symphony, and Mr. Koussevitzky stresses its jollity. In the first movement and in the last he gives us Homeric laughter, and in the other two lurk many a whimsical smile. Never does Mr. Koussevitzky let the symphony lapse into easy-going routine, and if he lays unlooked for emphasis upon certain details generally slighted or ignored, even to disturbing here and there the rhythmic progress of the music, he does thereby enhance and increase the symphony's power to arrest and hold the hearer's interest.

Last evening, both in the symphony and in the fragments from "Tristan," Mr. Koussevitzky led an orchestra wholly subservient to his will, responsive to his emotion. Prelude and "Love Death" rose and fell in molten beauty. And if Mr. Koussevitzky's pace at the beginning of the former piece seemed over-slow, the reason for this holding back was made apparent in the unleashed passion of the climax, becoming doubly exciting through this very contrast.

Making his first appearance at a Symphony Concert here, Mr. Motte-Lacroix gave last evening a sympathetic and discerning performance of a piano-part not displayful in the manner of the average concerted piece but rather a strand in the symphonic web. And conductor and pianist, seemingly working in complete accord, accomplished a plastic and beautiful ensemble.



TURDAY, MARCH 27, 192

SYMPHONY GIVES 20TH CONCERT

Conductor Koussevitzky and Orchestra Equally Inspired

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Delmas, overture to "Penthesilee" (first time in the United States); Spelman, "Assisi: the Great Pardon of St. Francis" (first performance); Ravel, "Mother Goose", Tchaikovsky, Symphony No 4, F minor.

Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra followed an exquisitely poetic performance of Ravel's suite by playing Tchaikovsky's Symphony as it never has been played here; a reading that was indescribably emotional, dramatic, overpowering; but let us first speak of the two unfamiliar compositions.

Marc Delmas, born in 1885, was awarded at the Paris Conservatory the prix de Rome in 1919. He has written several orchestral pieces and much for the stage. It has been said of him: "He is the typical musician-laureate." Is this a compliment or a sneer?

For Alfred Mortier's tragedy "Penthesilee," produced at the Odeon, Paris, in 1922, he wrote the overture and incidental music. We are concerned now with the overture, not with the dramatist's version of the old legend, yet this overture may be supposed to pre-figure the salient events of the play—the prowess of the Amazon in battle, her love for Achilles whom she overthrew, and her tragic end; as Massenet succeeded in his overture to Racine's "Phedre."

Delmas's overture is frankly theatrical, theatre music, rather than of an imaginatively symphonic nature. He mistook bombast for wild passion, noise for impressive sonority. The section based on the "love theme" has superficial sentiment rather than amorous intensity. His orchestration is for the most part thick, not varied in color. This is surprising, for the French composers of the later years seem to be born with a modern treatise on instrumentation in their hand; in fact their skill in orchestration is more conspicuous than their musical ideas.

Mr. Spelman's "Assist" is the last movement of a suite entitled "Saints's Days." It is preceded by "Sorrento: the Feast of St. Anthony"; "Venice, the Festival of the Redeemer"; "Siena, the Palio." It is possible that "Assisi" would gain in effect if it were heard in conjunction with the other movements, yet it is not difficult to understand the composer's intentions: music suggested, as he says in his modest note, by the religious festival, without the following of a detailed program. Hence the solemn march-like tempo; the ecclesiastical flavor of many passages; above all a certain mysticism that is not vague, not too insistent, but is contemplative and uplifting.fl Now that Mr. Spelman has heard "Assisi" he may find that some of the contrapuntal pages are so orchestrated that the walk of the different parts is not clearly defined; that there are involved measures which, while they show technical ingenunity, might gain by greater instrumental simplicity. When all is said, "Assisi" is creditable to his scholarship and to his lofty purpose. We are far from the sacred processional music of the theatrically minded, of which, that for the procession in "The Jewels of the Madonna" is probably the most shocking example. Mr. Koussevitzky had prepared the two unfamiliar pieces with his customary care; in the performance he led with his customary enthusiasm. Mr. Spelman was called to the platform, for the audience evidently liked "Assisi."

In many ways Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony is more characteristic, more racial than his fifth or his sixth. He has been overpraised; it is the fashion now in certain quarters to undervalue him. He still remains one of the few great figures in the musical world of the latter half of the 19th century. Let his "mannerisms" be granted. What composer from Handel down the years is free from mannerisms? Certainly not Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Weber, Wagner, Brahms, Franck, Debussy.

It is not given to every conductor to conduct Tchaikovsky's music with understanding and sympathy. His music is not for the rigidly academic; not for the scrupulous crossers of "t's" and dotters of "i's." The conductor must meet this self-torturing Russian more than half-way. He must not soften his wild lamentations, his stormy cries. He must find significance in the repetitions that disturb priggish objectors; in the tossing of phrases from one group of instruments to another. A conductor that puts on kid gloves for the conducting of Tchaikovsky's music is lost. Furthermore, the ideal conductor with this fourth symphony on the desk must have an orchestra like the Boston Sym-

---

NEW MUSIC HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Delmas and Spelman Pieces for First Time Here

GLOBE MAR 27

The program of yesterday's Symphony concert began with the first performance in America of the overture to "Penthesilee," by Marc Delmas. The second number was "Assisi: The Great Pardon of St Francis," by Timothy Mather Spelman, played yesterday for the first time in public. Ravel's "Mother Goose," and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony were the other numbers.

Mr Koussevitzky has made several changes since the original announcement, as has often been his way with programs, to the inconvenience of the not inconsiderable portion of his audience which makes an effort to study the music to be heard in advance of each concert.

Delmas, born in 1885 and resident in Paris, has a number of orchestral and other works to his credit, none of which have been performed in Boston or apparently in America. He was awarded the Prix de Rome in 1919 and has won several other French prizes. "Penthesilee," the overture to which was played yesterday, is described in the program books as an "heroic drama in verse" by Alfred Mortier, produced at the Odeon in Paris in 1922. There is incidental music by Delmas.

This overture, in a monotonously loud and seemingly rather muddled performance, left one with the general impression that here was a minor Massenet trying to write like a 20th century Wagner. There is a sonorous and dissonant preamble, mostly brass, followed by several episodes intended to be lyric and heroic by turns. In the theatre such music may be effective. But it seemed dull and tasteless yesterday, conventionally written and muddily scored by a man fulfilling a commission rather than writing from the heart.

Composer Present

Timothy Mather Spelman, Harvard 1913, now living in New York, was present and very warmly applauded at the close of the first public performance of his "Assisi," which is the fourth of a set of four tone poems called "Saints' Days," written at Florence in 1923-25, and lately published in London.

Mr Spelman cannot be accused of musical radicalism. His tone poem was suggested by the "Great Pardon of St Francis," but, as he says, "Is in no sense strictly programmistic."

The structure is as simple as the old-fashioned minuet and trio. The first, and chief theme is a rather conventional rhythmic figure in 5-4 time repeated rather than developed. The second theme is an inconsequential series of notes for flute with celesta accompaniment, gradually reinforced by other instruments and leading up to "the main theme played fortissimo by the violins, and all the horns, forissimo, accompanied by the full orchestra." The work as will be obvious ends in what the composer's analysis calls "a mood of glorification."

One felt that Mr Spelman's carefully and correctly written and capably scored tone poem was creditable to his technical skill. But the utmost one can honestly say in its favor is that if he would chop it in half and rewrite it for piano solo it would be a not ineffective salon piece.

It is possible of course that Mr Koussevitzky, who was yesterday not in the vein until Tschaikowsky's symphony was reached, did not do full justice to Mr Spelman's music. And it is obviously true that such comment as this represents only the casual impression of one listener. But the reviewer can in common honesty do no more and no less than to record exactly what his impression of a new piece was.

Familiar Symphony

Tschaikowsky's familiar symphony stirred Mr Koussevitzky's emotions and through him the orchestra and the audience. Much of it is now outmoded. Much of it was never the honest expression of an honest emotion, but an attack of hysteria set to music. But its emotional power in a vivid, free reading like Mr Koussevitzky's is not inconsiderable. The andantino and the famous pizzicato scherzo again seemed the most artistic portions of the work.

There is in the whole not a little of the Russian local color of which the Russian Nationalists are popularly supposed to have the monopoly. Let those who despise Tschaikowsky only to exalt Rimsky, compare the motto theme of this symphony and the theme in "Coq d'or" when the golden cockerel gives its warning, consider the Russian folk songs in the andantino and finale and then point out wherein the superior "originality" and "nationalism" of Rimsky consists. Note also in Tschaikowsky's favor the quasi-Oriental passage work in minor keys for wind instruments in the first movement.

The radio audience will almost certainly find the pizzicato scherzo in Tschaikowsky's symphony the most enjoyable number on this week's program. The rest of the symphony will probably come through well. Ravel's "Mother Goose," in a curiously dull and colorless performance, did not make its effect yesterday, and as the above comment on them sufficiently shows, not much is to be expected from the new pieces.

P. R.

SYMPHONY REVELS IN VIRTUOSITY

Plays Tchaikovsky's Fourth as Never Before in Boston

MAR 27

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To recall the Symphony concerts since the coming of Mr. Koussevitzky is, for many, to think first of his conducting of the music of his fellow countrymen, and this is no disparagement of his remarkable achievements with the music of other lands. And to the list of notable performances of Russian music may now be added that of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony at the concert of yesterday afternoon.

ITS VITALITY RESTORED

For sustained musical interest and as a well-rounded, evenly proportioned work of art, Tchaikovsky's Fourth may not compare favorably with the two that came after it. Yet it is unquestionably more typically Russian and perhaps also more truly personal. Certainly it is far less polished and polite. In it there speaks the Tchaikovsky who was emotionally a child of nature, a man whose feelings were of primitive intensity and strength.

To soften and refine this Symphony, as some conductors have done, to subdue it to a decorum seemly for the concert-room, is to devitalize it, to rob it of its most characteristic quality. From such error, needless to say, Mr. Koussevitzky refrained. On the contrary, he laid on and spared not. In the first movement the music sobbed and shrieked, alternately flamed or languished.

The pervading theme of Fate, so different from the corresponding motive in Tchaikovsky's succeeding symphony, sounded the note, not only of awe, but of terror. In headlong rush went the Finale, Mr. Koussevitzky's baton flashing in air like a sword of battle, the orchestra accomplishing marvels of virtuosity, tossing off Tchaikovsky's sixteenths as though they were child's play, outwardly in a very delirium of emotion yet actually in hair-trigger response to the conductor's will.

Contrasted more than ever sharply to the passion of the first movement and the excitements of the last, the melancholy Andantino and the Scherzo of plucked strings and isolated wind-choir each came and went yesterday in beautifully finished performance, while throughout the Symphony there was an elasticity remarkable even for this orchestra's present prowess. Hardly had the last chord ceased to sound before the audience sought release in frantic applause that continued unabated until Mr. Koussevitzky, on his third return to the stage, brought the players to their feet.

New Record for Applause

Already, for the matter of that, at the close of Ravel's charming "Mother Goose" had such acknowledgment been made. And the applause that greeted the first performance anywhere of Timothy Mather Spelman's tone-poem, "Assisi: the Great Pardon of St. Francis," and that lasted while the composer bowed twice from his seat and then came thrice to the front of the platform, helped to make this a record concert in the matter of clapping of hands.

Mr. Spelman, an American making his chief residence in Florence, has written in this, the fourth of a series of "Saints' Days," music of worth and interest in which the mood of religious festival is well sustained, and that prompts curiosity as to the nature and content of its three companions.

By way of introduction to a more than usually enjoyable concert Mr. Koussevitzky led the first American performance of Marc Delmas' Overture to Alfred Mortier's "Penthesilea," a well-made, well-sounding composition with an appropriate theatrical flavor and suggesting in its warlike introduction that this Parisian had not forgotten the "Gwendolyn" of Chabrier.

HE BOSTON HERALD, SUNDAY, MARCH 28, 1926

Weekly Comment

The German Requiem of Johannes Brahms will be performed this afternoon at the Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The title is "German Requiem," for the Requiem is not that of the church.

In 1854 Brahms wrote a symphony which was never completed. The work was turned into a sonata for two pianos. The first two movements are now known as the first and second of his piano concerto in D minor; the third is the March movement in three-four time, "Behold All Flesh" in the German Requiem.

At Carlsruhe in 1866, when Brahms was 32 years old he began to write this Requiem. It was generally believed by his friends that he intended it to be a memorial to his mother, Johanna, who died in 1865. Clara Schumann once said: "We all think he wrote it in her memory though he has never expressly said so." Joachim in his address at the Brahms Memorial Festival at Meiningen, in October, 1899, referred to this Requiem: "Never has a nobler monument been raised by filial love." The movement of the unfinished symphony, which is now the march "Behold All Flesh," was due to Brahms's grief over the tragedy of Schumann's sickness.

He worked on the Requiem while he was dwelling in Zurich and completed it at Lichtenthal, with the exception of the fifth number. In September, 1866, Clara Schumann wrote in her diary that Johannes had been playing to her some "magnificent movements" out of a Requiem of his own. "It is full of tender and again daring thoughts."

There was anxiety about the time and place of the production. Brahms was conscious of the music's worth and wished it to be brought out under the most favorable circumstances. The first performance of the work as originally completed was to take place under his direction in the Bremen Cathedral on Good Friday, April 10, 1868.

On Dec. 1, 1867, the Gesellschaft Concert in Vienna was devoted to the memory of Schubert. The first three numbers of the Requiem were then performed. The second part of the program consisted of selections from Schubert's "Rosamunde" which were then heard in a concert hall for the first time. The choruses of the Requiem were sung by the Singverein; the baritone solo by Dr. Paenzer of the Imperial Chapel.

The first two movements met with some approval, but the music as a whole did not please. In the famous pedal-point the drummer played the "D" forte throughout and drowned the chorus. When Brahms appeared on the platform, there were unmistakable signs of disapproval mingled with the applause of his friends. This led Hanslick to write in his review that the seriousness of the work should alone have commanded respect. "This seems not to have been the case with half a dozen gray-haired fanatics of the old school, who had the rudeness to greet the applauding majority and the composer, as he appeared, with prolonged hissing—a requiem on the decorum and good manners of a Vienna concert-room which astonishes and grieves us." Hirsch spoke of the "heathenish noise" of the kettledrums and said that the opposition was in an immense majority. Dr. Billroth found an intentional avoidance of the sensuous in Brahms as a composer and a pianist. "The Requiem is so nobly spiritual and so Protestant Bachish that it was difficult to make it go down here. The hissing and clapping became really violent; it was a party conflict. In the end the applause conquered."

Brahms took his text from various books of the Old and New Testament, also from the Apocrypha. There was no thought of doctrinal purpose. His text was from the Bible, and the passages chosen represented to Protestant nations "the highest aspirations of man." These passages were so arranged as to present in succession "the ascending ideas of sorrow consoled, doubt overcome, death vanquished. That they open and close with the thought of love is not of necessity to be ascribed solely to the artistic requirements of the work, or the exigencies of its sacred theme. Whoever has studied Brahms's life and works with sympathetic insight will be aware that the suggestion of love triumphant runs through both like a continuous silver thread." Thus writes Miss Florence May, though some have not agreed and do not agree with her.

Brahms went to Bremen on April 1, 1868, as the guest of Carl Reinthaler. The program of the sacred concert in St. Peter's Cathedral Church on Good Friday evening included the German Requiem (Julius Stockhausen singing the baritone solo), with miscellaneous music between the first and second parts: music by Bach, Tartini and Schumann's "Abenilied" played by Joachim; "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth" (Mme. Joachim); air for contralto with violin obbligato from Bach's "Matthew Passion" (Mme. Joachim and her husband, and the "Hallelujah" Chorus. Brahms conducted the Requiem; Reinthaler the remaining selections. All the soloists gave their services.

The doors of the cathedral were opened at 6 P. M. and for a hour the crowd poured in. Shortly before the time for beginning Clara Schumann walked up the nave on Brahms's arm. The performance of the Requiem was said to be all that Brahms could have desired.

After the performance there was a supper in the old Rathskeller. Speeches were made, one by John Farmer, who came all the way from England.

Later in the year Brahms sojourned at Bonn, preparing the manuscript of the Requiem for the engraver. Playing the music, he said to his friend, Dr. Deiters, in the course of the just completed fifth number, "I will comfort you as a mother comforts," that he had thought here of his own mother.

After the final completion and publication, the first performance was at a Gewandhaus concert in Leipsic on Feb. 18, 1869. Reinecke conducted. Basle, Carlsruhe, Cologne, Hamburg, Zurich, Weimar and even Chemnitz and Jena, not to mention other towns heard the Requiem before the complete work was performed in Vienna on March 5, 1871, with Mme. Wilt and Dr. Krauss, solo singers. The composer conducted, but the Requiem did not meet with noteworthy success.

The first performance in England was for an invited audience at the house of Sir Henry Thompson, July 7, 1871. Stockhausen conducted and sang the baritone solo; Anna Regan, the soprano solo. There was a chorus of about 30; the accompaniments were played as a piano duet by Lady Thompson and Cipriani Potter, who was then in his 80th year. There was a public performance by the Philharmonic Society, London, on April 2, 1873: W. G. Cusins, conductor; Charles Santley and Sophie Ferrari, singers of the solos. There is mention of an earlier performance at a students' concert of the Royal Academy of Music, London, John Hullah, conductor.

There was a performance at Leningrad in 1872; in Paris in 1874.

The first performance in the United States was by the Symphony Society at New York on March 15, 1877. Dr. Leopold Damrosch conducted; the solo singers were Marie von Heimburg and A. E. Stoddard.

This society did not perform the work again until Nov. 27, 1891, when Walter Damrosch conducted.

The first performance in Boston was by the Cecilia Society, B. J. Lang, conductor, on Dec. 3, 1888. The solo singers were Elizabeth C. Hamlin and Eliot Hubbard. Dvorak's "Patriotic Hymn" was also performed at this concert.

P. H.

Monitor
MAR. 29

Noveltles on Program of Boston Orchestra

The program of the twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, was:

Delmas	Overture "Penthésilée"
Spelman	"Assisi, the Great Pardon of St. Francis"
Ravel	"Ma Mère l'Oye"
Tchaikovsky	Symphony No. 4 in F minor op. 36

This was an afternoon of novelty, for Delmas' Overture was played for the first time in America and Spelman's "Assisi" was played for the first time anywhere.

This overture is of a type long since familiar in concert rooms. Effective, well written (for it is immediately apparent that it is the work of a well schooled technician) it contains little to arrest the attention. It contains high sounding phrases, it is brilliantly orchestrated, but it in reality expresses little. Its composer, according to the program book, has won a considerable number of prizes. On hearing this overture one is not surprised at the fact, for the writer of such eminently respectable music is bound to win the esteem of juries. Of originality, of a marked individuality it shows little trace.

Upon its heels came "Assisi, the Great Pardon of St. Francis," by Timothy Mather Spelman, a graduate of Harvard University. Like the overture by Delmas, it is music of little character, and unlike that of the Frenchman, it does not exhibit the same technical mastery. M. Delmas often conceals the poverty of his musical thoughts by the gorgeous orchestral dress with which he clothes them, but Mr. Spelman possesses not this resource. He does not as yet use the orchestral medium with freedom and his music often gives the impression of a too literal translation into an unfamiliar tongue.

Yet among the pages of his score there are here and there passages of promise, passages which show that the composer has a feeling, an instinct for the language of the orchestra, although his ability to express himself in it may at times be halting. The underlying thought of the composition is poetic. A more expert hand might have brought it to more complete expression.

Then followed Ravel's delightful "Mother Goose" Suite. Here was music in which the thought and the method of its expression were in the closest agreement; and, moreover, here were real musical thoughts seeking expression. Each movement of this suite is a finely wrought jewel, the work of a master craftsman and of a poet in tones as well.

To conclude the exercises of the afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky chose to play Tchaikovsky's strident Fourth Symphony. His temperament is well suited to the Tchaikovskian ardors. And, be it said, he often contrives to give them a dignity which no other conductor in recent years has succeeded in giving them. It is possible that he takes them seriously and that the composer's fantastic melancholy really appeals to him. In any case yesterday afternoon brought forth an unusually fine performance of the symphony, in which many of its most commonplace passages were made almost convincingly sincere, a performance which was brilliant without coarseness, emotional without exaggeration or

---

PENSION CONCERT CHORALE

Post MAR 29

Harvard Glee and Radcliffe Choir Assist Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The performance of Brahms' "German Requiem" by the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky, given and repeated last spring as part of the Harvard Glee Club's series of concerts, was repeated at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon in aid of the Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund, and will be heard there again this evening.

Thus has a choral masterpiece, long neglected hereabouts, become at length familiar music.

HAS ITS DULL PARTS

In calling the "German Requiem" a masterpiece the reservation must be made, as with many another musical masterpiece, that in it the composer's invention is not sustained at an equal level throughout. Brahms ws hardly a deeply religious man in the sense that Bach and Cesar Franck were religious. Nor was he a composer to whom the making of salient phrases came always readily. In many passages of the Requiem he seems to be but marking time, to be not completely at grips with his subject. And no performance, not even one of the surpassing excellence of that of yesterday, can breathe life into these relatively perfunctory measures.

But in such things as the affecting opening chorus, a page whose beauty may hardly be matched in the whole range of choral music, in the chorus, "Behold All Flesh," in the chorus, "How Lovely is Thy Dwelling Place," in the superb setting of "For the Trumpet Shall Sound," and in the consoling final chorus Brahms has written music that ranks with the greatest in its particular field.

Solo Parts Beyond Voices

Yesterday, as was the case a year ago, the passages for the solo singers failed of their fullest effect. Miss Ethel Hayden and Mr. Boris Saslawsky, to whom these solo parts once more fell, are rich in good intentions, in earnestness and in intelligence, but neither has the voice to make the most of such music.

It were repetitious to dwell at length on the many notable features of the choral singing yesterday. As in the previous performance of this Requiem, and later in the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, Mr. Koussevitzky accomplished with these student-singers results that a professional chorus might envy.

Tribute to Mr. Woodworth

Again he played upon them as upon a responsive instrument. And the orchestral performance, no mere accompaniment in music such as this, was yesterday beyond all praise.

The audience, which completely filled the hall, as it bids fair to be filled again this evening, was warmly applausive, and when, at the conclusion of the concert Mr. Koussevitzky led forward G. Wallace Woodsworth, acting conductor of of the college choirs in the absence of Dr. Davison, the enthusiasm knew no bounds as from chorus and

---

'GERMAN REQUIEM' ABLY PERFORMED

HERALD MAR 29

College Choruses Heard with Symphony Orchestra

For the spring concert in aid of the pension fund Mr. Koussevitzky conceived the happy idea or repeating Brahms's "German Requiem," which he had conducted a year ago for a concert of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. These choruses sang once more yesterday afternoon, and the soloists of last year also sang again, Ethyl Hayden, soprano, and Boris Saslawsky, baritone.

If it was Dr. Davison who deserved thanks last year for teaching that great body of young students to know, and so to love, great music, Mr. Koussevitzky merits thanks quite as hearty for giving them opportunity to study the Requiem further, and, beyond a doubt, to appreciate it the deeper. To learn a fine work and perform it once, never to sing or hear a note of it again—what is that worth? It is repetition that counts, and the knowledge that comes with it, till the beauty and the grandeur of music thus repeated sink deep into every heart.

These young people who, at the bidding of Mr. Koussevitzky and Dr. Davidson, have come to know this Requiem through and through, are not likely to forget it in a hurry; they have gained something of great price. And so have the public, the people, at all events, who have heard the Requiem twice. A pity it is the procedure cannot become a custom; a great work is surely worth hearing two times over. Then let it take its chances with the rest.

Mr. Koussevitzky, in planning yesterday's performance, must surely have argued that Brahms, being a German Protestant, had in his mind, when he wrote the Requiem, slow-moving singing such as obtains in German Protestant churches. But Brahms, according to the writings of his friends, was more markedly a musician than he was a man of churches.

However, one may argue, the heavy pace Mr. Koussevitzky too often chose yesterday made for a monotony, a dullness, which do not belong to the Requiem by right. It did away with the relief that contrast brings. It damaged the beauty of many an exquisite phrase. The task of the chorus it made very hard, for no body of sopranos or tenors either can sustain good tone on long, high notes if tempo keeps too slow.

If Mr. Koussevitzky were a choral conductor as experienced as he is orchestral, he could have shown his forces ways of phrasing that would have lightened their heavy burden, to say nothing of heightening the beauty of sound by a more adroit manipulation of varying vocal timbres. To the words, too, he could have given a finer clarity, and so greater force.

On his own ground with the orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky made much of the score sound as it has never sounded here before. And Brahms had no knack with an orchestra! The more praise, then, to Mr. Koussevitzky. One would not have suspected the fact yesterday.

The chorus sang with admirable correctness, and now and again they turned a phrase which showed their fine capabilities. They ended the Requiem espe-

---

ADVERTISER MAR

Brahms' 'Requiem' Sung at Symphony

Chorus and orchestra united to make the performance of Brahms' "Requiem" a brilliant one yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, with Ethyl Hayden, soprano, and Boris Saslawsky, baritone, as soloists. Serge Koussevitsky led the 250 singers and full orchestra in his usual masterful style.

Instead of being mournful, this requiem is buoyant with a triumphant spirit whch the singers and orchestra both

BRAHMS' REQUIEM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Choruses From Radcliffe and Harvard Assist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, gave Brahms' "A German Requiem" yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall for the benefit of the pension fund for retired members of the orchestra. Mr Koussevitzky conducted. Ethel Hayden, soprano, and Boris Saslawsky, baritone, sang incidental solos.

The hall had been sold out weeks in advance. The audience applauded with considerable vigor, but there was not the tremendous enthusiasm which was roused by the Ninth Symphony last Fall. There will be a second performance tonight at 8:15.

The Harvard Glee Club last season gave a performance of Brahms' Requiem, assisted by the Radcliffe Choral Society, and by Miss Hayden and Mr Saslawsky. There was an orchestra of Boston Symphony members, and Mr Koussevitzky conducted by invitation of Dr Davison. Yesterday's concert was therefore essentially a repetition of last year's. This season, owing to Dr Davison's absence in Europe the chorus has been trained by G. Wallace Woodworth, with the assistance of Mrs Robert Winternitz, assistant conductor of the Radcliffe Choral Society.

Sung in English

"A German Requiem," opus 45, is a setting of passages from the Scriptures compiled after the manner of the text of Handel's "Messiah." It was sung yesterday in English. Brahms wrote it throughout in an austere and monotonously elegiac vein, yet some of the choruses are among his supreme achievements, notably the second number. "Behold. All Flesh Is as the Grass," which was composed as a movement for a projected symphony, then later adapted to its present purpose.

This chorus, and the final chorus, "Blessed Are the Dead Which Die in the Lord," have the noble emotionalism of the "Song of Destiny," music which to some appears Brahms' finest work. But as a whole the Requiem has the heaviness, the occasional stodginess, the not infrequent straining for effects beyond the imaginative power of the composer which causes one to regard Mozart as an infinitely greater genius than Brahms.

Mr Koussevitzky's reading is free, and at best vivid. His tempi do not accord with Brahms' directions. As usual, he is guided by his own feelings, not by metronome and other markings on the printed page. One felt that much of the Requiem would gain by being taken at a steadier and more rapid pace. This music is not the frenzied musings of a romantic mourner, it is sober, philosophical, even at worst sedate. Try as he may Mr Koussevitzky cannot make it into successful Tchaikovsky, which yesterday one felt to be his imaginative aim.

The chorus sang with a will, an imaginative eagerness which would have atoned for many technical shortcomings. But except that the sopranos did not make the words they sang audible and that there were in all the parts occasional failure to attack and release notes cleanly, one noted no chronic or serious flaws in the choral part of the performance. The fortissimo passages were all muddy in quality, but that was caused by Mr Koussevitzky's striving for quantity at the expense of quality of tone.

Pleasing Soprano

Mr Saslawsky sang the two baritone solos expressively, but with unsteady tones annoying to the many who detest any suggestion of a tremolo. Miss Hayden again showed that she has a pleasing soprano voice which she uses with no small skill. Again, as last season, the pace of her solo was set too slow by the conductor.

This concert was broadcast through Mr Quinby's generosity, so that an incalculable number of listeners had an opportunity to enjoy it. Choral music, however, is one of the most difficult things to transmit by radio, so that reception may in many cases have proved imperfect.

P. R.

Use Adamson's Cough Balsam for Coughs and Colds. At all druggists.—Ad.

Globe Mar 29

264

HE BOSTON HERALD, SUNDAY, MARCH 28, 1926

Weekly Comment

The German Requiem of Johannes Brahms will be performed this afternoon at the Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The title is "German Requiem," for the Requiem is not that of the church.

In 1854 Brahms wrote a symphony which was never completed. The work was turned into a sonata for two pianos. The first two movements are now known as the first and second of his piano concerto in D minor; the third is the March movement in three-four time, "Behold All Flesh" in the German Requiem.

At Carlsruhe in 1866, when Brahms was 32 years old he began to write this Requiem. It was generally believed by his friends that he intended it to be a memorial to his mother, Johanna, who died in 1865. Clara Schumann once said: "We all think he wrote it in her memory though he has never expressly said so." Joachim in his address at the Brahms Memorial Festival at Meiningen, in October, 1899, referred to this Requiem: "Never has a nobler monument been raised by filial love." The movement of the unfinished symphony, which is now the march "Behold All Flesh," was due to Brahms's grief over the tragedy of Schumann's sickness.

He worked on the Requiem while he was dwelling in Zurich and completed it at Lichtenthal, with the exception of the fifth number. In September, 1866, Clara Schumann wrote in her diary that Johannes had been playing to her some "magnificent movements" out of a Requiem of his own. "It is full of tender and again daring thoughts."

There was anxiety about the time and place of the production. Brahms was conscious of the music's worth and wished it to be brought out under the most favorable circumstances. The first performance of the work as originally completed was to take place under his direction in the Bremen Cathedral on Good Friday, April 10, 1868.

On Dec. 1, 1867, the Gesellschaft Concert in Vienna was devoted to the memory of Schubert. The first three numbers of the Requiem were then performed. The second part of the program consisted of selections from Schubert's "Rosamunde" which were then heard in a concert hall for the first time. The choruses of the Requiem were sung by the Singverein; the baritone solo by Dr. Paenzer of the Imperial Chapel.

The first two movements met with some approval, but the music as a whole did not please. In the famous pedal-point the drummer played the "D" forte throughout and drowned the chorus. When Brahms appeared on the platform, there were unmistakable signs of disapproval mingled with the applause of his friends. This led Hanslick to write in his review that the seriousness of the work should alone have commanded respect. "This seems not to have been the case with half a dozen gray-haired fanatics of the old school, who had the rudeness to greet the applauding majority and the composer, as he appeared, with prolonged hissing—a requiem on the decorum and good manners of a Vienna concert-room which astonishes and grieves us." Hirsch spoke of the "heathenish noise" of the kettledrums and said that the opposition was in an immense majority. Dr. Billroth found an intentional avoidance of the sensuous in Brahms as a composer and a pianist. "The Requiem is so nobly spiritual and so Protestant Bachish that it was difficult to make it go down here. The hissing and clapping became really violent; it was a party conflict. In the end the applause conquered."

Brahms took his text from various books of the Old and New Testament, also from the Apocrypha. There was no thought of doctrinal purpose. His text was from the Bible, and the passages chosen represented to Protestant nations "the highest aspirations of man." These passages were so arranged as to present in succession "the ascending ideas of sorrow consoled, doubt overcome, death vanquished. That they open and close with the thought of love is not of necessity to be ascribed solely to the artistic requirements of the work, or the exigencies of its sacred theme. Whoever has studied Brahms's life and works with sympathetic insight will be aware that the suggestion of love triumphant runs through both like a continuous silver thread." Thus writes Miss Florence May, though some have not agreed and do not agree with her.

Brahms went to Bremen on April 1, 1868, as the guest of Carl Reinthaler. The program of the sacred concert in St. Peter's Cathedral Church on Good Friday evening included the German Requiem (Julius Stockhausen singing the baritone solo), with miscellaneous music between the first and second parts: music by Bach, Tartini and Schumann's "Abenilied" played by Joachim; "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth" (Mme. Joachim); air for contralto with violin obbligato from Bach's "Matthew Passion" (Mme. Joachim and her husband, and the "Hallelujah" Chorus. Brahms conducted the Requiem; Reinthaler the remaining selections. All the soloists gave their services.

The doors of the cathedral were opened at 6 P. M. and for a hour the crowd poured in. Shortly before the time for beginning Clara Schumann walked up the nave on Brahms's arm. The performance of the Requiem was said to be all that Brahms could have desired.

After the performance there was a supper in the old Rathskeller. Speeches were made, one by John Farmer, who came all the way from England.

Later in the year Brahms sojourned at Bonn, preparing the manuscript of the Requiem for the engraver. Playing the music, he said to his friend, Dr. Deiters, in the course of the just completed fifth number, "I will comfort you as a mother comforts," that he had thought here of his own mother.

After the final completion and publication, the first performance was at a Gewandhaus concert in Leipsic on Feb. 18, 1869. Reinecke conducted. Basle, Carlsruhe, Cologne, Hamburg, Zurich, Weimar and even Chemnitz and Jena, not to mention other towns heard the Requiem before the complete work was performed in Vienna on March 5, 1871, with Mme. Wilt and Dr. Krauss, solo singers. The composer conducted, but the Requiem did not meet with noteworthy success.

The first performance in England was for an invited audience at the house of Sir Henry Thompson, July 7, 1871. Stockhausen conducted and sang the baritone solo; Anna Regan, the soprano solo. There was a chorus of about 30; the accompaniments were played as a piano duet by Lady Thompson and Cipriani Potter, who was then in his 80th year. There was a public performance by the Philharmonic Society, London, on April 2, 1873: W. G. Cusins, conductor; Charles Santley and Sophie Ferrari, singers of the solos. There is mention of an earlier performance at a students' concert of the Royal Academy of Music, London, John Hullah, conductor.

There was a performance at Leningrad in 1872; in Paris in 1874.

The first performance in the United States was by the Symphony Society at New York on March 15, 1877. Dr. Leopold Damrosch conducted; the solo singers were Marie von Heimburg and A. E. Stoddard.

This society did not perform the work again until Nov. 27, 1891, when Walter Damrosch conducted.

The first performance in Boston was by the Cecilia Society, B. J. Lang, conductor, on Dec. 3, 1888. The solo singers were Elizabeth C. Hamlin and Eliot Hubbard. Dvorak's "Patriotic Hymn" was also performed at this concert.

P. H.

Monitor
MAR. 29

Noveltics on Program of Boston Orchestra

The program of the twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, was:

Delmas..........Overture "Penthésilée"
Spelman..............."Assisi, the Great Pardon of St. Francis"
Ravel..................."Ma Mère l'Oye"
Tchaikovsky
Symphony No. 4 in F minor op. 36

This was an afternoon of novelty, for Delmas' Overture was played for the first time in America and Spelman's "Assisi" was played for the first time anywhere.

This overture is of a type long since familiar in concert rooms. Effective, well written (for it is immediately apparent that it is the work of a well schooled technician) it contains little to arrest the attention. It contains high sounding phrases, it is brilliantly orchestrated, but it in reality expresses little. Its composer, according to the program book, has won a considerable number of prizes. On hearing this overture one is not surprised at the fact, for the writer of such eminently respectable music is bound to win the esteem of juries. Of originality, of a marked individuality it shows little trace.

Upon its heels came "Assisi, the Great Pardon of St. Francis," by Timothy Mather Spelman, a graduate of Harvard University. Like the overture by Delmas, it is music of little character, and unlike that of the Frenchman, it does not exhibit the same technical mastery. M. Delmas often conceals the poverty of his musical thoughts by the gorgeous orchestral dress with which he clothes them, but Mr. Spelman possesses not this resource. He does not as yet use the orchestral medium with freedom and his music often gives the impression of a too literal translation into an unfamiliar tongue.

Yet among the pages of his score there are here and there passages of promise, passages which show that the composer has a feeling, an instinct for the language of the orchestra, although his ability to express himself in it may at times be halting. The underlying thought of the composition is poetic. A more expert hand might have brought it to more complete expression.

Then followed Ravel's delightful "Mother Goose" Suite. Here was music in which the thought and the method of its expression were in the closest agreement; and, moreover, here were real musical thoughts seeking expression. Each movement of this suite is a finely wrought jewel, the work of a master craftsman and of a poet in tones as well.

To conclude the exercises of the afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky chose to play Tchaikovsky's strident Fourth Symphony. His temperament is well suited to the Tchaikovskian ardors. And, be it said, he often contrives to give them a dignity which no other conductor in recent years has succeeded in giving them. It is possible that he takes them seriously and that the composer's fantastic melancholy really appeals to him. In any case yesterday afternoon brought forth an unusually fine performance of the symphony, in which many of its most commonplace passages were made almost convincingly sincere, a performance which was brilliant without coarseness, emotional without exaggeration or

---

PENSION CONCERT CHORALE

MAR 29

Harvard Glee and Radcliffe Choir Assist Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The performance of Brahms' "German Requiem" by the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky, given and repeated last spring as part of the Harvard Glee Club's series of concerts, was repeated at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon in aid of the Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund, and will be heard there again this evening.

Thus has a choral masterpiece, long neglected hereabouts, become at length familiar music.

HAS ITS DULL PARTS

In calling the "German Requiem" a masterpiece the reservation must be made, as with many another musical masterpiece, that in it the composer's invention is not sustained at an equal level throughout. Brahms ws hardly a deeply religious man in the sense that Bach and Cesar Franck were religious. Nor was he a composer to whom the making of salient phrases came always readily. In many passages of the Requiem he seems to be but marking time, to be not completely at grips with his subject. And no performance, not even one of the surpassing excellence of that of yesterday, can breathe life into these relatively perfunctory measures.

But in such things as the affecting opening chorus, a page whose beauty may hardly be matched in the whole range of choral music, in the chorus, "Behold All Flesh," in the chorus, "How Lovely is Thy Dwelling Place," in the superb setting of "For the Trumpet Shall Sound," and in the consoling final chorus Brahms has written music that ranks with the greatest in its particular field.

Solo Parts Beyond Voices

Yesterday, as was the case a year ago, the passages for the solo singers failed of their fullest effect. Miss Ethel Hayden and Mr. Boris Saslawsky, to whom these solo parts once more fell, are rich in good intentions, in earnestness and in intelligence, but neither has the voice to make the most of such music.

It were repetitious to dwell at length on the many notable features of the choral singing yesterday. As in the previous performance of this Requiem, and later in the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, Mr. Koussevitzky accomplished with these student-singers results that a professional chorus might envy.

Tribute to Mr. Woodworth

Again he played upon them as upon a responsive instrument. And the orchestral performance, no mere accompaniment in music such as this, was yesterday beyond all praise.

The audience, which completely filled the hall, as it bids fair to be filled again this evening, was warmly applausive, and when, at the conclusion of the concert Mr. Koussevitzky led forward G. Wallace Woodsworth, acting conductor of of the college choirs in the absence of Dr. Davison, the enthusiasm knew no bounds, as from chorus and

---

'GERMAN REQUIEM' ABLY PERFORMED

HERALD MAR 29

College Choruses Heard with Symphony Orchestra

For the spring concert in aid of the pension fund Mr. Koussevitzky conceived the happy idea of repeating Brahms's "German Requiem," which he had conducted a year ago for a concert of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. These choruses sang once more yesterday afternoon, and the soloists of last year also sang again, Ethyl Hayden, soprano, and Boris Saslawsky, baritone.

If it was Dr. Davison who deserved thanks last year for teaching that great body of young students to know, and so to love, great music, Mr. Koussevitzky merits thanks quite as hearty for giving them opportunity to study the Requiem further, and, beyond a doubt, to appreciate it the deeper. To learn a fine work and perform it once, never to sing or hear a note of it again—what is that worth? It is repetition that counts, and the knowledge that comes with it, till the beauty and the grandeur of music thus repeated sink deep into every heart.

These young people who, at the bidding of Mr. Koussevitzky and Dr. Davidson, have come to know this Requiem through and through, are not likely to forget it in a hurry; they have gained something of great price. And so have the public, the people, at all events, who have heard the Requiem twice. A pity it is the procedure cannot become a custom; a great work is surely worth hearing two times over. Then let it take its chances with the rest.

Mr. Koussevitzky, in planning yesterday's performance, must surely have argued that Brahms, being a German Protestant, had in his mind, when he wrote the Requiem, slow-moving singing such as obtains in German Protestant churches. But Brahms, according to the writings of his friends, was more markedly a musician than he was a man of churches.

However, one may argue, the heavy pace Mr. Koussevitzky too often chose yesterday made for a monotony, a dullness, which do not belong to the Requiem by right. It did away with the relief that contrast brings. It damaged the beauty of many an exquisite phrase. The task of the chorus it made very hard, for no body of sopranos or tenors either can sustain good tone on long, high notes if tempo keeps too slow.

If Mr. Koussevitzky were a choral conductor as experienced as he is orchestral, he could have shown his forces ways of phrasing that would have lightened their heavy burden, to say nothing of heightening the beauty of sound by a more adroit manipulation of varying vocal timbres. To the words, too, he could have given a finer clarity, and so greater force.

On his own ground with the orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky made much of the score sound as it has never sounded here before. And Brahms had no knack with an orchestra! The more praise, then, to Mr. Koussevitzky. One would not have suspected the fact yesterday.

The chorus sang with admirable correctness, and now and again they turned a phrase which showed their fine capabilities. They ended the Requiem espe-

---

ADVERTIS

Brahms' 'Requiem' Sung at Symphony

Chorus and orchestra united to make the performance of Brahms' "Requiem" a brilliant one yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, with Ethyl Hayden, soprano, and Boris Saslawsky, baritone, as soloists. Serge Koussevitsky led the 250 singers and full orchestra in his usual masterful style.

Instead of being mournful, this requiem is buoyant with a triumphant spirit whch the singers and orchestra both

---

BRAHMS' REQUIEM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Choruses From Radcliffe and Harvard Assist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, gave Brahms' "A German Requiem" yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall for the benefit of the pension fund for retired members of the orchestra. Mr Koussevitzky conducted. Ethel Hayden, soprano, and Boris Saslawsky, baritone, sang incidental solos.

The hall had been sold out weeks in advance. The audience applauded with considerable vigor, but there was not the tremendous enthusiasm which was roused by the Ninth Symphony last Fall. There will be a second performance tonight at 8:15.

The Harvard Glee Club last season gave a performance of Brahms' Requiem, assisted by the Radcliffe Choral Society, and by Miss Hayden and Mr Saslawsky. There was an orchestra of Boston Symphony members, and Mr Koussevitzky conducted by invitation of Dr Davison. Yesterday's concert was therefore essentially a repetition of last year's. This season, owing to Dr Davison's absence in Europe the chorus has been trained by G. Wallace Woodworth, with the assistance of Mrs Robert Winternitz, assistant conductor of the Radcliffe Choral Society.

Sung in English

"A German Requiem," opus 45, is a setting of passages from the Scriptures compiled after the manner of the text of Handel's "Messiah." It was sung yesterday in English. Brahms wrote it throughout in an austere and monotonously elegiac vein, yet some of the choruses are among his supreme achievements, notably the second number. "Behold, All Flesh Is as the Grass," which was composed as a movement for a projected symphony, then later adapted to its present purpose.

This chorus, and the final chorus, "Blessed Are the Dead Which Die in the Lord," have the noble emotionalism of the "Song of Destiny," music which to some appears Brahms' finest work. But as a whole the Requiem has the heaviness, the occasional stodginess, the not infrequent straining for effects beyond the imaginative power of the composer which causes one to regard Mozart as an infinitely greater genius than Brahms.

Mr Koussevitzky's reading is free, and at best vivid. His tempi do not accord with Brahms' directions. As usual, he is guided by his own feelings, not by metronome and other markings on the printed page. One felt that much of the Requiem would gain by being taken at a steadier and more rapid pace. This music is not the frenzied musings of a romantic mourner, it is sober, philosophical, even at worst sedate. Try as he may Mr Koussevitzky cannot make it into successful Tchaikovsky, which yesterday one felt to be his imaginative aim.

The chorus sang with a will, an imaginative eagerness which would have atoned for many technical shortcomings. But except that the sopranos did not make the words they sang audible and that there were in all the parts occasional failure to attack and release notes cleanly, one noted no chronic or serious flaws in the choral part of the performance. The fortissimo passages were all muddy in quality, but that was caused by Mr Koussevitzky's striving for quantity at the expense of quality of tone.

Pleasing Soprano

Mr Saslawsky sang the two baritone solos expressively, but with unsteady tones annoying to the many who detest any suggestion of a tremolo. Miss Hayden again showed that she has a pleasing soprano voice which she uses with no small skill. Again, as last season, the pace of her solo was set too slow by the conductor.

This concert was broadcast through Mr Quinby's generosity, so that an incalculable number of listeners had an opportunity to enjoy it. Choral music, however, is one of the most difficult things to transmit by radio, so that reception may in many cases have proved imperfect.

P. R.

Use Adamson's Cough Balsam for Coughs and Colds. At all druggists.—Ad.

Globe Mar 29

7204

HE BOSTON HERALD, SUNDAY, MARCH 28, 1926

Weekly Comment

The German Requiem of Johannes Brahms will be performed this afternoon at the Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The title is "German Requiem," for the Requiem is not that of the church.

In 1854 Brahms wrote a symphony which was never completed. The work was turned into a sonata for two pianos. The first two movements are now known as the first and second of his piano concerto in D minor; the third is the March movement in three-four time, "Behold All Flesh" in the German Requiem.

At Carlsruhe in 1866, when Brahms was 32 years old he began to write this Requiem. It was generally believed by his friends that he intended it to be a memorial to his mother, Johanna, who died in 1865. Clara Schumann once said: "We all think he wrote it in her memory though he has never expressly said so." Joachim in his address at the Brahms Memorial Festival at Meiningen, in October, 1899, referred to this Requiem: "Never has a nobler monument been raised by filial love." The movement of the unfinished symphony, which is now the march "Behold All Flesh," was due to Brahms's grief over the tragedy of Schumann's sickness.

He worked on the Requiem while he was dwelling in Zurich and completed it at Lichtenthal, with the exception of the fifth number. In September, 1866, Clara Schumann wrote in her diary that Johannes had been playing to her some "magnificent movements" out of a Requiem of his own. "It is full of tender and again daring thoughts."

There was anxiety about the time and place of the production. Brahms was conscious of the music's worth and wished it to be brought out under the most favorable circumstances. The first performance of the work as originally completed was to take place under his direction in the Bremen Cathedral on Good Friday, April 10, 1868.

On Dec. 1, 1867, the Gesellschaft Concert in Vienna was devoted to the memory of Schubert. The first three numbers of the Requiem were then performed. The second part of the program consisted of selections from Schubert's "Rosamunde" which were then heard in a concert hall for the first time. The choruses of the Requiem were sung by the Singverein; the baritone solo by Dr. Paenzer of the Imperial Chapel.

The first two movements met with some approval, but the music as a whole did not please. In the famous pedal-point the drummer played the "D" forte throughout and drowned the chorus. When Brahms appeared on the platform, there were unmistakable signs of disapproval mingled with the applause of his friends. This led Hanslick to write in his review that the seriousness of the work should alone have commanded respect. "This seems not to have been the case with half a dozen gray-haired fanatics of the old school, who had the rudeness to greet the applauding majority and the composer, as he appeared, with prolonged hissing—a requiem on the decorum and good manners of a Vienna concert-room which astonishes and grieves us." Hirsch spoke of the "heathenish noise" of the kettledrums and said that the opposition was in an immense majority. Dr. Billroth found an intentional avoidance of the sensuous in Brahms as a composer and a pianist. "The Requiem is so nobly spiritual and so Protestant Bachish that it was difficult to make it go down here. The hissing and clapping became really violent; it was a party conflict. In the end the applause conquered."

Brahms took his text from various books of the Old and New Testament, also from the Apocrypha. There was no thought of doctrinal purpose. His text was from the Bible, and the passages chosen represented to Protestant nations "the highest aspirations of man." These passages were so arranged as to present in succession "the ascending ideas of sorrow consoled, doubt overcome, death vanquished. That they open and close with the thought of love is not of necessity to be ascribed solely to the artistic requirements of the work, or the exigencies of its sacred theme. Whoever has studied Brahms's life and works with sympathetic insight will be aware that the suggestion of love triumphant runs through both like a continuous silver thread." Thus writes Miss Florence May, though some have not agreed and do not agree with her.

Brahms went to Bremen on April 1, 1868, as the guest of Carl Reinthaler. The program of the sacred concert in St. Peter's Cathedral Church on Good Friday evening included the German Requiem (Julius Stockhausen singing the baritone solo), with miscellaneous music between the first and second parts: music by Bach, Tartini and Schumann's "Abenilied" played by Joachim; "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth" (Mme. Joachim); air for contralto with violin obbligato from Bach's "Matthew Passion" (Mme. Joachim and her husband, and the "Hallelujah" Chorus. Brahms conducted the Requiem; Reinthaler the remaining selections. All the soloists gave their services.

The doors of the cathedral were opened at 6 P. M. and for a hour the crowd poured in. Shortly before the time for beginning Clara Schumann walked up the nave on Brahms's arm. The performance of the Requiem was said to be all that Brahms could have desired.

After the performance there was a supper in the old Rathskeller. Speeches were made, one by John Farmer, who came all the way from England.

Later in the year Brahms sojourned at Bonn, preparing the manuscript of the Requiem for the engraver. Playing the music, he said to his friend, Dr. Deiters, in the course of the just completed fifth number, "I will comfort you as a mother comforts," that he had thought here of his own mother.

After the final completion and publication, the first performance was at a Gewandhaus concert in Leipsic on Feb. 18, 1869. Reinecke conducted. Basle, Carlsruhe, Cologne, Hamburg, Zurich, Weimar and even Chemnitz and Jena, not to mention other towns heard the Requiem before the complete work was performed in Vienna on March 5, 1871, with Mme. Wilt and Dr. Krauss, solo singers. The composer conducted, but the Requiem did not meet with noteworthy success.

The first performance in England was for an invited audience at the house of Sir Henry Thompson, July 7, 1871. Stockhausen conducted and sang the baritone solo; Anna Regan, the soprano solo. There was a chorus of about 30; the accompaniments were played as a piano duet by Lady Thompson and Cipriani Potter, who was then in his 80th year. There was a public performance by the Philharmonic Society, London, on April 2, 1873: W. G. Cusins, conductor; Charles Santley and Sophie Ferrari, singers of the solos. There is mention of an earlier performance at a students' concert of the Royal Academy of Music, London, John Hullah, conductor.

There was a performance at Leningrad in 1872; in Paris in 1874.

The first performance in the United States was by the Symphony Society at New York on March 15, 1877. Dr. Leopold Damrosch conducted; the solo singers were Marie von Heimburg and A. E. Stoddard.

This society did not perform the work again until Nov. 27, 1891, when Walter Damrosch conducted.

The first performance in Boston was by the Cecilia Society, B. J. Lang, conductor, on Dec. 3, 1888. The solo singers were Elizabeth C. Hamlin and Eliot Hubbard. Dvorak's "Patriotic Hymn" was also performed at this concert.

P. H.

Monitor
MAR. 29

Novelties on Program of Boston Orchestra

The program of the twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, was:

Delmas	Overture "Penthésilée"
Spelman	"Assisi, the Great Pardon of St. Francis"
Ravel	"Ma Mère l'Oye"
Tchaikovsky	Symphony No. 4 in F minor op. 36

This was an afternoon of novelty, for Delmas' Overture was played for the first time in America and Spelman's "Assisi" was played for the first time anywhere.

This overture is of a type long since familiar in concert rooms. Effective, well written (for it is immediately apparent that it is the work of a well schooled technician) it contains little to arrest the attention. It contains high sounding phrases, it is brilliantly orchestrated, but it in reality expresses little. Its composer, according to the program book, has won a considerable number of prizes. On hearing this overture one is not surprised at the fact, for the writer of such eminently respectable music is bound to win the esteem of juries. Of originality, of a marked individuality it shows little trace.

Upon its heels came "Assisi, the Great Pardon of St. Francis," by Timothy Mather Spelman, a graduate of Harvard University. Like the overture by Delmas, it is music of little character, and unlike that of the Frenchman, it does not exhibit the same technical mastery. M. Delmas often conceals the poverty of his musical thoughts by the gorgeous orchestral dress with which he clothes them, but Mr. Spelman possesses not this resource. He does not as yet use the orchestral medium with freedom and his music often gives the impression of a too literal translation into an unfamiliar tongue.

Yet among the pages of his score there are here and there passages of promise, passages which show that the composer has a feeling, an instinct for the language of the orchestra, although his ability to express himself in it may at times be halting. The underlying thought of the composition is poetic. A more expert hand might have brought it to more complete expression.

Then followed Ravel's delightful "Mother Goose" Suite. Here was music in which the thought and the method of its expression were in the closest agreement; and, moreover, here were real musical thoughts seeking expression. Each movement of this suite is a finely wrought jewel, the work of a master craftsman and of a poet in tones as well.

To conclude the exercises of the afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky chose to play Tchaikovsky's strident Fourth Symphony. His temperament is well suited to the Tchaikovskian ardors. And, be it said, he often contrives to give them a dignity which no other conductor in recent years has succeeded in giving them. It is possible that he takes them seriously and that the composer's fantastic melancholy really appeals to him. In any case yesterday afternoon brought forth an unusually fine performance of the symphony, in which many of its most commonplace passages were made almost convincingly sincere, a performance which was brilliant without coarseness, emotional without exaggeration or false theatricalism.

The same may not be said, without some reservations, of the playing of Ravel's suite. The exquisite refinement of this music seemed somewhat beyond Mr. Koussevitzky's ken. Too often was he consciously subtle. It is perhaps difficult for Mr. Koussevitzky to be simple, but Ravel's music is all artful simplicity. Mozartian in its clarity, and so its essence often escaped Mr. Koussevitzky.

S. M.

PENSION CONCERT CHORALE

Post MAR 29

Harvard Glee and Radcliffe Choir Assist Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The performance of Brahms' "German Requiem" by the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky, given and repeated last spring as part of the Harvard Glee Club's series of concerts, was repeated at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon in aid of the Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund, and will be heard there again this evening.

Thus has a choral masterpiece, long neglected hereabouts, become at length familiar music.

HAS ITS DULL PARTS

In calling the "German Requiem" a masterpiece the reservation must be made, as with many another musical masterpiece, that in it the composer's invention is not sustained at an equal level throughout. Brahms ws hardly a deeply religious man in the sense that Bach and Cesar Franck were religious. Nor was he a composer to whom the making of salient phrases came always readily. In many passages of the Requiem he seems to be but marking time, to be not completely at grips with his subject. And no performance, not even one of the surpassing excellence of that of yesterday, can breathe life into these relatively perfunctory measures.

But in such things as the affecting opening chorus, a page whose beauty may hardly be matched in the whole range of choral music, in the chorus, "Behold All Flesh," in the chorus, "How Lovely is Thy Dwelling Place," in the superb setting of "For the Trumpet Shall Sound," and in the consoling final chorus Brahms has written music that ranks with the greatest in its particular field.

Solo Parts Beyond Voices

Yesterday, as was the case a year ago, the passages for the solo singers failed of their fullest effect. Miss Ethel Hayden and Mr. Boris Saslawsky, to whom these solo parts once more fell, are rich in good intentions, in earnestness and in intelligence, but neither has the voice to make the most of such music.

It were repetitious to dwell at length on the many notable features of the choral singing yesterday. As in the previous performance of this Requiem, and later in the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, Mr. Koussevitzky accomplished with these student-singers results that a professional chorus might envy.

Tribute to Mr. Woodworth

Again he played upon them as upon a responsive instrument. And the orchestral performance, no mere accompaniment in music such as this, was yesterday beyond all praise.

The audience, which completely filled the hall, as it bids fair to be filled again this evening, was warmly applausive, and when, at the conclusion of the concert Mr. Koussevitzky led forward G. Wallace Woodsworth, acting conductor of of the college choirs in the absence of Dr. Davison, the enthusiasm knew no bounds, as from chorus and audience alike cheers mingled with the clapping.

'GERMAN REQUIEM' ABLY PERFORMED

HERALD ~~MAR~~ 29

College Choruses Heard with Symphony Orchestra

For the spring concert in aid of the pension fund Mr. Koussevitzky conceived the happy idea or repeating Brahms's "German Requiem," which he had conducted a year ago for a concert of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. These choruses sang once more yesterday afternoon, and the soloists of last year also sang again, Ethyl Hayden, soprano, and Boris Saslawsky, baritone.

If it was Dr. Davison who deserved thanks last year for teaching that great body of young students to know, and so to love, great music, Mr. Koussevitzky merits thanks quite as hearty for giving them opportunity to study the Requiem further, and, beyond a doubt, to appreciate it the deeper. To learn a fine work and perform it once, never to sing or hear a note of it again—what is that worth? It is repetition that counts, and the knowledge that comes with it, till the beauty and the grandeur of music thus repeated sink deep into every heart.

These young people who, at the bidding of Mr. Koussevitzky and Dr. Davidson, have come to know this Requiem through and through, are not likely to forget it in a hurry; they have gained something of great price. And so have the public, the people, at all events, who have heard the Requiem twice. A pity it is the procedure cannot become a custom; a great work is surely worth hearing two times over. Then let it take its chances with the rest.

Mr. Koussevitzky, in planning yesterday's performance, must surely have argued that Brahms, being a German Protestant, had in his mind, when he wrote the Requiem, slow-moving singing such as obtains in German Protestant churches. But Brahms, according to the writings of his friends, was more markedly a musician than he was a man of churches.

However, one may argue, the heavy pace Mr. Koussevitzky too often chose yesterday made for a monotony, a dullness, which do not belong to the Requiem by right. It did away with the relief that contrast brings. It damaged the beauty of many an exquisite phrase. The task of the chorus it made very hard, for no body of sopranos or tenors either can sustain good tone on long, high notes if tempo keeps too slow.

If Mr. Koussevitzky were a choral conductor as experienced as he is orchestral, he could have shown his forces ways of phrasing that would have lightened their heavy burden, to say nothing of heightening the beauty of sound by a more adroit manipulation of varying vocal timbres. To the words, too, he could have given a finer clarity, and so greater force.

On his own ground with the orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky made much of the score sound as it has never sounded here before. And Brahms had no knack with an orchestra! The more praise, then, to Mr. Koussevitzky. One would not have suspected the fact yesterday.

The chorus sang with admirable correctness, and now and again they turned a phrase which showed their fine capabilities. They ended the Requiem espe-

---

ADVERTI MAR

Brahms' 'Requiem' Sung at Symphony

Chorus and orchestra united to make the performance of Brahms' "Requiem" a brilliant one yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, with Ethyl Hayden, soprano, and Boris Saslawsky, baritone, as soloists. Serge Koussevitsky led the 250 singers and full orchestra in his usual masterful style.

Instead of being mournful, this requiem is buoyant with a triumphant spirit whch the singers and orchestra both interpreted in full measure. The concert, for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension fund, will be repeated tonight.

G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor both of the Harvard and Radcliffe groups, shared the ovation at the end of the program. Both soloists were heartily applauded also.

white and orchid. Sizes 36 to 42.
Women's Rayon Vests, bodice style; pink, peach, white and orchid. Sizes 36 to 42 .... 1.25
.... 98c
Women's Brassieres
Women's Brassieres, long lines, elastic shoulder straps. Pink rayon stripe, boned front and back. Four-inch elastic section. Four hose supporters. Hook side 1.50
Women's Handkerchiefs
Georgette Handkerchiefs, with one-inch hemstitched hems and embroidered corners. In many attractive colors. Each in Large Head sizes.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AKRON, O.
PRESS Jund

DEC 5 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY FAILS AS ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR

New York Critic Says He Is Convinced That Virtuosoship On Double-Bass Does Not Insure Capacity To Handle Symphony Band

By PIERRE V. R. KEY
New York Music Critic for the Beacon Journal

NEW YORK, Dec. 5.—A big name, where musicians are concerned does not guarantee always unusual ability in more than one way. Experience has taught me that eminent singers rarely make good teachers; and I am at length convinced beyond any doubt that virtuosoship on the double-bass does not insure the capacity to conduct a symphony orchestra.

Serge Koussevitzky has proven this to my complete satisfaction. Mr. Koussevitzky came to the Boston Symphony band a year ago amid a wild hullabaloo. The cultured Hubites purred and preened themselves for something quite grand. For a time there was no blow-up. The Russian double-bass player who had money to pay for special orchestra concerts in European capitals managed fairly well during his early appearances. But once he settled to his work the outer skin of his conducting resources slipped completely off. It left him as he is: a mediocre leader of symphonic music, plus personality and a manner that turns matters his way—for a while.

High Class Conductor

Readers of this column will recall my disinclination to commit myself as to Koussevitzky at his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony men. They will remember too, I think, that each reappearance of the Bostonians' chief left me less satisfied. Now I am ready to pronounce this man a first-class second-class conductor, a rating rather high at that.

When a conductor juggles with tempi as Koussevitzky does it is time to set him down as one of two things. A music experimenter or a seeker of oddities at the expense of his men. There were spots in his reading of the Tschaikowsky pathetique symphony the other evening when the Boston orchestra could scarcely play the notes. Think of a racing speed too great for so fine a body of instrumentalists! Then there were such additional matters as Koussevitzky individuality in phrasing and dynamics. It was a music hodge podge of which a sincere musician would be ashamed, but Koussevitzky goes serenely on, feted by Boston society, and fussed over no end. It is just about the limit. Too much for New York, who got that way only once within my memory. That was when Josef Stransky hypnotized some old time Philharmonic folk, during a period which now happily is gone.

A New Composition

One novelty on Koussevitzky's first program was Eichheim's A Chinese Tale, which proved to be an intriguing work with a host of oriental color but of needless length. The second first time work for New York was Ibert's Escales (Ports of Call), the ports suggested musically being Palermo, Tunis-Nefta, and Valencia. There are some nice rhythms and color effects, and the piece serves a certain purpose.

The second Boston Symphony concert which followed the first by 48 hours, brought forward the Brahms C minor symphony. It is a pity Brahms was not present to have heard the work, for Koussevitzky evidently felt he could improve upon it (in those matters of tempi and dynamics previously referred to).

There were other compositions performed, but there is no need to go particularly into detail concerning them. There were given Koussevitzky readings which are not, as one may gather by this time, closely related to those most of us regard as reasonably consistent.

Miss Farrar Quiescent

Our much loved Geraldine Farrar has gone and gotten sick, right at the beginning of her season as a comic opera star. The tour of her organization has been suspended temporarily, and the members of the company given their two weeks' notice. All of which would indicate that the fair Gerry is not in the best of health.

It really would be an excellent thing for this American prima-donna-that-was. She has gone on incessantly, often driving herself when she should have considered her own strength.

I personally regret that Miss Farrar has chosen to finish a glorious career with such an anti-climax as appearing (and for the sake of dollars) in comic opera. I should prefer to have remembered her as a great artiste, something which I find it as difficult to do as some of my friends and acquaintances.

Big Music Guns

Some big music guns have been booming of late in this vicinity. There were Paderewski, Rachmaninoff, Roland Hayes; and Maier and Pattison, the wizard piano duettists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

DEC 5 — 1925

Boston Symphony

The second visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra to Providence will take place a week from next Tuesday evening for a concert in Infantry Hall. Serge Koussevitzky will then present three numbers from the music of his ountrymen—Liadov's Fragment from he Apocalypse, a symphonic picture; he same composer's "Kikimora," a iry folk tale on the children's legend the Russian witch, and a suite from msky-Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Sal- ." The symphony of the evening l be the first of Brahms, in C minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

DEC 6 1925

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

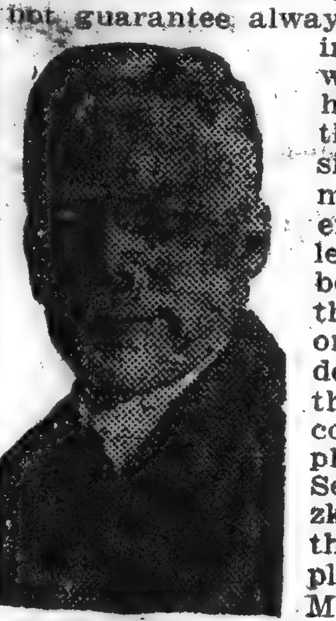
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Which Will Be Heard in Infantry Hall Tuesday, Dec. 15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
LOUISVILLE, KY.

DEC 6 1925

By PIER

New York, Dec. 5.—A big name, where musicians are concerned, does not guarantee always unusual ability in more than one way. Experience has taught me that eminent singers rarely make good teachers; and I am at length convinced beyond any doubt that virtuosoship on the double-bass does not insure the capacity to conduct a symphony orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky has proven this to my complete satisfaction. Mr. Koussevitzky came to the Boston Symphony band a year ago amid a wild hullabaloo. The cultured Hubites purred and preened themselves for something grand. For a time there was no blow-up. The Russian double-bass player who had money to pay for special orchestra concerts in European capitals managed fairly well during his early appearances. But once he settled to his work the outer skin of his conducting resources slipped completely off. It left him as he is, a mediocre leader of symphonic music, plus personality and a manner that turns matters his way—for a while.



PIERRE V. R. KEY

Readers of this column will recall my disinclination to commit myself as to Koussevitzky at his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony men. They will remember, too, I think, that each reappearance of the Bostonians' chief left me less satisfied. Now I am ready to pronounce this man a first-class second-class conductor, a rating rather high at that.

When a conductor juggles with tempi as Koussevitzky does it is time to set him down as one of two things. A music experimenter or a seeker of oddities at the expense of his men. There were spots in his reading of the Tschaikowsky pathetique symphony the other evening when the Boston orchestra could scarcely play the notes. Think of a racing speed too great for so fine a body of instrumentalists! Then there were such additional matters as Koussevitzky indivuality in phrasing and dynamics. It was a music hodge podge of which a sincere musician would be ashamed, but Koussevitzky goes serenely on, feted by Boston society, and fussed over no end. It is just about the limit. Too much for New York, who got that way only once within my memory. That was when Josef Stransky hypnotized some old-time Philharmonic folk, during a period which now happily is gone.

* * *

A New Composition.

One novelty on Koussevitzky's first program was Eichheim's "A Chinese Tale," which proved to be an intriguing work with a host of oriental color but of needless length. The second first time work for New York was Ibert's "Escales" (Ports of Call), the

A memorable debut was made by Luella Melius, American coloratura soprano, when she recently sang in opera for the first time in this country in a Chicago performance of Rigoletto.

ports suggested musically being Palermo, Tunis-Nefta, and Valencia. There are some nice rhythms and color effects, and the piece serves a certain purpose.

The second Boston Symphony concert which followed the first by forty-eight hours, brought forward the Brahms C minor symphony. It is a pity Brahms was not present to have heard the work, for Koussevitzky evidently felt he could improve upon it (in those matters of tempi and dynamics previously referred to).

There were other compositions performed, but there is no need to go particularly into detail concerning them. There were given Koussevitzky readings which are not, as one may gather by this time, closely related to those most of us regard as reasonably consistent.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

DEC 6 — 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY SOON COMES TO HARTFORD

Celebrated Russian Conductor Leads Boston Symphony Feb. 7.

Probably no conductor who has come to our shores for a number of years has attracted so much attention and interest as Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is to appear in Hartford at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 7, with this world-famous organization.

An enviable reputation preceded his first coming to America. In London and Paris for the last five years his name has stood for all that is striking, engrossing, and vital in orchestral conducting. America had had many reports of his brilliant sympathies and impassioned convictions. He may well have been called the outstanding musical personality of Europe.

Russia has claimed the larger part of Koussevitzky's earlier career. First known as a remarkable virtuoso of the doublebass, he soon gave all his energies to the more extensive field of conducting. His first conspicuous achievement as a conductor was the famous orchestra which he organized in Moscow. He assembled his country's best musicians, subsidized them that his hand might be entirely free, and drilled them into a splendid organization. In Moscow and Petrograd, Bach and Beethoven festivals figured among his concerts. He likewise championed music of

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

DEC 7 1925

Music Notes

The announcement that Eugene Goossens is to conduct three concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in January has been enthusiastically received in that city, according to a letter from W. H. Brennan, manager of the famous ensemble. The Boston papers were extremely cordial in their comment on the announcement that the leader of the Rochester Philharmonic was to appear there.

"An invitation to a guest conductor" says the Boston Evening Transcript, "bids fair to become an annual and profitable custom at the Symphony concerts. The permanent conductor enjoys a week's holiday midway; the subscribing public takes the pleasure of a new face, a new hand, a new interest and, among the doctors, change is an approved prescription.

"However well-reputed and high placed the guest may be, no numerous company in Boston—is likely to hear him with a strange orchestra. Called to the Symphony concerts, he is assured of audiences. He may even stir some to curiosity and others to debate."

Mr. Goossens will conduct his last matinee concert with the Philharmonic until February 4 on Thursday afternoon of this week at the Eastman Theater.

There will be no concerts during the holidays and during most of January Mr. Goossens will be absent from the city, conducting the New York Symphony in six concerts in that city early in the month and the Boston Symphony in Providence on January 19 and in Boston January 22 and 23

Roslyn Weisberg, the talented young American pianist who received her advanced training at the Eastman School of Music, where she was awarded the first piano degree, will be the soloist Thursday afternoon, playing the Grieg Concerto in A. Minor.

The program will include the first movement of the Brandenburg Concerto for Strings by Bach; the "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart; Malipiero's "Impressions from Nature" and the Sibelius tone poem, "Finlandia."

The sale of seats opens this morning at 10 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

DEC 20 1925

An examination of subscription lists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra discloses that only 26 per cent. of the patrons live in Boston. Fifty-nine per cent. come from the suburbs of that city and the remaining 15 per cent. from outlying cities and towns.

Arthur Middleton has been engaged

05

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

DEC 16 1925

SYMPHONY SCORES ANOTHER TRIUMPH

Throng in Infantry Hall Applauds Boston Orchestra.

Infantry Hall was the scene last night of another triumph of Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston symphony orchestra. The audience of over 1700 were highly pleased with the efforts of the musicians and the conductor was forced to return numerous times to encores. Mr. Koussevitzky was the artist last evening, his musicians seemingly having sunk their own personality into that of the conductor, and the pirture painted by music was marvelous.

This was the programme: Fragment from the "Apocalypse," Liadov; "Symphonic Picture, Op. 66;" "Kikimora," a folk fairy tale, Op. 63, Liadov; suite from the opera, "Tsar Saltan," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Symphony No. 1 in C-minor, Op. 68," Brahms.

Liadov's penchant for strength, color contrast and striking instrumentation was revealed in the two numbers played by the orchestra.

Koussevitzky indulged his imaginative talent in conducting the suite for orchestra from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan." It was a remarkable vehicle for the conductor to display his ability and the blending of brass instruments with the stringed instruments produced a splendid result.

The awful grandeur of the symphony was never better demonstrated than it was last night. Brahms, never an impatient man, did not hurry in producing his symphony in C-minor, with the result that his crowning effort is aced 10th in the rank of sympho- es. His calm, serene nature is re- aled in his masterpiece, although at periods Koussevitzky would have given the impression that Brahms was a man of extreme passion, and had indulged his passions in his symphony. The rendition revealed the temperament of the conductor and, while it departed from the usual presentation which has been accepted as part of ulted in passages of power.

o which the

ing passages

G FROM

CE, R. I.

TIN

ONY

AUDIEN

and Play

Concert,

nd his Bos

vening gave

ries in Infan

dience attend

red in the pr

sevitzky be co

at role. Doub

eners this wa

usseyitzky tha

Rimsky

re his

on last evenin and a hundred sive artists his instrument.

This was the programme:

Fragment from the Apocalypse.....
Symphonic Picture, Op. 66.
"Kikimora," a folk fairy-tale, Op. 6
Suite from the Opera, "Tsar Saltan
Rimsky-
Symphony No. 1 in C-minor; Op. 68.

legend. Both pieces received a technically and clear and pleasing presentation.

Rimsky-Korsakov's suite for orchestra, from the "Tsar Saltan," is based upon another fairy tale. It is written in his colorful style and abounds in effects produced by blaring brass and percussion instruments. Koussevitzky here found an excellent vehicle for indulging his imaginative talent and the result was a brilliant performance. After the close, he received many recalls.

With the Brahms symphony, however, came the best performance of the evening. This fine work, written when its composer was a young man, is one that grows in interest with repeated hearings. Brahms, a master in the use of orchestral technique, always has something ele- [illegible] to say. He had the rare faculty [illegible] sustained creative thought. Dignity [illegible] beauty go hand in hand in music [illegible] of his calm, serene nature. What [illegible]endous power and grandeur. This

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AKRON, O.
PRESS

DEC 5 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY FAILS AS ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR

New York Critic Says He Is Convinced That Virtuosoship On Double-Bass Does Not Insure Capacity To Handle Symphony Band

By PIERRE V. R. KEY
New York Music Critic for the Beacon Journal

NEW YORK, Dec. 5.—A big name, where musicians are concerned does not guarantee always unusual ability in more than one way. Experience has taught me that eminent singers rarely make good teachers; and I am at length convinced beyond any doubt that virtuosoship on the double-bass does not insure the capacity to conduct a symphony orchestra.

Serge Koussevitzky has proven this to my complete satisfaction. Mr. Koussevitzky came to the Boston Symphony band a year ago amid a wild hullabaloo. The cultured Hubites purred and preened themselves for something quite grand. For a time there was no blow-up. The Russian double-bass player who had money to pay for special orchestra concerts in European capitals managed fairly well during his early appearances. But once he settled to his work the outer skin of his conducting resources slipped completely off. It left him as he is: a mediocre leader of symphonic music, plus personality and a manner that turns matters his way—for a while.

High Class Conductor

Readers of this column will recall my disinclination to commit myself as to Koussevitzky at his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony men. They will remember too, I think, that each reappearance of the Bostonians' chief left me less satisfied. Now I am ready to pronounce this man a first-class second-class conductor, a rating rather high at that.

When a conductor juggles with tempi as Koussevitzky does it is time to set him down as one of two things. A music experimenter or a seeker of oddities at the expense of his men. There were spots in his reading of the Tschaikowsky pathetique symphony the other evening when the Boston orchestra could scarcely play the notes. Think of a racing speed too great for so fine a body of instrumentalists! Then there were such additional matters as Koussevitzky individuality in phrasing and dynamics. It was a music hodge podge of which a sincere musician would be ashamed, but Koussevitzky goes serenely on, feted by Boston society, and fussed over no end. It is just about the limit. Too much for New York, who got that way only once within my memory. That was when Josef Stransky hypnotized some old time Philharmonic folk, during a period which now happily is gone.

A New Composition

One novelty on Koussevitzky's first program was Eichheim's A Chinese Tale, which proved to be an intriguing work with a host of oriental color but of needless length. The second first time work for New York was Ibert's Escales (Ports of Call), the ports suggested musically being Palermo, Tunis-Nefta, and Valencia. There are some nice rhythms and color effects, and the piece serves a certain purpose.

The second Boston Symphony concert which followed the first by 48 hours, brought forward the Brahms C minor symphony. It is a pity Brahms was not present to have heard the work, for Koussevitzky evidently felt he could improve upon it (in those matters of tempi and dynamics previously referred to).

There were other compositions performed, but there is no need to go particularly into detail concerning them. There were given Koussevitzky readings which are not, as one may gather by this time, closely related to those most of us regard as reasonably consistent.

Miss Farrar Quiescent

Our much loved Geraldine Farrar has gone and gotten sick, right at the beginning of her season as a comic opera star. The tour of her organization has been suspended temporarily, and the members of the company given their two weeks' notice. All of which would indicate that the fair Gerry is not in the best of health.

It really would be an excellent thing for this American prima-donna-that-was. She has gone on incessantly, often driving herself when she should have considered her own strength.

I personally regret that Miss Farrar has chosen to finish a glorious career with such an anti-climax as appearing (and for the sake of dollars) in comic opera. I should prefer to have remembered her as a great artiste, something which I find it as difficult to do as some of my friends and acquaintances.

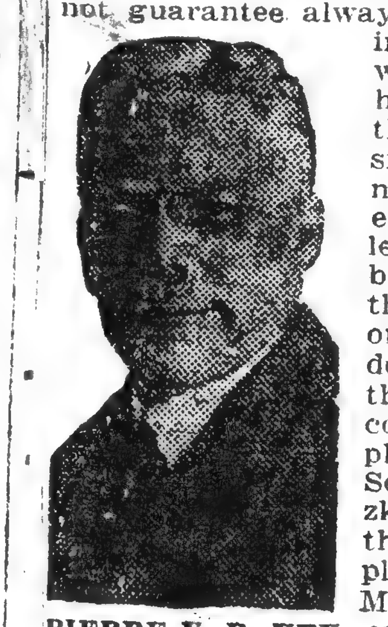
Big Music Guns

Some big music guns have been booming of late in this vicinity. There were Paderewski, Rachmaninoff, Roland Hayes; and Maier and Pattison, the wizard piano duettists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
LOUISVILLE, KY.

DEC 8 1925

By PIER



PIERRE V. R. KEY

New York, Dec. 5.—A big name, where musicians are concerned, does not guarantee always unusual ability in more than one way. Experience has taught me that eminent singers rarely make good teachers; and I am at length convinced beyond any doubt that virtuosoship on the double-bass does not insure the capacity to conduct a symphony orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky has proven this to my complete satisfaction. Mr. Koussevitzky came to the Boston Symphony band a year ago ~~amid~~ a wild hullabaloo. The cultured Hubites purred and preened themselves for something grand. For a time there was no blow-up. The Russian double-bass player who had money to pay for special orchestra concerts in European capitals managed fairly well during his early appearances. But once he settled to his work the outer skin of his conducting resources slipped completely off. It left him as he is, a mediocre leader of symphonic music, plus personality and a manner that turns matters his way—for a while.

Readers of this column will recall my disinclination to commit myself as to Koussevitzky at his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony men. They will remember, too, I think, that each reappearance of the Bostonians' chief left me less satisfied. Now I am ready to pronounce this man a first-class second-class conductor, a rating rather high at that.

When a conductor juggles with tempi as Koussevitzky does it is time to set him down as one of two things. A music experimenter or a seeker of oddities at the expense of his men. There were spots in his reading of the Tschaikowsky pathetique symphony the other evening when the Boston orchestra could scarcely play the notes. Think of a racing speed too great for so fine a body of instrumentalists! Then there were such additional matters as Koussevitzky indivuality in phrasing and dynamics. It was music hodge podge of which a sincere musician would be ashamed, but Koussevitzky goes serenely on, feted by Boston society, and fussed over no end. It is just about the limit. Too much for New York, who got that way only once within my memory. That was when Josef Stransky hypnotized some old-time Philharmonic folk, during a period which now happily is gone.

* * *

A New Composition.

One novelty on Koussevitzky's first program was Eichheim's "A Chinese Tale," which proved to be an intriguing work with a host of oriental color but of needless length. The second first time work for New York was Ibert's "Escales" (Ports of Call), the

A memorable debut was made by Luella Melius, American coloratura soprano, when she recently sang in opera for the first time in this country in a Chicago performance of Rigoletto.

ports suggested musically being Palermo, Tunis-Nefta, and Valencia. There are some nice rhythms and color effects, and the piece serves a certain purpose.

The second Boston Symphony concert which followed the first by forty-eight hours, brought forward the Brahms C minor symphony. It is a pity Brahms was not present to have heard the work, for Koussevitzky evidently felt he could improve upon it (in those matters of tempi and dynamics previously referred to).

There were other compositions performed, but there is no need to go particularly into detail concerning them. There were given Koussevitzky readings which are not, as one may gather by this time, closely related to those most of us regard as reasonably consistent.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

Dec 8 1925

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Which Will Be Heard in Infantry Hall Tuesday, Dec. 15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

C 5 - 1925

Boston Symphony

The second visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra to Providence will take place a week from next Tuesday evening for a concert in Infantry Hall. Serge Koussevitzky will then present three numbers from the music of his countrymen—Liadov's Fragment from the Apocalypse, a symphonic picture; the same composer's "Kikimora," a fairy folk tale on the children's legend of the Russian witch, and a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan." The symphony of the evening will be the first of Brahms, in C minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

DEC 8 - 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY SOON COMES TO HARTFORD

Celebrated Russian Conductor Leads Boston Symphony Feb. 7.

Probably no conductor who has come to our shores for a number of years has attracted so much attention and interest as Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is to appear in Hartford at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 7, with this world-famous organization.

An enviable reputation preceded his first coming to America. In London and Paris for the last five years his name has stood for all that is striking, engrossing, and vital in orchestral conducting. America had had many reports of his brilliant sympathies and impassioned convictions. He may well have been called the outstanding musical personality of Europe.

Russia has claimed the larger part of Koussevitzky's earlier career. First known as a remarkable virtuoso of the doublebass, he soon gave all his energies to the more extensive field of conducting. His first conspicuous achievement as a conductor was the famous orchestra which he organized in Moscow. He assembled his country's best musicians, subsidized them that his hand might be entirely free, and drilled them into a splendid organization. In Moscow and Petrograd, Bach and Beethoven festivals figured among his concerts. He likewise championed music of

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

DEC 7 1925

Music Notes

The announcement that Eugene Goossens is to conduct three concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in January has been enthusiastically received in that city, according to a letter from W. H. Brennan, manager of the famous ensemble. The Boston papers were extremely cordial in their comment on the announcement that the leader of the Rochester Philharmonic was to appear there.

"An invitation to a guest conductor" says the Boston Evening Transcript, "bids fair to become an annual and profitable custom at the Symphony concerts. The permanent conductor enjoys a week's holiday midway; the subscribing public takes the pleasure of a new face, a new hand, a new interest and, among the doctors, change is an approved prescription.

"However well-reputed and high placed the guest may be, no numerous company in Boston—is likely to hear him with a strange orchestra. Called to the Symphony concerts, he is assured of audiences. He may even stir some to curiosity and others to debate."

Mr. Goossens will conduct his last matinee concert with the Philharmonic until February 4 on Thursday afternoon of this week at the Eastman Theater.

There will be no concerts during the holidays and during most of January Mr. Goossens will be absent from the city, conducting the New York Symphony in six concerts in that city early in the month and the Boston Symphony in Providence on January 19 and in Boston January 22 and 23.

Roslyn W.isberg, the talented young American pianist who received her advanced training at the Eastman School of Music, where she was awarded the first piano degree, will be the soloist Thursday afternoon, playing the Grieg Concerto in A. Minor.

The program will include the first movement of the Brandenburg Concerto for Strings by Bach; the "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart; Malipiero's "Impressions from Nature" and the Sibelius tone poem, "Finlandia."

The sale of seats opens this morning at 10 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

DEC 20 1925

An examination of subscription lists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra discloses that only 26 per cent. of the patrons live in Boston. Fifty-nine per cent. come from the suburbs of that city and the remaining 15 per cent. from outlying cities and towns.

Arthur Middleton has been engaged

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

16 19

SYMPHONY SCORES ANOTHER TRIUMPH

Throng in Infantry Hall Applauds Boston Orchestra.

Infantry Hall was the scene last night of another triumph of Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston symphony orchestra. The audience of over 1700 were highly pleased with the efforts of the musicians and the conductor was forced to return numerous times to encores. Mr. Koussevitzky was the artist last evening, his musicians seemingly having sunk their own personality into that of the conductor, and the pirture painted by music was marvelous.

This was the programme: Fragment from the "Apocalypse," Liadov; "Symphonic Picture, Op. 66;" "Kikimora," a folk fairy tale, Op. 63, Liadov; suite from the opera, "Tsar Saltan," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Symphony No. 1 in C-minor, Op. 68," Brahms.

Liadov's penchant for strength, color contrast and striking instrumentation was revealed in the two numbers played by the orchestra.

Koussevitzky indulged his imaginative talent in conducting the suite for orchestra from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan." It was a remarkable vehicle for the conductor to display his ability and the blending of brass instruments with the stringed instruments produced a splendid result.

The awful grandeur of the symphony was never better demonstrated than it was last night. Brahms, never an impatient man, did not hurry in producing his symphony in C-minor, with the result that his crowning effort is ...ced 10th in the rank of symphonies. His calm, serene nature is revealed in his masterpiece, although at periods Koussevitzky would have given the impression that Brahms was a man of extreme passion, and had indulged his passions in his symphony. The rendition revealed the temperament of the conductor and, while it departed from the usual presentation which has been accepted as part of ...ulted in passages of ... power.

...o which the ...ing passages

...G FROM
...CE, R. I.
...TIN

...ONY
... AUDIEN...

...and Play...
Concert.

...nd his Bos...
...vening gave
...ries in Infan...
...dience attend...
...red in the p...
...sevitzky be c...
...at role. Doub...
...ene this wa...
...usseyitzky tha...
..., Rimsky...
...re his ...

...tion last evenin.., and a hundred ...sive artists ... instrument.

This was the programme:

Fragment from the Apocalypse.....
Symphonic Picture, Op. 66.
"Kikimora," a folk fairy-tale. Op. 6
Suite from the Opera, "Tsar Saltan
Rimsky-
Symphony No. 1 in C-minor, Op. 68..

legend. Both pieces received a technically and clear and pleasing presentation.

Rimsky-Korsakov's suite for orchestra, from the "Tsar Saltan," is based upon another fairy tale. It is written in his colorful style and abounds in effects produced by blaring brass and percussion instruments. Koussevitzky here found an excellent vehicle for indulging his imaginative talent and the result was a brilliant performance. After the close, he received many recalls.

With the Brahms symphony, however, came the best performance of the evening. This fine work, written when its composer was a young man, is one that grows ... interest with repeated hearings. Brahms, a master in the use of orchestral technique, always has something ... to say. He had the rare faculty ... sustained creative thought. Dignity ... beauty go hand in hand in music ... of his calm, serene nature. What ...endous power and grandeur. This

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AKRON, O.
PRESS

DEC 5 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY FAILS AS ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR

New York Critic Says He Is Convinced That Virtuosoship On Double-Bass Does Not Insure Capacity To Handle Symphony Band

By PIERRE V. R. KEY
New York Music Critic for the Beacon Journal

NEW YORK, Dec. 5.—A big name, where musicians are concerned does not guarantee always unusual ability in more than one way. Experience has taught me that eminent singers rarely make good teachers; and I am at length convinced beyond any doubt that virtuosoship on the double-bass does not insure the capacity to conduct a symphony orchestra.

Serge Koussevitzky has proven this to my complete satisfaction. Mr. Koussevitzky came to the Boston Symphony band a year ago amid a wild hullabaloo. The cultured Hubites purred and preened themselves for something quite grand. For a time there was no blow-up. The Russian double-bass player who had money to pay for special orchestra concerts in European capitals managed fairly well during his early appearances. But once he settled to his work the outer skin of his conducting resources slipped completely off. It left him as he is: a mediocre leader of symphonic music, plus personality and a manner that turns matters his way—for a while.

High Class Conductor

Readers of this column will recall my disinclination to commit myself as to Koussevitzky at his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony men. They will remember too, I think, that each reappearance of the Bostonians' chief left me less satisfied. Now I am ready to pronounce this man a first-class second-class conductor, a rating rather high at that.

When a conductor juggles with tempi as Koussevitzky does it is time to set him down as one of two things. A music experimenter or a seeker of oddities at the expense of his men. There were spots in his reading of the Tschaikowsky pathetique symphony the other evening when the Boston orchestra could scarcely play the notes. Think of a racing speed too great for so fine a body of instrumentalists! Then there were such additional matters as Koussevitzky individuality in phrasing and dynamics. It was a music hodge podge of which a sincere musician would be ashamed, but Koussevitzky goes serenely on, feted by Boston society, and fussed over no end. It is just about the limit. Too much for New York, who got that way only once within my memory. That was when Josef Stransky hypnotized some old time Philharmonic folk, during a period which now happily is gone.

A New Composition

One novelty on Koussevitzky's first program was Eichheim's A Chinese Tale, which proved to be an intriguing work with a host of oriental color but of needless length. The second first time work for New York was Ibert's Escales (Ports of Call), the ports suggested musically being Palermo, Tunis-Nefta, and Valencia. There are some nice rhythms and color effects, and the piece serves a certain purpose.

The second Boston Symphony concert which followed the first by 48 hours, brought forward the Brahms C minor symphony. It is a pity Brahms was not present to have heard the work, for Koussevitzky evidently felt he could improve upon it (in those matters of tempi and dynamics previously referred to).

There were other compositions performed, but there is no need to go particularly into detail concerning them. There were given Koussevitzky readings which are not, as one may gather by this time, closely related to those most of us regard as reasonably consistent.

Miss Farrar Quiescent

Our much loved Geraldine Farrar has gone and gotten sick, right at the beginning of her season as a comic opera star. The tour of her organization has been suspended temporarily, and the members of the company given their two weeks' notice. All of which would indicate that the fair Gerry is not in the best of health.

It really would be an excellent thing for this American prima-donna-that-was. She has gone on incessantly, often driving herself when she should have considered her own strength.

I personally regret that Miss Farrar has chosen to finish a glorious career with such an anti-climax as appearing (and for the sake of dollars) in comic opera. I should prefer to have remembered her as a great artiste, something which I find it as difficult to do as some of my friends and acquaintances.

Big Music Guns

Some big music guns have been booming of late in this vicinity. There were Paderewski, Rachmaninoff, Roland Hayes; and Maier and Pattison, the wizard piano duettists. The one and only Paddy came back to a jammed house in Carnegie Hall and played his program with an injured finger—a detail that was only a detail, since he was the same Paderewski of a year ago. . . if not the artist we have known in former years. But his auditors paid him homage, and applauded as they always did. He is a king who can do no wrong. I feel personally that Paderewski still has a message to deliver, but I must be honest in admitting that he distorts phrases and rhythms and pounds the piano unnecessarily.

Rachmaninoff, who is not a pianist in the best sense but a musician using the piano as an interpretative medium, also had a large audience; and it was like most Rachmaninoff audiences, enthusiastic. This Russian always has something to say that is worth listening to, though he has never been for me a wholly satisfying artist.

Hayes sings with the same sincerity, simplicity and spirituality he did last year and the year before. An inferior vocalist, we must all admit, with no unusual degree of voice. It is on the interpretative side of his art that he shines, and he did so on this occasion. One high light was his singing of La Reve, from Massenet's Manon; not as Massenet intended it should be sung, but, nevertheless, in a most appealing way.

As for those distinguished artists, Maier and Pattison, their recital was a treat and joy—as all they give almost invariably are.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
LOUISVILLE, KY.

DEC 6 1925

By PIER

New York, Dec. 5.—A big name, where musicians are concerned, does not guarantee always unusual ability in more than one way. Experience has taught me that eminent singers rarely make good teachers; and I am at length convinced beyond any doubt that virtuosoship on the double-bass does not insure the capacity to conduct a symphony orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky has proven this to my complete satisfaction. Mr. Koussevitzky came to the Boston Symphony band a year ago amid a wild hullabaloo. The cultured Hubites purred and preened themselves for something grand. For a time there was no blow-up. The Russian double-bass player who had money to pay for special orchestra concerts in European capitals managed fairly well during his early appearances. But once he settled to his work the outer skin of his conducting resources slipped completely off. It left him as he is, a mediocre leader of symphonic music, plus personality and a manner that turns matters his way—for a while.

PIERRE V. R. KEY

Readers of this column will recall my disinclination to commit myself as to Koussevitzky at his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony men. They will remember, too, I think, that each reappearance of the Bostonians' chief left me less satisfied. Now I am ready to pronounce this man a first-class second-class conductor, a rating rather high at that.

When a conductor juggles with tempi as Koussevitzky does it is time to set him down as one of two things. A music experimenter or a seeker of oddities at the expense of his men. There were spots in his reading of the Tschaikowsky pathetique symphony the other evening when the Boston orchestra could scarcely play the notes. Think of a racing speed too great for so fine a body of instrumentalists! Then there were such additional matters as Koussevitzky indivuality in phrasing and dynamics. It was music hodge podge of which a sincere musician would be ashamed, but Koussevitzky goes serenely on, feted by Boston society, and fussed over no end. It is just about the limit. Too much for New York, who got that way only once within my memory. That was when Josef Stransky hypnotized some old-time Philharmonic folk, during a period which now happily is gone.

* * *

A New Composition.

One novelty on Koussevitzky's first program was Eichheim's "A Chinese Tale," which proved to be an intriguing work with a host of oriental color but of needless length. The second first time work for New York was Ibert's "Escales" (Ports of Call), the ports suggested musically being Palermo, Tunis-Nefta, and Valencia. There are some nice rhythms and color effects, and the piece serves a certain purpose.

A memorable debut was made by Luella Melius, American coloratura soprano, when she recently sang in opera for the first time in this country in a Chicago performance of Rigoletto.

The second Boston Symphony concert which followed the first by forty-eight hours, brought forward the Brahms C minor symphony. It is a pity Brahms was not present to have heard the work, for Koussevitzky evidently felt he could improve upon it (in those matters of tempi and dynamics previously referred to).

There were other compositions performed, but there is no need to go particularly into detail concerning them. There were given Koussevitzky readings which are not, as one may gather by this time, closely related to those most of us regard as reasonably consistent.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

DEC 6 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY SOON COMES TO HARTFORD

Celebrated Russian Conductor Leads Boston Symphony Feb. 7.

Probably no conductor who has come to our shores for a number of years has attracted so much attention and interest as Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is to appear in Hartford at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 7, with this world-famous organization.

An enviable reputation preceded his first coming to America. In London and Paris for the last five years his name has stood for all that is striking, engrossing, and vital in orchestral conducting. America had had many reports of his brilliant sympathies and impassioned convictions. He may well have been called the outstanding musical personality of Europe.

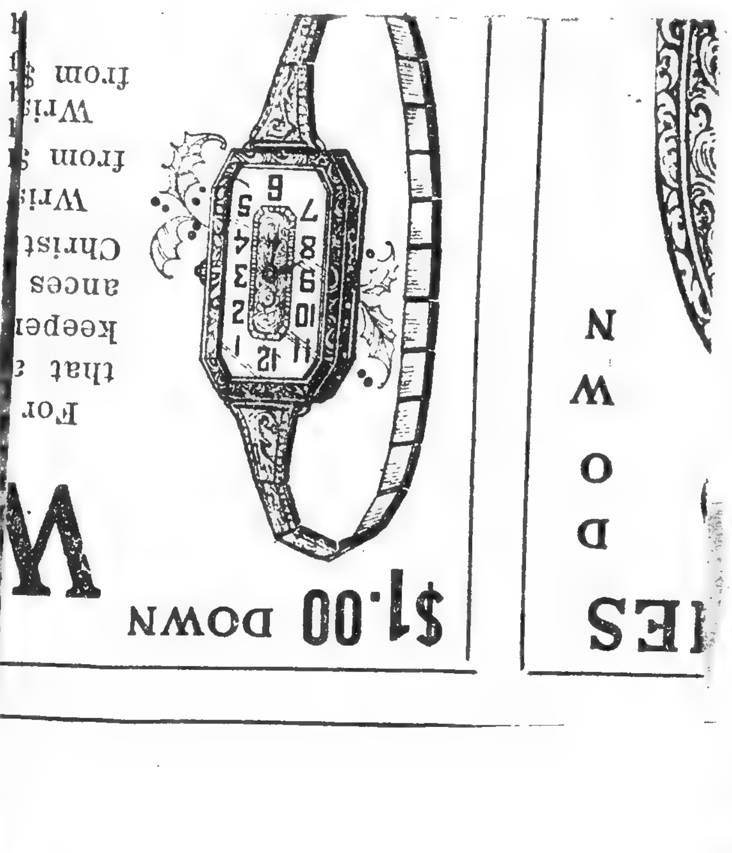
Russia has claimed the larger part of Koussevitzky's earlier career. First known as a remarkable virtuoso of the doublebass, he soon gave all his energies to the more extensive field of conducting. His first conspicuous achievement as a conductor was the famous orchestra which he organized in Moscow. He assembled his country's best musicians, subsidized them that his hand might be entirely free, and drilled them into a splendid organization. In Moscow and Petrograd, Bach and Beethoven festivals figured among his concerts. He likewise championed music of genius among living composers, and in furtherance of this project, founded what has come to be one of the most important music publishing firms in Russia.

It was also characteristic of him to travel all over Russia with his orchestra, bearing symphonic music to parts where it had never been heard. He even chartered a steamer, and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave concerts in town after town.

It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward. In Paris he organized what have come to be known broadly as the "Concerts Koussevitzky" and which have been the most prominent in that city. In London he has made a similarly vivid impression, particularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. He has likewise appeared as guest over numerous other European orchestras. He has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris, and in Barcelona.

Koussevitzky repeated his Paris and London concert series last summer with even greater success than ever before. A culminating episode was the presentation of the Cross of the Legion of Honor by the French government, and a special concert arranged by the composers of France in his honor, for which each of them composed special music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Hartford under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick, who will also present Giovanni Martinelli, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company in a recital at the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, January 24. Seats for both concerts are now on sale at McCoy's, Inc., 89 Asylum street.



$1.00 DOWN
NOW

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

DEC 16 19

SYMPHONY SCORES ANOTHER TRIUMPH

Throng in Infantry Hall Applauds Boston Orchestra.

Infantry Hall was the scene last night of another triumph of Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston symphony orchestra. The audience of over 1700 were highly pleased with the efforts of the musicians and the conductor was forced to return numerous times to encores. Mr. Koussevitzky was the artist last evening, his musicians seemingly having sunk their own personality into that of the conductor, and the pirture painted by music was marvelous.

This was the programme: Fragment from the "Apocalypse," Liadov; "Symphonic Picture, Op. 66:" "Kikimora," a folk fairy tale, Op. 63, Liadov; suite from the opera, "Tsar Saltan," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Symphony No. 1 in C-minor, Op. 68," Brahms.

Liadov's penchant for strength, color contrast and striking instrumentation was revealed in the two numbers played by the orchestra.

Koussevitzky indulged his imaginative talent in conducting the suite for orchestra from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan." It was a remarkable vehicle for the conductor to display his ability and the blending of brass instruments with the stringed instruments produced a splendid result.

The awful grandeur of the symphony was never better demonstrated than it was last night. Brahms, never an impatient man, did not hurry in producing his symphony in C-minor, with the result that his crowning effort is placed 10th in the rank of symphonies. His calm, serene nature is revealed in his masterpiece, although at periods Koussevitzky would have given the impression that Brahms was a man of extreme passion, and had indulged his passions in his symphony. The rendition revealed the temperament of the conductor and, while it departed from the usual presentation which has been accepted as part of this symphony, resulted in passages of tremendous grandeur and power.

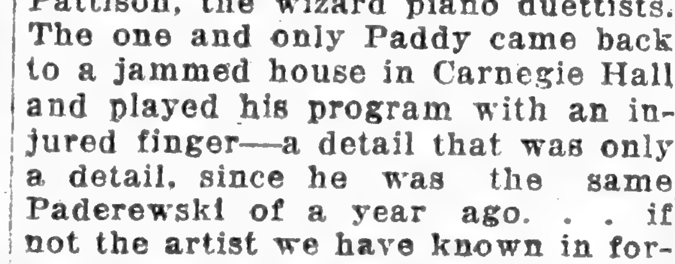
The dramatic heights to which the musicians rose in the closing passages brought a tremendous ovation from the audience and Koussevitzky and his musicians were forced to accept the plaudits of the audience while standing.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

DEC 5 1925

Boston Symphony

The second visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra to Providence will take place a week from next Tuesday evening for a concert in Infantry Hall. Serge Koussevitzky will then present three numbers from the music of his countrymen—Liadov's Fragment from the Apocalypse, a symphonic picture; the same composer's "Kikimora," a fairy folk tale on the children's legend the Russian witch, and a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan." The symphony of the evening will be the first of Brahms, in C minor.



Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Which Will Be Heard in Infantry Hall Tuesday, Dec. 15.

SYMPHONY HAS LARGE AUDIEN

Serge Koussevitzky and Play Present Second Concert.

Serge Koussevitzky and his Bos Symphony players last evening gave second concert of their series in Infan Hall. The usual big audience attend No solo artist was featured in the pr gramme, unless Mr. Koussevitzky be co sidered as appearing in that role. Doub less to a majority of listeners this wa exactly the case. It is Koussevitzky tha plays. The scores of Rimsky Korsakov and Brahms were his tion last evening and a hundred sive artists his instrument.

This was the programme:

Fragment from the Apocalypse....
Symphonic Picture, Op. 66.
"Kikimora," a folk fairy-tale, Op. 6
Suite from the Opera, "Tsar Saltan
Rimsky-
Symphony No. 1 in C-minor; Op. 68..
Un poso sostenuto; Allegro.

legend. Both pieces received a technically and clear and pleasing presentation.

Rimsky-Korsakov's suite for orchestra, from the "Tsar Saltan," is based upon nother fairy tale. It is written in his olorful style and abounds in effects proced by blaring brass and percussion inuments. Koussevitzky here found an cellent vehicle for indulging his imagnative talent and the result was a brilliant performance. After the close, he received many recalls.

With the Brahms symphony, however, came the best performance of the evening. This fine work, written when its composer was a young man, is one that grows n interest with repeated hearings. rahms, a master in the use of orchesal technique, always has something eling to say. He had the rare faculty sustained creative thought. Dignity beauty go hand in hand in music of his calm, serene nature. What endous power and grandeur. This

IPPING FROM RON, O.
RESS

C 5 1925

SSEVITZKY FAILS AS ESTRA CONDUCTOR

Critic Says He Is Convinced That Virtuoso Double-Bass Does Not Insure Capacity To Handle Symphony Band

By PIERRE V. R. KEY
ew York Music Critic for the Beacon Journal

, Dec. 5.—A big name, where musicians are concerned guarantee always unusual ability in more than one nce has taught me that eminent singers rarely make and I am at length convinced beyond any doubt that the double-bass does not insure the capacity to con-
ny orchestra.
ssevitzky has proven this to my complete satisfaction.
zky came to the Boston Symphony band a year ago llabaloo. The cultured Hubites purred and preened something quite grand. For a time there was no Russian double-bass player who had money to pay for a concerts in European capitals managed fairly well y appearances. But once he settled to his work the his conducting resources slipped completely off. It is: a mediocre leader of symphonic music, plus per-manner that turns matters his way—for a while.

s Conductor

s column will recall to commit myself ky at his first New with the Boston
They will rememthat each reappearnians' chief left me
Now I am ready to man a first-class
nductor, a rating
at.

ctor juggles with evitzky does it is down as one of two experimenter or a s at the expense of were spots in his chaikowsky patheti-he other evening orchestra could notes. Think of a great for so fine a mentalists! Then additional matters individuality in namics. It was a ge of which a sin-
ould be ashamed,
goes serenely on,
society, and fussed
is just about the
for New York,
y only once within
at was when Josef zed some old time
k, during a period
ly is gone.

omposition

on Koussevitzky's was Eichheim's A
ich proved to be an
with a host of
of needless length.
time work for New Escales (Ports of
uggested musically
Tunis-Nefta, and are some nice or effects, and the rtain purpose.
ston Symphony con-
ved the first by 48
rward the Brahms
ny. It is a pity present to have for Koussevitzky ould improve upon ters of tempi and sly referred to).
ther compositions
here is no need to
to detail concern-were given Kous-which are not, as y this time, closely most of us regard nsistent.

Miss Farrar Quiescent

Our much loved Geraldine Farrar has gone and gotten sick, right at the beginning of her season as a comic opera star. The tour of her organization has been suspended temporarily, and the members of the company given their two weeks' notice. All of which would indicate that the fair Gerry is not in the best of health.

It really would be an excellent thing for this American prima-donna-that-was. She has gone on incessantly, often driving herself when she should have considered her own strength.

I personally regret that Miss Farrar has chosen to finish a glorious career with such an anti-climax as appearing (and for the sake of dollars) in comic opera. I should prefer to have remembered her as a great artiste, something which I find it as difficult to do as some of my friends and acquaintances.

Big Music Guns

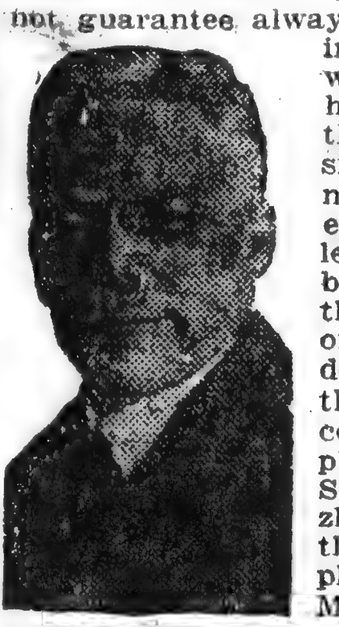
Some big music guns have been booming of late in this vicinity. There were Paderewski, Rachmaninoff, Roland Hayes; and Maier and Pattison, the wizard piano duettists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
LOUISVILLE, KY.

DEC 6 1925

By PIER

New York, Dec. 5.—A big name, where musicians are concerned, does not guarantee always unusual ability in more than one way. Experience has taught me that eminent singers rarely make good teachers; and I am at length convinced beyond any doubt that virtuosoship on the double-bass does not insure the capacity to conduct a symphony orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky has proven this to my complete satisfaction. Mr. Koussevitzky came to the Boston Symphony band a year ago amid a wild hullabaloo. The cultured Hubites purred and preened themselves for something grand. For a time there was no blow-up. The Russian double-bass player who had money to pay for special orchestra concerts in European capitals managed fairly well during his early appearances. But once he settled to his work the outer skin of his conducting resources slipped completely off. It left him as he is, a mediocre leader of symphonic music, plus personality and a manner that turns matters his way—for a while.



PIERRE V. R. KEY

Readers of this column will recall my disinclination to commit myself as to Koussevitzky at his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony men. They will remember, too, I think, that each reappearance of the Bostonians' chief left me less satisfied. Now I am ready to pronounce this man a first-class second-class conductor, a rating rather high at that.

When a conductor juggles with tempi as Koussevitzky does it is time to set him down as one of two things. A music experimenter or a seeker of oddities at the expense of his men. There were spots in his reading of the Tschaikowsky pathetique symphony the other evening when the Boston orchestra could scarcely play the notes. Think of a racing speed too great for so fine a body of instrumentalists! Then there were such additional matters as Koussevitzky indivuality in phrasing and dynamics. It was a music hodge podge of which a sincere musician would be ashamed, but Koussevitzky goes serenely on, feted by Boston society, and fussed over no end. It is just about the limit. Too much for New York, who got that way only once within my memory. That was when Josef Stransky hypnotized some old-time Philharmonic folk, during a period which now happily is gone.

* * *

A New Composition.

One novelty on Koussevitzky's first program was Eichheim's "A Chinese Tale," which proved to be an intriguing work with a host of oriental color but of needless length. The second first time work for New York was Ibert's "Escales" (Ports of Call), the ports suggested musically being Palermo, Tunis-Nefta, and Valencia. There are some nice rhythms and color effects, and the piece serves a certain purpose.

A memorable debut was made by Luella Melius, American coloratura soprano, when she recently sang in opera for the first time in this country in a Chicago performance of Rigoletto.

The second Boston Symphony concert which followed the first by forty-eight hours, brought forward the Brahms C minor symphony. It is a pity Brahms was not present to have heard the work, for Koussevitzky evidently felt he could improve upon it in those matters of tempi and dynamics previously referred to).

There were other compositions performed, but there is no need to go particularly into detail concerning them. There were given Koussevitzky readings which are not, as one may gather by this time, closely related to those most of us regard as reasonably consistent.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

DEC 8 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY SOON COMES TO HARTFORD

Celebrated Russian Conductor Leads Boston Symphony Feb. 7.

Probably no conductor who has come to our shores for a number of years has attracted so much attention and interest as Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is to appear in Hartford at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 7, with this world-famous organization.

An enviable reputation preceded his first coming to America. In London and Paris for the last five years his name has stood for all that is striking, engrossing, and vital in orchestral conducting. America had had many reports of his brilliant sympathies and impassioned convictions. He may well have been called the outstanding musical personality of Europe.

Russia has claimed the larger part of Koussevitzky's earlier career. First known as a remarkable virtuoso of the doublebass, he soon gave all his energies to the more extensive field of conducting. His first conspicuous achievement as a conductor was the famous orchestra which he organized in Moscow. He assembled his country's best musicians, subsidized them that his hand might be entirely free, and drilled them into a splendid organization. In Moscow and Petrograd, Bach and Beethoven festivals figured among his concerts. He likewise championed music of

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

DEC 16 1925

SYMPHONY SCORES ANOTHER TRIUMPH

Throng in Infantry Hall Applauds Boston Orchestra.

Infantry Hall was the scene last night of another triumph of Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston symphony orchestra. The audience of over 1700 were highly pleased with the efforts of the musicians and the conductor was forced to return numerous times to encores. Mr. Koussevitzky was the artist last evening, his musicians seemingly having sunk their own personality into that of the conductor, and the pirture painted by music was marvelous.

This was the programme: Fragment from the "Apocalyse," Liadov; "Symphonic Picture, Op. 66;" "Kikimora," a folk fairy tale, Op. 63, Liadov; suite from the opera, "Tsar Saltan," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Symphony No. 1 in C-minor, Op. 68," Brahms.

Liadov's penchant for strength, color contrast and striking instrumentation was revealed in the two numbers played by the orchestra.

Koussevitzky indulged his imaginative talent in conducting the suite for orchestra from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan." It was a remarkable vehicle for the conductor to display his ability and the blending of brass instruments with the stringed instruments produced a splendid result.

The awful grandeur of the symphony was never better demonstrated than it was last night. Brahms, never an impatient man, did not hurry in producing his symphony in C-minor, with the result that his crowning effort is iced 10th in the rank of sympho es. His calm, serene nature is re aled in his masterpiece, although at periods Koussevitzky would have given the impression that Brahms was a man of extreme passion, and had indulged his passions in his symphony. The rendition revealed the temperament of the conductor and, while it departed from the usual presentation which has been accepted as part of this symphony, resulted in passages of tremendous grandeur and power.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

DEC 6 1925

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Which Will Be Heard in Infantry Hall Tuesday, Dec. 15.

LIPPING FROM
TIMES
WTUCKET

C 5 — 1925

Symphony

of the Boston Sym-
Providence will from next Tuesday
rt in Infantry Hall.
y will then present
m the music of his v's Fragment from symphonic picture;
er's "Kikimora," a
he children's legend
h, and a suite from opera, "Tsar Sal-ny of the evening
Brahms, in C minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

DEC 7 1925

The an Goossens
certs of t chestra i thusiastic
according Brennan,
ensemble,
extremely on the an er of the was to a
"An i ductor"
Transcr
an annu at the S perman week's scribing ure of a new int
tors, ch
scriptio
"How
high pl
no num ton—is strange Sympho of audi some t debate.

RUSSEL'S
RUSSEL'S in gorgeous hand diamonds compar country. And R this Christmas.

WATCH
$1

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

DEC 20 1925

An examination of subscription lists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra discloses that only 26 per cent. of the patrons live in Boston. Fifty-nine per cent. come from the suburbs of that city and the remaining 15 per cent. from outlying cities and towns.

Arthur Middleton has been engaged

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS LARGE AUDIEN

Serge Koussevitzky and Pla Present Second Concert,

Serge Koussevitzky and his Bos Symphony players last evening gave second concert of their series in Infan Hall. The usual big audience attend No solo artist was featured in the pr gramme, unless Mr. Koussevitzky be co sidered as appearing in that role. Doub less to a majority of listeners this wa exactly the case. It is Koussevitzky tha plays. The scores of Liadov, Rimsky Korsakov and Brahms were his inspira tion last evening and a hundred r sive artists his instrument.

This was the programme:

Fragment from the Apocalypse.....
Symphonic Picture, Op. 66.
"Kikimora," a folk fairy-tale, Op. 6
Suite from the Opera, "Tsar Saltan
Rimsky-
Symphony No. 1 in C-minor; Op. 68..
  Un poso sostenuto; Allegro.
  Andante sostenuto.
  Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
  Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma c

The two numbers by Liadov reve composer's talent for striking instr tation. This seems a common poss of writers of the modern Russian s In combining instrumental voices strike the ear as the Russian scenic arti affects the eye. Their artistry ha strength, contrast, color.

In the symphonic picture, "Fragmen from the Apocalypse," Liadov catches th spirit of the biblical verse which inspire the piece. He employs such instrumen as the triangle, bells, celesta, cymba and drums in interesting fashion, b sometimes to such an extent that nois takes the place of music. It is a cleve musical conception, one bound to pleas ears which long for something new an strange as a stimulant. The "Kikimora," a folk fairy tale, likewise shows his ingenuity in picturing an old Russian legend. Both pieces received a technically and clear and pleasing presentation.

Rimsky-Korsakov's suite for orchestra, from the "Tsar Saltan," is based upon nother fairy tale. It is written in his olorful style and abounds in effects pro ced by blaring brass and percussion in uments. Koussevitzky here found an cellent vehicle for indulging his imaginative talent and the result was a brilliant performance. After the close, he received many recalls.

With the Brahms symphony, however, came the best performance of the evening. This fine work, written when its composer was a young man, is one that grows interest with repeated hearings. rahms, a master in the use of orches al technique, always has something el ing to say. He had the rare faculty sustained creative thought. Dignity beauty go hand in hand in music of his calm, serene nature. What endous power and grandeur. This a contrast it is to efforts descriptive the antics of goblins of fairy tales any of the attempts to make an orche tra assume the role of comedian.

The symphony's presentation by Ko sevitzky was tinged by his own per ality. His interpretation is one t would make Brahms appear a man of pa sion rather than a philosopher.

This tendency to read the score in temperamental style, while departing from tradition, nevertheless brought passages of was particularly noticeable in the final movement, where the players rose to splendid dramatic heights.

This revelation of the dramatic possi bilities of the score brought conducto

206

Herald Jan 15

Boston Symphony to Put 12 Saturday Concerts on Air

Broadcasting Made Possible by $12,000 Gift from W. S. Quinby

FIRST PROGRAM OF SERIES NEXT WEEK

Beginning a week from tomorrow, and continuing for 11 successive Saturday evenings, the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast from radio station WEEI, the Edison Electrical Illuminating Company, of Boston.

This series will be the first in the history of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The trustees of the organization have refused heretofore to permit the broadcasting of the music of this orchestra in its entirety. Hundreds of thousands of music-loving radio fans in New England will enjoy practically the same privileges as the fortunate season-ticket holders to the symphony concerts.

QUINBY TO GIVE $12,000

The broadcasting is made possible by the generosity of Winfield S. Quinby of Brookline, music enthusiast and prominent in civic betterment and New England business and industrial development enterprises. He will give $1000 a week for the 12 weeks, which will cover the greater share of the expense of the broadcasts. The remainder will be contributed by WEEI.

For the last two years, the public has had little opportunity to attend the Boston symphony concerts, seats at Symphony hall being occupied by the season-ticket holders and their guests. The trustees have long agreed with Charles W. Burton, manager of WEEI, that the broadcasting of the concerts would bring great pleasure to a very large number of persons who have often wished to listen to the Boston Symphony orchestra, but pointed to the expense of such an enterprise and to the deficit at the end of each concert season.

According to Mr. Burton, it was only recently that the Symphony trustees decided that the broadcasting of the Saturday evening concerts would be a good way in which to meet the annual deficit of the concert season; but they had long wished that they could afford to give the general public an opportunity to "listen in." All that stood in the way was the expense, and now Mr. Quinby has bridged this difficulty. But the radio public can thank the trustees, too, for their courtesy and WEEI for making it all possible.

Winfield S. Quinby is president of the W. S. Quinby Companies of Boston, New York and Chicago, dealers in tea and coffee, and a director of the Waldorf System, Inc., and the Atlantic National Bank; incorporator of the Home Savings Bank and a trustee of the Massachusetts Society for Mental Hygiene, Inc.

GOOSSENS COMES, CONDUCTOR AND COMPOSER BOTH

Trans — Jan 23

THROUGH A SYMPHONY CONCERT MANY-SIDED

Youthful, Pleasurable and Distinctive Figure—Fervors and Glamours Through an Overture of Weber—Power Oftener Than Beauty Upon a Symphony of Brahms—The Missing Sense of Poetry—Contrasts of Debussy's "Iberia"—Mr. Goossens's Own "Sinfonietta" and a Little Tone-Poem of Delius

BEFORE he had stirred his stick or drawn a note from the orchestra, it was pleasure to see Mr. Eugene Goossens upon the conductor's stand, yesterday afternoon, in Symphony Hall. Being in his thirty-third year, slim of body and unpouched of face, he is still youthful; whereas most Symphony Concerts seem the gathering place of middle and advancing age. Londoner by birth and taxable residence, he is cosmopolite by habit, wearing the air of a man of the world; while this and that conductor of the Symphony Orchestra has never quite escaped the French or German provincial backgrounds whence he sprang. (Let us call Gericke, Nikisch, Dr. Muck and Mr. Koussevitzky the exceptions that prove the rule.) As director of the music—to revive an old phrase—Mr. Goossens has equally agreeable idiosyncracies. Though he has worked often in the concert-hall, he has also worked much in the opera house. There he has sat or stood semi-shrouded in a pit. There few curious glances have followed him since the stage already held them fast. There, finally, he might use his body without let or hindrance to convey his music-making or dramatizing intent. Yesterday 2600 pairs of eyes gazed upon him across Symphony Hall. Sometimes they watched energies of body that, while they undoubtedly gain an expressive end, more become the sheltered orchestra-pit than the exposed concert-platform.

Mr. Goossens's left hand is also sign-manual of his interpretive will—from the alert signalling of a cue, after the manner of operatic conductors, to the smoothing of a transition or the clinching of a climax. To his orchestra the beat of his right hand must be a joy—both precise and plastic, vivid and firm-willed. Indeed there was no doubting, yesterday, its response to him. The personnel of the band at Symphony Hall still stands a little in awe of Mr. Koussevitzky. They wonder what he will do next; since he is a strict disciplinarian, in degree they also dread him. With Mr. Goossens they seemed to play more freely as man to man and musician to musician. Moreover, being new and able comer, he was also stimulus. The horns outdid themselves in golden depths of tone at the beginning of the Overture to "Der Freischütz"; the clarinets soon kept them company. The chords of the Passacaglia in Brahms's Fourth Symphony moved in sombre splendor of massed or parted voices. Rainbow-tinted from the wood-wind choir were the street-scene and the march-movement of Debussy's "Ibéria." For the first time since the visit of Mr. Casella, a young conductor had come as guest to the Symphony Concerts; for the first time, outside Mr. Walter and Mr. Schnéevoigt as well, he was not a mediocrity. The orchestra understood as much.

At the end of the Overture to Weber's opera, there was no questioning Mr. Goossens's abilities with music of the theater or music dramatic and romantic, warm of color, large of stride, impassioned of voice. After the final chords the curtain should have risen upon "Der Freischütz," with Symphony Hall and Boston blotted into an opera house and a Germnay of the folk. Not a measure missed the dramatic significance within or the romantic color without; yet none seemed manipulated or overdone. The transitions were strokes of music—and the theater; for Weber, in the orchestra-pit, loved the rhetorical thrill. The conductor had ear for riches of tone when the four horns sang; for subtleties of tone when the voice of the clarinet haunted the strings; for rhythm in the demoniac measures long since faded; for fervors of progress and energies of climax through the Finale. Over all was the romantical ardor—the flame and the flourish—which is half the battle for Weber. It is hard to remember when the perdurable old Overture has so sounded out of the theater for which it was written. Dr. Muck gave it no more operatic voice; while operatic conductors, Gericke, Nikisch, Muck, Monteux, have been the pillars of the Symphony Orchestra.

The ensuing Symphony of Brahms—the Fourth, in E minor—continued to amplify and began also to limit Mr. Goossens. His sense of music as motion, his rhythmic alertness, his keenness for contrast, transition, manifold and changeful moods, served well the first movement. Vividly and without labor it went, propulsive and many-voiced. On the other hand, in the gentler, tenderer, more songful measures—as the melody in B major, reiterated and returning—the conductor put by sentiment, poetry and their derivative, which is beauty. Beyond a well-considered and by no means inexpressive prose, Mr. Goossens did not go. With suspicions thus excited, the listener discovered, or believed he discovered, the same shortcoming through the Andante. The song of the violoncellos indeed spoke for itself. Johannes in the prime of his fifties did not fail to see to that. But this is the day of Toscanini, Stokowski, Koussevitzky and a lyric Brahms. Therefore the ear and the imagination craved these measures in an intensive beauty that Mr. Goossens either missed or withheld. He is young and sensitive, free-minded and modernist; yet somehow he seemed to be playing this Andante in the old Anglo-German leading-strings of the days when a conductor proved admiration for Brahms by crabbing his music. Even repeated figures wore a matter-of-fact, not to say a stencilled, air.

Through the remainder of the Symphony, however, Mr. Goossens was more responsive and more Brahms-like. There was no quarrelling with the vigors of tone, the zest of rhythm, the give-take-and-return that he flung into the Scherzo. If it harked back to Brahms rugged, it also evoked Brahms hearty. After all, in Mr. Goossens's just view, he could write such a German Scherzo with the best of them, which are Beethoven and Bruckner. In the Passacaglia, moreover, the conductor was on his own ground. For it is the sign and wonder of this Finale to the Fourth Symphony that Brahms has taken an old and intricate variation-form and not only worked it but dramatized it. Mr. Goossens struck large the opening chords; sped and sharpened the cadences; set the successive variations in tumultuous course; lightened and darkened the tonal colors; plied pace and accent as means to power; cut deep with the transition into E major; spread wide the pæan of the end. There are those that find sublimities in these final measures. If so, Mr. Goossens was full halfway up the heights. His thought, skill, schooling, experience, plainly work when he is playing Brahms; but now and again his sense of musical beauty, which is imagination with tones, seems rather to have gone on a journey.

In similar fashion, Mr. Goossens fell short with the slow division—"Perfumes of the Night"—in Debussy's "Ibéria"; whereas in the introductory movement and the finale, he and the orchestra dazzled the ear and set the temples beating. Agreed that the conductor was in haste and perceptibly nervous. The powers that be—it seemed—feared the length of a program that was no more than an hour and forty minutes long and which held the audience—with scarcely a departure—to the end. From the "Cuckoo" piece of Delius, the conductor sprang almost without pause into the "Image" of Debussy; seemed to quicken the pace of the street-music and to spur the course of the awakening fête. Between stands that wondrous interlude—the last music of Debussy before the decline began—pulsing with the warmths and lustres of the Spanish night; into oboe, clarinet, wood-winds and strings concentrating and poetizing the hush and the pungency, the stilled sweetness, of what seems an immortal hour. Again Mr. Goossens missed beauty; overlooked poetry; sketched an impressionistic tone-picture and passed on. Not even the siren-call of Mr. Gillet's oboe or Mr. Allegra's clarinet might stay him.

In the retrospect comes a more general, a deeper, questioning. To his honor and his praise, Mr. Goossens, composer or conductor, is an open-minded and enlightened young modernist, "croyant et pratiquant," as the Parisians neatly say. Like all his tribe he has praiseworthy distaste for excess of sentiment, for romantic flummery and sham. Yet as it seemed with Brahms's Andante and Debussy's Interlude, these just antipathies push too far and then hedge too closely those that hold them. Like Mr. Goossens, they tend to forget the beauty, the poetry, even the sentiment, of tones when these are the very essence and burden of the music. Of course, there are compensations: the rhythmic spring and the tonal glint that Mr. Goossens and the orchestra gave to the dawning fête tingle in memory; while they flicked the street-music with glint after glint of rhythmed, sensuous sound.

Two shorter pieces, new to Symphony Hall, also stood on the program—a Sinfonietta to disclose Mr. Goossens as composer; the little tone-poem, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," to recall Frederick Delius, these many years over-neglected composer at home and abroad. The Sinfonietta is not only a Little Symphony, as the title implies but also a condensed and compressed symphony, a tabloid symphony, as current verbiage might call it. There is an unmistakable first movement, say five minutes long; a slow division as brief in development; a finale, of no more length, that seems a scherzo to new usages converted. A motto-motiv ties all three together. The persisting concision gives the music pith as well as moments; clearly discoverable motivs gain and hold the ear; a ready skill, a fertile fancy, work them. The harmonic background sounds piquant; the scoring is terse and ingenious. The first division upsprings; the chromatic second dallies with that sentiment which Mr. Goossens is presumed to abhor; the third teems with his rhythmic zest, his light, sure touch alike upon "ideas" and voices. In sum, a Sinfonietta that is a pleasing bit of studio-work; a pleasant and profitable exercise, to both composer and hearer, in the subduing of orthodox forms to innovating practice. That way lies one road to musical progress.

Now upon Delius, hearing—or remembering—the first calls [illegible] the cuckoo [illegible] winter wanes, came homesick longing f[illegible] northern spring. In memory it [illegible] falteringly upon the earth it would release; softly it melted the binding chains; over the land it spread a loveliness as gentle and serene as that which Parsifal saw, and Gurnemanz, upon the meadows of the Grail. And Delius was wistful and melancholy with the remembrance and would write music. So he invented a motiv that recalled the singular interval in the cuckoo's song and to it joined the melody of a Norwegian folk-piece. Out of them he spun a simple, sad-voiced, musing tune, that returns upon itself like a haunting memory. He harmonized it in pale grays and with subdued instrumental timbres laced it. Presently it sighed itself away and the spell vanished; but not until simplicity was nigh to sterility, and dreamfulness close too wool-gathering, and the cuckoo thrice too often had echoed its call. For the while bird voices hardly charm in symphonic music—from Mr. Delius's distant cuckoo to Mr. R[illegible]ighi's too present nightingale.

H[illegible] P.

206

Herald Jan 15

Boston Symphony to Put 12 Saturday Concerts on Air

Broadcasting Made Possible by $12,000 Gift from W. S. Quinby

FIRST PROGRAM OF SERIES NEXT WEEK

Beginning a week from tomorrow, and continuing for 11 successive Saturday evenings, the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast from radio station WEEI, the Edison Electrical Illuminating Company, of Boston.

This series will be the first in the history of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The trustees of the organization have refused heretofore to permit the broadcasting of the music of this orchestra in its entirety. Hundreds of thousands of music-loving radio fans in New England will enjoy practically the same privileges as the fortunate season-ticket holders to the symphony concerts.

QUINBY TO GIVE $12,000

The broadcasting is made possible by the generosity of Winfield S. Quinby of Brookline, music enthusiast and prominent in civic betterment and New England business and industrial development enterprises. He will give $1000 a week for the 12 weeks, which will cover the greater share of the expense of the broadcasts. The remainder will be contributed by WEEI.

For the last two years, the public has had little opportunity to attend the Boston symphony concerts, seats at Symphony hall being occupied by the season-ticket holders and their guests. The trustees have long agreed with Charles W. Burton, manager of WEEI, that the broadcasting of the concerts would bring great pleasure to a very large number of persons who have often wished to listen to the Boston Symphony orchestra, but pointed to the expense of such an enterprise and to the deficit at the end of each concert season.

According to Mr. Burton, it was only recently that the Symphony trustees decided that the broadcasting of the Saturday evening concerts would be a good way in which to meet the annual deficit of the concert season; but they had long wished that they could afford to give the general public an opportunity to "listen in." All that stood in the way was the expense, and now Mr. Quinby has bridged this difficulty. But the radio public can thank the trustees, too, for their courtesy and WEEI for making it all possible.

Winfield S. Quinby is president of the W. S. Quinby Companies of Boston, New York and Chicago, dealers in tea and coffee, and a director of the Waldorf System, Inc., and the Atlantic National Bank; incorporator of the Home Savings Bank and a trustee of the Massachusetts Society for Mental Hygiene, Inc.

GOOSSENS COMES, CONDUCTOR AND COMPOSER BOTH

Trans — Jan 23

THROUGH A SYMPHONY CONCERT MANY-SIDED

Youthful, Pleasurable and Distinctive Figure—Fervors and Glamours Through an Overture of Weber—Power Oftener Than Beauty Upon a Symphony of Brahms—The Missing Sense of Poetry—Contrasts of Debussy's "Iberia"—Mr. Goossens's Own "Sinfonietta" and a Little Tone-Poem of Delius

BEFORE he had stirred his stick or drawn a note from the orchestra, it was pleasure to see Mr. Eugene Goossens upon the conductor's stand, yesterday afternoon, in Symphony Hall. Being in his thirty-third year, slim of body and unpouched of face, he is still youthful; whereas most Symphony Concerts seem the gathering place of middle and advancing age. Londoner by birth and taxable residence, he is cosmopolite by habit, wearing the air of a man of the world; while this and that conductor of the Symphony Orchestra has never quite escaped the French or German provincial backgrounds whence he sprang. (Let us call Gericke, Nikisch, Dr. Muck and Mr. Koussevitzky the exceptions that prove the rule.) As director of the music—to revive an old phrase—Mr. Goossens has equally agreeable idiosyncracies. Though he has worked often in the concert-hall, he has also worked much in the opera house. There he has sat or stood semi-shrouded in a pit. There few curious glances have followed him since the stage already held them fast. There, finally, he might use his body without let or hindrance to convey his music-making or dramatizing intent. Yesterday 2600 pairs of eyes gazed upon him across Symphony Hall. Sometimes they watched energies of body that, while they undoubtedly gain an expressive end, more become the sheltered orchestra-pit than the exposed concert-platform.

Mr. Goossens's left hand is also sign-manual of his interpretive will—from the alert signalling of a cue, after the manner of operatic conductors, to the smoothing of a transition or the clinching of a climax. To his orchestra the beat of his right hand must be a joy—both precise and plastic, vivid and firm-willed. Indeed there was no doubting, yesterday, its response to him. The personnel of the band at Symphony Hall still stands a little in awe of Mr. Koussevitzky. They wonder what he will do next; since he is a strict disciplinarian, in degree they also dread him. With Mr. Goossens they seemed to play more freely as man to man and musician to musician. Moreover, being new and able comer, he was also stimulus. The horns outdid themselves in golden depths of tone at the beginning of the Overture to "Der Freischütz"; the clarinets soon kept them company. The chords of the Passacaglia in Brahms's Fourth Symphony moved in sombre splendor of massed or parted voices. Rainbow-tinted from the wood-wind choir were the street-scene and the march-movement of Debussy's "Ibéria." For the first time since the visit of Mr. Casella, a young conductor had come as guest to the Symphony Concerts; for the first time, outside Mr. Walter and Mr. Schnéevoigt as well, he was not a mediocrity. The orchestra understood as much.

At the end of the Overture to Weber's opera, there was no questioning Mr. Goossens's abilities with music of the theater or music dramatic and romantic, warm of color, large of stride, impassioned of voice. After the final chords the curtain should have risen upon "Der Freischütz," with Symphony Hall and Boston blotted into an opera house and a Germnay of the folk. Not a measure missed the dramatic significance within or the romantic color without; yet none seemed manipulated or overdone. The transitions were strokes of music—and the theater; for Weber, in the orchestra-pit, loved the rhetorical thrill. The conductor had ear for riches of tone when the four horns sang; for subtleties of tone when the voice of the clarinet haunted the strings; for rhythm in the demoniac measures long since faded; for fervors of progress and energies of climax through the Finale. Over all was the romantical ardor—the flame and the flourish—which is half the battle for Weber. It is hard to remember when the perdurable old Overture has so sounded out of the theater for which it was written. Dr. Muck gave it no more operatic voice; while operatic conductors, Gericke, Nikisch, Muck, Monteux, have been the pillars of the Symphony Orchestra.

The ensuing Symphony of Brahms—the Fourth, in E minor—continued to amplify and began also to limit Mr. Goossens. His sense of music as motion, his rhythmic alertness, his keenness for contrast, transition, manifold and changeful moods, served well the first movement. Vividly and without labor it went, propulsive and many-voiced. On the other hand, in the gentler, tenderer, more songful measures—as the melody in B major, reiterated and returning—the conductor put by sentiment, poetry and their derivative, which is beauty. Beyond a well-considered and by no means inexpressive prose, Mr. Goossens did not go. With suspicions thus excited, the listener discovered, or believed he discovered, the same shortcoming through the Andante. The song of the violoncellos indeed spoke for itself. Johannes in the prime of his fifties did not fail to see to that. But this is the day of Toscanini, Stokowski, Koussevitzky and a lyric Brahms. Therefore the ear and the imagination craved these measures in an intensive beauty that Mr. Goossens either missed or withheld. He is young and sensitive, free-minded and modernist; yet somehow he seemed to be playing this Andante in the old Anglo-German leading-strings of the days when a conductor proved admiration for Brahms by crabbing his music. Even repeated figures wore a matter-of-fact, not to say a stencilled, air.

Through the remainder of the Symphony, however, Mr. Goossens was more responsive and more Brahms-like. There was no quarrelling with the vigors of tone, the zest of rhythm, the give-take-and-return that he flung into the Scherzo. If it harked back to Brahms rugged, it also evoked Brahms hearty. After all, in Mr. Goossens's just view, he could write such a German Scherzo with the best of them, which are Beethoven and Bruckner. In the Passacaglia, moreover, the conductor was on his own ground. For it is the sign and wonder of this Finale to the Fourth Symphony that Brahms has taken an old and intricate variation-form and not only worked it but dramatized it. Mr. Goossens struck large the opening chords; sped and sharpened the cadences; set the successive variations in tumultuous course; lightened and darkened the tonal colors; plied pace and accent as means to power; cut deep with the transition into E major; spread wide the pæan of the end. There are those that find sublimities in these final measures. If so, Mr. Goossens was full half-way up the heights. His thought, skill, schooling, experience, plainly work when he is playing Brahms; but now and again his sense of musical beauty, which is imagination with tones, seems rather to have gone on a journey.

In similar fashion, Mr. Goossens fell short with the slow division—"Perfumes of the Night"—in Debussy's "Ibéria"; whereas in the introductory movement and the finale, he and the orchestra dazzled the ear and set the temples beating. Agreed that the conductor was in haste and perceptibly nervous. The powers that be—it seemed—feared the length of a program that was no more than an hour and forty minutes long and which held the audience—with scarcely a departure—to the end. From the "Cuckoo" piece of Delius, the conductor sprang almost without pause into the "Image" of Debussy; seemed to quicken the pace of the street-music and to spur the course of the awakening fête. Between stands that wondrous interlude—the last music of Debussy before the decline began—pulsing with the warmths and lustres of the Spanish night; into oboe, clarinet, wood-winds and strings concentrating and poetizing the hush and the pungency, the stilled sweetness, of what seems an immortal hour. Again Mr. Goossens missed beauty; overlooked poetry; sketched an impressionistic tone-picture and passed on. Not even the siren-call of Mr. Gillet's oboe or Mr. Allegra's clarinet might stay him.

In the retrospect comes a more general, a deeper, questioning. To his honor and his praise, Mr. Goossens, composer or conductor, is an open-minded and enlightened young modernist, "croyant et pratiquant," as the Parisians neatly say. Like all his tribe he has praiseworthy distaste for excess of sentiment, for romantic flummery and sham. Yet as it seemed with Brahms's Andante and Debussy's Interlude, these just antipathies push too far and then hedge too closely those that hold them. Like Mr. Goossens, they tend to forget the beauty, the poetry, even the sentiment, of tones when these are the very essence and burden of the music. Of course, there are compensations: the rhythmic spring and the tonal glint that Mr. Goossens and the orchestra gave to the dawning fête tingle in memory; while they flicked the street-music with glint after glint of rhythmed, sensuous sound.

Two shorter pieces, new to Symphony Hall, also stood on the program—a Sinfonietta to disclose Mr. Goossens as composer; the little tone-poem, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," to recall Frederick Delius, these many years over-neglected composer at home and abroad. The Sinfonietta is not only a Little Symphony, as the title implies but also a condensed and compressed symphony, a tabloid symphony, as current verbiage might call it. There is an unmistakable first movement, say five minutes long; a slow division as brief in development; a finale, of no more length, that seems a scherzo to new usages converted. A motto-motiv ties all three together. The persisting concision gives the music pith as well as moments; clearly discoverable motivs gain and hold the ear; a ready skill, a fertile fancy, work them. The harmonic background sounds piquant; the scoring is terse and ingenious. The first division upsprings; the chromatic second dallies with that sentiment which Mr. Goossens is presumed to abhor; the third teems with his rhythmic zest, his light, sure touch alike upon "ideas" and voices. In sum, a Sinfonietta that is a pleasing bit of studio-work; a pleasant and profitable exercise, to both composer and hearer, in the subduing of orthodox forms to innovating practice. That way lies one road to musical progress.

Now upon Delius, hearing—or remembering—the first calls [illegible] the cuckoo [illegible] winter wanes, came homesick longing f[illegible] northern spring. In memory it [illegible] falteringly upon the earth it would release; softly it melted the binding chains; over the land it spread a loveliness as gentle and serene as that which Parsifal saw, and Gurnemanz, upon the meadows of the Grail. And Delius was wistful and melancholy with the remembrance and would write music. So he invented a motiv that recalled the singular interval in the cuckoo's song and to it joined the melody of a Norwegian folk-piece. Out of them he spun a simple, sad-voiced, musing tune, that returns upon itself like a haunting memory. He harmonized it in pale grays and with subdued instrumental timbres laced it. Presently it sighed itself away and the spell vanished; but not until simplicity was nigh to sterility and dreamfulness close too wool-gathering, and the cuckoo thrice too often had echoed its call. For the while bird voices hardly charm in symphonic music—from Mr. Delius's distant cuckoo to Mr. R[illegible]ighi's too present nightingale.

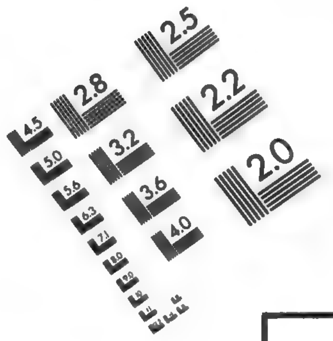
H[illegible] P.

REDUCTION

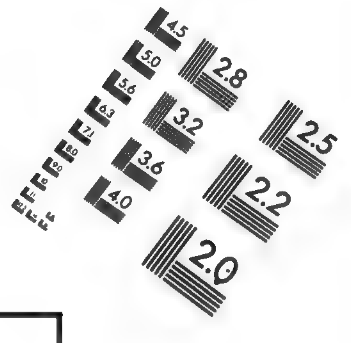
RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0

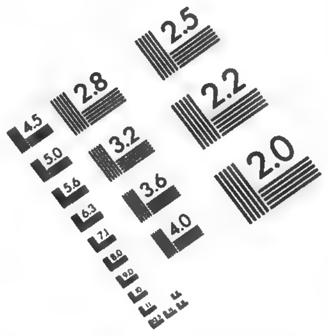


4.5
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

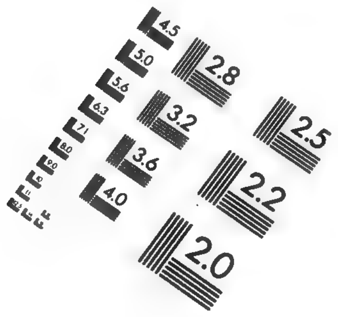
200 mm

150 mm

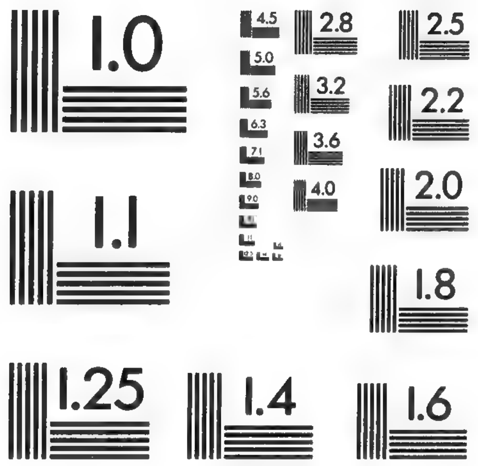
100 mm



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0



4.5
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0



1.0
4.5
2.8
2.5
5.0
3.2
2.2
5.6
6.3
3.6
2.0
4.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

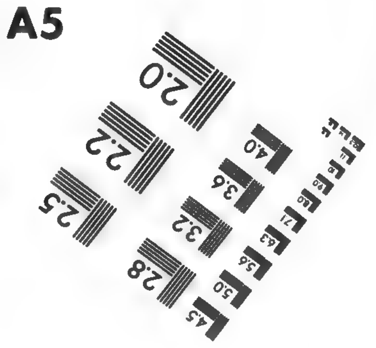
1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5

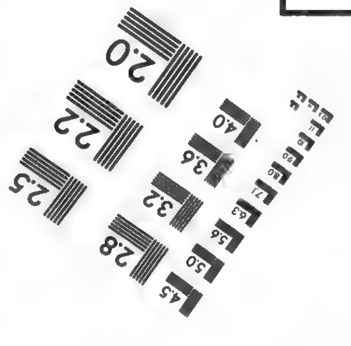


2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8

4.0
2.0
3.6
3.2
2.2
2.8
2.5

A4

A3



2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
4.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.0
2.0
3.6
3.2
2.2
2.8
2.5

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

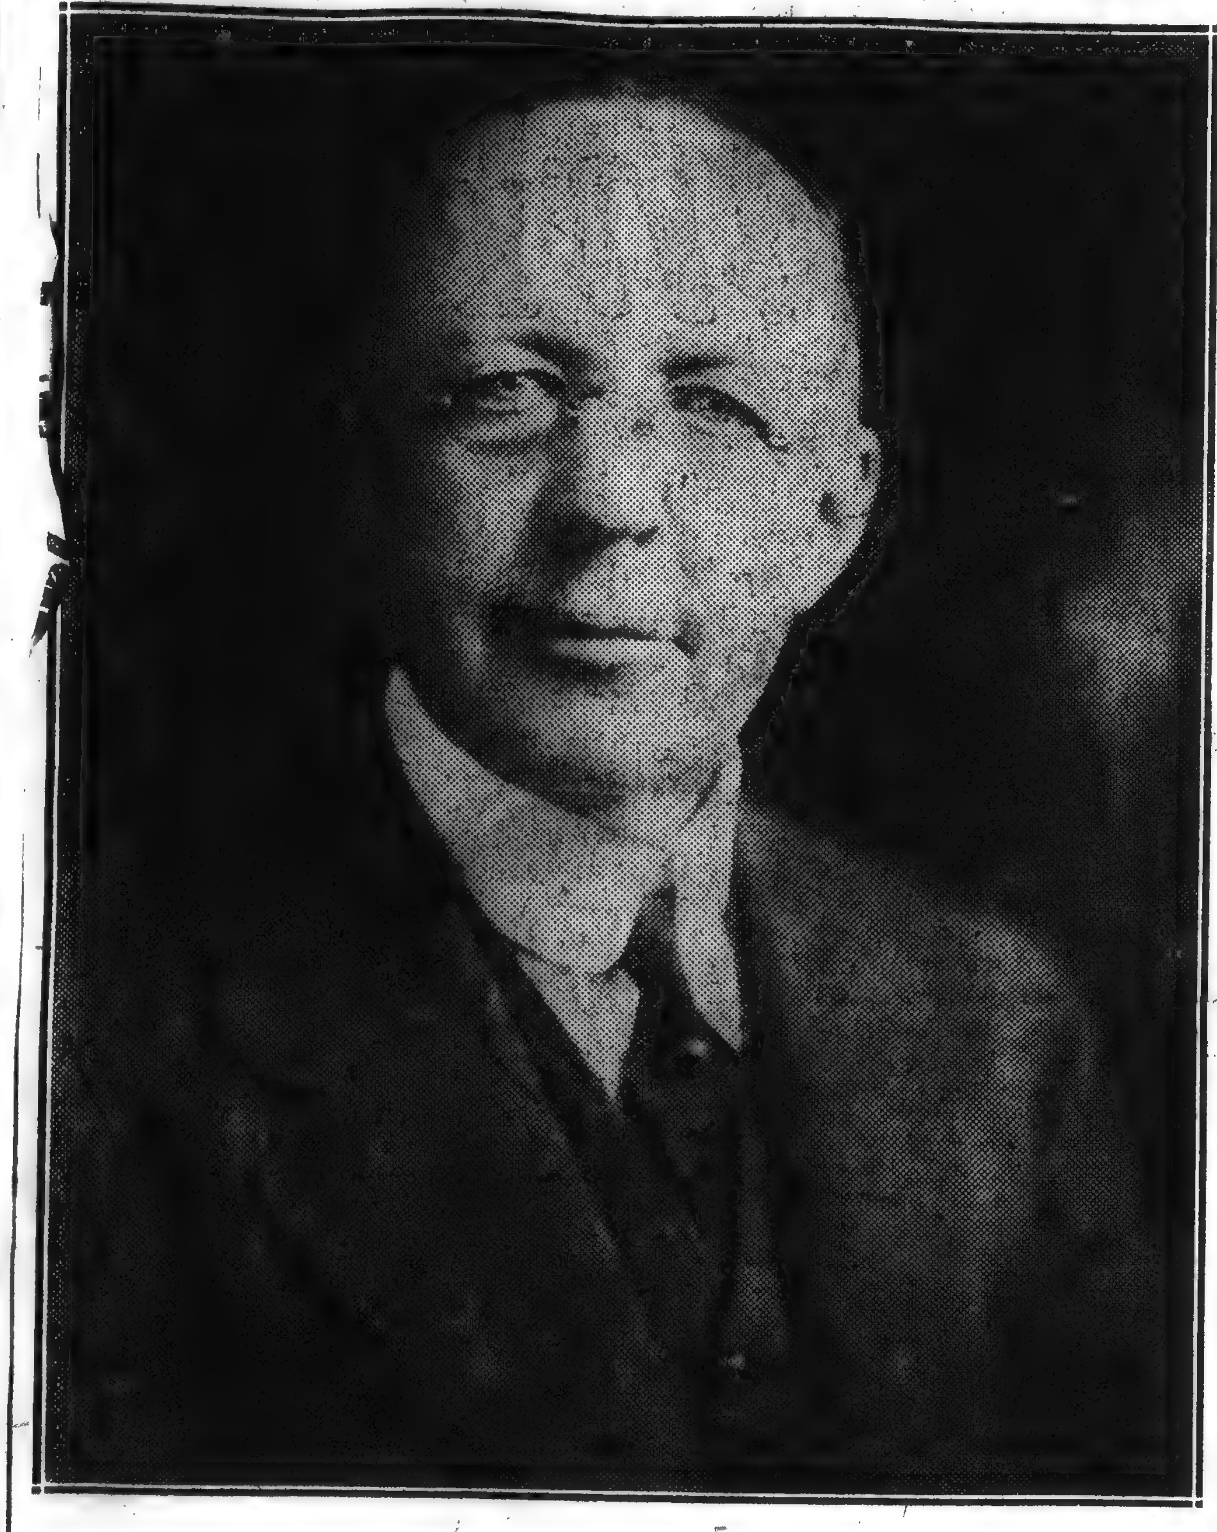
207

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY,

Jan 23

--- Tonight's Broadca

His Gift Marks Epoch in Radio



W. S. Quinby

President of the W. S. Quinby Company, Who Will Speak Over the Air Tonight in Connection with WEEI'S Broadcast of Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

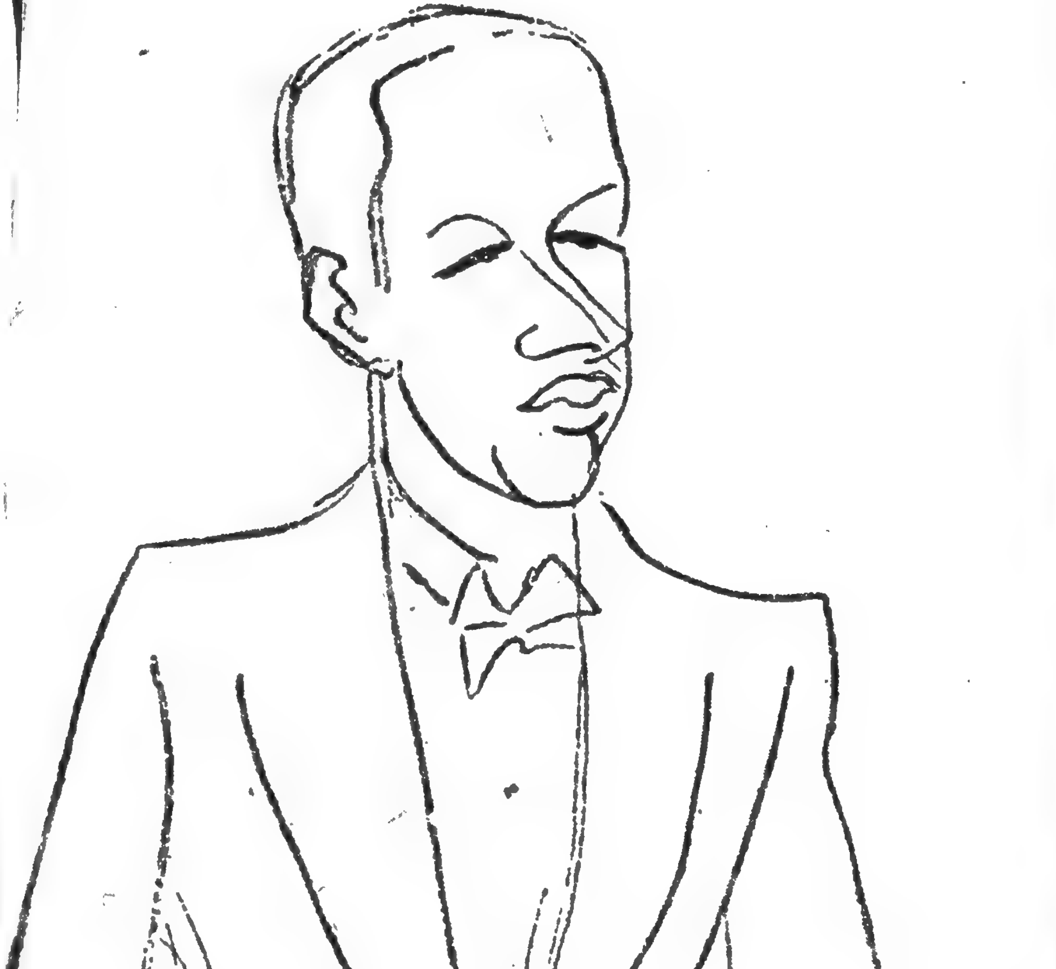
WHEN "E. F. A.'s" familiar voice comes over the air at 8 o'clock this evening, announcing from Symphony Hall and giving a preliminary discussion of the music to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, thousands of radio listeners, not only in New England, but in other sections of the East, will sit back in their chairs to enjoy one of the outstanding events in broadcasting history. Probably the most interested person will be W. S. Quinby, president of the W. S. Quinby Company, to whose generosity the listening public owes this concert and the eleven others which are to come.

The others will be broadcast on Jan. 30, Feb. 13, 20, and 27; March 6, 20, and 27; April 3, 17, 24 and May 1. Mr. Quinby feels that the Symphony broadcast, which he spent several months in helping to arrange, will be the outstanding achievement of his efforts to spread the fame and opportunities of New England in other quarters.

During the last week, engineers from WEEI, the Western Electric Company and the New England Telephone & Telegraph Company have spent about fifteen hours each day trying out the correct locations for microphones and their work received a thorough test at the rehearsal of the orchestra on Thursday. It is claimed that everything possible has been done to eliminate foreign sounds from the commotion always caused by an audience in a large hall, so that an almost perfect broadcast will result.

A room at the rear of the Symphony Hall stage has been reserved for the radio control room. Two expert control operators will be stationed there, as well as Arthur F. Edes, the announcer, who will describe the various selections played. Mr. Quinby will be present at the hall and is expected to make a brief statement to the radio audience.

Square-Rigged



Eugene Goossens

From the Caricature by Kapp

Boston Transcript Jan. 23/26

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—JANUARY 24,

MYRIADS HEAR THE SYMPHONY

First Broadcast by Great Orchestra a Success

Reports From All New England Tell of Delighted Listeners

Saturday Treat Through Season by Quinby's Gift

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played last night to what was undoubtedly the biggest audience that ever listened to a Symphony concert. Reports to the Globe from all over New England were unanimous as to the success of the first broadcast ever made by Boston's great orchestra.

W. S. Quinby, of the W. S. Quinby Company, whose generous gift of $12,000 made it possible for countless thousands to hear this concert broadcast through WEEI and WCSH, spoke briefly to the radio audience before the concert began, modestly sharing the credit for the broadcast with his business associates.

The Globe's musical critic, who heard the same program played Friday in Symphony Hall, was astonished and delighted with the broadcast. It conveyed to the radio audience an adequate notion of the concert.

The remaining concerts of the Symphony season will be broadcast on Saturday evenings. Mr Quinby's gift is certain to bring joy to innumerable listeners, many of them in lonely farm houses or dreary sick rooms.

Owner Refuses One

Only one incident marred the success of last night's broadcast. One number on the program, a Sinfonietta by Eugene Goossens, the young English composer and conductor who led the orchestra last night in the absence of Serge Koussevitzky, its regular conductor, who is on a vacation, was withheld from the radio audience. This composition is copyrighted by G. Ricordi & Co, the great Italian firm of music publishers. The managing director of the American branch of this concern, George Maxwell of New York, refused permission for the broadcast, because, as he said, "Radio contributes nothing to the treasuries of the publishers."

Mr Goossens requested permission for his work to be broadcast, asking it as a personal favor. Both Mr Quinby and officials of WEEI offered to pay a reasonable fee for permission to broadcast. But Mr Maxwell persisted in his refusal to grant it. There has been pro-

Continued on Page Twenty-One.

---

taken to indicate that drainage had the West. She told another friend she intended to go to a theatre that night.

MYRIADS HEAR THE SYMPHONY

Continued From the First Page.

longed controversy between broadcasters and music publishers about the payment of royalties on copyright music broadcast. The Ricordi firm, which controls all the Puccini operas and many other important works, has never permitted broadcasts. It seems unfortunate that an exception could not have been made in this case.

Perfect Nuances Heard

The radio audience listened to comment about the pieces played from A. F. Edes, announcer for WEEI, based, as he stated, upon Philip Hale's program notes for the Symphony concerts. In the prolonged intermission while those in the concert hall were hearing Goossens' Sinfonietta vocal selections were given from the studio of WEEI.

The most striking musical feature of the concert, as heard by radio was the perfect transmission of the incidental solos for woodwind instruments, especially the flute, clarinet, and oboe. The passages for horns and trombones were also very faithfully given by radio. The first violin part also came through well. A listener accustomed to hearing the Symphony Orchestra realized anew on listening to its broadcast the surpassing excellence of the leading individual players in the present orchestra.

The swelling and diminishing masses of tone as the orchestra followed Mr Goossens' eloquent interpretation of Weber and Brahms indicated to the radio audience the perfection in nuances of this orchestra.

Enjoyable Even Second Time

Nobody probably hoped for an absolutely perfect transmission of the playing of the full orchestra. The microphone, marvelous as last night's achievement again proved it to be, is still incapable of selecting and reproducing for distant hearers the exact sound of every instrument out of the hundred that play together when the whole orchestra is heard. In the relatively few forte passages where all the instruments are playing the effect was a bit blurred.

But with all critical reservations made the concert was enjoyable even to one who had heard it all the day before at Symphony Hall. The amount of pleasure it must have given to those unable to attend the concerts in person is incalculable.

W. S. Quinby, sponsor of the symphony broadcast, was introduced to the radio audience by Arthur F. Edes, WEEI's announcer, just prior to the concert.

Mr Quinby's Speech

Mr Quinby said:

"My remarks are going to be very brief, which no doubt is a bit of good news—but—at the conclusion I am going to add a postscript, which I hope all will have the patience to wait for.

"A great many people have expressed a desire to know how this very notable event—the broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra — was brought about. So I am very happy to have this opportunity to say a few words, hoping it may be of interest to all of you. It was not such a difficult problem—three people working to a common end, and a desire to accomplish a worthy purpose, hence patience and tolerance were all that were necessary.

"I think you will agree with me that this event is the climax of radio broadcasting, giving as it does, the entire public free of all cost the opportunity to hear the works of the world's greatest masters, interpreted by the world's greatest conductors guiding the world's greatest artists.

Plan Long Thought Out

"Heretofore this great organization of 107 men has played primarily for the small percentage of Bostonians who have been so fortunate as to securre seats in Symphony Hall, most of which are sold out in advance for the entire season. Tonight, however, and every Saturday evening concert for the balance of the season, this orchestra belongs not to Boston alone, but to millions of music lovers whose radio sets are within range of its harmonies.

"Back two or more years, when radio was comparatively new, and in its real wonder stage to everyone, and the air was crowded with the frivolous and light matters of life, it naturally came to me that the public would appreciate something of the best in the line of radio broadcasting, and, as the slogan of the organization of which I happen to be the head has always been 'You might as well have the best,' naturally my thoughts turned to that Boston institution which has always occupied in the minds of the people that position, and which has built up for itself a standard which has never been questioned—a standard by which all that is best in the musical world is always measured.

For Proper Transmission

"At that time I was unable to make any headway toward broadcasting the full Symphony Orchestra, for the reason that the trustees of Symphony felt they had standards to uphold, and could not see their way to consent to a broadcast, particularly as they could not feel sure of the proper transmission of their concerts.

"But we did succeed at that time, as perhaps many of you will remember, in broadcasting a group of the Symphony players, and the very evident pleasure and appreciation with which these concerts were received by all within possible hearing were such that we not only felt very much satisfied with what we had accomplished but there was implanted in our minds a determination to continue in our efforts, and give the public ultimately the very best the world afforded.

"So we never lost sight of our ambition to see that the full Symphony Orchestra was broadcast to the public.

"I understood the trustees were always desirous that this should happen when it could be done in agreement with Symphony standards, including a broadcasting station which met their requirements.

"Finest the World Affords"

"These negotiations have continued up to the present time, progress being slow because of the anxiety of all concerned that every provision possible should be made to insure the public an opportunity to hear the full Symphony under the best possible conditions, which conditions were met when Station WEEI was agreed upon.

"I am happy tonight in the thought that within a few moments this desire on the part of all those interested is about to become a reality, and that for 12 weeks, sitting comfortably at home, those who want the best will have an opportunity to hear and enjoy without any question the finest orchestral music that the world affords.

"Also I can say to you that everyone interested in this production takes the keenest pleasure in having been able to offer this to so many music lovers, and especially those who are unable through ill-health to enjoy many of the good things of life, an dthose living in far-away isolated communities.

"Please remember this is the first of 12 broadcasts—others will be given Saturday evenings during the balance of the Symphony season in Boston.

"An expression from you as to your reception and enjoyment will be much appreciated by all concerned, and may I add especially do I feel sure that the members of Symphony, as well as WEEI and myself, will be pleased to hear from you.

"Address all communicati [illegible] and they will be forwar [illegible]

"Here is the postscript, [illegible] member nothing else I have said, I hope you will all remember this:

"There is just one phase of the situation that I want to make clear to everybody. The newspapers and the public at large are giving me all the credit for having made this broadcast possible. The truth is this credit should be shared with my associates. While it is true that I took a more active part in the matter than anyone else, I did so only in the capacity of president of our company.

"Now I am going to bid you all good night, wishing you a most enjoyable evening."

There can be no doubt that an enjoyable evening was spent by at least half New England in listening to this concert. Next Saturday, beginning at 8:10, a program conducted by Serge Koussevitsky will be brodcast by the Boston Symphony from WEEI. The numbers to be heard are all by modern Russian composers. They include an orchestral fantasy, "A Uight on Bald Mountain," by Musorgsky; a piano concerto by Serge Prokofieff, in which the composer himself will play the piano part, and a symphony, 'The Divine Poem," by Skriabin. P. R.

SYMPHONY HEARD WELL IN SUBURBS OF BANGOR

BANGOR, Me, Jan 23—While radio conditions in the city proper have been very bad for the past 10 days and very little has been received from Boston stations, the Symphony concert reception tonight was fairly good, except for fading at times.

Stations five and six miles out reported fine reception.

1208

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, JANUARY 24, 1926

SYMPHONY PLAYS FOR RADIO THRONG

Thousands All Over New England Hear Famous Boston Orchestra for First Time

BY O. M. STATIC

An audience estimated in the millions throughout New England and beyond heard in their own homes the first broadcast last night of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was the greatest musical triumph in the brief but remarkable history of radio. And it marked forever the passing of the time when the world's greatest music played by the best musicians in the world was reserved for a small aristocracy with season tickets for the less than 3000 seats in Symphony Hall.

"BROADCAST CLIMAX"

It was heard last night by the sick and the bedridden, by those who never saw Symphony Hall and by those to whom such a broadcast opened wonderlands undreamed of before.

The broadcast was the gift of W. S. Quinby, of the W. S. Quinby Company, whose slogan is: "You might as well have the best." He co-operated with station WEEI, of the Edison Electric Illuminating Company, and the New England Telephone & Telegraph Company. It went out to the millions over the WEEI wave length and from station WCSH, the Congress Square Hotel, Portland, Me.

Mr. Quinby, New England business man and apostle extraordinary of New England achievement, in a three-minute introductory speech declared the event "the climax of radio-broadcasting." It gives the general public, he said, "the works of the world's greatest masters interpreted by the world's greatest artists."

Mechanical Triumph, Also

The broadcast was, of course, the greatest orchestral wonder in the short but vivid history of radio. But it was a mechanical triumph, too. Four microphones, two over the head of Eugene Goossens, guest conductor last night in the absence of Serge Koussevitsky on vacation, and two facing each other from opposite places over the heads of the 107 musicians in the orchestra, took every finest syllable of sound and carried the music through wires and amplifiers for re-broadcasting to the world of listeners in every city, town and hamlet of New England, and to the owners of sets in distant parts of the country.

Two flights above the platform where the musicians were seated was the radio control room which had formerly been a store room. It was from here that Mr. Quinby delivered his short address, and it was from the same place that Arthur F. Edes, programme director of Station WEEI and its chief announcer, read from 13 pages of carefully prepared manuscript the biographical sketches and explanatory notes that filled in the pauses between renditions.

In this room working under the greatest tension operated the experts of the telephone company, Charles Abel supervising, regulating the volume of sound as it came from the platform. The sound passed through amplifiers and went out on telephone lines to the Milk street headquarters of the telephone company. From there one telephone line carried the music to the Edison Station, WEEI, on Boylston street, and another to WCSH, Portland. Ralph W. Mathewson, the WEEI chief operator, and Leon Hentz, associate operator, in the control room of the station, continued the sound regulation before it ultimately reached the radio listener.

Big Orchestra Tunes

The broadcast of the music began about 8:19 o'clock following smoothly a few presentation remarks by Announcer Edes, the address by Mr. Quinby, and a resume of the history of the music and the life of the composer who wrote it again by Mr. Edes. The control was then switched from the scene of the speechmaking in the control room to the platform of Symphony Hall. There were the usual noises of a vast orchestra tuning. Then a sudden burst of applause indicated that Goossens, guest conductor, was taking his place on the stand.

Two or three moments of silence followed, to the radio listener a greater mark of tribute and respect to the orchestra than the applause. Distinctly one heard the 'rap-rap' of the conductor's baton. Then followed the tremendous sweep of the orchestra's music bursting forth in the eloquent opening strains of Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz." It was this everybody had been waiting for. It broke through the silence like a sudden burst of sunrise, mightily. It dispelled at once all fears of so large an ensemble registering fully in the microphones.

Precious little was lost. This in spite of the fact ample evidence was afforded showing that microphone placement could be improved. Never on the air from any station was there such complete volume more evenly balanced. The problem was greater than any yet presented to the mechanical experts. For when Symphony hall was built radio had not yet begun even to be a dream. The platform of the hall had in some way to be converted into a radio studio. This was not perfectly accomplished, but it was more nearly perfect than the best opera broadcast we have yet heard.

Each Unit Registers

Never was there such distinct reception from a musical organization ever half as large as this. It was a great ensemble, more vast than anything yet to come over the air. But each unit registered in its required measure with the uncanny accuracy that is the wonder and the mystery of the queer little contraption called a microphone, a bit of machinery no larger than a man's fist. The general plan of the broadcast moved without a jar or interruption. The biographical interpolations of Mr. Edes, his historical review of the career of Koussevitsky, who will conduct for next week's broadcast, and the others yet to follow, and the story of the orchestra itself from the days of its beginnings under its benefactor, Major Henry L. Higginson in 1886, were all carefully timed to fit the lapses of time between orchestra permormances.

There was one painfully disappointing feature in the broadcast. This was the omission of Goossens' "Sinfonietta," from the broadcast, although it was given by the orchestra for the listeners in the hall. It would have been more interesting to the radio audience than the other portions of the programme. But, according to the comment by Announcer Edes, this had to be culled from the broadcast because G. Ricordi & Company, of New York, who own the American performing rights, had forbidden it going on the air.

THREE IMPRESSIONS

Broadcast May Prove Boon to Those Who Have Never Heard Famous Orchestra at First Hand—Audience Is Expectant and Players "on Their Toes"

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At Symphony Hall last evening the curious and interested might receive three different tonal impressions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, giving under the direction of Eugene Goossens, as guest conductor, its first broadcast concert.

Within the auditorium might be heard the orchestra itself, in its present estate a glory of sound for which the world holds few parallels. In a room adjoining the second balcony was the instrument which was relaying the concert to station WEEI. Equipped with a loud speaker, this instrument gave the listener a very fair conception of the sound of the orchestra. The volume of tone, of course, and likewise the ultimate silken lustre, velvet depth or scarlet brilliance of the orchestral tone. And on the authority of those in charge of these operations, a first class receiving set should give quite a good version of the orchestra as that which this half-way station afforded.

Downstairs in one of the offices of Symphony Hall was a receiving set of probably average excellence, equipped both with loud speaker and earphones. Heard through the speaker the orchestra was truly but a shadow of itself. Heard through the earphones the effect was vastly more satisfactory.

Of three pieces heard from this instrument, the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, Delius's "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring" and the first movement of Debussy's "Iberia," the music of Delius with its rich string-texture sounded the most faithful to the original.

With the Symphony one missed the massive sonority of Brahms' orchestration, though certain solo passages for wind instruments came through excellently, while the vivid colors, the "patchier" instrumentation, the plentiful percussiveness of Debussy's orchestra did not exactly register.

For one who might not see it in its native glory, a stereopticon picture of the Matterhorn must inevitably give some idea of its grandeur. For the music lover who may not hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra "in the flesh," the broadcasting of its concerts must prove a boon, modified or heightened, of course, by the quality of one's receiving set.

Before the concert of last evening began, there was in the audience an air of expectancy and interest—something a little out of the ordinary was in the wind. There was a craning of necks to see the three microphones, set in a triangle behind and slightly to the left of the conductor so as to favor the tone of the violins rather than that of the heavy brass. The orchestra, too, which sat for its photograph before the concert began, was plainly on its mettle. Certainly the performance of Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz" was one of extraordinary brilliance, both more flexible and of keener edge than that of Friday afternoon.

OLAN & SON
WM. C. "BILL" DOLAN
r to Pay
FUR SALE
At SLAUGHTER PRICES
uls, Hudson Seals,
ns, Northern Seals

BROADCAST BY KOUSSEVITZKY

American Jan 27

If present plans do not miscarry, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his debut as a radio announcer Saturday night.

It is planned to have the noted conductor talk into the microphone at Symphony Hall. If he decides to speak it will not only be his debut as a radio announcer, but it will be the first time he has made any announcement whatsoever in connection with a concert.

Charles Burton, superintendent of the Edison station, WEEI; W. S. Quinby, New England business man and sponsor of the broadcast, and his associates, are more than eager to make Koussevitzky's voice a part of the broadcast.

Transcript Jan 28

Sign of the Times

Suggestion Already That the Course of the Symphony Concerts Be Altered to Suit the Radio

SOONER than it was anticipated the inevitable divergence has come. The radio people interested in the broadcasting of the Symphony Concerts are already meddling with the programs. It happens that various publishers of symphonic music reserve it from performance "on the air." Usually they do so with the sanction of the composers. Most of these pieces are the work of illustrious living hands which has had place and should have place at the Symphony Concerts. The radio people now suggest that such reserved pieces be eliminated from the programs, so that there may be no gaps in the broadcasting as there was last Saturday when Mr. Goossens's "Sinfonietta" was played in the hall, but not over the radio.

It is hard to take such a suggestion seriously since to comply with it would materially limit the repertory of the Symphony Concerts. After all, they exist primarily for the actual audiences of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, whose subscriptions for tickets and contributions to the guarantee fund maintain them. In reason and fairness these audiences have a right to a repertory unrestricted and unlessened by consideration for an incidental broadcast. It is not likely that either Mr. Koussevitzky as program-maker, or the trustees as final voice, will permit such a diminution of the field, the interest and the prestige of the Symphony Concerts. All three are dear to them.

H. T. P.

---

orchestra, direction W. Edward Boyle.

WEEI—Boston—349

Jan 30 Globe

6:45 A M—Health exercises.

7:45 A M—Morning watch, Rev Dr W. H. Murphy, First Baptist Church, Somerville.

8 P M—Boston Symphony Orchestra, direct from Symphony Hall, Serge Kousseviтsky, conductor. Courtesy of W. S. Quinby. (Moussorgsky) "Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve" (a night on Bald Mountain), orchestral fantasy; (Prokofieff) "Third Concerto for Piano, opus 26." Andante, Allegro; theme, Andantino: Variation I, Listesso tempo; Variation II, Allegro; Variation III, Allegro moderato; Variation IV, Andante meditativo; Variation V, Allegro giusto; theme, Listesso tempo; Allegro, ma non troppo. Intermission. Scriabin, Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," opus 43; Lento; Luttes; Allegro; Voluptes, Lento; Jeu Divin, Allegro. Soloist, Serge Prokofieff.

10 P M—Lucerne girls' quintet.

10:30 P M—Walter H. Kidder, baritone.

WBZ—Springfield—333 (242)

Metres—1200 Kilocycles—100 watts

3:00 p. m.—Special Phonograph Record Hour.

WEEI—Edison Light, Boston, Mass.—349 Metres—860 Kilocycles—100 Watts—0 Miles

6:45 a. m.—Tower health exercises.

7:45 a. m.—Morning watch by Y. M. C. A. the Rev. W. H. Murphy, minister First Baptist Church, Somerville.

8:00 p. m.—Boston Symphony orchestra broadcast direct from Symphony Hall, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor; courtesy W. S. Quinby. Programme—Moussorgsky, "Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve" (A Night on Bald Mountain), orchestral fantasy. Prokofieff, "Third Concerto for Piano," Op. 26. 1. Andante, "Allegro." 2. Theme, "Andantino. Variation I. "Listesso tempo"; variation II. "Allegro"; variation III. "Allegro moderato"; variation IV. "Andante meditative"; variation V. "Allegro giusto"; Theme, "Listesso tempo." 3. "Allegro, ma non troppo. Intermission—Scriabin, "Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," Op. 43. Lento; Luttes, "Allegro"; Voluptes, "Lento"; Jeu Divin, "Allegro." Soloist—Serge Prokofieff.

10:00 p. m.—Girls' quintet.

10:30 p. m.—Walter H. Kidder, baritone.

Post Jan 30

NEW ENGLAND

WEEI—Edison Electric Ill. Co., Boston, 348.6 meters, 861 K. C., 1000 watts

6:45 A. M.—Tower health exercises.

7:45 A. M.—Morning watch from Estey organ studio by Y. M. C. A. The Rev. W. H. Murphy, minister First Baptist Church, Somerville.

8 P. M.—Boston Symphony orchestra, broadcast direct from Symphony hall. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor. Courtesy W. S. Quinby.

PROGRAM

Moussorgsky—"Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve" (A Night on Bald Mountain), orchestral fantasy.

Prokofieff—Third Concerto for Piano, op. 26.
I. Andante—Allegro.
II. Theme—Andantino.
Variation I. Listesso tempo
Variation II. Allegro.
Variation III. Allegro moderato.
Variation IV. Andante meditative
Variation V. Allegro giusto.
Theme Listesso tempo.
III. Allegro, ma non troppo.
Intermission.

Herald Jan 30

Scriabin—Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," op. 43, Lento; Luttes, Allegro; Voluptes, Lento; Jeu Divin, Allegro.

Soloist—Serge Prokofieff.

10 P. M.—Lucerne Girls' quintet.

10:30 P. M.—Walter A. Kidder, baritone.

KOUSSEVITZKY IS WELCOMED

He Leads Symphony Orchestra After Two Weeks' Rest from Labors

CONCERT WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

~~HERALD~~ JAN 30

By PHILIP HALE

If Mr. Roussevitzky had any doubt concerning the respect and affection in which he is held by the great musical public of Boston, that doubt must have been dispelled by the glowing tribute paid him yesterday afternoon when he came on the platform of Symphony hall after his vacation of a fortnight.

The program was as follows: Moussorgsky, "A Night on Bald Mountain." Prokofieff, Third Concerto for piano and orchestra (Mr. Prokofieff, pianist). Scriabin, Symphony No. 3, "The Divine Poem." The concerto was played for the first time in Boston.

Apparently there are two Prokofieffs: one the composer of the splendidly barbaric "Scythian" suite, which was heard here in 1924; the other the composer of the Third Piano Concerto, a work in comparatively more academic form, but without a trace of academic rigidity and dullness. The music is refreshingly individual. One does not find in it the influence of any school nor of any other composer, past or present. Thematically, harmonically, it is Mr. Prokofieff's own, as is his employment of orchestral instruments. While the music has not the engaging and engrossing wildness of the "Scythian" suite, it is music of the East rather than of the West. Here and there one finds the melodic and rhythmic repetition dear to Orientals rejoicing in the consequent hypnosis. When this repetition gains little by little in intensity, the effect is exciting and at the last overpowering, so that the coolest hearer is seized with rhythmic fever and, like the inhabitants of ancient Abdera, is haunted by a simple melody. The theme of the second movement—we believe it to be original with Mr. Prokofieff, for no contrary statement has been made—is of exotic beauty, while the postlude of a few measures, ingeniously varied after each one of the set variations will long haunt the memory, the more so by its simplicity. These variations are ingenious, free from pattern work. The fourth, marked Andante meditativo, is unaffectedly poetic. Throughout the concerto there is no effort to stun or dazzle the hearer. It is as if Mr. Prokofieff had composed it for his own pleasure, without thought of possible audiences, indifferent to words of praise or blame.

It is often said disparingly of a musician playing his own composition for the piano: "He plays like a composer." This sneer cannot be directed against Mr. Prokofieff, any more than it is true of Mr. Rachmaninoff. Mr. Prokofieff in the most modest manner in the world played like a virtuoso who was not thinking first of technic, not trying to impress hearers by technical proficiency, conscious, but not too self-conscious of his own ability. He played as if he were a member of the orchestra, displaying sufficient fluency, a command of nuances and of sentiment, emotion and brilliance. He was recalled several times.

Whether Scriabin is great or not great among composers is a legitimate subject for discussion. This discussion will not in all probability shatter friendships and divide households as was the case long ago in the Beecher trial. Whether Scriabin is great or not, it can be safely said that Mr. Koussevitzky is his Prophet. This "Divine Poem," whatever may be thought of it as a whole, is to us preferable to "The Poem of Ecstasy" and "Promethus," which, it is said, have a theosophic mission. One attends a concert to hear music, not to hear theosophic teachings disguised by music. Dr. Eaglefield Hull who is a fanatical Scriabinite, is of the opinion that the "Divine Poem" expresses "the spirit's liberation from its earthly trammels, and the consequent free expression of purified personality." It is a pity that this "personality" helped itself freely from the music dramas of the unpurified Wagner. There are measures that are as direct quotations. It is also singular that the most striking, most emotional section of the work is entitled "Sensuous Pleasures." Like other orchestral compositions of Scriabin there is thematic material not always significant; there are pages of sheer bombast; a succession of climaxes that destroy any effect of one great and irresistible culmination of force. Yet one, not a fervid admirer of Scriabin, remembering the genuine beauty and poetic feeling of the section "Voluptes" might say of "the Divine Poem" that is is the least objectionable of his chief orchestral works.

The witch music of Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain" is amusing, though one is disappointed because the professional and amateur demons are not still more hellish in the celebration of their Sabbath. More might reasonably be expected of these Spirits of Darkness glorifying their great god Tchernobog. But neither Berlioz nor Boito, neither Gounod nor Cesar Franck were more fortunate in portraying Satan and his hosts in tones. Moussorgsky's music that follows the notes of the church bell in the village is of charming quality and it was wonderfully played.

The orchestral performance throughout the concert was brilliant, and again Mr. Koussevitzky was revealed as a most eloquent interpreter.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program for the 15th pair of concerts, Feb. 12th, Feb. 13th will be as follows: Vivaldi, Concerto, E Minor for strings; Lekeu, Fantaisie Contrapuntique sur un Cramignon Liegeois; Respighi, Symphonic Poem, "The Pines of Rome"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 1. The music by Vivaldi (edited by Mistovski), Lekeu and Respighi will be played in Boston for the first time.

1 208

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, JANUARY 24, 1926

SYMPHONY PLAYS FOR RADIO THRONG

Thousands All Over New England Hear Famous Boston Orchestra for First Time

BY O. M. STATIC

An audience estimated in the millions throughout New England and beyond heard in their own homes the first broadcast last night of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was the greatest musical triumph in the brief but remarkable history of radio. And it marked forever the passing of the time when the world's greatest music played by the best musicians in the world was reserved for a small aristocracy with season tickets for the less than 3000 seats in Symphony Hall.

"BROADCAST CLIMAX"

It was heard last night by the sick and the bedridden, by those who never saw Symphony Hall and by those to whom such a broadcast opened wonderlands undreamed of before.

The broadcast was the gift of W. S. Quinby, of the W. S. Quinby Company, whose slogan is: "You might as well have the best." He co-operated with station WEEI, of the Edison Electric Illuminating Company, and the New England Telephone & Telegraph Company. It went out to the millions over the WEEI wave length and from station WCSH, the Congress Square Hotel, Portland. Me.

Mr. Quinby, New England business man and apostle extraordinary of New England achievement, in a three-minute introductory speech declared the event "the climax of radio-broadcasting." It gives the general public, he said, "the works of the world's greatest masters interpreted by the world's greatest artists."

Mechanical Triumph, Also

The broadcast was, of course, the greatest orchestral wonder in the short but vivid history of radio. But it was a mechanical triumph, too. Four microphones, two over the head of Eugene Goossens, guest conductor last night in the absence of Serge Koussevitsky on vacation, and two facing each other from opposite places over the heads of the 107 musicians in the orchestra, took every finest syllable of sound and carried the music through wires and amplifiers for re-broadcasting to the world of listeners in every city, town and hamlet of New England, and to the owners of sets in distant parts of the country.

Two flights above the platform where the musicians were seated was the radio control room which had formerly been a store room. It was from here that Mr. Quinby delivered his short address, and it was from the same place that Arthur F. Edes, programme director of Station WEEI and its chief announcer, read from 13 pages of carefully prepared manuscript the biographical sketches and explanatory notes that filled in the pauses between renditions.

In this room working under the greatest tension operated the experts of the telephone company, Charles Abel supervising, regulating the volume of sound as it came from the platform. The sound passed through amplifiers and went out on telephone lines to the Milk street headquarters of the telephone company. From there one telephone line carried the music to the Edison Station, WEEI, on Boylston street, and another to WCSH, Portland. Ralph W. Mathewson, the WEEI chief operator, and Leon Hentz, associate operator, in the control room of the station, continued the sound regulation before it ultimately reached the radio listener.

Big Orchestra Tunes

The broadcast of the music began about 8:19 o'clock following smoothly a few presentation remarks by Announcer Edes, the address by Mr. Quinby, and a resume of the history of the music and the life of the composer who wrote it again by Mr. Edes. The control was then switched from the scene of the speechmaking in the control room to the platform of Symphony Hall. There were the usual noises of a vast orchestra tuning. Then a sudden burst of applause indicated that Goossens, guest conductor, was taking his place on the stand.

Two or three moments of silence followed, to the radio listener a greater mark of tribute and respect to the orchestra than the applause. Distinctly one heard the 'rap-rap' of the conductor's baton. Then followed the tremendous sweep of the orchestra's music bursting forth in the eloquent opening strains of Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz." It was this everybody had been waiting for. It broke through the silence like a sudden burst of sunrise, mightily. It dispelled at once all fears of so large an ensemble registering fully in the microphones.

Precious little was lost. This in spite of the fact ample evidence was afforded showing that microphone placement could be improved. Never on the air from any station was there such complete volume more evenly balanced. The problem was greater than any yet presented to the mechanical experts. For when Symphony hall was built radio had not yet begun even to be a dream. The platform of the hall had in some way to be converted into a radio studio. This was not perfectly accomplished, but it was more nearly perfect than the best opera broadcast we have yet heard.

Each Unit Registers

Never was there such distinct reception from a musical organization ever half as large as this. It was a great ensemble, more vast than anything yet to come over the air. But each unit registered in its required measure with the uncanny accuracy that is the wonder and the mystery of the queer little contraption called a microphone, a bit of machinery no larger than a man's fist. The general plan of the broadcast moved without a jar or interruption. The biographical interpolations of Mr. Edes, his historical review of the career of Koussevitsky, who will conduct for next week's broadcast, and the others yet to follow, and the story of the orchestra itself from the days of its beginnings under its benefactor, Major Henry L. Higginson in 1886, were all carefully timed to fit the lapses of time between orchestra permormances.

There was one painfully disappointing feature in the broadcast. This was the omission of Goossens' "Sinfonietta," from the broadcast, although it was given by the orchestra for the listeners in the hall. It would have been more interesting to the radio audience than the other portions of the programme. But, according to the comment by Announcer Edes, this had to be culled from the broadcast because G. Ricordi & Company, of New York, who own the American performing rights, had forbidden it going on the air.

THREE IMPRESSIONS

Broadcast May Prove Boon to Those Who Have Never Heard Famous Orchestra at First Hand—Audience Is Expectant and Players "on Their Toes"

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At Symphony Hall last evening the curious and interested might receive three different tonal impressions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, giving under the direction of Eugene Goossens, as guest conductor, its first broadcast concert.

Within the auditorium might be heard the orchestra itself, in its present estate a glory of sound for which the world holds few parallels. In a room adjoining the second balcony was the instrument which was relaying the concert to station WEEI. Equipped with a loud speaker, this instrument gave the listener a very fair conception of the sound of the orchestra. The volume of tone, of course, and likewise the ultimate silken lustre, velvet depth or scarlet brilliance of the orchestral tone. And on the authority of those in charge of these operations, a first class receiving set should give quite a good version of the orchestra as that which this half-way station afforded.

Downstairs in one of the offices of Symphony Hall was a receiving set of probably average excellence, equipped both with loud speaker and earphones. Heard through the speaker the orchestra was truly but a shadow of itself. Heard through the earphones the effect was vastly more satisfactory.

Of three pieces heard from this instrument, the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, Delius's "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring" and the first movement of Debussy's "Iberia," the music of Delius with its rich string-texture sounded the most faithful to the original.

With the Symphony one missed the massive sonority of Brahms' orchestration, though certain solo passages for wind instruments came through excellently, while the vivid colors, the "patchier" instrumentation, the plentiful percussiveness of Debussy's orchestra did not exactly register.

For one who might not see it in its native glory, a stereopticon picture of the Matterhorn must inevitably give some idea of its grandeur. For the music lover who may not hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra "in the flesh," the broadcasting of its concerts must prove a boon, modified or heightened, of course, by the quality of one's receiving set.

Before the concert of last evening began, there was in the audience an air of expectancy and interest—something a little out of the ordinary was in the wind. There was a craning of necks to see the three microphones, set in a triangle behind and slightly to the left of the conductor so as to favor the tone of the violins rather than that of the heavy brass. The orchestra, too, which sat for its photograph before the concert began, was plainly on its mettle. Certainly the performance of Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz" was one of extraordinary brilliance, both more flexible and of keener edge than that of Friday afternoon.

OLAN & SON
WM. C. "BILL" DOLAN
ar to Pay
FUR SALE
-At SLAUGHTER PRICES
uls, Hudson Seals,
ns, Northern Seals

BROADCAST BY KOUSSEVITZKY

AMERICAN JAN 27

If present plans do not miscarry, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his debut as a radio announcer Saturday night.

It is planned to have the noted conductor talk into the microphone at Symphony Hall. If he decides to speak it will not only be his debut as a radio announcer, but it will be the first time he has made any announcement whatsoever in connection with a concert.

Charles Burton, superintendent of the Edison station, WEEI; W. S. Quinby, New England business man and sponsor of the broadcast, and his associates, are more than eager to make Koussevitzky's voice a part of the broadcast.

Transcript Jan 28

Sign of the Times

Suggestion Already That the Course of the Symphony Concerts Be Altered to Suit the Radio

SOONER than it was anticipated the inevitable divergence has come. The radio people interested in the broadcasting of the Symphony Concerts are already meddling with the programs. It happens that various publishers of symphonic music reserve it from performance "on the air." Usually they do so with the sanction of the composers. Most of these pieces are the work of illustrious living hands which has had place and should have place at the Symphony Concerts. The radio people now suggest that such reserved pieces be eliminated from the programs, so that there may be no gaps in the broadcasting as there was last Saturday when Mr. Goossens's "Sinfonietta" was played in the hall, but not over the radio.

It is hard to take such a suggestion seriously since to comply with it would materially limit the repertory of the Symphony Concerts. After all, they exist primarily for the actual audiences of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, whose subscriptions for tickets and contributions to the guarantee fund maintain them. In reason and fairness these audiences have a right to a repertory unrestricted and unlessened by consideration for an incidental broadcast. It is not likely that either Mr. Koussevitzky as program-maker, or the trustees as final voice, will permit such a diminution of the field, the interest and the prestige of the Symphony Concerts. All three are dear to them.

H. T. P.

---

orchestra, direction W. Edward Boyle.

WEEI—Boston—349

Jan 30 Globe

6:45 A M—Health exercises.

7:45 A M—Morning watch, Rev Dr W. H. Murphy, First Baptist Church, Somerville.

8 P M—Boston Symphony Orchestra, direct from Symphony Hall, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor. Courtesy of W. S. Quinby. (Moussorgsky) "Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve" (a night on Bald Mountain), orchestral fantasy; (Prokofieff) "Third Concerto for Piano, opus 26." Andante, Allegro; theme, Andantino; Variation I, Listesso tempo; Variation II, Allegro; Variation III, Allegro moderato; Variation IV, Andante meditativo; Variation V, Allegro giusto; theme, Listesso tempo; Allegro, ma non troppo. Intermission. Scriabin, Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," opus 43; Lento; Luttes; Allegro; Voluptes, Lento; Jeu Divin, Allegro. Soloist, Serge Prokofieff.

10 P M—Lucerne girls' quintet.

10:30 P M—Walter H. Kidder, baritone.

WBZ—Springfield—333 (242)

Metres—1200 Kilocycles—

3:00 p. m.—Special Phonograph Record Hour.

WEEI—Edison Light, Boston, Mass.—349 Metres—860 Kilocycles—100 Watts—0 Miles

6:45 a. m.—Tower health exercises.

7:45 a. m.—Morning watch by Y. M. C. A. the Rev. W. H. Murphy, minister First Baptist Church, Somerville.

8:00 p. m.—Boston Symphony orchestra broadcast direct from Symphony Hall, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor; courtesy W. S. Quinby. Programme—Moussorgsky, "Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve" (A Night on Bald Mountain), orchestral fantasy. Prokofieff, "Third Concerto for Piano," Op. 26. 1. Andante, "Allegro." 2. Theme, "Andantino. Variation I. "Listesso tempo"; variation II. "Allegro"; variation III. "Allegro moderato"; variation IV. "Andante meditative"; variation V. "Allegro giusto"; Theme, "Listesso tempo." 3. "Allegro, ma non troppo. Intermission—Scriabin, "Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," Op. 43. Lento; Luttes, "Allegro"; Voluptes, "Lento"; Jeu Divin, "Allegro." Soloist—Serge Prokofieff.

10:00 p. m.—Girls' quintet.

10:30 p. m.—Walter H. Kidder, baritone.

Post Jan 30

NEW ENGLAND

WEEI—Edison Electric Ill. Co., Boston, 348.6 meters, 861 K. C., 1000 watts

6:45 A. M.—Tower health exercises.

7:45 A. M.—Morning watch from Estey organ studio by Y. M. C. A. The Rev. W. H. Murphy, minister First Baptist Church, Somerville.

8 P. M.—Boston Symphony orchestra, broadcast direct from Symphony hall. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor. Courtesy W. S. Quinby.

PROGRAM

Moussorgsky—"Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve" (A Night on Bald Mountain), orchestral fantasy.

Prokofieff—Third Concerto for Piano, op. 26.
I. Andante—Allegro.
II. Theme—Andantino.
Variation I. Listesso tempo
Variation II. Allegro.
Variation III. Allegro moderato.
Variation IV. Andante meditative
Variation V. Allegro giusto.
Theme Listesso tempo.
III. Allegro, ma non troppo.

Herald Jan 30

Intermission.

Scriabin—Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," op. 43, Lento; Luttes, Allegro; Voluptes, Lento; Jeu Divin, Allegro.

Soloist—Serge Prokofieff.

10 P. M.—Lucerne Girls' quintet.

10:30 P. M.—Walter A. Kidder, baritone.

KOUSSEVITZKY IS WELCOMED

He Leads Symphony Orchestra After Two Weeks' Rest from Labors

CONCERT WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

HERALD JAN 30

By PHILIP HALE

If Mr. Koussevitzky had any doubt concerning the respect and affection in which he is held by the great musical public of Boston, that doubt must have been dispelled by the glowing tribute paid him yesterday afternoon when he came on the platform of Symphony hall after his vacation of a fortnight.

The program was as follows: Moussorgsky, "A Night on Bald Mountain." Prokofieff, Third Concerto for piano and orchestra (Mr. Prokofieff, pianist). Scriabin, Symphony No. 3, "The Divine Poem." The concerto was played for the first time in Boston.

Apparently there are two Prokofieffs: one the composer of the splendidly barbaric "Scythian" suite, which was heard here in 1924; the other the composer of the Third Piano Concerto, a work in comparatively more academic form, but without a trace of academic rigidity and dullness. The music is refreshingly individual. One does not find in it the influence of any school nor of any other composer, past or present. Thematically, harmonically, it is Mr. Prokofieff's own, as is his employment of orchestral instruments. While the music has not the engaging and engrossing wildness of the "Scythian" suite, it is music of the East rather than of the West. Here and there one finds the melodic and rhythmic repetition dear to Orientals rejoicing in the consequent hypnosis. When this repetition gains little by little in intensity, the effect is exciting and at the last overpowering, so that the coolest hearer is seized with rhythmic fever and, like the inhabitants of ancient Abdera, is haunted by a simple melody. The theme of the second movement—we believe it to be original with Mr. Prokofieff, for no contrary statement has been made—is of exotic beauty, while the postlude of a few measures, ingeniously varied after each one of the set variations will long haunt the memory, the more so by its simplicity. These variations are ingenious, free from pattern work. The fourth, marked Andante meditativo, is unaffectedly poetic. Throughout the concerto there is no effort to stun or dazzle the hearer. It is as if Mr. Prokofieff had composed it for his own pleasure, without thought of possible audiences, indifferent to words of praise or blame.

It is often said disparingly of a musician playing his own composition for the piano: "He plays like a composer." This sneer cannot be directed against Mr. Prokofieff, any more than it is true of Mr. Rachmaninoff. Mr. Prokofieff in the most modest manner in the world played like a virtuoso who was not thinking first of technic, not trying to impress hearers by technical proficiency, conscious, but not too self-conscious of his own ability. He played as if he were a member of the orchestra, displaying sufficient fluency, a command of nuances and of sentiment, emotion and brilliance. He was recalled several times.

Whether Scriabin is great or not great among composers is a legitimate subject for discussion. This discussion will not in all probability shatter friendships and divide households as was the case long ago in the Beecher trial. Whether Scriabin is great or not, it can be safely said that Mr. Koussevitzky is his Prophet. This "Divine Poem," whatever may be thought of it as a whole, is to us preferable to "The Poem of Ecstasy" and "Prometheus," which, it is said, have a theosophic mission. One attends a concert to hear music, not to hear theosophic teachings disguised by music. Dr. Eaglefield Hull who is a fanatical Scriabinite, is of the opinion that the "Divine Poem" expresses "the spirit's liberation from its earthly trammels, and the consequent free expression of purified personality." It is a pity that this "personality" helped itself freely from the music dramas of the unpurified Wagner. There are measures that are as direct quotations. It is also singular that the most striking, most emotional section of the work is entitled "Sensuous Pleasures." Like other orchestral compositions of Scriabin there is thematic material not always significant; there are pages of sheer bombast; a succession of climaxes that destroy any effect of one great and irresistible culmination of force. Yet one, not a fervid admirer of Scriabin, remembering the genuine beauty and poetic feeling of the section "Voltes" might say of "the Divine Poem" that is is the least objectionable of his three chief orchestral works.

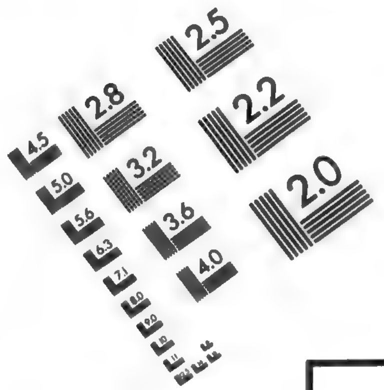
The witch music of Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain" is amusing, though one is disappointed because the professional and amateur demons are not still more hellish in the celebration of their Sabbath. More might reasonably be expected of these Spirits of Darkness glorifying their great god Tchernobog. But neither Berlioz nor Boito, neither Gounod nor Cesar Franck were more fortunate in portraying Satan and his hosts in tones. Moussorgsky's music that follows the notes of the church bell in the village is of charming quality and it was wonderfully played.

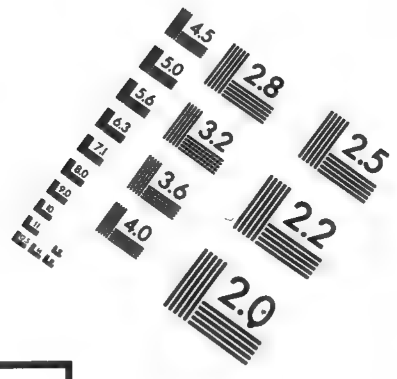
The orchestral performance throughout the concert was brilliant, and again Mr. Koussevitzky was revealed as a most eloquent interpreter.

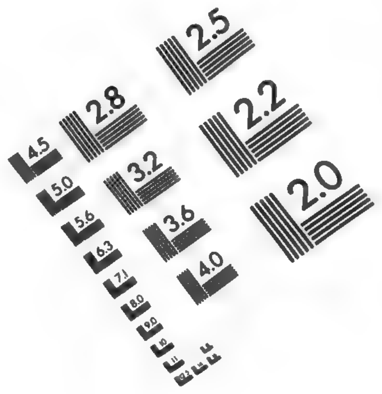
The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program for the 15th pair of concerts, Feb. 12th, Feb. 13th will be as follows: Vivaldi, Concerto, E Minor for strings; Lekeu, Fantaisie Contrapuntique sur un Cramignon Liegeois; Respighi, Symphonic Poem, "The Pines of Rome"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 1. The music by Vivaldi (edited by Mistovski), Lekeu and Respighi will be played in Boston for the first time.

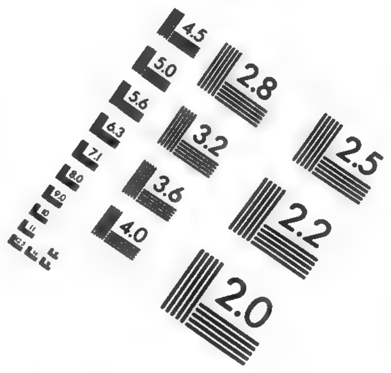
REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC





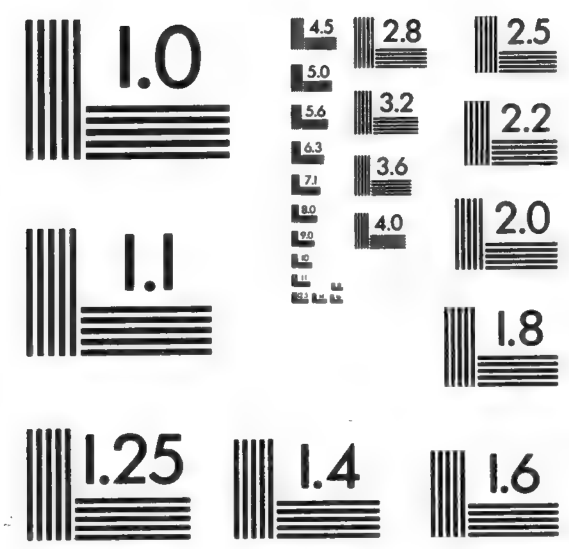




200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

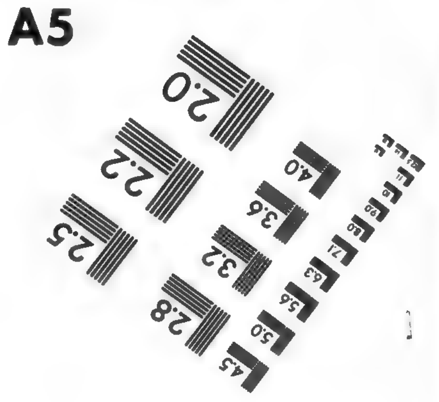
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

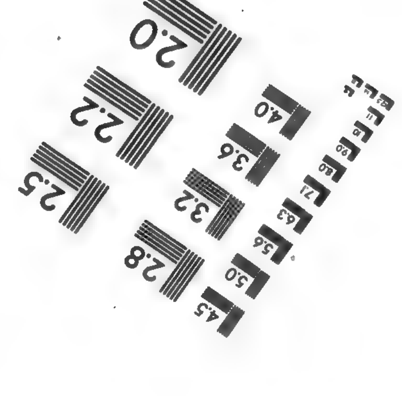
2.5 mm

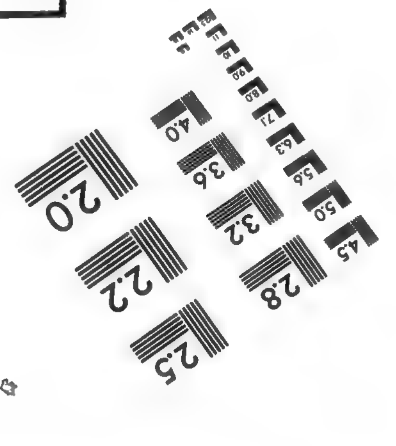
A5



A4

A3





PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

204

RUSSIAN DAY WITH SYMPHONY

Mr. Koussevitsky Given Cordial Welcome on Return

Jan. 30 - Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The return of Mr. Koussevitzky to an audience that welcomed him with unmistakable enthusiasm and the first public appearance here of Serge Prokofieff, as pianist in his own third Concerto, provided the element of personal interest in yesterday's Symphony Concert.

CONCERTO A NEWCOMER

As for the music, of the three pieces that make this week's all-Russian programme only Mr. Prokofieff's Concerto is actually new to Boston. Yet although the other two items, Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain" and Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," have both been played at the Symphony Concerts within the last five years, it is scarcely an exaggeration to say that they were yesterday heard here for the first time, such was the illumination shed by Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting of them.

None too readily may the later music Prokofieff, as exemplified in the Violin Concerto of last season and the Piano Concerto of yesterday be described. Less radical than the earlier "Scythian Suite," these pieces have a certain brittle quality; from the shines forth, not a warm and ruddy glow, but a clear white light. Yet they are by no means lacking in their share of surface charm.

Composer Cordially Received

Of the three movements of the Piano Concerto the second, a set of ingenious Variations on an exotic theme, gave the most decided pleasure. As pianist this modest young Russian makes no parade of technique. He plays as composer and musician rather than as virtuoso, yet it is none the less evident that for him mechanical difficulties do not exist. Whether as pianist or composer or both, yesterday's audience gave him a more than ordinarily hearty reception.

Hardly one of his more important works, Moussorgsky's tone-poem of the Witches' revel dispersed by the sounding church-bells seemed yesterday, thanks to Mr. Koussevitzky, pictorial, suggestive, genuinely imaginative music.

The "Divine Poem"

Of greater moment, however, is the "Divine Poem," which makes, with its successors, the "Poem of Ecstacy" and 'Prometheus," the musical ritual that, in the words of Paul Rosenfeld, was to call the soul through the gate of the sense of hearing, to lead it, slowly, hieratically, up through circle after circle of heaven, until the mystical gongs boomed and the mass emotion reached the father of souls and was become God."

'Struggles," "Sensuous Pleasures," and "Divine Activity" are the titles affixed to the three movements of this so-called symphony which spiritually and technically may be said to stand somewhere between Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Scriabin's own "Prome

---

Grand Opera or Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Radio Query Tonight

Two radio events of major importance are coming on the local stations tonight at about the same time and no doubt many of the radio audience will be undecided whether to listen in on the opera "The Masked Ball" coming from WNAC'S wavelength or 'the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, broadcast by WEEI. Both dial settings will bring in music of the highest order, beginning at 8 o'clock and continuing over 2 hours. This is the second radio concert of the Symphony orchestra and their program tonight will be composed chiefly of Russian selections. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra and make a few remarks before the microphone. The soloist assisting in the program is Serge Prokofieff.

The opera "The Masked Ball," sung in Italian, was written by Verdi. It is interesting as to locale for the three acts are laid in Boston, at the end of the 17th century. The action centers about Riccardo, Governor of Boston, who is portrayed by Charles Marshall, the New England tenor, in this presentation. Rosa Raisa takes the leading soprano role, while Van Gordon and Ruffo are prominent as contralto and baritone.

Another musical organization, the Repertory Theatre Orchestra, under the direction of Daniel Kuntz, has been added to the list of attractions of station WBZ, and beginning tonight will be heard each Saturday evening from 7:45 to 8:15 p m. The orchestra is composed of three violins, viola, cello, bass, flute, clarinet, piano, and drums.

Those who enjoy the old time dance music, especially the Irish variety, played by a real Irish fiddler, should turn to the WBZ wave at 9:15 tonight for the program by Patrick J. Gaffney. Mr Gaffrey's reputation as a fiddler is known throughout the East. Tonight he will have the assistance of Helen Carlene Hines, reader, who will tell some typically Irish stories.

COMPOSER PLAYS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Prokofieff Soloist in His Own Piano Concerto

Globe Jan. 30

Serge Prokofieff, the noted Russian composer, whose "Scythian Suite" and violin concerto roused much discussion here last season, was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. He played the piano part in his own concerto in C major. Mr Koussevitzky conducted, after two weeks of absence on vacation. The audience applauded him vigorously for several minutes at his first appearance. The program included two other modern Russian works, Musorgsky's fantasy, "A Night on Bald Mountain," and Skriabin's "The Divine Poem." The performance of all these numbers was unusually brilliant. In such music Mr Koussevitzky is at his best.

Prokofieff is a tall young man, slight in build, with not a trace of the poseur in his unassuming manner. He has the short-sighted, stoop shouldered appearance that one associates with graduate students of such financially unprofitable subjects as Assyriology or mathematical logic. The audience greeted him politely and applauded his concerto with something approaching warmth.

This concerto is full of interweaving rhythmic figures, strongly marked, and repeated until they grow monotonous. There are also several lyric passages, especially in the fourth variation of the slow movement, which are romantically emotional.

The music is written with conscious and wilful originality. But back of it a listener hearing it for the first time, could feel a genuine creative imagination, a sense of form, some degree of thematic invention. This piece is not written merely to startle the conventionally-minded. Prokofieff has something to say and says it with not a little coherence and a good deal of emphasis.

The workmanship, however, seems facile. Like all Russian composers, Prokofieff is repetitous and fundamentally nave.

The first hearing of this new work proved interesting enough so that one would like to hear it again and hear still more pieces by the same author, such as, for example, his "Seven, They Are Seven." Mr Prokofieff, incidentally, is a very clever pianist, with a mastery of rhythmic effects and a tendency to exact nothing else of his instrument, which would qualify him for a job in a jazz band.

Skriabin's "Divine Poem" is another attempt to express in music a personal philosophic attitude. The three movements are entitled "Luttes," "Voluptes" and "Jeu Divin." The first French title means "Strivings," the second "Joys of the Senses," the last "The Play of Divine Force," to translate freely words which have no exact English equivalents.

The composer was a mystic, a pantheist, who thought God and energy were identical. His music is strongly influenced by Wagner, but personal in style, to the point of strangeness. The agonised strivings of a soul in torment breathe through it and redeem to some extent its diffuse and often bombastic style. The motto theme for trumpets and the motive for basses linked with it are vivid and expressive at their first occurrence and impressive in their final transfigured form. But much of the music is, to at least one hearer, only a lot of disagreeable noise.

The performance, on which Mr Koussevitzky has plainly lavished his best energies in preparation, was probably as fine as could be given by any orchestra or any conductor. Musorgsky's fantasy about witches on a mountain top was also vividly played, without recourse to rhetorical exaggeration.

This program, through Mr Quinby's generosity, will be broadcast tonight at 8:10 from WEEI, conflicting, unfortunately, with the Chicago Opera broadcast of "Masked Ball." The radio audience will probably find all three numbers pretty heavy. Those who use earphones, or who have first rate sets, should be able to get a good deal of Musorgsky's and Prokofieff's music and find out what modern music at symphony concerts sounds like. But they must not expect tuneful or notably harmonious numbers on this program.

The next program to be broadcast will be given Feb 13. There are no symphony concerts next week in Boston. The chosen pieces are Beethoven's First Symphony, and shorter numbers by Vivaldi, Lekeu, and Respighi, whose "Pines of Rome" will be played for the first time here. That program should prove of greater interest than this week's to the average listener. P. R.

Advertiser Jan 30

RUSSIAN WEEK CELEBRATED THE SYMP

This is all-Russian wee Symphony, making an abs elty in the history of t famous orchestra.

Serge Koussevitzky, war comed back after his n vacation, is offering three works and presenting a Serge Prokofieff, pianist a poser, one of the most br Russia's younger musicians

Judged by his "Scythia played here last year F might be expected to res hairy Hercules. As a matte his first Boston appearanc day showed him to be a ta esthetic-looking youth with dome thinly fringed with blo Nevertheless, his third con piano and orchestra, playe Symphony concerts for time, proved every whit as as his "Scythian Suite;" a ermore, he proved himself pianist of prodigious power liance.

The concerto is one of interesting examples of music, expertly scored a what might be called char Russian themes; eclectic m rifying the academicians, ye ating and well worth applau a large extent the concert fantastic as Moussorgsky's on Bald Mountain," which program.

Prokofieff well deserved thusiastic applause that foll performance of the concerto Scriabin's third symphor tled "The Divine Poem," brilliantly performed.

SOME SYMPHONY SUGG

To the Editor of The Herald

Now that the broadcasti concerts by the Boston Syn chestra has become a realit prehensive may well view this latest inroad by the all signs the reaction of the r runs true to form. Already of letters pour in. Letters in superlative terms of the c letters of solemn denouncem publishers who refused to all righted opus to go on the air. are the requests that future be arranged with a view tow nating copyrighted numbers. words, if the cash customer phony hall wish to hear some modern work of importance, pens to be copyrighted, th forego that pleasure out of d radio fans, the large majority I daresay, never even heard Johannes Brahms.

Then of course come the numerous requests that M. zky address the radio audie each concert. If such and s cessions to democracy are t why not go the whole length suggest that the famous con only address his invisible au also devote some time to an questions shot at him at rand there should be that usual 'n clever fellow' with his us concomitant remarks. How would be, for instance, we suddenly hear above the "Eroica," "You ought to see with the overgrown fiddles sw say, during the Adagio Lam the "Pathetique" were we formed that the oboist was t a loss of 10 beats.

To make the debacle co would not surprise me if it suggested still further to su battery of saxophones for winds, banjos for the second to augment the orchestra wi cow-bells and sundry ki Then, I am sure, everything quite lovely!

A. A. BIE

Roxbury, Jan. 27.

BROADCASTS

HOW SYMPHONY WAS BROADCAST BY WEEI

Engineers Worked for Weeks to Give Listeners Best Broadcast of Year

Since the successful broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra direct from Symphony hall, many letters have come to WEEI, requesting information as to how so successful a broadcast of the program was obtained. For those that desire this technical information the following story is written:

QUALITY TRANSMISSION

First, of course, credit must go to W. S. Quinby, local business man and philanthropist, and to the trustees and members of the Boston Symphony orchestra. They made the broadcasting possible by perfect co-operation and in arranging proper financial remuneration.

Because of the quality transmission from WEEI, this station was picked to put these programs on the air, so that the radio audience could be assured of the best possible transmission after the program was delivered to the station.

Entire credit for the pick-up and delivery to WEEI, however, goes to the expert engineers of the New England Telephone & Telegraph Company, who worked practically day and night for more than a week in an effort to make the broadcast mechanically correct.

TELEPHONE ENGINEERS

The men responsible for this work are Charles Ables, Charles Vassell and their assistants. These men are specialists on radio telephone pick-ups and are in charge of all outside broadcasting lines operated through WEEI. Cooperating with these engineers of the telephone are Ralph W. Matthewson, chief operator of WEEI; Leon Hentz and Louis Dresser, assistant operators.

To the problems of these engineers was added the problem of tying up WCSH, the Congress Square Hotel broadcasting station, Portland, Me., for these broadcasts. It was the first time that any broadcast program had ever been relayed to Portland over lines from Boston.

The first step was the installation of the speech input equipment at Symphony hall. It was necessary to locate this apparatus where the orchestra could not be heard, in order that the telephone engineers might fairly judge the quality of the music from the loud speaker, which is a part of this equipment.

The best available space turned out to be the unfinished attic at the end of the second balcony at the right of the stage. Outside of being a bare room with no heat and very little light, this room is ideal for the operations of the engineers.

REASON FOR PAUSE

Many of you will remember during the talk on the Symphony, announcer "EFA" hesitated and faltered. This was caused by the lights suddenly going out in the room. These men had taken a small electric heater into their attic listening post, and in attempting to connect this heater a plug furnishing the light in the room became detached, plunging the room into total darkness. This was soon remedied by means of a small hand flashlight which supplied enough light to enable the men to reconnect the lighting circuit.

Tracing the path of the electric currents through the speech input equipment, we start with the microphones, which pick up the sound waves and convert them into electric current waves, which are faithful reproductions of the original sound.

These currents pass over wires to a mixing panel. By its means the operator can throw on and off the various microphones, and when several microphones are used simultaneously, can proportion the amounts of energy picked up by each to produce the best results.

MIXING PANEL USED

The output of the mixer is connected to an amplifier which must be used to increase the energy received from the mikes.

If the currents were not amplified they would be so weak when sent out over the telephone line that objectionable crosstalk would be picked up from other telephone circuits in the same cable. A spare amplifier was provided at Symphony hall for use in case the regular amplified failed.

The only other unit comprising the speech input apparatus is the volume indicator, which shows by the reading of a galvanometer the amount of power being put into the telephone line at each instant.

As this varies constantly with the volume of the music, the needle fluctuates continually and the operator must be on the alert to reduce the gain of the amplifier when the volume increases in order to prevent overloading.

When the amplifying apparatus was installed and wired the next problem was the location of the microphones. Repeated tests demonstrated that the best results were obtained with one mike suspended over the conductor's head for the ensemble effect, one over the right of the stage to pick up the bass viols and strings and one at the left for the violas, harps, etc. With this arrangement the mikes were all far enough away from the trumpets and shriller instruments to prevent blasting. A spare emergency microphone was also installed over the conductor's head.

The pickup installation completed, the remaining work for the telephone engineers consisted in equalizing the telephone line. This process is required in order to cause all the various frequencies of the sounds of music from approximately 100 to 5000 cycles per second, to pass over the telephone line with the same loss.

In the case of an unequalized telephone line, the higher frequencies undergo greater losses than the lower ones, which would cause music transmitted over the line, to sound distorted. The line to WEEI as well as the one to WCSH, Portland, had to be equalized. This process required, an engineer at Symphony Hall and one in the toll test room at 125 Milk street. Here a line amplified was used on the circuit to Portland and another at Wakefield. A bridging amplifier was connected to the imput of the line amplifier, in the toll test room and its output to the trunk extending to the Edison station. Tests were also made to ascertain the proper amplification from the various amplifiers on the circuit.

Hears Sleighbells, Can't Find the Snow

The realistic sleigh bells which have announced the arrival of the "Clicquot Club Eskimos" at WEAF each week recently sent a New Jersey listener bounding out of the house to witness the snowfall which had so suddenly come.

Sleigh bells to the contrary notwithstanding, the street was as clear as on a July evening and the mystery was not solved until the close of the "Eskimos" program when the sleigh bells were heard again.

RUSSIAN DAY WITH SYMPHONY

Mr. Koussevitzky Given Cordial Welcome on Return

Jan. 30 - Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The return of Mr. Koussevitzky to an audience that welcomed him with unmistakable enthusiasm and the first public appearance here of Serge Prokofieff, as pianist in his own third Concerto, provided the element of personal interest in yesterday's Symphony Concert.

CONCERTO A NEWCOMER

As for the music, of the three pieces that make this week's all-Russian programme only Mr. Prokofieff's Concerto is actually new to Boston. Yet although the other two items, Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain" and Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," have both been played at the Symphony Concerts within the last five years, it is scarcely an exaggeration to say that they were yesterday heard here for the first time, such was the illumination shed by Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting of them.

None too readily may the later music Prokofieff, as exemplified in the Violin Concerto of last season and the Piano Concerto of yesterday be described. Less radical than the earlier "Scythian Suite," these pieces have a certain brittle quality; from the shines forth, not a warm and ruddy glow, but a clear white light. Yet they are by no means lacking in their share of surface charm.

Composer Cordially Received

Of the three movements of the Piano Concerto the second, a set of ingenious Variations on an exotic theme, gave the most decided pleasure. As pianist this modest young Russian makes no parade of technique. He plays as composer and musician rather than as virtuoso, yet it is none the less evident that for him mechanical difficulties do not exist. Whether as pianist or composer or both, yesterday's audience gave him a more than ordinarily hearty reception.

Hardly one of his more important works, Moussorgsky's tone-poem of the Witches' revel dispersed by the sounding church-bells seemed yesterday, thanks to Mr. Koussevitzky, pictorial, suggestive, genuinely imaginative music.

The "Divine Poem"

Of greater moment, however, is the "Divine Poem," which makes, with its successors, the "Poem of Ecstacy" and 'Prometheus," the musical ritual that, in the words of Paul Rosenfeld, was to call the soul through the gate of the sense of hearing, to lead it, slowly, hieratically, up through circle after circle of heaven, until the mystical gongs boomed and the mass emotion reached the father of souls and was become God."

'Struggles," "Sensuous Pleasures," and "Divine Activity" are the titles affixed to the three movements of this so-called symphony which spiritually and technically may be said to stand somewhere between Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Scriabin's own "Prome

---

Grand Opera or Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Radio Query Tonight

Two radio events of major importance are coming on the local stations tonight at about the same time and no doubt many of the radio audience will be undecided whether to listen in on the opera "The Masked Ball" coming from WNAC'S wavelength or 'the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, broadcast by WEEI. Both dial settings will bring in music of the highest order, beginning at 8 o'clock and continuing over 2 hours. This is the second radio concert of the Symphony orchestra and their program tonight will be composed chiefly of Russian selections. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra and make a few remarks before the microphone. The soloist assisting in the program is Serge Prokofieff.

The opera "The Masked Ball," sung in Italian, was written by Verdi. It is interesting as to locale for the three acts are laid in Boston, at the end of the 17th century. The action centers about Riccardo, Governor of Boston, who is portrayed by Charles Marshall, the New England tenor, in this presentation. Rosa Raisa takes the leading soprano role, while Van Gordon and Ruffo are prominent as contralto and baritone.

Another musical organization, the Repertory Theatre Orchestra, under the direction of Daniel Kuntz, has been added to the list of attractions of station WBZ, and beginning tonight will be heard each Saturday evening from 7:45 to 8:15 p m. The orchestra is composed of three violins, viola, cello, bass, flute, clarinet, piano, and drums.

Those who enjoy the old time dance music, especially the Irish variety, played by a real Irish fiddler, should turn to the WBZ wave at 9:15 tonight for the program by Patrick J. Gaffney. Mr Gaffney's reputation as a fiddler is known throughout the East. Tonight he will have the assistance of Helen Carlene Hines, reader, who will tell some typically Irish stories.

Globe Jan 30

COMPOSER PLAYS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Prokofieff Soloist in His Own Piano Concerto

Serge Prokofieff, the noted Russian composer, whose "Scythian Suite" and violin concerto roused much discussion here last season, was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. He played the piano part in his own concerto in C major. Mr Koussevitzky conducted, after two weeks of absence on vacation. The audience applauded him vigorously for several minutes at his first appearance. The program included two other modern Russian works, Musorgsky's fantasy, "A Night on Bald Mountain," and Skriabin's "The Divine Poem." The performance of all these numbers was unusually brilliant. In such music Mr Koussevitzky is at his best.

Prokofieff is a tall young man, slight in build, with not a trace of the poseur in his unassuming manner. He has the short-sighted, stoop shouldered appearance that one associates with graduate students of such financially unprofitable subjects as Assyriology or mathematical logic. The audience greeted him politely and applauded his concerto with something approaching warmth.

This concerto is full of interweaving rhythmic figures, strongly marked, and repeated until they grow monotonous. There are also several lyric passages, especially in the fourth variation of the slow movement, which are romantically emotional.

The music is written with conscious and wilful originality. But back of it a listener hearing it for the first time, could feel a genuine creative imagination, a sense of form, some degree of thematic invention. This piece is not written merely to startle the conventionally-minded. Prokofieff has something to say and says it with not a little coherence and a good deal of emphasis.

The workmanship, however, seems facile. Like all Russian composers, Prokofieff is repetitous and fundamentally nave.

The first hearing of this new work proved interesting enough so that one would like to hear it again and hear still more pieces by the same author, such as, for example, his "Seven, They Are Seven." Mr Prokofieff, incidentally, is a very clever pianist, with a mastery of rhythmic effects and a tendency to exact nothing else of his instrument, which would qualify him for a job in a jazz band.

Skriabin's "Divine Poem" is another attempt to express in music a personal philosophic attitude. The three movements are entitled "Luttes," "Voluptes" and "Jeu Divin." The first French title means "Strivings," the second "Joys of the Senses," the last "The Play of Divine Force," to translate freely words which have no exact English equivalents.

The composer was a mystic, a pantheist, who thought God and energy were identical. His music is strongly influenced by Wagner, but personal in style, to the point of strangeness. The agonised strivings of a soul in torment breathe through it and redeem to some extent its diffuse and often bombastic style. The motto theme for trumpets and the motive for basses linked with it are vivid and expressive at their first occurrence and impressive in their final transfigured form. But much of the music is, to at least one hearer, only a lot of disagreeable noise.

The performance, on which Mr Koussevitzky has plainly lavished his best energies in preparation, was probably as fine as could be given by any orchestra or any conductor. Musorgsky's fantasy about witches on a mountain top was also vividly played, without recourse to rhetorical exaggeration.

This program, through Mr Quinby's generosity, will be broadcast tonight at 8:10 from WEEI, conflicting, unfortunately, with the Chicago Opera broadcast of "Masked Ball." The radio audience will probably find all three numbers pretty heavy. Those who use earphones, or who have first rate sets, should be able to get a good deal of Musorgsky's and Prokofieff's music and find out what modern music at symphony concerts sounds like. But they must not expect tuneful or notably harmonious numbers on this program.

The next program to be broadcast will be given Feb 13. There are no symphony concerts next week in Boston. The chosen pieces are Beethoven's First Symphony, and shorter numbers by Vivaldi, Lekeu, and Respighi, whose "Pines of Rome" will be played for the first time here. That program should prove of greater interest than this week's to the average listener. P. R.

Advertiser Jan 30

204

RUSSIAN WEEK CELEBRATED THE SYMP

This is all-Russian wee Symphony, making an abso
elty in the history of t famous orchestra.

Serge Koussevitzky, war
comed back after his m vacation, is offering three works and presenting a Serge Prokofieff, pianist a poser, one of the most br
Russia's younger musicians

Judged by his "Scythia played here last year P might be expected to res hairy Hercules. As a matte his first Boston appearanc day showed him to be a ta esthetic-looking youth with dome thinly fringed with blo
Nevertheless, his third con
piano and orchestra, playe Symphony concerts for time, proved every whit as as his "Scythian Suite;" an ermore, he proved himself pianist of prodigious power liance.

The concerto is one of t interesting examples of music, expertly scored a what might be called chara
Russian themes; eclectic m rifying the academicians, ye ating and well worth applau
a large extent the concert fantastic as Moussorgsky's on Bald Mountain," which
program.

Prokofieff well deserved thusiastic applause that foll performance of the concerto

Scriabin's third sympho tled "The Divine Poem," brilliantly performed.

SOME SYMPHONY SUGG

To the Editor of The Herald

Now that the broadcasti concerts by the Boston Sym chestra has become a realit prehensive may well view this latest inroad by the all signs the reaction of the r runs true to form. Already of letters pour in. Letters in superlative terms of the c letters of solemn denouncem publishers who refused to all righted opus to go on the air.
are the requests that future be arranged with a view tow nating copyrighted numbers.
words, if the cash customer phony hall wish to hear some modern work of importance, pens to be copyrighted, th forego that pleasure out of d radio fans, the large majority
I daresay, never even heard
Johannes Brahms.

Then of course come the numerous requests that M.
zky address the radio audie each concert. If such and s cessions to democracy are t
why not go the whole length suggest that the famous con only address his invisible au also devote some time to an questions shot at him at rand there should be that usual 'n clever fellow' with his us concomitant remarks. How would be, for instance, we suddenly hear above the "Eroica," "You ought to see with the overgrown fiddles sw say, during the Adagio Lam the "Pathetique" were we formed that the oboist was t a loss of 10 beats.

To make the debacle co
would not surprise me if it suggested still further to su battery of saxophones for winds, banjos for the second to augment the orchestra wit cow-bells and sundry ki
Then, I am sure, everything quite lovely! A. A. BIE

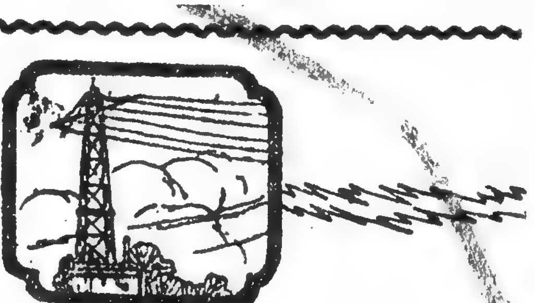
Roxbury, Jan. 27.

THE BOSTON HERALD, SUNDAY, JANUARY 31, 1926

BROADCASTS



HOW SYMPHONY WAS BROADCAST BY WEEI

Engineers Worked for Weeks to Give Listeners Best Broadcast of Year

Since the successful broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra direct from Symphony hall, many letters have come to WEEI, requesting information as to how so successful a broadcast of the program was obtained. For those that desire this technical information the following story is written:

QUALITY TRANSMISSION

First, of course, credit must go to W. S. Quinby, local business man and philanthropist, and to the trustees and members of the Boston Symphony orchestra. They made the broadcasting possible by perfect co-operation and in arranging proper financial remuneration.

Because of the quality transmission from WEEI, this station was picked to put these programs on the air, so that the radio audience could be assured of the best possible transmission after the program was delivered to the station.

Entire credit for the pick-up and delivery to WEEI, however, goes to the expert engineers of the New England Telephone & Telegraph Company, who worked practically day and night for more than a week in an effort to make the broadcast mechanically correct.

TELEPHONE ENGINEERS

The men responsible for this work are Charles Ables, Charles Vassell and their assistants. These men are specialists on radio telephone pick-ups and are in charge of all outside broadcasting lines operated through WEEI. Co-operating with these engineers of the telephone are Ralph W. Matthewson, chief operator of WEEI; Leon Hentz and Louis Dresser, assistant operators.

To the problems of these engineers was added the problem of tying up WCSH, the Congress Square Hotel broadcasting station, Portland, Me., for these broadcasts. It was the first time that any broadcast program had ever been relayed to Portland over lines from Boston.

The first step was the installation of the speech input equipment at Symphony hall. It was necessary to locate this apparatus where the orchestra could not be heard, in order that the telephone engineers might fairly judge the quality of the music from the loud speaker, which is a part of this equipment.

The best available space turned out to be the unfinished attic at the end of the second balcony at the right of the stage. Outside of being a bare room with no heat and very little light, this room is ideal for the operations of the engineers.

REASON FOR PAUSE

Many of you will remember during the talk on the Symphony, announcer "EFA" hesitated and faltered. This was caused by the lights suddenly going out in the room. These men had taken a small electric heater into their attic listening post, and in attempting to connect this heater a plug furnishing the light in the room became detached, plunging the room into total darkness. This was soon remedied by means of a small hand flashlight which supplied enough light to enable the men to reconnect the lighting circuit.

Tracing the path of the electric currents through the speech input equipment, we start with the microphones, which pick up the sound waves and convert them into electric current waves, which are faithful reproductions of the original sound.

These currents pass over wires to a mixing panel. By its means the operator can throw on and off the various microphones, and when several microphones are used simultaneously, can proportion the amounts of energy picked up by each to produce the best results.

MIXING PANEL USED

The output of the mixer is connected to an amplifier which must be used to increase the energy received from the mikes.

If the currents were not amplified they would be so weak when sent out over the telephone line that objectionable crosstalk would be picked up from other telephone circuits in the same cable. A spare amplifier was provided at Symphony hall for use in case the regular amplified failed.

The only other unit comprising the speech input apparatus is the volume indicator, which shows by the reading of a galvanometer the amount of power being put into the telephone line at each instant.

As this varies constantly with the volume of the music, the needle fluctuates continually and the operator must be on the alert to reduce the gain of the amplifier when the volume increases in order to prevent overloading.

When the amplifying apparatus was installed and wired the next problem was the location of the microphones. Repeated tests demonstrated that the best results were obtained with one mike suspended over the conductor's head for the ensemble effect, one over the right of the stage to pick up the bass viols and strings and one at the left for the violas, harps, etc. With this arrangement the mikes were all far enough away from the trumpets and shriller instruments to prevent blasting. A spare emergency microphone was also installed over the conductor's head.

The pickup installation completed, the remaining work for the telephone engineers consisted in equalizing the telephone line. This process is required in order to cause all the various frequencies of the sounds of music from approximately 100 to 5000 cycles per second, to pass over the telephone line with the same loss.

In the case of an unequalized telephone line, the higher frequencies undergo greater losses than the lower ones, which would cause music transmitted over the line, to sound distorted. The line to WEEI as well as the one to WCSH, Portland, had to be equalized. This process required, an engineer at Symphony Hall and one in the toll test room at 125 Milk street. Here a line amplified was used on the circuit to Portland and another at Wakefield. A bridging amplifier was connected to the imput of the line amplifier, in the toll test room and its output to the trunk extending to the Edison station. Tests were also made to ascertain the proper amplification from the various amplifiers on the circuit.

Hears Sleighbells, Can't Find the Snow

The realistic sleigh bells which have announced the arrival of the "Clicquot Club Eskimos" at WEAF each week recently sent a New Jersey listener bounding out of the house to witness the snowfall which had so suddenly come.

Sleigh bells to the contrary notwithstanding, the street was as clear as on a July evening and the mystery was not solved until the close of the "Eskimos" program when the sleigh bells were heard again.

204

RUSSIAN DAY WITH SYMPHONY

Mr. Koussevitsky Given Cordial Welcome on Return

Jan. 30 - Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The return of Mr. Koussevitzky to an audience that welcomed him with unmistakable enthusiasm and the first public appearance here of Serge Prokofieff, as pianist in his own third Concerto, provided the element of personal interest in yesterday's Symphony Concert.

CONCERTO A NEWCOMER

As for the music, of the three pieces that make this week's all-Russian programme only Mr. Prokofieff's Concerto is actually new to Boston. Yet although the other two items, Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain" and Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," have both been played at the Symphony Concerts within the last five years, it is scarcely an exaggeration to say that they were yesterday heard here for the first time, such was the illumination shed by Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting of them.

None too readily may the later music Prokofieff, as exemplified in the Violin Concerto of last season and the Piano Concerto of yesterday be described. Less radical than the earlier "Scythian Suite," these pieces have a certain brittle quality; from the shines forth, not a warm and ruddy glow, but a clear white light. Yet they are by no means lacking in their share of surface charm.

Composer Cordially Received

Of the three movements of the Piano Concerto the second, a set of ingenious Variations on an exotic theme, gave the most decided pleasure. As pianist this modest young Russian makes no parade of technique. He plays as composer and musician rather than as virtuoso, yet it is none the less evident that for him mechanical difficulties do not exist. Whether as pianist or composer or both, yesterday's audience gave him a more than ordinarily hearty reception.

Hardly one of his more important works, Moussorgsky's tone-poem of the Witches' revel dispersed by the sounding church-bells seemed yesterday, thanks to Mr. Koussevitzky, pictorial, suggestive, genuinely imaginative music.

The " Divine Poem"

Of greater moment, however, is the "Divine Poem," which makes, with its successors, the "Poem of Ecstacy" and 'Prometheus," the musical ritual that, in the words of Paul Rosenfeld, was to call the soul through the gate of the sense of hearing, to lead it, slowly, hieratically, up through circle after circle of heaven, until the mystical gongs boomed and the mass emotion reached the father of souls and was become God."

'Struggles," "Sensuous Pleasures," and "Divine Activity" are the titles affixed to the three movements of this so-called symphony which spiritually and technically may be said to stand somewhere between Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Scriabin's own "Prometheus," in which at last his personality becomes completely emancipated from outside influences.

COMPOSER PLAYS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Prokofieff Soloist in His Own Piano Concerto

Globe Jan. 30

Serge Prokofieff, the noted Russian composer, whose "Scythian Suite" and violin concerto roused much discussion here last season, was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. He played the piano part in his own concerto in C major. Mr Koussevitzky conducted, after two weeks of absence on vacation. The audience applauded him vigorously for several minutes at his first appearance. The program included two other modern Russian works, Musorgsky's fantasy, "A Night on Bald Mountain," and Skriabin's "The Divine Poem." The performance of all these numbers was unusually brilliant. In such music Mr Koussevitzky is at his best.

Prokofieff is a tall young man, slight in build, with not a trace of the poseur in his unassuming manner. He has the short-sighted, stoop shouldered appearance that one associates with graduate students of such financially unprofitable subjects as Assyriology or mathematical logic. The audience greeted him politely and applauded his concerto with something approaching warmth.

This concerto is full of interweaving rhythmic figures, strongly marked, and repeated until they grow monotonous. There are also several lyric passages, especially in the fourth variation of the slow movement, which are romantically emotional.

The music is written with conscious and wilful originality. But back of it a listener hearing it for the first time, could feel a genuine creative imagination, a sense of form, some degree of thematic invention. This piece is not written merely to startle the conventionally-minded. Prokofieff has something to say and says it with not a little coherence and a good deal of emphasis.

The workmanship, however, seems facile. Like all Russian composers, Prokofieff is repetitous and fundamentally nave.

The first hearing of this new work proved interesting enough so that one would like to hear it again and hear still more pieces by the same author, such as, for example, his "Seven, They Are Seven." Mr Prokofieff, incidentally, is a very clever pianist, with a mastery of rhythmic effects and a tendency to exact nothing else of his instrument, which would qualify him for a job in a jazz band.

Skriabin's "Divine Poem" is another attempt to express in music a personal philosophic attitude. The three movements are entitled "Luttes," "Voluptes" and "Jeu Divin." The first French title means "Strivings," the second "Joys of the Senses," the last "The Play of Divine Force," to translate freely words which have no exact English equivalents.

The composer was a mystic, a pantheist, who thought God and energy were identical. His music is strongly influenced by Wagner, but personal in style, to the point of strangeness. The agonised strivings of a soul in torment breathe through it and redeem to some extent its diffuse and often bombastic style. The motto theme for trumpets and the motive for basses linked with it are vivid and expressive at their first occurrence and impressive in their final transfigured form. But much of the music is, to at least one hearer, only a lot of disagreeable noise.

The performance, on which Mr Koussevitzky has plainly lavished his best energies in preparation, was probably as fine as could be given by any orchestra or any conductor. Musorgsky's fantasy about witches on a mountain top was also vividly played, without recourse to rhetorical exaggeration.

This program, through Mr Quinby's generosity, will be broadcast tonight at 8:10 from WEEI, conflicting, unfortunately, with the Chicago Opera broadcast of "Masked Ball." The radio audience will probably find all three numbers pretty heavy. Those who use earphones, or who have first rate sets, should be able to get a good deal of Musorgsky's and Prokofieff's music and find out what modern music at symphony concerts sounds like. But they must not expect tuneful or notably harmonious numbers on this program.

The next program to be broadcast will be given Feb 13. There are no symphony concerts next week in Boston. The chosen pieces are Beethoven's First Symphony, and shorter numbers by Vivaldi, Lekeu, and Respighi, whose "Pines of Rome" will be played for the first time here. That program should prove of greater interest than this week's to the average listener. P. R.

Advertiser Jan 30

RUSSIAN WEEK CELEBRATED AT THE SYMPHONY

This is all-Russian week at the Symphony, making an absolute novelty in the history of the Hub's famous orchestra.

Serge Koussevitzky, warmly welcomed, back after his mid-season vacation, is offering three Russian works and presenting as soloist Serge Prokofieff, pianist and composer, one of the most brilliant of Russia's younger musicians.

Judged by his "Scythian Suite" played here last year Prokofieff might be expected to resemble a hairy Hercules. As a matter of fact his first Boston appearance yesterday showed him to be a tall, spare, esthetic-looking youth with a bald dome thinly fringed with blonde hair. Nevertheless, his third concerto for piano and orchestra, played at the Symphony concerts for the first time, proved every whit as vigorous as his "Scythian Suite;" and, furthermore, he proved himself to be a pianist of prodigious power and brilliance.

The concerto is one of the most interesting examples of modern music, expertly scored and with what might be called characteristic Russian themes; eclectic music, terrifying the academicians, yet fascinating and well worth applauding. To a large extent the concerto is as fantastic as Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain," which led the program.

Prokofieff well deserved the enthusiastic applause that followed the performance of the concerto.

Scriabin's third symphony, entitled "The Divine Poem," was also brilliantly performed.

SOME SYMPHONY SUGGESTIONS

To the Editor of The Herald:

Now that the broadcasting of the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra has become a reality, the apprehensive may well view with alarm this latest inroad by the radio. By all signs the reaction of the radio public runs true to form. Already hundreds of letters pour in. Letters of praise in superlative terms of the concert and letters of solemn denouncement of the publishers who refused to allow a copyrighted opus to go on the air. Numerous are the requests that future programs be arranged with a view toward eliminating copyrighted numbers. In other words, if the cash customers of Symphony hall wish to hear some particular modern work of importance, if it happens to be copyrighted, they should forego that pleasure out of deference to radio fans, the large majority of whom, I daresay, never even heard of the late Johannes Brahms.

Then of course come the even more numerous requests that M. Koussevitzky address the radio audience before each concert. If such and similar concessions to democracy are to be made, why not go the whole length? I would suggest that the famous conductor not only address his invisible audience, but also devote some time to answering all questions shot at him at random. Then there should be that usual 'monstrously clever fellow' with his usual jocose, concomitant remarks. How droll it would be, for instance, were we to suddenly hear above the surge of "Eroica," "You ought to see these boys with the overgrown fiddles sweat!" Or say, during the Adagio Lamentoso of the "Pathetique" were we to be informed that the oboist was thrown for a loss of 10 beats.

To make the debacle complete it would not surprise me if it would be suggested still further to substitute a battery of saxophones for the wood winds, banjos for the second violins and to augment the orchestra with chimes, cow-bells and sundry kitchenware. Then, I am sure, everything would be quite lovely!

A. A. BIEWEND.

Roxbury, Jan. 27.

2500	West Pacific..	38	37⅛	38	87½
200	West Pacificpr	78½	78½	78½	78½
100	WPennPw pr..	109	109	109	..
2000	West Union...	148¼	141	143¼	140⅛
400	West'hse Brk..	120½	118	120½	119⅜
1000	Westing Elec..	73¼	73	73¼	73
400	Weston El Ins.	17¾	17⅝	17¾	18
100	W Elec Ins A..	29½	29½	29½	--
1500	Wheel & L E..	29¾	28¾	29⅝	28⅝
1200	Wheel&LE pr.	49¾	48⅛	49¾	..
5700	White Eagle..	28	27⅝	28	27
1200	White Motor..	82	81	81	81¼
400	White RM Spr	36⅝	36	36⅝	..
500	Wickwire prcts	2⅝	2½	2⅛	2½
15200	Willys-Over...	31¼	30¾	30¾	31⅛

prominent as contralto and baritone.

Another musical organization, the Repertory Theatre Orchestra, under the direction of Daniel Kuntz, has been added to the list of attractions of station WBZ, and beginning tonight will be heard each Saturday evening from 7:45 to 8:15 p m. The orchestra is composed of three violins, viola, cello, bass, flute, clarinet, piano, and drums.

Those who enjoy the old time dance music, especially the Irish variety, played by a real Irish fiddler, should turn to the WBZ wave at 9:15 tonight for the program by Patrick J. Gaffney. Mr Gaffney's reputation as a fiddler is known throughout the East. Tonight he will have the assistance of Helen Carlene Hines, reader, who will tell some typically Irish stories.

1926

heating

iler do you nend?"

B. Smith Boiler," he re- Company was the pio- try, and was the first to he facts about Fire Sur- ey to boiler efficiency. I xpense on the basis that, H. B. Smith Boiler will st many times.

d for it. Do a little in- part. I didn't arrive at sure you. I first sent a to investigate local in- h Boilers. They found, ecked up with the the-found his statements pring came, I had the a Smith installed in its est moves I ever made. ortable now, no matter nd I am already aware coal bin, that we are in coal.

e copy of
ook

h boiler troubles and s, send to the H. B. copy of their 32-page g Satisfaction at Mini- he A.B.C.'s of boiler pplication of scientific tect, engineer or heat- u apply to your own B. Smith Company, 2429

rompt mailing you

Heating Satisfaction at

....

....

te. ....

won't want to live in it. It won't a world fit for any one to live in. it will be a grand prison."

BLANK PAGE

PAPER— Monitor
DATE— Jan 17

Koussevitzky and Beethoven

By STUART MASON

THE program of the twelfth Symphony concert, given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, consisted of Beethoven's Overture to Collin's tragedy, "Coriolanus," and the same composer's Sixth and Seventh symphonies.

This was not the program as originally announced. Mr. Koussevitzky is a conductor of surprises. Not only does he change his programs at short notice, but his conducting of them is not lacking in that element also. It is worth noticing that the first and most natural thought in connection with the symphony concerts these days concerns Mr. Koussevitzky. Rightly or not, in spite of ourselves, his personality has become all pervading.

Several times he has played the music of Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert or Weber in a manner which was unmistakably original if not always conformable with preconceived ideas or so-called traditions. He has even played such music in a manner which was to say the least whimsical and capricious.

A Greater Koussevitzky

Yesterday's program offered him abundant opportunity for the further display of those qualities which have distinguished him in the past. Yet here Mr. Koussevitzky must have surprised those who were looking forward to more of those often strangely distorted versions of familiar pieces. Yesterday a much greater Koussevitzky was revealed to the public, a Koussevitzky with a broader and nobler conception of Beethoven than was to be observed in the playing of either of the Third or the Fifth symphonies at past concerts.

Yet the performance was not ultra conservative and the impress of the conductor's individuality was not lacking. The music was played in the true romantic style. His conception of it was poetic and imaginative but fancy was duly restrained and never overstepped the bounds of good taste. Proportions were well observed and it is doubtful if a more satisfying interpretation of these two symphonies could be desired by the most fastidious.

Possibly the last movement of the Seventh symphony might have gained in rhythmical incisiveness had it been at a slightly slower pace, but never has it been our good fortune to hear the Sixth played with such a fortunate choice of tempi. This symphony, until yesterday, has always seemed a tiresome work full of needless repetitions, often childish in the character of its themes and in its imitations of the sounds of nature.

Not so yesterday. Mr. Koussevitzky succeeded in bringing out what must have been the original intentions of the composer. By taking the opening allegro and the scene by the brookside at a faster pace than has been customary with his predecessors he brought out the broad lines on which these movements are constructed as no other conductor has done. By playing the music of the tempest in a more subdued manner he suggested the storm to the imagination rather than attempted to paint it graphically, and by broadening the measures of the final hymn of thanksgiving he lent a dignity to these pages which has heretofore been lacking.

Symphony Transformed

The symphony as a whole was transformed. It became under his hands once more a vital music, a music which touched the heart, which set the imagination aglow, a music once more vivid and pulsing with life, a music touched with the genius of the great master who penned its measures.

In like manner was the interpretation of the Seventh symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky did not attempt to read into its measures meanings which were foreign to them. It was a conception of this music which was supremely sane and straightforward, a conception which was satisfying, which left the hearer with the impression that this and no other was the manner in which it should be played.

This was playing which restored faith in Beethoven's music, which made it possible to once more understand its greatness and beauty, its universal appeal. Oftentimes it had seemed faded and worn. After yesterday's performance we know that it is blessed with eternal youth.

Strange to say, Mr. Koussevitzky was unduly restrained in the dramatic Overture to "Coriolanus." Here those theatrical qualities which have served him in many another piece of similar nature were not in evidence. He is truly a man of surprises, of unusual and unexpected ways with music, yet withal capable of touching the heights.

AMUSEMENTS

NEW YORK

---

arles Hubbard, à Paris, Tina Lerner der Steinert, jeune composi- ur bostonnais, et William Brennan, gérant de l'orchestre symphonique de Boston.

Comme toujours en Europe musicale, on parla beaucoup de l'Amérique. On compara les orchestres, les prix, les programmes. M. Koussevitzky expliqua que l'orchestre symphonique de Boston est plus homogène, en raison de son plus grand nombre et de ses plus grandes facilités de répétitions, que les orchestres européens. Mais il reconnut à ceux-ci plus de spontanéité, plus de vie individuelle.

Si l'Amérique est devenue un centre d'activités inégalable en manifestations musicales, l'Europe par contre reprend peu à peu sa place et les artistes commencent à limiter leurs tournées américaines à quelques mois afin de garder leurs places d'honneur auprès des auditoires européens.

L'Amérique a fait beaucoup pour les artistes mais ceux-ci ont fait beaucoup, encore plus peut-être, pour elle. Le goût musical s'y développe, les artistes y soignent leurs auditions tout autant qu'ils

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzsky, conductor, last evening drew its usual large audience at Infantry Hall. It was a concert made notable by the first presentation by the Boston orchestra of Glazounov's Symphony No. 8. The evening's interest centred in the playing of this new work and in the appearance for the first time here of the violinist, Paul Kochanski.

The programme was played as follows:

Glinka..Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla"
Glazounov..Symphony No. 8 in E-flat, Op. 83
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Mesto.
III. Allegro.
IV. Finale: Moderato.
Vivaldi....Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in A minor
a. Allegro.
b. Largo.
c. Presto.
Liszt.........."Tasso; Lamento e Trionfo," Symphonic Poem No. 2

Alexander Constantinovitsch Glazounov was born in Leningrad in 1865. He is now living in that city where in 1906 he composed the Symphony No. 8, in E-flat Major. The symphony was first played in this country by the Russian Symphony Society, Modeste Altschuler, conductor, in New York, in 1907. Although not a composition of recent date its performance last evening under Serge Koussevitzsky was its first by the Boston orchestra.

The advent of Mr. Koussevitzsky proved an upward step in the life of the Boston Symphony. It also means we shall enjoy more intimate acquaintance with the store of Russian orchestral works. This is a very pleasant outlook for patrons of these concerts. The modern Russians write music that fire one's imagination. There is bigness, richness, in their creations. Melody seems a natural gift to these artistic Slavic minds. Under a conductor fitted by racial relationship and so artistically gifted as Koussevitzsky, Russian music finds an ideal interpreter. So, last evening, the audience with high anticipation awaited the playing of the Glazounov symphony.

It is said that in this work the composer was influenced by Brahms. This perhaps is true in certain characteristics of style. But it is thoroughly Russian in its musical language, its passionate utterance of thoughts that pour forth with unceasing flow. It is restless, at times reckless in powerful expression. Agreeable dissonance pursues its course through the maze of intricate harmony.

The opening movement, Allegro Moderato, moves with intense, vigorous expression, alternating in storms of orchestral violence and the calmness which succeeds titanic force. It is music that thrills through its kaleidoscopic color, its seething, restless spirit; music that tells of strife, of struggle to attain some splendid goal. Nearly attaining this it reaches climaxes of power and brilliance which gradually decline as if to gather strength for greater effort. The movements closes in one of these periods of calmness.

The second movement again reveals the masterful instrumentation which gives life and vitality to the score. Here Mr. Koussevitzsky moulds his men into a responsive unit that answers with seemingly intuitive sense his interpretive will. Bits of melody occasionally shine forth and these, in many voiced combination, are developed in a glittering mass of harmony. This movement also ends in soft effects.

The brighter of the four movements is heard in the following Allegro, but this gaiety is lost in reappearing agitation of style. A forceful climax brings it to a close.

The finale retains all the power and spirit of the preceding movements, and leaves the hearer with the thought that in this fine imaginative work the composer has left a worthy monument to his genius.

Mr. Kochansky received many recalls after his well played concerto. The Vivaldi composition is written in the fashion of the melodic writers for the violin of the early days, when tone and simplicity were in vogue. Technically, the concerto is not difficult. Its effect lies in the player's ability to sing upon his instrument rather than astonish with intricate double stopping and brilliant tours de force.

Mr. Kochansky showed himself to be well adapted to this style of playing, giving the first movement with breadth and strong, effective use of the bow. The Largo, played with grace and the sweetness required, was an artistic effort and in the lively and sparkling presto he performed brilliantly. A half-dozen recalls showed the audience's appreciation.

The Liszt Symphonic Poem is long and not particularly interesting save in the latter part. Here a big climax is built [illegible] which serves as a triumphal and ef[illegible] close.

A. F. P.

TRANSCRIPT JUNE 9

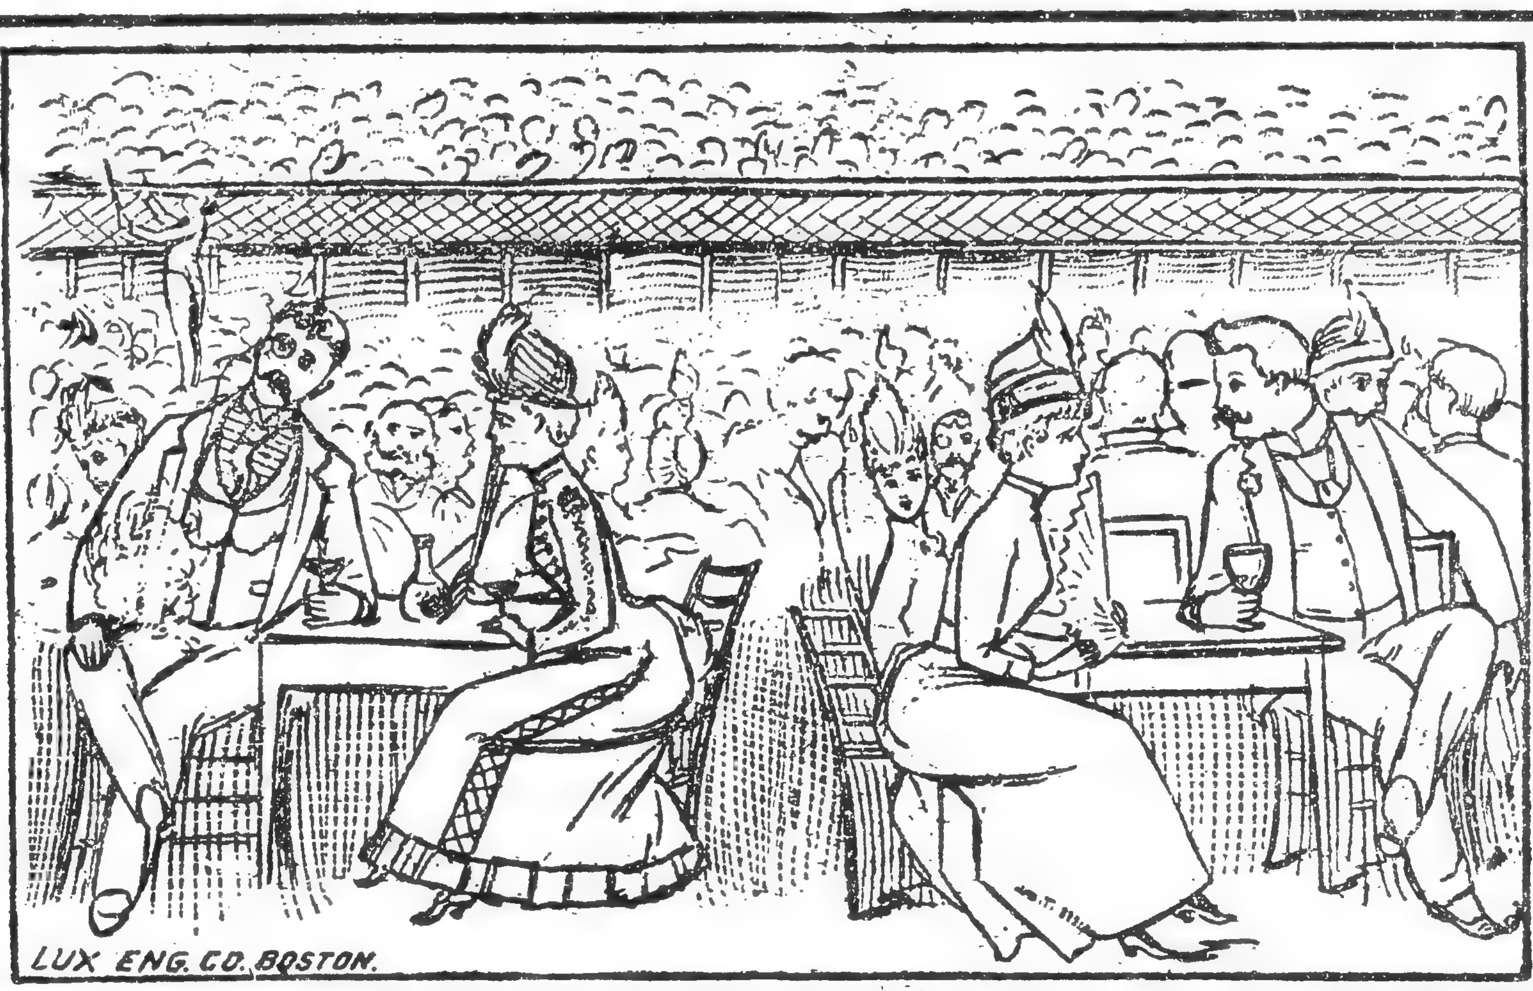
Other Times; Other Music

THIS MONDAY EVENING !

8 TO 11.

MUSIC HALL

PROMENADE CONCERTS



LUX ENG. CO. BOSTON.

50 GRAND ORCHESTRA 50

MR. AD. NEUENDORFF - - CONDUCTOR

Monday, August 20, 1888.

PROGRAMME.

1	WEDDING MARCH	MENDELSSOHN
2	OVERTURE (Rakoczy)	KELER BELA
3	WALTZ (Freudenklaenge)	RESCH
4	GRAND SELECTION (from Aida)	VERDI
5	OVERTURE (In Memoriam)	SULLIVAN
6	*a VORSPIEL to the 5th act Manfred	REINECKE
	*b INTERMEZZO (from Ballet Music Naila)	DELIBES
7	WALTHERS PRIZE SONG (from Die Meisersinger)	WAGNER
8	VORSPIEL to Henry the Lion	KRETSCHMER
9	OVERTURE (Orpheus aux Enfers)	OFFENBACH
10	WALTZ (Freut euch des Lebens)	STRAUSS
11	MEDITATION	BACH-GOUNOD
12	GALOP (La Chasse Infernale)	KOELLING

* The audience is respectfully requested to preserve silence during this number.

SPECIAL—To-morrow (Tuesday) 75th Night. Gala Performance. Only appearance of MISS MARIE JANSEN.

Tickets, 25 cents. Reserved Seats on Floor or Balcony, 50 cents, now on sale at the Box Office, Music Hall.

Memento of the Pops, When They Were Yet a Novelty

(From the Collection at Symphony Hall)

TRANSMITS SENSATION OF BEAUTY TO HEARERS

Boston Symphony Blazes Forth Into Radiating Brilliancy

LEADER IS MASTER ARTIST

Koussevitzky Invests Eloquence With Rhapsodic Transport

By JOHANNES MAGENDANZ,
Utica Conservatory of Music

It would be like carrying culture to Boston if one were to attempt a eulogy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We had occasion to hear it before and even if this were the first visit of the famous organization, we would take it for granted that criticism was out of place.

A capacity house greeted the genial conductor when he stepped with elastic steps upon his stand at the Avon Theater Tuesday night. One saw at once the alert, sensitive and nervous spirit in his graceful movements and gestures. The eloquence of his hands, particularly of his left, was remarkable, though at time he over indulged in gestures. Yet there was nothing affected about it, on the contrary he forgot himself entirely and was completely submerged in the music. And how he succeeded in transmitting the sensation, which he received, to the audience; how he raised them in the fire of the performance to white heat, how he analysed the moods of the composer's music! He is a poet; he makes the orchestra speak not merely eloquently, like others do, he invests eloquence with a rhapsodic transport, that matches vision.

And how he made the orchestra blaze forth into radiating brilliancy, how he plied symphonic climaxes, yet always leaving the background warm and the lines clear. And the orchestra! The sensibility of the blended tone masses was marvelous, perfect the luminous utterance of the music—I think particularly of the dainty Moussorgsky number—rhythmic suppleness and coloring, eloquence of passion—all and more could be noticed. The exquisite pianissimo of the horns and flutes was a dream. The trombones had a mellowness seldom heard.

The Symphony

The major work on the program was Glazounov's eighth symphony in E flat. A pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff, he shows like his master great technical skill. He too draws from national resources, and the color of his music is to a certain degree typically Russian. The first movement is a picture of pure joy and happiness. The principal theme utilizes free suspensions as its main sources of expression with a moderate sprinkling of ecstasy and soaring rapture. The second theme seems to indicate spiritual tranquillity in the secure possession of a precious object. Since the thematic and musical element of the first theme is more suitable for the development than that of the second, we hear it in the middle section almost exclusively employed; and the skill with which the composer tumbles from imitations into inversions, from contractions into expansions of theme or rhythm is amazing.

Unfortunately all these efforts make the interpretation somewhat prolix, fussy and even diffuse, and the permutations of the theme occasionally lack originality. But the movement was played with sincerity and abandon; the strings and the brass section were conspicuous for their marvellous tone quality. The second [illegible] is extremely lugubrious, as if smarting from a recent and profound bereavement, which the mourning soul is barely able to endure. Despair and horror speak throughout the movement in rhythms which remind us somewhat of the funeral march in the "Dusk of the Gods." It was played decidedly better than the first movement.

The third movement is still under the spell of its predecessor, suggesting a sort of danse macabre, spectre like, haunting and spookish in character. It is therefore, perhaps, the most impressive and musically the most valuable one. It gave the orchestra plenty opportunity of virtuosic display. The finale establishes a happy equilibrium; vigorous eruptions of elementary force are notable; the slow introduction occurred once more within the course of the movement, casting an ominous shadow upon its general tenor of contentment and puissance. A more plastic theme might have added to the effect of this movement. It can not be said that the symphony offered particularly inspirated music; neither could the sympathetic art of the conductor and the honest effort of the orchestra save the day.

En Route to San Francisco

Honegger's "Pacific 231" was the next number on the program and the waves of expectation ran pretty high. Perhaps too nigh.

Berloiz wrote a book "La Grotesque dans la Musique;" Honegger's "Pacific 231" is one of "les plus grotesques," that would set Hector spinning in his grave, had he only a chance to hear it. Honegger belongs to those who keep on preaching the evangel of the strange and grotesque. The effect of his "orchestrl movement" is a challenge to our conception of harmony, whether euphony or dissonance. Like a wild beast, growing and untrimmed it seems almost barbaric in its aspect: the rhythmic insistence, the frantic urge of stroke and counterstroke and the uncanny realism with which the thing is done, are dramatically stirring.

It had something of the elementary thrill of a Buffalo Bill story, only raised to the nth potency. But what Honegger does in an orchestral garb had been done long before him by Alkan for the piano, though his "railroad" study is still preserving the earmarks of decorum. Nevertheless Honegger's work is delightfully original and hits the popular fancy in the right spot.

Mr. Koussevitsky was an admirable "engineer." He started the thing like any freight train, quite slow; but scarcely was the caboose out of sight when he hit it at 50 an hour, and Lord knows, what the rate was when he sped through Nebraska and Wyoming. A huge joke, you say? No, sir, a very serious affair; the whole shooting match might have gone to smithereens. But, thanks to the man at the brakes, everything went smoothly, no accident, derailment or delay happened, unless we count the short stop near Denver, where the weary steel horse had to have a drink; yet the train pulled into the San Francisco station in due time.

Gee! It was an experience. For all the shouting, roaring, whistling, scratching, howling, rumbling, pounding and shrieking—was there not some yelling of Indians too?—one might have thought it was a ride to hell. Some one in the audience was seen rubbing his eyes; asked what seemed to he the matter, he said: "Why, I must have gotten a cinder in my eye when the damned thing went by." A musical chronicler tells us that when the Abbe Vogler, the great organist, imitated a thunderstorm, men donned their caps, women covered their heads and all the milk in town got sour. It seems that our ultra-modernists are at the end of their rope and grab up all kinds of odds and ends in the effort of pleading their cause successfully, but it is feared that neither express train, baby carriages, Zeppelins or "Upman" smoke studios will carry the day. In the meantime, it does no good for those who swear to Beethoven, Bach and the "Meistersinger" to assume the "transeat a me calix iste" attitude; nor should they lose their patience with those who bend their knees in worship of the "New Messiah."

The rest of the program consisted of some shorter numbers that gave to a certain extent relief. Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Flight of the Bumble Bee" had to be repeated.

Program Not Very Happy

The program was not a very happy one. Really great numbers were conspicuous by their absence. Some Bach, Wagner and Mendelssohn, as originally announced, would have given to the program a decidedly more distinctive background. It is a pity that immature taste and musical surfeit should dictate; if it was left to them we would hear nothing but bumblebees, cuckoos and what not. But why cavil? What's the use?

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER
911
ASA L. SHIPMAN'S SONS
NEW YORK

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE
REWIND